Tuesday, May 31, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Second report of the standing committee on standing orders.—Mr. Jacobs.

Seventh report of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.—Sir Eugene Fiset (for Mr. Vien).

CENTRAL FINANCE CORPORATION

MOTION TO RELIEVE COMPANY OF REPAYMENT OF PARLIAMENTARY FEES, AND AMENDMENTS THERETO

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last I gave notice of a motion in regard to the Central Finance Corporation, which paid certain fees on its application for an increase of capital last year, which increase was not granted. I now move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Isnor):

That the Central Finance Corporation, having paid a fee of $1,400 on the introduction of a bill for increase of capital in the session of 1937, be not required to pay the fees chargeable on increase of capital, on the reintroduction of the same bill during the present session, notwithstanding standing order No. 93, paragraphs (3) and (4) of the standing orders of the House of Commons, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Dunning that this question be referred to the standing committee on standing orders.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. DUNNING: The amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Carried.

Mr. STEVENS: What amendment was carried, Mr. Speaker? The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) suggested the words "the amendment." I ask what amendment.

Mr. DUNNING: The amendment to the motion of the hon. member for Brantford City.

Mr. STEVENS: No amendment was made.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, I made an amendment, when the matter was last before the house, that the subject matter of the resolution be referred to the committee on standing orders, that being the proper procedure under the rules.

Mr. STEVENS: I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is not in proper form. The motion reads: "notwithstanding standing order 93," and so on. If the minister has now made an amendment to refer the matter to the committee on standing orders, I have nothing further to say.

Mr. DUNNING: I made it on a previous occasion.

Mr. STEVENS: It should be made again to-day.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford City): The motion I made includes the amendment, and the latter part of the motion sets that forth.

Motion agreed to.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 132, for the relief of Kathleen Barnsley Prichard Hartney.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 133, for the relief of Thomas Russell.—Mr. Emmerson.

Bill No. 134, for the relief of Marie Marguerite Agnès Marcelle Dupont Ross.—Mr. Jacobs.

Bill No. 135, for the relief of Wilfred Augustus Cottle Stead.—Mr. Lennard.

Bill No. 136, for the relief of Celia Caplan Tucker.—Mr. Heaps.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED TRANSFERENCE OF WHEEL SHOPS FROM TORONTO TO LONDON, ONTARIO

On the orders of the day.

Mr. H. G. CLARKE (Rosedale): It has come to my attention that the transfer of the wheel shops of the Canadian National Railways at Spadina avenue, Toronto, to London, will put a lot of men out of work in Toronto. I am therefore directing these questions to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe):

1. Will the minister make a statement giving any information on this matter?
2. Will the minister prevail on the Canadian National Railway authorities to abstain from transferring this work from Toronto?
3. Could the minister give any reason for this proposed change?
4. Are a number of men being laid off at the East Toronto yards on account of this transfer?
5. What provision is being made for the men who are being laid off?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): My hon. friend gave me notice of this question a few moments ago. I have no information whatever on the subject, and in the ordinary course of events it is not a matter which would come to my attention. However, I shall be glad to direct the attention of the management of the railway to the inquiry of my hon. friend in this matter.

VALIDITY OF ALBERTA STATUTES

QUESTION OF DISALLOWANCE OF LEGISLATION INCLUDING ACT TO COME INTO FORCE JUNE 1

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): In view of the discussion that took place last evening it occurred to me this morning that this is the 31st of May and that to-morrow a certain statute which was enacted by the legislature of the province of Alberta will, unless disallowed, come into force. Inasmuch as great injury would follow to those who accept the statute if it were subsequently disallowed, I should like to ask the minister whether or not it is proposed to take immediate action to disallow such legislation, on the theory that if it were done, then 'twere well it were done quickly.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Six of the statutes which were enacted by the legislature of Alberta at its recent session are actually being considered by the department, and a recommendation will be prepared in due time, because there have been petitions for their disallowance. I might add that petitions are still coming in in very large numbers. The six statutes are the following: the Debt Adjustment Act, 1937, Amendment Act, 1938; the Limitation of Actions, 1935, which has been amended at the session of 1938; the Home Owners' Security Act; the 1938 Securities Tax Act; the Banking Corporations Temporary Additional Taxation Act; the Debt Proceedings Suspension Act, and the Tax Recovery Act, 1938. Requests for disallowance of these six statutes have been sent to the governor in council. Only one of them would come within the question that my right hon. friend has asked, namely, the 1938 Securities Tax Act, which compels every owner of a mortgage to pay a tax of two per cent on the principal of the mortgage on June 1 and to file a statement on the same day. There are penalties imposed—I think it is ten dollars a day—for failure to file the statement, and then an additional tax of five per cent of the tax of two per cent for every day of failure. This is really the only one in respect of which there is the urgency mentioned by my right hon. friend. I might say however that the question is a very difficult one, and there has not been any decision as yet.

Mr. MITCHELL: Will the Minister of Justice say whether there have been any petitions for the non-disallowance of these acts?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes. There have been a few letters and resolutions, rather than petitions, for the non-disallowance of these acts.

ANTICOSTI ISLAND

PROSPECTIVE SALE TO FOREIGN INTERESTS—MR. EMIL KARL GERHARDT

On the orders of the day.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to direct attention again to certain statements by one Karl R. Gerhard which appeared in the public press, in connection with his citizenship and his relations to the head of the German republic. I would ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) to ascertain whether or not Mr. Karl R. Gerhard or anyone with a similar name has been naturalized in this country in 1938, and whether or not the man who says that he is not Mr. Emil Karl Gerhardt is in fact the man who was part of the entourage of Mr. Hitler when he was visiting Rome a few weeks ago. I understand that the minister cannot answer now.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): This has been brought to my attention already. Perhaps it would be safer if I said to my right hon. friend that I will give him a fuller reply to-morrow; but my information so far is that they are two different men—

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I heard.

Mr. RINFRET: —and that the man to whom the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has alluded is not the gentleman who is a British citizen. However I will give a fuller reply to-morrow.

MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENTS

AUTHORIZATION OF LOANS TO ASSIST MUNICIPALITIES IN MAKING SELF-LIQUIDATING IMPROVEMENTS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider a proposed resolution to authorize loans not exceeding in the aggregate $30,000,000 to assist municipalities in making self-liquidating improvements.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: I think a statement is desirable at the outset of the discussion in committee on the resolution. The object of the bill to which this resolution is a preliminary is primarily to provide employment on self-liquidating works; secondly, it is for the purpose of enabling municipalities to finance on easier terms than ever before the erection, extension, renewal or improvement of income-producing or cost-reducing public services. It is an entirely new departure for the federal government to make loans generally direct to municipalities for municipal purposes, but I think it will be agreed that under the present conditions it is desirable that the credit of the dominion should be used wherever it can be used for the purpose of stimulating productive work.

On many occasions when the employment problem has been under discussion in the house there has been practical unanimity of opinion that it is desirable so far as possible to substitute work for relief, and I think I may say that there is practical unanimity of opinion also that the character of the work should be such as to produce revenue sufficient to take care of the cost; in other words, that it is not sound public policy to spend money on public works which do not of themselves earn a revenue wherewith to pay their carrying charges. The object of this bill, therefore, is to extend to municipalities the credit of the dominion on the exceedingly low interest rate of two per cent to enable the municipalities to proceed, as I said before, with the erection, extension, renewal or improvement of self-liquidating municipal projects.

There may be an objection, which I will anticipate now, that the municipality has no constitutional relationship with the parliament of Canada; that the municipalities of Canada are altogether creatures of the provincial legislatures; that the provincial legislatures alone can make laws respecting the conduct of municipal affairs within their borders. To all these I assent. We cannot legislate for any municipality in the Dominion of Canada; this parliament has no authority so to do. It may be urged that even by extending loans at a low rate of interest for the purpose indicated in this resolution we are interfering with the autonomy of the provinces. When the bill comes down it will be seen that the government seeks to guard against any suggestion of invasion of the autonomous rights of the provinces in this measure by providing that no project will be approved for the purpose of a federal loan unless the project itself has been approved by the government of the province, and secondly that the province guarantees to the dominion the repayment of the loan and the amortization charges by the municipality. There is therefore no compulsion in the law, no invasion of the autonomy of any province, but there is definitely a placing at the disposal of the municipalities of this dominion the credit of the dominion to enable them at lower rates than ever before to do works which in many cases are very much overdue.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be the credit of the dominion and the province, on that statement.

Mr. DUNNING: The credit of the dominion and the province, but the credit of the dominion is extended on terms which involve also a very definite contribution by the dominion to the cost of the enterprise itself. I will come to an estimate a little later of what the extent of the contribution of the dominion is in connection with the scheme. Many municipalities during the last few years have not been able to keep their income-producing services up to date, to make the necessary improvements, betterments, extensions and renewals. The public investment markets have not been available to many of them, partly because of the financial condition of the municipalities themselves, owing to existing high debts, high tax rates and tax arrears. These conditions have led in many cases to high operating and high maintenance charges simply because the money could not be provided for improvements and betterments which might have lowered and would in many cases have lowered costs of operation.

If the measure now proposed will enable productive undertakings to be carried on which, by increasing revenues from those benefiting from the services provided, or by decreasing costs of operation and maintenance, will pay for themselves without imposing an additional burden upon the general taxpayer, its justification, I submit, will be ample. I should emphasize that it is not the intention of the government in proposing this measure to tempt the municipalities into a type of debt which will involve higher general municipal taxation, but rather to assist the municipalities by means of an exceptionally low interest rate to provide those facilities either by means of service charges paid by those benefiting, or in the alternative, or possibly in addition, by the reduction in maintenance charges which are now very high on certain classes of obsolete municipal services in many municipalities.

The maximum amount of loan to be provided by legislation will be $30,000,000, but there will be a provision that the governor in council may fix a date after which no further loans will be made. The rate of interest on the loans will be two per cent, and the term of the loans will not be longer than the useful life of the project, with complete amortization during the life of the project. It is impossible, obviously, to give a definite term for the loan, because the life of one project will differ from the life of another; but the intention is to bring about self-liquidating undertakings.

I spoke of the purpose of the loans to finance the construction, improvements, extensions, or renewals of self-liquidating projects. A self-liquidating project is one which will increase the net revenues of the municipality sufficiently to pay interest on the loan and amortize the principal during the useful life of the project. Net revenue may be increased either by increased receipts from those benefiting from the service, or by decreased operating and maintenance charges. Again there must be demonstrated to the satisfaction of the government, first, the need for employment, and second, an urgent need for the project itself. The security taken by the government will be the debentures of the municipality. The loan, as I indicated before, must be guaranteed by the province in which the municipality is situated, and the project must be approved by the government of the province.

Mr. BENNETT: Will that constitute the determination of the question as to the work being necessary?

Mr. DUNNING: No, not entirely. It will be one of the factors. The original consideration is the need for the work in the municipality.

Mr. BENNETT: Who determines that?

Mr. DUNNING: The information must come to the Minister of Finance with the information gathered from the provincial government indicating its approval and a confirmation of the facts therein stated. It is proposed in the bill—I do not think the resolution deals with all phases of the bill, although I tried to make it as complete as possible—that the allocation of the $30,000,000 among the municipalities of the dominion shall bear the same relationship to $30,000,000 in each case that the population of the municipality bears to the population of the dominion as determined by the 1931 census. That is to say, the limit on the amount which may be lent to any one municipality under this act will be the proportion which the population of that municipality bore in the last census to the total population of the dominion.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, shortly it is only $3 per head.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. That introduces a difficulty which faces one in devising legislation of this kind, namely, that the smaller municipalities obviously would not be able to borrow a sufficient amount to be of any use in attempting to meet the problem either of providing work or of providing municipal facilities of a self-liquidating kind.

Mr. HEAPS: How about the larger ones?

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend let me make my statement?—and then of course I shall submit to questioning. I am trying to comprehend the whole thing in my mind at once.

As far as the smaller municipalities are concerned therefore it is hoped to overcome the problem represented by the statement I have just made by providing in the bill that notwithstanding the population provisions set out, a loan may be made to any municipality to the extent of $200,000. If hon. members will figure that out approximately on the basis indicated by the right hon. leader of the opposition it will be plain as to how that feature of the bill will work out.

As to the cost to the dominion, that of course will be represented by the difference between an interest rate of two per cent and the interest rate at which the dominion government is able to borrow from time to time for a length of time corresponding as nearly as possible to the term of the loan. It is however impossible to state positively just what the average term of these loans will be, based as they are upon the principle of self-liquidation within the useful life of the project. I can therefore give only an approximation of the cost to the government. The government actuaries have made certain estimates. Obviously if the loans on the average are for a term for which the dominion could borrow at a two per cent rate, then the cost to the dominion will be nil, provided no municipality defaults on its obligations.

Mr. BENNETT: What about administrative charges?

Mr. DUNNING: The administrative charges from the dominion's point of view will of course be absorbed as part of the cost of operation. If the loans are, on an average for a term, for which the dominion could borrow on a two and a half per cent basis, say ten years, then each half-yearly payment of $1,704,000 would show a loss to the dominion of $42,000—I am using round figures—or a total during the ten year period of say $850,000.

Let me state that in another way. If the average length of loans under this act should turn out to be ten years, and if the dominion can borrow at two and a half per cent for a ten year period, then the contribution made by the dominion, if the whole sum went out on that basis, would be $850,000 over the ten years, plus the cost of administration, as the leader of the opposition has said. If we assume a twenty year period, then of course the cost to the dominion rises. We have recently sold an issue of 20-year dominion bonds on a 3·07 per cent basis of cost. Therefore if we assume that the average term of the loans made under this act will be twenty years, and that the dominion could borrow for that period on an average of three and one-eighth per cent, each half-yearly payment would be $1,014,000 and there would be a loss to the dominion of $100,000 a year, or a total during the twenty year period of $4,000,000 plus the cost of administration. If the average term of the loans were thirty years, and if we assume that for such a period the dominion could borrow on a three and a quarter per cent basis, each half-yearly payment of $786.000 would show a loss to the dominion of $119,000 or a total during the thirty year period of approximately $7,150,000 plus the cost of administration.

From the inquiries I have been able to make regarding the length of useful life of projects which might be constructed under this legislation, I am inclined to the view that around twenty years is likely to be the effective period of amortization. It is rather difficult to state that with any accuracy, but I thought that in proposing the measure to the house I should endeavour to give information regarding the cost to the dominion of the whole scheme for varying periods from ten to thirty years, assuming that the whole amount goes out for average terms equal to each of the steps I have been discussing.

Perhaps it would be clearer to take a single loan for a project costing $1,000,000. On such a loan, if it were for ten years at two per cent, there would of course be no cost to the dominion other than cost of administration. If it were for ten years at two and a half per cent the total loss during the period to the dominion would be $28,000. If it were for twenty years, at three and one-eighth per cent, the total loss to the dominion on the $1,000,000 would be $134,000. If it were for thirty years the $1,000,000 at three and a quarter per cent would involve a loss to the dominion in addition to administration costs of $238,000.

I think I have covered all I desire to say at this stage of the proceedings. The dominion is satisfied, particularly as a result of information which has reached us following the announcement of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) that such a measure would be introduced, that there is a very definite need for just what this legislation proposes. There is no doubt that very many municipalities see in this proposal an opportunity of doing something really constructive for the people of the municipality, and really helpful from the standpoint of providing employment.

Mr. CAHAN: I am expressing my own views, which are very clear and emphatic, and not the views of any party, that in the present condition of affairs in Canada this proposal is inopportune. As hon. members know, we have had an opinion of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to the effect that expenditures made by vote of this parliament upon objects provincial or municipal, which are not within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of parliament, are illegal appropriations, and in view of that decision the government have instituted an investigation, more or less thorough, by means of the Rowell commission so-called, into the financial relations existing between the municipalities and the provinces on the one hand, and as between the municipalities and provinces and the dominion on the other.

We have been asked by the provinces time and again not to infringe upon the maintenance of their rights as provinces of this dominion, constituted by the British North America Act of 1867. In fact their insistence is so strong that more recently the idea is being propagated that Canada is but a name representing nine sovereign states which were created out of the British territory known as British North America by the British North America Act of 1867. While that contention no doubt is excessive and in my opinion unjustified, nevertheless it represents a growing sentiment in various parts of this dominion.

This parliament has assisted somewhat in the propagation of that sentiment. In my own experience I remember that I investigated expenditures made under appropriations voted by parliament, in the time of the late Sir Robert Borden, for the construction of roads and bridges in some of the provinces, especially in the province of Nova Scotia; and I do say on my responsibility as a member of this parliament that the expenditures so made were profligate and excessive and brought no real return commensurate with such expenditures. Those who expend moneys, for the raising of which and the payment of interest on which they are not responsible, do not consider such expenditures as public trusts in respect of which they, as honourable men, are bound to exercise a due degree of care and thrift.

In my opinion, as I have expressed it here, the British North America Act would not require very much in the way of amendment or modification if it were construed, interpreted and applied according to the views expressed at the time by those who framed that great constitutional measure. But for the confusion which does exist, this parliament and previous parliaments in my opinion are to a large extent responsible, because these parliaments have undertaken to interfere with provincial matters and have accompanied that interference with solatiums, sometimes amounting almost to bribery, in the way of financial assistance given to purely provincial projects.

I think there is no doubt, in view of the final decisions of the courts, that such appropriations as we have made for old age pensions and the like are not appropriations for subjects which are within the legislative competence of parliament. Every time we have interfered, out of a desire to assist in ameliorating the condition of some portion of the population in the provinces, we have brought this federal government deeper and deeper into the difficulty with the constituent provinces, or at least with some of them. At the present time in Canada there are provinces which are boasting of surpluses in their revenues, some very considerable surpluses. Under those circumstances why should we not refrain from expending federal money upon objects which are within the exclusive jurisdiction of such provinces, more especially since those are the very provinces which indignantly deny our right to interfere by legislation, administration or otherwise with the sovereign constituent rights of those provinces? Therefore it seems to me that a measure such as this is likely to sink the parliament of Canada and the Dominion of Canada more deeply into difficulties which should be solved before a large measure of financial relief to the municipalities, such as this, is enacted by the parliament of Canada.

The hon. gentleman has said—and I am merely summarizing his words—that this is to provide employment by enabling municipalities to construct income-producing municipal works. There are municipalities which will be entitled to come in and ask for relief and credit from the dominion treasury that are far more capable of providing such funds than the dominion government is capable. There are great cities in which there are great volumes of traffic and trade, large amounts of property, many men and corporations of wealth, which are able to provide for all the proper and serviceable municipal facilities required. There are provinces also which are able to provide not only for themselves as provinces but also for the municipalities under their care, supervision and keeping. Why should they not be called upon to provide such assistance?

We took over, first, temporary relief for unemployment. We have increased that in various ways by appropriations of various amounts for public works, some of which could not by any stretch of the imagination be included under the heading of federal public works. Then we have gone to the extreme in providing for the relief of the indigent and unemployed in provinces which boast of their surpluses and of the splendid state of their exchequers as compared with that of the dominion, until the idea seems to have permeated the minds of the whole population that the finance minister of Canada is in control of a money chest into which he may dip his arms to the elbows for the relief of every person, company, corporation or municipality that thinks it is in need of relief, utterly regardless of the fact that our condition as a dominion is, it seems to me, approaching a perilous point, where we are not able to provide, by revenues derived from federal taxation and from other proper sources, sufficient to pay our annual expenditures, much less to pay for the capital expenditures which we are making by appropriations of funds borrowed from time to time.

The important point at the present time is this: Until the Rowell commission, so-called, has reported—and I do not wish to discuss that commission or its work—and the government has decided as to the measures it will adopt in accordance with that report, this appropriation is ill-timed and inopportune. Because we must at a very early day come to a clear and definite understanding with the provincial governments and municipal authorities; and we shall not be in a position to come to a satisfactory understanding with them, an understanding which would be satisfactory to the whole of the dominion, until such time as we are resolved to maintain our federal services by our own taxation and to insist that they, by such taxation as they can impose at present or by such extended powers of taxation as may be granted to them, will undertake the full duty and responsibility of administering the affairs of the provinces and municipalities which, under the constitution of Canada, have been committed to their care.

I could say more. Perhaps it would be inadvisable for me to do so. I am committing no person but myself, as I have been expressing my own personal views. But to one who has lived with this question for some years, as I have, and had to do in the first years of my public life with provincial affairs and their administration, I am thoroughly convinced that, with the best of motives, parliament years ago took the wrong direction, and that by following along that wrong direction we will simply bring ourselves into graver and more complex difficulties.

The time has come when we should stop, look and listen, and consider and decide as to the future program of Canada in dealing with the provinces and municipalities, a program which must be initiated by the government of the day, but a program which I trust will be so broad, comprehensive, definite and satisfactory as to secure the approval of all parties in parliament.

Mr. McIVOR: Mr. Chairman, I am not a constitutional lawyer or a high financier, but this resolution looks like action to me. When I read about the municipalities meeting in Ottawa, in Toronto and other places, and sending their requests to the dominion government for relief, I think that this resolution is the answer to them. How are we going to cure unemployment if we do not provide productive work? As has been shown by conventions in municipalities, these municipalities have been in difficult times. If this is the father of assemblies in Canada, then certainly we should take the lead.

When I rose to speak I had intended asking the minister a question. In the event of the passage of the legislation taking over full control of the Bank of Canada could we borrow the money from that bank? In other words, could we take it out of one pocket, put it into another, and gain two per cent?

Mr. BENNETT: You do not have to put it back; you just take it.

Mr. HEAPS: All hon. members appreciate the sentiments expressed by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). That was the kind of talk one would expect from the hon. member, and I believe his viewpoint is appreciated. However I am always tempted to remark that I never heard him speak in that particular tone between the years 1930 and 1935, despite the fact that during that period vast sums of money were spent, probably not on projects exactly the same as those contemplated in the resolution, but on measures of a somewhat similar nature designed for the relief of unemployment.

In a sense I have been gratified by the statement of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), but my gratification was somewhat tempered when I heard him give the details of the proposed scheme. I am pleased indeed to learn the government contemplates spending $30,000,000. But if the scheme is hedged in the manner indicated by the minister I do not think the whole of the $30,000,000 will be spent by the government.

Mr. DUNNING: By the requests which are in now, I do not think there is much doubt about it.

Mr. HEAPS: I am not going by requests which may come in; I base my statement on the remarks of the minister. He said that the money will be handed out on a basis of population, and if that is so we shall be faced with a difficult situation. That would apply particularly in the large industrial centres of western Canada where there is a great deal of unemployment. Let us take as an example the city of Winnipeg. Its population of approximately 200,000 is about one-fiftieth that of the population of Canada, and according to the statement of the minister, Winnipeg will be entitled to receive one-fiftieth of the $30,000,000. If I am wrong I hope he will correct me.

Mr. DUNNING: The figures used by the right hon. the leader of the opposition will turn out to be approximately correct. If you allow approximately $3 per head of population you will not be far out.

Mr. HEAPS: As Winnipeg has one-fiftieth of the population of Canada it would be entitled to one-fiftieth of the $30,000,000, or $600,000. That works out at $3 per head of population.

Mr. DUNNING: I hope the hon. member did not understand me as putting forward this measure as a complete cure for all the unemployment that exists. This one measure deals with a particular class of productive enterprise which we believe will contribute towards that end. But there are like measures to come.

Mr. HEAPS: I quite realize what the minister has said; I understand him thoroughly. But on that basis the money will not be spent in the places where it is most needed. For instance if there is a severe unemployment problem in Winnipg, Vancouver or Edmonton, a problem much greater than that in other large industrial centres, those cities cannot get more than the amount to which they are entitled, despite the fact that some other city does not need assistance. For instance if Toronto or any of the other large industrial centres does not make a request for funds, still the municipalities needing assistance will be able to receive only their proportionate amount, according to population. For the city of Winnipeg under present circumstances $600,000 is a very small amount indeed, even to begin to take care of the unemployment problem. That is why I have a certain feeling of disappointment in the minister's statement this afternoon. I had expected he would outline a more comprehensive scheme. I am pleased to see that moneys are to be used for self-liquidating projects, but outside of housing I doubt if there are any schemes which could be styled as self-liquidating.

Mr. DUNNING: This is not intended to touch housing at all.

Mr. HEAPS: It is moneys distinct and apart from housing?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, absolutely.

Mr. HEAPS: And do I understand another bill will come down to deal with the housing problem?

Mr. DUNNING: Absolutely; the Minister of Labour has so stated.

Mr. HEAPS: Then if that measure is not now before the committee, I do not wish to deal with it. If it is intended in the present instance to deal with problems other than housing, of course a great deal of my criticism is not valid on this particular occasion, and I will admit it right away.

Mr. THORSON: The question raised by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) is one which the people of Canada must face. The sooner they do so the better for their welfare. It follows I think automatically from one of the recent decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council that this dominion parliament has no right to spend money in respect of any object which comes within the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces. It would seem that this consequence follows directly from the decision of the judicial committee of the privy council in the unemployment insurance reference. If that is so, the right of this parliament to spend any money for any object that falls within the legislative jurisdiction of the provinces is challenged; that challenge places before the people of Canada the necessity of deciding what objects of legislation are to be deemed national in their scope and what objects are truly of a provincial nature.

Mr. CAHAN: Hear, hear.

Mr. THORSON: And the sooner we face that question the better for the people of Canada.

There are a great many problems that were originally provincial in their scope and were within provincial jurisdiction, and are still regarded as such by the courts, although the nature of the problem has changed. Many of these problems that were originally provincial in their nature have now become national in their scope and importance; that brings squarely before us the necessity of recasting our constitution so that this parliament may be vested with the necessary jurisdiction to deal adequately with national problems.

Mr. BENNETT: If that is established under the language of Lord Haldane, we might have jurisdiction.

Mr. THORSON: It would be difficult to follow all the by-ways and by-paths through which Lord Haldane frequently travelled in dealing with constitutional problems.

Mr. BENNETT: I had reference to his observation that an undertaking local in its character in the first instance might, by reason of changed conditions, become national in its scope.

Mr. THORSON: Quite; it was once thought that we had an elastic constitution that would be self-adjusting and bring that about, but the latest decisions of the judicial committee of the privy council have removed that hope from our minds, so that we must recast the constitution in order to give parliament the necessary power to deal adequately with national problems.

Therefore it would seem to me that we should consider subjects of this sort first from the viewpoint of whether they are really national or provincial in their scope. If they are national, then we should face these national problems squarely and make the necessary adjustments in our constitution so that this parliament may have the necessary power.

I hope that this task will soon be undertaken by the people of Canada. We are in the position in this parliament of being continually held in contempt by reason of the fact that we have not in many cases the necessary legislative power to deal with problems that are truly national. We should acquire that power, and should do so in the interests not only of the dominion as a whole but of the individual provinces as well; for they have many duties now cast upon them which they cannot adequately discharge. The matter of unemployment relief and a program of works that will create employment is in my opinion a national one. I think this parliament is wise in bringing forward legislation such as this, because this is dealing with a national problem; if the validity of our act in so doing is challenged, we shall come to a solution of the problem all the sooner. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George served a useful purpose in directing our attention to this question.

Mr. SLAGHT: Will the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) be good enough to supplement his very clear explanation of the proposed bill by giving us a list of the projects which a municipality might be expected to go on with under the loans they would receive under this measure, so that we may get a better idea of the type of project he has in mind?

Mr. DUNNING: It is very difficult to give an answer to that, because of the variations that exist between the municipal laws in force in the various provinces. In some municipalities the provisions with respect to certain types of public works base capitalization and amortization on a service charge, whereas in another province the same utility is dealt with on the basis of general taxation; it is absorbed into the general scheme of things. In some provinces institutions such as the local government board in Saskatchewan—I forget what they call the similar body in Ontario and Manitoba—have a degree of authority over capital expenditures which enables them to determine whether the projects shall be a charge against the general municipal levy or be developed upon the basis of a service charge. It is quite impossible, therefore, to give a categorical answer. Really, "self-liquidating project" is the only definition I could find which would embrace all that I had in mind.

Mr. BENNETT: Three illustrations are given—waterworks, electric light systems, and gas plants.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. They are given because in practically all provinces they are dealt with on a service charge basis. But there is another type of case. There are waterworks already in existence, with old wooden stave pipes laid many years ago, and which involve at the present time a very high maintenance cost because of frequent breaks. The question then is, can that municipality, as a result of two per cent money and a low amortization, finance a new water main at less than or at approximately what it is now expending in trying to maintain an out-of-date, obsolete and very expensive utility? That is another illustration.

Mr. BENNETT: Plus possibly an additional charge.

Mr. DUNNING: Plus possibly an additional service charge. I see no way of defining it at this stage any more closely than by laying down the principle that the project undertaken under the act shall be self-liquidating. Obviously we do not want to broaden it to a point where it would encourage municipalities to go into unproductive enterprises.

Mr. BENNETT: "Self-liquidating" governs that.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and I am quite sure from the representations received thus far from municipalities all over the dominion that there is ample demand for help of this sort for enterprises which will be self-liquidating.

Mr. WALSH: I have a very complete and sympathetic understanding of the attitude assumed by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), and the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson). I do not wish to be understood as in any way opposing this resolution or offering anything in the way of destructive criticism of what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) proposes to do. I recognize the necessity of public works, particularly of the character which the minister has suggested, even in the resolution, but there is a question in my mind whether the works to be undertaken would continue to be for any length of time in the self-liquidating category. I am always distrustful of legislation which encourages public expenditure when the body making that expenditure is probably not in a position to bear the cost. This seems to be a measure which could be interpreted as encouaraging public expenditure on the part of municipalities even if it is placed in the category of self-liquidating assets of those municipalities. In many cases municipalities will seek to take advantage of what is offered in order to improve certain local conditions and will undertake public works to alleviate distress in their midst, although they can probably ill afford at the time to do so. That means a further increase of capital expenditure and of debt, even if the project for the time being is of a self-liquidating nature.

In the past we have had experience of similar enterprises and have, perhaps, spoken of them in terms which were rather gratifying; they probably served for the time being a useful purpose, but in the end proved to be a very decided hardship. I am thinking of such legislation that gave certain municipalities an opportunity of undertaking public enterprises on the basis of the government of Canada paying fifty per cent and the balance being found either by the municipality or jointly by the province and municipality. Those public works have now to be paid for; they are a debt upon the municipality concerned; the result is that it finds itself in the embarrassing position of having to bear the consequences of the debt, to pay the interest and to repay the principal over a period of years. I recall also grants which were made by this parliament in days gone by for technical education in the various provinces, to encourage the building of technical schools, to the cost of which the federal government made considerable contributions. Two or three years ago, however, the government of Canada decided to withdraw contributions to technical education. The result is that the municipality finds itself saddled with the expense of the proposition which it was encouraged to go into through the offer of the dominion government to find a certain amount of money in connection with the enterprise. I am not condemning it. It is all to the good. But in the end these municipalities find themselves with the obligation not only of providing interest on the debt and taking care of the sinking fund, but of defraying the cost of improvements and repairs of the buildings and paying the wages necessary in connection with upkeep.

Reverting to the matter of technical education, if the government had continued those grants the municipalities would have had no cause of complaint; but the government withdrew the grants. The result is that the municipalities find themseles burdened with the total cost instead of only a part of the cost of those enterprises. The buildings had to be maintained, and the purposes for which they were built had to be continued, and should be continued.

[Mr. Walsh.]

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend will pardon me, but surely he is not implying that particular weakness is inherent in this legislation?

Mr. WALSH: No. I quite agree with the minister. That is why I prefaced my remarks by suggesting that from the present aspect these projects appear to be self-liquidating, and there are satisfactory guarantees surrounding them. But so did the other enterprises, at the beginning, seem to be in the same category. For instance, I know of a certain city in Ontario that built three technical schools, on the promise of certain grants which were made through the provinces to the maintenance of this class of school. They took advantage of the situation, and it seemed to be very satisfactory, and was so as long as the assistance was continued, but it was discontinued, and the result is that the municipality is faced with the obligation of paying for the total upkeep. That is what I am afraid of in connection with this, even with all these guarantees.

Mr. DUNNING: But how could it be? The instance my hon. friend quotes rested upon the assumption that the federal government would continue annual grants from year to year forever or for a considerable period of time. No obligation under this legislation can arise upon an assumption of that sort. The municipality gets the money out and out; it knows that is all it will get. It must invest the money in a self-liquidating project; it must itself collect from the project the wherewithal to repay the federal government. It is not assuming that the federal government is going to continue to grant it money from year to year.

Mr. WALSH: Yes, I quite appreciate that the cases are not altogether analogous, but what I am trying to emphasize is that while we are starting out on this basis, I am not just sure where it may end. I am afraid that as a self-liquidating proposition, while it may be satisfactory for some years, over a period of time it is likely to become a liability; that is, we may be tempted to forget the circumstances surrounding the inauguration of such a grant as this. We all recognize the tremendous burden of taxation that rests upon municipalities at the present time. Many of them find themselves in difficult positions which are not of their own making but which were, so to speak, created for them. They undertook enterprises by way of relief measures during the past few years which have entailed upon them a tremendous debt, interest and sinking fund, all of which have to be met. In some cities over thirty per cent of the revenue has to be appropriated to sinking fund and interest. The result is that taxation is high, exceptionally so in many of our larger cities. The reaction is that building projects are at a standstill; heavy and necessary repairs to buildings cannot be made; yet if there is one branch of trade in Canada which should be improved, it is the building trade, particularly in the larger cities. They cannot be made unless there is building, and building will not be undertaken under present conditions, where the municipalities find themselves overburdened with debt and forced to raise a very considerable amount of money for the purpose of liquidating that debt or meeting interest and sinking fund charges from year to year. The only way in which we can encourage building operations in the larger cities is to lower taxation. Any measure that will tend towards lower taxation in those cities will tend to increase the business of the building trades; and any improvement that takes place will result in a general improvement in trade throughout Canada.

I emphasize that point and also the handicap under which the municipalities are working at the present time. I have every sympathy with the project in mind. I believe that the minister has surrounded it sufficiently with safeguards if they are maintained. We know governments and we know politics and we are rather afraid of legislation of this sort, but I should not like to see any legislation introduced which would encourage any municipality to enter upon a public works enterprise that will further increase the burden within that municipality and further delay the day when building operations can be carried out so that we can benefit thereby.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In Toronto we are faced with a very serious situation in connection with the extension of the sewage disposal works of that city. I do not know whether that can be called a self-liquidating scheme, but it is something which is very necessary, and it is also important that work be provided in Toronto in view of the unemployment situation. The present sewage disposal plant there is entirely inadequate. Sewage is going into the lake untreated—well, it is treated but we do not know how much of it gets the benefit of the treatment. It is a large project, and one that will take a good deal of money, but it is very necessary. The city of Toronto does not wish to embark upon any work which is not useful. There are a good many projects which people are talking about, but we want something which will be useful, something which will not represent a waste of money. Work in connection with sewage disposal in Toronto would benefit that city, and, more than that, it would benefit all those who are on the great waterways from that point down to the sea. That is something else to be considered. As it is now, sewage going into the lake not only affects the health of the people but kills fish. Would it be possible in order to undertake a project of that kind to guarantee the bonds of the city of Toronto, or would it be possible to let them have so much money to start with so that they might get a part of the work done? Certainly it is a very useful work, but the city needs assistance. I should like to see something done about it.

Mr. DUNNING: In this legislation there is no provision authorizing the dominion to guarantee the bonds of any municipality. I was under the impression that the credit of the city of Toronto stood very high, and I have no doubt that the city would be able to finance any undertaking of a general sort. But while possibly an enterprise of the kind mentioned by my hon. friend might not be self-liquidating, I have no doubt at all that there are many projects in Toronto which would be self-liquidating, and which, if financed under this scheme, would relieve the general credit of the city to such an extent as to enable them to do what they might wish to do with respect to other schemes that are not self-liquidating.

Mr. HARRIS: Would any scheme in connection with hospital extension be self-liquidating?

Mr. DUNNING: It depends entirely on the provincial law. In some cases hospitals are self-liquidating, while in others they are not.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): With further reference to the sewage disposal question, I do not know of any work that could be undertaken in Toronto which would furnish so much individual labour, but I do not believe that the city of Toronto could borrow money at two per cent. With the assistance of the dominion government, however, they could, and if they did have something done along that line, it would not cost the dominion anything at all.

Mr. ROGERS: I wish only to emphasize one aspect of the resolution before the committee. Actually, although it does not so state, the proposed measure is presented as a very definite part of the program submitted by the government to deal with the unemployment situation, and we have to consider the legislation in that context. For some years past it has been accepted as an obligation of the dominion government that we should assist the provinces in dealing with unemployment. We have accepted that obligation and have discharged it in a number of different ways. We have assisted the provinces through contributions for what has been termed direct relief. For a number of years we have also assisted the provinces in what has been known as a joint works program. Under some of these programs we have actually made contributions to municipal projects. I might mention in that connection the Winnipeg sewage disposal plant which is now being completed. That work was commenced in 1935 under the preceding administration and the obligation was assumed by the present government when it came into office. That was a definite contribution by the dominion to a municipal project. It has seemed wise, however, and in this I am entirely in accord with what has been said by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), and the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) that we as a dominion government should confine so far as possible our own expenditures to projects that are definitely within federal jurisdiction.

As we look back over our past experience we must admit that much confusion has resulted from the policy of conditional subsidies and grants in aid for specific purposes, which has been followed in the post-war period. But in this legislation the dominion government is not making a definite contribution to municipal projects as such. We are rather giving the support of the credit of the national government to the municipalities in order that they may relieve unemployment and provide themselves as they see their need with these self-liquidating projects. That is the essential purpose of the legislation which will be founded upon this resolution. It is designed, with the housing legislation to be later presented, to assist in the revival of the construction industry in Canada. On the basis of authoritative information that comes to us from those engaged in the industry and also from the bureau of statistics, it can be said that there is no branch of employment in Canada that is more capable of rapid revival under proper stimulus than the construction industry. If we can through housing legislation and assistance of this kind bring about a very considerable improvement in the construction industry, that will be of very great assistance in enabling municipalities across the country to reduce relief rolls and provide work as a substitute for the idleness in which, perhaps of necessity, so many of our people have been involved under the administration of direct relief. So that in the consideration which we give to this resolution it is important to keep before us at all times that the purpose of the legislation is to relieve the unemployment situation which now confronts the country.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. LEADER: I rise to support this resolution. I believe it should result in some very useful work and provide employment for great numbers of our workers. But the thought that strikes me now, as it has on former occasions, is that we are able to borrow money at such a low rate of interest compared with the rates now being paid for municipal undertakings and other works in this country. I believe I am justified in mentioning that fact again this afternoon, and pointing out to the minister and the government that they should undertake by some means to scale down interest rates now being paid. Let them attack the problem as they did in England and in Australia.

Mr. BENNETT: Building loans are paying five per cent in England.

Mr. LEADER: This resolution proposes to lend money to the municipalities at two per cent. In comparison I want to take as an example my own municipality, the rural municipality of Portage la Prairie. We are paying six per cent on debentures, and have been for nearly twenty years. Furthermore the municipality has the money in the bank to discharge those obligations. I asked them last fall why they did not pay them off, and they said they had not the power. On account of the term of the agreement—which I do not wish to repudiate—they could not pay them off. It seems to me they should have power to pay off those debentures and save that six per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, that is a matter for the legislature of Manitoba. He cannot lay that condition at the door of this parliament. The provincial legislatures legislate for the municipalities; we cannot control that in this house.

Mr. LEADER: Well, I must repeat what I heard the premier of Manitoba say not two months ago, that if the dominion government does not scale down the interest rates of this country the province of Manitoba will undertake to do something in self-defence.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not the question with which my hon. friend was dealing and which caused me to interrupt him. The question my hon. friend raised was as to the terms of debentures issued by his municipality. The terms of those debentures are subject to the approval of the legislature and government of Manitoba; they are not within the control of this parliament. I was not dealing with the general question of interest rates, but with the specific statement my hon. friend just made.

Mr. LEADER: Yes, the finance minister is entirely right in that regard, but I was going on to say that our municipality has the money in the bank and could pay them off; in such circumstances I do not consider it is much of a hardship to continue paying six per cent interest. I just gave that as an example. But there are millions of dollars of municipal obligations in this dominion in respect of which the municipalities cannot even pay the interest, yet the federal government refuses to give them the power to scale down their high interest rates.

I was going on to say that in Portage la Prairie last year the rink was burned down. I suppose a building such as that would come under this classification, because it is revenue-producing and would be self-liquidating. A vote was taken in the city and a by-law passed guaranteeing bonds, amounting to about $25,000, to build a rink. The city borrowed the money from a private individual and they are paying six per cent on it and were glad to get it. But it is too much in view of the fact that we can borrow money now at two per cent.

Let me give another example. The city made an extension of the waterworks system, expending $70,000 to $80,000 last year. I presume they borrowed that money, and I presume also that they are paying six per cent for it. The point I make is that there must be something this government can do to scale down these interest rates from six per cent—or perhaps more—which we are now paying, to two per cent. If that were done, out of the interest the municipalities would save they could themselves undertake many of these projects, and it would not be so necessary for the government to guarantee the bonds of the municipality as provided in this resolution.

I am not condemning the resolution; nevertheless it is an encouragement to municipalities to go further into debt. Under prevailing conditions I believe the resolution is in the interests of Canada, and I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Labour upon suggesting this plan. But I say again that I believe this government should undertake—and it has been too long delayed—to scale down the interest payable on the public debt, including municipal, provincial and dominion.

Mr. DUPUIS: Would the expression "other self-liquidating municipal project" include a municipal market building and accommodations in which the city charges the farmers fees for their stands?

Mr. DUNNING: That would depend on whether the facility contemplated was being provided on a definitely self-liquidating basis —that is to say, whether on examination the scale of fees provided, a reasonably conservative estimate of the extent of the patronage, and the experience of the past, demonstrated to the satisfaction of the province and of the dominion that the project would be self-liquidating.

Mr. BENNETT: And whether they were Liberals.

Mr. DUNNING: But if it is a proposal merely to erect a market building without any conditions at all with respect to the project paying for itself, the answer would be no. It would depend entirely on the set-up. It would not have anything to do with the political complexion of the municipal council, as suggested by the leader of the opposition.

Mr. DUPUIS: I want to corroborate what the minister has said and relieve the mind of the right hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett). The project I have in mind is a proposal to provide accommodation for a large group of vegetable producers around the city of Montreal, who for many years have been asking for it. At present they are confined in a very small space around Bonsecours market, so much so that they cannot approach the market with facility; if they do they are pushed back by the police, or fined. The consequence is that there has been established in Montreal a kind of trust which controls the whole vegetable market, to the detriment of producers and consumers. Some years ago I was asked by all the vegetable producers around Montreal to represent them before the legislature. The right hon. gentleman will see that I was not playing politics in that case at all; for the Liberal party was then in power in Quebec, and I fought that case on behalf of the vegetable producers. We could not obtain accommodation, owing to the objections of the municipal administration of Montreal at that time, unless the whole project were submitted to a referendum. It would appear as if this legislation would afford an opportunity to the farmers of that district and to the city of Montreal to avail themselves of this legislation and provide accommodation to the farmers and also the consumers of the city.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Before the resolution is put to the vote I desire to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and the government upon having introduced this resolution. It marks a new era in our national economy, if I judge it rightly, and expresses a high point in our general attitude towards municipal, provincial and national development. Hitherto small municipalities had to go into the open market and pay high interest on the moneys they desired. We are now about to establish an entirely different condition, and I think in the very near future, if I am permitted the opportunity, I can show how we may scale down our national debt. We are not talking about that to-day, but I must express myself as pleased with this general resolution.

I have a feeling that political and economic sense should be taught in our schools as part of the curriculum. Too often municipalities do not hesitate to get all the money they need when markets are right, without considering the self-liquidating nature of the undertakings on which they are about to embark. I have in mind, however, in another connection the extraordinary advantage that this will be to a prominent community in British Columbia where last year the water was analysed and on six occasions discovered to be contaminated. The provincial government could do nothing; by itself the municipality could not raise the money without paying a high rate of interest. Here is an opportunity afforded that municipality to obtain money at a very reasonable rate of interest and so safeguard the health of its people and assist them to avoid disease. I am heartily in agreement with this project, and I hope others of a like nature are coming forward. According to the 1931 census, the population of Canada was approximately 11,300,000, and if a per capita expenditure of only one cent per day was made in addition to what is now being expended we could increase the total industrial expenditure each year by $41,000,000. Those are staggering figures, when we consider that many of our people are living on the thin edge of the existence line. We must not only develop work at which these people can get higher wages; we must also discover some method by which each individual may get what he desires in such a way that he can pay for it without being compelled to go to charity and be placed on relief.

To my mind this is an excellent step that is being taken by the government, and I congratulate them upon it.

Mr. BARBER: I am in accord with this resolution, Mr. Chairman, but there is one question that occurs to me. A very large portion of British Columbia is not municipally organized. We have settlements springing up in unorganized districts which come directly under the government. I know of one or two points in particular where settlements have been considering the installation of water and light systems, and the nature of the industries surrounding them would indicate that there would be a good revenue from such systems. I was wondering if those settlements could be dealt with through the government, when they are not municipally organized.

Mr. DUNNING: Provision will be made in the bill in respect of areas which, having no municipal organization, are dealt with directly by provincial governments.

Mr. BENNETT: I have just one word to add. The hon. members for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) and Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) raised a legal issue that may become of very great importance, but I think the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) was very wise in directing attention to the fact that the underlying policy in connection with this matter had to do with unemployment. Nothing will be easier than for this measure to be misunderstood. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor) has just spoken of it as though it were something it is not at all. The hon. member dealt with something that this bill is not. This bill does not provide for municipal financing. This measure intends to do one thing, and one thing only. Where it will provide employment—the minister was very clear about that; that is the first—and second, where works are necessary works, then this measure becomes available.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): That is it precisely.

Mr. BENNETT: That has nothing to do in any shape or form with municipal financing as such. It has to do with a broad general policy of national application in regard to unemployment; it must, or else it falls by the wayside. The minister says this is part of a program that will deal with that national issue. If that be so, then one approaches it very simply, and the difficulties to which reference was made—and the hon. member for Selkirk was fair about it—may vanish if you can assert beyond peradventure that this is a national measure; that is, that it deals with a measure of national importance within the language of the courts. Otherwise it may be that somebody will apply for an injunction when an application is made under the statute.

Mr. DUNNING: That is why I made that my first word. Primarily it is to provide employment.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite; I followed that at once. The remarks of the Minister of Finance were supplemented by those of the Minister of Labour, to make it clear that the underlying purpose of the measure is to deal with the problem of unemployment within municipal areas. I asked the minister who was to determine that question and he said that obviously many authorities would be responsible for representations that would contribute to the ultimate determination of the question.

There is nothing new about one side of this resolution. During the days of the development of the automobile a grant of many millions of dollars was made by this parliament to assist in the construction of highways. As a result of inquiries that were made it became apparent that the money would have to be expended by the provinces and municipalities and that the dominion might exercise supervisory powers as to the character of the works to be constructed and the approving of the general plans. That was a recognition of the supremacy of the province with respect to property and civil rights within its boundaries and with respect to the municipalities, as creatures created by the legislature of the province. That ended any further effort on the part of the dominion to deal with the highway question as such, outside of questions that might arise in connection with an interprovincial or trans-Canada highway, over which this parliament might have jurisdiction.

The fact that we deal with the assessment of money on the basis of population makes it a matter of extreme difficulty, yet there is no other method by which it could be dealt with that would give any measure of satisfaction to every part of the dominion. Apparently a city of eighty thousand people would have a maximum available under this act of roughly a quarter of a million dollars. That would be a rather inadequate sum with which to approach some of the problems of which I have knowledge in some of these communities. The point raised by one of the hon. members for Toronto, as to our being able to apply the principle of the proposed act to a portion of an undertaking, arises at once.

Mr. DUNNING: That is provided.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it will be. It is open to that construction, and I apprehend that is what is intended.

Mr. DUNNING: It is developed in the bill itself.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the bill will naturally develop it. We will take for instance a city like greater Vancouver with a population of 250,000. There you would have a maximum of $750,000. The sum of $750,000 in that city would probably go a very considerable distance, if used for self-liquidating projects, for the extension of waterworks, sewers and so on. They purchased their electric light and, I think, own their poles; they do not own their street railway system, I believe. But going to the prairie provinces we might take a town in which the maximum as provided by the resolution would be $200,000. That of course would be very helpful; but in connection with an almost worn out waterworks system it might be extremely difficult to carry on. I had in mind the sewage disposal plant in Winnipeg which we had to deal with. There is a case in which the application of the principle behind this measure would be wholly inadequate.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And as a matter of fact in my judgment at that time it was a case either of an epidemic or of going ahead with the sewage disposal plant, one or the other. We were forced by the circumstances to assist in the construction of that plant, which was a difficult and costly undertaking. The sum I have mentioned would not be any good at all.

The application of the general principle of a consideration of population in determining the amount to be distributed will create a situation which I fancy in many cases will be impossible of application, although it would be highly desirable.

There is, however, a method of disposing of this matter which will remove any possibility of the charge of its being illegal, which is the method which was adopted not by the former government, but by former governments, of placing the money under adequate supervision through provincial authorities.

The reason that at the present time money is lent to the municipalities by the provinces and not by the dominion was so adequately dealt with by the Minister of Finance that I do not propose to repeat it. They are the creatures of the legislatures. We deal only with the entity called the province, and not with the entities created by the legislatures. We are now proposing to depart from that and deal with the entities created by the legislatures themselves. In so doing we did come in conflict with—it may be an obiter dictum of the privy council; but at least we ran against that in the last cases. We overcome that if all the preliminary steps are taken that the minister has suggested, and the ultimate distribution is a matter between the provinces and the dominion. For it will be remembered that the province is being asked to give its guarantee, and frankly I fancy some of the provinces will hesitate greatly to do it. Because the amount which would be available would be insignificant having regard to the requirements of what might be called medium-sized communities in some of the provinces. They might well hesitate to give their guarantee; I fancy some will hesitate to do so. I believe I should point out to the minister that it will require legislation to enable them to do so.

Mr. DUNNING: In some cases.

Mr. BENNETT: In all cases, either legislation that is already existent or that will have to be enacted. And as this act is supposed to be of service in the immediate future it is quite clear that where the legislatures have risen for this year they cannot come within the provisions of the act.

Mr. DUNNING: But there is an alternative.

Mr. BENNETT: The alternative is to waive it, of course. The alternative is to take the promise of the government that it will do it, and then take a chance on it.

But I say as the resolution reads it is quite obvious that if the legislature of a province has met and risen for the year it cannot deal with the guarantee, which in most instances, is a statutory requirement. Although I am not quite sure, I will admit that there are about three provinces which have general statutes enabling them to give guarantees under certain very restrictive conditions. Whether this comes within any of them or not, I am not in a position to say. But I think it is well to mention to the minister that that guarantee must be provided for. How are we going to deal with Ontario, for instance? My memory is that there is no general power of guarantee on the part of the government of Ontario for matters of this kind. Any guarantee given by the government without statutory authorization is invalid. There being therefore no authorization, this act cannot become effective in Ontario until the legislature meets, unless—and that is the reason I make the suggestion—we deal with it by some other method. The same applies equally to British Columbia. The legislature of that province has risen for the year.

Mr. DUPUIS: Quebec is the same.

Mr. BENNETT: And the same applies to Quebec as the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville has indicated. Under these circumstances I think we should carefully consider whether or not we may not be enacting legislation which looks upon the face of it to be excellent, but which has imposed upon it the condition of a guarantee by a province and a municipality, and which may become abortive, and which would be absolutely useless from the standpoint of practical application until the legislatures met.

And what is more, I think I should say to the minister that in some of the provinces I know the municipalities have no power of guaranteeing unless they get the exact, specific legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: No power to borrow.

Mr. BENNETT: No power to guarantee.

Mr. DUNNING: They do not guarantee anything; the municipality does not guarantee.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought it was proposed that a municipality should give its guarantee for the payment of debentures, where they were issued on self-liquidating schemes by boards owned by the municipality, which, however, would guarantee the payment of debentures issued by the board.

Mr. DUNNING: That of course would come in in that sense.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; because the minister gave an illustration, and I thought I followed him accurately.

Mr. DUNNING: But that is a rare case. In most cases they are owned directly.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but in one or two instances of which the Minister of Finance has knowledge, they did set up by statute an independent body for the purpose of operating their utility; and as I followed his illustration it would be possible for this legislation to be made available to them, provided the city gave its guarantee as being the real owner of the utility, although the debentures would be the debentures not of the municipality but of the utility.

Mr. DUNNING: The municipality would never have to obtain authorization from the province.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is the point I make. Those are the two points I think we shall have to consider carefully when we come to the bill itself. For frankly I do not see how we are going to make this effective without the legislatures of the provinces taking steps to give their guarantees, or to authorize such guarantees to be given. I am not interposing this in any way as an obstruction, but rather as a suggestion which I think will have to be met before we can this year make it effective. The Minister of Labour has indicated how desirable it is that we should do so. That difficulty could be overcome in part by making the distribution a matter as between the provinces and the municipalities, provided the provinces would have the power they have heretofore enjoyed in that regard.

But a look at the orders in council downstairs does not induce one to believe that self-liquidation has been the sole determining factor in the granting of the aid to which reference has been made. Under the circumstances I think we will have to give the utmost consideration to the details of the measure. The minister has said that the resolution is as detailed as he thought he could make it. There are some details he has supplied in his very admirable explanation, but I am afraid that unless we go beyond the terms of the resolution, or if we follow strictly the terms of the resolution, we will find we have placed upon the statute book an act that provides for something being done next year, after the legislatures of the provinces have met and authorized their several governments to give the guarantees which, under the resolution, constitute an essential feature of the proposal.

Mr. DUPUIS: Would the right hon. member permit a remark?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUPUIS: It occurs to me that in many legislatures statutes were passed concerning unemployment and relief acts. I am sure that in Quebec similar legislation was passed, stipulating that it was for unemployment or relief, and the municipality was not bound to obtain authorization from the province. Otherwise it would be necessary to have either a referendum or the authorization of the provincial government.

Mr. BENNETT: What the hon. member has said is correct so far as the municipalities are concerned. But the point I was endeavouring to make was that unless and until the legislatures of the several provinces have authorized their governments to give guarantees for the repayment of the sums advanced by the dominion under this legislation, it cannot become workable under the terms of the resolution now before us. I think there is no doubt as to that, and as many of the legislatures have risen for the year 1938 it will be essential for us to consider, when the bill based on this resolution is before us, whether we are in a position to insist upon that guarantee being given. It would involve the minister ascertaining from the several provinces whether or not they have the authority to give the guarantees without further legislation.

Mr. DUPUIS: The same difficulty will occur even if the distribution is made to the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: No, because some of them have power to give promises to pay, which would be the same thing with respect to unemployment relief as a guarantee.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps I should at this stage indicate what is in the mind of the government regarding the point raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). In fact, I think I should apologize for not having anticipated it, but I overlooked it completely in making my statement.

The laws of the provinces relating to municipal expenditures vary very widely; the powers vested by the legislatures in the various lieutenant governors in council vary very widely as also do the powers extended to municipalities to do certain things involving capital expenditure. It is quite impossible to frame a measure which would meet all the varying conditions, and I was compelled therefore to visualize the possibility that this scheme might have a sufficient appeal to the various provincial authorities to warrant them even in calling the legislature together for a couple of days to make possible what might be required in their particular case, for the municipalities on the one hand and for themselves on the other, to enable them to come within the ambit of the legislation.

I will be perfectly frank, Mr. Chairman, and say that I do not think the dominion can extend this credit on any less secured terms than those involved in the bill. As the one charged with the guardianship of the treasury, I should say that I believe the security asked for by this legislation is reasonable and no more than adequate so far as the dominion is concerned, especially when we have in mind the fact that each legislature controls absolutely the municipalities within its borders. The municipalities are wholly the creatures at all times of the provincial legislatures. If we proceed to lend direct to the municipalities—and there is some question whether we could, as indicated by the leader of the opposition,—it would be open to any provincial legislature so to change the conditions under which its municipalities operate as to make it quite impossible for us to get the money back. We might as well face that. That being the case, seeing that we are rendering this assistance to institutions which are wholly the creatures of provincial legislatures, I think that when we are lending the money so cheaply, when we are taking the degree of loss on the loan which I indicated in my earlier remarks on the subject, the minimum security we should ask is that the province should guarantee that the municipality will keep the obligation it has incurred for a project; and remember, that the project must itself have the approval of the provincial government before it can become eligible for a loan under this statute.

Mr. BENNETT: And be self-liquidating.

Mr. DUNNING: And be self-liquidating. I would not regard it as a hardship, and I am sure the provinces would not, for the legislatures, if necessary, to meet for the very short time required to enable such amendments to be made to their municipal laws as would enable them to take advantage of this legislation. Before this session is over there may be, there will be, other measures which may involve a similar principle. If we are to extend the credit of this dominion to our various self-governing bodies of one kind or another it seems to me that we must take the constitutional aspect sufficiently into account and that we must receive such security as the people of Canada have the right to expect us to take, especially when the expenditure involves a definite annual contribution by the people of the whole of Canada to the people of a particular part of Canada who are organized into a municipality.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): In view of the earlier remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the remarks now made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), I should like to know specifically, Mr. Chairman, whether in your judgment I am misinterpreting this resolution. I had no idea that I had done so. I instanced a certain municipality in British Columbia which had a faulty waterworks and desired to improve it; desired to take out the old wooden pipes and replace them with concrete pipes. That is all work which would involve labour, and it would, as I see it, come within the purview and under the provisions of this legislation. Am I correct in so interpreting it?

Mr. DUNNING: You have omitted one essential qualification. The work must be self-liquidating.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Oh, yes. That was in my mind, although I did not state it.

Mr. BENNETT: And one other qualification.

Mr. DUNNING: The approval of the provincial government.

Mr. BENNETT: One other.

Mr. EULER: It has to provide employment.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the essential basis, yes. Might I ask my hon. friend if there is any unemployment in the municipality concerned?

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: A great deal? That would be an essential primary condition.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): Just to make the resolution unanimous, Mr. Chairman, I wish to endorse it for our group here. I can see that a great deal of credit will be derived from this resolution. I have in mind a problem in Edmonton which for a number of years has been debated, and which has been a financial issue; that is, the addition of another unit to the electric light plant of the city. I assume that would come under this resolution?

Mr. DUNNING: Provided it comes within the scope of the conditions I have named, yes.

Mr. MITCHELL: Will the minister tell us whether or not the federal government will accept the guarantee of the province of Alberta?

Mr. DUNNING: I am sorry that question was asked.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 143, to assist municipalities in making self-liquidating improvements.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REVISION OF RADIOTELEGRAPH ACT—CLARIFYING OF SECTIONS DEALING WITH LICENSING RADIO RECEIVING SETS

The house resumed from Thursday, May 12, consideration in committee of Bill No. 52, respecting radio in Canada—Mr. Howe—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 9.

Mr. LAWSON: As some of the prior sections to section 9 were allowed to stand, because the minister was going to consider having certain amendments moved to those prior sections, may I suggest to him that it might facilitate our dealing with the subsequent clauses if he would go back to those which stood and deal first with the proposed amendments to them?

Mr. HOWE: According to my records, the first clause to stand was section 4, subsection 1, paragraph (e). I was asked by the right hon. leader of the opposition to obtain an opinion from the Department of Justice as to the legality of that clause. I have that opinion, which I will read and table. It is from C. P. Plaxton, acting deputy minister of justice.

Dear Sir:

In connection with the consideration in the House of Commons of Bill 52, entitled "An Act respecting Radio in Canada," and in particular of the provisions of section 4 (1) (e) of the said bill which empowers the minister to make regulations,

"(e) prescribing that no radio receiving set or radio apparatus for installation or use as, or in, a private receiving station may be sold, repaired or maintained by any person until a licence is first obtained for such station;"

you request my opinion upon two questions relative to the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada which the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett asked to be submitted to this department. These two questions as set out in the issue of the House of Commons debates for May 11, 1938, page 3014, and my answers thereto are as follows:

Question 1: Has this parliament power to legislate with respect to the sale and conditions of sale of radios in Ontario?

Answer: In the form in which this question is framed, unrelated as it is to any provision of the bill, the answer would clearly be in the negative. But assuming that the question is intended to elicit an opinion as to the validity of said section 4 (1) (e), I think that the said provision, as framed, does not profess to legislate with respect to the sale and conditions of sale of radios in Ontario. It professes rather to impose a condition upon the sale or servicing of a radio receiving set or apparatus when, but only when, such set or apparatus is "for installation or use as, or in, a private receiving station"; and "private receiving station" as defined by section 2 (f) "means a radio receiving set or radio apparatus intended for or capable of receiving broadcasting."

In the reference re Regulation and Control of Radio Communication in Canada (1932) A.C. 304, the judicial committee of the privy council (opinion by Lord Dunedin) held that broadcasting, as a subject matter of legislation, fell within the exclusive legislative competence of the dominion parliament, in virtue of section 91 (29) and section 92 (10) (a), as being within the scope of the word "telegraphs," and also an undertaking "connecting the province with any other or others of the provinces and extending beyond the limits of the province." The board said, in this connection:

"The argument of the province really depends on making, as already said, a sharp distinction between the transmitting and the receiving instrument. In their lordships' opinion this cannot be done. Once it is conceded, as it must be, keeping in view the duties under the convention, that the transmitting instrument must be so to speak under the control of the dominion, it follows in their lordships' opinion that the receiving instrument must share its fate. Broadcasting as a system cannot exist without both a transmitter and a receiver. The receiver is indeed useless without a transmitter and can be reduced to a nonentity if the transmitter closes. The system cannot be divided into two parts, each independent of the other."

It follows, in my view, that it is clearly within the competence of the dominion parliament to require all private receiving stations, as defined, to obtain licences and to pay the fees prescribed therefor; and that being the case, I think it is likewise within the competence of the dominion parliament to provide for the effective enforcement of the provisions concerning licences and payment of fees therefor by appropriate ancillary provisions. Said paragraph (e) appears, in my view, to be directed to this object, not to the object of regulating the sale or conditions of sale or radios in any province.

Question 2: Has this parliament the right to insist upon a repair contractor ascertaining whether or not a licence has been taken out by the owner of the radio upon which he is to work, and to make him liable to a penalty if he fails to do so?

Answer: In view of the observations set out in my answer to question 1, it follows that this question should be answered in the affirmative.

In view of the opinion, and in view of the fact that this section which is now being embodied in the act has been in the radio regulations passed by order in council in 1932 and in subsequent years, and that it has worked effectively and has not caused any serious difficulty to date, I recommend that paragraph (e) be allowed to stand.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 4, subsection 1, paragraph (e).

Mr. LAWSON: Does the minister not mean that paragraph (c) remains in the bill?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what he says.

Mr. LAWSON: He said "to stand," and confused the chairman and the committee.

Mr. HOWE: Stands as part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN: When the committee were on this bill on May 11, an amendment was moved by Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) to section 4, subsection 1, paragraph (e) which was allowed to stand. The amendment is to amend section 4, subsection 1(e) by striking out the words "sold or serviced" in line 3 and substituting therefor the words "sold, repaired or maintained."

Mr. BENNETT: That passed, I think, did it not?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, I think that amendment passed.

The CHAIRMAN: The records are that it did not pass.

Mr. BENNETT: That should pass first.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment to section 4, subsection 1(e) carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection 1 (e) as amended agreed to.

Section 4 as amended agreed to.

Mr. LAWSON: If the minister will permit me, before he goes to section 5; I marked on my copy of the bill that paragraph (e) of section 3 stood, but it may be that there was an amendment. In other words, the idea was that it was to stand in order that the penalty might be prescribed by the law itself and not be left to be determined by order in council.

Mr. HOWE: My recollection is that the amendment was at the time approved and the clause passed as amended.

Mr. LAWSON: On section 3 paragraph (e) was there an amendment?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes; that amendment was carried.

Mr. LAWSON: Then section 5 is the next one.

On section 5—Station licences.

Mr. HOWE: Section 5 is related to section 10 which is the penalty section for section 5, and we have suggested an amendment which was printed in the votes and proceedings. The amendment reads:

That Bill No. 52, clause 10 (1) be amended by inserting after the word "shall" in line 43 the following:

"Unless he satisfies the court or magistrate that the radio station or private receiving station or radio apparatus was not at the time of the alleged commission of the offence intended for or capable of being used for transmission or reception of radio."

And by striking out the words "not less than $5 nor exceeding $50" in lines 43 and 44 and substituting therefor the following "not exceeding $50" so that the said clause 10 (1) will read as follows:

"Any person who establishes a radio station or private receiving station or instals, operates or has in his possession any radio apparatus, in violation of the provisions of this act or any regulations made hereunder, shall unless he satisfies the court or magistrate that the radio station or private receiving station or radio apparatus was not at the time of the alleged commission of the offence intended for or capable of being used for the transmission or reception of radio, be liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding $50 and on conviction on indictment to a fine not exceeding $500 and to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months, and in either case the aforesaid radio apparatus may be forfeited to his majesty by an order of the minister."

The larger fine mentioned is, of course, for private sending stations, the installation of which is a very serious offence and has always been so regarded. Private sending stations are installed from time to time, unauthorized broadcasts being sent therefrom. Heavy penalties up to $500 have been imposed, depending upon whether or not criminal intent can be proved in connection with the establishment of these sending stations.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is the usual course that the forfeiture, or confiscation as it is sometimes called, of the apparatus should be by direction of the court or magistrate as the case may be and not of the minister.

The CHAIRMAN: In order to clarify the record, I would point out that section 5 has not been carried.

Mr. HOWE: We were discussing some changes in the act relating to section 5, and perhaps we were rather out of order. I suggest that it might be well for us to pass on to clauses 9 and 10 and then return to clause 5.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 5 carry?

Mr. LAWSON: No amendment is proposed for section 5?

Mr. HOWE: No.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Sections 7 and 8 are carried; section 9 is not.

Mr. BENNETT: Has section 6 carried?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

On section 9—Search warrant.

Mr. LAWSON: I have no desire to repeat what I said when this clause was under consideration on a previous occasion. I rather thought the minister would give some consideration to the wide powers contained in this section with respect to the persons to whom search warrants may be issued. I do not know whether it is proposed to make any change in the section. If not, I shall not debate the matter again.

Mr. HOWE: The section has been very carefully examined by the law officers, and it is felt that the powers are necessary. I brought down a return showing the number of searches made since 1932, the period during which this provision has been in effect. In 1937 there were fifteen unlicensed transmitting stations—and operating such stations is regarded as a very serious offence—and there were seven searches for private receiving stations. The latter take place only when there is absolute defiance of the law. The return indicates, therefore, that the power is not abused. I may say that my officers are of the opinion that it is absolutely necessary to have this provision in the act if the act is to be workable.

Mr. BENNETT: The power should be there; the question is, to whom should the authority be given?

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Penalty for establishing stations without authority.

Mr. HOWE: I would ask my colleague the Minister of National Defence to move the amendment I have read. It is proposed in order to meet an objection from hon. gentlemen opposite, that the officers of the department shall not have discretion in deciding whether a prosecution will take place, the contention being that the judge should be the person to determine whether the apparatus was in use or capable of being used.

Mr. LAWSON: This section stood when it was before the committee on a former occasion, as I understood it, by reason of two objections which I raised to the section and pointed out to the minister at that time. In the statement now made by the minister I am afraid he is confusing the two. The objections I made were these: Under this new legislation the mere possession of a radio receiving set constitutes an offence, irrespective of whether that radio receiving set was capable of being operated. I pointed out that when you consider the clause on the next page, I think subsection 2, which puts the onus on the accused, once it was proven that a man was in possession he was automatically guilty of an offence and the magistrate could not relieve him. To meet that situation this amendment has been proposed, and I think it meets that situation.

Mr. HOWE: I have two more amendments to this clause, which I think will meet the views of my hon. friend.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move the amendment read by the Minister of Transport.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. LAWSON: I should like the clause as amended not to be declared carried until I hear what the other amendments are.

Mr. HOWE: I would ask my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) to move the following amendment to section 10, subsection (2):

Amend clause 10 (2) of Bill 52 by striking out the words "the onus shall be upon the accused to prove that he had a licence at the time of the alleged commission of such an offence, and" in lines 2, 3 and 4 on page 5.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. LAWSON: The amendment in fact does nothing except to remove redundant words from the section as it previously stood.

Mr. HOWE: I have other amendments. I will ask the Minister of National Defence to move to:

Amend Bill No. 52, clause 10, by striking out subsections (3) and (4) and inserting the following as clause 11:

(1) No proceedings shall be taken against any person under this act except by order of the minister.

Renumber clauses 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15 as numbers 12, 13, 14, 15 and 16 respectively.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I so move.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister think it is really desirable to say that no proceedings of any kind under this act shall be taken except with the consent of the minister? It deprives the act of its public character and places in the hands of a political official the administration of justice. That is really what it means. It is legislation of a kind that is usually very much frowned upon, for reasons which I think are apparent. If that limitation were confined to certain sections, all right. But to say that all proceedings under the act shall be subject to the approval of the minister is going further than I can recall having been done in any similar situation; because it at once limits the administration of justice, prevents a person who has knowledge from laying a complaint before a justice of the peace, and makes the minister, who is a political officer, the preliminary judge in every case that is adjudicated upon by a magistrate. That is a wrong principle, and I think in practice it was abandoned a long time ago. Under the Lord's Day Act we have special provisions as to proceedings being taken only on the fiat of the attorney general, and it was held in an important case that that fiat had to be signed by the attorney general in person; that his deputy could not do it. The result is that, in a case of the slightest possible violation of the provisions of this very important statute, in a remote section of this country, the minister would have to give his consent, I take it in writing, before proceedings could be taken. I urge upon the minister reconsideration of the application of that very broad principle to this statute; for surely this statute, like all other public statutes, should be capable of enforcement, where there has been open breach, by any citizen laying a complaint before a justice, and proceedings being taken. There are other sections which I admit at once should not be enforced by the average citizen making a complaint, but should be subject entirely to the control of the minister. That would prevent many abuses which might otherwise arise. But I certainly think it is going a very long way to say that any proceedings under a public statute can be taken only with the consent of the minister.

Mr. FACTOR: Is there not a similar provision in the Weights and Measures Act?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think so. Under certain sections, yes; but this covers the whole act.

Mr. BOTHWELL: It seems to me this section will conflict to some extent with section 9, under which information may be given to a justice of the peace to issue a search warrant.

Mr. BENNETT: That has to have consent.

Mr. BOTHWELL: If no proceedings can be taken without the approval of the minister, then the minister would have to grant leave before even permission for a search warrant could be granted.

Mr. HOWE: This has always been in the act. I think the original purpose was to temper justice with mercy. I know that since I have been minister I have had reports submitted on the circumstances of the people against whom actions were to be taken, and I have not authorized a search unless the people were able to pay. I think that is the purpose of this provision. Personally I should be very glad to be relieved of the responsibility. I have signed hundreds of these prosecutions since I have been in office and have received a good many complaints from people whose respect I value for having done so. I think every minister since this act has been in force has signed an authorization for every prosecution that has taken place.

Mr. BENNETT: That may be, but the statute did not require the consent of the minister to all procedings. It simply required his consent to proceedings under certain sections. Now the consent of the minister must be obtained for the very simplest prosecution; a search warrant could not be issued in a remote section without the consent of the minister.

Mr. HOWE: In that event I suggest that the situation could be met by withdrawing the last amendment, which was made at the suggestion of the Department of Justice. In view of the discussion I think probably the proposed last amendment is a mistake. I think it was only intended that the prosecutions under section 10 should require direction from the minister. With the consent of the committee I will withdraw the last amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall section 10 as amended carry?

Mr. LAWSON: No, Mr. Chairman; I want to go back to subsection 1 and remind the minister of the second point I raised when the section was reserved. That is, you have two procedures in the same section. A man may be prosecuted by summary procedure, in which event there is a penalty which would seem to be commensurate with the offence of failing to obtain a licence for a private receiving set; or he may be prosecuted by indictment, in which event the penalties are very heavy. The minister to-day admitted that the indictable offence is put there for the purpose of dealing with those who may establish unauthorized private broadcasting stations, and I quite agree that there should be a more severe penalty for that offence. But as I pointed out when the section was under consideration previously, who is going to say whether some person who fails to take out a licence for a private radio receiving set is going to be prosecuted by summary procedure, or is going to be haled before a superior court and charged with an indictable offence?

Mr. FACTOR: The minister has to consent to a prosecution.

Mr. LAWSON: The minister's reply was that the departmental officials would make the determination. The minister will remember I pointed out that I did not think it was proper that a civil servant should have the right to determine whether I, as a citizen, should be prosecuted for a minor or a more serious offence arising out of the same set of facts and the same circumstances. Now the hon. member for Spadina says the minister may determine. I assume that is by reason of subsection 3, if subsection 3 is to stand.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: Does not the minister himself think, even if subsection 3 is to stand, in view of the statement he made to-day, that this clause should be clarified and that specific provision should be made whereby anyone who operates or has in his possession a private radio receiving set without a licence may, on summary conviction, be fined a minimum or a maximum amount? Then go on and say anyone guilty of establishing or having in his possession a private sending station shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable to certain penalties, if that is the thought in the mind of the minister, urged upon him by the department. I do think it is a mistake to pass legislation giving discretionary power to someone who is not a judicial or quasi-judicial official, to say that I may be prosecuted for an offence which may result in a minor or a major penalty. If there is to be a discretion of that kind, I think it should be exercised by a crown official such as the crown attorney.

Mr. HOWE: My officers point out that there may be a criminal offence in connection with a receiving station. That is, it is quite conceivable that a man could use a receiving station to tap an important source of information, such as a Marconi wireless beam, a transoceanic service, and to dispose of the messages in a criminal way. Then, of course, there are two grades of offences even in connection with sending messages. We have several cases of this kind: A boy will build an amateur sending station in his basement. Of course he is simply taken before the judge and ordinarily fined from $2 to $5, whereas a big company might set up an illegal sending station and really do a great deal of damage with it. My officers believe that the section as it stands, administered with discretion, is the most effective way to handle the situation.

Mr. LAWSON: In view of the minister's information that a private receiving station could tap a radio beam and obtain secret information, of course my objection falls.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 11—His majesty may take possession of station.

Mr. LAWSON: Does section 11 now consist of what was formerly subsection 4 of section 10?

Mr. HOWE: No; section 11 is just as it appears. We withdrew the amendment changing the numbers of the sections.

Section agreed to.

Section 12 agreed to.

On section 13—Action for offence to be taken within two years.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to this section, Mr. Chairman, I should like to suggest to the minister that the period should be one year instead of two years. I think two years is rather a long time within which to maintain the right to take proceedings under a statute of this kind; I believe that will be agreed. I have noticed that in many of our quasi-criminal statutes this period of time has operated very greatly to the detriment of those who at one time had a good defence, which the lapse of time made it impossible for them to assert. I should think twelve months would be ample in a statute of this kind, and I suggest to the minister that this might be changed accordingly.

Mr. HOWE: I am very glad to accept the suggestion of my right hon. friend, and I will ask my colleague to move that in line 4 of section 13 the words "two years" be changed to "one year."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 14—Regulations to be published in Gazette.

Mr. BENNETT: As the section stands, it will be noted that the regulations shall, as from the date of publication or any later date mentioned therein, take effect as if they were enacted by parliament. That part of the section is quite understandable. But in view of the fact that it takes four or five days for a Gazette to be transmitted from one part of Canada to another, as a result of my own experience and observations I have concluded it would be desirable to say definitely that the regulations shall take effect, say ten days after the first publication in the Gazette. I am not mentioning ten days as a definitely suggested period, but am giving it simply as an example of a fixed date after the date of publication. The minister will see at once the difficulty which otherwise might arise.

Mr. HOWE: Yes, and I am glad to accept my right hon. friend's suggestion.

Mr. DUNNING: I move:

That for the words "shall as from the date of publication" in the seventh line be substituted the words "shall ten days from the first date of publication."

Mr. HOWE: Would seven days be a satisfactory period?

Mr. BENNETT: That would be hardly sufficient time for Vancouver island.

Mr. LAWSON: No; seven is not enough.

Mr. FINN: It seems to me the committee is giving very wide powers, almost dictatorial powers, to the Minister of Transport. Under another section he is the sole judge as to what the offences are, and they are to be laid by him. We find that the department in the right of the crown collects all the moneys, and nothing goes to the magistrates or justices of the peace.

Such person may be guilty under the statute. As has been pointed out to the minister, we are getting into a new field in which laws are enacted outside the criminal code and outside the powers given in connection with the laying of informations under this measure. Cases are placed in the hands of magistrates or justices of the peace for trial. I think in fairness to the hundreds of thousands of people in Canada who have radios in their homes, they should have greater opportunity of ascertaining what the regulations are. The suggestion of the right hon. the leader of the opposition is along the right lines, but I do not think it goes far enough. The regulations in my opinion should be embodied in the statute. Surely the Minister of Transport and his technical officers are in a position to say what the regulations are going to be and to put them in the statute, so that every one in Canada, no matter where he may live, may know whether or not he is guilty of an infringement of a regulation.

Very few people, with the exception of some in Ottawa, read the Canada Gazette. It is a publication which may go out to members of parliament; but those members are not going to make unpopular suggestions to their constituents; at least I should think they would not. I am asking the minister if there could not be some way in which the regulations would be made clear to the owners of radios, so that advantage would not be taken of them, and so that they would not be accused of being guilty of an offence under regulations of which they had no knowledge? An accused person might say he had no knowledge, and there was no manner in which he could receive it, unless he were a person who read the Canada Gazette.

Mr. BENNETT: There has been a great improvement, and most cases which would arise are now covered in the statute.

Mr. FINN: I am pleased to hear the leader of the opposition say that. It gives me some balm of conscience to know he believes that the amendment suggested by the Minister of Transport is sufficient. I have no desire to have any difference with the Minister of Transport, but it is my hope that people using radio sets in far distant parts of Canada shall not be confronted with regulations of which they had no knowledge and about which they were not in a position to know. They may have had no intent to commit an offence under the regulations, because they would have no knowledge of those regulations.

Mr. BENNETT: Apropos of what the hon. member has said I was going to say to the minister when I was speaking to section 14—and then I thought it might be absurd to suggest it in a statute—that it might be well for the minister to say: "The department will undertake that any important regulations are brought to the attention of the public through broadcasting." I thought that would be an easy way to deal with the matter, but I did not like to suggest it as part of the statute.

Mr. HOWE: I assure my right hon. friend that that will be done. I would point out, however, that the important regulations are printed on the back of the broadcasting licence, itself.

Mr. BENNETT: And the statute is now more complete in that regard than it was before?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; in revising the act we have brought in most of the regulations.

Mr. LAWSON: Printing regulations on the back of the licence will not help much, because the section is designed against people who have no licences.

PRIVATE BILLS

RESTIGOUCHE LOG DRIVING AND BOOM COMPANY—NON-INSISTENCE UPON AMENDMENT

Mr. C. J. VENIOT (Gloucester) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint Their Honours that this house does not insist on its amendment to its Bill No. 66, respecting the Restigouche Log Driving and Boom Company, to which the Senate disagreed.

Motion agreed to.

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 125, for the relief of Paul Sanson White.—Mr. Hill.

Bill No. 126, for the relief of Louise Maud Thomas Gregory.—Mr. Factor.

Bill No. 127, for the relief of Emma Kathleen Lavery Forester.—Mr. Graydon.

Bill No. 128, for the relief of Edith Margaret Campbell Quinn.—Mr. Hyndman.

Bill No. 129, for the relief of Dorothy Maud Doran Gay.—Mr. White.

IMMIGRATION ACT

AMENDMENT OF PROVISION RESPECTING PROHIBITED CLASSES

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Neill for the second reading of Bill No. 112, to amend the Immigration Act.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, when this bill was last before the house I had risen to close the debate. I had intended to be brief; but when I was speaking it occurred to me that in view of the positive and definite statements made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), it would be well for me, not being a lawyer, to check up as to the accuracy of what he said. His statement was to the effect that the passage of this bill would make conditions in British Columbia many times worse than they were before, and would allow thousands and thousands of Japanese to enter provided they possessed the ability to learn English. I took up this matter with every legal expert I could find, and with one accord they said that this was not so. Most of them laughed; some of them swore, and others said, "How could it?" I showed them the Immigration Act and my bill and asked them if it was possible that any increased number of Japanese could come in, and with one accord they said it was impossible.

Section 3 of the Immigration Act contains a number of prohibited classes. People who come under those classes cannot enter Canada under any condition. There are twenty-one different classes set out, and I shall name one or two at random. Persons who are imbeciles, Persons afflicted with tuberculosis, persons who are alcoholics and so on are not allowed in. The twentieth prohibition has to do with people who cannot read any language. I am dealing with the Japanese at the moment, and they would be able to come in if they could read the Japanese language. I add to that prohibition by stating that in addition to any person being able to read their own language, they must be able to read either English, French or some language of Europe. How could that possibly let in more Japanese? They can come in now if they can read their own language. I simply superimpose on that the stipulation that they must be able to read English. Yet we are told that this will allow thousands and thousands of Japanese to come in.

Mr. CRERAR: If my hon. friend will pardon me, I believe he is wrong there. The number is limited to-day by the gentleman's agreement under which so far as Japanese are concerned, the Immigration Act does not apply. If my hon. friend will permit me, I should like to point out that according to his bill, if a Japanese over a certain age can read English, French or any other European language, he would be permitted into the country.

Mr. NEILL: If the hon. gentleman will excuse me, I shall apply to him the language he applied to me a few weeks ago and say that he is talking nonsense.

Mr. CRERAR: That is not the opinion of the immigration officials.

Mr. NEILL: Never mind. Do not make speeches. It does not matter whose opinion it is. My hon. friend says that they would be allowed to come in if they can speak English, but the gentleman's agreement restricts the number who may come in to 150. My bill does not do away with that restriction. If every Japanese in Japan was able to speak English, the gentleman's agreement would still exist and would permit only 150 to come in. I have the agreement before me; it states that hereafter immigrants from Japan will be subject to all the regulations of the Canadian Immigration Act—the minister evidently did not know that—and then there is the extra provision that the number coming in shall be limited to 150. I repeat that my bill does not repeal the gentleman's agreement that limits the number to 150, so how can thousands and thousands come in? The effect of my bill will be largely to cut down the 150. The classes that come in under the gentleman's agreement are mostly farm labourers and domestic servants, and it is seldom that they can speak anything but Japanese. The restriction imposed by this bill will probably restrict the number coming in to five or perhaps ten a year for some years to come. At most it will be a very small number.

Does the house know that according to the records of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police the deportation of forty-three Japanese was recommended in a given period? Deportation is not recommended unless a crime is committed, and yet these forty-three deportation orders were cancelled at Ottawa. It would appear that the Japanese have some friends at Ottawa. It is generally quite difficult to get a deportation order cancelled. I once tried to get one cancelled in connection with a solitary, lone Scotchman, and I had considerable trouble. Yet these forty-three orders were cancelled even though they had been recommended and appeared on the records of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Here is the final thing. Notice was served on that committee by a Japanese official to the effect that if their investigation resulted in the deportation of not more than ten or fifteen Japanese there would be no serious trouble, but if thirty or forty Japanese were affected then there would be trouble. They were told that there would likely be repercussions in Japan. That was told the committee by a high Japanese official. The picture is this: When we find men committing crimes we must not find more than fifteen of them guilty or there will be trouble. It will be just too bad, or else. I believe if these facts had been laid before the house when we were considering Bill No. 11, the vote would have been different.

It is true that this bill does not provide for the total exclusion provided for by Bill No. 11, which should have been passed. The Minister of National Defence approved that bill, but he voted against it. His own national poet says:

> He knows the right and doth approve it too,
> Condemns the wrong but still the wrong pursues.

The government rejected Bill No. 11 because the Japanese might not like it, but this bill makes no reference to the Japanese by name. They are only one of many of the coloured nations of the world which make up three-quarters of the population of the world. The educational test has been in use against the Japanese for many years now, I think thirty, or at least twenty, as regards Australia and New Zealand.

I object strongly to having it spread on the pages of Hansard and through the radio and the press that I have introduced in this house a bill which would make matters in British Columbia many times worse and allow thousands and thousands of Japanese to come in, when the facts are as I have stated, and they cannot be contradicted. I want to give hon. members a picture of this bill. It reached its second reading in the shape of Bill No. 38. I said what I could in favour of it. There was no objection made against it, no fault found with the matter of it, no comment upon it, no criticism of it. But a point of order was taken in connection with the printing of it, a point of order that has not been enforced for ten years, and had it been enforced impartially that day it would have thrown out nine other bills, six of them important government bills. However, it was thrown out; I brought it in again—the rules allowed it—and it came to the second reading the other night. The whole gamut of technicalities had been exhausted. Believe me, it was gone through with a tooth comb, and it could be attacked only on its merits. There are sixty-three lawyers sitting behind the leader of the government party. The massed intelligence of all that legal ability—for they are able men—would naturally be brought to bear on the subject, and what was the result? The mountain laboured and brought forth, not a mouse; it did not even bring forth the cheese to bait the mouse. All the concentrated ability of those sixty-three lawyers could produce only this piffle about the thousands and thousands of Japanese. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor) would, I am sure, call it an "emotional argument" which was used in that connection.

That having been disposed of, what is left of the argument against the bill? Nothing, because there were no other arguments put up. There cannot be much wrong with the bill when the only argument used against it is of such a puerile character. But it is going to be condemned. We remember that in the nursery tale we were told that the wolf said he was going to eat Little Red Riding Hood because she had done something against him. When she proved she had not done it, the wolf said, "Well, I am going to eat you because your grandmother did something." When she showed that her grandmother had not done it, the wolf said, "Well, I am going to eat you, anyhow," and this government is going to kill this bill anyhow, although no argument has been advanced against it. This is not a nursery or a nursery tale; we are a legislative body of lawmakers; we have some privileges and rights, and we ought not to be asked to defeat a bill without some reason being given for doing so. The premier told us, very properly, what in his opinion was wrong with Bill No. 11; but no one on the government side has told us what is wrong with this bill, and yet it is going to be defeated.

If the government will not take the house into its confidence as to the reasons for this course, I am going to take the house into my confidence. I am going to make a diagnosis, as the doctors call it, founded upon the facts as we know them and as they seem to warrant, and suggest the reason why the government is determined to defeat this bill upon a party vote without any justification. The reason is twofold. First, there is nothing wrong with the bill; but, second, there has been an arrangement made with Japan that there will be no further restrictions on immigration for a given period. Not a treaty, of course not; no written agreement; no negotiations even, but just these mysterious diplomatic things they call, I believe, in the highest diplomatic circles, "conversations". If such an arrangement was made, I do not blame the government for living up to it; but I do blame them for making such an important arrangement without consulting this house, which alone has the power to make such an agreement; and still more, having made it, for not having told the house what it was. If that is the explanation, the bargain, not having been sanctioned by us, is not binding on us, and there is no reason why we should yield control over our domestic affairs.

Mr. CRERAR: Will my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. NEILL: No. For four months I have waited for this thing, and I am going to have my innings to-night.

Mr. CRERAR: There is just this—

Mr. NEILL: No!

Mr. CRERAR: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am entitled to say this. My hon. friend has said either too much or too little.

Mr. NEILL: That is not a point of order.

Mr. CRERAR: He has hinted that there is some arrangement, and he ascribes the opposition to his bill as being the result of an arrangement which must have recently been made.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say "recently."

Mr. NEILL: That is not a point of order.

Mr. CRERAR: I just want to say there is no—

Mr. NEILL: I do not wish the minister to say it. He has had his opportunity. The bill has been up for second reading twice. He had all the time in the world. But I will answer him. I was going to answer him anyway if he had kept quiet. If that is not the explanation, I will furnish another. If he does not like the one horn of the dilemma he can take the other. Is it because the government get political hysterics every time the name of Japan is mentioned? We dare not deal with the strictly domestic matter of our own immigration for fear—and fear is an ugly word, Mr. Speaker—that an alien heathen nation, that has no claim whatever to a grievance, might not like it, a nation whose best claim to fame at the present moment is the fact that it is raping and ravaging a friendly nation whose territory it swore a few short years ago to protect and maintain.

Now, this thing is cumulative. Where is it going to stop? If we yield five per cent of our rights to-day for the sake of peace, six months hence we shall be required to surrender ten per cent, and a year afterwards they will want fifty per cent. Other nations will imitate this policy, and we shall lose their respect.

How did we get their respect? We became a nation, not by the Statute of Westminster that we hear so much about, but through the blood and treasure we spent in France to prevent Canada from becoming a German colony. The Statute of Westminster did something. It gave us power to make our own treaties. A lot of good that did us. If we set our feet on the fatal, bitter path I have outlined, soon we shall not be allowed to make our own treaties; we shall not even be allowed to make our own pyjamas, because Japan will discover that she can make them cheaper because of her low standard of living, and they will be sent to Toronto and sold below the cost of the raw material there. If that is to be our policy, we had better tear up the Statute of Westminster and crawl back as a colony under the overburdened protection of the British nation. At least we would be safe there; yes, cheaply safe, would we not? Britain would give it to us, give it to us to the last exhaustion of her strained powers, and she would not worry and fuss because every now and again we debate whether we would be at war when she is at war. But what a humiliation it would be for us as a nation and as individuals!

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. Speaker, it is more than forty-seven years since I came to this country. That is a longer time than the lives of many of the hon. members I see before me. I have married, brought up a family and buried our dead here. I have been a loyal and true Canadian in thought, word and deed. I have taught my children that they must not pay too much attention to the land of their parents, but that they must be true Canadians and bear faithful allegiance to Canada herself. For the first time in nearly half a century I have occasion to be ashamed of my adopted country. To-night we are at the fork of the road. We can say to Japan, "While you have not said you objected to this bill, we have not passed it because we thought you might not like it. We have not exactly cut loose from Britain, but we have indicated that there is no obligation, that there are no commitments if she is in trouble, and to that extent we have weakened her in the eyes of the world; you have our sympathy; we hope you will not be too hard on us." Shall we take that degrading and humiliating position, or shall we say to Japan and to the world, "When Britain is in trouble we are in trouble; when Britain is at war we are at war, and when Britain is in a war, while we cannot bind future parliaments as to the amount of participation, any more than the British parliament is bound, we will do our part; we are solidly behind Great Britain economically, financially and in every other way to the best of our ability." Then, let us say to Japan, "We are determined to run and control our own domestic affairs, of which immigration is one, and another is to decide whether people can be deported or not. That is another privilege and we are going to use it. We are solidly behind the British nation, and the British nation is solidly behind us." That would be the end of it. That would be a policy of courage, a policy of dignity and self-respect, both for us and from the other nations, and one that would make for the preservation of peace, a bold policy which would put us in standing and reputation with all the nations of the world. Whether we take the short vision of the immediate future or the long vision down the vista of time, it would be a policy that would immediately and ultimately work for the benefit of British Columbia, of Canada and of the British empire in which we are all concerned. I think the first step towards the announcement and the initiation of such a policy would be for us to pass this bill which is before us to-night.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT SWEEPSTAKES ORGANIZED BY PROVINCES FOR BENEFIT OF UNIVERSITIES OR HOSPITALS

The house resumed from Friday, May 27, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bertrand (Laurier) for the second reading of Bill No. 28, to amend the criminal code.

Mr. VITAL MALLETTE (Jacques Cartier): There are so many public hospitals in the county of Jacques Cartier that I consider myself in duty bound to speak on this bill sponsored by the hon. member for Laurier which would permit the holding of sweepstakes under provincial regulations and supervision for the benefit of hospitals and legally constituted universities. No doubt hon. members will be interested to have a list of the hospitals which are in my county. In Lachine we have l'Hôpital St. Joseph and the Lachine General Hospital. In Cartierville we have l'Hôpital du Sacré Coeur, better known throughout America as the Hospital for Incurables. At Côte de Neiges we have l'Asile Nazareth, St. Mary's and the Jewish hospital. At St. Laurent there is l'hôpital de Notre Dame de l'Espérance.

It is well known that hospitals are having a hard time financially. In all the cities in Canada annual campaigns have to be held to support the hospitals. In many cases that is not sufficient, and provinces and cities have to guarantee their bonds, and not only the bonds but often the interest coupons as well. Therefore there is no doubt about hospitals being in need of financial support. Fortunately there is a large number of anonymous benefactors who help such institutions. Some generous people help them regularly, others at various times or upon special occasions. Some benefactors adopt a certain institution, sometimes because of religious reasons, sometimes because a hospital specializes in the treatment of diseases in which they take an interest. Hospitals devoted to the care of children seem to have a peculiarly strong attraction for good-hearted people, and derive great benefit from their interest. Leading citizens of both sexes serve on the boards of administration of hospitals and charitable institutions of all kinds. Their services are, of course, given freely; they render them as a duty and often as a hobby as well. They are glad to help their fellow citizens to that extent. This is practical Christianity of a kind of which we are greatly in need. Leading business and professional men deem it an honour to act in such positions, and occupy them efficiently. Such noble sentiments reflect great credit upon humanity.

A moment ago I gave a list of the public hospitals in my county, and as far as I know every one of them is finding it exceedingly hard to make both ends meet. Still they do not even think of curtailing their services. By some means or other they carry on in spite of the deficit. A striking example is that of the Nazareth Asylum for the Blind, the deficit of which for the year ended June 30, 1937, amounted to $63,169.91. If to this were added what might be the value of the free services given by the Grey Nuns, what the deficit would amount to I leave to the imagination of hon. members. Other hospitals in my county have shown the same devotion to duty and the same deficits. These institutions, of course, make efforts to get help from their supporters and I have made a list of some of the means that are resorted to in order to secure such financial support. These include private subscriptions, bazaars, tombolas, kermesses, drawings, card parties, oyster suppers, soupers d'habitants, soupers du bon vieux temps, theatricals, house to house canvassing, dances, old boys' reunions, strawberry festivals, pilgrimages, and the latest method, bingo. Using all these methods they are sometimes able to lighten the load. This all requires a tremendous amount of work, while at the same time large sums of money leave Canada for another country where they are employed for this very purpose, that is, to help the hospitals. As an illustration in support of my contention, let me quote a short extract from an article that appeared in the Ottawa Journal of March 25, entitled Irish Sweepstakes Become a Major Industry, by Hugh Smith of the New York Times, sent from Dublin:

> If and when any Irish government has the temerity to end the sweepstakes, it will create something akin to a national crisis, since running sweeps has become one of the Free State's most important industries. . . .
> When Mr. Cosgrave regime gave legal sanction back in 1930 for running the first sweep for the hospitals, the prize fund was less than £500,000 and only a few hundred persons were employed in running the lottery.
> The success of the venture startled even the sweep's own promoters. The prize fund soared to almost £3,000,000 in 1932, and to-day it is seldom below £1,500,000. As millions began to roll in, the payroll increased accordingly. To-day an average of 3,000 people are permanently employed. The last few weeks before each sweep, this number rises above 4,000.

We may ask whether Canadians are taking an interest in sweepstakes. In this connection I have the Montreal Gazette of April 8, which states that $1,100,170 was spent by Canadians in tickets on Irish sweepstakes. Returning for a moment to the hospitals and their value to Canada, I ask how many hospitals have closed their doors since 1929? You will find the number remarkably small, if any have closed at all. They carried on, in the full sense of the word "carried" as it is used and understood wherever the English language is spoken. I have often heard mentioned both inside and outside this chamber the debt which this country owes to the banks for having weathered the depression. I have never heard anything about the hospitals. Far be it from me to minimize the success of our banks; but if people feel like examining achievements performed during the very dark period, I suggest that they might well place in the front rank the survival of our hospitals from one end of the country to the other, a survival which has been due largely to the self-denial of those in charge. If tickets for lotteries operated in other countries are being sold clandestinely in this country, there must be some sort of demand for them, and if this demand persists in spite of the illegality of the procedure, is it not to be presumed that it satisfies some sort of natural craving? Such being the case, are we not a little foolish, a little crazy, to let vast sums of money leave Canada when we need them so much here, especially when the operation of such lotteries would be under the control of the provincial authorities?

It must be borne in mind that the operation of the proposed act will not mean any additional charges upon the already overburdened taxpayers, while it may result in very considerable help to the beneficiaries of the scheme. Moreover, it would ensure that the buyers of tickets would be fairly dealt with. Here I allude to the possibility of moneys paid for tickets in foreign lotteries never being properly remitted.

Perhaps here it might not be amiss to quote a few opinions in support of the bill now under consideration. In this connection let me use the French sentence, "A tout seigneur, tout honneur." I refer again to the Montreal Gazette of March 28, which says that Hepburn—a name well known here—is in favour of sweepstakes. Let me go further and quote from La Presse of April 1:

> The chief argument of those who oppose public lotteries is that people would no longer give money to hospitals. That may have been true in other times, but it is not true to-day. The present generation has become accustomed to strokes of luck and is ever avidly seeking them, as is evidenced by the numerous drawings of all kinds which reappear despite the efforts of the police. The addiction to such pursuits has spread to all classes of society and it is in order that our hospitals and universities may derive some benefit from it that it is sought to procure an amendment to the criminal code legalizing lotteries. There is no doubt that the immense majority of Canadians are in favour of lotteries, providing they are surrounded by the necessary safeguards.

Again, to give the house the point of view of the province of Quebec, because somehow or other we always have the reputation of being peculiar in Quebec, let me quote from the Montreal Gazette of October 29, 1937:

But in our old province a lot of people don't see a moral issue so long as proceeds of lotteries do good work, are run by government, don't feed racketeers.

I quote further from the same article, which is by Mr. Ashley W. Cooper:

And French logic comes back to the fact that lotteries may be gambling and gambling may be tabu under the criminal code, but you can't legislate people—Canadians included—into being good. Prohibition is cited. And the stream of Canadian dollars that runs to Ireland and other outside spots for periodical lotteries isn't forgotten.

I think this makes our position very clear. When people say we must not gamble in Canada the question naturally arises whether there are any forms of gambling at present tolerated by the law. The reply is very simple. There are race tracks, the stock market, the mining market and the grain market, to take only four of the best known examples. Just as I say my county shines as regards hospitals, so I can say it shines as regards race tracks. With regard to gambling in stocks, when the markets are on the rise we have lots of winners in my county, though when the market is on the decline we do not hear so much about it. Nevertheless money is won and lost by these devices, and very little if any of the profit goes to the hospitals, where it would be put to good use.

So I may summarize this argument by saying that hospitals are numerous in Canada, and there is no doubt they are all having a hard time. Some of the universities are also finding it difficult to keep going; that is generally admitted. In some other countries they have found a way to overcome that difficulty, to a certain extent at least, through the operation of lotteries controlled by the state. It is suggested that this be done here, and in my humble opinion it is a sensible suggestion, for the very good reason that whether or not a lottery is authorized tickets are sold anyway. On occasion they are sold within a hundred yards of where I stand at this moment, and we make the mistake of allowing all this money to go to other countries instead of retaining it here.

I congratulate the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Bertrand) upon having brought this matter before the house, and I support him. I think I have advanced some very good reasons in support of the bill. I do hope the bill will be carried, because I can see it would be to the great benefit of the hospitals in my constituency, and to at least one of the universities in the province of Quebec.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I desire to express myself in favour of this bill, and I do so because it makes an attempt, although imperfectly, to remove from the criminal code the effort to regulate the moral and ethical expression of our people. I mean by that I am perfectly satisfied that we should control the abuses in our ethical relationships to each other, and in our morals, as expressed in our economy. But when it comes to regulating and controlling the ordinary expressions of our thoughts, our ideas and our ideals, in ethics and morals, then I contend the criminal code is going altogether too far.

We have had representations from reverend and honourable members claiming that this was really a religious issue. The hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) brought out a novel interpretation of one of the commandments, and attempted to make that which was really an ethical instruction a religious teaching. In addition, the hon. member for Athabaska (Mr. Rowe) made extravagant statements about what would occur in Canada if we permitted this bill to pass. I am not one who believes that the world is necessarily going to the dogs. We are really bettering all the time. Occasionally we have lapses—sometimes by individuals and sometimes in masses. But in the main our progress is forward. And because of that and because I have faith in our people and in ourselves, I am supporting this bill. If it were a question of national ethics, differing entirely from the individual expression, that might have been brought out by some of the speakers to the bill. But I have not discovered that any of them have found that fact.

Holy Writ has been invoked to show us that we would do wrong. But as I look through Holy Writ I cannot discover that it especially teaches us it is wrong to make a stake or to take a gamble. I have a distinct recollection of a celebrated parable:

Behold, a sower went forth to sow;

And when he sowed, some seeds fell by the wayside, and the fowls came and devoured them up:

Some fell upon stony places, where they had not much earth: and forthwith they sprung up, because they had no deepness of earth:

And when the sun was up, they were scorched; and because they had no root, they withered away.

And some fell among thorns; and the thorns sprung up, and choked them:

But other fell into good ground, and brought forth fruit, some an hundredfold, some sixty-fold, some thirtyfold.

There is another case of the king with ten thousand who took counsel whether he should go up against him who came to meet him, and fight him with twenty thousand.

These things have to be borne in mind if we are going to invoke Holy Writ to support the opposition to the bill. Then, we were told it would corrupt the morals of our people. May I point out that in 1922 there developed in Great Britain what is known as the penny pool. The poorest people subscribe to those penny pools and take their chances. To-day there is an annual turnover of approximately £40,000,000 in those penny pools. The government in the sale of stamps and in the sale of post office and money orders receives a total of £200,000 a week. There are 35,000 persons directly employed in accounting, auditing and other services in connection with the pools.

How are they conducted? The laws in the old country are definitely prohibitive of gambling of this kind. But those who instituted the penny pools have got around it, and each person staking is permitted to forward his statement of what he assumes the results of the various sporting events are going to be. He does this on or before Friday of each week, the results being declared after the events take place on the Saturday. On the Monday each person who has sent in his stakings sends the money, win or lose. In the course of the years they have built up a tremendous number of individuals rich and poor who are honest enough and moral enough to pay their debts, whether they win or lose. In June of last year one of those firms in Liverpool—I believe Littledales is the name—refused £1,000,000 offered by a United States firm who wanted their purged and purified list.

Does that indicate that the morals of those people, poor or rich, have been disturbed? These are things which should prevent our looking at these matters of sweepstakes in an extravagant fashion. We have in our own economy the whole question of insurance. What is insurance? What is the question of making a payment by way of premium for life insurance? It is true that the payments are deduced actuarially on a scientific basis, but all the time each individual taking out insurance is taking a gamble with his money against his existence.

Therefore, when we come down to these facts we find we are already gambling very considerably in our own economy in Canada. Abuse of this matter is the only error; and because I feel that and feel it strongly I would like to see passage of the bill. Large and wide visioned tolerance should obtain in our human affairs. To take a chance is entirely human. Every time we lie down at night we take a chance, and if it were not for the eternal promise we would never rise again.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nine o'clock.

SUPPLY

VALIDITY OF QUEBEC STATUTE—CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON STATEMENT OF MR. WOODSWORTH

The house resumed from Monday, May 30, consideration of the motion of Mr. Dunning for committee of supply.

Mr. J. A. BRADETTE (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, the discussion introduced yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) comes down to a discussion of ideology. It goes deeper than financial or even social matters, and involves principles in which the Canadian nation and also several foreign powers are interested.

It goes still deeper than that. We are compelled in such a discussion to mention internal and domestic policies of foreign nations, although in certain instances nations affected may resent our action. I intend to point out, however, in the few moments at my disposal that the purpose of the discussion is solely in order as forcibly as we can to bring before the house some of the new political philosophies, fallacies and demagogy which have been brought forth in the civilized world in the last fifteen or eighteen years.

In the discussion of the padlock law there is also the matter of internal administration, so far as Quebec is concerned. There is also the matter of morals of which perhaps the people living within the borders of that province are in the best position to judge. They know best the mentality of their own people.

When we consider the Russian revolution we have to try to analyze the feelings, the inclinations, of the people of that nation.

We have to use metaphor. When we do that we realize that the Russian people are entirely different from Canadians. One of the primary results of that revolution was the decision that brains, intelligence and the faculty to manage and direct were not to be considered as being worth any more than common labour. Of course I realize that in suggesting such a philosophy of internal policy I may be opening up a very wide discussion. There is no doubt that in a democracy labour must of necessity have a primary place in the social functions of the nation. However, we must not forget that the Russian revolutionists practically swept away the intelligentzia of the Russian nation. Any one who possessed a university degree could not take part in the government of that country. There was to be only one class, the proletariat, the workers. I want just to leave this thought with the house to digest. We are all familiar with how soon they found that it was absolutely impossible to carry out these ideas.

Another idea, utterly contrary to western civilization, was that religion should not exist, should be destroyed. They contended that religion of any kind was simply an opiate to civilization. That proletariat government tried to erase religion from that great country. We can easily visualize how repulsive such a policy would be to a civilized Christian country. We must realize how foreign such a policy is to the mentality of Canadian people.

Another idea advanced by the Russian revolutionists was that the individual had no right to any personal gain. The individual lost his identity entirely. The only supreme being was the state under Lenin or Stalin who were practically deified. The individual existed purely and solely for the state. This is another philosophy that is absolutely foreign to Canadians and civilized peoples generally. No doubt this revolution was brought about by injustices suffered by the Russian people under the tzarist regime, but the leaders of that revolution were not content to apply the principles they advocated to Russia alone. To them it was more than a political philosophy; it became almost a religion. We saw the zeal generally connected with any new religion exerted on behalf of this philosophy. In their obsession they were not content to apply their ideas to Russia alone; they wanted to spread them all over the white and coloured world. In a few months after the revolution we saw soviet and bolshevist emissaries in China, India, Japan, Germany, Italy, England, Central America, South America and North America.

An immediate reaction set in in many of these nations when they found these missionaries in their midst. Many of the countries in Europe were still suffering from the results of the great war. The result was that we had the spectacle of communism actually being the parent of fascism and nazism. If communism was not the father of these last two isms, at least it was mainly responsible for the functioning of fascism in Italy and nazism in Germany.

We must be very careful in discussing a matter of this kind. We must realize the horizons we have to face. In a discussion of this kind we must visualize the different angles of the situation. You must envisage it within its proper perspective. When you have to deal with a ferocious animal you must take more precaution than when you are dealing with a domestic cat. When you have to deal with a venomous reptile you must be more careful than when you are handling a song bird. In this case we are dealing with something that is very dangerous, not only to the mentality but to the national life of this country. I well remember only three short years ago when I barely escaped with my life during the bushmen's strike in Cochrane. That strike was instigated by communist leaders, and I say with all the sincerity and knowledge I possess that they were in the pay of soviet Russia. There are some members in the house at the present time, these being known as labour leaders, to whom I went three, four or five years ago and told what had happened. They sympathized with me in my situation because they realized that these communist leaders did not desire a solution of our labour problems. They wanted to continue their agitations. They wanted to have sabotage in our mines, in our transportation systems and throughout our industries. They did not have a solution of our problem in their hearts.

I would be the last to say that the labouring people of this country are receiving the remuneration they should receive; that they are living and working under first class conditions. However, I maintain that our problems, especially our labour problems, will never be solved by these agitators in the pay of a foreign institution. I feel free to speak of this. I maintain that this country has no right to try to impose its political beliefs upon any other country; yet communist Russia has tried to spread its beliefs throughout every section of the civilized world. I intend to employ all my energy and limited talents in the fight against this curse which has been undermining the population in certain sections of our dominion and has also tried to undermine our institutions.

Perhaps you will ask what this has to with the padlock law in Quebec. I know something of that province because I was born there. While I owe my primary loyalty to Ontario, my forefathers for the last four centuries are sleeping their last sleep in the Laurentian hills in the riding of Charlevoix. I know the make-up and mentality of the people of Quebec. I know their fine traditions. I know it will be surprising to many people in Quebec to know there are a few sections in that province, especially in the city of Montreal, where communism seems to have found a fertile field.

(Translation): Mr. Speaker, I now wish to direct my remarks more particularly to my compatriots from the province of Quebec, in order to tell them that many young French Canadians—fine specimens of manhood, and intelligent young men—have played the part of assistant communist leaders during the strikes that have taken place in the forests of northern Ontario and in our mines. I rose on several occasions to tell them that, being the descendants of the pioneers who settled on the shores of the St. Lawrence, and exhibiting all the traits of the French-Canadian race on the north American continent, they should set a good example to the English speaking majority in this country. I told them that the part they were playing was unworthy of French-Canadians. I explained to them that they were submitting to the influence of a group of people who were not even naturalized, who had been in this country for five, ten or fifteen years only, and who had not yet managed to become naturalized; I told them that a French-Canadian was supposed to be a national leader and that he should not allow himself to be deceived by foreigners who were trampling upon his ideals and his principles.

Mr. Speaker, I was anxious to mention that episode in order to bring home to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) the fact that there are indeed communists in the province of Quebec.

I hold in my hand a document which other hon. members have no doubt received.

(Text) I believe that this would be the time and place to take up a few moments of the house to divulge some parts of a confidential report covering the pre-convention meeting of the U.L.F.T.A. provincial secretaries of the communist party, which was held at 300 Bathurst street, Toronto, Ontario, on Saturday and Sunday, August 18 and 19, 1934. I am not going to read all the minutes of that meeting, but I believe it would be a revelation to this house and to the whole country of the policies that were then propounded by the communist party, in trying to insinuate themselves into the ranks of labour, for the purposes of destruction and propaganda:

Sharabura recommended that in order to break up all the L.W.I.U. members must speak to the C.B.U. members urging them to join and to expose officials of the various lumber companies, and in the event of a strike, after two weeks if the companies refuse to recognize the demands of the L.W.I.U. trusted members only must be instructed to make efforts to damage the property of lumber companies in question by breaking up the camps, setting fire to the same, and other acts of sabotage.

Later on in the report, at page 4:

To popularize the next strike in each city in order to obtain accommodations for strikers, and mobilization of women and children to take an active part in the strike in collecting food and funds and participating in picket duty.

Later on:

Recommended by Huculak that the miners' local of Kirkland Lake and Sudbury send the L.W.I.U. a few cases of dynamite to be used to blow up the camps and other buildings in the case of prolonged strike. This recommendation was turned down as not practical. Kulik advised that it was an easy matter for the L.W.I.U. to obtain as much dynamite as necessary because this is kept in all lumber camps to be used for blowing up stumps and stone. In the event, however, the dynamite supply in lumber camp runs short, the miners will be notified.

I am not going to read any more of this report. It is in my possession and any member may have access to it. They went so far as to say that they were going to poison the food of the workers who would have the audacity to remain working. I am sorry to say that during the last strike we had in my section, our population did not get the support they expected from some of the authorities in the province of Ontario, and we took upon ourselves to represent these authorities for the support of law and order to the full extent. Why? Because ninety-nine per cent of the strikers who were real Canadians and had been having conferences with the lumber companies at which the conditions were largely remedied, were ready and willing to go back to work; but these leaders did not want those young men to carry on fruitful work; they wanted them to carry on agitation, and you can see how far they wanted them to go. They did not want these workers to be satisfied, but they simply wanted radical agitations to be maintained.

We fed those people for three or four weeks; but still those strike leaders were not satisfied, and when they became extremely bold we took the law in our own hands and gaoled some of the communistic strike leaders because they would not allow men who wanted to work to go to work at fruitful employment.

Having made that statement, I can easily visualize how the province of Quebec reacted against the communist organization and propaganda. Let us never befool ourselves with the idea that communism is not dangerous. Was it a majority of the Russian people which brought about a revolution in that fine big country? It was not; it was an infinitesimal minority. The same applies to-day. Do all the Russian people belong to the communist party? Oh, no; the powers of the Russian state to-day are wielded by only a few men, and a very small percentage of the population belongs to the communist party of Russia. And yet we are invited to be tolerant as regards this new policy. I ask the house this question: How long would the Russian government be tolerant if any emissaries from the Social Credit or the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation or the Conservative or the Liberal party went to Russia and told the people there that their government was not one they could support? What would the lives of those emissaries be worth?

It must be realized that a certain international political affiliation having its headquarters in Moscow is trying to bring into this country something absolutely foreign to our own mentality, eminently disruptive and destructive. We are asked to play with this fire, this dynamite, this disease. Only a few days ago the Department of National Revenue were able, I believe, to prevent admission to this country of a number of magazines of an immoral tendency. There was not a single protest from any section of this country; yet there are some who would like to keep our doors wide open to the admission of the poison which is trying to poison the minds of all nations to which it has had access.

I want to say a few words about the discussion which was started as to the padlock law in the province of Quebec. I have studied that law. Perhaps it is not elaborate enough as far as the definition of communism is concerned. Perhaps some of its features might lead to some abuse of power. On the other hand, as I said last night, in my view it does not in some respects go far enough. Although I might make a small, favourable distinction—a very small one indeed—between communism on the one hand and nazism and fascism on the other, in favour of the latter, at the same time I believe these three isms are absolutely foreign to Canadian thought, and the population of Quebec particularly, and the law, if it was meant to be sincerely and honestly applied—I say this with all sincerity—should have included all the isms that exist in the province of Quebec.

An hon. MEMBER: Liberalism?

Mr. BRADETTE: It will never be as bad as that. I hold in my hand an article which appeared in Maclean's magazine only a few short weeks ago. In it you can see the swastika cross and the leaders of the nazi-fascist party in the province of Quebec. On the second page is a photograph of some nazist forum, attended by quite a number of young men—I notice at least fifty—who are giving the nazi salute and are taking military drill. This is just as foreign to our thought as even communism. I also find here an article in a newspaper called l'Unité, a newspaper in the province of Quebec, which appeared on Thursday, March 24, 1938, issued from Sainte-Therese de Blainville. I have not a translation, and I would not dare to translate it from French into English, but I am going to read it in French:

(Translation) What we want is a genuine revolution. A fierce upheaval that may destroy that impression of security which is still harboured, even in the midst of the vicissitudes which we are experiencing.

I shall not read the whole passage, Mr. Speaker, but this quotation shows where all that is liable to lead us.

Too many schemes are being planned stealthily or openly, and the plotters are so strongly entrenched that it would be impossible to storm their positions. In trying to correct what is wrong, in endeavouring to separate the wheat from the tares, we are liable to destroy what is good, for "so and so" may have a cousin, a friend, a relative who compels him to follow the antinational course he has taken, and deeply-rooted feelings lead him toward the very things he is fighting against. That explains the inefficiency of the "buy home products" campaign. That explains also why political graft is ever flourishing.

A revolution will be like a huge blood-letting. All the impure blood will flow, as well as all purulent matter. What remains will be all the purer. And if, at that fateful moment, a leader can be found who will hold the reins with a firm hand, all will be well, for in that case the nation will have survived the crisis and its power will again be in the ascendant.

These writings, Mr. Speaker, are just as foreign to the French-Canadian and Catholic mind in the province of Quebec as the claims of the communist party's followers.

(Text) No doubt the padlock law was passed because the premier of Quebec fully appreciated the fact that the population of that province must be made to realize the seriousness of the situation. I have never had the pleasure of meeting the premier of that province personally, but I do not for one moment doubt his Canadianism. I am quite sure that when the great majority of the people of that province fully realize the communistic danger he will find it possible to amend the law which has been described as the padlock law of Quebec. May I point out to hon. members that this matter goes deeper than financial or personal considerations. There is a moral principle involved, and no member of this house, I venture to say, will ever have the audacity to suggest that Quebec has never been a true daughter of confederation. No one will ever doubt her loyalty, her great attachment to her loyal clergy who have so greatly helped to make and mould the people of that province what they are, and who are standing at their side to-day, as during all times of danger in the past, making them realize the danger of communism.

There is no danger of the people of Quebec not fully abiding by the law. There is no doubt as to their broadmindedness and tolerance. Take, for instance, the conference held the other day by some of the social credit members in that fine city of St. Hyacinthe. Social credit, to the people there, was a new theory; but when it was propounded it caused no disturbance; there was no threat to the Canadian democracy; there was no suggestion whatever that our institutions were in danger of destruction.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I make it very clear to the members of this house and to the people of the province of Quebec that social credit is in no way related to or akin to communism?

Mr. BRADETTE: I did not need to have the hon. gentleman's assurance of that; I fully realize it. I mentioned the incident merely to illustrate the hospitality of the people of Quebec and their essential and natural tolerance. Anyone who is worthy of the name Canadian and who has studied the history of Canada, especially of lower Canada, ever since it came into confederation, must know that the French Catholic majority in the province of Quebec have always been tolerant towards the Protestant minority there. Take, for example, this incident that took place in the province some years ago. It so happened, by force of circumstances, that there was no one to represent the English speaking Protestant minority on the municipal board of the city of Quebec, and the premier of the province so amended the municipal act as to provide for such representation. I could cite hundreds of cases to illustrate the splendid calibre and the mentality of the people of that province.

The French-Canadians have made a valuable contribution to confederation. Indeed, it was a British statesman who said that if ever the day came when British civilization stood in need of some element to maintain it on the north American continent, that element would be the French-Canadians. Let me say to the hon. member who started this discussion that there are sixty-five worthy members in this house from Quebec. They know the situation exactly as it exists in that province of Quebec, and I submit that their views would prevail on that subject. I venture to say that if hon. gentlemen from any other province found themselves confronted with a situation such as that which exists in the province of Quebec to-day, they would resent the suggestion that they had not the right to express the views of the people they represent. I am sure they would be among the first to take steps to fight such a menace if it threatened them. I do not want to discipline the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), but I must say that he has not always been constructive in his utterances. During the last federal election—I am quoting from the newspapers—he told the people in western Canada that they ought to be careful how they voted in the election because in all probability a Liberal administration would be returned by reason of the strong Quebec representation and that there was danger of domination from the province of Quebec. I say that it ill becomes any hon member who aspires to the office of Prime Minister some day to make statements of that kind. I have no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that the authorities in that province of Quebec are fully competent to deal with the question that faces them.

In conclusion, may I say that I am all for freedom in the best sense of the word, but I am opposed to freedom when it comes to invading the rights and the liberties of others. When freedom becomes license of that sort, then I condemn it. I am in favour of the sort of freedom which was so well propounded by Garcio Moreno, that young man who was taken prematurely from this life, that splendid South American statesman. The freedom that he advocated might well find application not only in his own country but throughout the world—freedom everywhere and to everyone except to evil-doers and wrong-doers.

Mr. JOSEPH JEAN (Mercier) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I wonder what was the intention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) when he called the attention of the house, last evening, to the question of the disallowance of the so-called padlock act enacted by the Quebec legislature last year.

I have no right to impute motives to the hon. member, but he is not unaware that in raising this question he is lending himself to a political game that can easily be guessed. Should we remain silent, the hon. member knows full well that there are in the province of Quebec many persons who will blame us for not having replied to him. Should we speak in favour of disallowance, he knows that another group of people in Quebec will accuse us of favouring the expansion of communism. Should we mark our approval of the act in question, we will be taxed with inconsistency, in view of our attitude regarding Section 98 of the Criminal Code.

The hon. member must realize that a question of that kind transcends the bounds of political parties and that our conscience will not permit itself to be guided by any electoral advantage resulting from our attitude in the matter. It would be easy to reply to him in one way or another. At the elections of 1935 we received a definite mandate from the voters of the province of Quebec and we have acted in consequence.

If, in raising this question, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was thinking only of safeguarding the liberties of the people, as he said last evening, I could easily answer him that if there is in the dominion a province that respects the liberty of the citizen, that province is Quebec, and in spite of the existence of the so-called padlock act, I have no hesitation in stating that it is in Quebec province that Canadians enjoy the greatest measure of liberty, that minorities receive the best treatment and that the preachers of the most varied political doctrines are given the best reception, though the people may not accept their views.

My hon. friends of the C.C.F. as well as of the Social Credit group know full well, and all the more for having experienced it lately, that the citizens of the province of Quebec are ready to listen to them, and that if they have not made more recruits in that province, it is because they have not yet convinced us of the merits of their political system.

But what my hon. friend does not understand—and I wonder whether he ever will understand it—is the conception we in Quebec have of liberty. There may be, even among our own people, narrow minds who seek for petty political purposes to confuse Canadian political liberalism with the liberalistic doctrines condemned by our spiritual leaders. It is possible that our tolerance, I might even say our goodwill towards minorities, is interpreted in some circles as concessions made to error. But such is not, Mr. Speaker, the opinion of the majority of the people of Quebec province.

I shall not undertake to give my own definition of the doctrine of liberty such as we conceive it, for fear of committing an error; I shall quote the opinion of the spiritual leader of the province of Quebec expressed in the now memorable speech which he delivered in Montreal on January 29th last.

> Liberty, said he, is for man the voluntary domination of his talents in order to attain his end, his perfection, his happiness.
> Natural liberty is the source from which flow all liberties and the principle at the base of all human rights.
> Does it necessarily imply the liberty to do wrong? No, in spite of what is often thought and contended. Liberty is a faculty of the reasonable being. Its use can therefore only be reasonable. Otherwise, liberty is not used, but abused. The power to do right or wrong is certainly a mark of liberty, but it is not the sole mark or the most formal. It is the mark not of an ordered but of a disordered liberty. It is an imperfection, a disease.

We hear cries of liberty, liberty, equal liberty for everyone. Such cries are based on a lamentable, blind misunderstanding, having its source in absurdity. Those who clamour for that freedom are the first to deny it to others. Liberty for everyone to do good, of course. Equal liberty for the child and the grown-up, for the sane man and the mentally deficient, for the law-abiding citizen and the convict, for the defender of the state and the traitor—that is surely not what you want. Beware of any misunderstanding and say rather: Respect for the just liberties of all, and liberty of the individual consistent with his duties. That is better, because it is liberalism without licence. According to that doctrine, every citizen would be free to use his own judgment in his decisions relating to his personal conduct, his choice of a home, his actions, his daily routine, his friends, the use of his property, his right of association, his contracts, etc., but within the limit of what is right that is to say, of natural and divine law and of sound human laws which promote the common good.

And further:

> In the light of such principles, we must form our opinion of other modern liberties—freedom of worship, freedom of speech, freedom of the press and freedom of teaching. Those are real, honest and precious liberties when they are used in matters where freedom is permissible and within the bounds of moral right, beyond which they become abuses, weaknesses and destructive principles.

It follows therefore that it is never permitted to request, defend or grant freedom to think, to write or to teach, nor indiscriminate freedom of worship, as so many rights which nature has given to man. . . .

It also follows nevertheless that these various species of freedom may be tolerated for reasonable causes, providing a proper temperament prevents them from degenerating into licence and disorder.

To sum up, Mr. Speaker, we of the province of Quebec are in favour of liberty, but not of licence.

We believe that liberty is the natural condition in which man is called upon to fulfil his destiny, but that is a false conception of liberty to seek in its name to spread the most pernicious errors. And communism, I am sure every member of this house will admit, is an error that must be condemned. It is the antithesis of liberty such as we conceive it.

It is possible that the means used by the Quebec government to combat communism are questionable; but, as the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) so judiciously stated last evening, it is not for the moment our business to make any decision in the matter.

The question is under consideration and will be decided, I am sure, in the best interests of the country.

I wished to make these few remarks, Mr. Speaker, so that our hon. friends of the different opposition groups may understand that we, Quebec Liberals, are not at variance with the spiritual and religious authorities of our province in matters of principle and that their directions on such issues will, in the future as in the past, guide our public actions.

Let me add that such a wholesome influence is not to be feared, for should our Christian civilization ever be attacked as it has been in other countries, it is the province of Quebec, its people, its clergy and its loyalty that would be called to its rescue. And should true liberty ever vanish from this land, we would be its last defenders.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I am sure the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Jean) will excuse me if I do not follow him in what he has said. I should like, however, to say a word concerning the speech made by the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). I do not feel called upon to reply to him at length because I do not think anything he said has anything to do with the question under discussion. It is not necessary that I should defend the Russian revolution, if it needs any defence. I had the high distinction of being refused admission to that country to see how the revolution was progressing, so that I need not concern myself with defending it.

[Mr. Jean.]

He referred to the hospitality with which the social credit party was received last Sunday in Quebec. In that connection I would like to point out that if the province of Quebec can enact legislation barring advocates of communism, there is nothing to prevent the province of Quebec from enacting legislation to keep social credit out. That is the danger in the legislation with which we are now dealing. That, however, seems to have been lost on the hon. member for Cochrane.

Before I touch upon the specific points on which I wish to speak, I will refer briefly to some remarks made last evening by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Tremblay). To me his statements were amazing. If the point of view he expressed were to be generally accepted and to become a guiding principle in Canadian affairs, we could say goodbye to confederation and to all hope of making this dominion a united nation. He said in effect that what was done in Quebec was exclusively the concern of the people of that province. In this parliament we cannot hold to that theory. If we accepted that doctrine, it could not stop with the province of Quebec. If it is a good principle for Quebec, it is equally good for Alberta or any other province. If the people of this dominion want unity of purpose in its affairs, that unity cannot be attained or maintained on that basis. The hon. member is reported at page 3379 of Hansard as saying:

If a majority of the citizens of my own province think they should oppose those who preach opinions which we do not approve in that province; if they think that we should have such a law, it is up to them, because we are still living in a democracy, and while I do not think the majority should dictate, at the same time the will of the majority should prevail.

I point out to the hon. member that to the extent that they have such legislation as the padlock law, to that extent they have not democracy. The democracy they have they have in spite of that act and not because of it. My understanding of the rights and privileges guaranteed to us by the constitution of this country is that I may hold and preach whatever opinions I please, as long as I do so in accordance with the laws of the land. For the benefit of the hon. member I should like to quote a brief excerpt found in the Votes and Proceedings of this house of March 4 last, from the joint opinion of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada and Mr. Justice H. H. Davis. The learned judges were giving their opinion in regard to Bill No. 9, an Alberta bill entitled, "An act to ensure the publication of accurate news and information," and they said:

> Any attempt to abrogate this right of public debate or to suppress the traditional forms of the exercise of the right (in public meeting and through the press) would, in our opinion, be incompetent to the legislatures of the provinces or to the legislature of any one of the provinces, as repugnant to the provisions of the British North America Act, by which the parliament of Canada is established as the legislative organ of the people of Canada under the crown, and dominion legislation enacted pursuant to the legislative authority given by those provisions.

There is no ambiguity in that language; there can be no misunderstanding of the opinion of the learned judges in regard to the rights of the people, as to where the law begins and where it ends. Let me direct the attention of the house to the central thought in that quotation, which is:

> Any attempt to abrogate this right of public debate or to suppress the traditional forms of the exercise of the right . . . would, in our opinion, be incompetent to the legislatures of the provinces or to the legislature of any one of the provinces.

> In the province of Quebec we are different from our fellow citizens of the other provinces of this dominion. But surely no one in this house will forget that we love British institutions; we are attached to them; we owe our liberty to British institutions.

My hon. friend did not say whether he supported or opposed the "padlock" law, but after he made that statement I was wondering what British institutions were being conserved by that law. He did not tell us, and I am at a loss to know. I remember reading in the Manchester Guardian a short time ago that the padlock law was unique in British legislation; that there was nothing of the kind in any other British dominion. As a last word in regard to the remarks of the hon. member, I should like to say that every British institution which we hold dear to-day was dearly bought by people who dared to stand up against great odds and give expression to the faith that was theirs. These institutions were not won by people who were afraid to express an opinion that at the time might be not only unpopular but dangerous. So the hon. member for Dorchester had better declare himself as to where he stands in regard to the padlock law.

This act was first brought to the attention of this house fourteen months ago yesterday, March 30, 1937, six days after it had been assented to by the lieutenant governor of Quebec. On that occasion the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) directed the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and also the attention of parliament, to the dangerous nature of this legislation. He pointed out that the "padlock" law seriously interfered with rights and privileges which the British people had won for themselves through centuries of struggle and sacrifice, rights and privileges now considered a part of our heritage. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out at that time, and he reiterated it last night, that Canadian citizens had rights as Canadians regardless of what province they might reside in, and I think that is amply proved by the quotation I read from the opinion of the chief justice and Mr. Justice Davis of the Supreme Court of Canada.

The hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) said quite a lot about communism. I have before me an editorial that appeared in Toronto Saturday Night of May 1, 1937, commenting on a speech delivered by Hon. T. J. Coonan, minister without portfolio in the Duplessis government. Among other things, Mr. Coonan said that communism was not defined in the "padlock" law because no half-dozen people in the country would be able to agree upon such a definition, and because many people are communistic and do not know it. He added that in passing this legislation the Duplessis government was taking a leaf out of the communist book. Let me direct the attention of the hon. member for Cochrane to that remark. I do not believe we can overcome obnoxious doctrines, doctrines that we do not like, by accepting them and incorporating them into our laws. I am afraid we shall have to find some other way, and if I were to choose a way I think I would adopt the suggestion offered by the Minister of Justice in a speech delivered last year, I believe, in which he said that the way to overcome communism was to improve the conditions under which people lived and to make those conditions better and easier. We cannot overcome such doctrines by suppression. Suppression led to the revolution in Russia, and suppression will lead to revolution everywhere, sooner or later.

In commenting on the statement of Hon. Mr. Coonan, Toronto Saturday Night said:

Of the accuracy of this last statement there can be no doubt.

That is, the statement that the Duplessis government was taking a leaf out of the communist book.

In that one respect at least Mr. Duplessis and Mr. Coonan are "communistic," though not apparently without knowing it. But surely there are certain serious risks about undertaking to suppress a thing concerning which no half-dozen people agree as to what it is. We have had a large quantity of legislation of this sort in Germany, and it has been reflected in the kind of prosecutions from which many of Mr. Coonan's fellow-religionists in that country are now suffering. It is an accepted doctrine now, in both Germany and Russia, that a crime does not need to be defined in advance, does not need to be recognized as a crime by the person who commits it, does not need to be regarded as a crime by the mass of the citizens. All that is necessary is that the authorities should say it is a crime (after it has been committed), and it thereupon becomes one. That this power of determining what is a crime without reference to any statutory definitions is of the very essence of personal, autocratic government; that it was driven out of the British system after a tremendous struggle several hundred years ago; that it invariably leads to the deterioration of the authorities themselves, to the rise of tyranny in the rulers and the decline of spirit and independence in the ruled—these facts seem to have no weight in the minds of our modern advocates of the star chamber and the "preventive arrest."

I should like the hon. member for Cochrane to read that over, and think it over; and I have hopes that then he would deal with this question from an altogether different point of view from the one from which he considered it to-night. When my leader opened this discussion he, followed by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), demonstrated by evidence which has not been challenged that Canadian citizens are being denied their lawful, constitutional rights in the province of Quebec because of the operation of this act. In my opinion they have given ample reason why the government should act in the matter, and also why that action should be no longer delayed. According to the statistics of the Quebec government, from November 2, to the beginning of May, 124 raids have been made on offices and private homes. Let it be noted that most of these raids were on private homes. We find that 532 books dealing with communism have been seized, and that is not all the books which have been seized. These are books seized and not returned, books which have been confiscated.

Let me point this out: The decision as to whether a book deals with communism or is communistic in character is decided by a professor of the university of Montreal. How the professor became an expert in communism, we are not told. There does not seem to be any appeal from the professor's decision. If he says a book deals or books deal with communism, the book or books must be confiscated. If in the professor's opinion books do not deal with communism, they may be returned to the owner. It would seem that if the professor of the university of Montreal decided that Alice in Wonderland, the Pilgrim's Progress or Macaulay's History of England were communistic literature, that would be the end of them so far as the owner was concerned. There is no appeal. That is a state of affairs which the people of Canada should not be asked to tolerate, and which, if we are going to hold the freedom we now have, we cannot tolerate.

I noticed last night when speakers on this side were pointing out how the act was operating in Quebec, some hon. members opposite were smiling. I wonder if they would smile; I wonder how they would feel if in their own provinces their homes were raided, their books and papers taken away for examination by some professor, and only those books returned to them which, after examination, the professor decided they should have returned. Let me say that such a thing may happen. If it can happen in the province of Quebec; if we are content to let it happen in that province, is there any reason to believe it may not happen in other provinces? If we allow it to happen in Quebec, how can we prevent it in any other province? There is a principle involved here which this government dare not ignore. This is a matter in which a great principle is at stake, and it must be considered on the basis of principle if we are going to deal with it adequately.

I think it would be appropriate to bring to the attention of the house by way of comparison the expedition with which the Minister of Justice and the cabinet acted in another case respecting questionable provincial legislation. On August 6, 1937, the government of Alberta passed three acts, namely "An act to provide for the regulation of credit of the province of Alberta"; "An act to provide for the restriction of the civil rights of certain persons"; "An act to amend the judicature act."

These acts were assented to by the lieutenant governor of the province on August 6. On August 10 they were received by the Secretary of State at Ottawa. On the same date, August 10, the Minister of Justice prepared a long and elaborate report on these acts—on the same day as they were received in Ottawa. That report contains almost five pages of typewritten foolscap, single spaced. The Minister of Justice recommended disallowance of the provincial legislation, a procedure which he stated less than six months earlier could not be easily exercised. But it did not seem very difficult to exercise, and certainly it did not take very much time in the Alberta case. Then seven days later, on August 17, the three Alberta acts were disallowed.

I draw attention to the fact that copies of the Alberta acts were received in Ottawa on August 10, according to sessional paper 221, and on the same date the statement of the Minister of Justice was prepared recommending to the governor in council that the acts be disallowed. I am not complaining about the haste; the minister thought it was justified. I am not going to dispute the point with him. But compare the speed with which the Alberta acts were challenged with the slowness of action in the case of the padlock law.

This act was assented to by the lieutenant governor of Quebec on March 24, 1937. On March 30, six days later, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre brought the matter before parliament. The Minister of Justice said he had not seen the act, and that he could not make a statement in regard to it until he had seen it. We are told an authentic copy of the act reached Ottawa on July 8, three and a half months after it was assented to. This may have been the "first convenient opportunity" required by the British North America Act, but it is strange that an act could come from Edmonton, Alberta, in four days, whereas it took three and a half months to come from Quebec.

On January 28, the Canadian Civil Liberties Union, with the support of forty other organizations, presented a formal petition to the Minister of Justice for disallowance or for reference to the supreme court. Speaking in the house on February 4, seven days later, the Minister of Justice complained as to criticisms leveled at him because he had not dealt with the padlock legislation. He said it was unfair to ask him for a decision so soon, because he had had the petition before him for only a few days. But he prepared the report on the Alberta acts the day they were received in Ottawa. He prepared that report and recommended disallowance without a petition. May I point out that he had the padlock law before him from July 8 until January 28, when the petition was presented for disallowance or reference to the supreme court.

Here is a comparison in reference to a serious matter about which we should have some explanation. It took less than one day's consideration for the minister to recommend disallowance of the Alberta acts—just one day for the government to call for a reference before the supreme court. Only eleven days intervened between assent and disallowance of the Alberta acts, whereas with respect to the "padlock" law, fourteen months have passed since assent, and the minister promised that a reference to the supreme court would have his serious consideration.

I do not like to reflect on the phrase "serious consideration", but the lapse of time in the present instance is an added justification for the smile which comes to people's faces when "serious consideration" is mentioned. More than eight months have elapsed since the first request for disallowance, four months since the first formal petition and two months since hearing counsel in support of the petition. I do not think the minister can say we have been impatient; any more patience in the matter and it could surely be said that patience had ceased to be a virtue.

I have a great many resolutions before me asking either for disallowance or for a reference to the supreme court. As the minister has probably had more than I have had, I shall not take the trouble to read them to the house. May I conclude with only one or two further observations, which I make as seriously, sincerely and as kindly as possible. There are many reasons why the "padlock" law should be either disallowed or referred to the supreme court for a decision as to validity. These reasons have been explained time and again. There is one reason, however, which I believe should weigh heavily with this government. It claims it is anxious that the unity of the Canadian people be maintained. We are all anxious that national unity should be strengthened, but I say in all earnestness that unity in Canada cannot be maintained if one province is going to be treated differently from another.

Mr. P. J. ROWE (Athabaska): Mr. Speaker, I feel it my inescapable moral and legal duty to join in the protest which has been made by some hon. members against this legislation. I regard it as an awful invasion of the age-old liberties which we of the Anglo-Saxon race have always referred to with justifiable pride and reverence. These liberties have been won as the result of a thousand years of struggle, and in my judgment they have been violated by this legislation. Those thousand years of struggle were marked by considerable personal sacrifice and risk on the part of those who won them for us. We are the recipients and heirs of the results of those efforts and we are also the guardians for the future. We must pass on to those who come after us these liberties sound and intact.

It seems incredible that in the year 1938 it is possible that there should be upon the statute books of one of our great provinces a law that permits the encroachment upon and the setting aside of what we have always regarded as the elementary rights of ordinary citizens. Here is what is possible under this legislation. An executive officer is enabled to punish a man by padlocking his house before a court has found him guilty. The burden of proof of innocence is placed upon the person thus attacked, and there is no appeal from the decision of a single judge of the superior court. Any peace officer is enabled to seize literature, not only of a communistic nature—the interpretation of what constitutes communism is left to the uncontrolled discretion of the party who pleases to decide the matter—but of any sort of literature tending to produce communism. I quote from the petition sent in from the Canadian Civil Liberties Union:

> This act violates fundamental principles of the Canadian constitution. The preamble to the British North America Act states that Canada is to have a "constitution similar in principle to that of Great Britain." This phrase is based on Quebec resolution No. 3, which speaks of following "the model of the British constitution." Elementary principles of British constitutional government are freedom of speech, of the press and of public meeting subject to the limitations of the criminal law; the right of a man to a fair trial in open court if charged with an offence; a presumption of innocence in the accused until he is proven guilty; and freedom of the home from arbitrary search and interference by executive officers acting without judicial warrant.

There can be no doubt that all of these principles have been violated by this act. It was with astonishment that I listened to an hon. member read a list of the books and periodicals which had been seized. The whole thing struck me as being absolutely ridiculous. It is almost unbelievable that the speeches of Lloyd George, the books of Charles Dickens and of Sidney and Beatrice Webb have been seized. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has often stated in this house that the way to stop subversive activities in this country is to remove the cause. Has it ever occurred to any hon. member that there may be very definite causes for what are loosely referred to as subversive activities? I should like to quote from an article which I read this morning in an Edmonton paper, the People's Weekly of May 1938. The writer of this article is Mr. S. Lapedes, secretary and organizer of the United Garment Workers of America. He says:

> Eighty per cent of those gainfully employed in Quebec receive wages lower than the minimum required for a decent standard of existence. In a parish near Quebec city a firm employs seventy-five workers at a maximum wage of eight cents an hour and a minimum of five cents. The minimum wage in Quebec is forty per cent lower than in Ontario.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The man who wrote that wrote a lie.

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): I have given the name and date of the periodical and the name of the writer.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is slander.

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): The minister may look it up in the reading room. If this article is not correct, he may take whatever action he deems advisable against one who has allegedly published an inaccurate statement.

Mr. HANSELL: We should have a press act to make them publish the truth.

Mr. ROWE (Athabaska): I have heard the Minister of Justice repeatedly make the statement in this house that the way to correct subversive activities is to remove the cause. It is our business to see that these inhumanities are removed. I cannot describe this legislation as other than frantic, hysterical and altogether outrageous. It is just another melancholy example of the utter and complete bankruptcy of ideas which characterizes present day government and leadership. The attempt is made to treat the symptom rather than the disease. The attempt is made to rearrange the consequences rather than to discover and remove the causes. I have said over and over in the house that the resources of labour and material in this country are capable of producing an abundant and happy living for all our citizens, provided we use sound, scientific principles of production and distribution. Yet we are clinging to the carcasses of a dead system and a dead policy.

I appeal to my French-Canadian colleagues in the house. Over a period of centuries old France has produced a great number of brilliant and courageous defenders of democracy and freedom, and so has French Quebec. I shall not name them because they are well known to every hon. member. How does this legislation square with the immortal words of that great Frenchman who said:

> I may disagree with everything you say, but I will defend with my life your right to say it.

I suggest that we should keep those words in mind and try to square our legislative enactments with them. May I suggest that we turn our attention to the urgent problem of preserving our political and industrial democracy here in new France? The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) suggested in the house about ten days ago that we should be prepared to endure "sore travail" in order to defend the democracy of old France. Let us get firmly established the industrial democracy of new France. Let us work on the principle that democracy, like charity, begins at home.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has referred to the alacrity with which the government proceeded to disallow certain legislation when the interests of rich and powerful people in this country were in jeopardy or were questioned. One cannot help contrasting that with the fact that fourteen months have gone by, and we heard last night a recital of the terrible injustices and the serious invasions of the elementary principles of the rights of the people that have been going on in that province for fourteen months, and apparently no attention is paid thereto. This inaction on the part of the government raises a question which one hears being asked all over this country. Is there one law for the rich and another for the poor? I am reminded of the satirical remark made by another illustrious Frenchman, Anatole France. He said in one of his books:

> The law in its majesty equally forbids the rich as well as the poor to sleep under bridges and steal bread.

It may be, and I believe it has been argued that the government should not exercise its powers of disallowance until an application seeking such action has been presented to it. But, I suggest, in the case of such gross, flagrant and palpable transgression of the elementary rights of private citizens the government should be empowered to act without unreasonable delay.

CONCENTRATION OF SINGLE UNEMPLOYED MEN IN VANCOUVER—RESPONSIBILITY ATTACHING TO HOLDERS OF NATURALIZATION CERTIFICATES

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the house resolves itself into committee of supply, I desire to direct attention to a few matters which, I think, constitute grievances that the government should take early steps to remedy.

First, the public property of Canada is vested in the crown in right of the dominion. The post office property of Canada is vested in the crown in right of the dominion, and has been constructed by the taxpayers of Canada for public use.

Second, it is the duty of the government of Canada to see that the property owned by the Canadian people for Canadian purposes is available for the purposes for which it was provided.

Third, a post office is a public place under the provisions of the criminal code.

Fourth, during the last several days the entrance hall of the post office at Vancouver has been completely filled with large numbers of idle and unemployed persons. It may be true that there has been a failure on the part of the national government to take appropriate steps to provide for them. That, however, is entirely beside the question. It is not my purpose or intention to indulge in any discussion with respect to that matter, except to point out that there is a large measure of sympathy on the part of many citizens of Vancouver for those who thus find themselves unemployed.

Fifth, under the law of this country, when persons thus unemployed or persons who have nothing to do but loiter in a public place—and under the code a post office is a public place—they are trespassers.

Sixth, the criminal code of this country has provided that it is the duty of the owner of property that is held, as a post office is, by the crown in right of the dominion, to remove with as much force as may be necessary those persons who are trespassing upon that property. Further, the criminal code has provided that in the event of trespassers resisting attempts to remove them, they are deemed to commit an assault without justification or provocation. That is section 61 of the Canadian criminal code.

I should like you Mr. Speaker, to realize that this country is now being held up before the world as a country in which there is no longer respect for law and order. Blazoned upon the headlines of great journals throughout the American continent is the statement that sit-down strikes are now the order of the day in Canada, and that the public property held by the crown in right of this dominion, not of the province, is no longer available for the purposes for which it has been constructed, but that men by hundreds are sitting there, not for hours but for days. I have no suggestion to make as to the solution of the difficulty between these individuals and the crown as represented by either the province or the dominion, by the government of the one or the other, but as a Canadian I protest against the continuance of public property being held by those who are trespassing upon it. I feel quite certain that if this matter were put before them as it should be, and they were asked to leave this property at once, as trespassers, this would have the desired result; for these men are not ignorant men. The evidence of the press indicates that, in many instances, they are men of education, understanding and appreciation, and yet to enforce their demands they are carrying on a sit-down strike in the post office at Vancouver. Last year the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) declared in this house in bold terms, as reported at page 2114 of Hansard, that sit-down strikes should not be tolerated in Canada. It is true that what he had reference to at that particular time were sit-down strikes in industrial and commercial properties; but whatever may be said with respect to sit-down strikes in commercial and industrial properties, however much you may declare and inveigh against them, you must realize that a sit-down strike by those who are trespassers upon public property is one of the most serious things that could happen in this dominion.

The press in Vancouver has been directing attention to this matter. As I say, it is now being blazoned in the public press of other countries. I ask the administration to take immediate steps, on behalf of the Canadian people, to vindicate the majesty and authority of the law and see to it that those who trespass upon public property in defiance of the laws of the country are requested peaceably, honourably and fairly to leave the public property upon which they are trespassers; failing which, the steps provided for by the criminal code should be taken without delay. It is that, Mr. Speaker, to which I wish to direct the attention of the house at this time. It is a real grievance which does not affect the community of Vancouver alone. It is a grievance that affects every Canadian, whoever he may be, who is interested in the fair name and fame of this dominion and has any respect for its reputation among the peoples of the world.

I now direct attention to the second grievance about which, I think, the people of this country are greatly concerned. I hold in my hand what I dare say has been seen by many people, namely, a statement made by a returned Italian named Vincent Scappatura, in the North Bay Nugget on May 27, 1938, couched in terms which I think the right hon. the Minister of Justice will admit should not be permitted to be used by any man who is a naturalized British subject in Canada, in which statement he refers to our institutions as being so lacking in vigour and strength as compared with the institutions that have been set up in Italy; that England had to back down; that Mussolini "just wont scare"; that when the British fleet was concentrated in the Mediterranean, Mussolini could have sunk it, and that the British navy was too weak and unorganized to do anything about it. And so far as Canada is concerned, he points out that Canada cannot do certain things in connection with certain matters with which we deal every day, because in this democracy we are unequal to it and the only way in which we can deal with these matters is through the application of certain principles. To quote the words attributed to him:

> "When there was a lack of employment among farm workers, the fascists sent agents to survey the farms," related Mr. Scappatura. "Work and repairs that were needed were advised to be done. Not next week or when the farmer felt like it but now!"

And then he goes on to point to the regulations that are applied with reference to the life of the farmers and others in Italy. I am not going to take up the time of the house reading it, but there are nine proposals which he asserted in this country and which are not only a reflection upon this dominion but a reflection upon the British crown and upon British public men as well as upon our institutions and our form of government. This man is a naturalized Canadian. He has been absent from this country for several years, and he came back the other day. He says that he is going to get a passport to go back to Italy; that he will sell out his property there and then come back to this country.

I ask the government of the day to enforce the provisions of the statute which was placed upon the statute books by common consent—not by a party measure. I refer to the Naturalization Act, being chapter 138 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, the first subsection of section 9, which reads as follows:

> Where the governor in council, upon the report of the minister, is satisfied that a certificate of naturalization granted by the minister under this act or granted under any Naturalization Act heretofore in force in Canada has been obtained by false representation or fraud, or by concealment of material circumstances, or that the person to whom the certificate was granted has shown himself by act or speech to be disaffected or disloyal to His Majesty, the governor in council shall by order revoke the certificate.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is done frequently.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; that was what I was about to say in my next sentence. It is very frequently done, and I hope that as long as we have a country it will continue to be done on appropriate occasions, as I believe it will be by all governments and under all circumstances. I direct public attention to this matter rather than the attention of the Minister of Justice personally, in the first instance, because I think it is of the utmost importance that it should be known by those who have come to this country, who have made their homes here, who have secured naturalization certificates, who have received the benefits and advantages of our institutions, that it is to their advantage to realize that they must conduct themselves as citizens of this new country and not as citizens of the old. I know that the Minister of Justice not only holds that view but has had occasion frequently, very frequently, to exercise the power that is involved in the cancellation of certificates; and my grievance—I put it frankly, not on my own behalf—is that such a statement as I shall hand to the minister should be made by any man in this country and that he should come back to Canada after an absence and declare that he is going to get a passport for the purpose I have indicated. My suggestion is that a commission should at once issue for the purpose of investigating the matter which I thus bring to the attention of the government.

I shall not, of course, make any pronouncement as to the authenticity or otherwise of the statements that appear in the public press. I saw them in the press and debated with myself as to what my duty was in the premises. I think, having regard to the troubled times in which we live, it is highly important that those who obtain naturalization certificates in Canada should realize that these certificates may for just reason and cause be cancelled. I was told only a few days ago that if that were generally understood by some in this country, we would have less occasion for worry in connection with certain types of unrest which manifest themselves in one or two sections of Canada.

These are the two matters to which I direct the attention of the government at this time before we go into supply, in order that the government may have timely notice of a situation which later undoubtedly will engage this house in debate. I have endeavoured not to make any statement that is controversial in the sense of not being strictly within the terms of the information which is in my possesion. Had I read from the public press of Vancouver some of the statements which have appeared there, the statement that I have made would be much stronger than it now is. I have not for many reasons read at length the statement that appears in the North Bay newspaper; for I might thereby be deemed to be accepting it as wholly accurate, when it might be that the naturalized Italian would say that it was an improper appreciation of what he meant to say. I do believe, however, that one of the best methods by which we can deal with this whole situation—the last one to which I have referred—is for an authoritative statement to be made at the appropriate time by the Minister of Justice as to the liability and responsibility attaching to those who have obtained naturalization certificates in this country through their residence and through their oath of allegiance which is, of course, a condition precedent to the certificates being issued under our statute.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I should like to make some reference to the remarks of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) with regard to the situation in the post office at Vancouver. He has described it as a sit-down strike.

Mr. BENNETT: I said it was so described.

Mr. EULER: I am quite willing to accept the words of my right hon. friend, but I think that possibly it is not quite a parallel case to the so-called sit-down strikes in the United States, in that the sit-down strikes there were carried on by employees on property which was not their own. I am making no excuses whatever for what has taken place; but I might say that possibly the post office property being public property, unless extremes are resorted to, the public has a certain right to be in these lobbies. I am not saying for a moment that they are not trespassing and that they will not have to be dealt with, but I think hon. members will admit that the situation is a rather trying one. I dare say there is a certain amount of public sympathy, but it seems to me that cannot be permitted to interfere with the proper functions of the Post Office Department. We had hoped that, instead of perhaps playing into their hands by way of ejecting them by force, the common sense of these men would, after all, lead them to leave the premises voluntarily.

Mr. BENNETT: They have been there for ten days now.

Mr. EULER: And perhaps by avoiding any violent action, the precipitation of something worse than has so far occurred may have been avoided. I am inclined to agree with the leader of the opposition that there is something due to the majesty of the crown; the property belongs to the crown, and nothing should be permitted to interfere with the normal use of that property. When I say that, I would also add that one of the reasons why no drastic action has been taken is that the service in the Vancouver post office has not been interfered with. I should like to refer to what was said here the other day, I think by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) who stated that there were being carried on in the post office lobby, games, races and activities of that kind, which I understood him to say were seriously interfering with the work of the post office. That is not the case. I stated at the time that I as acting Postmaster General had had no information to that effect but that I would make immediate inquiry. I did so, and the district director forwarded the following telegram on that point:

Activities are not indulged in during hours lobby open to public. On the evening of Victoria day concert held and foot-races run in lobby. This was done in orderly manner and no damage resulted. Wednesday men requested to keep quiet as possible during the evening to avoid distracting sorters. This request complied with and when lobby was closed unemployed clean out debris and assist washing floor.

I read that to indicate that during the post office business hours there was no interference whatsoever with the functions of the post office. I am also free to say that while I and the government had hoped that the whole matter would dispose of itself; that the men perhaps would come to more normal ideas of what is right and proper and vacate the premises, I am quite willing to say to the house that in my opinion, speaking for myself, the matter cannot continue indefinitely; and some action will have to be taken if the men do not vacate the post office property. I notice the right hon. leader of the opposition is shaking his head and indulging in a bit of merriment, I suppose at my expense.

Mr. BENNETT: No, far be that from me, but I thought it rather strange that a property belonging to the crown should be converted into a theatre.

Mr. EULER: Well, it was after hours. But I admit he might take the view he does. While it was on a holiday, May 24, I admit it is not a proper place to carry on that sort of thing. But I also say that when he evidently makes the suggestion—I do not want to misinterpret what he said—that violence should immediately have been used in ejecting these men—

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. BENNETT: He was very careful to say exactly the opposite. Why did my hon. friend say he endeavoured not to misconstrue? I said to request these men to withdraw quietly, and then if they did not do it, did not understand it, to use such force as might be necessary, under the criminal code.

Mr. EULER: That bears out exactly what I said. My right hon. friend used the word "force." These men have been asked to withdraw; they have not withdrawn; now my right hon. friend repeats himself; he advocates or suggests the use of force.

Mr. BENNETT: The criminal code provides for it.

Mr. EULER: The law provides for many things, and if we had proceeded as drastically as might be done under the law and immediately upon this thing taking place had proceeded to eject these men by force if they did not leave when asked it is just possible—without making any excuse for them—that such action would have precipitated a condition which later we might have had cause to regret. I am free to say again this thing cannot continue indefinitely, and so far as I am concerned I think some action will have to be taken to ensure that the lobbies of the Vancouver post office shall be used in a proper way for the carrying on of the post office business.

Mr. MacINNIS: I do not know whether I am entitled to speak again, this being a new subject, but if I am in order—

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member has spoken twice on the motion to go into supply.

Mr. MacINNIS: I have spoken only once on the motion to go into supply. If I am out of order—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): You are.

Mr. MacINNIS: Then there is nothing I can do, but I would like to have said a few words which I think might be of interest.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): As far as the matter mentioned by my right hon. friend is concerned, I shall see to it that this report is given to the Secretary of State, whose department deals with naturalization matters, and I have no doubt my right hon. friend will receive some report as a result of it.

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): I should like to say a few words as a citizen of Vancouver, stressing more particularly the necessity for the government to do something to place these men at work. That is a responsibility from which the government cannot escape. These men are single unemployed transients. I believe several thousand of the men of that class now in Vancouver do not even belong to British Columbia; they are men from the other provinces of Canada. The stand taken by this government and the provincial government is that they will ship back to their respective provinces those men who do not belong to British Columbia. But the difficulty is that when these men get back to their home provinces they are treated there as transients; they cannot establish any claim to relief, and so naturally enough they will not go. The men are not criminals in any sense of the word, although I think they are being wrongly led. Quite apart from the men who are in the post office and the art gallery, there have been some going out during the last week begging for money, shaking little tin cans before the citizens, whereupon the city police pick them up on a charge of obstructing the police. The reason that charge is laid is that it is an indictable offence and therefore the province has to pay for their keep. Actually they are not obstructing the police at all; they hop into the police wagon and go off with smiles on their faces.

That is the position in my city, and the sad part is that it is breaking down the spirit of the citizens, breaking the morale of the city. It is something they see every day, talk about every day; it is right there on their doorstep. The result is that business is slowed down; there is no chance for more jobs in the city; it will simply mean that there will be more unemployed. I suggest to the government that the main reason why this problem is not being dealt with, was not dealt with last week, is because Ottawa is 3,000 miles away from Vancouver; our people are out there over the mountains on the Pacific slope, out of touch, and the government here does not realize how serious this question is for the people of Vancouver. If the same situation existed in Toronto, with three times the population of Vancouver, you would have 15,000 single transient unemployed there, and you would have 3,000 men camped in the Toronto post office and the Royal Ontario museum. No one in this house can tell me that if that state of affairs existed, the government here would not have taken action a long time ago. If it were in Montreal, you would have 20,000 single unemployed, and 4,000 of these men parked in the post office there and the art gallery. Then the members of the government here would realize the seriousness of the situation.

I suggest to the government that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) should go to the coast at once, where he could see the situation for himself. I suggest also that some of the forestry camps be reopened until it is possible to give these men work on the works projects. Almost a month ago I told the minister this trouble was coming, and as I pointed out then, these men have been kept all winter in forestry camps; they are not like the men on the prairies or in Ontario who have been kept on the farms, and can go on with farm work in the summer. These men have been in the forestry camps, which are closed each spring. The men are turned loose, and they all drift to the one city. That is how the trouble came about. We have had the same thing each year for the last two or three years, and I submit to the ministers who are here to-night that some action should be taken at once. I am not saying anything about using force, but I place emphasis on the need for giving these young men work. If you do that, there will be no trouble at all about getting them out of the post office and the art gallery.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, we are a long way from Vancouver, and in a matter of this kind I would far sooner let the officials of the government in that city look after matters than try to deal with the difficulty at such long range. So far as I know, and I think so far as the government have been informed, the men about whom we are speaking this evening have been fairly well behaved under the circumstances. They are not in exactly a normal frame of mind in a great many instances. If they had desired to do harm in that city, they were in an art gallery, where they could have done incalculable damage in a very short space of time, but the fact that they have kept discipline there and do not want to damage property at least speaks well for the behaviour of the men involved. It may sound almost humourous to think that on crown property these men were almost guilty of having a pleasant evening. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would far sooner find the men doing that and behaving with a sense of decency than attempt to remove them by force and possibly have them barricade themselves in these public buildings. Instead of condemning the government for the action they have taken, I think there is some commendation due them, particularly those officials in charge in Vancouver, for the patience that has been shown under the circumstances. Further, I think the people of Vancouver have shown a great deal of sympathy and have given a great deal of support to the men involved.

When a moment ago I said they were not entirely normal I meant that they were not leading entirely normal lives. For several months previously they were in camps in the country. Then they came to the city and found no one willing to assume responsibility for their maintenance or even to help them obtain work. I would suggest, following the last speaker, that the government should exert every possible endeavour to see that these men are given a guarantee of some kind in regard to food, clothing and shelter, and then they should be provided with work. I think, if they were given some assurance of work in the near future, the trouble in regard to these men would soon be ended.

Hon. GROTE STIRLING (Yale): Mr. Mr. Speaker, this is Canada, and day by day we are looking at and hearing about a most extraordinary state of affairs that exists in the Vancouver post office. I cannot listen to these stories without my mind going back again and again to the situation with which the late administration had to deal at a time when depression was much worse and unemployment far more widespread. At that time the government of the day had to handle matters as they found them, and in devising methods to meet the situation with which they were confronted the government met with nothing but remonstrance, criticism and obstacles on the part of the opposition of that day. I remember the methods employed by the late administration to deal with that portion of this problem which fell to the dominion through agreement with the provinces, that is, the care of the single, homeless unemployed; methods which gave satisfaction to a very considerable number of those men, who were glad to receive shelter from the storm and subsistence, and to do work which was laid out for them. But everything that was done by the late administration for this class of men was condemned and ridiculed by those then opposed to us.

How has the problem changed? Those camps were closed. It is true that some of the camps have been reopened by other organizations for this purpose. When the camps were closed, the numbers in them having been greatly reduced, an arrangement was made between the present government and the two railway companies to employ these men for a certain length of time. When we endeavoured to get information at the end of that period as to what had become of the men who had been in the camps, we found it extremely difficult to find any trace of them. But they have turned up since in the persons of these single, homeless, unemployed still not dealt with by the dominion government. So we look on the situation in that province to the west, which has always had the most difficult part of this problem to look after, and which has had to handle it largely by itself, and we see a condition of affairs the news value of which is being exploited by the press of the world, with the result that the people of the world are smiling at Canada.

Mr. R. M. WARREN (Renfrew North): Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to tender any advice to the government on how to deal with this problem. There is only one angle of it that I propose to mention, and it is the manner in which we have educated numbers of our single men in this country in the idea that if they fail to find jobs for themselves, a generous government will turn in and provide them with a home, with food to eat and with raiment to wear. To my way of thinking that is one of the greatest injuries we have done to the young men of this country; we have robbed them of their initiative, destroyed their ambition to go out and find work, to do any job they can find. I am afraid it is only too true that once a young man works on a government job it is very hard to get him to work for a farmer or a contractor. If he gets work with the government one year, working eight hours a day and not being pushed too hard, he wants that job the next year, and if he does not get it then it is going to be just too bad for all concerned.

My suggestion is that some way be found of getting our young people away from this idea that they must eternally depend on some governing body to look after them. As I understand it, these young men in British Columbia were offered transportation back to their home provinces. They were taken into those camps under the youth training scheme, given employment during a time of stress, and then had the chance to go back to their own provinces where very likely they would have been able to find some kind of work.

Mr. MacNEIL: Where is the work?

Mr. WARREN: I venture to say that many of these men, at all events, could find work on the farms of the different provinces if they wanted to; but that is the trouble; you cannot get them to take that work after they have been doing government jobs. They do not want that kind of work.

Mr. MacINNIS: Are there any unemployed in the other provinces?

Mr. WARREN: Not in the rural districts. There are plenty of farmers looking for men.

Mr. MITCHELL: Is the fault that of the men who are in the post office and art gallery of Vancouver, or is it the fault of this nation which has not been able to meet their needs for work?

Mr. WARREN: I think it is greatly the fault of the young men there, that they did not get out of Vancouver when they had the money and the price to get out where work was to be found, and to take on the work available.

Mr. MITCHELL: Does that clear us of our responsibility?

Mr. WARREN: I do not see why any governing body should have to take the responsibility for taking care of all of its citizens. If we are going to adopt that sort of attitude—well, what are we drifting to?—just a dictatorship; that is all.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is the hon. member aware that a large number of young men are from the drought areas and could not return to the conditions which obtained there without being a great burden upon those municipalities.

Mr. WARREN: I suppose they are putting in crops in the dried-out areas this year, and in doing that they require help. If they have moisture, they will naturally want to put in crops, and in doing that there would be employment for numbers of these men.

Mr. MacINNIS: The hon. member says that he supposes; is there any indication that a person would get employment if he arrived there? You cannot go to the prairie provinces only on a presumption.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Inspection and investigation, $1,046,840.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Acting Postmaster General): We discussed this item the other day.

Mr. BENNETT: What changes have been made? I understand there is an increase in the inspection department in some of the provinces. Perhaps the minister would give us the information so that the item could be disposed of.

Mr. EULER: There has been one additional inspector of postal services.

Mr. BENNETT: Where?

Mr. EULER: Stationed at Toronto district.

Mr. BENNETT: And that is the only addition?

Mr. EULER: Yes, and a superintendent of the investigations division and another superintendent of the service division, both in Toronto, and one senior postal clerk at Quebec.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

TABLING OF NEW PROPOSALS FOR DEVELOPMENT OF GREAT LAKES SYSTEM

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): On May 28, the Secretary of State of the United States addressed a note to the Canadian Minister at Washington setting forth new proposals for the development of the great lakes-St. Lawrence system for navigation and power. That note was accompanied by a draft treaty, and the government of the United States, we are informed, desires to publish this to-morrow. So it is only fair to the house that I should lay on the table four copies of both the note of the United States Secretary of State and the proposed draft treaty. Of course we have not considered it yet.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): May I suggest it probably would be very much appreciated by every hon. member of the house if that could be printed in the votes and proceedings. I believe that would be desirable.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have not the slightest objection, and I move accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, June 1, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

BANKING AND COMMERCE—THIRD REPORT AND DRAFT BILL RESPECTING INTEREST ON SMALL LOANS

Mr. W. H. MOORE (Ontario) presented the third report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, together with a draft bill entitled, An Act respecting Interest on Small Loans.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): This is a very lengthy report. I suggest that inasmuch as no action is proposed to be taken on it to-day we might dispense with the reading of it and let it appear in the votes and proceedings.

Mr. STEVENS: It is an excellent literary production. It ought to be heard by hon. members.

Mr. DUNNING: There will be time to do that.

STANDING ORDERS—CONCURRENCE IN SECOND REPORT

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier) moved that the second report of the standing committee on standing orders, presented to the house on May 31, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

MAIL PRINTING COMPANY

AMENDMENT TO ACT OF INCORPORATION RESPECTING VALUE OF REAL ESTATE HOLDINGS

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound) moved the first reading of Bill No. 130 (letter J-2 of the Senate), respecting the Mail Printing Company.

Mr. CAHAN: Explain.

Mr. SLAGHT: Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to amend the act of incorporation of the Mail Printing Company, which was enacted in 1880. The only amendment proposed is the substitution of "one hundred thousand" for "thirty thousand" in the clause in the original bill which provides that real estate held by the corporation at any one time shall not exceed in annual value the sum of thirty thousand dollars. By reason of the increase in value since 1880 and the new premises acquired by this corporation, they find it desirable to have the annual value of the real estate that they may hold increased to one hundred thousand dollars.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PRIVATE BILLS

FIRST READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Bill No. 131, respecting the Globe Printing Company.—Mr. Slaght.

Bill No. 139, for the relief of Irene Thomas Smith.—Mr. Walsh.

Bill No. 140, for the relief of Sylvia Salzman Udashkin.—Mr. Lawson.

Bill No. 141, for the relief of William Dougald Stanley Campbell.—Mr. White.

Bill No. 142, for the relief of Mildred Varner MacLeod.—Mr. MacLean (Prince).

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT HEATING STAFF

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. How many hours per week are actually worked by the chief engineer, or engineer in charge, during the heating season on buildings under the Public Works department?

2. How many in the summer season during the "overhaul" of the plant?

3. How many men come under this category?

4. If on duty over the 44 hours per week specified in the civil service regulations and also by P.C. 670, 27th March, 1930, do they receive monetary compensation for overtime?

5. Do they receive time in lieu therefor?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. 48 hours.

2. 44 hours.

3. 18.

4. No.

5. Time in lieu is allowed for working over a 48-hour week in the heating season and a 44-hour week in the summer season.

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. Have shift engineers and firemen on the heating staff of the Public Works department been working continuously for more than one week without receiving the 24 hours off weekly, in accordance with the Lord's Day Act, and also P.C. 1537, 7th September, 1925?

2. If so, how many, and what periods were thus continuously worked during the heating season 1937-38 by each?

3. Have these men received monetary compensation for such extra days?

4. If not, have they received time in lieu thereof, and has such time been equitably arranged so as not to penalize by compelling them to work a predominant number of night shifts?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. Yes.

2. (a) 44.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

QUEBEC POSTAL DISTRICT EMPLOYEES

Mr. BOULANGER:

1. How many persons in the Quebec postal district are at present temporarily employed by the Post Office Department and without having passed the civil service examination?

2. What was the date of first appointment of each of these employees, the nature of his work and his salary?

3. How many persons in the postal district of Quebec successfully passed the last civil service examination for positions as clerks, postal helpers, mail porters or letter carriers?

4. How many of the successful candidates at the last examination have actually secured employment in the Quebec postal district?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

CANADIAN NAVAL SERVICE

Mr. STIRLING:

For a copy of all orders in council, letters, forms of tender, bids or tenders, cables, telegrams and correspondence of all kinds, relating to the construction of ships for the Canadian naval service prior to the 1st day of January, 1913.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Subject to the usual reservation with reference to documents that may be confidential, there is no objection to the motion passing.

[Mr. Cardin.]

ANTICOSTI ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Yesterday the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) asked me to ascertain whether or not Mr. Karl R. Gerhard or anyone with a similar name has been naturalized in this country in 1938. The reply is as follows:

There is no record of the naturalization in Canada of any person bearing the name Emil Karl Gerhardt.

There is the record of a certificate of naturalization having been issued, on November 19, 1937, to Karl Rudolf Gerhard, of 3463 Shuter street, Montreal.

The petition of Gerhard for naturalization was filed in the office of the clerk of the circuit court for the district of Montreal, on the 2nd June, 1937. The petition was heard by His Honour Judge Bumbray, on the 22nd October, 1937, who made a favourable report. The oath of allegiance was taken by Gerhard on the 12th November, 1937, and a certificate was issued to him in the regular course.

According to his own statement, confirmed by the records of the immigration branch, Department of Mines and Resources, this Karl Rudolf Gerhard, then aged twenty-two, farm labourer, destined to the Lutheran immigration board, Montreal, landed at Halifax on March 15, 1930, ex the SS. Stuttgart.

The particulars of his residence in Canada were given as follows:

At Eden, Ontario, 1930-32, % N. O. Stillwell, storekeeper.

At London, Ontario, 1932-33, Huron college and university.

At Waterloo, Ontario, 1933-34, % Jack Conrad, 34 Young street.

At Montreal, Quebec, from September, 1934, until 1937.

At the time of his application, he described himself as a journalist. He further stated that he had made a three months' visit to Germany in the summer of 1936.

There is no record in the Department of State as to whether this Mr. Gerhard made a trip to Europe during the course of this year or whether he was in Rome at the time of Mr. Hitler's visit.

UNEMPLOYMENT

CONCENTRATION OF SINGLE UNEMPLOYED MEN IN VANCOUVER—OCCUPATION OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Has any progress been made towards the peaceful evacuation of the Vancouver post office by the single unemployed?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The situation is just as it was described yesterday. The men are still in the lobby of the post office.

Mr. STEVENS: And still playing games.

Mr. EULER: I have no knowledge of that; in fact I doubt it very much, just as my hon. friend's information was incorrect the other day.

Mr. STEVENS: Not at all.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED LAY-OFF OF EMPLOYEES AT EDSON, ALBERTA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. H. MITCHELL (Medicine Hat): I wish to address a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). A telegram has come to-day addressed to the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Kuhl), from the town of Edson, Alberta, a divisional point of the Canadian National Railways. It states that an already heavy relief burden is being further aggravated by the lay-off of railway employees at this point. The citizens there are expressing anxiety and they ask for an early solution. What assurance can the government give the people of Edson that these men will be adequately provided for so that a crisis which appears to be impending there may be averted? I notice that the ministers of transport and of labour are not in the chamber at the moment, and I trust that the Minister of Justice will direct their attention to the question.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): My two colleagues are engaged elsewhere to-day, but this matter will be called to their attention and I hope to give my hon. friend an answer to-morrow.

EXCISE TAX AMENDMENT

MISCELLANEOUS ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES INVOLVING NO ALTERATION IN RATES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved the third reading of Bill No. 123, to amend the Excise Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

Railway mail service, $10,323,670.

Mr. GREEN: In the details of the vote given on page 169 it appears that there is only one grade for all railway mail clerks. About six weeks ago a delegation from the railway mail clerks appeared before the civil service committee, asking that a recommendation be made that there should be at least two grades of railway mail clerks, one for the junior men and one for the seniors who have charge of the different lines. We understood subsequently from the chairman of the civil service commission that the Post Office Department had asked for a regrading. Will new grades be established?

Hon. W. D. EULER (Acting Postmaster General): I am told that the matter has to be discussed with the civil service commission, but that has not yet been done. Action will follow as soon as the parliamentary committee on the civil service has completed its work, when the department will consult with the civil service commission as to what steps should appropriately be taken.

Mr. GREEN: Is the Post Office Department in favour of such a regrading?

Mr. EULER: No definite decision on that can be given until all the details have been thoroughly examined by the officials of the department. The department on its own initiative has referred the matter to the civil service commission for discussion. I do not know whether my hon. friend can gather a favourable opinion from that or not. But the matter will be discussed later on.

Mr. GREEN: The civil service commission gave us to understand that they were quite agreeable to it, but that the initiative had to come from the Post Office Department.

Mr. EULER: It has already been taken.

Mr. STEWART: I notice an increase of $327,600 in this item. Referring to page 169, mail service by railway, we find that the amount last year was $6,950,000 and this year $7,150,000, representing practically all the increase. How does this increase come about? Is there an extension of the service, or is it an increase in rates?

Mr. EULER: Almost the whole increase of $200,000 in this item is due to increased services. The following is a list of some eighteen new services that have been added, which accounts for $170,000 of the increase of $200,000:

Mail Service by Railway

The increase of $200,000 is to provide for the following services:

Route—Service	Annual cost
Hartney and Virden—Baggage car to postal car	$ 1,710 14
Montreal and Toronto—Baggage car service (new)	6,947 20
Ottawa and Brockville—Baggage car service (new)	1,601 60
London and Hamilton—Baggage car service (new)	1,014 12
Sudbury, Capreol and Winnipeg (trains 94, 97, 3, 4)—Baggage car service (new)	5,081 96
Sudbury, Capreol and Winnipeg (trains 95, 3, 1, 2, 4, 96)—Baggage car to postal car	88,350 52
Capreol and Field—Baggage car service (new)	473 40
Pembina and Winnipeg—Baggage car to postal car	3,153 48
Melville and Winnipeg—Baggage car service (new)	582 00
Toronto and Sudbury junction—Baggage car service (new)	3,405 44
Toronto, North Bay and Timmins—Baggage car to postal car	7,470 58
McLennan and Hines Creek—Baggage car to postal car	2,946 84
Senneterre and Val d'Or—Baggage car service (new)	1,802 88
Edmonton and Dawson Creek—Increase in frequency, postal car service	10,944 18
McLennan and Hines Creek—Increase in frequency, baggage car service	1,372 08
Toronto, London and Windsor; London, St. Thomas and Simcoe; Toronto and Stratford—Rearrangement of train service	2,093 92
Richmond and Sherbrooke—Baggage car to postal car	1,408 50
Montreal and Winnipeg—Overflow space	30,000 00
	$170,358 84

Mr. BAKER: Is this money equally divided between the two railways?

Mr. EULER: It is impossible to make an arbitrarily equal division of the services. It depends on the points served by the different railways.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): Does the increase in parcel post weight limit involve an increase in staff or equipment to handle that extra business?

Mr. EULER: Not up to this time.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): What was the reason for increasing the weight?

Mr. EULER: Chiefly to give an extra service to people in rural districts; and I think the department hopes for a little heavier income from the parcel post service on account of that increase.

Mr. SENN: The minister stated that this increase was not divided arbitrarily on an equal basis between the two railways. Of course there are places served by only one railway system. On the other hand there are many places reached by both railways. What is the system followed by the department in such cases? Is the service divided between the two railways or is one used exclusively? What is the governing factor?

Mr. EULER: I am informed that where both railways are available no one railway gets the business exclusively; there is a division. I cannot say whether it is always an equal division.

Mr. BARBER: I have in mind services in British Columbia. Are not the through mail contracts from the east to Vancouver held altogether by one company?

Mr. EULER: I am not sure that I can answer that question entirely to the satisfaction of my hon. friend. There is a difference in favour of the Canadian Pacific Railway, which I understand is largely accounted for by the fact that it was the pioneer railway, and reaches more completely the towns and villages in that locality than does the Canadian National. Naturally the business would go by the Canadian Pacific where they can serve the communities best. Through mails from the Atlantic to the Pacific, coming in by Canadian Pacific steamships, account for a very large proportion.

Mr. BARBER: I have in mind the lower Fraser valley. The mails have been carried by the Canadian Pacific on the north side of the river for many years, perhaps since mail cars first commenced to run. But from places situated on the Canadian National on the south side of the river the mails at present go to Vancouver via Canadian Pacific and then come back by the British Columbia Electric to points in the Fraser valley, which means that although there is a train on the Canadian National coming in at 7 a.m. which could deliver our mail, we do not receive it until noon. And there is the same delay with outgoing mails; they go to Vancouver or a point near Vancouver and are taken across and placed on the Canadian Pacific. The minister mentioned baggage car service. I think that district could be well served with a baggage car service between Kamloops and New Westminster. It is a service which we very much desire. It has been discussed from time to time, connecting with the Canadian Pacific from Rosedale to Agassiz. If this could be arranged, to give us a baggage car from those points at any rate, it would solve the problem. I am speaking of one of the largest settlements, which is served by several rural routes, that is the Chilliwack area on the Canadian National.

Mr. EULER: I assure my friend that we shall be glad to give his suggestion every consideration.

Mr. BARBER: The baggage car rates would not be very high.

Mr. EULER: I am told that the cost would be very little more, though I cannot say precisely what it would be.

Mr. BARBER: It would be a great convenience to the people of that district, the business people particularly; it would mean a difference of several hours.

Mr. EULER: We shall be very glad to consider it.

Mr. SENN: May I ask if buses are used to any extent at all in carrying mail from one point to another, and whether that comes under this item. I understand that from time to time newspapers are carried by bus, but I do not know whether or not the cost is borne by the newspaper companies themselves. I should like to know if there is any use made of the buses.

Mr. EULER: The bus service comes under the following item. This has to do with the railway mail service.

Mr. ISNOR: To me this item dealing with railway mail service has to do with a very important branch of the Post Office Department. The railway mail clerks are chosen from the best of the postal clerks. Their hours are long, and I am wondering just what protection they receive in the way of accommodation. We remember that last year or the year before the Dominion Railway Mail Clerks' Association made a protest in regard to cars of a certain type, and I should like the minister to advise us whether the department has any control over the type of car which is provided for the use of the railway mail clerks.

Mr. EULER: I am told that representations in this regard are being made constantly to the railway companies and the railway commission, and improvements are made from time to time.

Mr. ISNOR: Who makes the representations?

Mr. EULER: The Post Office Department.

Mr. ISNOR: I should like a little more light on this point. Are the representations made from the association to the department and then from the department to the railways? Is that the procedure?

Mr. EULER: That is usually the case.

Mr. ISNOR: Is steel equipment now being used throughout or are the older types of cars still in use?

Mr. EULER: The change has not been made in all cases, but it is being made gradually and progressively from the wooden cars to the steel cars.

Mr. ISNOR: I thank the minister for that information. I sincerely trust that in the very near future the change will be completed so that steel cars will be used throughout; because, as I said before, this is a most important branch of the service and the men are compelled to work very long hours. They are not like the men on duty in the ordinary post office, who are working in a fireproof building. These men carry on at all hours, day and night, and it is necessary for them to complete their work by stated times. For that reason I think they should have every protection possible.

I should like to take this opportunity of thanking the department for inaugurating a better, quicker and more satisfactory service between Boston and Halifax via Yarmouth, which I understand comes into operation on June 25. I think it only fitting that I should express my thanks and appreciation at this time.

Mr. SPENCE: In these days when business is declining sharply and when business people are more or less up against it, and with so many people out of work, I wonder if there is any real necessity for an added expenditure of $327,000 to give this extra service. Does the minister really believe this is a necessity?

Mr. EULER: I did not actually make up these estimates, of course, but I am quite sure the business people themselves demanded improved service, and in response to these demands we are making these extensions and additions. I cannot say anything further with regard to the matter. I think the extensions and additions that are being made are thoroughly justified. This is a growing business; Canada is a growing country, and while at the moment there may be what might be termed a slight recession, we hope it will be only temporary.

Mr. SPENCE: Business people are just like other people; they want anything they think they can get as long as they do not have to pay for it. It is up to the department to refuse to give them anything that does not pay the department. It is really a waste of money to give too much service when the financial position of the country does not warrant it.

Mr. McGREGOR: How much of this money goes to each of the railways?

Mr. EULER: For 1936-37 the figures are as follows: The Canadian Pacific received $3,550,789.32, and the Canadian National, $2,901,703.10.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: At the present time, as we all know, there is a decided drive on the part of the Canadian Pacific railway to bring about some sort of unification, and one of the reasons is that it would result in some saving to the taxpayers. I have been looking over the amounts granted to the Canadian Pacific for the carriage of mail. I am quoting from an article that appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of May 28, and I assume that these figures are correct:

1927	3,727,444
1928	3,715,032
1929	3,741,391
1930	3,693,153
1931	3,565,386
1932	3,621,875
1933	3,490,697
1934	3,519,697
1935	3,537,456

These are very large sums. For the life of me—and I have raised this question before—when we have our own Canadian National property, supported by the taxpayers of this country, I cannot see why we should not give the Canadian National Railways, wherever possible, the business of carrying the mails. I asked this question several years ago and could not get a satisfactory answer. I do not think there is one forthcoming; at least, if the minister can give it I would like to have it. Even in the case of mail carried on Canadian Pacific steamships I cannot see why, when it reaches this country, it could not for the most part be carried over the lines of the Canadian National Railways, or at least to half of the territory covered. Certainly, through mails could be carried in that way.

I should like to have a further explanation from the minister. If there is anything in the plea Sir Edward Beatty is making, that we ought to try to save money for the taxpayers, then is this not one way in which it could be done.

Mr. HOWDEN: I would like—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: May I have an answer from the minister, before we pass from this point?

Mr. HOWDEN: I was going to ask a question along the same lines.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps two or three years or more ago I might have made the same sort of speech as the hon. member has just made, because in those days I drew attention to the same conditions with regard to the mail service of the two railways. And I would not say for a moment that at the present time I am in disagreement with the hon. member. At the same time I am informed that the differential is gradually diminishing; that is, the two railways are approaching more nearly the same amounts which they receive from the government for the carrying of mail.

There are many reasons, and probably I should give them here, for the difference between the two contracts. For example, mail carried on Canadian Pacific railway ships across the Atlantic and routed to western Canada would naturally, I suppose, be carried on Canadian Pacific railway trains. That which is carried on the Cunarders, which may not be so widely patronized, would go on the Canadian National Railways. When the Canadian Pacific railway was built into western Canada it was the pioneer road. It passes to the south and through the larger towns and cities such as Brandon, Regina, Moose Jaw, Calgary and on to Vancouver. Probably for that reason it receives more for the carrying of mail than would the Canadian National Railways passing farther to the north. Then, radiating from the main line of the Canadian Pacific railway are many branch lines. I do not know just what the number is, as compared with the branch lines of the Canadian National Railways. I am informed, however, that they are more numerous and would naturally get more mail business than would the Canadian National system.

I do not believe the same argument would apply in eastern Canada because at least in western Ontario I believe the Canadian National lines are as numerous.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But even if they are—

Mr. EULER: I am granting that. I do not say that the same argument would prevail in eastern Canada. At this time I am not going to make an explanation of the situation. I am saying nothing as to the policy of the present government, whether or not there is any well-defined policy with regard to the matter or whether the fact that the one is publicly owned and the other privately owned should have any bearing whatsoever on the amount of business that should be given to each. I have heard it strenuously argued that the Canadian National Railways should not be favoured at the expense of the privately owned line. I will admit I have always felt—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is that the government policy?

Mr. EULER: I am not making a declaration of policy. The one policy that is being followed is, I believe, the policy which has been in vogue for many years—and I say this subject to correction from members of previous governments—namely, that there was not to be any discrimination in favour of either the publicly owned or the privately owned line.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But these figures seem to indicate that there is discrimination.

Mr. EULER: These are not discriminatory. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company happen to get more contracts and more money because their lines run in the places where they can best give the service. I am told that is the explanation.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Is there a greater Canadian Pacific mileage than Canadian National?

Mr. EULER: No. But especially in western Canada the Canadian Pacific passes through the more thickly populated parts, and the cities which receive more mail.

Mr. CAHAN: There is a greater volume of postal business.

Mr. EULER: Yes. In western Canada there is a greater volume of mail received along the lines of the Canadian Pacific than along those of the Canadian National.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The minister has said the difference is decreasing. Will he give details for the last ten or twelve years as to amounts given to the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. EULER: I can give examples in the last three years. In 1935-36 the difference was about $668,000. In 1936-37 it was only $665,000, or a reduction of $13,000, and in 1937-38 it was reduced to $620,000, or $35,000 less than it was the year before. That is why I say the differential is diminishing.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: But not very rapidly.

Mr. HOWDEN: I should like to follow up the interrogation of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. What is the policy of the Post Office Department with regard to the distribution of railway mail contracts? Are they let by tender? A minute ago the minister said that because the Canadian Pacific railway has direct connection with certain steamship lines, he assumes it would be given transference of the mail from those lines. I do not believe that is a sufficiently good reason. It is the custom of the government generally to let contracts by tender. If those mail contracts are not let by tender, how are they let? I ask that because it is evident the Canadian National Railways have been getting the worst of the deal all along the line for many years.

Mr. EULER: That question is easily answered. The space rates on the cars are fixed by order in council, and are the same for both railways. The allotting of the contracts is on the basis I suggested a moment ago, namely to whichever railway can give the better service.

Mr. HOWDEN: The two railways carry passengers from one coast to the other. My information is that the Canadian Pacific has all the through mail contracts, and if that is so it certainly looks like discrimination.

Mr. EULER: I can give no explanation other than the one I have already given, that it is not correct to say that the Canadian Pacific carries all the mail to the Pacific coast—

Mr. HOWDEN: All through mail.

Mr. EULER: No, not all the through mail. But for the reasons I have given they have the greater proportion. There may be other reasons with which I am not conversant.

Item agreed to.

Air and land mail services, $8,052,005.

Mr. BARBER: What portion of the vote last year was expended on this service? The minister might also indicate the revenues from the service.

Mr. EULER: In 1937-38 there was an expenditure of $6,087,888.56 out of a vote of $6,325,000. The air appropriation in that year was $705,000, with expenditures of $375,400.79. A large part of the appropriation was not expended.

Mr. BARBER: What was the revenue?

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I cannot give the detailed items of revenue because the amounts have not been divided. The net revenue was $35,546,161.25.

Mr. BARBER: Is that the total revenue from the post office?

Mr. EULER: The total revenue from all post office services.

Mr. BARBER: What is the amount from the air mail service?

Mr. EULER: It is impossible to segregate the revenue from the different items.

Mr. STEVENS: The sale of air mail stamps would show that, would it not?

Mr. EULER: So far as the mail service on land, stamps on cheques, and so on, are concerned, those are not really postal revenue.

Mr. STEVENS: But the air mail postage is.

Mr. EULER: The estimated revenue from the air mail service is $631,043.88.

Mr. BAKER: Do I understand the minister to say that only $400,000 was spent on the air mail service? My thought was that it would be profitable, and I think it is, which is creditable. Has the department considered developing the air mail service?

Mr. EULER: We are doing that.

Mr. BAKER: But even more than at present? I would go so far as to say that even if the air mail service was not profitable, it should be developed, because then in case of emergency you would have a well trained force that might prove very useful.

Mr. EULER: We are extending the air mail service all the time. The Trans-Canada air mail service will begin about July 1. It is an extensive addition to the present service. Another service is being inaugurated this summer from Regina to Prince Albert, and there are others under consideration, one from Vancouver to Fort St. John, joining up with the line from Calgary and Edmonton to White Horse. The department is as fully air-minded as any other part of the populace, I think, so far as air mail service is concerned.

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. BAKER: I am glad to hear of the extensions of the service that are being made. I should like to see the Post Office Department encourage an even greater extension of the service, even at a loss within certain limits, because in addition to giving an air mail service it would provide us with a magnificent, trained force to call upon.

Mr. MITCHELL: In the details given on page 170 of the estimates there is an item, mail service by air, $1,573,435, an increase from $705,000 the previous year. May I ask what is included in that item?

Mr. EULER: Does my hon. friend refer to just the increase?

Mr. MITCHELL: No; I want to know what mail service by air includes.

Mr. EULER: The increases are accounted for very largely by the inauguration of the air mail service on the Trans-Canada Air Lines, which will begin about July 1. If my hon. friend desires a list of the services, they fill about three pages and total between forty and fifty.

Mr. MITCHELL: I wanted to know what that $1,500,000 was expended on.

Mr. EULER: It is for the carrying of mails by air.

Mr. MITCHELL: Are there contract payments to air companies, including the Trans-Canada?

Mr. EULER: Precisely.

Mr. MITCHELL: How are these contracts let for air services? Are tenders called for?

Mr. EULER: Under the provisions of the Post Office Act tenders are called for in most cases, but that is not the case with the Trans-Canada Air Lines because it is owned by the Dominion of Canada, and the companies are paid a price fixed by the government for the carrying of mails. The service from Regina to Prince Albert, for example, is done by tender, and most of the other services are by tender.

Mr. TUSTIN: The minister said the estimated revenue was $680,000. Is that for air services for the coming year?

Mr. EULER: That is not for this year, but for 1937-38. We can, of course, expect much larger revenues this year because we are inaugurating further services like the Trans-Canada Air Lines and others.

Mr. TUSTIN: That is why I asked the question. I notice that about $800,000 more is being provided for expenditures on air service.

Mr. EULER: That is almost wholly for new services, chiefly the trans-Canada, which will bring in further revenue.

Mr. McKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): I should like to say a word on behalf of the rural mail carriers. No body of men in any department give more efficient or faithful service than do the rural mail carriers. Day after day, summer and winter, they carry on their work in all kinds of weather. They have made requests to the department from time to time that they be remunerated on a more adequate basis, but the reply has been that the contracts are let by tender, and if a lower tender has been submitted, it is their own fault. But that is not altogether true because I find on looking up the records that there was a departmental ruling in 1932-33, when probably postal revenues were a little low, the effect of which was this: If a contract was unfortunate enough to fall due in that period, the contractor was told that he could not renew if the rate was over $35 per mile; under that rate, they would renew the contract. The result was that those rural mail carriers who were unfortunate enough to have their contracts expire in that period had to take a reduction in price. This has created an unfortunate situation because in many post offices we have men getting $40 per mile and other men, through no fault of their own but just because their contracts expired in that earlier period, getting $35 per mile. I have asked the department on several occasions to restore the pay of these men to its former status, but the reply is that they cannot raise the price without calling for tenders, but they can lower it. That seems to be a peculiar state of affairs, because if you can change the contract one way surely you can change it the other. They have presented their case from time to time in clear and moderate terms, and their claims should be given sympathetic consideration. They have given the best service possible and are maintaining it at a high standard of efficiency. I think it should be possible for the department to establish a minimum amount, because when the tenders are opened it is frequently found that some people, who have not much knowledge of what the work involves, put in a tender much lower than it can be reasonably done for. For that reason I believe there should be a minimum rate set. I might add while I am on my feet that I think the department could very well restore some of the holidays they have taken from these men in years gone by.

Mr. SPENCE: During some years that I have been in this house, the rural mail service has been criticized by hon. members of all political views; it is an annual affair. I agree that some of these men are working for practically nothing; they are not getting sufficient to maintain their truck or their car or horse or wagon, as the case may be; but the fault is their own; they tender too cheaply, that is the difficulty. I cannot see how the department can change it, although I should be very glad to see it changed. Someone has mentioned that the people are getting air-minded. To my mind the people are "in the air", and the post office department are leaving them to it. In this item we are discussing and the three items above it there is an increase of over $1,600,000. I wonder how long eleven million people can stand the drain that is coming through in the estimates this year. The estimates of every department have been increased; there is to be no reduction in anything. Is business getting any better? Are the people any better off? Just feel your own pocket and ask yourself.

An hon. MEMBER: The Liberals are in power.

Mr. SPENCE: The Liberals cannot make good times any more than anyone else can. Nobody can do it.

Mr. EULER: In spite of what the hon. member says, the money which is spent in the air mail service comes back to us. It is a paying business.

Mr. SPENCE: The minister cannot show much revenue coming back from it. I believe it is like the Post Office Department; they do not know whether they are making money or losing it. We have not been given the true standing of the Post Office Department since I have been in the house. The minister is not to blame.

Mr. THOMPSON: On several occasions when these estimates have been before the house I have called the attention of the committee to the condition of the rural mail carriers, and I want to say a word in that connection in support of what the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. McKenzie) has said. It has been stated here that these men are paid the value they place on their own services. I say that is quite unfair. Why should the rural mail carrier be treated any differently from the city or the town mail carrier? There is a fixed salary for the man in the city or town who is delivering the mail. In this case they ask for tenders and they select the man whom they or the civil service commission think is best qualified to discharge those duties. But they go out into the country and say, "Now, you fellows bid against each other, and we will give the contract to the lowest bidder", and they are continually employing the men who put the lowest value upon their own services. That is absolutely unfair to the rural mail carriers. Also there is a certain amount of patronage involved—I will not say in the appointments, because the lowest tenderer invariably gets it if he can obtain two sureties with whom the department is satisfied; but when the four-year contract expires the man who has the patronage in that riding, either the member sitting on the government side or the defeated candidate if his party should be in office, is written to and asked if he would recommend that the contract be renewed or whether it should be put up for tender; and his advice is always followed. Now, why should the job of the man who has been faithfully discharging his duties for four years be subject to the whim of some man who thinks that he did or did not support his party? I say it is unfair.

I should like to see a mileage rate set. Some routes may be run cheaper than others. The highway which is ploughed out in the winter time and is always easy of access by car or horse may be more cheaply run than one in the back country where the roads are not in such good condition. A mileage rate should be set upon every rural route; ask for your tenders and then select from them the man whom you feel is the most competent to do the work; do not leave the tenderers at the mercy of the man who has the patronage of the riding. I know of several cases where people who were hard up have bid for these rural routes below what they should be run for. I remember saying to one man, "Why did you put in a tender for that route at that figure?" He said, "Well, I am hard up. I have a boy of about fourteen who has just come out of school, and he can take one of the horses and run that, and I have that much money coming in." "But," I said, "it will scarcely feed your horse." What I want to see done is to have the rural mail carriers placed upon the same footing as the city mail carriers. Let there be no difference between them. Further, let these appointments be made by the civil service commission, and let no man be discharged from his office except for cause. That is the only way that you will get the rural mail on a satisfactory basis. At the present time it is universally acknowledged, I believe, that an injustice is being done to our rural mail carriers.

Mr. SPENCE: There is just one thing I want to emphasize. I agree with all the previous speaker (Mr. Thompson) has said, but in the city of Toronto there is always competition for carrying the mails from substation to station, railway station to post office, and so on. I do not know the amount of the tender of the man who got the last contract in my district, but he cut out the man who had been doing the work for several years. So it is evident that there is competitive bidding, as in the rural mail routes, although I do not know whether that applies in every city.

Mr. THOMPSON: It is the delivery of letters we are talking about.

Mr. MITCHELL: My constituency is very largely rural, and I wish to support the remarks made by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) concerning the problems of the rural mail carrier. I know that in the Medicine Hat constituency the mail carriers often have to travel over exceedingly difficult prairie roads, and to make the journey in all kinds of weather, and they are expected to break the trail. The people in the neighbourhood always look to the rural mail carrier to do that trail-breaking for them, because they know that he has to make the journey. I have noticed that their outfits—their cars or whatever they are using to break the trail—are the most ramshackle ones in the community, largely because of the work they are called upon to do and the small revenue they are able to get out of their contract. I have known of rural mail carriers in my constituency who have had to drop their contracts before completion, and the guarantors have had to supply substitutes and pay them out of their own pockets. While I have not personally made a special study of the case of the rural mail carriers, I have every reason to agree with and to support the plea of the hon. member for Lanark that the contracts be placed on a definite mileage basis rather than left to the cupidity of individuals to outbid one another on a minimum scale. Surely it should be possible to improve on that method.

Mr. EULER: And make them civil servants?

Mr. MITCHELL: If need be. I disagree very much with the patronage method of appointing rural mail carriers. It does not seem to be the kind of thing that ought to be a reward for political virtue, and since it is a public service that delivers mail to Liberals, Conservatives, Social Crediters and whatnot, everywhere, it ought not to be a political prize. I object to it.

Mr. WALSH: I rather like the reference to political virtue. It sounds appetizing. May I ask the minister the names of the persons serving on the directorate of the Trans-Canada Air Lines representing the Post Office Department?

Mr. EULER: The representative of the Post Office Department is Mr. Herring.

Mr. WALSH: He is an official of the Post Office Department?

Mr. EULER: He is the chief superintendent of the air mail service.

Mr. WALSH: How many directors are there on the Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. EULER: That is really in the Department of Transport. I believe that there are two transport men on the board but I do not know what the total number is.

Mr. EULER: Section 17.

Mr. WALSH: Yes. It appeared to me even at that time that it was not a fair clause to put in a bill of this kind creating an air service from one end of Canada to the other, which was not altogether for the purpose of transferring mail from one point to another, and making the Post Office Department responsible for any deficit that might be created. I recall that at the time the suggestion was made, and it was repeated later, that there would be no deficit in connection with the trans-Canada airways. We were told that we need have no fear so far as deficits were concerned, that it would be a surplus-producing operation and it would be run at a profit. We all hoped that. I can remember the optimistic reference which an early report on the railways made in connection with our railway operations when the government took over the railways in the early twenties. We were given to understand at that time that we would very soon be receiving returns in the way of surpluses. Here was another encouraging report by a responsible minister of the crown suggesting that this new enterprise was going to be run at a profit, that there would be a surplus. I am sorry that the minister is not in his place but I know that he will have no objection to a reference to a previous statement made in this house, and made also before the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines in the course of their meetings this year.

This surplus is only a presumption; it is quite possible that there will be no surplus, but there is likely to be a deficit, and the Post Office Department is to be saddled with that deficit. My contention is that the Post Office Department should protect its interests and see that the clause is eliminated from the bill incorporating the Trans-Canada Air Lines.

Mr. EULER: Would it not be a little late now to do that? The time was when the bill was put through.

Mr. WALSH: It was urged at that time, but the government thought it advisable, and they had the necessary power to incorporate that provision in the bill. I wish to urge again, however, now that the Post Office estimates are before us that the point I am making be given consideration. I do not think it is fair to ask one department to bear the responsibility for the success or otherwise of an undertaking that is managed altogether by another department. If the Post Office Department had on the board of directors of the Trans-Canada Air Lines an equal number of directors with those from the other departments of government they could probably protect their own interests; but with only one director out of five or seven the Post Office Department can scarcely be protected, and yet according to this clause their interest happens to be very vital inasmuch as they have to bear the responsibility for the success or failure of the enterprise financially. I urge that as a point worthy of consideration, particularly in view of the fact that this is 1938 and this clause is to come into effect in 1940. Before it is put into effect I hope that the Post Office Department will see that their rights are more adequately protected than they seem to be at the present time.

Mr. EULER: I am afraid that any action now to reverse what was done in a government bill last session would be rather premature. I think it must be presumed that the government followed that policy after mature consideration, and I should hardly feel like urging that it be reversed before it has been tried. The hope is that neither the Post Office Department nor the Trans-Canada Air Lines will lose money, after the policy has had a fair trial.

I should not like my hon. friend from Lambton and others who have spoken with reference to the mail carriers dilemma, if you like to put it that way, to think that I am neglecting to note what they had to say. Every year since I have been a member of this house—twenty-one years—I think this matter has been agitated by hon. members sympathetic to the cause of rural mail carriers. I also feel some sympathy for them. But the question has many sides; it is a matter of policy. It is now the law that rural mail contracts shall be let by tender and the contract given to the lowest tenderer—

Mr. STEWART: Except—

Mr. EULER: —except the Postmaster General thinks it is not in the public interest or something of that kind. But, generally speaking, I think the principle of tendering is a just one. It is applied in other departments; when a public building or public work is to be undertaken plans are submitted for tender and the lowest tender accepted. That is generally the way in which private business is done; I think it is a fair principle in regard to government contracts. Comparison has been made with city mail carriers, who are civil servants and receive a fixed remuneration. There is room for argument; it may be urged that rural mail carriers should also have a fixed salary. As to a tender per mile—well, there could not be a tender if you fix a price per mile. How would you award the contract?

Mr. THOMPSON: To the man considered most competent.

Mr. EULER: In accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act. I am not in a position to say whether the government has any thought of changing the policy. The Post Office Act would have to be changed. This would have to be considered, that if rural mail carriers were paid in anything like the same proportion as carriers in the cities the post office would be a losing proposition. Some years ago there was, I believe, a bill introduced which, if it had become law, would have increased the cost of carrying these rural mails by about $10,000,000 a year.

Usually one likes to pay for service about what it is worth, and while I have no fault to find with giving mail delivery to people in rural areas, anyone who knows anything about the matter knows that rural mail delivery is a losing proposition. Whether we should say that people in the country should get this service even if we lose still more heavily is something for consideration; perhaps they should. But if any such method as putting these carriers under the civil service commission were adopted, there would be a very substantial deficit in the Post Office Department. However, it is a matter for consideration. I am only the acting minister; the observations that have been made will no doubt be brought to the attention of the Postmaster General for his consideration.

Mr. THOMPSON: If the tender system is a fair one, as the minister has said, why is it not carried out in other departments of the government?

Mr. EULER: It is.

Mr. THOMPSON: It is not in other departments. It may be in contracts for a public building, which is an altogether different matter from hiring a man to perform certain duties. If that principle is a fair one, why not apply it to other departments, and to mail carriers in the cities?. I maintain that it is a very unfair principle, and that some remedy should be found for this rural mail situation. The present system cannot be defended in fairness or justice. I have known people who have faithfully carried the mail for four years and who at the end of that time have found their route put up for tender by the man handling the patronage of the riding, and the pay beaten down to less than half what it was before; twenty or twenty-five people bidding against one another. These things are not in the best interests of good service. I feel very strongly on the matter. Of course, as the minister has said, this matter has been brought before the house every year for many years. If put on a basis comparable with city carriers, it would entail a large expenditure; nevertheless the present basis is unfair and should be changed.

Mr. STEWART: As the minister said, this subject is not a new one. I admit it presents considerable difficulty. There is, however, a principle which I think the minister will recognize, that is that the labourer is worthy of his hire. He deserves fair compensation. I think it is not beyond the capacity of the officials and inspectors of the department, who are highly efficient and have a good organization, to undertake a survey of these rural routes and to classify them in three or four categories. On some of these routes we know the mail carrier makes a little incidental revenue. On other routes there is no revenue. Some routes are ten or twelve miles, some twenty or thirty miles; some are over good roads, some over bad roads, in winter and in summer. It is a complicated proposition. So, if action is to be taken, I think it should be in the way of putting each route in its own class. We must remember also that in most cases it is only a part-time job, and therefore it is difficult to compare it with the work of the city mail carrier. But that is not an unsurmountable difficulty, and I am sure the Post Office Department inspectors have knowledge enough to put a fair price on each and every rural mail route under four or five different classifications. Then, if they established rates of $20, $30, $40, $50, a month, that would be the basic rate, and those who desired to carry mail on that basis might be advertised for and a selection made.

Mr. EULER: By whom?

Mr. STEWART: Well, that raises the question whether it should be under the civil service commission or the Post Office Department. There is a lot of mean, petty patronage now in connection with these rural mail routes.

Mr. EULER: I should like my hon. friend to interpret that word "now" a little more definitely.

Mr. STEWART: Oh, I am not particular; I will say there has been ever since rural mail delivery was established, if that will give the minister any comfort. There is now, has been, and I will say always will be, as long as the present system is continued. It is desirable that that be removed. I think the minister will agree that in rural communities these miserable little contracts are a source of grievances and bitternesses that persist and are out of all proportion to the importance of the contract. So I suggest that for the purpose of doing away with this miserable, petty, contemptible patronage, the system that has been suggested should be adopted. Perhaps the selection should not be made by the department; I would be prepared to trust the inspector of the department or the minister, but it would be always under the suspicion that there was patronage in it. So perhaps the civil service commission is the only organization that is free from patronage or the suspicion of patronage in that direction. They could make the selection.

Once a man has a contract he must equip himself; he has to buy a motor car or some sort of vehicle, and he has his contract for only four years. Then up comes the patronage question again. The member of parliament is bothered; he is notified of the expiration of this contract and asked whether he recommends that it be renewed or that it should be put up for tender. He is the victim of pressure in his own community, and it would be better for him if he had nothing whatever to do with it.

Mr. EULER: Quite right.

Mr. STEWART: It would be much better for him. The member of parliament is in a position of responsibility to this house at all times, but a defeated candidate has no such responsibility. Regardless of that, he is just as zealous about this little matter of patronage—perhaps more so—as the member of parliament who has the responsibility of representing the constituency. His friends go to him and he goes to the department, if you please, and makes representations. Though the unfortunate man who had the contract may have given good service and performed the work at a price satisfactory to the department, this defeated candidate, if you please, says, "I want this put for tender," and his request is complied with. That is the unfortunate part of it. As I say, he has no responsibility whatever, but his request is complied with and an injustice may be done to a man who has served faithfully and who has the support of the people on the rural route, who want him retained. That does not make any difference; the route is put up for tender again on a patronage basis. That, I think, is the worst evil in connection with the whole thing.

In order to put the service on something like a reasonable and fair basis for the man performing the work, I think a basic rate should be established. Then let the applicants go to the civil service commission; let a selection be made and let that be permanent. That should be the end of it, as long as that man discharges his duties satisfactorily, just as it is the end of it with any other public servant. These are the suggestions I make to the minister in connection with the rural mail service, realizing the difficulties and the fact that these discussions have taken place year after year though no action has been taken. I think if we resolved to put it on a fair basis and eliminate patronage, we would be doing a real public service; we would be saving money, and we would be putting the relations of the people in these communities on a much firmer and better basis.

It would be better for the members of parliament and for the defeated candidates as well. That is all I desire to say on that point.

There is one other observation I desire to make. I noticed in connection with the last item, for the railway mail service, a substantial increase; and I notice another substantial increase in the amount for air and land mail service. I believe the minister has made it clear that so far as the mail service by air is concerned, the receipts have been greater than the expenditures for the past year. I notice that the expenditure for the coming year is to be $1,573,435, as against $705,000 for last year, or more than double, which forces one to the conclusion that the mail service of Canada for the next year is going to cost a considerable amount more than it cost last year. Then, when we come to the supplementary estimates, we find that for the railway mail service there is a further amount required of $34,000 and for air and land mail services a further amount of $168,000, which brings the total cost of the mail service considerably in excess of what it was last year.

Mr. EULER: Of course the revenues will be up as well.

Mr. STEWART: One would hope so, but the point I wish to make is this: In establishing these additional air services shall we reduce the cost of the rail service, or shall we simply have a duplication? It is an improved service, of course; but is it really a duplication, or are we cutting down on the cost of our rail service through the establishment of the air services? In which direction are we going? Are we just building up a duplicate service that will cost more each year, even though the revenue may increase; or are we going to be able to eliminate some of these other services to balance up?

Mr. EULER: With regard to the extension of the air mail service and whether it is just duplicating the land service, my answer would be that this is not the case to any great extent. Many of the air mail services go to places in the interior, mining districts and so on, where they have no railway service at all. With regard to the Trans-Canada air mail service I would judge that possibly when a man sent a letter by air mail he would not send a duplicate letter by the train service; but of course it must be remembered that while there may be some diminution in the amount of mail carried by rail, the rate received for carriage by air is twice the rail rate, six cents as compared with three cents.

[Mr. Stewart.]

With regard to the increased expenditure, the increase is due almost entirely to the extended air mail service, more particularly the Trans-Canada service, and we hope to obtain a revenue commensurate with the added cost.

Mr. McIVOR: I had a little experience during the past year with the post office officials, and I should like to pay my tribute to their courtesy and efficiency. I received notice that the salary of our rural mail carrier, who is an efficient man with a family of ten good children, was being objected to; that some people thought he was receiving too much; that his salary should be cut or that somebody else should have a chance to tender. I do not know whether that man was a Conservative, a Liberal or a member of the social credit party, but I do know he belonged to a group just as important as any of these parties; I refer to the fact that he was a returned soldier. I wrote just as plain a letter as my intelligence would permit, stating that this man's salary should be increased instead of being cut down. I received a most courteous reply stating that there would be no change for this year, and I would inform the acting minister and the officials now that as far as I am concerned there will be no change next year. When that man drives his car summer and winter, sometimes digging himself through snow four feet deep, he earns every dollar he receives. I must say however that I could not have got better treatment or more courteous replies from any department than I got from the Post Office Department.

Mr. WOOD: I should like to make one or two observations at this point, and probably I may mention several facts, as the discussion has been rather broad. I am sorry to see the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) leaving the chamber because it seems to me that his references to rural mail carriers have been totally different in the last two or three years from what they were previously. May I point out that the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) was also aware of these facts when for five years he supported a government, but I have not seen any indication of action that was taken at that time.

I do not speak because I have not sympathy with the ideas expressed by the hon. members, but that which has impressed me, a new member in the house, has been the attitude of those who had the opportunity during those five years to make the corrections. I would suggest that the acting Postmaster General has made a satisfactory defence, and that there is something to be said in favour of his statements.

While I must admit I am sorry to see rural mail contracts let at low rates, yet it may be that we as members of parliament have some responsibilities in the matter. For my part, may I say that this morning I sanctioned three contracts in connection with the Post Office Department. I did not know the political complexions of the applicants. I was not at all concerned with that aspect of the matter. If they want the positions, then so far as I am concerned I should like to see them have them.

The hon. members for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) and Leeds (Mr. Stewart) referred to petty bickering and patronage; possibly that can be traced to their own weakness. I believe we as members of the House of Commons should do all we can towards correcting this injustice.

There is another section of the community which does not enjoy the advantage of house to house delivery; I refer to small towns with populations under a certain amount. The record before me shows that there are fifty-three towns in Canada with post office revenues of $20,000. In those towns are energetic and ambitious people, and they feel they would like to have the advantage of postal services equal to those enjoyed by the people in the larger industrial centres.

It seems to me that there has always been unfairness in connection with deliveries. It would appear that if you live in a large community it is possible to get better service than can be obtained in a rural community. To my mind that is an injustice, but as such it is probably comparable with everything else pertaining to rural and urban centres. For some reason it would seem that special privileges are given to those in the large industrial centres. Undoubtedly there are energetic people in the smaller towns—living there because of their association with small manufacturing concerns—who are making wonderful contributions to our national life.

A resumé which I made of figures showing returns to the Post Office Department from smaller centres discloses that in some of the smaller places larger returns are made to the department than from large centres. For the benefit of hon. members from Toronto may I point out that for every dollar of expenditure in that city the return is only $2.84, whereas in the little town of Paris for every dollar of expenditure in the post office and sub-post office there is a return of $3.64. Even in the city of Ottawa, the capital city of Canada, the return is only $1.27 on each dollar expended. If we study the figures with respect to Vancouver we find that the post office in that city is running at a deficit, and that we are losing about $100,000. Yet we continue to give the people in those centres the advantage of postal delivery, while people who live in small towns, showing post office revenues of $20,000 per year, have to trail down to a post office to get their mail. I suggest they are entitled to some consideration.

I doubt very much whether the expense would be much greater if better business principles were applied in connection with the administration of some of those offices. In my own constituency, if I may be permitted to make some personal observations, a great deal of rearrangement in connection with rural routes has taken place since I had the opportunity of representing the constituency. If those changes were summed up I believe they would show that the cost of the service is now much less than it was previously, despite the fact that there are several hundreds of people who, through a readjustment of routes and the elimination of certain other routes, are to-day receiving a better service than they did previously. Certain business principles have been applied, with the result that they are getting better service.

I would ask the acting Postmaster General to give these matters some consideration. In these particular times the changes I suggest might give employment to more people, would bring about a better service, and would have the effect of equalizing the service in the smaller towns with that in the larger centres. I believe these changes could be made without a great deal of extra expense. I understand the answer has always been that there would be additional cost, but I believe that by the application of proper business principles and a possible readjustment of some of the wage scales in larger centres, places where administration costs are far in excess of the service given, the smaller centres could be served. It seems to me that a better service could be extended to people who are just as worthy as those in the larger centres.

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Chairman, may I associate myself with the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson) and with other hon. members who have said a word for the rural mail carriers. I realize, as has been pointed out by the acting Postmaster General, that to change the system we now have would require a great deal of study and consideration. In other words the whole question is bristling with difficulties and would be somewhat difficult to change. But if I have appraised properly the temperament of the acting minister I would conclude that he is a person who would enjoy attacking a difficult problem. Because it was difficult it seems to me would be no reason why he should not tackle it, provided he is convinced that the present arrangement is not equitable.

I believe all hon. members are convinced that the present arrangement is not an equitable one. The acting minister has said that the rural routes were given out on a basis of tender, in conformity with the principle applied in much of the government's business. I think the minister will agree with me that while competitive tenders may be quite equitable in some instances, they are not necessarily equitable in others. As a matter of fact, in a great part of the business which the government now gives by tender there is no real competition at all. I know enough of the business of giving out government and municipal business by tender to know that generally speaking there is very little competition; but here is a field where the competition is almost unlimited, and where persons for various reasons, sometimes not exactly because they need the business at all, tender at a very low figure that would not give anything like a decent standard of living if there were not some other sources of income on which to draw. In other matters, such as fair wage contracts, we have adopted a minimum wage to ensure that a person shall receive at least a subsistence standard of living, because we know very well that if there were no bar at all to competition in services of that kind, employers of labour would get the services they require for almost nothing, particularly in times like these. If it is a good principle to apply in that direction, I see no reason why it should not apply in the matter of rural mail delivery.

The minister said that the practice has now become law, but our laws are not the laws of the Medes and Persians which cannot be changed. We change our laws every day, and let me say again that if the law is wrong, if it upholds or encourages a system that has become inequitable, there is no reason why that law should not be changed and every reason why it should be changed.

I am always surprised when I hear hon. members on both sides of the house talk about patronage. Members on this side criticize patronage, and then members on the other side say: "Oh, yes, but you indulged in patronage when you had the opportunity." Patronage apparently has never been considered on the basis of whether it is a good or a bad thing.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Oh, no, it has not. The hon. member for Kingston, I think it was, spoke about patronage and somebody replied: "You did it."

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. TOMLINSON: What does the hon. member think about it?

Mr. MacINNIS: I think it is wrong, and I make no bones about it.

Mr. TOMLINSON: You have no patronage.

Mr. MacINNIS: No, and I do not want any. I do not consider it wrong simply because I do not have any. There is a principle involved, and I have to consider the matter on that basis. I know there are many members in this house who have just as much patronage as my hon. friend who would like to get away from patronage altogether, and they express that opinion in his presence. I say again that patronage ought to be considered apart altogether from the fact that we can give out a little bit of a job, making big fellows of ourselves in our constituencies by doing that sort of thing. If I cannot get support without having to give out favours, I would not seek support at all, and I do not see why anybody else should try to get support through some little influence he may have in giving out patronage. Let us consider patronage as the evil thing it is and try to get rid of it. I would suggest to the acting Postmaster General that he has quite a number of competent officials in his department, and there are others throughout the service, who should give consideration to this grievance of the rural mail carriers so that before we deal with the post office estimates another year some way may be found of meeting the present situation. I am quite in agreement with the minister that it is a very difficult problem, but no problem is so difficult that a solution can not be found for it.

Mr. WALSH: May I revert to the question of the air mail services? I was speaking on the subject a few minutes ago and I would draw the attention of the acting minister to a clause in the Trans-Canada Air Lines Act, chapter 43, 1937, section 17, reading as follows:

> If in the preceding year the corporation incurred a deficit, the rate or rates for the current year shall be fixed so as to produce an increase in the sum total to be paid on account of the said rates equal to the deficit in the preceding year.

If that clause could be amended, we would eliminate some of the difficulty so far as the post office is concerned. Then, in clause 16 of the same statute we have these two paragraphs:

> (1) The governor in council may authorize the Postmoster General to enter into a contract with the corporation for the transport of mails by means of the Trans-Canada lines.

(2) Such contract shall provide for the transport of mails at a rate or rates to be fixed, in respect of the initial period of operation, by the terms of the contract, and thereafter, as hereinafter provided by this act.

Has a contract yet been entered into by the Post Office Department with Trans-Canada Air Lines Limited for the current year?

Mr. EULER: The contract has not actually been drawn up, but the arrangement has been made. As my hon. friend will notice, there is an item in the supplementaries to provide for an addition to the rate per mile as contemplated in the main estimates. It was fifty cents a mile in the main estimates; but the government has decided that the rate shall be sixty cents a mile, and for that reason an additional $58,000 is provided in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. WALSH: The rate next year will be sixty cents a mile as fixed according to the terms of the act.

Mr. EULER: It will be sixty cents from the day of the inauguration of the service.

Mr. WALSH: How much of the vote for the Trans-Canada service is represented in the total of item No. 261?

Mr. EULER: I have not the exact figure at the moment, but there is an item of increase under "mail service by air" of $768,435, and almost the whole of that is due to the Trans-Canada air contract. It will depend, of course, on the day the service commences—we are expecting it to commence on July 1—and second, on the number of miles that will be travelled.

Mr. WALSH: The minister cannot break down this figure into increase in air mail service and increase in land mail service?

Mr. EULER: It would be only an estimate, after all, with regard to air mail service, because, as I said a moment ago, it is at sixty cents a mile, and it will depend directly on the number of miles the mail will be carried and the date upon which the service commences. As I said, we hope to have it commenced by July 1. If it is not begun by then, we shall not spend so much because there will not be the service.

Mr. WALSH: Can I make this suggestion to the minister in connection with the estimates of the Post Office Department for next year; referring to item No. 261, is there any particular reason why these two services should not be distinguished, by having one item for land mail service and one for air mail service? I think the acting minister can see the reasonableness of a demand of that kind—

Mr. EULER: It is in here now.

Mr. WALSH: —because we have been discussing item No. 261 this afternoon, and the discussion has gone from the air to the land and back again; really we have been discussing two separate, distinct items.

Mr. EULER: If my hon. friend will look at the summary, he will see that "mail service by air" is listed separately, and "mail service by ordinary land conveyance" is listed separately, the former costing $1,573,000 odd and the latter, $6,381,000 odd. They are distinguished there.

Mr. WALSH: In order to separate the discussions next year, could they not be put in two separate categories? We are discusing now, I assume, item No. 261.

Mr. EULER: They are separated there just as I read them.

Mr. WALSH: I know they are separated in fact; but as the minister knows, he has been receiving questions in connection with air mail, and he is receiving questions in connection with land mail, all under the same item, whereas if we had these two separated the discussions would also be separate; we should not be jumping from land to air.

Mr. EULER: That may be worth while considering.

Mr. BARBER: The minister mentioned sixty cents. That means sixty cents per 100 miles?

Mr. EULER: No; sixty cents per mile travelled by the airplane carrying mail, for all mail.

Mr. BARBER: It does not make any difference how much there is?

Mr. EULER: For all mail carried. It does not make any difference.

Mr. BARBER: Are the western services now operating from Winnipeg to Vancouver? If so, what points in British Columbia are being served and what points are likely to be served?

Mr. EULER: There is a day service from Winnipeg to Vancouver touching Regina, Lethbridge and Vancouver.

Mr. BARBER: Are there any other points in British Columbia that it is intended to serve direct?

Mr. EULER: The plane does not alight anywhere between Lethbridge and Vancouver. Of course the Trans-Canada will provide a fuller service. It will be a night service. This is only a day service that they have now.

Mr. TELFORD: May I suggest that the minister should consider the feasibility and the possibility of making the carrier service on the rural routes permanent appointments; that he should just adopt the present contractors and make them permanent? If that were done, if any carrier thought his contract was too low he could resign. Then his successor would be appointed either by the civil service commission or by the Postmaster General.

Mr. EULER: I would be very glad to take the representations and the arguments into consideration, and I certainly will refer them to the Postmaster General himself when he returns.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): This is a most important department and a most important branch of the service. I wish further to emphasize what has already been said with reference to the low wages paid rural mail carriers and the service as it is affected by so-called patronage. In my opinion the low wages which are paid under our present tender system seriously affect the rural mail service. The acting minister looks surprised, but I think he will agree with me that the cheapest service is usually the slowest. Mail service, like most other services to-day, is improved by speed. Many mail carriers in certain districts where roads are suitable for cars, are unable to use automobiles merely because their salaries are so low. Very often they are driving lame or slow horses, and their equipment is of a very poor class, because they are unable to buy new equipment. I quite agree with what has been said by hon. members that at least a minimum rate of pay for rural mail carriers should be established. Personally I should be glad to see the rural mail carriers of this country given their appointments through the civil service commission. I realize that would not be so satisfactory to some who wish to retain the power to recommend mail carriers in their respective districts. This, however, is one of the most important branches of the department, and the low wages which have been and are being paid seriously affect the service. A rural mail carrier, who drives on all kinds and conditions of roads, winter and summer, is just as much entitled to a reasonable rate of pay as his urban brother who travels under more favourable circumstances, very often and, in fact, mostly for a higher fixed rate. Proper service to the people, which must be the chief objective of the department, could be attained to a large extent were more modern equipment used by the rural mail carrier, but that is impossible under present conditions. The patronage system which has been in effect, also seriously affects the service to the boxholder. Very often a man is removed upon the recommendation of a government candidate, merely to make room for someone more favourable to the government.

Mr. FURNISS: Is he necessarily removed?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I think he is unnecessarily removed by the political patronage system.

Mr. FURNISS: The hon. member said he was removed on recommendation. As I understand it, the recommendation does not necessarily remove him.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): No, Mr. Chairman, but it puts the route—

Mr. FURNISS: It puts him in competition.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe):—puts the route up for tender.

Mr. FURNISS: Competition.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): And very often nothing is taken into account other than the lowest tender, and very often the lowest tenderer is recommended for political purposes.

Mr. EULER: The lowest tenderer gets it by law.

Mr. FURNISS: Does the hon. member mean that the lowest tenderer gets the position or gets the contract through the recommendation of the member?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I did not make myself as clear as perhaps I might have done. The lowest tenderer is given the contract providing—

Mr. REID: He must be, by law.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Not necessarily. The lowest tenderer is given the contract providing the sitting member or the government candidate does not oppose his appointment.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. EULER: I am sure my hon. friend does not wish to do an injustice, but that is strictly not the case.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It is, provided he is shown to be unfit to carry the mail.

Mr. EULER: I do not wish to interrupt, but this matter ought to be cleared up. There is absolutely no patronage in the allotting of tenders. Under the Post Office Act the lowest tenderer must receive the contract, unless in the opinion of the minister, it is not in the public interest that he should receive it.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Who advises him?

Mr. EULER: An investigation must be made regarding his credentials.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I do not want to be misunderstood, nor do I want to misrepresent the case. Under the present system the lowest tenderer is accepted unless it is shown that the tenderer is unfit to carry the mail—if he is a criminal or is in any respect unfitted for the work, or has not sufficient equipment, or if he is not a responsible person. It happens very often that when the lowest tender is accepted the tenderer in a year's time finds that he has not the proper equipment and cannot afford to supply it. Over a number of years scores of rural mail carriers have come and asked me what they could do under such circumstances, because while they did not care to throw up the contract they could not afford to carry on. Quite often a man who has not had experience puts in a tender at a figure at which it is impossible for anyone to carry on, while someone else has the proper equipment and is prepared to take on the contract. Anyone can often see at a glance how impossible it is for a rural mail carrier to give proper service on the basis of the tender he has put in. I am sure the acting minister has had evidence of that.

Mr. EULER: There are cases.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Certainly, and that in itself affects the service. I do not wish to say that a man's tender is accepted on a political recommendation, but I do believe that if two tenders were the same, some consideration would be given to the tender put in by the government candidate.

Mr. EULER: That very seldom happens, I imagine.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The minister says it does not happen.

Mr. EULER: It has not come to my knowledge.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The acting minister has not been associated with the department for any great length of time. I am glad he is introducing something new into the Post Office Department, because that probably has been the practice for a number of years. In my opinion the service in the outlying districts is as essential as that in the urban centres. There is one case in my own district which I wish to bring particularly to the minister's attention. I refer to the post office at Egbert, which has been in existence for about sixty years. The store in which that post office has been located for a number of years changed hands recently and it is quite evident that the new purchaser did not please the government candidate. While there was no question about the gentleman's character—in fact politically I believe he is a supporter of the government—he was not recommended by the government candidate in the district. I have here a petition signed by no fewer than seventy-six or seventy-eight of the box-holders in the district, practically every one on the route. I will hand it over to the minister. The petition points out that their service will be severely impaired by the change. In the first place, it will add six or eight miles to the route served from Thornton post office. It is adding miles in a district which is difficult of transportation, a very hilly district and one in which it will be almost impossible for deliveries to be made until late in the day.

I appeal to the minister to give more consideration to the service in the outlying districts rather than to patronage, which unfortunately has so much to do with that service. I realize that in many districts it has been considered wise to eliminate small post offices. It has been part of the departmental policy to eliminate these small post offices where the service can be as efficiently carried on through the route. For instance, there may be a good road with five or six or eight miles of a drive, and the mail carrier may be using an automobile, so that he is able to give prompt and speedy service. But in outlying districts where the mail carrier drives all day, often missing train connections in bad weather and under bad road conditions, it is difficult for any mail carrier to give that type of service to which the people are entitled. I urge the minister, in considering this petition, to take into account the features I have pointed out.

I am not going to delay the estimates at this time by reading the petition in full. I will simply present it to the acting minister in the hope that he will give it the most serious consideration. In conclusion, I wish to support the recommendation made by others in the committee, that the government seriously consider a different system with respect to rural mail carriers. Personally I do not believe that any rural mail carrier should be dismissed or his route put up for tender unless for some legitimate cause, unless it is shown that he is not giving efficient service to the boxholders, or unless it is proved by governmental inspection that his rate of pay is entirely too high. I venture to say that there are very few mail carriers in Canada whose remuneration is too high. On the other hand, too often, for very minor reasons a route is put up for tender and services are seriously impaired because there is so little understanding of what is involved in the upkeep of such equipment as will give the service required. I do think that if the rural mail service could be put under the civil service commission it would be far better for all concerned, both government supporters, and those whom the rural mail carriers are supposed to serve, and who are entitled to as efficient service, notwithstanding that they may be in the back concessions, as is given to urban dwellers by employees receiving better remuneration.

Mr. McCUAIG: I should like to add something to what was said by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe). He was very fair in saying that the person who received the postmastership did not receive it on account of politics, because the person who bought the store was a Liberal and had been all his life. But there is another element which was not explained by the hon. member, that is that the person who owned the store tried to make a profit by selling the post office. The former owner of the store died. Then the executor tried to sell the post office and the store. He found he could not sell the store alone because there was not enough revenue for a storekeeper in that small village unless the purchaser was guaranteed that he would also receive the post office. Therefore the executor was trying to benefit by the sale of the post office. The first tender for that store I understand was $800; they obtained other tenders, and the person who tendered the last time, thinking he would also receive the post office, offered about $1,400. Therefore the estate was trying to benefit by selling the post office.

I wish also to express my agreement with the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe in regard to a minimum rate. I have in my own riding one rural mail route which has been carried by the same man for many years. The distance is about twenty miles and he receives $443. I do not know what he is in politics; I never saw him, but I wrote to him about a year ago telling him his contract was ready for renewal. I told him I did not think he was receiving enough and that it should be put up for tender again. He said he was afraid to throw it open for tender because people at the present time are tendering so low that he might not get it again.

I think there should be a minimum rate, and then a choice made from those who tender at that rate. We could decide whether to let the member or the defeated candidate make the choice or have it done in some other way. All we are interested in is good service and fair remuneration for mail carriers. As far as my riding is concerned, there have been very few dismissals in recent years. That is probably due to the fair-mindedness of the men who preceded me; they were Conservatives for many years, and I find that in very few cases did they ask for the mail route to be put up for tender. I have followed their example. In the last three years I think only two mail routes have been thrown open for tender; and I would advise hon. members that the fewer mail routes they open for tender the less grief they will have.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I want to answer the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. McCuaig) in regard to that estate. I realize that my hon. friend did not want to air any family quarrels from Simcoe here. I think his remarks might be misconstrued as suggesting that the estate took any undue advantage of the fact that the post office was in the store. I believe it is generally conceded that in a community where there is practically no other place to put a post office it is usually left in the store. In fairness to the estate I wish to say that the estate received no assurance from anyone that the post office would be left there, and sold the property only on the ordinary assumption that it would be. Then the purchaser of the store pointed out to me that the government candidate in the riding had assured him that there would be no change. So, if there was any misrepresentation, it certainly was not on the part of the estate. I think the hon. member did not wish to convey the suggestion that the estate had taken that advantage.

Mr. GOLDING: In view of the opposition to the patronage system as expressed by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) and the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), I should like to ask them why they supported the late government in throwing into patronage all post offices with revenues running from $400 to $3,000. Prior to that action it was only post offices with revenues under $400 that came under the patronage system. In view of their opposition now to patronage in regard to rural mail service I should like to know why they supported that policy.

Mr. LAWSON: May I answer that, as I happen to be in possession of the facts?

Mr. GOLDING: Yes; the hon. member was one of them.

Mr. LAWSON: I happened to be chairman of the committee on the civil service which sat that year, which committee consisted, according to my recollection, of four Conservative members, two Liberal members and one Labour member. That committee, after inquiring very exhaustively into the post office situation, came to the conclusion that it was not possible to administer the appointments to these post offices with revenues ranging between $400 and $3,000 on the so-called merit basis as required by the Civil Service Act, and that attempting to do so was bringing the whole merit system in this country into disrepute. The committee, therefore, recommended unanimously that the step referred to by the hon. member be taken, and since it was the unanimous recommendation of the committee to the government of that day the government saw fit to enact measures necessary to implement the report of the civil service committee.

Mr. GOLDING: If my hon. friend thinks it was not possible to operate the merit system in regard to offices with revenues ranging between $400 and $3,000, does he think it would be possible to apply it in connection with rural mail services?

Mr. LAWSON: Frankly I would not like to answer my hon. friend's question, because I do not know what the subject of the discussion is. I came in just a few minutes ago; I did not hear the discussion. I rose merely to answer the question asked by my hon. friend because I happened to be the chairman of the committee which made the recommendation.

Mr. LOCKHART: There is one matter to which I would invite the attention of the minister. I think the departmental officials have knowledge of it. While evils may creep in, if honest men are administering the department they can easily find ways to overcome such difficulties as have been referred to in this discussion. A man in my neighbourhood had a rural mail contract and carried on his work faithfully and well. He has a small piece of improved road, but mostly his route is on cross concessions where the mail has to be carried by a light type of horse. These mail carriers probably use machinery and a heavy type of horse in their farming operations. This man wrote to the department, in view of the fact that the contract was coming up for renewal, stating that he would have to get a light horse and some new equipment in the way of a conveyance in order to carry on, and asking if there was any way by which he could be assured that the contract would be renewed, after having carried on the work faithfully for the term of the contract. I think the minister will agree that under the present regulations the departmental officials could do nothing else than write back and say that if the person having the patronage for the constituency recommended that the contract should be opened for tender, that would have to be done. In other words this man could not receive any assurance such as he asked.

I want to concur in a great deal of what has been said to the effect that this service should be systematized so that a man doing good work would be continued in his position, but in particular I wanted to point out to the acting minister these specific instances where men could not be given any assurance whatever but had to wait until the contract expired. If somebody said the contracts were to be thrown open for tender, these men could make no provision for new equipment.

Mr. SLAGHT: I commend to the acting minister and his department very earnest consideration of this difficult problem in the hope of devising some method other than that at present in vogue, which I understand we inherited from the former administration, by which rural mail carriers may receive adequate compensation for the important duties they perform. In my riding there are very many rural mail carriers. In my investigation of this matter, my connection with the renewal of old contracts and the granting of new ones, it seems that the men performing this service have been woefully underpaid. We have extreme climatic conditions, under which sometimes they have to open up their own roads in the winter time, and they perform this service for a mere pittance. Perhaps no administration can be held responsible for this state of affairs, but with the brains of the present administration and the officials in the department we ought to be able to find a remedy.

The hon. gentleman who suggested a minimum mileage rate, as I understood him, offered a suggestion that might help. The difficulty is that a minimum mileage rate in some parts of Ontario where there is an all-year service would be entirely inadequate as a standard for a similar service performed in some other part of this province. I do feel, however, that a body of men who are in his majesty's service, handling his majesty's mail, performing one of the most loyal and important public services that the country demands, ought to have better treatment than they are receiving at the present time. In saying that I desire to make it clear that I do not intend to indict any administration or any particular body of officials. But, if with their knowledge of the working of the system as it has been in vogue for the last twenty years, something can be done for the betterment of the lot of our rural mail carriers, I should endorse it most heartily.

Mr. RICKARD: I would like to say a word about these rural mail carriers and the Post Office Department generally. I agree with the other hon. members who have spoken in regard to the mail carriers. I believe they are a class of men who are entirely underpaid. How that situation is to be remedied is up to the department, and I believe it may be very hard to find a solution.

What I rose to say, however, was this: Since I have been in this house, particularly on the estimates of the Post Office Department, we have heard a great deal about patronage, principally from the party to my left. Today the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) made particular reference to the dismissals that have occurred in some post offices. I should like to bring to the attention of the committee one case that occurred in the county I represent concerning an appointment made under the previous government in 1934. We had a postmaster receiving a salary of less than $3,000 a year. It is true that he was an old man, seventy-six or seventy-seven years of age, but in the office he had two very competent girls, one of whom happened to be from a Liberal family and the other from a Conservative family. There was quite an agitation to have this man dismissed, but apparently the officials of the department were none too anxious to do that. However, there was sufficient pressure brought to bear upon the government of the day and this man was dismissed, on the recommendation of the president of the Conservative association and of the member for my constituency then sitting on the government side. As I say, this man had two girls working in the office. The new appointee was the secretary of the Conservative association for that riding, a returned man who had been in the constituency only a year or two. When he was appointed he dismissed the Liberal girl but retained the Conservative girl. If that is not party politics I do not know anything about it. I have nothing against the present postmaster, who is a first class man. When I was elected I was asked to do my best to have him dismissed, but I refused to do so because he is a good man, carrying on the work efficiently.

I could go further with this matter, but I do not think it necessary. However, if any hon. members wish to look up the records of the department they will see exactly how this dismissal was made. On many occasions in this house when the estimates have been under consideration I have heard discussions of patronage, but certainly that patronage existed from 1930 to 1935.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I did not suggest that patronage existed only on one side or under only one party; I was pointing out the viciousness of the principle that has been in force for many years.

With further reference to my own riding I wish to point out to the acting Postmaster General that the post office at Egbert is not in the riding of my hon. friend from Simcoe North; it is in the riding of Dufferin-Simcoe. Even though I have handed the minister the petition, I should like to know whether any recommendation has gone out for the closing of the Egbert post office.

Mr. EULER: That post office is being reopened.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): On behalf of the petitioners I wish to thank the minister.

Mr. GREEN: To get back to the air mail service, would the minister give the figures for mileage and weight of air mail carried during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1938? How do those figures compare with last year?

Mr. EULER: The amount was 1,260,909 pounds.

Mr. GREEN: And the mileage?

Mr. EULER: I regret I have not the mileage.

Mr. GREEN: Could we have placed on Hansard a list of the air mail services? That was done last year, and for purposes of comparison it would be very useful.

Mr. STEWART: That will be satisfactory.

Mr. EULER: I shall be pleased to do that. The list is as follows:

Mr. GREEN: Earlier this afternoon the minister said there was to be a new air mail route from Vancouver to Fort St. John, connecting there with the Edmonton-Yukon air line. I wonder whether or not that has been definitely decided. I hope not, because there has been serious trouble in connection with the matter. I believe opinion on the coast is strongly in favour of having the air mail carried by the direct route from Vancouver to the Yukon, going up through Quesnel, Hazelton and Telegraph Creek. I understood the department was going to have a survey made of the latter route, which is quite a bit shorter and which during the last seven or eight months has been successfully flown by passenger planes. I should like to know whether the department has decided not to have the mail flown by that direct route.

Mr. EULER: I regret to tell the hon. member the decision has been made. I do not know that I should express regret. I can give the reason why that which the hon. member has described as the direct route—which I am told is not really shorter—has not been accepted by the Post Office Department. I am told that the comparative risks of flying near the coast, through those ranges of mountains, are so great that the decision was made to carry it the other way. I am told, further, that the route which has been chosen is really the shorter one.

Mr. GREEN: The route chosen is on two sides of a triangle; I do not know how it could be shorter than the direct one. Was an investigation made of the routes this spring?

Mr. EULER: Of course the thought is that the route ties up Vancouver with the Peace River district, a condition which I believe has been desired by the people of Vancouver. At any rate, the decision has been made, and I may make that statement definitely to the hon. member. It has been decided to adopt the route I have indicated, and I believe the most important reason for doing so has been that it would be too dangerous to fly along the route suggested by the hon. member, one which passes through the mountains.

Mr. GREEN: What is the contract price, and what number of flights have to be made?

Mr. EULER: The contract has not actually been made yet.

[Mr. Euler.]

Mr. GREEN: Well, cannot the minister give us the price? Apparently it has been decided to send the mail that way, and the name of the firm to do the flying is known.

Mr. EULER: My information is that there are two tenders, although I have not the figures before me. One is considerably lower than the other. Perhaps I should not have made a statement in the matter, but I believe one figure is something like thirty cents and the other about forty cents. So that there would be no doubt as to who would receive the contract. Undoubtedly the lower tender would be accepted. The recommendation has not yet been prepared to give to council.

Mr. GREEN: Has there been any survey made this spring of the direct route by any department of the government?

Mr. EULER: There is a report on both routes from the civil aviation branch, a branch of the Department of Transport.

Mr. GREEN: Is that a new report or an old one? Was it not made a year or two ago?

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I cannot tell my hon. friend that. But hon. members are aware that the civil aviation branch of the Department of Transport has not been in existence very long, so that I should judge it would be fairly recent.

Mr. MacNEIL: On what evidence did the minister condemn the more direct route from Vancouver to the Yukon suggested by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green)? On former occasions representations were made, and the assurance was given that the whole matter would be carefully explored. We are given to understand that a private company has undertaken survey work and has demonstrated successfully that the more direct route can be flown safely. I now ask that some consideration be given to this matter by the department. Has any survey been made recently to indicate clearly that the direct route is out of the question?

Mr. EULER: I believe I answered that question a moment ago. I stated that we had had reports from the civil aviation branch of the Department of Transport. As a result of that it was decided to take the route I have indicated, rather than the one through the mountains.

Item agreed to.

To provide for payment to W. J. A. Stewart, a former employee of the Halifax post office, of the amount of $3,509.65, representing the difference between the amount of civil pay he received between the 25th September, 1915, and the 20th July, 1919, while absent on active military service overseas, and the amount he is entitled to under the provisions of order in council of the 11th August, 1914, P.C. 2102, $3,509.65.

Mr. STEWART: Is this a new item, or is it voted annually?

Mr. EULER: In a sense the item is somewhat peculiar. It has to do with a Mr. Stewart who enlisted for overseas service. He was supposed to have enlisted on December 25; therefore the military pay would be deducted from his civil service pay. Recently it was discovered that he actually had enlisted on September 25, 1915, and therefore no deduction should have been made. This matter involves the sum of $3,509.65. After all an agreement was made with the man, and it is only fair that he should be paid. That is all there is to it.

Item agreed to.

Pensions and other benefits: To provide for the payment of compassionate allowances to employees injured while in the performance of their duties, or to other persons injured while performing duties in any way connected with the postal service, or in protecting His Majesty's mails, or to the dependents of such employees or other persons who may be killed while so engaged; payments to be made only on the specific authority of the governor in council, $5,000.

Mr. MITCHELL: How much of this item was not expended last year?

Mr. EULER: Last year there was no expenditure. The year before there was one of $750 and the year before one of $3,500. I hope none of this amount will be expended; it is voted to cover cases of emergency.

Item agreed to.

Departmental administration, further amount required, $16,800.

Mr. STEWART: What is the explanation concerning this item?

Mr. EULER: It is in connection with the increase of the weight of parcel post. It is intended to inform the public concerning the facilities which have been given, and in connection with certain charges for the issuing of a special booklet dealing with the increase in the weight of parcels carried by the department.

Item agreed to.

Post offices, including salaries and other expenses, headquarters and staff post offices, and supplies and equipment for revenue post offices, further amount required, $335,000.

Mr. STEWART: I notice there is a substantial increase in this item, which one would have expected to see in the main estimates. Why did it not appear in the main estimates?

Mr. EULER: This is due to more or less of a change in policy. At one time the night service men were paid on the basis of seven hours instead of eight hours, seven hours night service being regarded as equivalent to eight hours day service; but under the last administration, for purposes of economy, that practice was discontinued, and it has now been restored, at an additional cost of $110,000. The $160,000 is for further temporary assistance.

Mr. BARBER: Is this further temporary assistance required by the new regulations closing post offices on holidays? Is it to keep the service going on holidays?

Mr. EULER: The answer is in the affirmative.

Mr. LOCKHART: Are the salaries of all the post office employees back on the original basis before the five per cent cut was made?

Mr. EULER: They have all been restored.

Mr. LOCKHART: In every department?

Mr. EULER: Yes.

Mr. LOCKHART: Thank you.

Item agreed to.

Inspection and investigation—further amount required, $8,000.

Mr. EULER: This is to provide for an overdraft in previous years.

Item agreed to.

Air and land mail services—further amount required, $168,000.

Mr. GREEN: What arrangements have been made for transatlantic air mail service?

Mr. EULER: No actual arrangements have yet been made. The British government is still making experimental flights, and the matter has not been brought to a definite conclusion.

Mr. GREEN: Is it expected that there will be any air mail flown this summer?

Mr. EULER: Quite doubtful.

Mr. GREEN: Are there any negotiations under way for transpacific air mail service?

Mr. EULER: No; we are not at the moment doing anything on the pacific.

Item agreed to.

Pensions and other benefits—payment to the widow of the late Lorne C. Pethick, a former employee of the Orillia post office, $1,000.

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister explain this? It seems to be an extraordinary item.

Mr. EULER: The details are as follows:

It is to provide for payment of $1,000 to widow of the late Lorne C. Pethick, former employee of the Orillia post office, who, as a result of a fall on a slippery sidewalk while on his way to work, broke two ribs which punctured his lungs, and resulted in death on 26th December, 1937, from pneumonia.

Mr. Pethick was employed as a temporary letter carrier in the Orillia post office from 9th April, 1937, to 26th December, 1937, date of death, from circumstances set forth above. He was a returned soldier.

The department understands that the widow has been unable to establish any claim against the city of Orillia due to lack of witnesses, and she is not eligible for compensation under the Workmen's Compensation Act as the injury was not sustained while Mr. Pethick was on duty, but on his way to work. It is recommended that, on compassionate grounds, an amount of $1,000 be paid his widow, who is represented to be in destitute circumstances.

Mr. STEWART: I am afraid this opens up a line of cases that may cause the minister some difficulty in the future. Does he know of any precedent for a case of this kind? It often happens that a person is injured on his way to work, and at the moment of receiving the injury is not an employee of the government or a company or an individual for whom he may be working, and if he has no action against the city, for example, on account of the condition of the sidewalk, he is without legal remedy. Such cases occur quite often. Does the minister know of any case where similar action has been taken?

Mr. EULER: No; I do not know; but the man was on his way to work, and he might be regarded as being actually in the service of the department. Quite frankly, I would say that it is a case of showing perhaps too much sympathy, but we felt we might perhaps err on the humanitarian side. That is the whole story.

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

BANKING AND COMMERCE—FOURTH REPORT

Fourth report of the standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Moore (Ontario).

STANDING ORDERS—CONCURRENCE IN THIRD REPORT

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (Cartier) presented the third report of the standing committee on standing orders, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—EMPLOYEES LAID OFF

Mr. MASSEY:

1. How many employees of the Canadian National Railways, in all departments, have been laid off in the past six months?
2. How many in Ontario?
3. How many in the past month in: (a) Ontario; (b) all Canada?

Mr. HOWE: The Canadian National Railway management state, in reply to the above questions, that the information is not kept in the form requested, and could only be obtained at the cost of much labour and expense.

The railway does report certain figures to the dominion bureau of statistics showing the count of employees as at the end of each month, and the following figures are taken from such reports:

Number of employees in all classes on Canadian National Railways: April 30, 1938, in Canada, 65,423; in Ontario, 21,705. March 31, 1938, in Canada, 66,456; in Ontario, 21,561. October 31, 1937, in Canada, 70,599; in Ontario, 23,207.

These figures cannot be interpreted to mean that the difference represents employees laid off, as seasonal changes are reflected therein.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

ST. LAWRENCE STEVEDORING COMPANY

Mr. LACROIX (Quebec-Montmorency):

1. What conditions are imposed by the St. Lawrence Stevedoring Company for the use of its unloading plant on the coal wharf set apart for the use of the public in the harbour of Quebec?

2. Is the St. Lawrence Stevedoring Company a subsidiary of the Canadian Import Company?

3. Is the president of the St. Lawrence Stevedoring Company an officer of the Canadian Import Company?

4. What would be the approximate cost of a complete unloading plant if it were provided and installed by the National Harbours Board of Canada?

UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): In consequence of a telegram received to-day, I desire to ask several questions of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) in regard to the single unemployed situation in Vancouver.

1. Have the departmental representatives been in direct negotiation with the representatives of the single unemployed to discover some basis of settlement of their grievances?

2. What was the date of the last issue of deferred pay vouchers, and what was the amount for each individual?

3. Is it possible to undertake a registration of the men to ascertain the following facts: the number of men with domicile in British Columbia; the number of veterans with domicile in British Columbia; the number of those with domicile in other provinces for whom work may be available if transportation is accepted?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): The hon. member gave me notice that he intended to ask this question to-day, but I received the questions in the form in which he has presented them only a few minutes before three o'clock. I shall deal with them, therefore, on the basis of such information as I have.

The answer to the first question is that the representative of the Department of Labour who has been in Vancouver for some time past has been in consultation with the provincial government but has not been in direct negotiation with the representatives of the single unemployed.

In reply to the second question, according to our information the last of the deferred pay vouchers were redeemable on May 15. I am not able to give the exact amount of money due to individuals, owing to the fact that the amount would depend upon the length of time they passed in the camps.

In answer to the third question, I may say the provincial government did undertake the registration of all single unemployed men who passed through the forestry conservation camps. It was on the basis of that registration that the minister of labour of British Columbia made his proposal that these men who came to British Columbia from other provinces should be returned to their homes in such other provinces. As to work that may be available for those who entered British Columbia from other provinces, I can only say that these men when they return to their homes will be eligible in the same way as others in the same position with respect to youth training plans and such works projects as may be in progress within the provinces to which they go.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Would the minister answer a supplementary question in this same matter? This situation in Vancouver is no doubt causing just as grave concern to the government as to those of us who represent that city. The meagerness of the information we have at the present time—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MacINNIS: My question will be very brief, but it needs a little explanation. In view of the meagreness of the information given in reply to the questions asked by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) would the government provide an opportunity this week for discussion of this matter, either on an item in the Labour department estimates or by some other means?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We might have discussed that instead of the padlock law the last two days.

Mr. MacINNIS: Well, that is entirely in the hands of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. ROGERS: There was a discussion some time ago on this very question, as my hon. friend is aware, which occupied the greater part of an afternoon. I am far from suggesting that such a discussion exhausted the possibilities of debate on a question of this kind. But I should like to assure my hon. friend, if he needs such assurance, that the government is fully aware of the situation, and certainly members of the government are equally anxious that it shall be remedied quickly and in the proper way.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO SITTING ON THE KING'S BIRTHDAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. SAMUEL FACTOR (Spadina): May I ask the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) whether the house will sit on Thursday, June 9, the king's birthday?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I have looked over the record of the last ten years as to the sitting of the house on the king's birthday. In four of the past ten years parliament was not in session. In two of the ten years the house observed the holiday by not sitting. In two others the house adjourned for some time during the day. In 1929 we were having morning sittings at that time and the house adjourned at one o'clock. In 1935 the house adjourned from three-thirty to eight o'clock. In 1936 parliament prorogued on the king's birthday, at five o'clock in the afternoon.

The government would be willing to ascertain what the feeling of the house is with regard to this matter, and I think there would be no better way than to instruct the whips to confer together and report. We shall be quite willing to meet the wishes of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: On some of the occasions to which reference was made the garden party was held in the afternoon, and the house adjourned to permit hon. members to attend.

MEMBER FOR MOOSE JAW

REPORTED STATEMENT IN SASKATCHEWAN WITH RESPECT TO SASKATCHEWAN RIVER WATER PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to ask a question of the government. Which member of the government may answer it I do not know, but presumably it would be the acting Prime Minister (Mr. Lapointe).

The press carries a dispatch indicating that a member of this house, namely the hon. member for Moose Jaw, Mr. J. Gordon Ross, stated publicly on May 31 as follows:

> I am therefore making this definite statement, that if the Patterson government is returned on June 8 the Saskatchewan river water project will be completed this fall.

My inquiry is whether or not there is any warrant for such a statement being made on behalf of the government of this country.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Of course my right hon. friend cannot vouch for the accuracy of that newspaper report; neither can I. I think the thing to do first is to—

Mr. STEVENS: Wait until after the Saskatchewan election.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): —ascertain whether it is a correct statement. Then I shall be glad to give a further answer to the question.

[Mr. Factor.]

Mr. BENNETT: I may say that I have made some inquiries, and I have a telegram—which obviously I cannot read—indicating that it is correct. But it is a rather serious matter for a private member of this house to undertake to promise expenditures of public money which have to be voted by the parliament of Canada.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Well, the hon. member for Moose Jaw is a pretty intelligent man, I should be surprised if he got himself into such a difficulty.

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman is the only one who would be surprised.

Mr. STIRLING: Meantime it is a Liberal joke.

Mr. BAKER: It is no joking matter.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. H. MITCHELL (Medicine Hat): Yesterday I addressed a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and asked the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to direct their attention to it. Might I have an answer to that question to-day?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): My attention has been called to the question, which has to do with staff reductions on the Canadian National Railways. These are not matters of which the Department of Transport has knowledge; they are a detail of railway management. Staff reductions are taking place, partly seasonal and partly due to a serious reduction in traffic in certain areas. If my hon. friend would like to question the management on this and will place his question on the order paper, it will then be referred to the management in the ordinary way for such answer as they may care to give.

PENITENTIARIES COMMISSION

INQUIRY AS TO BRINGING DOWN OF LEGISLATION THIS SESSION BASED UPON REPORT

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Would the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) tell the house whether it is proposed during this session to proceed with legislation based upon the report of the penitentiaries commission? Because if it is, obviously we shall have very little opportunity to give the matter the study that its importance demands.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I think there may be preliminary legislation as a result of the report, but it would be physically impossible to deal with all the matters and recommendations of the report at this present session. I think when my right hon. friend gets the report he will see that it will necessitate long and careful study and consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: When may we expect the report?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Some time next week.

MUNICIPAL IMPROVEMENTS

AUTHORIZATION OF LOANS TO ASSIST MUNICIPALITIES IN MAKING SELF-LIQUIDATING IMPROVEMENTS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 143 to assist municipalities in making self-liquidating improvements.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Well, Mr. Speaker, is this bill going to pass without any discussion at all? It was presumed the minister would on presentation of an important measure of this kind make a statement in regard to the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend could not have been in the house the other day.

Mr. STEVENS: I was in the house.

Mr. DUNNING: I made a very complete statement on the resolution, and at this stage I cannot add anything to what I then said. When the bill gets into committee I anticipate a fairly general discussion on the application of the individual clauses. On second reading, however, I can add nothing to the very full statement I made in the debate on the resolution.

Mr. STEVENS: One is somewhat under a handicap in discussing this bill, which is a very important one, particularly on second reading, when the principle is accepted, because naturally in committee we are limited to the discussion of sections and the details of sections. That is particularly so in view of the fact that no notice was given and there has not been any further statement by the minister. At least the minister will remember that when the resolution was being discussed there were several points raised to which the minister replied that these would be disclosed with the introduction of the bill. That I think occurred on at least two or three occasions.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think my hon. friend can quote one case where that occurred on this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: I am quite sure of it, though I speak subject to correction. If the minister says he did not say so, of course I accept his word, but my recollection is that he did. For instance, I am reminded that the question of unorganized districts was raised, and it was said that this would be dealt with when the bill was brought down.

Mr. DUNNING: No; I said it would be covered in the bill, and it is covered in the bill in so many words.

Mr. STEVENS: At least we might have expected some statement from the minister on the introduction of his bill. In any case, despite all these handicaps, I think there should be a discussion of the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: Very well.

Mr. STEVENS: This is the point about which I am concerned, and I am sure other hon. members are concerned about it as well. In the consideration of this bill or any of its sister bills, if I might use that term, we are dealing with the policy of the government in regard to the whole unemployment problem. I have no desire to object in so far as this particular bill is concerned, as far as it goes, to a very limited degree, in dealing with the question of unemployment. It will be recalled that during the discussion of the resolution it was also repeatedly emphasized by the minister, I think, and others, that the very essence of this measure was the question of unemployment, that it dealt with unemployment. Therefore I think it is competent for a member, while approving of this bill, at the same time to call in question the adequacy of this or any other measures I have seen so far to deal properly with the question of unemployment.

problem, if I might apply that term, that exists in Canada with regard to the financing of the municipalities, says to the municipalities, "Now, we will lend you a certain limited amount of money." In some instances it will be a matter of only a few thousand dollars; in the larger cities it will amount to half a million or more, according to size. But the government says, "You must bring to us first a security that is absolutely self-liquidating and satisfactory to us. Then you must have your note endorsed by the province; and if you comply with these requirements we will lend you the money at two per cent—two per cent per annum."

Well, Mr. Speaker, whatever else may be said about it, certainly this is not a very great contribution towards either the solution of unemployment or the relief of the municipalities from the financial distress under which they are now labouring. During the debate on this general subject some weeks ago—I am not permitted to quote it, but I think there can be no objection to my just referring to it—I took the liberty of pointing out to the house that one of the chief problems in Canada was that municipalities—the same thing applies to provinces, but for the moment I am limiting myself to municipalities—are called upon to bear new burdens in these days, peculiar to the conditions that have existed for the last eight, nine or ten years. They are called upon to bear new and onerous burdens; that is, to pay a substantial share of the cost of general unemployment relief, and, incidentally, to care for ever-increasing numbers of indigent people; because without question the numbers of indigents to-day have increased greatly as compared to the numbers for whom the municipalities were called upon to care a few years ago. That of course is altogether apart from what one might call industrial unemployment.

This bill offers no relief to the municipalities in that regard at all; I think one would search in vain through the measures presented to the house to find any suggestion of giving assistance to the municipalities in that way or for that purpose. I believe it would have been infinitely better at this time had the government provided $30,000,000 or more to, shall I use the word, subsidize the municipalities, to assist them in carrying on their burden of finance in these days of ever-increasing social duties. I know that immediately the answer will be made that this parliament cannot vote money to municipalities, because municipalities are the creature of the provinces. All that is admitted, but I do submit that where there is a will to achieve an end, ways and means to reach that end can always be found.

What are the municipalities faced with, and what is the effect generally on the country of their condition? In the first place, they have increased taxes upon realty to a point where it is admitted by all that new building operations are virtually an impossibility because of the heavy burden of the realty tax. We are told that another bill will be introduced, dealing with housing. But at the very root of the housing problem lies the weight of municipal or city taxation, and it is not wholly the fault of the municipality. I will admit that during the years of industrial activity and prosperity, many cities and municipalities were somewhat reckless in their borrowing. But that was not peculiar to municipalities; it was common to them, to provincial governments and to the dominion government; and furthermore it was prevalent in private industrial corporations. All through the economic structure in the days of activity we had a degree of profligacy, if you like to use that extreme term, or recklessness in borrowing which we now realize was improvident and unwise. It does not lie within the right of this parliament to reflect upon the municipalities for having been improvident in the past, because the whole country is at fault in that respect. The failure to move forward in necessary construction is fundamentally due to the heavy taxation on realty in the municipalities. A month ago or more I made the suggestion that parliament might consider subsidizing municipalities to effect a reduction in taxation, in other words, offer to assist them by grants if a corresponding reduction were made in the rate of taxation on realty in the cities. If something of that kind were done—and I submit it would not cost this year more than this amount of $30,000,000—it would be infinitely more effective in starting the wheels of industry through a building program than will the rather left-handed method of assistance suggested in this bill. That is one point I wish to emphasize.

The other point is this question of unemployed single men. What are we going to do about it? Apparently, as near as I can judge, we are going to do nothing more about it than is set forth in the supplementary estimates tabled a week or two ago. In these estimates I see very little for that purpose. There are some other grants in aid to the provinces, but these grants in all probability will—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think there is too much disturbance in the chamber. I will call upon hon. members to remain in their seats and to be silent during the debate.

Mr. STEVENS: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I submit that, while these observations of mine do not interest hon. members very much, the subject matter must challenge the attention of parliament. I am warning parliament that if we do not grapple with these problems this session we shall invite disaster.

I was just about to make an observation regarding these unemployed single men.

Mr. DUNNING: I hesitate to interrupt my hon. friend, but there are many opportunities, on appropriate questions, to survey the whole field of problems of this kind. I gather that the motion for second reading is still before the house. I suggest that, in order to prevent a very wide range in debate over the whole economics of the country, hon. members should at least stick to the principle of the bill, which is the making of loans to municipalities for these purposes. I know that it permits a pretty wide latitude, but I do think my hon. friend is rather exceeding it at the moment.

Mr. SPEAKER: Will the hon. member confine his remarks as much as possible to the principle of the bill, which has to do with the lending of a certain amount of money to municipalities?

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Speaker, no member of the house is more desirous of submitting to your ruling than I am, and if your ruling is that this trend of observation is out of order I shall not pursue it. Nevertheless I am going to say a few words on the bill. I did wish to approve it, but if we are to be precluded from discussing the other elements of unemployment, only one small part of which is dealt with in this bill, I am going to say that I think the bill is wholly inadequate and is not an answer to the demands and the needs of the country.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, it is not put forward as a complete answer.

Mr. STEVENS: I know.

Mr. DUNNING: I so stated in my remarks the other day.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; and the moment I refer to some of the others—

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no, no.

Mr. STEVENS: Just a moment,—and the moment I refer to some of these other needs, and recite or indicate what provision is made to take care of that condition, a point of order is raised and I am asked to limit myself strictly to this bill.

Mr. DUNNING: That is cheap.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister says "that is cheap." Perhaps I might on a point of order ask you, Mr. Speaker, if language of that kind is warranted, from the Minister of Finance or any other hon. member?

Mr. DUNNING: It is not. I will anticipate your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and withdraw it.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, that is that. Another point: if you want to hair-split on rules,—usually an hon. member rises in his place when he addresses the Speaker. I am not a hair-splitter on rules, and I was not desirous of wandering far afield. I shall take my seat now, but I am going to say again to the house, we are playing with fire—

Mr. DUNNING: Not on this bill.

Mr. STEVENS: —when we disregard the unemployment situation as it applies to single homeless unemployed men. That is what we are doing, and this bill is not an adequate answer to that. I simply close with saying that as far as this bill goes, which is a very short distance, towards the solution of these problems, I welcome it. But the government must not expect that the acceptance of this bill or the meagre votes in the supplementary estimates will be an answer to the demands of this country for a solution of the unemployment problem.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I did not say anything on the resolution which preceded this bill, not because I did not feel there was something which could be said, but because I was and am in agreement with the proposals in the bill. I have no doubt that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) realizes just as much as the rest of us that the bill is not perfect or adequate to meet the situation now confronting the people of Canada. However, in my opinion the bill is a good start. The principle involved is a good one. I disagree with the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens); I believe that this method of providing funds for the municipalities is much better than to grant subsidies. The time may come when that will be necessary, but for the present I believe that this is the better way of dealing with the problem. It is unfortunate, but the fact is that when a municipality receives money, through either federal or provincial agencies, it considers it as something that has come right out of the sky and that may be spent without any great regard for economic consequences. I have seen that happen time and time again. As I say, the time may come when this government will have to help the municipalities, through subsidies, but if that is done there will have to be very stringent control over the expenditure of the money.

Mr. STEVENS: That was not my suggestion. I said that it would be accompanied by a reduction in taxation.

Mr. MacINNIS: I disagree again with the hon. member for Kootenay East. I am doubtful of its being possible to reduce taxation in that way. I came here in 1930 when we were just entering the depression. At the special session of 1930 the government decided to appropriate $20,000,000 to meet the unemployment conditions of that time, with which action I agreed. The intentions were good, but I am convinced now that that $20,000,000 did more harm than good. Some municipalities actually went into bankruptcy in order to meet the dollar for dollar provision.

I do not wish to say anything more about this bill. If this session lasts much longer I am sure the government will have to consider other measures to meet the situation that now confronts us. The fact that home building is at a low ebb is not due altogether to high taxation. The poor are without homes, but we must realize that they are also without clothing and without proper food. High taxation does not prevent their getting new clothes. High taxation does not prevent their getting proper food. Some little time ago I attended a meeting where this housing question was being discussed. One gentleman said that the reason why the housing situation was so bad was that the building trades were organized so well and had forced up wages to a point where people were not able to build because of the increased cost. When I heard that statement I thought of the report of the textile commission. No one can say that wages are high in the textile industry. No one can say that wages are high in the clothing industry. No one can say that wages are high in the boot and shoe industry. No one can say that the prices received by the farmers for their farm products are too high. Yet the workers need clothes, they need boots and shoes and they need decent food. The high wages paid in the building or any other industry is not the cause of the poverty of the working class.

Let me repeat that I approve of this measure, but I believe that a great deal will depend upon the way it is administered. I have already brought it to the attention of the authorities in Vancouver and I hope they will be able to take advantage of it so far as it goes.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, this is the second day of June and this house has been in session since January. It sat during the months of February, March, April and May. The government either had a policy or it had not. Its duty was to have a policy. Frequently in days gone by I listened to appeals by members of the present government to the emotions of the people of this country because it was alleged that a policy was not forthcoming. To think that on the second day of June we have one instalment of a policy being introduced into this house to deal with the problem of unemployment in Canada! This one measure is so framed that unless action is taken by the legislature of the province it will not be effective.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Excuse me, I have made that statement and I shall support it. I admit that the minister has changed his bill from the statement he made on the resolution.

Mr. DUNNING: I have not changed it.

Mr. BENNETT: Some one has, for he stated positively what was going to be done and that is not what is in the bill. Let us have no misunderstanding about that. Let us go a step further.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, I must take exception.

Mr. BENNETT: You can take exception, but that is not a point of order. Year after year, month after month, week after week and day after day, during the years from 1930 to 1935, complaints were heard from this side of the house, in season and out of season and criticisms bitter and remorseless were launched against the government of the day because of what was said to be the delay in dealing with these matters. Now we find this government, on the second day of June, introducing what the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) described the other day as the policy of the government to deal with unemployment. That policy was to be part housing, part self-liquidating loans and part something else. If this government had this policy, as they should have had, when the house met, why did they let the legislatures of the nine provinces prorogue without being advised of it? Let some one answer that. Why did they let the legislatures that are to give the guarantees with respect to this indebtedness come and go without taking any action? Let them answer that.

Let them answer one thing more. The municipalities cannot issue their debentures without the authority of the provincial legislatures. They have no power to do so. I had a telegram this morning from the mayor of Calgary pointing out that he could not issue any debentures unless the legislature gave him the power. Had he known of these proposals he would have sought and obtained the necessary power from the legislature before it prorogued. The other day we had the spectacle of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) rising in his place and telling the people of Canada that this problem, which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) had declared in 1935 to be the most important problem in Canada—he declared that prior to the election—

Mr. DUNNING: What did I say?

Mr. BENNETT: He declared it was the most important problem. Knowing that it was most important, knowing that this matter had to be dealt with, he allows the legislatures of the nine provinces to come and go. We have the spectacle of the Minister of Finance standing in his place and saying that in order to deal with this bill and other measures the provincial legislatures will call special sessions.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no; quote me fairly.

Mr. BENNETT: They may call special sessions.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. BENNETT: Probably would. Let us read his words.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right; read them.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister said, as reported on page 3386 of Hansard:

The security taken by the government will be the debentures of the municipality. The loan, as I indicated before, must be guaranteed by the province in which the municipality is situated, and the project must be approved by the government of the province.

Note those words, "must be approved by the government of the province." This bill does not provide that at all, it provides that the municipality must take steps to get approval. Let us look at it. Section 3 reads:

No agreement shall be entered into under this act unless:

(d) the municipality has obtained an undertaking from the government of the province concerned in form satisfactory to the minister that such province will guarantee to the government of Canada the payments for interest on and amortization of the loan, required to be made by the municipality to the minister.

That is not what the minister said the other day. He says now that these municipalities must get an undertaking from the government of the province that they will guarantee these payments.

Mr. DUNNING: But I did say just that the other day.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I will not have interference with what I have to say.

Mr. DUNNING: And I will not be misquoted.

Mr. BENNETT: I read a moment ago what the minister said. He said:

The loan, as I indicated before, must be guaranteed by the province in which the municipality is situated, and the project must be approved by the government of the province.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course. That is what I said, but it is not what you said I said.

Mr. BENNETT: I read it a moment ago, and I have just read it again, and now I will read, on the second reading of this bill, section 3, subsection 2, paragraph (d)—I will read the whole of the section:

(2) No agreement shall be entered into under this act unless:

(a) the municipality submits detailed financial estimates demonstrating to the satisfaction of the minister that the project to be constructed or the extensions or improvements or renewals to be made will be a self-liquidating project;

(b) the construction, extension, improvement or renewal of the project is urgently needed and will assist in the relief of unemployment in the municipality concerned;

(c) any application by a municipality for a loan under this act and the project to be financed out of the proceeds of the loan have been approved by the lieutenant governor in council of the province in which the municipality is situated; and

(d) the municipality has obtained an undertaking from the government of the province concerned in form satisfactory to the minister that such province will guarantee to the government of Canada the payments for interest on and amortization of the loan, required to be made by the municipality to the minister.

The onus now, sir, under this statute is placed on every municipality that proposes to use any of this money to secure from the government of the province an undertaking that they will guarantee the payments—not get a guarantee but an undertaking to give one; not an undertaking between the two governments, federal and provincial, but that the municipality will undertake this work. And I have just said that some of the municipalities have no power to issue debentures without legislative authority. Therefore they are blocked at the very start. There is the end before you start. The municipality of Calgary cannot issue debentures just because they feel like it; they have to have authority to do so. I do not know how it is with respect to other provinces, but I am told from the short inquiries I have been able to make this morning, and I believe the information to be accurate, that in some of the provinces the approval of a board is required for the issue of debentures, and that in other cases there must be direct authorization by the legislature to incur additional debt. That means that if one of our western municipalities proposes to increase its debt by $100,000, and thereby secure the benefits of this act, it has to obtain from the legislature power to increase its debenture debt to that extent. Obviously I am not undertaking to speak for all the provinces. I do not know what the law may be in Prince Edward Island or Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, but I do know this, that the legislatures of those provinces have all met and have prorogued since we came into session.

Mr. FACTOR: That is why paragraph (d) is put in.

Mr. BENNETT: A solon has now come to the rescue of the government. What an absurdity that an observation of that kind should be made, that that would cure this difficulty.

Mr. FACTOR: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. The right hon. gentleman said that my statement was absurd, or words to that effect. I say that is the reason paragraph (d) is there.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not a point of order, Mr. Speaker, and there is no necessity for the hon. gentleman to demonstrate it.

Mr. FACTOR: I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a point of order.

Mr. FACTOR: Mr. Speaker will rule on that.

Mr. BENNETT: You cannot interfere with the conduct of debate by jumping up and saying, "it is a point of order," just because you do not like the language that is used by the speaker, unless such language contravenes the rules. To say that a statement is absurd does not contravene the rules.

Mr. FACTOR: I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. gentleman has made the statement that my words are absurd. I say that is not proper language to use in this house. I was giving the reason for paragraph (d).

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: There is no necessity to give it. The hon. member has raised a point of order, and he cannot make a speech. He says the word "absurd" is unparliamentary. That is the point, and the Speaker has to decide it.

Mr. FACTOR: I have a right to say why the statement is not absurd.

Mr. BENNETT: No. That is exactly what you do not have the right to do.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Which is absurd?

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not see the word "absurd" mentioned in Beauchesne's Rules and Forms, but I may be mistaken.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, I said it was absurd to make the observation that was made, and the demonstration of it was wholly unnecessary. But now that it has been demonstrated by the hon. gentleman himself, I direct attention to the fact that that section will not in any sense authorize or confer power upon the municipality which it can get only from the legislature. As the minister himself stated the other day, the legislature creates the municipality. The legislature confers upon it the powers that enable it to function as such. The extent of its powers is determined by the act of the legislature creating the municipality or by the general law of the province, as defined by statute law. The mayor of the city to which I referred directs attention to the fact that he is unable to issue debentures unless he has legislative action. Paragraph (d) does not touch that at all. It asks that the municipalities shall go out and get from the government a promise that they will introduce a bill guaranteeing the payments. The minister said it was a condition that they should be guaranteed. I have read the statement he made the other day, and I will read it again if necessary. He said:

> The loan, as I indicated before, must be guaranteed by the province.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course it must. That is what the bill says.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister for a single moment suggest that to get an undertaking from a government to a municipality is a guarantee?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the minister's language is that it must be a guarantee.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right, and it will be.

Mr. BENNETT: And the bill says that the agreement between the municipality and the government of the province must be obtained by the municipality.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Now I come back to this, and I cannot stress it too strongly. Can any hon. member of this house visualize the circumstances under which the government introduces at the end of May a bill that contemplates these acts being done, involving action by legislatures, and seeing the legislatures come and go, without this government taking any steps? Is this policy a new policy? Was it thought out before the house met? Was it thought out when the legislatures were in session? Was it considered whether they were in session or not? Is it any wonder that the people of this country ask, what is the matter with parliament? Why is no action being taken, they ask, to deal with the unemployment problem? There are inquiries and correspondence everywhere, asking why nothing is being done. And then when the mountain labours and brings forth a mouse, what have we? We are told that what the government is doing is part of a grand policy to deal with unemployment. The Minister of Labour said: Keep that in mind—this is only part of a program. How long have they had the program? How long have they had the policy? Did they have it when the legislature of Prince Edward Island was in session, or the legislature of Alberta, or of British Columbia, or of Quebec, or Ontario? If they had, why didn't they act? If they had not, why did they not bring down a policy that does not contemplate the necessity of the legislatures meeting in special session?

With respect to the meeting of the legislatures the minister used these words, at page 3399 of Hansard:

> Perhaps I should at this stage indicate what is in the mind of the government regarding the point raised by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). In fact, I think I should apologize for not having anticipated it, but I overlooked it completely in making my statement.
> The laws of the provinces relating to municipal expenditures vary very widely; the powers vested by the legislatures in the various lieutenant governors in council vary very widely as also do the powers extended to municipalities to do certain things involving capital expenditure. It is quite impossible to frame a measure which would meet all the varying conditions, and I was compelled therefore to visualize the possibility that this scheme might have a sufficient appeal to the various provincial authorities to warrant them even in calling the legislature together for a couple of days to make possible what might be required in their particular case, for the municipalities on the one hand and for themselves on the other, to enable them to come within the ambit of the legislation.
> I will be perfectly frank, Mr. Chairman, and say that I do not think the dominion can extend this credit on any less secured terms than those involved in the bill. As the one charged with the guardianship of the treasury, I should say that I believe the security asked for by this legislation is reasonable and no more adequate so far as the dominion is concerned, especially when we have in mind the fact that each legislature controls absolutely the municipalities within its borders. The municipalities are wholly the creatures at all times of the provincial legislatures. If we proceed to lend direct to the municipalities—and there is some question whether we could, as indicated by the leader of the opposition—it would be open to any provincial legislature so to change the conditions under which its municipalities operate as to make it quite impossible for us to get the money back. We might as well face that. That being the case, seeing that we are rendering this assistance to institutions which are wholly the creatures of provincial legislatures, I think that when we are lending the money so cheaply, when we are taking the degree of loss on the loan which I indicated in my earlier remarks on the subject, the minimum security we should ask is that the province should guarantee that the municipality will keep the obligation it has incurred for a project; and remember, that the project must itself have the approval of the provincial government before it can become eligible for a loan under this statute.

I have read the whole passage in order that there may be no difficulty on that score, and I do point out that nothing short of a provincial statute will meet the conditions imposed in some provinces. Obviously, I cannot speak for all of them, but I say that some of them require an act of the provincial legislature; and what is more, sir, the minister himself recognizes it. He said he thought that they might meet together for two days—it is important enough for that—in special session to deal with the matter. And they allowed the legislatures to meet and prorogue, while they did nothing. That is the policy, that is the program of the government. Do you call that a policy, Mr. Speaker? Do you call that a program? What do you think the Canadian people would have felt like if they had been told in 1935, "Our program is to call parliament together in January and let the months of February, March, April and May go by, and in the closing days of May put a resolution on the order paper, following that up with a bill, the second reading of that bill being moved on the second day of June, contemplating at the same time, both in the resolution and in the bill, that nothing short of an act of the legislature, in some of the provinces at any rate, would comply with the terms of that program or policy." For the Minister of Finance himself, speaking for the government, so intimated. But it does not apply to this alone. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) the other day said, "There is other legislation and the same principle is to be applied." Housing was one matter which was mentioned.

Some day, Mr. Speaker, I will read a few extracts from Hansard of 1934 and 1935, when action was being taken in March, when we called together the provincial premiers and obtained their views as to what had to be done. I am bound to say that I never found any difficulty in dealing with them except in one instance. They pressed their views, and we reached agreements which were loyally carried out by the provinces on the one hand and by the dominion on the other; and if there were differences of opinion they were liquidated peacefully and quietly. But in 1935 the placards declared that there was to be, "Harmony! harmony! There are eight provinces, and we shall have the nine of them wtih the dominion, all one happy family of Liberalism." That was what was broadcast to the electors of the country, and now we have the full fruition of it in a bill that can be made effective in 1938 only in some parts of Canada by an act of the legislature which would involve that body meeting in special session, as pointed out by the Minister of Finance. That is the story. And, what is more, as pointed out in the communications that I have been receiving, these contracts and arrangements should all have been made before June; in other words, the time to prepare for them was during the months that have passed. But every time any question was asked with respect to any policy of unemployment relief, we know what answer was given. No wonder there is a smile on the faces of some of my hon. friends. The hon. gentleman at whom I am now looking was in the house from 1930 to 1935 and he will recall some of those historic days. There are the facts, however. Now Mr. Speaker, I commend to hon. gentlemen, who will so vociferously cheer the proposals of their government, a reading of Hansard for the years from 1930 to 1935. If they do, they will see what their party said then, and they will then explain to the Canadian people—

Mr. DUNNING: They might also look at what the right hon. gentleman said while they are looking up the other speeches.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: You see, Mr. Speaker, precisely what I said would happen has happened. The alleged wit of the Minister of Finance is relied upon to relieve a tension that has become very desperate. The Minister of Finance says, "Let them read what you said."

Mr. DUNNING: It would be instructive.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, they would find that there was no waiting until the second of June to take action. Of course, one does not expect anything like fairness about these things. When a government is entrenched as firmly as the present administration is, it folds its arms and says, "What are you going to do about it"? I may remind you that you are there with a minority vote of the electorate of Canada to begin with, and—

Mr. BOTHWELL: It must be a rather wonderful experience to be in opposition.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it is a wonderful experience to be in opposition but never a new one to me; and I can say to the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell) that it is perhaps more enjoyable than being in office.

Mr. CLEAVER: May I ask a question?

Mr. BENNETT: I see no reason why the hon. gentleman should, but if it will give him any pleasure I shall be glad to answer his question.

Mr. CLEAVER: Will you be good enough to indicate whether you are opposing or supporting this legislation?

Mr. BENNETT: Either the hon. gentleman is suffering from lack of hearing, or else he does not read, I do not know which; but if he was in the house the other day and listened, then he knows what was said.

Mr. CLEAVER: I thought you had a change of heart.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member must not address another hon. member personally, but must refer to him by his constituency.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think that can be excused in the circumstances. I asked the minister to devote some consideration to the practical problem as to how this necessary legislation should be made available to the people of Canada in the year 1938. After so doing he might also indicate why we now have to wait, at this advanced season of the year, for the benefit of this legislation, when provision should have been made for it and it should become effective now, not later. Lastly he might indicate why, knowing of this policy, if it is intended to use it as a policy, he let the legislatures meet and part—happy to meet, sorry to part, happy to meet again—in special session. He might explain that also.

Mr. G. G. McGEER (Vancouver-Burrard): I must confess that I had some difficulty in following the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) because I was unable to apprehend the distinction he seemed to have so completely in mind between the language of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and the language of the bill with respect to provincial guarantees. Certainly in British Columbia the cities and municipalities require no legislation whatever to authorize them to borrow money from the dominion government or from anybody else. They do have to pass a by-law to cover any expenditure to be made in the form of capital developments, but for a great many works such as are covered by this bill they would not even have to pass a by-law. Had the leader of the opposition directed his remarks to the fact that some legislative assemblies may not have conferred power on the lieutenant governor in council to give the guarantee required in this bill, it would have been more to the point, because I doubt very much whether all our provincial lieutenant governors in council have the power to guarantee municipal borrowings for all purposes covered by this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: I pointed out the other day that most of them in my opinion have not. I dealt with that.

Mr. McGEER: In any event it seems to me that that defect, if it be one, is fully covered in the section, because it provides that the guarantee may be in a form satisfactory to the minister; which means that the minister could accept a provisional guarantee by order in council, which would be subject to confirmation by the legislature sitting at its due time. I can see no reason why any loan under this provision need be delayed for the calling of a special session of a provincial legislature.

There is one item I should like to draw to the minister's attention, and suggest that one of the fields of real employment that could be aided by this kind of financial assistance is the construction of sewers and waterworks facilities. In the city of Vancouver and surrounding municipalities we have established a metropolitan sewer board and metropolitan water board. That organization is the largest employer of unemployed labour in and around Vancouver. It was through the activities of the sewage board and water board that we were able to absorb considerable unemployment; for in such work a very large number of the men on relief were given the opportunity and privilege of working out their relief. The undertakings are purely municipal, and I think it would be wise to include—

Mr. BENNETT: The minister dealt with that the other day by illustration.

Mr. McGEER: —boards carrying on municipal works as well. While I think that the definition of a self-liquidating project is very wide, there is a class of work in and around cities from which real benefits to the revenue of the cities come but which can hardly be described as self-liquidating developments because the contributions made to them are largely free. I suggest that in the field of tourist trade development there are a great many opportunities for improving parks and beaches and developing tourist attractions in almost every city in Canada, which provide an opportunity to give employment to a large class who are now unemployed, and develop a tourist trade which in itself is a continuing proposition, and one of the best incentives to ancillary activities that we have yet found. I know of several opportunities in my own province on which unemployed could be set to work and the tourist trade greatly facilitated, if only funds were available for developing the kind of attractions which not only draw tourists but keep them in and around our cities for longer periods of time. In addition to the suggestion I made with regard to boards carrying on municipal works I respectfully suggest to the minister that the definition of self-liquidating projects might be extended to include undertakings designed to improve Canadian tourist trade. The tourist trade of Canada to-day is of tremendous importance to the national government. The 20,000,000 tourists who come to Canada annually from the United States and exchange United States currency for Canadian goods and services are helping us to meet our national debt problem on the other side of the line—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to remind the hon. member, as I did the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) that he should confine his remarks to the purpose of the bill, which is to assist municipalities in making self-liquidating improvements.

Mr. McGEER: I was suggesting that the bill might include the development of tourist trade. Of course if it is out of order to suggest that the provisions of the bill be extended, I could not discuss that; but I was not aware that the rules limited one, in discussion of the principle of the bill, to exactly what is named in it and gave no privilege of suggesting any expansion. However I have no doubt the minister is just as well aware of what I was going to say as I am myself. So I bow to your honour's ruling and respectfully ask the minister to imagine what I might have said.

Mr. A. H. MITCHELL (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to delay the passage of the bill, and I hesitate to take part in the debate; but there are some things that must be said from this corner. I see no harm in subsidizing the municipalities as a means of improving their public utilities and services; but as a serious means of solving unemployment I do not think this bill can be expected to work very effectively.

In my opinion this bill indicates a tendency on the part of the government to indulge in a mild form of what has come to be known in the United States as pump-priming, which has not solved the unemployment problem in that country and will not solve the unemployment problem in Canada. I do not wish to discuss unemployment now, except to say that it is a world-wide condition, and I believe it is here to stay. But the right of the people to live should have precedence over any man-made rules and regulations, and until some government, this or some other, accepts those two facts and correlates them to our outworn money system, the effect of unemployment will grow and grow. That I certainly do believe.

So, Mr. Speaker, while I have no objection to the bill now before the house, I feel like pointing out that it is another example of straw-clutching by a drowning government.

Mr. ERNEST BERTRAND (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I was not going to participate in this debate and would not have done so had it not been for the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I always enjoy his wit, though sometimes it is very caustic. The right hon. gentleman said, "And they let the legislatures prorogue before introducing this bill." A few days ago one of the members on this side of the house took the time to calculate how long a session would last if all the members of this house were to speak as often as the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) has spoken, taking the hon. member as an example. The result of the calculation was that it would take four and a half years to complete one session. The sessions of the legislatures are short and they generally start before our sessions begin here. I know in Quebec the legislature had started its session at least twenty to twenty-five days before we began, and the session of the legislature lasts only about three months. So the hon. member for Broadview alone would take up enough time in discussing the other laws to cover the period during which the provincial legislatures would be sitting.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. STEVENS: Might I suggest to the minister that after the words "local improvement district" the words "or board" might be added?—because in some municipalities there are joint boards which cover perhaps more than one municipality and operate as a body under provincial charter. For instance, there is the joint sewage scheme and the greater Vancouver waterworks. So if the words "or board" were inserted perhaps it would cover a case of that kind.

Mr. DUNNING: With respect to joint works between various municipalities made possible by the existence of a board jointly controlled by them, I am advised that in most cases there would be no difficulty in complying with the language of the act, because in every case such boards are controlled by the municipalities. It would merely become a question, I am advised, of dividing the proceeds of the loan and the liability for repayment between the municipalities controlling the boards in a joint undertaking.

I do not think it is advisable to change the definition, but perhaps in some of the later sections the alteration of a word might make it quite clear that where joint works are contemplated they are not barred because more than one municipality shares in the administration of a board. I must say that was one point arising out of the discussion the other day which caused me to consider changing the bill slightly. The right hon. leader of the opposition unconsciously did me an injustice; up to date there has been no change at all in the bill from the original draft, and in the language I used the other day I gave what I believed to be an accurate description of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: The resolution.

Mr. DUNNING: The difference between us, however, is so slight—

Mr. BENNETT: The resolution itself is not reproduced in terms in the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: No, it was an abridgement of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. DUNNING: But I think the difference between us is too slight to quarrel about. The intent is clear, and I think the intention we all have is similarly clear. When considering the matter of the joint boards, however, I thought it would be well to have the benefit of the discussion in committee before finally deciding how we should deal with such a situation, for the reason that I have been astonished at the degree of diversity which exists between the provinces in relation to their municipal laws. In attempting to devise a measure under the benefits of which all might come, definite terms have been very difficult to find. That, more than any other one thing, led me to say to the leader of the opposition the other day that I could visualize the possibility of provincial legislatures having to meet for a couple of days because of the wide differences in their own legislation with respect to municipalities and of course the great variations in the degree of authority one legislature has extended to its lieutenant governor in council and the degree of authority extended in another province. The main question that was in my mind, however—and I ask the right hon. leader of the opposition to believe this—in making that statement the other day was the wide diversity in municipal law.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the hon. gentleman made that quite clear.

Mr. DUNNING: I thought that in committee we would hear from members from all parts of Canada as to the particular types of institutions which exist. If it is possible to put this legislation into such shape as to make it absolutely certain that no legislature will be required to meet, that will be a good thing; but I do seriously submit that it is not all-important. The all-important thing is to have this legislation right from the standpoint of the parliament of Canada. We cannot expect to develop it in a manner which will fit the peculiarities of the municipal law of any particular province. We can go as far as is reasonable.

In the matter of the boards mentioned by the leader of the opposition the other day, and by the hon. members for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) and Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) to-day, undoubtedly there is a sufficient common interest or common experience with regard to joint boards to make it desirable to see to it that municipalities should not be debarred from the benefit of this act because they are operating jointly.

Mr. BENNETT: Not jointly.

Mr. DUNNING: In fact I think we would desire quite the reverse.

Mr. BENNETT: I hardly think that is it. Would I be interrupting if I suggest that with respect to that definition of municipality, the difficulty which was referred to by me the other day, and which was again referred to this afternoon by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, is a very real one. Why should we not say that it "includes a city, town, or any agency or board of such incorporated city or town"? The minister sees what I mean?

Mr. DUNNING: But we have to go further and make provision for them, jointly.

Mr. BENNETT: That can come later when you are dealing with it, but the point I want to make is that there is no doubt that some of these metropolitan boards issue their own debentures.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know how many do—probably very few.

Mr. DUNNING: Very few.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point I made the other day, and I thought the minister dealt with it fairly. They issue their own debentures, and in some instances they are guaranteed by the city or town.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, they are guaranteed jointly.

Mr. BENNETT: No, their obligation is direct, and the guarantee is by the city or municipality of which they are an agency.

Mr. DUNNING: Or by several of them.

Mr. BENNETT: It might conceivably be by several of them.

Mr. DUNNING: It is in some cases.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not sure of the situation concerning Winnipeg. I had to do with that in connection with a sewage disposal project. The minister will remember that there are a large number of municipalities surrounding the central municipality of Winnipeg. But I have such indefinite information that I cannot speak with any authority.

Mr. DUNNING: I thought I had covered that in section 5 by the use of the term "other securities."

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I think that covers that side of it, but I am talking about whether or not you are going to include an agency or board of an incorporated city or town. It does not apply to villages; it applies just to cities or towns.

Mr. DUNNING: "Incorporated village" is included there.

Mr. BENNETT: I see it is. That is why I say it does not require any board. I suggest they have them only in cities or towns.

Mr. DUNNING: No, there was an application this morning for a group including a village who wished to come in a scheme with respect to a hospital which they could demonstrate was self-liquidating. That was by a board. It was a new type of board to me.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact I had not thought of this covering a municipal hospital, but clearly it is broad enough.

Mr. DUNNING: Provided it is self-liquidating.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite, and provided the work is essential or desirable. I am a little perturbed as to whether or not the limitation which may be imposed by the definition of "municipality" may not shut some of these out. I say that with hesitancy to the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: I intend to let section 2 stand, after an expression of opinion with regard to it.

Mr. BENNETT: May I say this?—the minister will get my point. Not many years ago a public minded citizen in one of our cities brought action to restrain the city council from utilizing money to send a delegation somewhere. The case went to the supreme court, and his view was sustained; the council were personally liable. Now there are those who do not agree with this general idea of our dealing with municipalities, and it may be that we have to contemplate someone taking proceedings. Therefore I am making these observations with the hope that we shall foresee as far as possible these difficulties and, by foreseeing them, prevent any possible interference with the operation of what in my judgment is a desirable plan.

Mr. STEVENS: Might I add one or two sentences?

Mr. DUNNING: I should appreciate a full discussion on that matter of definition, because I want to let it stand.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: Before the hon. member speaks: I was pleased to see one thing which is the greatest departure this government has made in policy that I know of. It is going to permit estimates to be made by Conservatives, for on the second line it says, "on the basis of conservative estimates."

Mr. DUNNING: Not your kind, though.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the greatest change on a question of policy that I have seen.

Mr. STEVENS: I was going to add a sentence or two. I confess that I am not right up-to-date regarding the situation on the Pacific coast as respects these joint boards, but this is as I recall it. It is about thirty years since the joint sewerage scheme was organized. It took in the then municipalities of Vancouver, Point Grey, South Vancouver and Burnaby. Three of those have been merged in a single city. Burnaby is still on the outside. This joint sewerage board was erected by a special bill of the provincial legislature. I cannot from memory say precisely how the municipalities pay their share, but I know that the joint board issued its own debentures or securities. Now, this situation may possibly arise. The city of Vancouver, which now represents three of those municipalities, they having in recent years been amalgamated, might be quite agreeable: the municipality of Burnaby, which for the time being is in rather serious distress, but is quite a minor factor in the board's operations, might find itself unable to contribute, but the other very preponderating part might be willing to absorb any part of the share of the municipality of Burnaby. Therefore it should be made possible for the agreement to be made with the entity, namely the sewerage board, which has its own powers and its own rights.

With regard to the waterworks, which is still more in line with this objective, I think it applies to North Vancouver. I wish the hon. member for that constituency were here, but he is not. The waterworks is located in the municipality of North Vancouver. It passes close to, and part of it passes through the city of North Vancouver; those two municipalities are involved; and I imagine its service extends also to West Vancouver. Then it crosses the Narrows and serves the city of Vancouver, and Burnaby, and, I think, the municipality of Richmond and Lulu Island as well.

Mr. REID: And New Westminster.

Mr. STEVENS: New Westminster is now connected up; that is true. New Westminster used to have its water from another section.

Mr. DUNNING: Who owns the waterworks?

Mr. STEVENS: It is now called the Greater Vancouver Waterworks system.

Mr. DUNNING: Do the individual municipalities do their own laterals?

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, yes. They do in the sewerage and, I imagine, in the waterworks as well.

Mr. DUNNING: That solves it.

Mr. STEVENS: The point is that it may be found highly desirable and the opportunity may arise for a refinancing of that which would result in a lowering of the charges. As far as the security is concerned it would be one of the best that could be offered in Canada for one of these projects.

Mr. DUNNING: Refinancing under this project?

Mr. STEVENS: For instance, if they had debentures maturing. But I presume that that means reconstructing?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh yes.

Mr. STEVENS: There might be additions and extensions made which would enable the board to take advantage of this act. My opinion, frankly, is that it is very nearly approached now. "Local improvement district" is a pretty wide term in itself, but I think it would be well to add in there "or joint municipal board", because the security is even better than that of a single municipality. There should be no objection to it.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me I should like to develop the difficulties that I have run into in that connection. I do not do this with any desire of declining to give further consideration to his suggestions. Here is the first difficulty with respect to the joint boards. We have had to place a limitation upon the amount which any one municipality can get. This limitation is based upon the relation of its population to the population of Canada. It would be possible to have a joint board made up of one large municipality and several small ones. If each municipality deals separately with the minister with respect to some self-liquidating project, the small municipalities, in spite of not having sufficient population, could borrow up to $200,000. The large municipality would be subject to the limitation which works out at about $3 per head. The difficulty of adjusting a joint project to what I know the individual municipalities will want to do, that is, take advantage of what they would be entitled to, will in practice be overcome in the case of most joint water boards by the fact that the individual municipality cooperating in a joint waterworks undertaking almost invariably builds its own laterals within its own borders. That is to say, the joint water board exists for the purpose of delivering water to the boundary of the municipality, or to some agreed-upon point. The development of the distributing system would in many cases offer opportunity to the municipality to take advantage of this scheme. This would be particularly true in connection with the repair and renewal necessities of old lateral distributing systems. I know of many cases where old wooden stave pipes are being used at a tremendous maintenance cost. It has been demonstrated to me that in some cases the maintenance cost considerably exceeds the two per cent interest and carrying charges on these loans. This is the type of work that would create employment.

Mr. BENNETT: It must result in an increase in the annual net revenue. A project might be self-liquidating without adding anything to the net annual income of a municipality.

Mr. DUNNING: Have you considered the words, "either by reductions in the annual operating and maintenance charges"?

Mr. BENNETT: The principal words are, "will on the basis of conservative estimates result in an increase in the annual net revenue." I was wondering whether all these projects could be said to operate to result in an increase in the net annual revenue of the municipality.

Mr. DUNNING: "Either by reductions in the annual operating and maintenance charges."

Mr. BENNETT: That is only descriptive of the method.

Mr. DUNNING: I spent more time over this section than over any other. I want to have the benefit of everyone's view. The governing words are, "increase in the annual net revenue of the municipality."

Mr. BENNETT: Those are the governing words.

Mr. DUNNING: But let us jump from there to the words, "sufficient to pay the annual charges for interest on and amortization of the loan." How is that sufficient amount to be raised? It has to be raised either by reductions in the annual operating and maintenance charges or by service charges paid by those benefiting. That was the process of thinking I went through in arriving at this section.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not say it is not sound. I only thought it might give rise to a little difficulty.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall have it reexamined. I shall also give consideration to what has been said in the committee wth respect to these joint boards. Frankly, I can see some difficulty with respect to the joint boards in apportioning the amounts. I believe that all the municipalities that might be partners in a joint board would have plenty of self-liquidating projects other than those which might be joint in character.

Mr. BENNETT: I was thinking of my own city where there is a street railway that is not profitable at times, while there is an electric light system that is profitable at all times. In the net result the city has to take care of the situation by means of taxes. How would they be treated, having regard to the fact that they are not separate entities? Would the city be able to ask for assistance in expanding the street railway system if it was able to show that as a result of that expansion there would be an increase in the net annual income of the city by reason of the improved facilities thus provided? Of course the credit of the city as a whole, of the taxpayers as a whole, would be responsible for repayment. It would not be just the system, which might not be profitable one year or another, but the taxpayers as a whole.

Mr. DUNNING: But "on the basis of conservative estimates" would over the period—

Mr. BENNETT: I hope it will continue that way in Calgary. At any rate this is a subject of some difficulty.

Mr. MARTIN: The matter referred to by the right hon. gentleman gives rise to a question I should like to ask. In the city of Windsor the street railway is operated by the hydro-electric commission.

Mr. DUNNING: Owned by?

Mr. MARTIN: It is owned by the city, but there is some scheme of operation which has been entered into between the city and the local hydro-electric commission. I should like to know if the present system could be expanded or a substitute bus system brought into being under subsection (c) of section 2. Would that be considered a self-liquidating project?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. DUNNING: To ask me to describe what is a self-liquidating project without critical examination of what is involved is more than I can do. I find it difficult to think of a municipality attempting to develop transportation under the auspices of a scheme of this sort. I would not definitely debar it, but the self-liquidating project that we have in mind is in connection with facilities generally in use by a municipality. Exceptional cases, such as the one mentioned by my hon. friend, and the case of Calgary, referred to by the leader of the opposition, would have to be studied. I may state frankly to the committee that I am not anxious to widen the definition of "self-liquidating works." I do not want to be put in the position of being accused of agreeing to lend to this municipality and not agreeing to lend to that municipality. I should like to have one rule that will be generally applied. I fear that to widen the definition would add very materially to my responsibility.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I agree with what the minister says about desiring to keep this within bounds, but I should like to have his reaction to this picture. A certain municipality at the present time is circumscribed by Indian reserve lands. It is tending to outgrow its present boundaries and unquestionably it will come before the Indian department to ask for permission to purchase certain of these reserve lands. In doing so it will add to its area and increase its taxes. Would that picture come within the provisions of this bill?

Mr. DUNNING: Absolutely not. I can answer that quite positively. The purchase of land is not a work creating project.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Taxes would develop immediately by the purchase of these lands. I just wanted to be clear about it.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is very persuasive, but I am quite sure that such a project would not come within the requirements of the bill. It would not have the effect of creating employment.

Mr. NEILL: How about a sewage system?

Mr. DUNNING: If they borrowed for that purpose, that might be conceivable.

Mr. MITCHELL: I see that paragraph (b) of section 2 defines "municipality" as including:

—a city, town, incorporated village, county, township, rural municipality, local improvement district or a province where such province is administering directly territory not organized into county or municipal units.

Irrigation projects have not yet been mentioned in the discussion, and I was thinking of the possibility of irrigation projects being undertaken on the prairie. I have one in mind which would be larger perhaps than would be allowed under the bill, but would an irrigation project be considered by the minister, who is a westerner, as self-liquidating?

Mr. DUNNING: It would depend somewhat on the financial set-up proposed for the irrigation district. As my hon. friend knows, there have been many irrigation projects which have not been self-liquidating by any means. I think, however, that an irrigation project could scarcely come within the purview of this legislation for another reason. The limitations imposed in the matter of population as to the amount which could be secured would scarcely, I think, make possible an irrigation scheme of any size under this act.

Mr. NEILL: Reverting to sewerage systems, the bill requires the scheme to be self-liquidating. Would the minister regard a scheme as coming within the terms of the bill if the municipality put on a special rate to cover the interest charges? Usually there is no charge for the use of the sewerage system. It is general to the municipality. But suppose a municipality undertook to earmark a mill rate sufficient to meet the interest charges per year, would that be regarded as self-liquidating?

Mr. DUNNING: No. The object of the bill is not to encourage municipalities to add to their general municipal rate. Sewerage systems that are built on a service charge basis, whereby those benefiting from the sewerage extension over a period of years pay for it, would be within the purview of the bill as being self-liquidating, but not a project proposed to be dealt with by the imposition of an additional mill rate on the whole municipality through the medium of the general tax. That would not be self-liquidating.

Mr. NEILL: I suggested a mill rate specially earmarked for the project.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to look into it, but I do not think it would be within the purview of the bill because it would have the effect of increasing the general rate of the municipality. If my hon. friend will study the language of paragraph (c) he will see that it says:

> "Self-liquidating projects" means a project which when completed will . . . either by reductions in the annual operating and maintenance charges . . . or by increase of revenues from persons using the services of or otherwise benefiting from the project—

And so on.

Mr. HAMILTON: I should like to call the minister's attention to the wording of paragraphs (b) and (c), having in mind that in Ontario, at all events, in a good many municipalities waterworks and electric light systems are handled by a public utility commission. A public utility commission is an incorporated body, but when it comes to raising money for the purposes of the utility, that I think is up to the municipality as such. The revenues, I think I am correct in saying, go to the public utility body, which at a later date, when they have no further need of them, turns them over to the municipality. It occurs to me that in order to take care of that situation the wording of paragraph (c) might require to be slightly revised, since it does not necessarily mean an increase in the annual net revenue of the municipality. Some provision perhaps should be made to take care of cases where the public utility body receives the revenues from an extension of the water service or something of that kind, and turns over the surplus revenues from time to time to the municipality.

Mr. DUNNING: But surely the annual revenue of such a public utility body is calculated to be sufficient to take care of the debt charges created by the utility. Surely it must pay over annually to the municipality an amount sufficient to take care of the carrying charges. As far as I am familiar with public utility commissions, they are put in the relationship to the municipality generally of having to contribute to the general treasury an amount equivalent to the carrying charges on the utility which they are administering; but they may hold in reserve, as a branch of municipal government, their earnings over and above those fixed charges. In any case I do not anticipate any difficulty in working that out. From a conservative estimate—not a political conservative estimate, but an economic conservative estimate—of what we can expect over a period of years with respect to the utility, I do not anticipate any difficulty such as my hon. friend mentions. The difficulty would come in connection with boards that have to deal with several municipalities.

Mr. LAWSON: The answer of the hon. minister to the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) leaves me with considerable confusion in my mind as to a kind of project in respect of which I think the minister will receive many applications from Ontario. In order to illustrate clearly the one which I wish to know about, in view of this definition, I will mention very briefly one which I think would clearly come within it. Suppose the municipality desires to construct a water-works system.

Mr. DUNNING: To construct one?

Mr. LAWSON: To construct a water-works system. Ordinarily a municipality in Ontario charges each user of the water either a flat rate per month or on the basis of a water meter, a gallonage basis.

Mr. DUNNING: Or on the basis of a frontage tax.

Mr. LAWSON: That is possible, but not usual in Ontario in respect of water systems. I assume that that would be a self-liquidating project.

Mr. DUNNING: Clearly.

Mr. LAWSON: But now I want to mention a project that is very different and ask for the minister's interpretation. Assume that a municipality wants to instal a sewer and sewerage system. In that case there is no monthly rendering of accounts and no monthly payment by the user, but in lieu thereof a proportion of the cost of the construction of the sewers and the sewerage disposal works is assessed per foot frontage against the property benefited, and there is taken into the general rate of the municipality that portion of the cost which is represented where the sewers have to cross streets at intersections. Would a scheme of that kind be considered self-liquidating, bearing in mind that the cost thereof is specially assessed against the property owner and included in the tax bill along with the general rate, and payable over the term of years which the engineer estimates to be the life of the work?

Mr. DUNNING: I attempted to meet that, as will be clear later on in the bill, by making provision for paying part of the cost out of the proceeds of a loan under this bill. What I visualized was this, that the part of the cost of the sewerage system cited by my hon. friend—

Mr. LAWSON: Specially assessed.

Mr. DUNNING: —which is specially assessed could be financed under this scheme. The rest of it the municipality generally would have to take care of. But I would not like to be too definite in saying yes to specific cases that are put to me across the floor. My hon. friend understands that I am not now saying that municipality so-and-so can come along and get a loan. The class of cases I contemplated when framing the bill did include the possibility of a portion of a facility being on a basis which would come within the purview of the act, and another portion of the same facility being on a different basis; and in order to make possible the consideration of assisting any such work "partly" was put in.

Mr. HEAPS: How about the security in that case?

Mr. DUNNING: There would be no difference to the security.

Mr. HEAPS: In another section it is provided that the government shall receive a mortgage.

Mr. DUNNING: "May"; that is for an entirely different purpose, to meet a different case in some provinces, where the only kind of security that could be taken would be a mortgage or hypothec. I do not expect that the mortgage or hypothec provision will be frequently made use of, but it is there in case other security cannot be given.

Mr. LAWSON: In which event the municipality in the ordinary course of events would issue debentures for payment for the very work we have been discussing, and I assume that the government would take from the municipality a proportion of those debentures to secure the amount advanced.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: I wish to point this out to the minister—and he will bear in mind that when I asked the original question I wanted to know what the government had in contemplation; that was all. If I understood his statement a few minutes ago, in answer to the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill)—and that is what prompted me to ask the question—the minister said that the government would not favour under this scheme works that imposed additional taxation upon the municipal property or home owner.

Mr. DUNNING: The general municipal rate.

Mr. LAWSON: Of course a special assessment would be an extra burden of taxation on the municipal property owner.

Mr. DUNNING: Those benefiting from it.

Mr. LAWSON: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: We have no objection to that.

Mr. LEADER: There are two questions which I should like to ask the minister. When any municipality desires to extend its sewage system or its waterworks, will that municipality be able to borrow under this bill for that purpose?

Mr. DUNNING: It would depend upon whether it was self-liquidating.

Mr. LEADER: If it were specially assessed I presume it would be.

Mr. DUNNING: If it were specially assessed on those whom it benefited, yes.

Mr. LEADER: The other question is this: If a town or a city desires to hard-surface its main street, will it be possible for that town or city to borrow money under this bill?

Mr. DUNNING: Again, if it were a self-liquidating project which conceivably might occur in such a case partly in one way and partly in another. Assume that the present street is all broken up and requires a very heavy expense of maintenance year by year, an expense of which there is record which is ascertainable. Assume further that the cost of the paving is to be assessed on a frontage basis against the property on either side. The combination of those two factors, (1) a lowering of maintenance costs as a result of the work and (2), the assessing of the cost of it on those benefiting, might very well bring such a project within the terms of the act. But remember again, I repeat, I do not want to give specific assurances which will be taken to mean that anyone can come along and ask for a loan to pave a street. It must be demonstrated that the particular project does fall within the definition of self-liquidating public work.

Mr. LEADER: I wish to thank the minister for his reply. I have in mind a special case, and his answer is really encouraging.

Mr. WEIR: Reference has been made to self-liquidating projects where a municipal levy may be used for waterworks or sewage disposal undertakings. What will happen with respect to applications made for repairing school houses?

Mr. DUNNING: I had not contemplated that.

Mr. WEIR: I think it had better be contemplated. Do I understand that the minister is definitely ruling that feature out of this legislation?

Mr. DUNNING: I am not ruling out anything which can be demonstrated to the government to be self-liquidating within the language of the statute. It must be self-liquidating.

Mr. LOCKHART: I appreciate what the minister has said with regard to the self-liquidating aspect of this matter. May I briefly recite for his information a case that is now before the Department of Transport in connection with the Niagara peninsula. I am referring to a very definite sewage disposal scheme which is necessary in consequence of a condition that has been brought to the attention of the municipality by the department of health of the province of Ontario. In the hands of the engineers of the Department of Transport there is now the report that has been prepared in conjunction with the department for an extensive sewage disposal scheme which is to take in a group of municipalities. It has been brought about quite definitely by representations from the department of health in Toronto, who object to the raw sewage and industrial waste emptying into lake Ontario. If these municipalities collectively enter into some scheme of providing a trunk sewer that will take care of all this industrial waste and sewage, treated to an extent probably approved by the provincial government, will the minister go so far as to suggest that, by reason of the fact that the federal government is more or less involved in consequence of certain conditions that have grown up over a long period of years in connection with the establishment of industries and so on, consideration could be given to a large joint scheme such as this, undertaken by the municipalities? Would it be possible to assist them in advancing such a scheme?

Mr. DUNNING: From the manner in which my hon. friend sets it out I doubt very much whether it could be arranged. Of course, no one can tell until the actual concrete proposition is submitted. When that is done one will look at the actual proposition and ask whether it is a project which, when completed, will on the basis of conservative estimates result in an increase in annual net revenue to the municipality either by saving money or by a service charge on those benefiting. I am sorry I cannot give a categorical answer, because my hon. friend is outlining something which is still in embryo. Let me say, however, that he must not forget that the degree of financial assistance which would be possible for qualified projects is limited by the populations affected. What would be the population in the municipalities to which my hon. friend is referring?

Mr. LOCKHART: About 50,000.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, the maximum loan that they could get even with a qualified project would be $200,000.

Mr. HEAPS: For each municipality or for all?

Mr. DUNNING: That is a question which, as I have pointed out, is giving me some difficulty. Certainly it is difficult for me to see how five municipalities can call themselves five separate entities and get the maximum for small municipalities, when they have by their own action made themselves into a large municipality. It is very difficult for me to answer. Certainly, if they deal with self-liquidating projects of their own individually, they could go up to $200,000. But to say that by merging their populations they are still able to take the advantage which accrues only to those of small populations is a doubtful thing for me to promise at this stage.

Mr. HEAPS: Why should there be such a provision in the bill? I intended raising that point on another section. There should be some flexibility.

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend mind leaving that until we reach that section? We might let section 2 stand. I think I have all the suggestions I am likely to get on the definition of the term "self-liquidating." They will all be carefully considered.

Section 2 stands.

On section 3—Loans to municipalities.

Mr. McIVOR: In the words of another, I should like to make a few observations. Perhaps this bill is late in coming. But it is better late than never. Jacob—I mean the first Jacob—waited fourteen years for Rachel, and Jacob thought she was worth waiting for. I would say that this bill was well worth waiting for.

I took considerable interest in the convention held some time ago of mayors and aldermen of the cities of Canada. They made some great speeches, speeches which I suppose would compare favourably with the oratory in this house, in demanding something from the dominion. I say this bill is something. It may not be a great deal, but it is something. It is now up to the civic officials to show their business ability. Let me give a concrete example of what a man was able to do with $30. He is the Reverend Richmond Craig of Winnipeg. He began with $30 and a heap of junk and rubbish; he gave a man a meal for sorting this heap, and with his business brain—I think ministers compare favourably with mayors in business ability—he organized a business employing the down-and-outs of Winnipeg. Hon. members from Winnipeg will bear me out. He set them to mending old boots and shoes, clothes, beds, clocks, stoves, etc. He paid the minimum wage to men who could not get a job anywhere else and were down and out. In 1933 his payroll amounted to $13,000. In 1937 the Good Will Industries showed interesting growth; during a period of six years the sum of $150,000 was paid out in wages, the minimum wage being paid, and a six storey building is now occupied. This shows what an ordinary individual could do. Why cannot our mayors and civic authorities borrow some of this money at two per cent and make it live? Why cannot they use it, not for something that will start and stop never to go again, but for something that will keep going and make work. I do not mean sewers and electric light plants. Let them use their business ability to find something that will be a going concern. I commend the minister for this step; it is only a small thing yet, but it is bound to grow.

Mr. LOCKHART: This clause brings us back to the scheme I suggested. It includes waterworks, etcetera. The minister probably did not understand that the project I have in mind is proposed by a group of municipalities which will act independently.

Mr. DUNNING: They will act separately?

Mr. LOCKHART: They will have to act separately. Let me be more explicit. The project starts at the outlet of the Welland ship canal; the old basin is being polluted, and the municipalities of St. Catharines, Port Dalhousie, Merritton and Thorold, all separate municipalities, are now considering this large scheme of treating their sewage and industrial waste. They will have to act separately, but they have had a joint meeting—

Mr. DUNNING: To coordinate?

Mr. LOCKHART: —to coordinate their interests. It seems to me it should be possible—

Mr. DUNNING: Provided it is self-liquidating.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is the point I am coming to. This will replace some of the old trunk sewers of these several municipalities. They have to replace them; the provincial government says they must be replaced, that this condition must be cured in some way. Each municipality will have to assume part of the cost of this main trunk sewer which is to carry the sewage in a treated condition into lake Ontario. The present system is on a basis of contributions by each one that uses it. I wished to get some direction as to whether in such a scheme as I have outlined a group of municipalities could come under the provisions of this bill by coordinating their interests.

Mr. DUNNING: We are not concerned about whether a municipality coordinates a self-liquidating project with one of another municipality; if within each of the municipalities concerned it can be demonstrated that such a project as my hon. friend outlines will be self-liquidating within the language of the section, it will qualify. Otherwise it may be possible, as mentioned by the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson), that parts of the project might be self-liquidating within the definition and other parts not. That would not, in my opinion, bar the municipality from taking advantage of this scheme for the parts that are self-liquidating. It is difficult to deal positively with a hypothetical case; I cannot speak positively about it.

Mr. HEAPS: On many occasions when requests for public expenditures were made the minister asked hon. members where the money would come from. Would he explain to the committee how the money is to be raised for the expenditure involved in this bill? Does he intend going on the open market to raise the money, or to follow the precedent adopted by the government of 1934, which expended a large sum for public works and printed new currency for it? I am not pretending to be an expert on money, but I am tempted to ask the question because of the success which apparently attended the experiment tried in 1934. I think the government still have power to issue a certain amount of currency, and if that could be done, instead of showing a deficit on the proposed scheme, I think they would actually have a profit.

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid my hon. friend cannot, on a bill of this kind, get an answer to a question on monetary policy. I would call his attention to the first words of the section now under discussion:

> The minister . . . may enter into an agreement with any municipality to make a loan or loans to such municipality out of any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund. . . .

That is the authority conferred upon the minister by this bill. I cannot indicate the manner in which the consolidated revenue fund will be replenished. I cannot indicate that there will be any change in the methods followed hitherto by the present government to replenish the consolidated revenue fund. Perhaps if my hon. friend would read my remarks of the other day with respect to the cost of this scheme to the government, he would see that there I contemplated the payment of interest upon the money by the dominion government, and that is the basis of the calculations.

Mr. HEAPS: That is why I said the government might have made a profit instead of showing a loss, as was stated by the minister, because I had in mind the remarks of the minister the other day when he introduced the resolution. Is there really any objection on the part of the government to issuing new currency, as was done in 1934?

Mr. DUNNING: I certainly will not go into a discussion of major monetary policy, Mr. Chairman, nor do I think my hon. friend really expects me to do so. He is asking what might be called a general question without expecting me to say that it would be beneficial or otherwise to Canada for so much more—so much more—or so much more than that—of money to be printed and used for this purpose. I do not feel inclined to go into a discussion of that. The management of credit and currency in the country through the central bank is being conducted on scientific lines with the best interests of the whole economy in view. A few weeks ago I indicated the manner in which that had been conducted so far, the expansion that took place in the credit base, and the general reasons underlying it. I do not think my hon. friend would expect me to go further.

Mr. HEAPS: It was done in 1934; a precedent was established then, and on that occasion I think it worked out fairly satisfactorily. All the harm that was predicted did not come about, and without knowing a great deal about the subject I still have a feeling that if the principle were extended a little on this occasion the same good results might be obtained.

Mr. ESLING: I was quite enthusiastic in connection with the former housing act, which contemplated that the municipalities would participate as lending authorities. Many of them were keen to do so, but an obstacle arose through the fact that there was no possibility of transactions taking place as between the municipal government and the federal government. At the last meeting of the union of municipalities of British Columbia a proposal was presented to have the municipal act amended to permit such transactions; but the union of municipalities had in mind the unfortunate financial position of some of the smaller municipalities, and refused to act upon the resolution.

I should like to ask in a general way what course is to be pursued by a municipality which desires to construct a complete sewerage system. It cannot do business directly with the federal government and under this act it must have the approval and guarantee of the provincial government. That municipality must have an outlet for its sewerage. In the case to which I refer the only outlet is the Columbia river, some five or six miles distant. Between the first municipality, serving about five thousand people, and the next municipality, serving about eleven thousand people, there is a district containing three or four thousand people, and there must be a trunk sewer. Some of it would be in organized municipalities, and a proportion would be in a provincial district. The question is who applies for the loan? Certainly the main portion of the trunk sewer, serving the municipalities, will be self liquidating; but there is that portion between, and the question is how that would be cared for.

Mr. DUNNING: The general credit of the municipalities otherwise might be used for those portions which would not qualify under this legislation, but certainly I do not think we can widen the definition of "self-liquidating", and at the same time leave the measure a practicable piece of legislative machinery, especially having regard to the first remarks of my hon. friend. He spoke of the experience under the old housing act, which set up municipal authorities as lenders. But no municipality has come within that provision of that old act, because the provincial legislatures, from which the municipalities derive their powers, have not empowered them to do so. As I said in my remarks on the resolution the other day, we are dealing with institutions which are wholly the creatures of the provinces. We can deal with them only in such manner as will take that into account at all times. That is why we say in this bill that the project proposed by a municipality must have both the approval of the government and its guarantee of repayment. I do not think I can add anything to that.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Securities for loans.

Mr. DUNNING: I should like this section to stand, in order to give consideration to the points which arose under the definition section, with particular reference to boards, which might involve a change in this section.

Section stands.

On section 6—Aggregate amount of loans.

Mr. HEAPS: Under this section I should like to raise the point I brought up a few moments ago, the question of the rigidity with which the bill seems to be worded. A municipality can borrow at approximately the rate of $3 per head of its population. A municipality, of say two hundred thousand people would be able to obtain a loan of about $600,000 for a project which it favoured. I do not see why the measure should be as rigid as that, and why there should not be in some section of the bill a clause providing a certain amount of flexibility where some worth while project is to be undertaken by a municipality, so that such municipality would be permitted a larger sum than is definitely provided in this measure. I think I can envisage many difficulties which might arise where a municipality of, say two hundred thousand people would require a loan of, let us say a million dollars for some good project. Under the existing bill that could not be done, and I would suggest that the minister take into serious consideration the question of developing some method so that, in a case such as I have mentioned, the amount stipulated in this bill might be increased.

Mr. DUNNING: That clause is vital. I shall be perfectly frank with my hon. friend: I do not desire and the government does not desire to be placed in a position of even appearing to discriminate between the thousands of municipalities in this country. It is all very well for my hon. friend to rise in his place in the house to-day and say, "There might be a very good project in this municipality which ought to have a larger amount allowed, and there should be some flexibility." I can well imagine what would be the situation next year when some municipality had received more than another. There would be charges of political considerations, and of influence by hon. members, and all that sort of thing. This is a case in which the government and particularly the minister desire to operate within reasonable limits fixed by statute. I really wish to have this scheme worked on an economical basis and to have political considerations of preference here and there removed as far as it may be possible to do so. If in this legislation we make it possible for one or two of our great cities to take larger amounts than their proportion of the whole population, I am afraid we shall seriously lower public confidence in the scheme. On the other hand, the exception which is provided in favour of the small municipalities is one which is, I think all hon. members will agree, very necessary in order to make it possible for small municipalities to take advantage of the legislation at all.

Mr. HEAPS: In the very last sentence of the statement the minister has just made, a form of discrimination is indicated. When you allow a small municipality, which is probably in a poorer position to take care of its obligations than is a larger one, the right to obtain $200,000 as its share of this vote, it may mean that in the small municipalities there will be allowed as much as six to ten dollars per head. In fact, at the present time there is no definition in the bill stating to what particular municipality that $200,000 limit refers; that is, the size of the municipality. It may be one having a population of two or three thousand, or it may be one with a population of ten thousand.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and while my hon. friend is objecting to my having so much discretion, he desires me to have discretion to give millions to the larger centres.

Mr. HEAPS: No.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what it looks like to me.

Mr. HEAPS: I am pointing out to the minister that although he says he does not want to discriminate between one municipality and another, the bill already contains a section of that kind. I myself have sufficient confidence in the minister—

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes!

Mr. HEAPS: —to know that he will put his approval only upon municipal projects which are self-liquidating and will produce the maximum amount of employment. Although I come from a large municipality and I do not know whether it will be able to take advantage of the provisions of this bill, I would not have the slightest objection to the minister and the Department of Finance being given discretion to allow, under certain circumstances, larger appropriations to be made.

Mr. DUNNING: What circumstances?

Mr. HEAPS: Where the project is shown to be desirable.

Mr. DUNNING: What circumstances would the hon. member write into the law?

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know how I would put it in the law.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the trouble.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not pretend to be a lawyer.

Mr. DUNNING: It does not require a lawyer.

Mr. HEAPS: I think that discretion might be given to the Minister of Finance or to the treasury board—whichever he cares to put into the bill—that under certain circumstances, where a larger amount is required, it may be granted.

Mr. DUNNING: But surely my hon. friend can state the circumstances. If he would do so, possibly I could—

Mr. HEAPS: Surely. I will give the circumstances which were referred to by one of the previous speakers. There was the case of the Welland canal area, where they considered having a joint undertaking by a number of municipalities, and where they were allowed $50,000; but if the amount were $150,000, it would not be sufficient to take care of what is possibly a very necessary as well as a self-liquidating project. I suggest that if, under circumstances of that kind, the larger amount were appropriated by the government, it would be doing a very wise thing and one to which no objection could be taken.

Mr. ESLING: With which government will the municipality do business—the federal government or the provincial government? It must have the guarantee of the provincial government, and I think it will be found that the municipality must give a chattel mortgage to the federal government. You have two governments concerned.

Mr. DUNNING: Under what statute is that?

Mr. ESLING: Is there not a clause in this bill providing for a chattel mortgage to the federal government for any project which the municipality undertakes? I think so.

Mr. LAWSON: Not a chattel mortgage.

Mr. DUNNING: No; there is no provision for a chattel mortgage.

Mr. ESLING: Oh, I think so.

Mr. LAWSON: "Chattel mortgage" only in the sense, I might suggest to the hon. member, in which a debenture might cover chattels incidental to the work or the project.

Mr. ESLING: Since the provincial government must guarantee.

Mr. DUNNING: The provincial government must guarantee, but there is in addition the power given to the minister to take a mortgage or a hypothec on the particular utility, but that is merely a permissive power in order to enable the minister to deal with cases where the law of the province may be such as to render that security more desirable than some other type.

Mr. LAWSON: I would question the wisdom of and suggest to the minister that he reconsider the soundness of the principle which he enunciated here a few moments ago, of basing the limit of contribution on a ratio of population. The primary purpose of this bill as I understand it is to relieve unemployment or to create employment, and population in municipalities may have no relation in the world to the number of unemployed in any municipality. I think we know from experience that a much larger ratio of population is unemployed in the large centres than in the smaller centres of population. Surely that is so. I have listened in this chamber to members of the government explaining why we have this difficulty with the unemployed in British Columbia. In Vancouver they are congregated from all over Canada and particularly from all parts of British Columbia. I believe that every census which has been taken, including the census of the employment commission, indicates that the proportion of unemployed to population is much greater in the larger centres than in the smaller. If the primary purpose of this bill is to provide employment, surely the basis on which a limitation of contribution or loan to any particular municipality should be fixed is the ratio of unemployed to the population in the particular place, rather than the population of a particular place to the whole population of Canada. I suggest that the minister might seriously consider that point.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Just following that, I might point out to the minister that the percentage of unemployable in the country and the small towns is twenty per cent, while in the cities the percentage of that type of unemployed is only five per cent.

Mr. KENNEDY: I am wondering how the minister can tell when to give the smaller municipality a larger loan. For instance, if it is on a per capita basis, you will have to wait a certain time to tell whether any municipality is going to take advantage of the loan. Is there a time limitation upon a municipality taking advantage of the provisions of this bill before you allow the smaller municipalities to take loans up to the $200,000 limit?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no time limit.

Mr. KENNEDY: Every municipality may be given an opportunity of obtaining a loan, but how long are you going to extend that privilege before you start to divide the surplus?

Mr. DUNNING: We will deal with all applications as they come in until the $30,000,000 is exhausted. I do not expect to have the financial problem my hon. friend points out. It must be remembered that the relationship is to the total population of Canada. It is expected that there will be large areas in Canada which in the nature of things cannot take advantage of this legislation, and I am quite sure that I shall have sufficient leeway to be able to take care of the small municipalities that will want the limit of $200,000 without in any way impairing the ability of the larger ones to secure what may be needed. I may tell my hon. friend that I would be pleased—I speak for myself alone, if a minister ever can speak for himself alone—to see such a development in schemes of this sort within the next twelve months as to involve the necessity of my coming back to parliament and saying that more money is needed and should be voted. I am reasonably sure the difficulty anticipated by the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Kennedy) will not arise.

Mr. HEAPS: Could the minister define just what is meant by a small municipality?

Mr. DUNNING: It is defined automatically. My hon. friend will note these words, "a loan not exceeding two hundred thousand dollars may be made to any municipality of whatever population." If we take the rule of thumb of $3 per head being the approximate amount, a municipality of 60,000 population would be entitled to only $180,000. Nevertheless, such a municipality will be able to obtain up to $200,000. By that method of computation, a municipality of 10,000 population would be able to get only $30,000; but if the other conditions are satisfactory, it will be able to obtain up to $200,000. The small municipality is defined by the break point of $200,000. I may tell my hon. friend that the figure in the first draft bill was $250,000, but it seemed to me that was too high a limit. Putting the break point at $200,000 means that municipalities with populations below 60,000 will be able to get $200,000. If we carried the other computation below that point, we would reach a figure which would be of no use at all.

Mr. ESLING: Would it not save the minister a great deal to make these loans directly to the provinces? The province has the last word. It does not make any difference how generously disposed the minister may be; if the provincial government does not approve the project and is not willing to guarantee the loan, that is the end of it.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think we should make loans to the provinces to carry on this class of work. The dominion is making these loans for the purpose of enabling municipalities to carry out self-liquidating projects to relieve unemployment. We must have as much control of expenditures as our constitutional position will permit. I believe that is the general view of the members of this house. We have attempted in this measure to conserve the right of this parliament over the disposition of moneys voted, and at the same time conserve the autonomy of the provinces in acknowledging their powers within their own field.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Limitation of time.

Mr. BENNETT: Is this section absolutely necessary in view of the fact that there is a limit of $30,000,000? As soon as that is gone, the minister can no longer make loans. Why is it necessary to say that the governor in council may at any time fix and determine the date? Does that mean that before the $30,000,000 is expended, the governor in council may say that there is to be no more money expended? It is open to that construction?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; it does mean that. I shall be frank with my right hon. friend. This bill is one of several in which the same provision will appear. It is considered that under the conditions which prevail to-day it is desirable that the governor in council should have the definite power to stop expenditures.

Mr. BENNETT: I just wanted to have it clear.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Staff and salaries.

Mr. BENNETT: An hon. gentleman sitting beside me said the other day that surely there was staff enough in this city to take care of all requirements without adding a single person to the payroll of this country. I think the minister should say that this new work will be carried on by existing staffs in Ottawa.

Mr. DUNNING: Not in the Finance department.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. DUNNING: I think my right hon. friend will acknowledge that.

Mr. BENNETT: Some of the work has been taken over by the Bank of Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: The staff went over to the bank.

Mr. BENNETT: This raises the old political question. There will be a couple of hundred applications in the hands of the minister at an early date, and perhaps my estimate is too small. There should be no difficulty about using existing staffs without adding to the payroll of this country. This work could be taken care of by a little judicious cooperation between departments. The civil service commission have lists of temporaries who are being released from time to time.

Mr. DUNNING: We could not take advantage of those temporaries without having the authority contained here. I would point out to my right hon. friend that this provision is necessary in all of these schemes. It was necessary with the Dominion Housing Act to make provision for a staff. However, I am rather proud of my reputation for staff parsimony. The Dominion Housing Act and the home improvement plan have been carried on with a staff of seven, if my memory serves me aright.

Mr. BENNETT: There are very few people needed in Ottawa in connection with the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. Most of the work is outside Ottawa.

Mr. DUNNING: I should like to have this latitude because I think it would be difficult to operate without it. I appreciate the force of my right hon. friend's remarks, and I intend to draft for such work any who may be free to come from other places.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Orders and regulations.

Mr. BENNETT: I wonder if the minister would not think it desirable to insert a paragraph in terms similar to that we inserted in a bill of the Minister of Transport the other evening, that regulations made hereunder should be published in the Gazette and have the force of law a given number of days after they have been published. I am only giving the minister the benefit of my own actual experience. It is unfair to ask people to be bound by regulations of which they have had no means of knowledge, and which have become effective without having been published in any way and with no time given to the public to understand what they mean. We made it ten days, I think, in connection with the bill of the Minister of Transport. He thought it was reasonable and I think it is.

Mr. DUNNING: The only objection I would have is on account of the different nature of the regulations which are here involved. Would any good object, for example, be served by publishing in the Gazette the form of agreement?

Mr. BENNETT: It might be very useful. I would point out to the minister this, if he will permit me to do so. I arrived at this conclusion in my short experience, that any order in council which has the effect of law under a statute should be published.

Mr. DUNNING: But a detailed agreement in the Gazette?

Mr. BENNETT: If it is going to have the force of law under a statute, I have no doubt that it should be published. The old practice was always to have the agreement appear as a schedule. Then we went further and said that the governor in council had the power to do it. Then we cut the Gazette out entirely, and the result is that you issue orders which have the effect of law and with respect to which the public knows nothing, and without the average citizen having an opportunity to know anything about it. I am sorry to say that, but I am saying it in the light of my own experience, and not directed against any government.

Mr. DUNNING: You have read Lord Hewart's book, too.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but of course you could not conduct government in England unless you had recourse to certain discretionary powers being exercised by the treasury and other bodies. But this is a little different. This is a case in which you authorize a body of men to discharge really legislative duties without affording any opportunity to the people affected to know what the legislation is. That part of the criticism of Lord Hewart I think is fair criticism. We used to publish in the Gazette all agreements, and it may be very important to citizens and ratepayers to have an opportunity to see what kind of agreement you are making. It is important that the general form of agreement should be known.

Mr. DUNNING: The general form, yes. But the agreement with any municipality?

Mr. BENNETT: They are all the same.

Mr. DUNNING: They could not be, of course.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 9 gives the governor in council power by order or regulation to:

(a) determine the form of the agreement between any municipality and the minister;
(b) determine the form of the guarantee to be given by a provincial government.

That is very important:

(c) prescribe the conditions under and the manner in which the proceeds of a loan may be advanced to a municipality.

[Mr. Dunning.]

That would be an arbitrary exercise of power applicable to all. It might be 10, 20 or 30 per cent. It is important, in order to allay suspicion and to ensure public confidence, that you should know from the regulations that all municipalities are receiving the same treatment, and I say frankly to the minister that he knows that is so. And then:

(d) make provision for any other matters concerning which orders or regulations are deemed necessary or desirable to carry out the purposes and intentions of this act.

Mr. BENNETT: That is one of those basket subclauses,

Mr. DUNNING: That you have to have but do not want to use.

Mr. BENNETT: If you are in opposition you object to anyone else using it, but in office you use it.

Mr. DUNNING: We will let section 9 stand so that I shall have an opportunity to give consideration to the points raised by my right hon. friend. I should say to him that the form of agreement between any municipality and the minister was put in, in that sense, because it was contemplated that there would have to be a great variety of agreements and it might be very difficult to evolve a standard form, and if we did not evolve a standard form we might have to put in the Gazette the details of a special agreement with, say, a small municipality on Vancouver island or in Prince Edward Island. But I appreciate the motive of my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not say that some of these agreements cannot be varied.

Mr. DUNNING: I should like the section to stand for consideration from the point of view of publication of essential information in the Gazette.

Mr. BENNETT: Information that controls the exercise of the law-making power.

Section stands.

On section 10—Report to parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the calendar year is better than the fiscal year. As things now stand, the report would cover the fiscal year ending March 31, 1939, and next year it would be received by the house within fifteen days after the beginning of the session. But that will be next year. It is not a case like the auditor general's report. The auditor general's report at the present time is of no use to us at all in the sense of giving us information during the session of parliament for which we are here. I noticed that once or twice the minister has used the word "calendar" instead of "fiscal" year; and if you made this the calendar year we would next session get the report on what was done up to the end of 1938, and then the following year we would have a report for the complete calendar year. I forget which one it was, but in connection with one other matter it was found of great advantage to make it the calendar year.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL REVENUE

Customs and excise division—General administration, $1,106,150.

Mr. STIRLING: There seems to have been a considerable alteration in the number of those employed and a general increase in the total. Would the minister give a description of what the alterations amount to?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): It has already been given. The information was given some months ago.

Mr. STIRLING: The item has already been called?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Then, do not do it twice.

Mr. ILSLEY: It will be found fully dealt with in Hansard of February 15.

Mr. BENNETT: This is an item that covers the whole administration of the department in question. Would the minister indicate in a few brief sentences the extent to which seasonal duties are maintained, and the extent to which the dumping duties are being operated, if at all, in his department? Would he give us at the same time a general idea regarding rebates? Unfortunately, as perhaps the minister knows, the auditor general's report, upon which we must rely, does not afford us any information subsequently to March 31, 1937, and inasmuch as we dealt with estimates in this house in 1937, we are, in the auditor general's report, dealing with something that has already been disposed of by the house. Hence I am emboldened to ask him now as to the general principles under which the administration is now carrying on with respect to the matters to which I have referred.

Mr. ILSLEY: The first matter to which the right hon. gentleman has referred is that of seasonal duties. Seasonal duties relate only to fruits and vegetables, and the system in force, as has been explained to the committee on several occasions, is that at certain times in the year, when the competition of United States fruits and vegetables is particularly serious, valuations for duty purposes are fixed by the Minister of National Revenue acting under the authority of an order in council that was passed some years ago. The values that are fixed are for the most part regional and for the most part, if not wholly, seasonal. The reason they are regional is that the season varies for different parts of Canada, and there are times when it would be very inconvenient and undesirable for United States fruits and vegetables to be shut out of certain parts of the dominion, even though it might be desirable for some action to be taken with respect to them in other parts of the country. For that reason the country, for administrative purposes, is divided into three districts: one comprising the four western provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba; another being the provinces of Ontario and Quebec; and the third, the maritime provinces. Sometimes values are fixed for the whole nine provinces, sometimes for the four western provinces and not for the others, sometimes for the two central provinces and not for the others, and so on, depending upon the supplies available in these districts. I believe the practice is well understood by the members of the house.

For a great many years there has been considerable dispute as to the application of fixed values and seasonal duties, and there have been many experiments looking to the best method of giving the fruit and vegetable growers of British Columbia, the central provinces and the maritime provinces reasonable protection without at the same time imposing undue hardship upon the importers, who must import large quantities of fruits and vegetables at all times. Since this government has been in office the Minister of Finance has stated on several occasions, as I too have done, that we carry on the protection of the fruit and vegetable growers in as reasonable a way as we can by this method. The duties have been reduced as compared with those which were imposed by the previous administration. At the time of the negotiations with the United States, when the trade agreement was entered into, it was provided that advances on invoices should in no single instance be more than 80 per cent of the smallest advance made during the three previous years, and that has been carried out and more than carried out. In a number of instances they are not more than 60 per cent, and in one case not more than 40 per cent. Great care is given to the periods during which these values are imposed, and equal care is given to the amount of the advance that is regarded as proper.

The next subject on which the right hon. gentleman asked me to say a few words is that of dumping duties.

Mr. BENNETT: And their application.

Mr. ILSLEY: Dumping duties date from about 1907.

Mr. BENNETT: From 1906-07.

Mr. ILSLEY: And the principles are now well understood by importers and producers in Canada. The section which provides for the collection of special or dumping duty is section 6 of the customs tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: Much modified since it was first passed.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; there have been amendments from time to time. But the principle which underlies the application and collection of dumping duties is this, that if the price at which the goods are purchased by the importer is less than the fair home market value, the difference between the invoice price and the fair home market value of the goods is collected in the way of special or dumping duty. But there is a provision that the amount collected shall in no case exceed 50 per cent of the value of the goods for duty purposes. There are various other provisions; that is the general principle. This applies only to goods of a class or kind produced in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: That principle may be said to underlie the whole structure of dumping duties?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The question I particularly wanted the minister to deal with was that which arises out of the determination of market value. It will be recalled that there was a reference before the tariff board—I saw something of it in the press; I have not had time to read the details—as to what price should be taken as the market price. That is, I buy in carload lots; someone else buys in smaller lots, and some other person buys in some other kind of lots. For the purpose of determining whether or not dumping duties should be paid, what is the governing price?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no problem more difficult than that. The practice of the department for years has been this: The trade status of the importer is first ascertained. If the importer is a consumer, the value for duty is the fair home market price as paid by consumers in the country of origin. If the importer is a retailer, the value taken for duty purposes is the price paid in the principal markets of the country of origin by retailers. If the importer is a wholesaler, the value taken for duty purposes is the price paid by wholesalers in the country of origin. If the importer is a distributor—

Mr. BENNETT: Or jobber.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I do not know the difference between jobbers and wholesalers. I take them as meaning the same. But there is a trade status known as distributor, and distributors ordinarily are able to purchase goods at a lower price than wholesalers. If the importer is a distributor, the practice of the department has been to allow him to import at the distributor's price in the country of origin. In some instances there is no distributor in the country of origin; all the sales are to wholesalers, or perhaps to retailers or consumers. But the conditions are such that the merchandising of the goods through distributors in this country is the natural and proper way in which they should be merchandised. In that case we allow what are called distributors' discounts; there are a few such cases. We are authorized to do that under section 41 of the Customs Act.

I must say that the practice of the department has been challenged. A recent case before the tariff board has brought all the principles under review. A recent decision of the board—

Mr. BENNETT: In what case?

Mr. ILSLEY: The insulating board case.

Mr. BENNETT: Has there been a decision?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The decision was that in that particular case the fair market value must be taken to be the price at which the greatest volume of goods moved into consumption in the country of origin.

Mr. BENNETT: Could be purchased by anybody in that country?

Mr. THORSON: The greatest volume.

Mr. ILSLEY: I must say I do not know what interpretation to put on the decision. If we divide the goods into five classes in that particular instance, in the country of origin perhaps 35 to 40 per cent are sold to wholesalers; those sales are greater than to any other single class. The meaning of the decision probably is that we must take as the value for duty the price to the wholesalers in the country of origin because it is to that class of purchaser that the greatest volume of goods is sold. But it may be that the decision means something else entirely. It may be that the board had in mind two classes only, putting in one class the wholesalers and retail lumber dealers, who are almost wholesalers; they sell to contractors who in turn use the product in the building of houses. If that is what the tariff board meant, then we have wholesalers and retail dealers in one class. The sales to them hover around 50 per cent, and the application of the decision of the board may depend upon whether more or less than 50 per cent is sold to that class of wholesalers and lumber dealers.

Mr. BENNETT: Why would that follow?

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the decision uses the term "wholesalers and jobbers," but possibly they mean wholesalers and dealers or jobbers and dealers. The reason given in the decision is that, more than half of the output being sold to these classes of purchasers, they constitute the principal market in the country of origin; and when section 35 refers to the sale in the principal markets of the country of origin, it means to the largest class of purchasers. If we adopt that principle for value in the future, it will make some change in the practice of the department. But I am glad to say that the tariff board was very careful to point out that they were not laying down a general principle but simply saying that in that particular instance they think the "fair home market value in the principal markets" means the price at which the greatest volume of goods moves into consumption.

Mr. BENNETT: I am obliged to the minister. Some people resident in the constituency I have the honour to represent were interested in a motion which has been pending in this house since February 16 in connection with the application of the customs tariff by the officers and clerks of the Department of National Revenue. I was not aware that the insulating board case had been decided until the minister was good enough to say so. The effect of that decision I understand to be that the market price which has to be considered in determining whether or not dumping duty should be applied is the price at which the largest volume of that commodity was being sold in that country and could be purchased by anyone who qualified as a purchaser. That would be correct?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; that is it exactly.

Mr. BENNETT: Then it would seem to me that if this rule were applied reasonably, it would prevent the inquiries that have been going on as to whether John Smith was just a casual purchaser or whether he was a purchaser of ten gross or of a thousand gross, we will say, of a given commodity. The only matter that should be inquired into when I lodge my invoice with the department is whether or not I actually could buy that commodity in the market of origin at the price indicated.

Mr. THORSON: Buyers in the same category.

Mr. BENNETT: No; that is what I want to get away from. That is what I want to find out about, because that is the matter about which there has been so much difficulty. I buy goods in New York to-morrow; I come to the customs house here and hand in my invoice showing that I bought them at a store on Broadway, and showing what I paid for them. The department says, "We want dumping duty from you, Mr. Bennett." I say, "You are not entitled to dumping duty, because I bought those goods at the price at which anybody else could buy them in that store on Broadway, and therefore the section does not apply." That is the contention I want to put fairly up to the minister, as it is put up to me by those who are interested in the matter in the part of the country in which I live.

Have I made myself clear? I purchase a bill of goods in a store in New York; I get my invoice and hand it in here, and I am told, "Oh, no, you cannot have that at that rate; you have to pay dumping duty." But I say, "I am not going to pay dumping duty; you have no right to ask me for it." Then the official says, "Let us see. Are you a retailer or a consumer, or what are you?" I say, "That is none of your business. I bought these goods, and anybody else could buy them in that community for exactly the same price. Therefore I have come within the statute; that is the market price at which those goods can be bought in that community." I am talking about the legislation as it now stands; I am not saying what it might be. That is the position taken by those who are keenly and deeply interested. They say, "This statute does not allow them to do this; this statute does not permit officials to make inquiries," and it will be remembered that the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Ross), in his resolution of February 16, dealt with that particular phase of the matter, and in a moment I am going to say something about another phase of it.

How do we find ourselves, in the administration of this act, authorized to take dumping duties from an importer when he has bought his goods at a price at which, Smith, Jones and Brown in New York can buy them on the same day in the same store? Surely we cannot take a dumping duty in that case; yet I know of instances that have been brought to my attention in which the department have been saying, "You have to pay dumping duty, because you are not the same type and class of purchaser as the other person who bought them in New York." I say that is not your business; if these men can walk into a store in New York and buy those goods at the same price. I buy them for that price; it is on my invoice, and I pay my duty on that price. In that statute there is no power given to enable the department to exact a dumping duty from me.

I am putting this to the minister because it is not a conjectural case; it is the position that is put to me, that the law does not authorize it. I apologize for taking time on it; but it is a vital matter to people who find themselves coming across the border, who are not within the exemption, and who are paying duty from day to day. I remember how bitter was the complaint in one instance, and on inquiry I found that this citizen who was importing these goods was paying exactly the price that Smith, Jones and Brown would pay for these goods in that store in New York, although it may be said that Smith, Brown and Jones bought in larger volume than my friend did. But I say, under the law as it stands, that is not the concern of the department. They have one question to decide; that is whether I bought these goods honestly and openly for what was the market price of those goods in that city, and "market price" means the price at which the goods could be marketed by the seller to a buyer in that city. Have I made myself clear?

Mr. ILSLEY: The right hon. gentleman has made himself perfectly clear, and I agree as to the importance of the question he has raised. I am not at all sure just what the act does authorize the department to do, but I am of a contrary opinion to the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps if the minister has the section before him, he might read it in order that I might better follow his observations.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is section 35. Needless to say, I have given a great deal of thought to this very matter. I do not know whether the right hon. gentleman is expressing these views as his own or whether he is putting forth what might be a reasonable interpretation of the act and suggesting that he would like me to give my views on it. I do not agree with that construction of the act. When the right hon. gentleman goes into a store in New York and buys goods which he brings to the border, or which he has sent to him, we are confronted with the duty of ascertaining whether he has paid the fair market value of the goods when sold for home consumption in the principal markets of the country of origin, which would be the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: That is why I selected New York.

Mr. ILSLEY: In order to give a reasonable and workable interpretation of that section, we must take sales under substantially similar conditions to purchasers in the United States. I think that is the only reasonable interpretation which can be placed on the act. We ask ourselves: What do United States purchasers pay for those goods when they go into a store in New York and buy them?

Mr. BENNETT: In my illustration they went into that store that day, bought these goods and paid the price I paid for them. The minister perhaps did not follow me. I bought my goods in New York. Brown, Smith and Jones bought their goods in New York in the same store on the same day, and paid for them x price. I paid the same x price. It is true that the price which Jones, Smith and Brown paid was a price which they paid because they bought in large volume in the United States, but it is also true that I was given that same price; and having been given that price, that was the market price in that city to United States citizens for those goods.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, but not to United States citizens generally.

Mr. BENNETT: Where is there anything like that in the act?

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not say it, but I say the section must be interpreted in that way; otherwise it is entirely unworkable.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 35 states:

1. Whenever any duty ad valorem is imposed on any goods imported into Canada, the value for duty shall be the fair market value thereof, when sold for home consumption, in the principal markets of the country whence and at the time when the same were exported directly to Canada.

2. In the case of importations of goods the manufacture or produce of a foreign country, the currency of which is substantially depreciated, the value for duty shall not be less than the value that would be placed on similar goods manufactured or produced in Great Britain and imported from that country, if such similar goods are made or produced there.

3. If similar goods are not made or produced in Great Britain, the value for duty shall not be less than the value of similar goods made or produced in any European country the currency of which is not substantially depreciated.

4. The minister may determine the value of such goods, and the value so determined shall, until otherwise provided, be the value upon which the duty on such goods shall be computed and levied under regulations prescribed by the minister.

The first subsection is the one in which we are interested; that is:

Whenever any duty ad valorem is imposed on any goods imported into Canada, the value for duty shall be the fair market value thereof, when sold for home consumption, in the principal markets of the country whence and at the time when the same were exported directly to Canada.

This was brought to my attention by an importer, and as a matter of fact I did turn up this section. I have no excuse to give him when he tells me that they gave him a price in New York which was the same price that Jones and Smith and Brown paid for those goods.

Mr. ILSLEY: What was the status of the sellers? Were they manufacturers or wholesalers?

Mr. BENNETT: They were wholesalers. There are two lines of cases, both of which have been presented to me, but for the sake of this discussion I had better deal with the wholesaler rather than the manufacturer. I will deal with the manufactured goods in another way. I am not talking about what the statute should say; I am talking of what it does say. The minister appreciates that point. Jones and Smith and Brown were ahead of me in that store on Broadway, that wholesale shop. They bought an invoice of goods. I was there; I saw their invoices, and I said to them, "Is this the price you paid without discount or anything else, buying these goods in the United States"? And they answered, "Yes, that is what we paid." "It is not a fire sale; it is a regular sale by this wholesaler"? "Yes." I say to the clerk, "I want an invoice of ten dozen of these goods." "Well, the price should be a little higher than that, should it not"? he will probably say to me; "you are going to use them here"? That has been said to me. I say, "No; I am taking them out of this country." "Well, then, you can have the same price as is paid by the Americans who use them in this country." It is within the knowledge of the minister that sometimes they offer to shade the price, but we are not talking about shading the price. They give me my invoice for exactly the same price. My contention is that when my goods reach this city and I go down to the long room with my invoice, as the law now stands there is no power given to the Dominion of Canada to take any more money from me by way of duty than upon the computation of the price which is in that invoice, because it is established that three people bought those goods at the same price for use and consumption in the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: Re-sale. Undoubtedly, in the case put, the Americans bought the goods for re-sale. They were retailers buying from a wholesaler.

Mr. BENNETT: They come within this, "the fair market price for home consumption," at any rate.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, well, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: It may be that cases might arise which necessitate a change in the law; but just where an official of this country is given a right to say to me or to my friends, "Although you bought your goods at the same price as that which Jones and Smith and Brown paid for theirs, and although they are using theirs in the United States and you have taken yours to Canada, I shall ask you to pay a dumping duty or an increased duty on them," I do not know; I say I cannot find it in the four corners of the statute. If it is desired to put it there, it should be put there. I take it that that was what was in the mind of the mover of the resolution with respect to this matter. The minister asks me my opinion with respect to it. I am bound to say that when I read the discussion which took place in the newspapers with respect to insulating board I was rather surprised. I could not think that there is anything in the statute which permits officials of the department to go beyond the language of the act. There is nothing there about volume or substantial conditions or anything else; it is the fair market price paid by consumers or purchasers in that country.

Let me now take the retail case, which brings it nearer home. I have known, as most hon. members of this committee have, people who sometimes secure bargains, very great bargains, on a bargain day in one of the large New York stores. My contention is that, under the law as it stands, there is no authority in this country to take from me a larger duty than the invoice calls for, because that was a bargain sale that everybody could avail themselves of, and it was a retail sale. That is the position which I hope I have made perfectly clear to the minister. I am bound to say I believe that if it is desired to apply some other principle, the statute should be amended, because I do not believe that, under the terms of the statute as it stands, that power is there. That is the submission I have to make.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would probably be desirable to have the act clarified in some way, because the dispute which took place over insulating board showed that the problem was very difficult, and I do not know whether the reasons given by the department for the practice were altogether valid or sound.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is only fair to say that the practice is nothing new; it did not arise since the minister took office.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think the practice of the department is authorized by the section. I shall try to explain why I think so, although I may not meet the right hon. gentleman point by point.

The duty of our appraisers is to "ascertain, estimate and appraise"—those are the words —the fair market value of the goods when sold for home consumption, and so on. Now there will be several fair market values of those goods in the country of origin.

Mr. BENNETT: And I say that Canadians can always take the lowest.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; they will likely get the lowest, because the sale will be made in that way and there will not be any undesirable consequences to the sellers; that is the reason they will get the lowest. But sometimes there will be three levels, each of which is the fair market value of the goods when sold for home consumption, depending upon what? Upon the status or class of the purchaser. That is what it depends upon.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; but the statute does not say so.

Mr. ILSLEY: As yet I am a thousand miles from what the statute says. I am simply stating what the facts are. The facts are that, taking that area in the United States in which he has bought the goods he will find certainly two and probably three price levels ordinarily prevalent. If the man is a consumer, he will find he has to pay so much for the hat or whatever it is; if he is a retailer, he will have to pay a lower price; and if he is a wholesaler, he need only pay still less.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: And if I am fortunate enough to buy at the lowest of the three prices, I am penalized for doing so.

Mr. ILSLEY: The right hon. gentleman is not logical there. He has branched off on to a matter of policy when we are discussing at the moment a question of law, and law only. We can reach the question of policy later. What I am saying is that in the case I have put there are three levels of prices. How are our officers going to determine what is the fair home market value of these goods for customs purposes? Well, there is only one way if the section is to be operated at all, and that is to consider what class the purchaser was in; what his status was in purchasing. We have to consider what the price would be under similar conditions, that is, the fair home market value so far as that particular instance is concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what the statute says.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a reasonable interpretation to place upon the statute, just as reasonable as the right hon. gentleman's interpretation. Why does the right hon. gentleman say that the price he paid as a consumer buying from a wholesaler was the fair home market value, when the fair home market value to consumers, to people in the same position as he, was so much higher? It is our duty to find out how much higher that price is. When we find out how much they are paying, then we know what is the fair home market value. That is the reason why that rule has been adopted by the department. The right hon. gentleman says that he is penalized because he buys these articles. Of course he is because that is the principle of the dumping clause. It has been debated for thirty years whether it is fair to penalize buyers for buying too low in a foreign country. The principle is settled, and observations of that kind are off the track.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will observe that I did not make any objection to the dumping clause. I have supported it too many times. Perhaps the hon. gentleman was not always as warm in his support as I was.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not warm about it; I am simply arguing a legal point.

Mr. BENNETT: I said he was not as warm in his support of the dumping duty as I have been. The principle of the dumping duty is not quite as the hon. gentleman states. The principle of the dumping duty was to protect us against surplus products being dumped on our market at prices that bore no relation to the market value. I could give case after case. Here is a factory which sells 80 per cent of its production at home. It may be that in order to keep the factory going at full time, the remaining 20 per cent of the production is sold at a 30 per cent discount under what it is being sold for in the United States. I think Mr. Fielding was the father of the dumping duty. I remember reading his speech about it and thinking it was a very fair statement of the situation.

Let me give another illustration. There is a great sale going on in New York, to last all this week. I go down there, and as one of a million other people I buy certain goods at a tremendously low price. I cannot find any authority in the statute that will enable this government or the officials of this department to charge any rate of duty that may be called a dumping duty with respect to those goods. The price I paid was the fair market price. You say, "That is not the fact." Of course you say it is not the fact. It is the old story that was dealt with by the price spreads committee. It is a matter of selling goods to clear them out and thereby make it difficult for the smaller retailer to continue in business. I am only pointing out to the minister that however laudable it may be—he will observe I have been careful not to say it was not—there is no provision in the statute that enables this to be done. These are not importers I am talking about; these are people who went across the line and bought goods in a store on Fifth avenue or Broadway. But they found they could not get the goods through on the invoice price because they were told it was a bargain sale. The fact is that this was the price at which anyone could buy them.

Mr. ILSLEY: The right hon. gentleman is talking about a purely theoretical case. It would be news to me if we had ever attempted to collect a dumping duty from a consumer because of the price he paid in the country of origin.

Mr. BENNETT: I will admit he did not consume them all.

Mr. ILSLEY: The right hon. gentleman spoke about going down to a bargain sale and being asked to pay a dumping duty. That has never happened in the history of the department.

Mr. BENNETT: Not as against an individual consumer, but I am talking about a consumer who purchases more than his own requirements. Some he gives away, and he lets somebody else reimburse him in connection with some of the rest. I must say that I do not believe the department has any right under that statute to charge any more than the invoice price.

Mr. HEAPS: The question of insulite products has been mentioned during the course of this discussion, and possibly the minister might be in position to give the committee further details in this connection. I have in my hand a communication which I received from a firm of distributors in the city of Winnipeg who are protesting strongly against the new regulations put into effect with regard to the valuation. Possibly if I read this communication it would explain the situation much better than I could. It is from D. Ackland and Son, Limited, under the date of May 19, 1938, and reads:

> A further development has taken place in regard to the importation of insulite products, a matter which the writer took up with you a short time ago.
> It is evident that there has been pressure brought to bear by eastern Canadian manufacturers to have the value for duty purposes of insulite products raised, and we are given to understand that a recommendation to this effect has been made to the Minister of National Revenue by the tariff board. This is a reversal of a ruling made by the tariff board about one year ago.
> This affects very considerably the consumers of these products in western Canada, inasmuch as we—in conjunction with other distributors in the west and the Insulite Company—were able to reduce the price of insulite products, effective March 19, 1938, and it was necessary for eastern manufacturers, in order to compete, to lower their prices. This, naturally, does not please them and the pressure they have brought to bear is the result.
> When you take into consideration the fact that duty and excise tax on these products amount to 28¾ per cent and in the face of this we are able to import these products from United States, make a satisfactory profit and still reduce the price to the dealer and consumer, it is very apparent that eastern manufacturers are either away behind in their manufacturing methods or are making an exhorbitant profit.
> We think the action taken to increase the value for duty purposes entirely unfair to both the Insulite Company and western Canadian distributors and consumers.

Perhaps the minister is able to give the committee some more information about this particular case. Evidently this regulation is working a hardship upon those who are compelled to buy this product from the western distributors. I am not in a position to say anything with regard to the definite statements made in this communication as to representations made by the eastern manufacturers to the government or the tariff board. I should like to have from the minister the real reasons that lay behind the tariff board giving a ruling for an increase in the duty on this particular commodity. Also, can he advise whether the western distributors were able to purchase these goods in the United States at the fair market price at which they were being sold in that country?

Mr. ILSLEY: The letter just read by the hon. gentleman contains certain inaccuracies or misstatements. In the first place, the tariff board has made only one decision. It did not make the decision a year ago which was at variance with the present decision. That decision was made by the department applying the principle which I have just tried to state to the leader of the opposition. The decision was that the value for duty purposes to the Canadian distributors, of which there are two, one in western and one in eastern Canada, should be the price at which the manufacturer sold to the two distributors in the United States, one being on the west coast and one in one of the gulf states. There was considerable difference between the price to the distributors in the United States and the price to the wholesalers.

When the department came to the decision it did and gave the ruling it did, the Canadian Manufacturers immediately protested very strongly because they said that as only a small proportion, less than 15 per cent, of the output of this particular product was sold in the United States to distributors, that price was not a fair home market price in the markets of the country of origin; that those markets were not the principal markets, and they went to the tariff board to have the matter decided. The tariff board heard argument upon it, deliberated, and finally delivered its decision that the department was wrong; that the price we had taken as the fair home market price was not the home market price but a special price given on a small part of the product to two distributors in the United States in consideration of certain services which the distributors performed, and that the price which we should take as the value should be the price at which the greater part of the product moved in the country of origin. There is an ambiguity in the board's decision, I think, and because of that ambiguity, as I tried to explain to the leader of the opposition a few minutes ago, we have not as yet made any change in our ruling. We are prepared to accept the finding of the tariff board, but we are in great doubt how to apply it. We do not know how to apply it, and until the decision of the tariff board is clarified in some way or another, either by reargument or otherwise, we do not intend to change the present ruling of the department.

[Mr. Heaps.]

When the correspondent of the hon. gentleman says that effect has recently been given to the finding of the tariff board, he is incorrect. Effect has not been given to it, although it has been approved by myself as minister in the normal course as the decision of a judicial body.

I do not like to let go unchallenged the statement that pressure was brought by eastern manufacturers. In a sense pressure is brought by everybody who goes to the department or the tariff board. We have representations continually from the two conflicting interests, those of the importers and those of the Canadian manufacturers. It would have been much better if the hon. gentleman's correspondent had said that application was made and argument heard before the tariff board, as a result of which they came to a decision. It is a carefully reasoned judicial decision, and the declaration of the tariff board is this:

> The insulating board under consideration in this appeal should be appraised for duty purposes on the basis of the prices at which the greatest volume of the exporter's production moves into consumption in the home market.

Mr. HEAPS: If such is the ruling of the tariff board on importations of this commodity, would not the same ruling apply to every other commodity that is imported into Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: Conditions vary so greatly that it is almost impossible to answer that question in the affirmative. I would not care to answer it in the affirmative. It may apply in one case and not in another.

Mr. HEAPS: The tariff board evidently claim in the decision they gave in regard to insulite that the value for duty purposes should be based on the price at which the largest volume of the goods was sold in the United States.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: If that is their decision, would it not be precedent in regard to other commodities as well? I am wondering if there are not many similar cases of goods being brought into this country where you would not have to increase the value for duty purposes. Personally I think a hardship is worked in this case because the manufacturers have quite a substantial protection already, 28¾ per cent, and on top of that there is the haul of four hundred miles from Minneapolis to Winnipeg, which adds to the cost, and therefore to the protection; so I think 28¾ per cent is ample protection for the manufacturers without having to increase the value for duty purposes. While I do not personally know very much about the main contents of the letter, I must say as regards the general principle underlying the communication, that a protection of 28¾ per cent ought to be ample for the manufacturers.

Mr. ILSLEY: It largely depends on the value upon which it is based.

Mr. HEAPS: I assume that there is the usual differential which manufacturers have to give between the distributor and the wholesaler, which is not very great as a rule.

Mr. REID: Complaints have reached me from British Columbia from fruit and vegetable growers regarding the application of seasonal duties. They say that seasonal duties are applied for Ontario, Quebec and the maritime provinces, and that British Columbia's produce is six weeks ahead of these other provinces, and they complain against seasonal duties being imposed on importations into these eastern provinces and not upon importations into British Columbia. It may well be that there is an explanation for that. If so, I think it should be indicated because I feel that consideration should be given to their appeal.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is nothing unusual about receiving complaints from British Columbia, or for that matter from Ontario, the maritimes and everywhere else, about these matters, but it is not correct to say that duties are not put on in the western district until they have been put on in the eastern district. In some instances they are put on considerably before, and, in some instances, some time afterwards. The time at which the fixed values become effective depends upon the reports that are received as to climatic conditions, the stage to which crops are advanced on a certain date, and so on. If the hon. gentleman will tell me what particular commodities he has in mind—

Mr. REID: Strawberries, cabbages and cauliflower.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. SPENCE: We might as well sit outside.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose the minister would agree with that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would not say that. It is difficult to make myself heard at the same time by those sitting behind me and those sitting in front.

Mr. REID: Have seasonal duties been placed against the importation of strawberries into British Columbia?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: I was wondering if my ears deceived me or if my mind misconceived the statement made by the minister in reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps), because as I understood it the minister said the tariff board had reached with regard to insulite board, a decision which he as minister had formally approved as a judicial decision, but that the department was going right on in its own sweet way, carrying on exactly as before, although the tariff board had held that it was in error. Did I misunderstand the minister in that regard?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; the hon. gentleman misunderstood the minister if he is stating what he understood the minister to say.

Mr. LAWSON: Well, I am.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say I understood him to say that too.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is the situation. All that the tariff board did was to lay down a principle. They made no particular finding as to any particular value. They laid down a principle; as it is in the application of that principle that the difficulty arises, and until we are able to apply the principle to the peculiar facts in this case, no change is being made in the existing situation. If the decision of the tariff board had been that the value for duty purposes, so far as these particular importers were concerned, should be $35 or $30 a thousand, it would be applied, but they did not say that at all. The tariff board's decision was that it should be the price at which the greatest volume of the exporters' production moves into consumption in the home market. The question is whether that means the greatest volume as between five classes or two, and until that point is settled we cannot apply the decision.

Mr. LAWSON: Is it not a fact that the tariff board always determines principles and never the application of principles?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; usually they determine the application.

Mr. LAWSON: By decision?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: Has the department asked the tariff board in this particular case to deal with the application of the principle now that they have determined the principle?

Mr. ILSLEY: We have notified the parties and they are entitled to be heard. We could not go to the tariff board in any hole-and-corner way and ask them what they meant, because one person will lose and the other win. They are entitled to be heard.

Mr. LAWSON: I do not mean in any hole-and-corner way. I meant whether the department had asked the tariff board, upon notice to the other parties, to clarify the application of the principle.

Mr. ILSLEY: We have notified the parties.

Mr. LAWSON: Which leaves it up to the parties.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Do I understand that there will be another hearing?

Mr. LAWSON: It is the old system of passing the buck.

Mr. ILSLEY: There will be no delay from these parties.

Mr. HEAPS: Is there to be another hearing before the tariff board before the question is finally disposed of?

Mr. ILSLEY: That depends upon what the parties want.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I have figures from the bureau of statistics with respect to imports of finished manufactured articles from the United States. In 1935 we brought in $172,165,535; that is, 56 per cent of all articles imported were finished manufactured articles.

Mr. ILSLEY: For what period—the calendar year 1937?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): That was for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1935. For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1936, we brought in finished manufactured articles amounting to $189,341,680, or 59·3 per cent of the total imports. In 1937 that had increased again until it was $247,207,956 or 62·8 per cent, and by the end of March this year we had imported finished manufactured articles amounting to $317,851,663, or 65·2 per cent. That seems to be a very large proportion of finished manufactured articles, and I do not think there would be very much unemployment in Toronto if we had $100,000,000 worth of that made in our city.

Mr. THORSON: Has the hon. gentleman the corresponding exports?

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): In view of the fact that our balance of trade has gone from $52,000,000 in our favour with the United States at the end of March, 1937, to $52,000,000 against us by the end of March, 1938, I should like to know what steps the department has taken to see, now that our exports to that country have been greatly curtailed, that our imports shall be curtailed to a corresponding extent in order that we may get in our urban centres some of the benefit in connection with the production of these finished manufactured articles amounting to $317,851,663, or 65 per cent of the total imports. We should like to have an opportunity to manufacture some of those goods here. What is the department doing to correct this situation?

Mr. ILSLEY: The Department of National Revenue is an administrative department whose duty it is to apply the law, and that is what we do to the best of our ability. I do not know what more there is for my department to do.

Mr. BENNETT: In other words, you pass them on to the Finance department.

Mr. ILSLEY: It would not be proper for the Department of National Revenue to be trying to make tariffs. It is our place to collect duties.

Mr. EULER: I would remind my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Ross, St. Paul's) that we had a total favourable balance of trade with all countries of $316,000,000 in 1937.

Mr. WARD: I wish the minister would tell us exactly what methods are being employed to ascertain the true market value of goods entering Canada where the dump clause is applied.

Mr. ILSLEY: Various methods are followed. Very often price lists and catalogues are available, and investigations are made by our investigators in foreign countries and by those who endeavour to find out in difficult cases what the fair home market value is.

Mr. WARD: Take a country like Japan or China. Have we officials there to report to the department as to the home market value of goods in those countries ?

Mr. ILSLEY: We have no investigators in Japan or China. We use such information as we can get, keeping in touch with invoices and using the services of trade commissioners where possible.

Mr. WARD: A great deal has been said in this house, especially by my hon. friend to my left, in defence of dumping duties. I have been informed by many business men in the country that Canadian manufacturers are about as successful in dumping goods in other countries as the manufacturers of any other country. Is that a fact? I am told that Canadian manufacturers can successfully dump goods in other countries, and still they complain so bitterly about goods being dumped into Canada when they might benefit the consumer slightly.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have no precise or complete information about the practices of our manufacturers because the matter does not come within the purview of the Department of National Revenue. We are concerned with imports and not with exports—that is, in an administrative way. I have been given to understand, however, that some dumping goes on, that there is some selling of goods in foreign countries at less than the price charged in the home market; and that more or less goes on the world over.

Mr. HARRIS: The minister will probably get the answer at the Canadian Manufacturers Association convention at the Chateau Laurier. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is just back from the convention, and perhaps he could answer the question.

Mr. BENNETT: Probably the minister could say from his own knowledge or the informatioin in his department that other countries have the same law against dumping in their markets, sometimes a little stricter than ours.

Mr. ILSLEY: Some of them have.

Mr. BENNETT: During my absence from this country some Canadians referred me to the strict provisions that prevail in another country which absolutely prevent the importation of goods from Canada except at the market price, and that market price as fixed was a rather high price. There was no country that I visited which does not make the same provision we have, or a more drastic provision, against the dumping of our surplus products on their market. That is true at least about Great Britain.

Mr. EULER: Great Britain has no dumping law.

Mr. WARD: If the statement of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) is correct, it should help our low tariff people, because I have been assured by many business men in this country that our Canadian manufacturers can dump goods against these very stringent laws of other countries; so surely they might be a little more generous with the Canadian consumers, and do a little more dumping in Canada, which might do something to relieve the strain in the rural districts.

Mr. BAKER: Would the hon. member give any specific case of a Canadian manufacturer who has been successful in dumping goods in other countries below the Canadian price?

Mr. WARD: I cannot give any specific case. The cases given to me were in conversation with business men who have travelled widely throughout the world. I was talking to a man just the other day, and he made the statement that he believed there was no country in the world more successful than Canada in dumping goods in other countries. I thought it was rather a compliment to the Canadian manufacturers, but I thought that if they were able to dump so successfully as this man claimed, they ought to be able to do a little better for the Canadian consumer.

Mr. HARRIS: The observations made by my hon. friend are very far from the mark. I understand he made some reference to Great Britain. Let him come nearer home and tell us something in regard to our great neighbour to the south. Anyone who has had occasion to make shipments to the United States knows it is a common practice there that if there is any question about a commodity which is being imported, whether it be a carload or a trainload or a small shipment, interfering not only by way of dumping on that market but with the trade of that country, the shipment is held up at the border; a questionnaire is sent through to Washington, and Washington rules as to whether the goods might be considered as being dumped, or whether their importation conflicts in any way with the interpretation of the customs laws of that country. I can tell my hon. friend that in 90 per cent of the cases the interpretation by the authorities at Washington is such that the United States market receives every possible little bit of protection there is in their schedules. The Minister of National Revenue says he is just an administrator of the statute. I have heard that answer many times in this chamber during the last decade and a half. We want a little more than administration. We want in that department a minister who has a vision of his responsibilities to the Canadian people, apart from administering the straight letter of the law.

An hon. MEMBER: That is what we have.

Mr. HARRIS: I am glad to hear it, and I hope he will continue so. When he has a problem of this kind before him, let him give some thought and consideration to what effect these goods coming into this country is going to have, not only on the manufacturer or dealer who is handling them, but on the thousands of our citizens who should be finding their vocation in manufacturing goods of a kind that we can manufacture in Canada. My hon. friend is smiling to himself, but if he will just stop and think what has been shown in some of the reports that have come before this chamber during the last three or four months; if he will remember that the increase in free imports of iron and steel products alone was from some $42,000,000 last year to $75,000,000 this year, and if he will consider how much employment that difference would give to men in our urban centres, and remember that in that particular trade alone, whereas they had some 99,153 employed in 1929 we find now 35,000 unemployed—

Mr. DEACHMAN: How many did they have in 1933?

Mr. HARRIS: They had 99,153 in 1929.

Mr. DEACHMAN: In 1933?

Mr. HARRIS: No; in 1929.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the hon. member for Huron North will recall that there was a depression.

Mr. DEACHMAN: There could not possibly have been a depression, because my right hon. friend was elected to cure unemployment.

Mr. BENNETT: No; he was not. That does not answer the question.

Mr. HARRIS: If we could inculcate in the mind and heart of the minister and the men administering this department that one idea, that they are charged not only with the responsibility of administering the statute but also with the responsibility of seeing that Canada's interests are best served in like manner as obtains in the United States, Canada could be helped very considerably; and the minister would not be departing from the statutes, but would be interpreting and administering them in the interests of Canada rather than sticking rigidly to the letter of the law rather than the spirit, as sometimes happens. Large quantities of goods are dumped in this country when consideration should be given to the effect they are having.

Mr. DEACHMAN: A few minutes ago the hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) was very anxious about our adverse balance of trade. I think the Minister of Trade and Commerce might give us a little information in regard to that. As I recall his figures, he said our favourable balance of trade during the past year was $360,000,000.

Mr. EULER: No; $316,000,000.

Mr. DEACHMAN: Does that include our favourable balance in tourist traffic, or is it limited solely to our commercial balance? The hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) is anxious to know whether the minister could not violate the letter of the law—

Mr. HARRIS: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, I did not say that.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I beg the hon. member's pardon, I withdraw that. Violate to some extent the spirit.

Mr. HARRIS: I did not use the word "violate" at all. I ask the hon. member to withdraw.

The CHAIRMAN: I understood the hon. member to say that if he did use the word he would withdraw it.

Mr. DEACHMAN: The hon. member for Danforth suggested that the minister should go a little further than the letter of the law—am I right—and that he should try to interpret the spirit of the law in keeping with what the hon. member for Danforth deems to be in the interest of the Canadian people, going beyond the exact letter of the law as enacted by the parliament of Canada. Let my hon. friend recall that during the years 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935 and 1936 our imports were decidedly lower than they were in 1937, and yet employment in Canada in 1937 was greater than it was in any of these years mentioned. If shutting out goods could create employment, then employment should have risen with a swelling tide from 1930 right down through 1931, 1932 and 1933; those were the periods when goods were shut out of the Dominion of Canada. You called upon your gods then to bring down the fire from heaven; but the gods were off at a chess game, and they paid no attention.

Then my hon. friend said we should shut out goods now. I only want to direct the attention of the committee to this fact, that for the first three months of this year imports into the United States fell by $300,000,000 as compared wih the same period in the previous year, and again unemployment increased tremendously in that country, until to-day it is almost as serious as it was at any time during the past five years.

For some reason or another this is one of the remedies that do not work; it is one of the remedies that never work. I ask the hon. member for Danforth to do this: Will he take the record of the trade of Canada; will he go over it year by year; will he put his finger on the year which shows the greatest volume of unemployment? He will find almost invariably that it was a year in which imports were at a very low level. Why is that? The reason is simple. When goods are coming into this country we are shipping goods out in payment for them, and the result is expanding trade, developing opportunity, expansion of business and relief from unemployment. But when, either from some outside cause or from your own action, you deliberately reduce the volume of imports, whether by tariffs or by some other form of taxation, then I want to tell you that you are budgeting for unemployment. As surely as economic laws are true, so surely will you get that unemployment. I ask the hon. member for Danforth if he will consider these facts and look over these figures. Then, when he has presented the figures to the house, will he tell us why these claims of his fail to work and why he cannot get that remedy applied in such a way as to produce results?

When a political party has been offering a remedy for a considerable time and it has failed; then, when they have a convention coming on, I suggest a very wise procedure, which will bring them support in this country. I do not often give advice to the Conservative party. Sometimes I give it to my own party; sometimes they do not accept it. Perhaps if the Conservative party could be induced to accept the advice I am about to give, they will not remain here in a little band, hopeless, bewildered and forlorn. I suggest that they consider their policy of the past. I suggest as a slogan for them, "Back to the tariff of Borden and Meighen." That is a nice sounding phrase and one that should bring support. Why do they not accept it?

An hon. MEMBER: You tell them.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I should be delighted to tell them; I expect an invitation to the Conservative convention myself. But the hon. member for Danforth mentioned one or two other matters which demand a word or two of explanation, and I am glad to give it. The hon. member said that imports of free goods have increased. They have. We are importing about 10 per cent more free goods than we were back in 1930. We have shifted too far towards a protective and too far away from a revenue tariff. That is the truth, but I want to point out to the hon. member for Danforth that these goods coming in are the raw materials of the manufacturers. These men, who sometimes accuse me of being extreme, are themselves extreme. The increase in the imports of raw materials is largely the result of the pressure upon this and past governments to increase these imports. I am glad to welcome to my side the army of Canadian manufacturers. I am glad to see that they are meeting in Ottawa at the present time. I hope, however, that they will exert the pressure just a little further, and that the medicine which they like so well when it is applied to the things they buy, will be applied also to the things they sell. Frankly, I believe they will do it in time, because the application of a high protective policy leads to increased unemployment and to increased taxes. It leads to the application of a high sales tax and a high income tax, and to large expenditures by governments. Some year, when he has a little more time and a little more experience in the inner workings of protection, the Canadian manufacturer will come to a conference and will tell the people of this country, "We have gone far enough. Protection is costing the manufacturers too much." Then they will come before a government headed by the hon. member for Danforth and the hon. member for St. Paul's—and I hope, if he stays with the party, by the present right hon. leader of the opposition—and ask in the name of the manufacturers themselves that we have a little closer approach to free trade than we have had at any time in the history of the dominion.

Mr. HARRIS: We are still dealing with the item concerning general administration, and I still adhere to the point I raised a moment ago. But I should like to straighten out a few of the ideas of the hon. member for Huron North. A moment ago the hon. gentleman said that the figures of total trade revealed that the imports under the present administration were less, and without reciting any figures he went on to elaborate some of his free trade ideas. I should like to put on record the imports into Canada, using round figures:

1934	433,000,000
1935	522,000,000
1936	562,000,000
1937	671,000,000

Mr. DEACHMAN: Would my hon. friend be good enough to put the unemployment figures alongside those?

Mr. HARRIS: There is the increase in imports into this country. That does not go far enough, Mr. Chairman. As I see it, the difference between the party that sits here and my hon. friends who sit opposite, together with the rump which sits to my right—this rump which kicks over the traces because the breeching is not on the shaft, much to the embarrassment of my hon. friends on the treasury benches; this rump which emphasizes the line of demarcation between the party to which I belong and my hon. friends on the treasury benches—is this: Your god as far as this matter is concerned is total trade, no matter what kind of trade that may be. To go a little further, and give our ideas as I see them, the ideas of this very important group, they are these: Trade, yes. We want trade; but we want trade of a kind that will not take away from our citizens their artisanship and their vocations. We are a people very similar to the people to the south. We have at hand goods to work with similar to the goods they have. Their standard of living is similar to ours; their trades and callings are the same as ours. There is a difference in our situation with reference to the United States as compared with what obtains regarding our possibilities of markets elsewhere. The main difference as I see it may be illustrated by a few figures which I should like to put on record.

Our total trade with foreign countries, of which the main portion is with the United States, shows some illuminating facts. When the party led by the right hon. leader of the opposition was in power, what were the imports of fully manufactured goods? I refer first to these because there is about forty dollars' worth of labour in each one hundred dollars' worth of manufactured goods, whether they are made in the United States or in Canada. In 1933 manufactured goods of the value of $173,000,000 came into this country. In 1934, although total imports increased by $25,000,000, our fully manufactured imports receded, as the bluebook shows, to $166,000,000. At the same time imports of raw materials increased from $99,000,000 to $108,000,000, and imports of partly manufactured goods, which represent twenty dollars' worth of labour in each one hundred dollars, increased by only $5,000,000. With the advent of the hon. gentlemen who now lead the government, what do we find? Increases almost by leaps and bounds in importations to this country, but what kind of imports? Imports of fully manufactured goods, which amounted to $166,000,000 in 1934, rose to $288,000,000 last year. That, to my mind, takes away from our citizens a chance to apply their artisanship to goods which they can make in this country.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Why not compare similar years instead of referring to 1934?

Mr. HARRIS: I will give them all, although I do not want to delay the committee. The hon. member for Huron North used the figures for the year I have quoted. However, I will give the hon. member all the figures: 1933, $173,000,000; 1934, $166,000,000; 1935, $207,000,000; 1936, $227,000,000; 1937, $289,000,000. Partly manufactured goods: 1933, $13,000,000; 1934, $18,000,000; 1935, $25,000,000; 1936, $25,000,000; 1937, $27,000,000. Raw materials: 1933, $99,000,000; 1934, $108,000,000; 1935, $132,000,000; 1936, $132,000,000; 1937, $156,000,000. To get a clear view of this picture it is necessary also to think about our exports, and what do we find? My hon. friend wants figures; I hope he will take note of these. Our exports or raw materials were: 1933, $91,000,000; 1934, $92,000,000; 1935, $97,000,000; all in the nineties; 1936, $104,000,000; 1937, $179,000,000; whereas our exports of manufactured goods rose from $116,000,000 to $145,000,000 in 1935, $163,000,000 in 1936, and $194,000,000 in 1937. That, one might say, is a reflection of the expansion of the primary industries, those industries which take out of mother earth her raw materials and ship them to foreign lands. Every time you take a dollar's worth of goods represented by shipments from primary industry you deprive one citizen of the opportunity of exercising his handicraft. When you get into the secondary industries, for every dollar's worth of raw material in the primary industries you have ten dollars' worth of labour produced by the secondary industries in completing the manufacture.

In making mention to the Minister of National Revenue of his interpretation of the act and his construction of the dumping duties, I would like to say not only to him but to those who surround him, give some thought, not to the manufacturer—he will take care of himself—but to our artisans who in thousands are walking the streets wanting work. They do not want to be unemployed. Give them every possible consideration by interpreting the act as it was meant to be interpreted when the statute was enacted and when the dumping duties were imposed. Dumping duties were not inserted on the record just for the sake of the letter; they are not intended to be lived up to merely in the letter; they are put in because behind the statute was the demand of public opinion that we should protect our citizens against the inroads of other countries that want to dump their goods into this country. That is why the statute is there. The minister as an occupant of the treasury benches does his best to interpret the letter of the statute, but public opinion requires that he shall interpret it in the way which was intended by those upon whose demand the law was placed on the statute book.

The difference between our party and that of our friends who at present occupy the treasury benches can well be shown by their actions in the matter of commercial treaties. I know I may be a little out of order, but I am now addressing those charged with the responsibility of administering the Department of National Revenue. With that thought in my mind I ask them to reflect for a minute upon the effect which treaties negotiated by the present government have had upon the trade of Canada, compared with those which were negotiated by the previous administration. What are the facts, broadly speaking? Consider first our trade with Great Britain. Britain is unable in a large measure to compete with and dump on this market. In the first place Great Britain is so far away; in the second place it contains so large a consuming population; in the third place it supplies world markets which have been dependent upon it for centuries, in Africa, Asia and elsewhere. It was my pleasure the other day to meet a gentleman who was just returning from a district two thousand miles in the interior of China where he had been for sixteen years, selling goods produced in Great Britain. Having these other markets, Britain is not so wont to dump goods on our Canadian market as are our friends to the south. In that connection, consider the treaty of 1932, otherwise known as the empire trade treaty, keeping in mind the problem that I have tried to recite in the earlier part of my remarks, namely that raw materials do not make for work as much as partly manufactured goods, and only half as much again as fully manufactured goods.

We find this to be the fact. Imports of raw materials from Great Britain increased from $19,000,000 in 1933 to $38,000,000 in 1937, or an increase of 100 per cent. Imports of partly manufactured goods from Great Britain increased from $18,000,000 to $37,000,000 in the same period, or an increase of a little over 100 per cent. But the imports of the great class of commodities which represents work, which represents the opportunity for the unemployed to find employment, the fully manufactured goods, increased only 50 per cent. The imports were valued at $81,000,000 in 1933 and $121,000,000 in 1937. I say without fear of contradiction that that was not a treaty which took away from our working people the opportunities of obtaining a livelihood.

At the same time I put on the record the other side of the picture. Our exports of raw materials increased slightly during the period 1933 to 1937, from $112,000,000 to $201,000,000, a total of 80 per cent. The increase in the exports of partly manufactured goods from 1933 to 1937 under that particular trade treaty amounted to 400 per cent. For every $100 worth of partly manufactured goods that left this country, there was $20 paid out to Canadian labour. A moment ago I stated that the imports of manufactured goods from Great Britain had increased only 50 per cent, while our exports of fully manufactured goods increased from $85,000,000 to $189,000,000, a total of 120 per cent. Those exports meant more work for Canadian workmen. For every $100 worth of fully manufactured goods exported, a total of $40 was paid to our Canadian workmen who need their jobs so badly during these difficult times.

Contrasted with this picture is the fact that to the south of us are people very similar to us, with raw materials much the same as we have at our disposal. They are eager and willing to trade with us, but we should not let that trade be the kind that brings only customs duties into the Canadian treasury. It should be the kind of trade that will not take away from the Canadian workman the opportunity he now has to make a living in this country.

Mr. LAWSON: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) skated around the subject matter concerning which I desire to ask a question of the minister. Before doing so, I cannot refrain from a comment or two in connection with the criticism which the minister for Huron North levelled against the administration.

An hon. MEMBER: The member.

Mr. LAWSON: I beg your pardon, the member for Huron North. Even with his free trade doctrines he may be a minister of this government some day because anything is liable to happen the way they carry on. If I understood him correctly, the hon. member for Huron North was criticising the administration because they did not so administer the law as to bring about the greatest amount of imports into Canada. He told us that if we looked at the record of the years in which we had our greatest importations into Canada, we would find that those were the years of greatest prosperity. I suggest that that is not going far enough. If you look merely at the importations into Canada and have no regard for the exportations or for the trade balances, you do not get a true picture.

The hon. gentleman forgets just what happened to us in this country. If you will go back to the years 1926 to 1930, you will find that our imports were mounting steadily, but so were our adverse trade balances. With what results? We had to pay the ultimate price in 1930. Let me give a simple illustration. It always seems to me that many national problems can be reduced to the problem of the individual. Let me assume that an individual in this country has an income, a wage, or anything you want to call it, of $25 a week, and he goes on spending $30 a week. How long can he last? Only until his credit is exhausted. When his credit is exhausted, he is broke, and when he is broke, he is down and out. That is exactly what was happening to us prior to 1930, until the Conservative administration came into power and created favourable trade balances instead of adverse.

The hon. member for Huron North offered some sympathy to those of us who sit on the Conservative side. I suggest to him that he take the Liberal party, of which he is a member, stand them up in front of a mirror and let them have a look at themselves. We may be small in numbers, but at least we do not present the spectacle we have had presented here. We have heard the hon. Liberal member for Brantford (Mr. Macdonald) urge upon the treasury benches that they should maintain the tariff, while other members of the Liberal party have asked the treasury benches to reduce or eliminate the tariff altogether. At least we have a consistent policy and some measure of unity.

I come now to my question which concerns dumping duty, the matter around which the hon. member for Huron North skated. As I recall it, prior to 1935 there were three sections in the act in connection with which dumping duties were imposed. My recollection is that those were sections 35, 41 and 43. Since this administration came into power, one of those sections has been repealed, I understand section 43.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. LAWSON: I know one section was repealed. I have not the act in front of me, so I cannot pick out the section. Will the minister be good enough to outline to the committee any difference in the principles of administration in the imposition of dumping duties which he has carried on as a minister of the crown, representing the Liberal government, since his government came into power, as compared with the principles of administration in effect from 1930 to 1935, under the Conservative administration?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is a large order, and it would take considerable time to answer. The hon. gentleman is not correct in his statement that we repealed section 43, but we did make some changes in the Customs Act. Section 36 is important. It states that the value for duty purposes shall not be less than the cost of production, plus a reasonable advance for selling costs and profit. While I am not intimately acquainted with the practices that existed prior to October 23, 1935, I understand there were many complaints that the advances added by the Department of National Revenue in 1935 and prior years were unreasonable. At any rate the negotiators at the time the negotiations were going on between Canada and the United States requested that a change be made to the effect that the advance added to the cost of production would not be more than was usual in the trade; that section was amended accordingly, and a great many valuations outstanding under section 36 were made accordingly.

I come now to section 37. It authorized the governor in council to provide that in arriving at the value for duty purposes of any particular commodity the discount from the list or published price should be limited to a certain amount. It had particular reference to automobiles, and, I think, to radios.

Mr. BENNETT: And plated silverware.

Mr. ILSLEY: It could apply to anything, but I was told that the chief commodities were automobiles and radios. The discount fixed from the list or published price on automobiles was 20 per cent. As most members of the house know, the ordinary discount to a dealer from the list price is considerably more than 20 per cent. It ranges from 24 to 28 per cent, or something like that.

Mr. LAWSON: May I suggest to the minister that that order in council with respect to the discount on automobiles was repealed before his government came into power?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know whether it was repealed or not, but the section of the act remained there.

Mr. LAWSON: I know, because I had the pleasure of recommending its repeal.

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 37 was repealed by us, and it is impossible to limit these discounts under the law as it stands at present.

Mr. BENNETT: They are limited, though, by section 35.

Mr. ILSLEY: Discounts?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, because the fair market value, as determined in the country in which the goods are sold, as compared with the price at which you get them, prevents a discount from being made. That creates a price which is below the fair market price in the community where it is sold. So it is the same thing in the end.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not the same thing at all. The value for automobiles under my right hon. friend's administration was higher than the price charged dealers in the United States, because the discount allowed here was only 20 per cent and dealers in the country of origin were getting from 24 to 28 per cent. That meant that dealers importing automobiles were paying on a higher value than the home market value, and that is what we put an end to.

My hon. friend asked me to state the difference in the principles of administration under the former government and this government. When we came in we found outstanding, I forget just how many, but I think there were from twenty-five to thirty-five valuations on manufactured goods under section 43. They were arbitrary valuations, with no relation to the home market value or to the cost of production in the home market, nor were they intended to have any relation to it. The valuations were put on purely to prevent importations. Some were put on for the protection of very small industries, and some for the protection of large and substantial industries. All these valuations have been cancelled by this administration in respect of importations from most-favoured-nation treatment countries and intermediate tariff countries, and no valuations under section 43 have been imposed at all by this administration except on fruit and vegetables and for a few months on coronation souvenirs, for what were alleged to be patriotic purposes. The whole practice in respect of manufactured goods which were the subject of fixed or arbitrary valuations has been changed. All with the exception of three have been cancelled, and none has been imposed. We have had I do not know how many applications to impose them, and continue to have them; but section 43, so far as the imposition of new valuations is concerned, has been a dead letter. It is continued with regard to fruits and vegetables in the way I explained to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. LAWSON: To save another question later on, would the minister be good enough to tell me where there is any difference in principle between maintaining twenty-seven valuations under section 43 and maintaining three? It is merely a difference in the quantum, not in the principle.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a big difference to the public.

Mr. LAWSON: You did not repeal section 43.

Mr. ILSLEY: No; we used section 43 in respect to fruits and vegetables because it is the most feasible way to protect the fruit and vegetable growers. This has been explained in the house time and time again.

Mr. BENNETT: It was there when you came in.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; but we have provided an appeal to the tariff board from valuations under section 43, something which did not exist before.

I was not prepared to answer to-night such a broad question as the hon. gentleman asked me, and I am simply gathering up my thoughts as I go along. There have been amendments to section 6 of the customs tariff to provide that before goods can be classified as of a class or kind made in Canada they must be made in this country. Under the former administration it was common to make a ruling that goods were of a class or kind made in Canada before they were made in Canada, simply because they were getting ready to make them in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: The Liberal tariff of 1930 made special provision for a certain rate to prevail until such time that it was apparent Canadian manufacturers were producing in quantities to meet Canadian demand, and that then the rate of duty should be determined. That is not a device which was created by the late administration. It has been used by both administrations. It was to anticipate the time when production would be sufficient to meet Canadian demands, and it was an advice in advance to those putting money into factories that when the factory was producing, a certain rate of duty would prevail.

Mr. ILSLEY: That may be a provision of some item of the customs tariff, but that is not what I am talking about. I am talking of rulings, of hundreds of thousands of applications that have been made for the application of dumping duties; decisions have been made by the department, and hundreds, certainly a great many instances can be turned up where a ruling was made that the goods were of a class or kind made in Canada when the manufacturers were not in a position to produce. Rightly or wrongly we have provided not only that they must be ready to produce them, not only that they must have the factory capacity to produce the goods, but that they must actually have a foothold in this market to the extent of 10 per cent of the normal Canadian consumption.

Mr. LAWSON: You did that to make a trade treaty with Japan.

Mr. ILSLEY: My hon. friend wants to know where we have differed from his administration. If I had had a little time for preparation; if I had known that these questions were going to be asked, I could have given him a great many more instances. We amended section 6 of the customs tariff, giving power to the governor in council, in cases where goods were not available through the ordinary channels of distribution in this country, to order the application of special or dumping duty. There were certain monopolies in this country; only they were selling the goods, and they did not offer them through the ordinary channels of distribution at all. We provided in the case of one particular commodity which is quite important, that dumping duty should not apply, so that that monopoly should have foreign competition, though it was brought about by quoting below the home market price. I could go through the whole list if I had time, but undoubtedly there has been a change in the spirit of administration. It would not please the hon. gentleman who spoke here to-night; it would not please the two hon. members from Toronto who spoke, because they think we are on the wrong track. But I have laid down in speeches that I have made—and the officers of the department pretty well know my views on these matters—that the Department of National Revenue is primarily a revenue-collecting rather than an industry-protecting agency. That is exactly what the hon. member for Danforth says it should not be, and exactly what I say that it should be, primarily a revenue-collecting rather than an industry-protecting agency. Otherwise we get into the realm of lawmaking; and we are not lawmakers; we are law administrators.

Mr. SPENCE: You take your orders from the other departments.

Mr. ILSLEY: We administer the law passed by this parliament, not by the other departments at all, but by this parliament; and that is where we should take it from instead of from persons who call on us from day to day asking us to shut out or to let in goods by arbitrary rulings. That is the first principle. The second principle is that we should not be astute to devise ways of shutting out imports. There are a great many ways in which this can be done. It can be done by making regulations, by notifying collectors, by notifying importers that everything must be taken subject to amendment; it can be done by delays in appraisals. As a matter of fact, there are all sorts of ways in which imports can be shut out if it is desired. But the principle we have adopted is that no undue administrative regulations should be placed in that way upon imports.

Mr. FRASER: To be consistent with his remarks to-night—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Louder.

Mr. FRASER: —why does the minister not apply the same principle to the fruit growers in the Annapolis valley? He maintains a fixed valuation in connection with that. Why discriminate against the manufacturers?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no fixed value on apples at the moment.

Mr. STEVENS: Louder. We cannot hear this interesting conversation.

Mr. BENNETT: A little louder, please; those pearly words of wisdom we would not miss for anything.

Mr. FRASER: I am seeking information, and it is certainly enlightening to have the minister tell me that the fixed valuations have recently been discontinued. He will have to answer for that in the Annapolis valley.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Can the minister give a list of the arbitrary values that have been taken off?

Mr. ILSLEY: I can get it for the hon. gentleman.

Mr. HAMILTON: The discussion has taken a wide field, but there are one or two things I should like to mention in connection with some points that have been brought out. The hon. member for Danforth referred to the great increase in the imports of steel. Well, if imports of steel should cause any member of this house to worry, they ought to cause me to worry. I am one of those to whom the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) referred as possibly having different views on tariff matters from those held by other members of the Liberal party, but I have found that out of the differences in these views, which have undoubtedly existed in the Liberal party from the days of the first Fielding tariff to the present minute, the compromise that has been effected, and the resulting policy that has been enacted and put upon the statute books, has been a tariff that has generally brought prosperity to the country during those years.

I wish to refer for a moment to one remark of the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman). I do not agree entirely with that hon. gentleman when he suggests that increased imports are necessarily the cause of increased prosperity, but I have noticed one remarkable fact in connection with steel. It may be a coincidence, but it is certainly a remarkable fact. It is rather dangerous to look for cause and effect, because sometimes there may be several effects from one main cause. I do not think increased imports are a cause of prosperity; but I do know this, with refernce to the steel industry—and as I say, it may be a coincidence—that with increased imports there has been very largely increased production within Canada. In the last few years, the hon. member for Danforth states, there has been an increase in imports of steel. That is true, but it is also true that the steel industry in Canada has been operating at the same time to a very high degree of capacity. In fairness to the government, in fairness to a proper understanding of the effect of imports of steel, I consider it not out of place to say that the steel industry in my city in 1934 had total days work of 389,865, whereas last year the number was 789,758. Hours work in 1934 were 3,299,000 odd and last year, 6,415,000 odd. The number of men employed in 1934 was 2,009 and in 1937, 3,011. That has been during the time the steel imports have been increasing. I will not venture to say what the operation of the steel plant in the maritime provinces has been, but I am informed and I believe that they have had a very high average of operation based upon normal capacity. But I wish to go behind that and to point out that between 1921 and 1929, the peak, imports of iron and its products increased by the figures I am about to give. We imported in 1921, $245,625,703, and by 1929, skipping the intervening years, that had risen to $349,194,597. But during the same period the selling value of the production of iron and its products in Canada had jumped from $382,398,000 odd in 1921 to $738,012,000 odd in 1929. It may be a coincidence, but it is a fact that when there was a dollar's worth of increased imports there has been several times a dollar's increase in production of iron and its products within Canada.

When it is said that, if imports of any commodity amounted to $100,000,000 in 1936 and jumped to $150,000,000 in 1937, had we not allowed that extra $50,000,000 to come into Canada there would necessarily have been increased prosperity or production in Canada, I must question the accuracy of that theory. I think the statistics and records of Canada indicate the contrary. Not that I advocate as a cure for depression seeking to open our doors to imports, but it is not correct to suggest that increased imports necessarily mean decreased production and less prosperity in this country.

Mr. LAWSON: The minister says that by reason of certain revisions in the act since the Liberal government came into power he can no longer limit the discounts. I cannot accept that statement. On another occasion I shall give specific instances to show that discounts are limited, and limited effectively under provisions which still remain in the act.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is because they are limited in the home market.

Mr. LAWSON: Nor can I, much as I should like to do so, give the minister or his government credit for the change in the spirit of administration in the Department of National Revenue. I occupied that position I think for a shorter time than any other minister who ever held it; but I have had associations with the department for a good many years, and I think the change in the spirit of administration started and was consummated as the effect of the courtesy, capacity and ability of the present commissioners began to be felt within a couple of years after their appointment.

Item agreed to.

Inspection, investigation and audit services, $1,102,730.

Mr. LAWSON: Is the increase of almost $100,000 attributable to statutory increases, increases in staff or what?

Mr. ILSLEY: The increase is $97,115. There is an increase of $52,231 in the salaries of permanent officers. It is made up of restoration of the five per cent deduction, $44,746; living allowance, $300; and statutory increases, $19,530. That makes $64,576. There is a saving in another way that brings the total increase down to $52,231. Then there is an increase of $13,585 in the salaries of temporary officers.

Mr. LAWSON: That would be occasioned by more appointments than in the previous year?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is occasioned by the appointment of additional excise tax auditors, who have more than paid for themselves.

There is an increase of $300 in living allowance, that is for one officer in the Yukon. There is also an increase of $30,999 in travelling expenses. That is due largely to the appointment of these additional auditors. That makes the total of $97,115.

Item agreed to.

Ports, outports and preventive stations, including pay for overtime of officers, notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act; and temporary buildings and rentals, $7,548,200.

Mr. LAWSON: What is the cause of the increase of $396,700? How much is restoration of salary deductions, statutory increases, and what proportion relates to new appointments?

Mr. ILSLEY: Restoration of salary deductions and statutory increases account for $384,012.

Mr. LAWSON: It would appear, glancing at the details on page 144 of the estimates, that the number of appraisers in the department has been greatly increased. I am wondering whether the appointment of these additional appraisers is responsible for the difference between the figure for restoration of salary deduction and statutory increases, and the total increase. For example, halfway down page 145 we find there are thirty-five customs appraisers as against thirty-two in the previous year; 112 assistant customs appraisers as against 101, and several increases in the appraisal division. Why the additional appointments, why the necessity for a greater number of appraisers?

Mr. ILSLEY: The increase is due almost wholly, if not wholly, to changes in classification which might be described as promotions.

Mr. LAWSON: So that there will be decreases in other classifications?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the explanation of this very considerable saving in overtime?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is due to an important change of policy effected in the department April 1, 1937. The policy of the department prior to that time was to get a substantial amount of the work at many of the frontier points done in overtime. It was always a question which was the best or most economical way to get the work done. But from April 1, 1937, a great deal of the overtime was abolished and additional officers taken on. The advantage from the standpoint of dollars and cents of having the work done in overtime is that you can fit your officers in and so may be able to keep a smaller staff. But the disadvantage from the economic standpoint is that you pay a higher rate. We pay ordinary examiners seventy cents an hour. So we changed the system. We eliminated a great deal of the overtime; we took on something like 150 of additional staff to do the work that had been done in overtime by the others. That has resulted in an economy for the department, and not only that, but we believe it is a much better system because many of the officers at the frontier ports were working long hours. They did not have any time to do anything else at all. They were working seven days a week, and their usefulness as citizens was impaired to a considerable extent, which I think is generally admitted to be the wrong way to arrange work if it possibly can be avoided.

Mr. STIRLING: And that change, I take it, would be of considerable assistance to the travelling public?

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not know that there was any particular neglect of the travelling public before.

Mr. STIRLING: I was not suggesting that, but sometimes you had to telephone for an official.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think that is quite true.

Mr. LAWSON: Also in the details for this item, at the top of page 147, I notice an increase in the number of clerks from fifty to 103, with an increase in salaries of approximately $36,000. In the very next item I notice that the number of office boys has been reduced from forty-five to one, so I assume that the forty-four office boys must have been made clerks, grade 1, and in addition the minister must have appointed seven or eight other clerks in order to get the number of 103.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is about the picture, I think.

Mr. LAWSON: Why would these office boys be moved up? Would it be because by service they had acquired knowledge and were entitled to the higher classification?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. After two years of service as office boys they expect to be promoted to clerks if they can pass the examinations and otherwise qualify.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I should like to ask the minister if the increase in the number of appraisers might have been due to the importation of a power shovel into Huron North. The value of the shovel was $700. For duty purposes they valued it at $900. The actual cost of bringing it into Canada, including duty, excise tax and so on, amounted to close to 50 per cent of the cost. I checked up on the general average rate of duty on machinery other than agricultural machinery coming into Canada, and during 1937 it amounted to approximately 17 per cent. Machinery generally enters the dominion at a very low rate because it is held by the manufacturers to be important that machinery coming in for their use should have a customs rate not very closely related to the rate which applies on consumers' goods. We have ditching machines admitted duty free, I think, and it strikes me as peculiar that you can bring in a ditching machine duty free, but when you bring in a machine to shovel the clay which goes to make the tile, the tariff rate, on a second-hand machine, amounts to nearly 50 per cent.

There should be, I suggest, something approaching consistency in regard to items of that kind; that is, we should try to get a tariff which reflects adherence to a certain code, if I may put it in that way. If we believe that a manufacturer of cotton goods or a person operating a sugar beet factory should be entitled to a relatively low tariff rate, then the manufacturer of brick or tile should be entitled to the same consideration. There is another factor which applies in that case. The manufacturer of brick or tile may have a tariff on the product which he produces, and it may be argued that he, having an opportunity to exploit other people, may submit with a certain degree of tameness to the exploitation of himself. But in regard to tile, for instance, it is not a product which would come in from very long distances, because the freight cost and transportation risk rather operate against it, whereas some other products might enter the country more readily. I suggest, therefore, that a machine of that kind should receive some consideration, and that applies equally whether the machine is new or second-hand. We must remember that we have passed through a period of depression which resulted largely from the artificial restriction of trade; but we are entering another period of depression on account of the continuance of trade restriction, and therefore there is more demand for second-hand machines than was formerly the case. So I think the government should give particular consideration to second-hand machines of this type.

Item agreed to.

Income tax division—General administration, including authority to create positions and make appointments within the division, notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act and the said positions and staff so appointed are hereby wholly excluded from the operation of the said act, $310,335.

Mr. CLEAVER: The textile probe brought to light many millions of dollars of undisclosed profits. What steps, if any, have been taken to collect the taxes which should have been paid on these profits?

Mr. ILSLEY: We have eight suits pending against textile companies for sums aggregating slightly over a million dollars. Whether or not we recover that amount depends on whether we win the suits.

Mr. LAWSON: Would the minister be good enough to repeat his answer? I am very sorry, but I could not catch it.

Mr. ILSLEY: My answer was that we have eight suits pending against textile companies for the recovery of income and business profits taxes for sums aggregating slightly over a million dollars. I went on to say that whether or not we recover that amount depends on whether we win those suits.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Would the minister say how many suits are pending with reference to other industries or businesses?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, no; I could not say. I do not know. I could not answer that. I happened to know this because the suits arose out of the evidence given before the Turgeon commission on the textile industry.

Item agreed to.

District offices, $2,005,708.

Mr. LAWSON: Is the increase attributable to increase in staff?

Mr. ILSLEY: The increase is $126,874.25. Of that amount $44,340 is due to increase in staff; there has been an increase of forty-one employees. There is $16,326.35 due to general salary adjustment increases to be applicable to 1938-39. That makes $60,666.35. The reinstatement of the five per cent salary deduction in 1938-39 accounts for $57,727.90, and there is an additional $2,600 for travelling expenses. Then there is $5,400 in addition for sundries, $300 in addition for telegrams and telephones, and an increase of $180 for one official in Montreal, making in all $126,874.25.

Mr. LAWSON: The reason I asked the question specifically with relation to this item is that I thought possibly the minister might have done something to rectify a condition which existed when I was in the department and towards the adjustment of which some effort was made by the previous government. By reason of the fact that the income tax branch of the Department of National Revenue is not under the Civil Service Act, those who are employed in that branch have not the advantage of statutory increases and so forth. I know that prior to 1935 it had been found that on the average the salaries paid for positions were less than for similar positions in the other two branches of the same department, namely the customs and the excise branches, and some effort was made to readjust that situation. I had in mind that some further efforts would be made, and I should like to know if anything has been done in that regard. If so, has it been given effect to; and as a result of what has been done, if anything, are the salaries in the income tax branch now commensurate with those in the other two branches of that department?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a scheme of reclassification which has not yet received the approval of the treasury board. It was recommended by a committee from the income tax division, sent to treasury board and then referred to the civil service commission, who made a report on it. It is back before the treasury board and is being considered, in regard to some of its phases, at the present time. If it receives approval, it will substantially correct the anomalies to which the hon. gentleman has referred.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): In view of this $126,000 increase, is it the intention of the department to cooperate more closely with the provincial government of Ontario, bearing in mind the statement of the premier of Ontario last year that he could obtain no cooperation from the Department of National Revenue at Ottawa in his efforts to collect succession duties.

Mr. ILSLEY: The cooperation has been whole-hearted and thorough throughout.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It has been improved since then, has it?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, throughout it has been good.

Mr. LAWSON: I should like to make it clear, that if "cooperation" means that information on people's income tax returns is supplied by the income tax department to the succession duty department of any province, I am absolutely and irrevocably opposed to it. I hope that is not what is meant by the minister's assurance that any province is getting a large measure of cooperation.

Mr. ILSLEY: The circumstances under which information is supplied are very carefully defined, and, I think, provide for all the necessary safeguards.

Mr. STIRLING: How successful does the minister consider he is in the matter of dealing with evasion of income tax? Income tax in this country is such a new tax that not so very many years ago it was fairly common to meet somebody who would tell you that he had no intention of even making a return until his neighbours did so.

Mr. ILSLEY: Inevitably there is some evasion, but I have no reason to think that that evasion is on a wide scale or is substantial. The hon. gentleman may remember that the president of the United States on June 1, 1937, delivered what was called, I think, a tax evasion message, to which he attached a memorandum of Mr. Morgenthau setting out eight ways in which income taxes were evaded in the United States. We immediately went into the matter here to see whether by chance Canadians might be evading income tax by any or all of those methods, and we concluded that by reason of the provisions of our act it was practically impossible for them to use at least those methods of evading income tax in this country. I have no reason to think there is more than a minimum of evasion here.

Mr. STIRLING: What policy does the department adopt with regard to prosecutions? As regards the 1935 return, how long can a person escape who has not made due return or has incurred penalties?

Mr. ILSLEY: Prosecutions take place all the time, right along, for failure to make returns. There is a limitation of three years upon prosecutions for false returns. If falsity in returns is ascertained within that time, as a general rule prosecution takes place.

Mr. STIRLING: The prosecution does not take place until after three years?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh no; that is not it. It cannot take place after three years. There is a limitation of three years.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): If I understood the minister aright, the hon. member for York South having said that he did not agree with a certain practice of the government, the minister said that at no time did the government refuse to cooperate fully with the provincial government at Toronto with reference to the collection of succession duties, so far as the income tax branch could cooperate.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, within the limits that were laid down. It depends on what the hon. gentleman means by "full cooperation." If he means that we have always been prepared to throw open all our files upon request, that is not the case; but under conditions which are carefully specified in the agreement with the province of Ontario we make certain information available, and that has been the case since, at least, the early part of 1936.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I would go this far in support of what the hon. member for York South has said, that I believe some of the tactics which were used in the collection of succession duties might require too much information from the Department of National Revenue. I do not know how far the government can go or what restrictions are embodied in the so-called agreement.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, it is not a "so-called" agreement, it is an agreement. It is an agreement under a statutory provision passed by this parliament. The restriction is simply this, that if a minister of the crown in the government of not only the province of Ontario but certain other provinces as well certifies he has reason to think he has evidence that fraud exists and an inspection of income tax returns is required for detection of that fraud, they are shown to the government.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Well then, I think there has been an erroneous impression spread throughout Ontario, by the premier of the province stating that in cases where he was sure there was fraud and refused to settle succession duty taxes, he received absolutely no cooperation from the department at Ottawa.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I have stated what the facts are.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Thank you.

Item agreed to.

General—Amount to be paid to the Department of Justice to be disbursed by and accounted for to it for customs-excise and income tax secret investigation services, $15,000.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Will the minister kindly say what this vote is for? I cannot understand the phrasing.

Mr. ILSLEY: This is to enable the department to obtain information in connection with the collection of revenue.

Mr. STIRLING: Through the mounted police.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I am a little troubled by the phrase "to be disbursed by and accounted for to it for customs-excise and income tax secret investigation services." Should not that be "accounted for by it"?

Mr. LAWSON: It means accounted for to the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. ILSLEY: The Department of National Revenue tells the Department of Justice to whom to pay the amounts. That is what is meant by the words "accounted for to it." The amounts are paid by the Department of Justice at the request of the Department of National Revenue. The Department of Justice must be furnished with the names of the persons and the reasons for payment.

Item agreed to.

Customs and excise divisions—To provide for payment to C. P. Blair, formerly assistant commissioner of customs, compensation for services in connection with the revision of the Customs Act, in the event of same being required, $1,250.

Mr. STIRLING: What do the last seven words mean, "in the event of same being required"?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the revision of the Customs Act is completed before six months, that amount will not be required. The amount paid last year for the full year was $2,500, and the expectation is that it will be completed within six months.

Mr. LAWSON: You are providing for the maximum payment you may have to make?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Item agreed to.

To provide, notwithstanding anything contained in the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, or any other act or law, for payment out of the consolidated revenue fund to Hector Hamel, formerly assistant customs appraiser, Montreal, the amount of his contributions to the civil service superannuation fund, $2,759.61.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the explanation of this?

Mr. ILSLEY: Mr. Hamel was an old employee of the department who was dismissed. I am sorry the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. White) is not here this evening. He spoke to me about this matter and said he would support me on it. I do not think he will mind my saying that he told me he felt that the dismissal was unjust. An effort was made to have the contributions made by Mr. Hamel returned to him, and it was found that this was the only way in which this could be done. This man is seventy-three years of age and his dismissal was not warranted. It was accompanied by a confiscation of his contributions to the fund, and for that reason we felt that we should vote this item for the return of the contributions.

Mr. STIRLING: When was the dismissal?

Mr. ILSLEY: In 1932.

Item agreed to.

Income tax division—district offices—further amount required, $41,742.

Mr. LAWSON: What is the reason for this general provision?

Mr. ILSLEY: Most of this is for the scheme of reclassification to which I referred. I thought it had to do with the inauguration of a technical branch, but I have been told that is covered by another item.

Item agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member for St. Paul's (Mr. Ross) asked me to give him a list of items. These are as follows:

Meats, fresh, prepared or preserved.
Eggs, frozen, desiccated, powdered, etc.
Slack cooperage stock.
Lime.
Hardwood doors.
Women's and children's clothing.
Cotton fabrics and artificial silk fabrics.
Fringes, gimps, tassels, etc.
Electrical lighting fixtures, lamps and shades.
Cut roses.
Canned asparagus.
Eggs in shell.
Baby chicks.
Dried peas.
Dried beans.
Market poultry.
Live stock.
Canned salmon.
Sugar of milk.
Wicker furniture.
Cotton wiping rags.
Umbrellas.
Sheet rubber goods.
Wood lead pencils.
Wool jersey cloth and cotton stockinette.
Metal pot cleaners.
Thumb tacks and furniture nails.
Casein.
Wire rope.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Fifth report of the standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Vien (for Mr. Moore).

SASKATCHEWAN ELECTION

REPORTED STATEMENT OF MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE RESPECTING APPROPRIATION OF $50,000,000 FOR HOUSING

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the government whether or not we have transferred the seat of government from this parliament house in Ottawa to the province of Saskatchewan. I mean that very seriously; for the British North America Act provides that no money votes shall be dealt with until the approval of the governor general shall have been given, by message to the House of Commons, in which they must originate. Last evening in Saskatchewan it was announced by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) that $50,000,000 was to be appropriated by this parliament for housing matters, and that the appropriate legislation would be passed by parliament this session. In view of the provisions of the British North America Act, and knowing as I do the ability of this government to undertake almost anything that is unconstitutional, I am desirous of knowing whether or not the government had been transferred to Saskatchewan during the evening in order that the announcement might thus be made. My second question is whether or not His Excellency the Governor General has given his approval to such a statement being made on the hustings in Saskatchewan rather than in the House of Commons, as provided by the constitution.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Acting Prime Minister): The government of Canada has certainly not been transferred to Saskatchewan. The only transfer that I know has been effected is the transfer there of the government of Alberta. As to campaign promises made there, I do not know of any; but if there have been any on the part of the Liberals of Saskatchewan they certainly pale into insignificance compared with the promises made by the other major party which is contesting the election there—I am not speaking of the lesser groups, of course. With regard to the assertion concerning a program of housing, while it was announced some time ago by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers)—

Mr. BENNETT: But he was very careful.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): —the amount I think has not been stated; I should be surprised if it has been stated definitely even in Saskatchewan. It must be an approximation.

Mr. BENNETT: No. There is just one observation that the Acting Prime Minister did not make that I hoped he would make. He said the government of Alberta had been transferred to Saskatchewan; there is not lacking evidence that resources have also been transferred to Saskatchewan.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I do not know about that. I have no experience in that.

Mr. BENNETT: No!

ST. LAWRENCE WATERWAY

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION THIS SESSION RESPECTING TREATY WITH UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Would the Minister of Justice tell the house whether it is proposed during this session to introduce legislation with regard to a treaty with the United States respecting the St. Lawrence waterway?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I do not expect any such speedy development. Obviously this new proposal, accompanied by a draft agreement, will have to be carefully considered and submitted to the interested parties, and it will require a good deal of work before anything can be submitted to the house. It will have to be first signed and accepted, so I do not see any prospect of anything during the present session of parliament.

SEED GRAIN

RECENT DELIVERY OF WHEAT IN SASKATCHEWAN —POLICY AS TO REMAINDER OF WHEAT UNSOLD

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) is not in his place, but I had intended to ask him a question, which will appear in Hansard and doubtless he will be able to answer on Monday.

I am in receipt of information that cars of wheat have been delivered recently in Saskatchewan, for instance at a station called Coleville, where a car is lying on the track. From the report of May 21, 1938, which is the last weekly statement furnished by the Canadian wheat board, which statements the minister has been good enough to file from time to time in the office downstairs, the wheat board has received $9,000,000 on account of cash wheat sold to the Saskatchewan government, but apparently as of May 21 some 2,368,356·25 bushels still remained unsold. I suggest that the minister might indicate the policy of the government with respect to that, because apparently, according to the terms of the letter directed to the board, the government took over the whole of the wheat. That I think was the effect of it; they may not have intended to do so. I think it is important that we should know the situation. Apparently the amount of cash remaining in the hands of the board from the sale of the wheat that belonged to the board had risen to nearly $6,000,000, if not more.

I thought possibly the minister might make a statement indicating the exact position, from the standpoint of policy, dealing with the remainder of wheat on hand, because I think probably the seeding season is past. I fancy there will be no further distribution of grain this year for seed purposes in Saskatchewan.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The question of my right hon. friend will be called to the attention of the minister, and I am sure an answer will be given.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING LEASES OF MINERALIZED AREAS AND ADVANCES TO ASSIST AGRICULTURE AND OTHER PURSUITS

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 138, to amend the Indian Act.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): The terms of this bill seem to be reasonable and appropriate enough, though perhaps section 2 is rather difficult to understand. In the discussion of the resolution on which this bill is founded the minister made a statement in connection with band funds that I was pleased to hear, which apparently indicated the intention of the department to abandon a system about which I have often complained in the past in connection with the handling of band funds. But there is nothing about it in the act itself, and I have learned by experience that it is not what the minister says but what the act states that counts. Perhaps it would be more appropriate to take that up when the house is in committee.

There is one other point I should like to mention. I am not anxious at this time of year to see any delay in legislation, but possibly it is better to bring up this point now instead of later on, after we have taken more time on the matter. The resolution on which this bill is founded was considered by the committee of the whole, as all such resolutions must be considered, and was passed on Thursday, April 7. The minister moved that the house go into committee of the whole to consider the resolution, which concluded with these words:

—the outstanding advances at any time not to exceed $350,000.

Then in the discussion of the resolution itself, at page 3349, the minister said that the amount was not to exceed a total of $350,000. That phrase occurs again and again, but when the bill is brought down it indicates an expenditure of half a million dollars. I should like to ask the minister or the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) whether that would not upset the legality of the bill and make it necessary to reintroduce it later on. I should think it would be better to have that changed now, because I understand it is not in order to increase by a large sum the amount authorized under the hand of his excellency when the measure is brought in.

Mr. CRERAR: I might say in reply to my hon. friend that this is a misprint in the bill. The amount is $350,000. The error probably arose in this way: there was some discussion of the advisability of making it $500,000, but it was finally decided to make it $350,000, as a beginning at any rate. When we get into committee I propose to amend that section of the bill accordingly. I think that will be quite in order.

Mr. NEILL: Will that make it legal? Can you amend a bill to make up for such an important discrepancy?

Mr. CRERAR: I am not clear on the legality of it; I should think it is within the power of the committee to reduce, but not increase it.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I think the point made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is a very serious one, unless the house unanimously grants the minister authority to reduce the figure from $500,000 to $350,000. It is quite clear that under the joint operation of sections 53 and 54 of the British North America Act this bill can be considered only after a resolution has been adopted by the house; and inasmuch as the resolution provided for $350,000 we must take it that this is another bill entirely which is being introduced by the minister, a bill that has no reference at all to the resolution that was before the house the other day.

[Mr. Neill.]

Under the circumstances it is quite clear that the bill would be out of order, but I should think that by unanimous consent, in view of the very persuasive explanation by the minister as to how the Minister of Finance saw fit to reduce the amount from $500,000 to $350,000, feeling that the exchequer of the country could hardly go that far, the error might be rectified. I appreciate the explanation that was given, because a few moments before I observed that the minister looked at the Minister of Finance, who returned his glance with that happy smile sometimes described in loose journals as that of the cat that had swallowed the canary. It is quite clear that the fine Italian hand—with no offence to Mussolini—of the Minister of Finance is to be seen in the reduction of the amount from $500,000 to $350,000, and I fancy that the minister had good reason for making the change.

Speaking for myself only, I am sure those associated with me would be glad to accord the minister, with the unanimous consent of the house, the opportunity to treat the $500,000 as a misprint, as a misunderstanding of the will of the Minister of Finance, and to accept the statement that it should be $350,000 instead.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Leases and licences to prospect for minerals.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): When the resolution was being considered a few days ago the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George asked for certain information as to the position of various Indian reserves with respect to the minerals which might be found in or under them, and suggested it might be desirable to obtain a statement in the matter from the law officers of the crown.

I am not in a position to submit such a statement to-day. The matter has been before the Department of Justice for an opinion for some time, but the question is greatly involved and that opinion has not yet been received. With the permission of the committee however I believe I can outline the situation in the various provinces from a statement prepared by the officials of the department. With the permission of hon. members I shall read the statement, which is as follows:

The ownership of minerals underlying Indian reserves does not appear to have been determined with any finality, except as mentioned hereafter. Some months ago however the Department of Justice was asked for a statement as to just what the position of the crown in the right of the dominion is. Although this reference has been studied, when it is realized that there are 2,200 reserves scattered throughout the nine provinces, that these reserves were set aside or acquired at different times under varying conditions, and that the privy council and supreme court decisions on the subject of Indian reserve under-rights were given in connection with definite sets of circumstances that do not apply generally, and further that there seem to be some differences in the judgments, it will be appreciated that the task is by no means a simple one. Consequently it is not possible at this time to make a clear-cut statement as to the ownership of these minerals in all the provinces. In Ontario, the prairie provinces, and the railway belt and Peace river block, British Columbia, the situation is fairly clear, and it is desirable that proper mining regulations be established.

It might be well to make clear at the outset that part (1) of the bill does not involve any change in practice in the administration of Indian mineral lands. Mining regulations have been standing for years and it was only when the government revised the oil and gas regulations for Indian reserves with a view to bringing them up to date and providing for better revenue for the Indians, that the legal foundation for the regulations was questioned.

The justice department expressed doubt as to whether section 54 of the Indian Act was sufficiently wide to authorize the governor in council to pass general regulations of this kind. In other words while a particular lease or sale might be provided for by order in council, general regulations could not properly be set up under which the department might issue leases or otherwise dispose of such rights. The department has prepared new quartz mining regulations for Indian reserves but submission of these regulations to the governor general in council has been withheld pending approval being given by parliament to this bill.

Generally speaking the situation with respect to ownership of Indian reserve underrights appears to be about as follows:

Ontario

An agreement between the dominion and the province of Ontario was entered into on July 19, 1924, for the settlement of certain questions respecting Indian reserve lands. The agreement is set out in full in chapter 48 of the Dominion Statutes, 1924. It provided that Indian reserves should be administered by the dominion for the benefit of the Indians and—

"6. Except as provided in the next following paragraph, one-half of the consideration payable, whether by way of purchase money, rent, royalty or otherwise, in respect of any sale, lease or other disposition of a mining claim staked as aforesaid, and, if in any other sale, lease or other disposition hereafter made of Indian reserve lands in the province of Ontario, any minerals are included, and the consideration for such sale, lease or other disposition was to the knowledge of the Department of Indian Affairs affected by the existence or supposed existence in the said lands of such minerals, one-half of the consideration payable in respect of any such other sale, lease or other disposition, shall forthwith upon its receipt from time to time, be paid to the province of Ontario; the other half only shall be dealt with by the Dominion of Canada as provided in the paragraph of this agreement numbered 1.

7. The last preceding paragraph shall not apply to the sale, lease or other disposition of any mining claim or minerals on or in any of the lands set apart as Indian reserves pursuant to the hereinbefore recited treaty made in 1873, and nothing in this agreement shall be deemed to detract from the rights of the Dominion of Canada touching any lands or minerals granted or conveyed by His Majesty for the use and benefit of Indians by letters patent under the great seal of the province of Upper Canada, of the province of Canada or of the province of Ontario, or in any minerals vested for such use and benefit by the operation upon any such letters patent of any statute of the province of Ontario."

In effect this means that the dominion deals with the disposal of mining rights in Indian reserves, that the province receives one-half the revenue therefrom and the Indian band concerned the other half, with the exception that in the case of certain reserves in the vicinity of the north-west angle of the Lake of the Woods covered by the Indian Treaty of 1873, the Indians receive all the revenue.

Prairie Provinces

When the natural resources transfer agreements were entered into with the three prairie provinces and the crown lands transferred from the dominion to the provinces, provision was made in the agreements to avoid the difficulties which had existed in Ontario prior to the agreement of 1924. Two sections of these agreements read—

"11. All lands included in Indian reserves within the province, including those selected and surveyed but not yet confirmed, as well as those confirmed, shall continue to be vested in the crown and administered by the government of Canada for the purposes of Canada, and the province will from time to time, upon the request of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, set aside, out of the unoccupied crown lands hereby transferred to its administration, such further areas as the said Superintendent General may, in agreement with the Minister of Mines and Natural Resources of the province, select as necessary to enable Canada to fulfil its obligations under the treaties with the Indians of the province, and such areas shall thereafter be administered by Canada in the same way in all respects as if they had never passed to the province under the provisions hereof.

12. The provisions of paragraphs 1 to 6 inclusive and of paragraph 8 of the agreement made between the government of the Dominion of Canada and the government of the province of Ontario on the 24th day of March, 1924, which said agreement was confirmed by Statute of Canada, fourteen and fifteen George the Fifth, chapter forty-eight, shall (except so far as they relate to the Bed of Navigable Waters Act) apply to the lands included in such Indian reserves as may hereafter be set aside under the last preceding clause as if the said agreement had been made between the parties hereto, and the provisions of the said paragraphs shall likewise apply to the lands included in the reserves heretofore selected and surveyed, except that neither the said lands nor the proceeds of the disposition thereof shall in any circumstances become administrable by or be paid to the province."

British Columbia

Section 13 of the agreement respecting the union of British Columbia with the dominion reads:

"13. The charge of the Indians, and the trusteeship and management of the lands reserved for their use and benefit, shall be assumed by the dominion government, and a policy as liberal as that hitherto pursued by the British Columbia government shall be continued by the dominion government after the union.

To carry out such policy, tracts of land of such extent as it has hitherto been the practice of the British Columbia government to appropriate for that purpose, shall from time to time be conveyed by the local government to the dominion government in trust for the use and benefit of the Indians on application of the dominion government; and in case of disagreement between the two governments respecting the quantity of such tracts of land to be so granted, the matter shall be referred for the decision of the secretary of state for the colonies."

The dominion and the province entered into an agreement on the 24th September, 1912 (McKenna-McBride), which provided for the setting up of a commission to adjust the acreage of Indian reserves in British Columbia. The agreement contemplated the conveyance by the province to the dominion of additional areas for Indian reserves with full power to deal with the lands in such manner as it deemed best suited for the purposes of the Indians, including the right to sell the lands for the benefit of the Indians. This agreement was approved by the governments of the dominion and the province. The commission's report was received on 30th June, 1916, and in 1920 a dominion act was passed (Chapter 51) enabling the governor in council to give effect to the report in whole or in part. A similar act was passed by the province in 1919 (Chapter 32). The report was approved by provincial order in council on 26th July, 1923, and by dominion order in council on 19th July, 1924, excepting suggested "cut-offs" in railway belt.

On 22nd March, 1929, a supplementary agreement was entered into in connection with the reconveyance to the province of the railway belt and Peace river block and with respect to the form of conveyance to be used in transferring the additional reserves to the dominion. This agreement provided in part for the exclusion from the general transfer of the railway belt and Peace river block of reserves previously set aside by the province or the dominion and for the administration of such reserves in accordance with the conditions of the McKenna-McBride agreement. The lands were excluded from the general transfer by section 13 of the natural resources transfer agreement which forms a schedule to the Railway Belt and Peace River Block Act, chapter 37, statutes of Canada 1930. Clause 3 of the agreement of 22nd March, 1929, reads:

"3. We have considered clause 4 of the document known as the McKenna-McBride agreement, which reads as follows:

'4. The lands which the commissioners shall determine are not necessary for the use of the Indians, shall be subdivided and sold by the province at public auction.' It is considered that this provision might beneficially be varied so that it be provided that on agreement between the two governments, through their respective departments, the lands may be either subdivided for sale, or disposed of en bloc, as may appear most advantageous in the circumstances of each particular case, but that such sale and disposal shall be by public auction; and as to disposal of timber, mineral and similar rights, the same should be dealt with by agreement between the respective governments through their proper departments, and we shall recommend accordingly to our respective governments."

The forms of conveyance agreed upon in 1929 reads in part:

". . . the lands set out in schedule attached hereto be conveyed to His Majesty the King in the right of the Dominion of Canada in trust for the use and benefit of the Indians of the province of British Columbia, subject however to the right of the dominion government to deal with the said lands in such manner as they may deem best suited for the purpose of the Indians including a right to sell the said lands and fund or use the proceeds for the benefit of the Indians subject to the condition that in the event of any Indian tribe or band in British Columbia at some future time becoming extinct that any lands hereby conveyed for such tribe or band, and not sold or disposed of as heretofore provided, or any unexpended fund being the proceeds of any such sale, shall be conveyed or repaid to the grantor. . . ."

For years the department has been endeavouring to secure a conveyance of title to the reserves agreed upon by the McKenna-McBride commission but without much success. The matter has been discussed more than once within recent months with Premier Pattullo and he has given his assurance that it would be adjusted without further undue delay.

Mr. BENNETT: Probably the congress of the United States is dealing with it.

Mr. CRERAR: Possibly.

A draft form of conveyance was submitted by the province some weeks ago but it was not in accord with the form agreed upon in 1929 and is not acceptable to the department. This has necessitated further negotiations which it is hoped will shortly produce satisfactory results.

Quebec

There are no outstanding mining leases or mining permits covering Indian reserve lands in Quebec. The situation with respect to Indian reserves in that province is slightly different to that in Ontario.

Mr. BENNETT: None of them are in the mineralized area.

Mr. CRERAR: So far. To continue:

The decision of the privy council in the St. Catharines Milling case established that in Ontario the rights of the Indians in the lands was a "personal and usufructuary right" depending entirely upon the bounty of the crown. In Quebec the Indian interest in some cases amounts to beneficial ownership and in these cases the province has no claim to any reversionary interest.

Mr. BENNETT: In many cases they asserted their right to a reversionary interest, and it has been granted.

Mr. CRERAR: The statement continues:

In others, the rights of the Indians in reserves are personal and usufructuary and their position may be similar to the Indians of Ontario.

It is realized that the situation is not at all satisfactory particularly in view of the fact that the development of the mining areas in Quebec is being extended rapidly and the time will soon come when we will be faced with the problem of dealing with the mineral rights. As soon as a definite opinion is received from justice department further steps can be taken as may be considered advisable.

Maritime Provinces

It has not been necessary to give a great deal of thought to the dominion crown's title to minerals underlying Indian reserves in the maritime provinces. However the situation with respect to those reserves set aside prior to confederation is probably comparable to the case of Ontario. Certain reserves were purchased outright by the dominion and the dominion's title in these cases is absolute.

This is a lengthy statement, but I think it sets out the conditions as briefly and concisely as they can be set out at the present time. It is quite evident that there are varying conditions surrounding the titles to these reserves in respect to all that they may contain in the way of mineral wealth. The conditions governing vary in British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec and between different reserves in these provinces. However, when I approach the Department of Justice to see if they could give me a statement that would meet the wishes of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, they said it was quite impossible to do so at the present time. Consequently I have fallen back on this statement that was prepared by the officers of the department and which I think outlines the situation fairly well.

Mr. BENNETT: The statement just read by the minister is an interdepartmental statement for use in the department?

Mr. CRERAR: Quite.

Mr. BENNETT: I would think that in the main it is a very clear and correct statement of the situation. The St. Catharines Milling Company case is the leading case dealing with the rights of provinces to the reversionary interests in lands in which it was held the Indians had other than a beneficial interest. When their interest in the reserve terminated, the dominion thought that the interest in the land reverted to the crown in the right of the dominion, but the courts decided that it belonged to the crown in the right of the province. That is the decision so far as Ontario is concerned, and under the circumstances of that particular case. The late government had to deal with a situation in Quebec in which the same principle was applied, the conditions and circumstances being similar, but there are some reserves in Quebec which were created under different conditions than those applicable to the reserve in the St. Catharines case. The only practical difficulty is whether or not the mines and minerals under the soil in an Indian reserve belong to the crown in the right of the dominion or in the right of the province.

Mr. CRERAR: That is, speaking of Quebec?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the only practical question at issue in this bill. It is the whole question, because each case will have to be decided on its merits. It may be found when the minister is dealing with an Indian reserve in one province that the conditions of the original grant creating the reserve are such as to vest a claim in the crown in the right of the province and not of the dominion.

Mr. CRERAR: That would not apply to the prairie provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a point about which I am not entirely clear. There are some appropriations of land which stand on a different basis from the original treaty arrangements; in other words, the boundaries of the reserve have been to some extent modified from time to time, and it may well be that in particular sections conditions are different from those in reserves in parts of what was the northwest territories. But broadly the right to mines and minerals in what was the northwest territories should belong to the crown in the right of the dominion.

The suggestion I make to the minister in respect of this clause, in view of what is happening in the western development of oil, is that these leases should be disposed of by public tender or public auction. I am not saying that because there happens to be in power a government which I am not supporting. Some years ago a former lieutenant governor of Manitoba while a member of this house gave considerable attention and consideration to that phase of our public administration. His attention had been directed to certain conditions, and my attention had been directed to certain conditions. He had investigated certain matters and he discussed them with me. I am inclined to think it would be very helpful to the minister, to the department, and certainly to the Indians—inasmuch as we are only trustees, because that is all we are; we are administering this Indian property in trust—if the leases should be disposed of only by public tender or public auction. The granting of a lease to search for oil or precious metals is a matter of very great importance to the Indians, and the Indian has become, shall I say, somewhat suspicious in connection with the administration of his affairs. I am constantly having these matters brought to my attention; sometimes I see Indian chiefs in the summertime, and they tell me they are not satisfied about this particular thing or that. While in many instances the alleged grievance is wholly groundless, I believe it would be in the public interest if we provided that these leases should be disposed of by public tender or public auction. In the United States, they now provide that leases of this kind shall be disposed of by tender, and I am inclined to think that if the minister would so provide, he would do a real service to the Indians. At the same time he would render his own lot somewhat easier, because no one who is familiar with the history of this country during the last forty years in respect to the alienation of our timber limits and mining reserves and matters of that kind can be ignorant of the fact that there is always a disposition on the part of those who support the government of the day, regardless of party, to obtain if possible benefits by reason of that support, claiming that it entitles them to more favourable consideration than they would otherwise receive in connection with applications for leases and many other matters. The records of this country contain striking evidence of the success of those efforts, and my profound conviction is that in dealing with the Indians for whom we hold these lands as trustees it would be very much in the interests of all concerned if we provided that their disposition should be by public tender.

Mr. CRERAR: The suggestion of my right hon. friend is certainly interesting, but I am just wondering whether or not it would retard development.

Mr. BENNETT: It might have once, but it would not now, clearly.

Mr. CRERAR: Take a reserve, for the sake of illustration, where the geological formation might be favourable to minerals. A prospector comes along who has studied the geology of that particular reserve, and wants a permit to prospect. Now if the conditions were such that we were required to advertise before he could prospect, I doubt if you would find people interested in the matter. But suppose he carries on his prospecting and makes a discovery. It is at that point that he has to interest someone else, and quite clearly I think the place where the principle of public tender would come in would be in the initial stage, in the right to prospect. The fear I have is that the principle which the leader of the opposition has stated, and with which in general practice I wholly agree, might not, in a particular instance such as I have outlined, work out to the advantage of the Indians but rather to their detriment by retarding or preventing development. The conditions surrounding prospecting for minerals and developing mineral property are quite different from the conditions surrounding the sale of pulpwood or timber—

Mr. BENNETT: Or petroleum.

Mr. CRERAR: —or petroleum. In those cases I think I am safe in saying that the public auction principle should be recognized in the disposal of the surface rights. I recall very well that on the St. Peter's reserve, about thirty-five or forty miles north of Winnipeg, an old reserve, part of which was surrendered, there is still a substantial portion left which is marsh or hay land, and every year the right to cut the hay on parcels of this land is put up by public tender or auction to the neighbouring farmers. That principle I think is very generally recognized in connection with such matters, but I am afraid that in mineral development it would work to the detriment of the Indians rather than to their advantage. In the matter of prospecting for oil, I am not so sure. We had a request within the last year, if my memory serves me rightly, in connection with the Sarcee reserve.

Mr. BENNETT: Many years ago a company I know of had a permit to operate on the Sarcee reserve.

Mr. CRERAR: I believe my right hon. friend is correct. When the permit is given a certain charge is made, and there is a time fixed within which those taking out the permit have to do certain work, failing which there is a penalty which they have to pay, or abandon the work. If the development proceeds to the point where drilling takes place and oil is discovered, there is a provision in the regulations with respect to royalties. But I shall certainly give attention to the point raised by my right hon. friend, which might be covered in the regulations so far as it is practical to do so.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I should like to stress that general recommendation. When we are dealing with sub-surface resources we are dealing with something that is definitely wasting, and any expenditure of energy and money on the development of these resources tends only to lessen them. So that the generations to follow will have that against us; unless we are very careful to assure something to our Indians which represents compensation for the wasting of their resources, in symbol if not in actual value, they will have something to say about it. I visualize the time when we shall do that with all the mineral resources of this country. At present we throw them open to anyone who chooses to come, but the time is definitely coming when we shall demand from those who prospect and mine for mineral resources some portion of that which they mine and which they recover.

Mr. NEILL: I would suggest that as a matter of accuracy it would be better were the section to read:

The governor in council may make regulations enabling the superintendent general to issue leases on Indian reserves. . . .

According to the way the subsection reads now, he might lease a piece of my home farm. The old subsection 2 read like this:

The governor in council may make regulations enabling the superintendent general without surrender to issue leases for surface rights on Indian reserve.

Apparently we have abandoned that; we have just given them power to issue leases which may be anywhere, but I think that is rather an important thing. I suggest that the minister look into that. Nowhere in this section as it now reads is there any suggestion that the leases are to be on or connected with an Indian reserve.

While I am on my feet I should like to bring up another matter. I do not know that it has strictly to do with this section, but the minister introduced it, and I suppose it is arguable that it is in order; you cannot deal with the minerals on the reserve unless you have that reserve. He alludes to the McKenna-McBride agreement. If I remember aright that was negotiated in 1912. I remember the express urgency of getting the matter adjusted at that time; the government had chartered a steamer at a cost of $800 a day to take the commission around. That is twenty-five years ago, and they have not got it adjusted yet. There was a report made in 1916, I believe. I gathered from the minister's statement to-day that about 1919 they agreed upon a form of conveyance, and the interdepartmental report did not deal with the trouble between the two provinces. As far as my knowledge extends, because I have asked about this matter in years gone by, it arises from the fact that the province is not willing to cede the land it agreed to cede with a clear title; it wants to reserve the minerals and water rights. It must be quite evident that, whatever the terms of the agreement were, as I understand it it was to be a completely free deed by both parties. The dominion government wished on behalf of the Indians to get more reserves, generally small ones which had been omitted in the survey many years ago—mostly fishing stations in the district I represent. On the other hand there were some bigger reserves where it was patent that the Indians did not and never would require the whole area, and it was agreed that they should give up those portions. I think in one case it was a matter of a couple of hundred acres or something of the kind. But the whole thing is held up now; the land to be given back from the reserve cannot be touched because it is in this condition of tentative sale; it cannot be used. That is rather a nuisance in some respects, even to the Indians themselves. On the other hand the dominion government has not the title to these other reserves which it ought to have and which it may need now in the case of negotiations for mineral rights with the white people in the vicinity and so on. The minister says he has had conversations or negotiations with the premier of British Columbia. Did it not develop in those conversations just what the trouble was? —because it is so many years now. Either we have these rights and can make this agreement and should have the agreement, or we have not. Just what is the trouble as the minister knows it?

Mr CRERAR: I do not know that I am in a position to state precisely the reason for the delay.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister said he could not get any action.

Mr. CRERAR: It has been difficult to get action in the department concerned. It is not my place to criticize the methods of the administration of another government. Our departmental officers are of the opinion, and I agree with them, that the matter is quite clearly set out, and it should be settled. But it takes two parties to reach a settlement. So far we have not been able to prevail upon British Columbia to carry out the agreement in the terms as we understand it, and we think our judgment is right as to what those terms mean.

Mr. NEILL: I suggest another commission.

Mr. CRERAR: I hope that we may get somewhere with it in the next few months.

Mr. BENNETT: During all the years I have been in the house the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has always interested himself very keenly in these matters affecting the rights of the Indians in the province of British Columbia, and I am not paying him any compliment when I say I think he is more familiar with the situation than most of us. But there is this to be said, that the province of British Columbia under the terms of the McKenna-McBride agreement were to convey to us certain definite areas, and there is no limitation imposed upon the terms of the grant, but they now insist upon restrictions which are not within the agreement. That is the story as I understand it. The minister has very properly said that he and his department decline to give effect to the provincial view. It may have to be the subject matter of a reference to the courts or to an action of some kind before it is finally determined. So I suggest that inasmuch, as the minister very properly said, one does not want to criticize another government, especially a friendly member of the family as referred to in 1935, it might well be that the premier of British Columbia would not be ill disposed to lobby the matter before the congress of the United States, and they might be willing to arbitrate our differences and adjust them, either on the terms of a new military road or some other scenic attraction: possibly something of that sort might be done.

But leaving that for the moment I think if the minister will look at the section he will see that—I do not want to use a harsh term—it is rather loosely drawn. I confess that I do not think the second subsection means anything. If I might have the attention of the minister just one moment with respect to it: (a) contemplates grants being made by the crown of rights to prospect for, mine, and take away minerals under the surface of an Indian reserve after it has been surrendered to the crown. That is clear; only, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni points out, unfortunately when this bill was drawn somebody, it is quite obvious, was thinking in terms of a half million dollars, and he got that in and forgot to put in the provision that should have been included, that it applies to an Indian reserve. The section that it supplants or replaces provides, of course, that it deals with Indian reserves. There is nothing here to show that it deals with an Indian reserve. It might, for all we know, deal with one of those new sites acquired by the Minister of Transport for the broadcasting corporation, or something of that sort. The minister will note on the opposite page the old section. Of course it refers to surface rights on Indian reserves. This section does not refer to rights anywhere. What does (b) mean? Let us read the section:

> The governor in council may make regulations enabling the superintendent general to issue leases upon such terms as may be considered proper in the interests of the Indians and of any lessee or licensee,
> (b) Without surrender, to any person authorized to mine any of the minerals in this section mentioned, of surface rights over such area of any land within a reserve containing any such minerals as may be necessary for the mining thereof.

Surely the matter is not connected up in such a way as to make clear what that means. Another thing I find difficult to understand is, our sudden solicitude for the lessee or licencee. Our primary duty is to the Indian and the Indian only. I always thought the lessee was able to look after himself. But now we are adding to this section the provision, "upon such terms as may be considered proper in the interest of the Indians—" and these words underlined, "and of any lessee or licencee." Why should we be considering him? Our concern is the Indian. We are the lessors. The superintendent general is really the lessor in this case. I hope the minister will not regard me as unfair, but I cannot but think it is loosely drawn.

Mr. STIRLING: And who is the licencee?

Mr. BENNETT: Then the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) points out that we use the word "licencee" although there is nothing in the section to indicate who the licencee is, prior to the use of the term there.

Mr. STIRLING: When the matter was being discussed at the resolution stage I expressed the view that the cart was being put before the horse, in that the lease is being talked about before the prospecting. In the illustration the minister gave ten minutes ago he drew our attention to the probable chain of events. Certainly the prospector would come in before the lessee. It is improbable that an area will be leased or that an application made for the lease of mineral land which has not been prospected. The desirable way to approach this would seem to be to make arrangements for the possibility of granting a licence to prospect. Possibly this reference to a licencee means that. But it appears to me to come after the granting of a lease. From the minister's story just now it would appear that he is in agreement with me on that point. He did not refer to it when I raised the question before, but perhaps he would indicate now whether he thinks it is probable that anyone will want to lease a piece of an Indian reserve before there has been some demonstration by someone that there is mineral value on it.

Mr. CRERAR: I would think not, but on the other hand the prospector on a reserve wants to have his interest protected for the future should he find minerals. You could not say to a prospector: We will give you a licence to prospect, but we will not give you any right to develop or explore further than merely prospecting. If the prospector found mineral the department might say: Very well; thank you very much; we now know we have mineral there, and we will put it up for auction.

Mr. STIRLING: Might not a licence be given as a kind of option to that man?

Mr. CRERAR: What is proposed is to set up regulations which will permit of prospecting, and, if the prospecting is successful, lay down the conditions on which development can take place.

Mr. BENNETT: And the royalties, I take it.

Mr. CRERAR: Precisely. So the prospector when he goes on the reserve to prospect has before him a clear picture of what lies ahead as far as his relationship with the department is concerned, should his prospecting result in finding mineral.

Mr. NEILL: But he cannot go on without a surrender, and getting a surrender by the band means the expenditure of a lot of time and money.

Mr. CRERAR: The surrender by the band would have to be prior to his going on the reserve to prospect.

Mr. NEILL: But what prospector would go to the considerable expense of getting a surrender without knowing whether there is any mineral there?

Mr. CRERAR: If we get an application to prospect, or perhaps three or four applications, the matter will be taken up with the Indian band to ascertain if they are willing to give a surrender under the regulations.

Mr. MacNICOL: That is a surrender to permit prospecting.

Mr. CRERAR: And if the prospecting results successfully, the right to develop afterwards.

Mr. NEILL: How is the man to know there is any mineral there? He cannot go on the reserve to find out; that would be trespassing. If he wants to go on he will have to go through all the formality and expense of getting a surrender from the band. And it is expensive, because they are scattered all over; he has to get them together, get their consent, and that of the Indian agent. A prospector's means are limited; how will he do that? If he is allowed to prospect in a casual way and then get the surrender, that is different; but on account of the expense I would not seek a surrender until I knew there was some reasonable prospect of finding something.

Mr. CRERAR: Let me give an illustration. In the Little Long Lac area, if my memory is correct, there are certain well defined geological formations. There is an Indian reserve not far from the district where several mines have been developed. It is known that the same geological formation carries through the reserve. On the strength of that a prospector might say: I should like to prospect on the reserve. The department can then secure the surrender, if the Indians are willing to give it, prior to any prospecting being done at all. The point I am making is that it is not sufficient to have the surrender in the terms of the right to prospect; the surrender must include the right to go on and develop the mineral if the prospecting proves successful.

Mr. STEVENS: That raises the point I mentioned the other day. The bill as drafted, following the general terms of the resolution, is extremely broad. It does say "upon such terms as may be considered proper in the interest of the Indians," but there is nothing in the bill that I see which makes it obligatory upon the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs to protect the rights of the Indians in case of a discovery of minerals, by providing that they shall, in perpetuity I would say, share by royalty in whatever winnings may result from the discovery. Take subsection (a): the Indians must surrender their rights prior to the property being prospected, and some concern or individual having prospected the area, the superintendent general is free to make any agreement he may think fair for the recovery and taking away of the minerals, the Indians having already completely surrendered their rights. Parliament ought above all things to safeguard the inherent right of the Indians to some definite prescribed return in the form of a royalty or participation in the winnings from any discoveries made. That is a vital point.

To come to details, I could visualize this situation. Here is a reserve such as that the minister has cited, Little Long Lac, where it is known that the geological formation offers a probability of finding mineral. What rule can be designed, other than that which was adopted in the United States in the opening up of the Indian territories in Oklahoma, which would treat fairly different individuals who might go in there and prospect? It appears to me that what is visualized in this bill is that some individual or corporation may go to the government and ask for co-operation in getting the surrender, and then under the regulations may get a prior right to prospect, and acquire the right to mine such minerals as may be found. As I have already stated, the interests of the Indians are not safeguarded, and on the other hand it would shut out the opportunity to others to prospect and stake property. If we are going to follow the principle of surrender then it should be accompanied either by an open right, first come first served, or we should definitely state that the government or superintendent general will enter into an arrangement with the highest bidder, say. That might be one way; or with some corporation, company or individual for a specific right, an individual right, an exclusive right to prospect and recover.

The main point I have in mind, and which I think is quite inadequately dealt with, is the ultimate participation of the Indians in whatever the recovery may be. That is sufficiently defined in the act, and while it is true that for a great many years the superintendent general has satisfactorily administered Indian interests, as the minister has pointed out on several occasions usually those matters have concerned grazing leases, the cutting of hay or in some cases the cutting of timber. They have been comparatively small operations of no very great importance, most of them of very little importance. In this instance, however, it may be of vital importance and ultimately amount to very large sums as development occurs.

Personally I should be loath to see the clause pass in its present form. I think it should be reconsidered and redrafted, and I believe the statute should contain some definite limitation of the power of the superintendent general in the way of leasing, such as a stipulated minimum royalty. That is not a new thing; it is well established in many parts of the United States, particularly in connection with oil, and in Canada as well. There is a well-established principle in regard to royalty, and I see no reason why it should not be adapted to minerals as well as to oil. If such a provision is not included I for one would not be satisfied to have the bill passed in its present form.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I am glad to see this phase of the situation developing. The instinct of the prospector is very much like that of the homing dove; he will go after his ore wherever he thinks it can be found. Obviously the right thing is to have the Indians determine exactly what their position should be, and that can be done very easily in consultation with the Indian department before any prospecting takes place. Then if a prospector goes on a certain piece of land or into a certain reserve he knows that if he finds anything it is subject to certain conditions in regard to royalty or percentage of the company formed or something else, and he knows that definitely has to be faced before he proceeds. Then the matters of prospecting, stripping, cross-cutting and all that sort of thing, which are definitely associated with the ultimate development of a mine, can be undertaken in perfect freedom, and the capitalization of any company for such purposes can be proceeded with in the knowledge that those conditions have to be faced.

I feel quite satisfied that this is the only way in which the thing should be done, and I agree with the hon. member for East Kootenay (Mr. Stevens) that those conditions should appear in the act for the protection of the Indians. There will be a disposition, not necessarily at this time but at some later time, to avoid the responsibility of giving the Indians some value out of their wasting resources, and I think we must face that issue.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the minister replies I should like to mention another question and he can deal with them both at once. I think now the reason the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George asked the questions he did the other day, and the reason certain questions were asked the minister to-day, has become apparent. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken, as well as the hon. member for East Kootenay, was under the impression that the mines and minerals belong to the Indians. In some parts of the country they do not at all. In northwest Canada they belong to the crown in the right of the dominion; the Indians never had any title to them. It was for this reason that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George asked his question the other day. In different parts of Canada the ownership is dissimilar, as was pointed out in the departmental memorandum. We have no power at all to reserve a royalty to the Indians with respect to some parts of Canada, because the grant of the reserve did not give them any right to any of the minerals. But that is not so universally. There are some parts of the country in which that is not so, but it is so in western Canada between the lakes and the mountains. I cannot say as to the situation over the mountains, but when the minister mentioned the Little Long Lac reserve, as a matter of fact part of the mine that has been developed in that section of the country is believed to extend on to the Indian reserve, and as I understand it the law is perfectly clear that the mines and minerals under that reserve belong to the crown in the right of the dominion, not to the province of Manitoba or to the Indians. That is the difficulty. They never did belong to them, because when they received title to the reserve they did not get the minerals; that is provided by the statute which was subsequently confirmed by the imperial parliament.

That is the position there, but it is not universally so. I repeat, I do not think it wise or desirable to leave legislation of this kind to the governor in council. The minister was not in the house from 1930 to 1935, but with his well-known studious habits undoubtedly he read every pearly word of wisdom that escaped the lips of his now Prime Minister; and he realizes that government by order in council certainly is calculated to destroy the very fabric of this young confederation. The very foundations of it are imperilled. And despite the obvious anxiety of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor) to support Liberal principles, he will find it a little difficult to do so by becoming a confirmed believer in government by order in council. I do suggest to the minister that he is going a very long distance now in substituting the governor in council for the parliament of Canada. It is true that the council of the government now consists of a much more distinguished group of men than was the case then, in the minds of those who spoke so critically of them, but still they are not denied the power of criticism or the right to suggest that after all it was the principle and not the individual that was at stake. I leave it to the minister if he thinks it wise to entrust the governor in council with responsibility for legislation of that kind.

One point more arises out of that. I repeat: Why should we suddenly become imbued with the idea that we are no longer trustees for the Indians? You see, as it was we were always trustees for the Indians, until this bill came down. Now we have to be thinking of a man who is the lessee or licencee. What concern have we with him, and how long have we had to be considering the other man when we were dealing with the interests of the Indians for whom we were trustees? As long as our superintendent general does his job, which is to look after the Indians as trustee, I do not think he should be worrying very much about the interests of the lessee or lessees. But that is one of the amendments proposed by this bill.

Then there is the next point, which is this, and I am going to take them in order. To whom does the Indian surrender—to the crown or to an individual? Heretofore surrenders to my knowledge have always been to the department—that is, to the crown through the department. The surrender is given by the Indian to the crown. What compensation is he to get? The old statute provided:

> Such terms to include provision of compensating any occupant of land from any damage that may be caused thereon as determined by the superintendent general.

That had not to do with this particular phase of it at all. The Indian is asked to surrender. The minister writes a letter to the agent and says, "We have been advised that it is not improbable that a vein of gold or silver may extend under this area. There are men willing to prospect it, but before we can do anything we will have to have a surrender. I want to get a surrender of that from the Indians." He goes out and sees the Indians, saying, "I want you to surrender." He takes the form provided by the department, with which we are all familiar. Those forms are presented to the Indians, some of whom can write and some of whom cannot; others make their mark. They come together. If the prospector is very anxious to see about this surrender being given he usually provides something in the way of liquid refreshments or otherwise, wholly against the law, to lubricate the transaction of business and make it much easier to obtain the surrender. I am sorry to say that this is so.

The surrender is obtained. The crown has the title; what is the compensation to the Indian? It would seem to me that there is a case in which the crown must come in, and in which we should have legislation,—because the Indian has no interest in the minerals, by law. But he should have an interest by agreement. The crown should say, "If you do surrender we will give you in perpetuity or during your lifetime in the mine which may develop there ten per cent, fifteen per cent or twenty per cent, or whatever royalty may be taken from any earnings which may come from the development of the property That is where the crown comes in in connection with the matter. That is where the crown comes in, by reason of the fact that under the law as it now stands the Indian has no interest in the mine or mineral under the land. He has only surface rights, and they are held in connection with his rights on part of the reserve.

Then, let us come to the next point, which has to do with the question of prospecting. As this bill now proposes, that can come about only after surrender. What starts the minister to ask for a surrender? Because someone says there is something there, or because a prospector says there is, there is no obligation then, as the hon. member for Kootenay East has pointed out, to give it to him. Somebody else may step in the minute it is done, and say, "I am going to prospect there." But he cannot prospect there unless he has a licence to do so. Therefore the minister gives his prospector's licence to a man and sets the wheels or machinery in motion, in order to get the surrender. That is what happens there.

How could it be done any other way, as it now stands? I suggest to the minister that he take the matter up with his officers and redraft the section so as to express more clearly what I am sure he has in the back of his mind, namely a provision that will not retard development but rather assist it, and one which will ensure the Indian getting something through his surrender of something which will accrue to the crown by reason of his parting with his reserve.

Mr. STIRLING: Is it not the idea that he should get the rent?

Mr. BENNETT: He might get the rent, but it would be a very insignificant sum, relatively. It may be a very valuable mine and the royalties may amount to thousands or perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars. What strikes me more than anything else, having reference to what was said by the hon. member for Nanaimo, is that in connection with the South Africa diamond mines the crown took sixty per cent of the earnings of the Premier mine, the greatest single diamond mine in the world. Sixty per cent, by way of royalties, to the crown; and they still take fifty per cent of the difference between the old statutory price of gold and the new price established by the United States.

Under these circumstances might it not be well for the minister to consider the redrafting of this section, so as to express what he clearly had in his mind, and something which certainly this section does not express? It would take some time to do it properly, but certainly it is not expressed here. I do wish once more to point out to him that the officer who suggested that the words should be added "and of any lessee or any licencee" should be told that after all we are the trustees for the Indians, and that we have had no difficulty heretofore in discovering lessees or licencees who are highly competent to take care of themselves, either directly or through the aid of competent and skilled professional men whose services they can always employ.

We must not get away from the one idea which was common to the whole of the legislation affecting the Indians, namely that we are their trustees. Nothing less than that will satisfy the law; and any attempt to make us trustees for somebody else is at variance with the whole theory of our law, as written. I ask the minister to let the section stand, to recast and redraw it so as to provide that at least with regard to some fundamentals we are going to have it in the statute; I entreat him not to depart from all those great traditions upon which our institutions are founded, and substitute for parliament the governor in council, even although it consists of eminent gentlemen, three of whom I see opposite.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, so far as the governor in council is concerned this particular section does no more than is done in other sections of the Indian Act dealing with the disposal of surface rights.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but they are done by auction, as you know.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; usually sold by tender or auction.

Mr. BENNETT: They have to be.

Mr. CRERAR: The leader of the opposition has placed an interpretation upon the clause which would indicate that we have in mind some protection for a lessee or licencee. The purpose of the provision is simple. There may be a reserve where the surface rights have already been granted to someone; for instance, the right to cut pulpwood for a period of years, as happens in some cases. Such a person has certain rights on the reserve. Along with that may come the possibility of discovering minerals. Someone else wishes to prospect the reserve to discover if minerals are there. This provision is inserted simply to give the governor in council power to make regulations which will properly safeguard the interests of the man who has the right to cut timber, or is cutting it, and of the other man who is given the right to prospect. That is all that is given in the section.

Mr. STIRLING: Who is the licencee?

Mr. CRERAR: The licencee may in one case mean the man who has the right to cut pulpwood on the reserve.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Then if that is so, clearly it is not stated correctly in the bill, because it says:

To issue leases upon such terms as may be considered proper in the interest of the Indians and of any lessee or licencee.

Mr. CRERAR: And of any person else who may have such right.

Mr. BENNETT: But the words "lessee or licencee" refer to the people mentioned in paragraphs (a) and (b) who now become lessees and licencees. This is all one section.

Mr. STIRLING: We do not know who the licencee is, because it is not referred to anywhere else.

Mr. CRERAR: When we get upon matters of legal interpretation I am on rather difficult ground. It seems to me however that the intention is clear.

Mr. STEVENS: I take it the minister means the prospective lessee.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: The lease to be issued, because it refers to that in the same subparagraph. The subparagraph reads:

The governor in council may make regulations enabling the superintendent general to issue leases upon such terms as may be considered proper in the interest of the Indians and of any lessee or licencee.

There is no intimation that it refers to any other type of lessee.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the only person it could refer to.

Mr. STEVENS: Taking the minister's interpretation there should be a subclause to make it clear that this is protecting the interests of prior lessees, which is an entirely different thing.

Mr. CRERAR: I suggest that this section be allowed to stand and I shall look into the points raised by the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for Kootenay East.

Mr. NEILL: Was this thing drawn up in the department of the minister?

Mr. CRERAR: It was.

Mr. NEILL: It seems to me that the law officers of the crown would have more sense than to do anything like this.

Mr. CRERAR: This bill passed the law officers of the crown.

Mr. NEILL: Was it drawn up in the minister's department?

Mr. CRERAR: As is customary, the draft proposals were placed before the law officers of the crown, who were told what the department desired in respect to these amendments.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister may have answered this already, but I should like to know if any requests were made to the department prior to the introduction of this legislation for the privilege of prospecting or acquiring mineral rights on reserves.

Mr. CRERAR: There were one or two. There was one in connection with oil rights on the Sarcee reserve, west of Calgary.

Mr. BENNETT: That is an old one. There is also one at Little Long Lac.

Mr. CRERAR: There was also, as I recall, a request there. I might deal with another point that was raised by the hon. member for Kootenay East. It would be rather difficult to specify in the act the exact return that the Indians should get from mining minerals on a reserve. The purpose is to draft regulations covering the mineral development from the beginning to the end. Obviously that must be regarded as one operation. A man who goes in to prospect must also be given the right to carry through with the mineral development. Otherwise he will not go in to prospect.

Mr. BENNETT: He gets the one only if there is a surrender, and the other he may get without a surrender, under the proposed legislation. He can get the right to prospect only with a surrender, and he can get the right to surface rights without a surrender.

Mr. CRERAR: The regulations must cover the whole story of the development. You cannot give a prospector merely the right to prospect. If he has not the right to follow up with the development, he will not go in to prospect. You will stop your development right at the beginning. Consequently the regulations must set out the whole process of the development, they must cover the prospecting, the right to explore further, the right to put in a mill and convert the ore into a saleable commodity. The terms upon which that is to be done and the returns that will be made to the Indians must be covered by the regulations.

Mr. STEVENS: My point is that the statute should provide for a minimum royalty, let us say ten per cent. This principle would be applied to all. When an individual prospector or a company contemplates the exploitation of some mineral deposit, he or they will know that whatever eventuates a royalty of so much will have to be paid. The royalty should be fixed in the statute so that everyone would know what he was faced with should he desire to undertake some development. I do not want to come down to this level, but things have happened before in dealing with the public domain. What I have to say does not apply to this government any more than to any other, but the government might be and probably will be subject to all sorts of pressure to secure leases under the most favourable conditions once it is known that there are good prospects in the reserves. I know, and I am sure the minister knows, that occasionally, not frequently, some of the most insignificant prospects develop into fabulously rich mines. The Sullivan mine, one of the greatest lead mines in the world, was sold for $10,000 after some development work had been carried on. One might cite other similar cases in northern Ontario. The whole business of mining is surrounded with an element of indefiniteness. No one can know until a property has been developed what results may be achieved. To pin in the statute some minimum safeguarding the rights of the Indian would not interfere with the minister or the superintendent general making detailed regulations covering terms and conditions, but the underlying principle should be laid down in the legislation. I appreciate what was said a moment ago by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) to the effect that in some sections mineral rights are not inherent to the reserve. Undoubtedly that is true.

Mr. BENNETT: The reservation could be made in favour of the Indian just the same.

Mr. STEVENS: Quite so. There is another phase of it. With the surrender of Indian rights the British Columbia government claims that the reserve reverts to the province. That feature should also be considered. The whole business is exceedingly complicated and complex when we come to deal with mineral rights. I insist that we should protect the rights of the Indians in the matter of participation in the winnings, and I plead earnestly with the minister that when he is considering the redrafting of this measure he include in statutory form a specified minimum royalty right. I am suggesting that ten per cent should be the minimum, but that may not be satisfactory. Then the matter of tendering might be considered and this feature could be provided for in the regulations. This might be considered in connection with cases where it is known that the geological structure is favourable and that there are likely to be valuable minerals in the area. One tenderer might say, "Yes, I will pay more than the minimum; I am ready to pay twelve per cent." Another tenderer may say, "We are willing to pay fifteen per cent." There would be an opportunity to improve the position of the Indians. At the risk of being tedious, I repeat that there should be in the statute a minimum royalty protection for the rights of the Indians.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister mentioned Little Long Lac. I am sure he is familiar with the situation of the Indians in that area. He must know that the Indians are more or less excited over the possibility of their hunting grounds, not merely their reserve, being overrun by irresponsible whites who are likely to steal their traps, interfere with their hunting, and so forth. If prospectors or anybody else are to be allowed to go on the reserve and prospect for minerals, I wonder what is going to happen to the Indians. Suppose gold is found in large quantities in the area around Little Long Lac; where are the Indians to go? They have been shifted now almost off the face of the earth; the whites keep moving them farther and farther north all the time. Later when the Indian estimates are up I shall have a word or two to say about the matter. I know the minister is sincere in his efforts to help the Indians. I have been on quite a number of reserves where I have heard his good intentions commended, and I want to commend him upon what he has in mind for the Indians. I am deeply interested in the whole Indian set-up in this country, and in due course I may have something to say about it. At the moment, having travelled over quite a number of reserves myself, I am just wondering what the effect will be on the Indians if under this measure the reserves are to be invaded by prospectors.

Mr. WOOD: I should like to make one or two observations, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). I believe that the purpose of this bill is to safeguard the interests of the Indians. I have had some experience, as a representative of a constituency containing one of the largest reserves in Canada, in connection with the disposal of oil and gas leases, and if I understand this bill aright it is just to place within the Indian department the leasing of Indian territory because they have there men who by knowledge and ability are equipped to supervise the leasing of these areas. Am I right in that? Is not that the purpose of this bill?

Mr. STEVENS: The minister nods his head. Surely he does not agree with that statement. The Indians are not surrendering their lands to the department.

Mr. WOOD: If you want to get a lease from the Six Nations reserve it has to be approved by the Indian council. They are not competent to look after such things properly, and I take it that the purpose of this bill is to safeguard the interests of the Indians. We had a glaring example on the reserve in my constituency of what a small amount the Indians were able to derive from a lease; had it been on a royalty basis it would have been much better for the Indians. Vast quantities of gas went off that reserve. I shall not give the figures because it is the private business of the companies concerned.

This bill is a step in the right direction to safeguard the interests of the Indians, and I support the minister in every piece of legislation he brings down for the purpose of properly looking after the interests of the Indians. They have a lot of wealth in their reserves; unfortunately the average layman is unable to interpret a lease very satisfactorily, and in many of these Indian leases there have been so many holes that the lessees have been able to get out from under their responsibility and have made only a very meagre contribution to the Indians. I am only a layman, and after listening to the contributions of hon. members of the legal profession to the discussion I am much more confused than I was two hours ago; but I was hopeful that this bill was going to do the very thing the hon. member for Davenport wanted, namely to have the interests of the Indians safeguarded by the superior knowledge of the Indian department.

Mr. NEILL: I am sure that none of us questions the integrity and devotion of the minister and his desire to do the best he can for the Indians. It is simply a question of procedure. I agree very largely, practically wholly, with the remarks made by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), but I wish to draw attention to another phase and to make one last attempt to explain about this surrender business.

Speaking subject to correction, and possibly the hon. member for Kootenay East will correct me if I am wrong, I am practically certain that in British Columbia a prospector can go anywhere he likes. He can go on my private garden and stake a claim if he likes. I recall that when the streets of Victoria were being dug for a drain-pipe, there was something that looked like gold; a prospector staked the street in Victoria and was only prevented from going ahead and doing development work by a by-law which required him to put up a large amount as a guarantee. So far as my knowledge goes, the ordinary prospector who has paid a licence fee of five dollars, I think it is, can go and prospect anywhere on public or private land. He can, as I said, stake a claim in my garden; when he has staked it he can record his stake for a fee of $2.50, and he is then confronted with the obligation to buy out my surface rights. I am protected there. There are some railway lands where the base metals are owned by the railway, but a prospector can prospect on those railway lands, and although the base metals belong to the railway he can prospect for gold and silver; and if he makes a discovery he has to get some form of quit-claim from the railway company of their rights in regard to the base metals. But there is no prohibition preventing him from going ahead and prospecting at all. He can prospect anywhere he likes.

The idea of this legislation is to get people to prospect on Indian lands to develop supposed wealth, but you will not get these lands prospected on these lines because the prospector is not going to stop at an imaginary line in the bush; he is going to go right into the Indian reserve and ascertain whether there are any minerals there. Theoretically he is not supposed to go on the reserve until he has complied with the law, and he has to get a surrender from the Indians when he comes to the reserve. Now there may be two or three hundred Indians scattered over the district and elsewhere, and it may take a year to get them together and get the surrender. A man on Vancouver island applied last August to buy a miserable lot, sixty by one hundred and thirty, and he has not got the Indians together yet to give a surrender. The red tape of the Indian department, and the apathy, shall I say, of the Indian agent, has resulted in that condition. A prospector makes a discovery of certain minerals on a reserve and he tries to get a surrender from the Indians. The Indians may be fishing up on the Skeena river and will not be back for six months. The surrender must be obtained from a majority of the band, and the Indian agent says: We shall not be able to get the band together until February. The prospector gets disgusted and goes away. You will not get the ordinary prospector to go in and prospect if you require a surrender by the Indians. I cannot see why the Indians should be compelled to surrender it. Let the prospector go in, and if he discovers minerals, then make your conditions when he is wanting to develop his mine; but you will not get very far if you compel him, before he can do the most casual prospecting on that land, to get a surrender.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister also give consideration to the question of the necessary use of the water if successful mining is undertaken? Will this clause give him all the power that he needs to grant rights to use the water for domestic, industrial and perhaps for power purposes, all of which will be needed if the mine be successful?

Mr. CRERAR: So far as the water power is concerned—

Mr. STIRLING: Water will certainly be required.

Mr. CRERAR: Quite. Of course the purpose of this section is to enable the governor in council to make all the regulations that are necessary in the premises.

Mr. NEILL: To legislate.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, to do just what the governor in council has power to do now in respect to the disposal of other rights on Indian reserves. I would suggest, as I stated a moment ago, that the section should stand. I wish particularly to look into the possibility of favouritism, which might be implied in this section, to a lessee or licensee. However, the point which the hon. member for Kootenay East raised, that the act should definitely contain a provision of a minimum royalty or compensation to the Indians for minerals taken off reserves is one which, I think, it might be difficult to apply. I shall be glad to act upon his suggestion and look into the matter. It might be possible to put in some limitation that the amount should not be less, for instance, than the royalties appertaining in respect of provincial lands under similar circumstances. I recognize at once that there are difficulties in the way of carrying out the suggestion of the hon. member. I suggest that clause 1 stand. We might consider clause 2 and pass it.

On section 2—Advances for assistance to Indians.

Mr. HOWE moved:

That in the last line of page 2 the words "five hundred" be struck out and the words "three hundred and fifty" be substituted therefor.

The CHAIRMAN: "Three hundred and fifty thousand dollars."

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. STIRLING: Is the idea that the various bands of Indians may approach the minister through the agent and advocate the setting aside of a certain sum of money to enable them to do such and such?

Mr. CRERAR: No. The purpose of this is to provide a fund which may be drawn upon to assist individual Indians or communal enterprises on reserves, or, as I stated the other day in the discussion on the resolution, to supply raw materials, for example, to Indian schools for the promotion of handicraft work. The intention is that it will be provided by way of advances from this fund. The individual Indian may get $1,000 to equip himself with some live stock. That would be done on the advice of the Indian agent, or, in some instances, perhaps of the farm instructor on the Indian reserve. There are other cases where the Indians as a band might be supplied with live stock out of this vote, but with the definite understanding that repayment would be made to the fund over a period of time. The purpose is to encourage in the Indians the virtues of independence and self-reliance. At the present time, if an Indian needs some machinery or a team of horses to work his individual piece of land—if he has one—on the reserve, the only way he can get it is by the money being voted by parliament and given to him, and consequently that has come to be regarded by the individuals concerned as a gift or a grant. Those are not the conditions under which the virtues of independence and self-reliance can be cultivated and developed.

This scheme, if such it may be called, was put into effect several years ago in the United States, and according to the information obtained by our officials in the department at Ottawa, in many instances it has worked out quite successfully. Quite obviously there are a great many reserves to which this would not apply, which could not take advantage of it. On the other hand there are many reserves—several in Ontario and in the prairie provinces, and some in the maritime provinces—where it could be applied. That is the purpose of the fund, and I think we have safeguarded it sufficiently to ensure that the money will be wisely spent.

Mr. STIRLING: Supposing a band or a portion of a band wanted assistance in building a community hall or a church or the setting aside of a piece of land for a cemetery—two of these instances have occurred recently in my riding—would they be permitted such assistance under this scheme?

Mr. CRERAR: No; I do not think those cases would come within what is contemplated in this plan.

Mr. STEVENS: I suppose they must be "self-liquidating."

Mr. CRERAR: Well, I had that precious word in my mind a little time ago, but I hesitated to use it. It is intended to apply where the loans or advances will be repaid. Assistance in the matter of getting an area suitable for an assembly or the building of a community hall would, I should say, come out of the ordinary vote; it would have to be provided for there. Conceivably you might get assistance from the fund for a community hall, but it would have to be on some plan that would permit of the repayment of the money. So far as the administration of this fund is concerned, it is the present intention that it shall be used only for such purposes. We do not wish to create the impression in the Indian's mind that this is the same as an estimate passed in the house and the money handed to him. I think the scheme is worthy of a trial, and I anticipate that some useful results will come from it.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister is quite correct in that view. I believe that useful results will follow, but I have great hesitancy in supporting legislation which provides for money being given to the individual Indian by the department. Frankly, I believe you are going to create friction on the reserves where you authorize the crown or the department to lend money to the individual Indian. If it is done through the band or the chief, the situation becomes tolerable. If it is done through the representative of the government, I think the position will be intolerable. I support the experiment with that limitation. I have a fairly intimate knowledge of two bands of Indians; I am quite familiar with their experiments in agriculture; and I know of the coal mine which they operate on one of their reserves with some degree of success. I have seen the department take extreme care of the Indians as regards medical attention, and their numbers, which were formerly diminishing, are now increasing.

The band that lives nearest to Calgary is a band of Indians in indifferent health, the Sarcees. A large area of their reserve is used for military purposes and has been taken as a training ground, and they get some revenues from that source. Then there are the Stony Indians a little further west who are naturally hunters and who complain bitterly that they are not getting sufficient to enable them to live decently, that what they receive is inadequate for their necessities. If I thought that granting them money as individuals for the purposes mentioned in this bill would be helpful, I should like to support it, but from what I know I say to the minister that he would be well advised if his department did not deal with the individual but left it as a matter between the chief and the band. If we start in as a government to make loans to individual Indians, every Indian in the band will ask for money and if he does not get it he is going to wonder why one man is favoured as against another. If they are allowed to work it out in their own way at their own powwow, I think they would select the individuals entitled to loans without arousing the animosities and jealousies which would be inherent in any effort the crown or the Indian agent might make in that direction.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not altogether agree with my right hon. friend on that point. There is, for instance, the Caradoc reserve near London, Ontario, where there is a considerable area of excellent farming land, and we have on that reserve well educated Indians who have a piece of land of their own, but have no means to carry on farming operations. If this were limited solely to advances to the band as a whole, there would be no place in the picture for them.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister did not follow me. I said the advances should be made to the band for the purpose of enabling them to determine the individuals who might be benefited, rather than that the crown itself should do that.

Mr. CRERAR: I should be afraid in that case that even the chief and his councillors might not be the wisest people to decide who should receive a loan, and the extent of the loan. I visited this particular reserve two years ago; I found there several Indians who were doing very well. They carried on excellent farming practice and were successful farmers. But under the act they were Indians. Adjacent to them were other Indians who were depending practically altogether on the government for relief. If I may use that as an illustration, one purpose of this legislation is to assist Indians who are now on relief to become self-sustaining, and if possible put some fibre and morale into them in that way. I think the scheme is well worth trying.

Mr. HAMILTON: Is it contemplated to include under "equipment" in section 94B, such things as fishing equipment, nets, etc.?

Mr. CRERAR: It might include that.

Mr. HAMILTON: I have in mind the Indians on lake Superior who are engaged to a certain extent in fishing, who might be assisted under the provisions of that section, and I am curious to know whether it is contemplated that such things would be included.

Mr. WOOD: Would advances for buildings and repairs come under this section?

Mr. CRERAR: I should not like to answer that definitely at the moment. I think it would require a stretch of the imagination to get them in.

The equipment mentioned by the hon. member for Algoma West (Mr. Hamilton) would come I think, within the category.

Mr. BENNETT: I think so.

Mr. WOOD: I think there is something in what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) said, provided the band in many of those reserves could be induced to duplicate the amount advanced by the government. On the Six Nations reserve, which is the largest in Canada, and perhaps the most progressive, there was an effort made last year by the department to rehabilitate some of the Indians who by virtue of the fact that they live under the Indian Act could not go out and borrow money to supply themselves with the necessary equipment. On that reserve of 54,000 acres there are practically 6,000 acres not being tilled, and growing up with weeds, because through the depression years they had to sell and keep on selling equipment until there was nothing left to work with. The department has gone a certain way in supplying those Indians with implements of production at cost under an agricultural instructor, and because of this service they are paying back the cost of the implements to the department. The agricultural instructor only two weeks ago called my attention to the fact that this spring alone, for ploughing gardens and corn fields with his tractor, he has received $158 in cash for the services that the department has rendered. This shows that the Indians will pay provided there is proper supervision. I would ask the minister to give some consideration to the suggestion of the leader of the opposition, provided the Indian band will duplicate the amount that the department is prepared to advance, where there is, say an agricultural instructor to supervise those advances and see that they get value for their money. This would extend the service the department is rendering, and putting the responsibility on the band would lead them to take a greater interest in their own people. I do not see any reason in that case why advances should not be made for buildings and equipment which are particularly necessary on the reserve I mentioned because it is a first-class farming section, and they cannot maintain the fertility of the soil unless they have stables in which to keep live stock.

Mr. BENNETT: I think in the last line the wording should be changed to read, "live stock, fishing and other equipment." There is some doubt whether the law officers would not say that under the present wording, you could not provide for fishing nets. To say "live stock, fishing and other equipment" would meet the situation.

Mr. CRERAR: I think "equipment" would cover it.

Mr. BENNETT: But it says, "live stock and equipment", and the ejusdem generis rule might make it different. If you said, "fishing and other equipment", there would be no question. I mention that because the question was asked of me, and I am afraid I agreed too hastily in saying I thought the language was broad enough to cover it. There might be difficulty, and I should not like to find myself in the position of having indicated that I thought it was all right when on looking at it carefully I might be in error.

Mr. CRERAR: If it would tend to clarify it I have no objection to the insertion of the word "fishing," after the words "live stock", and the insertion of the word "other" before the word "equipment".

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I so move.

Amendment (Mr. Mackenzie, Vancouver) agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: I do not think we have passed the first amendment yet of $150,000.

The CHAIRMAN: There are two amendments; that was the first.

Mr. NEILL: I just want to say a word or two with regard to the first amendment. I am aware that all these bills must contain provisions granting power to make regulations, but I always protest at such extreme power being taken. It gets down to the point where the governor in council instead of this parliament is given power to legislate. On page 2 the bill states:

—such advances shall be made under regulations established from time to time by the governor in council—

The other day the Minister of Finance introduced a bill in connection with loaning money to municipalities, and he safeguarded himself by repeated conditions. He said the rate of interest was to be two per cent; that no single municipality could get more than so much, and so on; but all these powers in this case are to be exercised by the governor in council. Is any interest to be charged on these loans? We do not know. Surely we ought to know. If we were dealing with white people I am sure we would be demanding that information. Then again, is there to be a limit; is any one Indian or any one band to be allowed to get a large amount, or is there to be a restriction such as the Minister of Finance provided in his bill? Then again, is there to be any period to the making of these loans? Is it to extend for all time or for a limited time, or what are these conditions?

I submit that we ought to be informed on these points, and that these matters should not be left to be dealt with by regulation. I submit that the general outline of these things should be put in the bill. Surely it is not out of the way that anyone representing Indians, as we all do indirectly, should ask whether they are to pay interest and, if so, at what rate. Is there to be any amortization? If so, what is the period? I think we are entitled to know all these things. Does the minister not think so also?

Mr. CRERAR: The purpose of the provision in the section which my hon. friend has just criticized is really to limit the power of the department; in other words, the conditions under which these loans may be made or advances given, and the uses to which this revolving fund may be put, will not lie wholly within the discretion of the Indian department but will have to conform to regulations adopted by the governor in council. That is the purpose of the provision.

So far as the rates of interest are concerned, certainly it would be the intention to charge interest, but the rate might vary in certain cases. For instance, a certain rate of interest might be charged to an individual Indian; another rate of interest charged on a loan to an Indian school for the purchase of materials to be worked up into goods for sale. Those conditions should not be too rigid. I repeat that the purpose of this provision is to not leave the power wholly in the Indian department to say when or how or to whom these advances may be made out of this fund, but to subject that to the scrutiny and approval of the governor in council. It may be necessary to vary the conditions from time to time, and that is why provision is made to vest the governor in council with power to make these regulations.

Mr. NEILL: I really do not accept with any intense appreciation the explanation given. The minister says the real purpose of giving the governor in council this power to legislate by regulation is to prevent too much power getting into the hands of the department; that now the matter will be controlled by regulations which must be approved by the governor in council. Of course that does not sound so bad, but while I have never been in the council I have an idea that these regulations will be prepared by his department and presented by him to council more or less as a matter of form. Then it will be held in council that as the minister whose department is concerned has gone into the matter thoroughly and prepared these regulations, they must be appropriate, and they will go through as a matter of course. What I am suggesting is that it should not be left to the governor in council to settle these things; they should be settled by this house, as was done in the case of the housing act, the farm loan act and so on, which had to do with white men. I cannot see why an Indian, or those interested in the welfare of the Indians, should be kept more in the dark, than those concerned with white people.

The minister says he does not know what rate of interest will be charged. That is an extraordinary statement. We are going to embark upon what seems to me a hazardous enterprise if we charge varying rates to different people. Why should Jones get a better rate than Smith? I cannot see why. I should suppose that the interest charged either of them would be governed to some extent at least by the interest the government has to pay in the first place, as is the case under the farm loan act. That board has to sell its debentures, and they must loan the money to the farmers at a certain interest rate not more than so much above the rate they have to pay. But now this matter is going to be dealt with by regulation, and the interest may be varied according to the circumstances. I do not know why one Indian should get a better rate than another. An Indian can easily make up a story as to why his circumstances are more necessitous than those of the other man, or why a school should be favoured more than a band of Indians, and so on.

I agree with what the right hon. leader of the opposition said as to the inadvisability of lending money to individual Indians, because if you do you will not be bothered about interest, repayments or anything like that; you will not get back more than two per cent anyway. However, I do think the committee should be informed on these matters. The minister has not told us the rate of interest he is going to charge, but that will be dealt with by regulation under the act. I really do suggest that it is not desirable to give the governor in council, which largely means the department, such sweeping powers, such as are not asserted by the Minister of Finance, whose department is supposedly much more capable in these matters than the Indian department. I should like the minister to express himself as to whether he does not think it advisable that at least there should be some indication as to the interest to be charged, the period for which it is to be charged and the limitations in regard to individual loans. Can he not give us any information on those points?

Mr. CRERAR: No; at the moment I am not in a position to give my hon. friend information on those points. As a matter of fact, the farm loan act, the home improvement act and the Dominion Housing Act all give power to make the necessary regulations for the carrying out of the acts. This is a new venture, wholly in the nature of an experiment—I think with a fair chance of working out—and I do not think it is asking too much to give the governor in council power to make regulations for the administration of this fund. We could have left out that provision, in which case the administration of the fund would have remained wholly in the hands of the Indian department. Obviously that might be open to criticism. I can assure my hon. friend that while I may bring or recommend to council certain regulations under this act, that does not at all mean that council will accept my proposals.

Mr. BENNETT: No; that is proved by that $500,000.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. That was really a mistake, though. The right hon. leader of the opposition is getting a good deal of merriment out of that typographical error, but I can assure him that his guess in that respect is just as wide of the mark as many of his guesses in connection with other matters.

Mr. BENNETT: If his other guesses were as accurate as this he has been correct very often.

Mr. CRERAR: No; he is wide of the mark. Those are the reasons why we suggest that the governor in council should be given power to make regulations. They may limit the loans and say, "You cannot go above a certain amount in individual cases."

Mr. NEILL: What amount?

Mr. CRERAR: That will be determined by the circumstances of the case.

Mr. NEILL: That is what I am objecting to; we are giving the government power to legislate. I protest that we are passing a bill which we would not pass if it were to apply to white men. The minister says the other acts give power to make regulations. That is so, but it is subject to the other provisions of the bills which set the rates of interest. Is the rate of interest in this case to be one per cent or 6 per cent or 10 per cent, or what is it to be? Is this a proper provision for us to pass? The minister says he does not think there is going to be any harm done. If we are to surrender to the governor in council our power to legislate, let us understand it; but why does not the Minister of Finance do it? I may say any experience I have had with the Indian department in recent years would encourage me to put power into the hands of the Minister of Finance rather than into those of the Department of Indian Affairs.

Mr. BENNETT: But that was prior to 1935.

Mr. NEILL: We will not go into dates. But I do submit the minister has not given us satisfactory reasons why we should pass legislation giving his department power—because it comes down to that; his recommendation is accepted by council—to fix a rate of interest which is entirely in the air. Will he say it will not exceed 6 per cent? When the bill in connection with farm loans was before the house we asked the questions: What is the farmer to pay? What rate will he be charged? What is the service charge to be?

Is there to be amortization in this instance, and over how many years is it to be spread? I think we are entitled to know these things before we pass legislation of this kind? The minister is content to say, "It is an experiment." Yes, but let us limit the experiment to within at least reasonable bounds.

There is one other matter I should like to discuss, although it does not apply directly to the bill. It was introduced by the minister. When he spoke on the resolution he referred to band funds, and indicated that those funds belonged to the bands and therefore could not be used for purposes suggested in the bill. His actual words were:

> As a matter of fact, when these moneys go into the band funds, they cannot be taken out of the band funds by the administration without the consent of the Indians.

If he had put that into the bill I would be very happy, because I have been trying to get that provision for many years. When I was Indian agent I would at times be sent to get the surrender of a piece of land from Indians to be used for necessary purposes, such as the building of a railway, or something of that kind. The first thing the Indians would say was—and I need not put it into dialect—"What are we getting out of this?" I would say, "The law says you are getting a certain sum of money, half of which will be distributed among you, and the other half put into a fund in your name." Although they did not ask it at first, later they did ask, "What is the fund going to be used for?" Later on they discovered, and I discovered, that this was used to pay relief to the Indians, and the Indians—not being absolute fools—when I came back again to get another surrender said, "What is the advantage in our surrendering this piece of land? We give up a piece of our land, and you take the equivalent in money and put it into a fund. We understand that. You keep it in a bank. Then, when our people are poor and when we go on relief you take the money out of our fund. If we had not given the surrender of that piece of land we would still have enjoyed relief. But now you make us pay our relief out of our capital. You have persuaded us to surrender this land. We receive only half the sum in cash, and now you pay the rest into the fund and it is used to pay relief." They said—and they used a strong word—"you allow the department to rob us of that money." The same policy is still going on in a greater or lesser degree. If the bill is to provide for funds to lend the Indians money, and if the minister says that, as a matter of fact, when these Indian moneys go into the band funds they cannot be taken out without the consent of the band, then it is all right with me. But that is not by any means the policy the department has carried out.

Mr. BENNETT: I really think that on reflection the minister will realize that it is desirable to state, say 3 per cent interest. I concur in the views expressed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Just let us pause for a minute. If it is going to be open to differentiation between east and west, we are going to have the same difficulties that governments have experienced in times past. That is the reason why I take it that in the measure before us yesterday there was provision for a 2 per cent rate, but it applied equally to the west and to the east. It applied to every part of Canada; and I should think that if the minister provided for possibly 3 per cent, he would be fair to the Indians, having regard to the nature of the experiment, and to the country.

I can only say, of course, that the minister knows how fully I agree with the observations of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni as to the governor in council becoming a legislative rather than an administrative body. There are measures which are quasi-administrative and quasi-legislative in regard to which the executive must at all times have jurisdiction, and exercise it. Here you are dealing in a legislative way with matters which during the present session and in previous sessions we have thought of sufficient importance to be dealt with by parliament, and not by the delegated authority which the governor in council receives from parliament.

I think the minister would be well advised to consider, and favourably, the suggestion made by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and provide for a 3 per cent rate. Then there would be no difficulty between contending communities as to the rate. The minister would say, "It is fixed by statute; I cannot make it more or less. It is the same in Ontario as it is in British Columbia." I believe he would find this very satisfactory.

Mr. CRERAR: There is no danger of conflict between contending communities in the administration of this provision.

Mr. BENNETT: There might be.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not wish to place upon it the limitation suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. It may be desirable in certain circumstances to loan money for a certain period free of interest altogether. For instance, we may wish to take up the matter of making handicraft articles for sale, and as an encouragement to an Indian school we might say, "We will advance you a few thousand dollars"—or a few hundred dollars, as the case may be—"to buy material out of which you may make these goods." There may be another instance where we would be advancing money to an Indian tribe as a whole for the purchase of live stock, a project which would be of common interest to the tribe. In that case we might wish to charge 4 per cent or 5 per cent. If we put in a definite provision setting out that a certain rate of interest will be charged, I believe we will make the administration too rigid and too difficult.

I should be very glad indeed if I might believe that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni had a little more confidence in the impartiality and fairness of the government in protecting the public interest in connection with making these regulations. I believe this might be very well assumed in the circumstances.

Mr. NEILL: It is the judgment of the Indian department I am dubious about.

Mr. CRERAR: I promise the hon. member for Comox-Alberni that as always I shall scrutinize carefully any recommendation I make to council in connection with a matter of this kind. I should like to agree to the suggestion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, but I think it would be a handicap in administration.

Mr. NEILL: I assume we must accept the minister's statement and must not waste more time in the discussion, but I must point out that this is a most extraordinary situation, one which has never been seen in the house before, where large sums are being loaned without the rate of interest being indicated. However, let it go at that.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think they can collect any.

Mr. NEILL: And it is discriminatory. One man can get it at one rate, and another body such as a church or some body with possibly more political influence, can get it at another. The Minister of Finance is now in his seat. May I say to him that I was paying him a compliment by stating that when he introduced legislation in connection with a large loan he insisted that the rate of interest, the amount of amortization, the period of the loan, limitations as to municipalities, and so on, be defined in the bill. I do not know whether the minister's attention has been called to it, but here is a bill under which we are told it is proposed to lend up to $350,000 at varying rates of interest.

Mr. CRERAR: I stated it might be desirable to vary the minimum, or it might be useful.

Mr. NEILL: I had in mind the bills the Minister of Finance introduced in connection with farmers' creditors and so on. In those bills the minister always defined the rates of interest, the charges and so on. However, the Minister of Mines and Resources will not accept this suggestion. I just want to make one last suggestion, that there should be a concluding section in this bill similar to that which appears in many bills, that within fifteen days after the opening of parliament a report shall be made covering the preceding calendar year. That would make the information readily available for us during the session.

Mr. CRERAR: I would be quite prepared to accept that suggestion.

Mr. NEILL: I am astonished.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni is making headway. If he continues he will have the whole bill redrafted according to his wishes. However, speaking seriously, I think his suggestion is a useful one. Perhaps this section could stand also, and the hon. member's suggestion will be incorporated in the bill.

Amendment (Mr. Howe) agreed to.

Section stands.

Progress reported.

TRANSPORT COMMISSION

AUTHORITY TO CONTROL TRANSPORT OF PASSENGERS AND GOODS BY RAILWAYS, SHIPS AND AIR CRAFT

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 31, to establish a board of transport commissioners for Canada, with authority in respect of transport by railways, ships and air craft.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2, subsection 1, paragraph (a)—Definitions—"Agreed charges."

Mr. REID: Could the minister explain why lumber is not included in paragraph (e) covering goods in bulk? In the committee this paragraph was amended to include pulpwood, woodpulp, including pulpwood and woodpulp in bales, iron and steel scrap and pig iron. It seems to me that leaving lumber out of this definition is detrimental to the Pacific coast. Pulpwood and the other commodities mentioned in this paragraph have to do mostly with the eastern coast, and I should like to know why lumber has been left out.

Mr. HOWE: The intention was to include in this definition those goods which ordinarily move in bulk and which are the raw materials of manufacture. There is one exception in the case of grain and grain products, including flour and mill feed in sacks. The reason for this exception is the fact that the life of a mill depends upon its being able to ship its products at a rate more or less competitive with the rate of its raw materials. With that exception, the goods enumerated are goods usually shipped in bulk. It may be considered that an exception is made in connection with pulpwood and woodpulp in bales, but we find that on the St. Lawrence it is customary to bale these commodities for shipment. Woodpulp is the raw material for paper mills, and it usually moves as a full bulk cargo. Lumber is a manufactured product and is highly competitive as far as transportation goes. It was felt that the shipment of lumber should be regulated. I may say that intercoastal shipments of lumber are regulated in the United States in connection with cargoes passing through the Panama canal.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be observed that paragraph (e) contains the following:

> ores and minerals (crude, screened, sized, refined or concentrated, but not otherwise processed) including ore concentrates in sacks.

What the hon. member for New Westminster has said with respect to lumber being a raw material can be said also of refined concentrates. In many instances the lumber is shipped just as it comes from the saw without being planed. Frequently it comes to the prairies in that condition. Surely lumber unplaned must occupy the same position with relation to poles and logs as refined concentrates occupy with respect to "ores and minerals (crude, screened, sized, refined or concentrated, but not otherwise processed)." It could be said that some apt words might be used, such as "lumber other than planed lumber." I can understand the point made by the minister, that planed lumber is a material immediately ready for use, but I would remind him that a great deal of the lumber which comes to the prairies is not planed. It is planed in our mills after it arrives on the prairies. Then we have lumber moving down the east side of the Rockies to the mills on the prairies. That is true of Edmonton and Calgary, and to a lesser degree of Regina. They would not pay the freight on rough lumber when they could have it sent forward as planed lumber. I think that point is worthy of consideration. There should be a clear distinction as to lumber being a bulk cargo when it is not so prepared as to be ready for use.

Mr. HOWE: The committee considered this carefuily and it was felt that the raw material for lumber is logs. Of course, the movement on the prairies would not be affected by this bill. Whereas logs sometimes move in bulk to the extent of a full shipload, it is seldom that lumber moves as a full shipload.

Mr BENNETT: It does by water.

Mr. HOWE: Not since the schooner days. I have not seen a full shipload of lumber for many years on a boat of a class that would come within the scope of this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: I have seen cargoes, but I do not know how large the boats were.

Mr. REID: I have seen these large boats with nothing but lumber on. Wheat and lumber and bulk goods are what they ship. The bulk goods are principally from the east and are exempt under this bill, while the bulk of the lumber from the coast of British Columbia is going to be controlled under this legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose this has been agreed to by the committee; but I must say that I have great difficulty in inducing myself to believe that it is sound, having regard to what took place in the United States in the early days of transportation, as described by Miss Ida Tarbell, in connection with rates and agreed charges that were made by great companies with the carriers of that day, notably the Pennsylvania. It does seem to me to present an opportunity for great abuses. The minister is unable to point to any country in which it is successfully working. It is true that in the United States they have talked about it, but they have not done it. I have made inquiries since the minister spoke on the second reading of the bill, and I cannot find that they have it in force in the United States, although they have talked about it.

Mr. HOWE: No; but there are over two thousand agreed charges in effect in England, where it has been operating for four years.

Mr. BENNETT: But the situation in England is quite different from what we have on this continent, as anyone knows who is familiar with their network of transportation facilities and the way in which they have arranged them. There are areas wholly within the sphere of activity of one transportation system; you have another one in a given area, and then you have the London, Midland and Scottish taking control of an area. Then there is the Southern. There are four separate systems.

I do not want the minister to go over the ground again, because I know this has been threshed out in the committee and perhaps I should not be taking up time over it, but I confess I have been unable to find any good reasons for thinking that this is not going to work a hardship, and not only that, I think it will bring about those very conditions which caused so much difficulty in the United States and, by discrimination, made it possible to create a situation that brought into being the Interstate Commerce Commission, the standardizing of rates, and the prohibition against common carriers making rates for one person that were not enjoyed by all. That is what it gets down to. Stripped of everything, this simply means that a rate can be made which cannot be availed of by everyone.

Mr. HOWE: The bill says just the opposite.

Mr. BENNETT: Whatever the bill says, stripped of everything it does mean that. Those of us who recall the history of transportation in Canada will remember that before the late Hon. A. G. Blair, as Minister of Railways, introduced and passed through this parliament legislation providing for a railway commission, he deputed Doctor McLean, the deputy chief commissioner, to study the whole matter abroad for, I think, a whole year, and his book is the one that is still circulated among those who desire to obtain a knowledge of the history of the development of transportation in this country. It is looked upon almost as a standard work in some of the universities. On the strength of that Mr. Blair, as Minister of Railways, introduced that bill, which is now the law of the country and under which he became the first chairman of the railway commission.

But with respect to freight rates it was no longer possible to do what was done in days prior to that. Some shippers, for instance, got free transportation. I can remember when I went west forty years ago that a man who had large traffic had transportation given to him by one of the systems or by both. Every effort was made to induce him to do all his business in that particular way, and the whole essence of Mr. Blair's legislation was: No discrimination between the carrier and his customers, none at all, under any circumstances, and discrimination was made a very serious offence. Perhaps the minister, with his early training in the great country to the south of us, will recall the great agitation which went on there which brought into being the Interstate Commerce Commission. In addition to that, in order that there might be no discrimination, most of the individual states have their several railway commissions to prevent, with respect to local rates, any variation. A man's business may be worth only one dollar a year to the corporation, or it may be worth a hundred thousand dollars. The rate is the same. That was the basis of the rates, as regards both state and federal authorities in the United States. Now, whatever may be said of this bill, stripped of everything it is going to get down to a form of discrimination.

Mr. HOWE: It is rather difficult to discuss, the matter of discrimination when we are considering the definition of "agreed charges." We have whole paragraphs designed to prevent discrimination, and I would suggest that that phase of the discussion might wait until we reach them.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps that is a sound observation. The definition of what is an "agreed charge" is one thing, and the application of it is another.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraphs (b) to (e) inclusive agreed to.

On paragraph (f)—"Great lakes".

Mr. BENNETT: I desire to direct the minister's attention to the fact that in the letter which came from the Secretary of State for the United States, and which is to be found in the votes and proceedings of May 31, 1938, he specifically pointed out that the sovereignty of the United States with respect to lake Michigan must be admitted. The second paragraph of Article VII of the draft treaty states:

> Nothing in this article or in any other article of this treaty shall be construed as infringing or impairing, in any way, the sovereignty of the United States of America over lake Michigan.

I mention that only because I have grave doubts whether or not the parliament of Canada should attempt to give a definition of the great lakes that involves the inclusion of property which the United States asserts solemnly is within their sovereignty, and they use the word "sovereignty" in the draft treaty.

Mr. HOWE: I am quite prepared to delete lake Michigan. It has no purpose in the bill anyway. Lake Michigan is surrounded on all sides by United States territory, and this bill does not apply to traffic plying from a Canadian point to a United States point. I would ask my colleague the Minister of Finance to move that the word "Michigan" be deleted.

Mr. DUNNING: I move accordingly, Mr Chairman.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not wish to be taken as indicating that I agree with the Secretary of State of the United States—

Mr. HOWE: Quite.

Mr. BENNETT:—because Lake Michigan so mingles with the other great lakes that to say there is sovereignty over the whole of it, without being able to define it, is a proposition with which I am unable at the moment to express agreement.

Mr. HOWE: Quite. I may say I did not suggest deleting the words because I admitted sovereignty. I deleted it because it had no real purpose in the bill in the connection in which it is used.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): How, then, do the words "and its tributaries" become affected by the same description given by the leader of the opposition?

Mr. BENNETT: It is a tributary all right. It is a tributary of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. HOWE: St. Lawrence and its tributaries. Of course there are tributaries of the St. Lawrence; for instance the Richelieu.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

On paragraph (g)—"licencee".

Mr. REID: I was wondering if the word "railroads" should not be in there, because I notice in paragraphs (m) (n) and (o) transport by air, water and rail specifically mentioned, although in paragraph (g) it just mentions "transport by water or by air".

Mr. HOWE: No licence is required for railroads. The railroads come into this bill under the Railway Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Would it not be well that the minister should add the words "within Canada" after the words "St. Lawrence river and its tributaries"? It certainly could do no harm, and would make it clear that we were not endeavouring to legislate beyond our own jurisdiction. Probably the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) will say it is the rule that we must be taken to be legislating within our own competence. On the other hand, would it not be wise to add the words "within Canada"?

Mr. HOWE: In view of the international section of the river I would prefer not to do that. For example, a boat coming from Kingston to Montreal does pass beyond the jurisdiction of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that. Is that not one of our difficulties?

Mr. HOWE: Of course there are restrictions to our legislative competence in an international sense; for instance, pilotage and anything of that kind affecting the two countries. But for the purpose of this bill I do not think there is any difficulty. I believe that to insert the words "within Canada" would introduce difficulties which would trip us up later on.

Mr. BENNETT: But have we any jurisdiction outside Canada?

Mr. HOWE: We have jurisdiction over boats which travel outside Canada in moving between two Canadian ports.

Mr. BENNETT: In foreign waters our jurisdiction, except such as attaches to the flag, is gone.

Mr. HOWE: Nevertheless we have jurisdiction over the voyage. We are talking about rates for a voyage between two Canadian ports.

Mr. BENNETT: But we are talking about the definition now. This is a definition clause.

Mr. HOWE: I would prefer not to make the change.

Mr. STIRLING: Does this cover the Ottawa river?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Is that clear from the paragraph?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. It is a tributary of the St. Lawrence.

Paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph (h)—"Maritime provinces."

Mr. BENNETT: Quebec would say it is a maritime province. But we need not discuss that.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph (i) agreed to.

On paragraph (j) —"Ship."

Mr. REID: Could the minister explain why this is changed to "five hundred" tons? Previously, I think, it was one hundred and fifty tons. That does not take in such a large ship.

Mr. HOWE: Representations were made that there is a class of trade plying from Montreal on the lower St. Lawrence which has never been regulated. In many instances goods are not even carried with a bill of lading. The limitation suggested was one hundred and fifty tons, and it was believed that limit would cover traffic of that class, but representations were made that some of that traffic would have been brought under regulation, and the committee decided, somewhat against my better judgment, to raise the limit to five hundred tons.

Mr. BENNETT: I think one hundred and fifty was too low, and I think five hundred is too high.

Mr. HOWE: I did, too.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph (k) and (l) agreed to.

On paragraph (m)—"Transport."

Mr. BENNETT: It is a little difficult to see that this definition means much. "Transport means transport."

Mr. DUNNING: It is just in case it might mean something.

Mr. BENNETT: The paragraph says that "transported" and "transporting" shall have corresponding meanings. I take it they are going to carry on "correspondence." Otherwise they have no meaning.

Mr. DUNNING: A lawyer must have done that.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph (n) (o) and (p) agreed to.

Subsection 1 agreed to.

On section 2, subsection 2—Application of Railway Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it quite clear that there is no inconsistency between subsection 2 and the previous definitions? I would have thought subsection 2 might have said, "Except as herein provided." It says:

> Unless it is otherwise provided or the context otherwise requires, expressions contained in this act shall have the same meaning as in the Railway Act.

Probably that is broad enough to cover the different meanings which are given to some of the terms, and which are not exactly similar to the meanings given in the Railway Act. Perhaps the thing is clear.

Subsection 2 agreed to.

Section agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: We shall go on with part I this evening?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, after the private bills. Section 2 is carried, Mr. Chairman, as I understand it?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and subsection 2 of section 2.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

COPYRIGHT ACT AMENDMENT

POWER OF MINISTER TO PROTECT PUBLIC AGAINST ABUSES OF EXCLUSIVE RIGHTS

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Stormont) (for Mr. Martin) moved the second reading of Bill No. 124 to amend the Copyright Act.

Mr. NEILL: Explain.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The sponsor of this bill, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) is unavoidably absent this evening, and has asked me to speak to this motion. The present Copyright Act contains provision for relief where the owner of the copyright fails to print a copyrighted work or cause the same to be printed in Canada, or fails to supply the reasonable demands of the Canadian market for such work. In such case any person may apply to the Secretary of State for a licence to print the work. The granting of the application is subject to various conditions. The compulsory licence provisions are limited to domestic works where the author is a Canadian citizen. The purpose of the present bill, as I understand, is to give to the minister greater powers in dealing with such applications and to protect the public against any abuse of the exclusive rights conferred upon copyright owners by the act. The further powers conferred by the bill correspond with the powers given by similar provisions under the Patent Act, 1935. It is the intention of the sponsor of this bill to amend it in committee so that application may in future be made not to the minister but to the registrar of patents, and also that the relief may be granted by the registrar of patents. It also provides for leave to appeal from his decision to the exchequer court of Canada within a certain period of time, so that such applications will ultimately be reviewed by the courts.

The present bill arises out of a decision of the minister holding that under the present working of the compulsory licence sections of the Copyright Act he had no jurisdiction to grant an application for a compulsory licence in connection with certain fire insurance maps which are the subject of copyright. This application had the support, among others, of thirty-three Canadian fire insurance companies, but the minister was unable under the present wording of the section to consider the application on its merits. The bill is obviously one which should be considered by a standing committee, and it strikes me that the committee on banking and commerce is the one to which it should be referred.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): Perhaps in the absence of the hon. member who introduced this bill I may now give a further explanation as to its motive and what it may lead to. I must congratulate my friend, the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Chevrier) who in a few words has given the essential features of this bill. Its object is to introduce into the Copyright Act sections similar to those which already exist in the Patent Act, permitting the minister to grant redress in the case of monopolistic ownership of a copyright. This provision does not exist in the Copyright Act, and the reason is quite obvious. I may point out that in the Patent Act there are a number of sections which are fairly sweeping, whereby in case of abuse of rights under patents the commissioner of patents may order the owner of the patent to supply the Canadian market, and a complete series of sections provide that the patent owner may appeal to the exchequer court, etcetera. These sections are Nos. 65, 66, 67, 68 and 69 and other sections of the Patent Act of 1935.

There is an essential difference between a patent and a copyright. By reference to the interpretation section of the Patent Act one finds an invention defined as "any new and useful art, process, machine, manufacture or composition of matters, or any new and useful improvement in any art, process, machine, manufacture or composition of matter." In other words, the Patent Act deals with an object, and gives an exclusive right to a patentee to manufacture and sell that object. A copyright is a different thing. The definition of copyright is found in section 3 of chapter 32 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927:—

> For the purposes of this act, "copyright" means the sole right to produce or reproduce the work or any substantial part thereof in any material form whatsoever, to perform, or in the case of a lecture to deliver, the work or any substantial part thereof in public; if the work is unpublished, to publish the work or any substantial part thereof.

I think it is apparent, when those two definitions are compared, that a copyright is quite a different thing from a patent. In the case of a copyright, which covers mostly works of a literary or artistic nature, it has never appeared that the owner of a copyright could have the least interest in not publishing or selling reproductions of the work; therefore there has been no provision made in the Copyright Act, and to my knowledge—and I have been following copyright discussions for the last twenty years—this is the first instance of a demand being made, at least in the house, for a provision similar to that in the Patent Act against the monopolistic ownership of a patent.

The situation which now faces us is different altogether. Experience has shown that not only may we have to deal with an artistic or literary work, but there might also be copyrighted works of a commercial application, of which the exclusive ownership might become of great advantage to the owner of the copyright. That is the case which has been submitted recently to the Department of the Secretary of State, in which a group of insurance men are the owners of a copyright covering insurance maps which have no literary or artistic value, but which have an exceptional commercial value. In their refusal to allow another group of insurance men to buy copies of those maps they were put in a position of imposing conditions whereby these maps might be acquired by the other group, which has led to the charge against the first group of exercising a monopoly. Therefore the case has been submitted to the Secretary of State. After very careful consideration of such case, and without pronouncing on the merits but merely considering whether there is in the Copyright Act any section that might apply, my officers and I have come to the conclusion that there is none. There are, it is true, the licence clauses of the Copyright Act of 1921, but they do not apply to a case like this. I remember distinctly when these clauses were inserted. That was done under the late Hon. Mr. Doherty, and I was a member of the committee which dealt with the act at that time. I know very well that the purpose of these clauses was altogether different from the purpose that is now invoked. It was also the legal opinion of the departmental experts that these licence clauses could not possibly apply to such a monopoly.

Mr. MAYBANK: If the minister would permit a question at this point, was the copyright in the case presented an inherent copyright as the result of having done the work, or was it a copyright that had been applied for and obtained from the Department of the Secretary of State?

Mr. RINFRET: It was acquired from the original author by the present owners, if that is what my hon. friend wants to know.

Mr. MAYBANK: I did not mean that. I had understood that in the case of these insurance books there was an inherent copyright; that it was not a copyright sought and obtained upon application to the Department of the Secretary of State.

Mr. RINFRET: I do not think that would have a great bearing on the case. I may tell my hon. friend that the application I had to consider was whether the licence clauses of the present Copyright Act could apply to the ownership of the copyright in those insurance maps. I just wanted to explain that the licence clauses had no other purpose than to protect the Canadian printers. I may add that at the time the authors protested vigorously against the insertion of these clauses in the Copyright Act, as they object also to the amendment now before the house, because they claim that copyright is an exclusive right. When the case was submitted to the department my only function was to decide as to whether the licence clauses could apply to the ownership of those insurance maps, and it is quite apparent to anyone who reads these clauses carefully that they do not. In brief, the licence clauses merely state that when a book or a work of art is edited outside Canada and the Canadian market is not supplied with copies of the work, then the printer may apply to the Secretary of State and obtain permission to publish the same work in Canada under certain conditions. That is why this bill is introduced now, because I think both parties are quite agreed—or at least they have to abide by the decision of the Department of the Secretary of State—that there is nothing in the present Copyright Act which deals with the particular case that has been submitted to us. Therefore, under the terms of the present act we have to decide that the owners of the copyright have exclusive rights to it and cannot be forced to sell it to anybody.

The intention of the present bill is to give the minister power to decide that in certain cases the owners of a copyright carry it to abuse, and to grant such relief, in the words of the bill, as the minister may deem just and fair in the circumstances. Without any desire to criticize, I am afraid the bill has been drafted rather hurriedly. I am not pronouncing as to its merits in general, but I think it is an endeavour to cover the particular case that has been submitted to the department.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Was this matter not taken before the exchequer court last February?

Mr. RINFRET: I was coming to that. This particular phase of the question was not before the court, but the ownership of the copyright itself has been disputed and the case has been heard in the exchequer court. That court has rendered a judgment, and an appeal has been taken to the Supreme Court of Canada, so that phase of the matter is now sub judice

For all these reasons I agree with the hon. member for Stormont that we should not, in the single hour that is available twice a week for the consideration of public bills, and at this late stage of the session, endeavour to consider in detail a bill of such complexity, but that it would be much better to have some committee of the house consecrate the necessary time to it. I still have my doubts as to whether or not the principle of the bill should be adopted. I am not quite convinced that the dispositions of the Patent Act could well be applied to the Copyright Act in general. I must admit, however, that this exceptional case has created a doubt in my mind which did not even exist before the point was brought to my attention. I may say also that, as in dealing with patents or trade marks, or even the shop cards bill that I introduced earlier in the session, whatever power may be placed in the hands of the minister I believe there should be an appeal to the exchequer court. This bill does not provide for such an appeal, and I believe it would be a mistake even to consider the bill unless it contained a provision of that kind.

May I add that I have received a considerable number of telegrams both for and against this question as well as quite a number of representations on both sides. I believe we should approach this bill with very great care and not be too hasty in our decision. I believe both sides should be heard. Therefore I desire to move in amendment that the bill be not now read the second time but that the subject matter be referred to the committee on banking and commerce. This is moved as an amendment to the motion for second reading.

the minister upon having made a motion that will obviate the necessity of our affirming a principle which, unfortunately, at this time of the session it would be difficult thoroughly to appreciate and understand. It is quite clear that, in any event, those provisions of the bill which contemplate retroactive action with respect to pending litigation should not be accepted by this house. It would be cruel indeed if we were to interfere with pending litigation, and I cannot think that the sponsors of the bill would so desire.

With respect to the merits I have no observations at all to make, because I would be prejudging something about which it may well be that in the light of further evidence I might be able to arrive at a conclusion other than that which I now have in mind. But I feel quite certain that the bill should be referred to a committee. My only doubt was as to whether or not that committee should be the committee on banking and commerce, or a select committee, because the banking and commerce committee has a very great deal of work to do. It is a large committee, and it has been found that in matters of this kind usually a select committee is able to devote more time and attention than the standing committee to the consideration of the subject matter of a reference. However, in view of the remarks of the minister it apparently is to go to the committee on banking and commerce, and so without prejudice to the merits or demerits of the measure, except in respect to that portion of it which would deal with pending litigation, I have much pleasure in supporting the amendment of the minister.

TRANSPORT COMMISSION

AUTHORITY TO CONTROL TRANSPORT OF PASSENGERS AND GOODS BY RAILWAYS, SHIPS AND AIR CRAFT

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 31, to establish a board of transport commissioners for Canada, with authority in respect of transport by railways, ships and air craft—Mr. Howe—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 3—Board of transport commissioners.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the minister's intention with respect to the present board of railway commissioners? This contemplates the creation of a new board.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): It simply changes the name of the existing board, as I understand it.

Mr. BENNETT: I am asking as to the personnel.

Mr. HOWE: It does not affect the personnel at all.

Section agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5, subsection 1, paragraph (a):—Application for licence.

Mr. REID: Although I appeared before the committee and made representations regarding this clause, I am afraid I must still register an objection, because I view the section with alarm, if it is passed in its present form. It is all very well for the minister to express the view that the section would not bring about discrimination; but I fear that once it comes into effect, a steamship company in British Columbia wishing to go into the business of transporting lumber or other goods may very well, according to this section, meet with grave objections from the board administering the act. I therefore raise the objection and ask that even at this late hour some further consideration be given. Perhaps the minister could meet the argument I have advanced, and if so I should like to hear what he has to say.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the minister answers the hon. member, probably I might say a few words.

Mr. HOWE: Very well.

Mr. BENNETT: We are now getting to the point where we propose to license transportation facilities. That is what this means. We have created transport companies on sea, land and in the air. Now we are carrying bureaucracy one step farther and providing for the licensing of organizations which under the act will transport goods and/or passengers.

To lay a foundation for a licence for that purpose is not an easy undertaking, but those who propound the measure must be prepared to support that thesis. While I have not followed in detail the work before the committee, the minister and those who hold similar views, namely the supporters of the administration, believe that a case for licensing has been made out. I am not unmindful of the difficulties that we have in this country with respect to our railways and their revenues, and the difficulties that are being experienced by the railways in other ways as well. But it is a long, far cry from financial conditions to the point where we say that we shall licence those whom we have created for the purpose of carrying on the business.

I know how strongly this has been advocated in certain quarters, and I understand their motives, motives which are sincere and earnest. They are endeavouring to increase their revenues. And they propose to increase their revenues by diminishing the traffic that is handled on the one hand by unlicensed organizations, and by increasing the traffic, they believe, of those whom they say are entitled to the licences, namely, their own organizations and others, including those operating in the air.

The section is explicit in stating that you have to determine, first, "public convenience and necessity". That is the purpose as indicated by the bill. The board of transport commissioners will have to determine whether the public convenience and necessity—it is not alternative, but is a cumulative expression—require this transport service. That issue goes before the board of transport commissioners.

If you left the issue just at that point alone, it would be rather a difficult problem. But it is rendered more difficult still; for the board is given directions as to certain factors which must be considered in determining that issue. Those factors are stated in sub-clauses to the bill, one of which refers to complaints by competitors, to put it shortly. That is number one. The board will consider the attitude of the competitors to the competing applicant organization, whether by rail, water or air, "on the routes or between the places which the applicant intends to serve on the ground that suitable facilities are or, if the licence were issued, would be in excess of requirements, or on the ground that any of the conditions of any other transport licence held by the applicant have not been complied with."

Mr. Chairman, think how splendid it would have been if we had had a provision such as that in Canada, say when we built some of our present railway lines! But you see, we have these railway lines. One of the factors being considered by a senate committee to-day is that we have three transcontinental lines in certain sections of the country, merging into two as they pass through the mountains. This is locking the door after the horse has been taken from the stable. You will observe I use milder language than is usually used in connection with that proverb.

The second factor is this:

(b) whether or not the issue of such licence would tend to develop the complementary rather than the competitive functions of the different forms of transport, if any, involved in such objections.

[Mr. Bennett.]

That is, would there be an elimination of competition? It is not for me to say at the moment whether or not that is sound, but it contemplates the granting of a licence to an applicant if his proposed methods of transport are complementary to and not competitive with existing facilities. The third one is quite comprehensive. Paragraph (c) reads:

(c) the general effect on other transport services and any public interest which may be affected by the issue of such licence.

That is involved in the broad principle which has to be determined by the board on every reference. The next paragraph deals with the quality and permanence of the service to be offered by the applicant, his financial responsibility and so on. The questions of safety in the air and matters of that kind are next dealt with. I pass these by because they are matters which we would expect any board would have to consider. Then comes this provision:

Notwithstanding anything contained in subsection one of this section, if evidence is offered to prove,—

(b) that the applicant was during such period using ships or aircraft, as the case may be, for the purpose of such business—

I take it that the effect of that is to have the board consider the existing facilities and conditions and the length of time during which they have been operating. Then it is provided further:

The board shall, if satisfied with such proof, accept the same as evidence of public convenience and necessity to the extent of the user so proved and issue a licence accordingly.

This section has been changed in part since the bill went to the committee. I shall not say more than that these provisions apply largely to the inland waters, the air and the sea and do not deal with other branches of the transport service. It is a recognition of an existing right based upon and determined by the method applied in the utilization of that right by the protester during a period of twelve months prior to the date of application.

It is a little difficult to determine whether or not in a young country like this we should undertake to license these facilities. I am told by those who are deeply interested in the problem that we should likely agree to it; that it is sound. I know that they have been endeavouring to do it in the United States for a long time, but thus far they have failed. They are watching this experiment with great interest. I made some inquiries myself, and I had inquiries made by others. I believe Mr. Eastman is the gentleman who is undertaking to correlate the activities of the railways of the United States. Without trying in any sense to repeat his language, I was told that at a public hearing he made the observation that they were watching with much interest what might happen in this country. If we were less poor as a country, the situation would be less difficult. I am not talking of our physical assets; I am talking of our accumulated material resources.

I cannot but think it is taking a rather long leap in the dark to apply to this extent the theory of bureaucracy to transport. I apprehend the answer that will be made. I should not anticipate the answer, but I have tried to think of it fairly. It is felt that this may do something to improve the financial position of our transport companies. The last paragraph to which I directed attention applies to the sea and to the air. I know the apprehension that exists among some of our friends on the prairies as to the possibilities of increased freight rates for the movement of grain from the great lakes. Whether or not that apprehension is based upon any real appreciation of the problem, time alone will demonstrate.

The minister is of the opinion that this can be faced with equanimity, without fear as to the possible results. I suppose the answer he will make is the answer that ministers always make: If it does not work out satisfactorily, it can always be repealed. But nations cannot make experiments as easily as individuals without paying a pretty long price. We are paying a heavy price for some of the experiments we made in Canada in days gone by when we believed that something would happen that did not happen. In other words, we predicated our views of the future upon an anticipated expansion which did not develop. The minister will observe that I am not speaking with, shall I say, my usual certainty. There is grave uncertainty in my mind, but I cannot think I would be doing justice to the situation if I adopted the principle without pointing out what I concede to be the difficulties, and my real fear of the consequences.

I believe that a planned economy may be very necessary under new conditions in many parts of the world. I am making that confession of faith at once. I believe that the vast accumulation of knowledge which has come to mankind during the ages cannot be utilized unless by some planned utilization of the accumulated skill that comes to people only by reason of planning their operations, whatever they may be. But to plan in this instance, without its being part of a further plan, that is, a general plan, is to set up one branch of a bureaucracy without correlating its activities to a planned or logical scheme for the whole. Until such time as we are ready to contemplate that feature of our national life, it seems to me that making this gesture will not accomplish what the minister so earnestly desires.

I suppose there is no member of this committee who is not as anxious as the minister that our difficulties should find a favourable and successful solution. But it is a great responsibility to attempt regimentation with respect to our transportation services without correlating it to a planned and considered scheme that contemplates the application of the accumulated scientific and other knowledge of our world to the economic affairs of the country. I have expressed very vaguely what is in the back of my mind, but I felt that I should make these observations before I became a party to the adoption of a principle which is far more than the application of it. In the application we find that we are touching every phase of our national life. Transportation is very important from every angle, whether it be the transportation of passengers through the air, on the sea or across the land, or the movement of our freight in any way that the act contemplates and has provided for.

I can readily understand how one who represents a constituency in British Columbia looks with the greatest apprehension on a measure of this kind because British Columbia is peculiarly situated. There is transport by water, which passes through a foreign country to reach the Atlantic coast by traversing a part of the Pacific, and the utilization of a canal that has been provided at an enormous expense. So this becomes a matter of vital importance to the people of the seaport areas of British Columbia. Their ship-borne traffic passing through the canal goes not only to the markets of Europe but also to our own eastern Canada, which makes it very important from that angle also, so that if we are to license these enterprises in this way I think we might perhaps have taken a little longer time to determine whether or not in practice it would effect the benefits which the minister desires without inconveniences and disadvantages that may amount almost to a calamity in connection with the nation as a whole.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the discussion of this bill brings out enormous inconsistencies. I have followed this legislation now for the second year in this chamber and in another chamber, and the inconsistency of the discussion is perhaps the chief feature of it. We have to-day the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) before dinner expressing the greatest concern lest there should be any relaxation whatsoever of regulation as applied to the railways. The regulation of the railways was applied at a time when the railways had a virtual monopoly of transportation in this country. To-day they are far from occupying that position. The purpose of this bill is to meet the changed situation by making a move in the direction of equality of opportunity for competition. Having relaxed the regulations applied to the railways, we desire to extend these relaxed regulations to those competing forms of transport over which the federal government has jurisdiction. Strangely enough, those who are most opposed to any relaxation of the regulation of the railways seem to be the ones most fearful of evil results following from the application of such relaxed regulation of other forms of transport.

May I point out another inconsistency? Something has been said about the senate investigation. On the walls of the committee room where that discussion is taking place is a map of Canada. On that map about five thousand miles of railway are covered with a black tape, being lines that it is proposed to abandon. I think that is a fair indication in railway circles, at least, that we have too much railway transportation. On the great lakes during the last year, when traffic was light, we have had some forty lake boats scrapped simply because there were no cargoes for them. There is actually to-day an impending shortage of tonnage on the great lakes, and the fact that freight rates on grain from the head of the lakes to Montreal have advanced from four cents to 5¾ cents a bushel during this season is an indication of changed conditions that exist there.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the average rate about three years ago?

Mr. HOWE: The rate has gone as low as a trifle under three cents.

Mr. BENNETT: That is my memory.

Mr. HOWE: And it has gone up to 5½ cents, and it touched six cents once or twice.

Mr. BENNETT: Very seldom.

Mr. HOWE: It has never stayed at six cents for any long period. However, I think we all will agree that a surplus of transport is uneconomical for any country, and that the shippers of the country would be better and more cheaply served if it were not necessary for the transportation industry to have a surplus of transport facilities. The public pays for those facilities in the end, and while in times of depression there may be abnormally cheap transportation, in times of large production the price is apt to go to a point which will bring a fair average return on the surplus facilities.

We believe—and other countries have shared that view, because the principle of convenience and necessity is of widespread application as applied to transportation facilities—that it is desirable to give the regulating board the privilege of deciding whether an increase in our transportation facilities is required by public convenience and necessity. This bill proposes that we attempt to make some progress in the direction of relaxation of the regulation of the railways, on the one hand, and that we extend regulation to unregulated carriers, on the other. I think everything in the bill indicates that we are instructing the board of transport commissioners to apply the new regulations cautiously. The board has behind it fifty years of experience in regulating transportation as a background for extending its operations, and I believe that no harm can be done by the application of this bill to transportation in Canada. I believe, on the contrary, that considerable good can be accomplished by a wise application of the provisions of this bill.

I find it difficult to understand why many people are very timid about placing this bill on the statute books. People talk very freely about drastic solutions of the railway problem. But think of the havoc that would follow the tearing up of any five thousand miles of railway in this country, and compare that with any disabilities to the Canadian people that could arise from this bill, and in comparison the latter must appear very trivial indeed. I believe this is a constructive step to place the transportation industry on a sound basis, and I sincerely trust that hon. members will take a kindly view of the bill.

Mr. REID: Mr. Chairman, I am not presuming to speak for British Columbia, but we have good cause from our experience with past legislation to view with alarm anything that imposes statutory restrictions with respect to transportation. British Columbia is in a unique position. If we had not the railways, we could still transport our products by water. By this bill you are going to place transportation by water in the hands of one company, and give them a virtual monopoly of transportation. I can visualize a new company going before the board and asking for a licence to transport lumber by ships. It could easily be pointed out by the company at present operating and by the railroad companies as well that there were ample transportation facilities already provided to take care of all shipments of lumber or any other goods from the Pacific coast to the Atlantic on the Canadian side. I am pointing out to the minister and warning him that in my opinion—and I have not heard any argument or evidence to the contrary—you are going to place transportation by boats in the hands of one man or company who will have a monopoly of it, and so the right to others in the future to obtain a licence and transport by water will be denied.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the minister will acquit me of any desire to take up too much time. This matter has been thoroughly discussed in the committee and I have no desire to trespass upon their good will. But I think I should point out to him that he is in error when he speaks of inconsistency; he has failed to grasp the essential underlying foundation of the argument addressed to the committee. It will be remembered that after a long struggle the masses of the people secured equality under the law with respect to freight rates. That was a very long struggle. All one has to do in order to get a clear appreciation of the nature of that struggle is to read casually the history of transportation in the United States. And in our own country we followed that old statement of Commodore Vanderbilt that freight rates were based upon all the traffic could stand, and that the large shipper who had a tremendous volume of trade for the railways could get a rate denied to the small man who was endeavouring to start a very indifferent business. That principle was swept away. That fact is at the basis of our whole railway law on the traffic side of it, and the change in the United States was secured after infinite struggle. Perhaps no one knows more about that than the minister, because he was in an institution which had a great deal to do with teaching regarding this very matter. I refer to what is known as the school of technology, I think it is the Massachusetts school of technology, one of the foremost institutions in the world; they had to do with the mechanical side of business; but across the way, in the great university, the question of transportation was enagaging the attention of very brilliant minds, and at last the Interstate Commerce Commission came into being. Here Mr. Blair, having deputed Mr. McLean to make an investigation, put upon our statute books the law which established the railway commission.

There is no inconsistency in our position. I want to make clear to my hon. friend the minister our contention that at this stage of our national life we cannot go back and start again. Disraeli once said that democracy could never retrace its steps. I have a favourite saying that not even heaven itself can change the past; what has been, has been. These words I regard as of tremendous import in the life of nations. Here is this country with all these railways—rightly or wrongly. My hon. friends opposite are responsible for our having three systems. The great Canadian who sat in that chair opposite me told the people of this country that $13,000,000 would pay for the National Transcontinental; and his colleague the Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, made the same observation, and they believed it. I am not for a moment saying that they were endeavouring to impress these views upon the Canadian people without believing in them, for they did believe them. We looked into the future; we had great dreams, and we are unable to see them realized.

What we are doing now is endeavouring to start again at scratch. If the minister had said, when we were duplicating existing facilities, "I am going to insist upon a licence being granted before that facility is duplicated," we would have had a different situation. If the minister will take the trouble to read the debates on the Grand Trunk Pacific and the amendment of the late Sir Robert Borden with respect to the construction of the line from the head of the lakes eastward, he will see that had that amendment been adopted we should not have had what we have now; we should not be faced with our present difficulties in connection with these various systems. I mention that not by way of argument but to indicate some of the difficulties there are in retracing our steps. The minister knows, when he speaks about that map on the wall with black tape on five thousand miles, that we cannot retrace our steps and cancel five thousand miles of track. Everybody knows that. A method by which it may not be served as it has been in days past is another thing altogether, whether it should be treated as a secondary or tertiary line or in some other manner. Some lines can be taken up, but to talk about blacking out five thousand miles is another matter altogether. I do not believe it is possible for us at this time to retrace our steps in the matter of transportation. I do not think the minister has recognized the consistency which runs through our position, or perhaps I should say my own position, because I do not say that it represents anyone but myself, and I speak for myself only. The position is this: Once having established uniformity under the law for the rich and the poor shipper, it is a retrograde movement to undertake to retrace your steps and say that the man with a lot of business is going to have an advantage over the man with a little business.

Mr. HOWE: That is just the opposite to what this bill says.

Mr. BENNETT: I have heard my friend say that so often that sometimes I think he almost believes it.

Mr. HOWE: I do believe it.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I had far more confidence in my hon. friend's intelligence before he made that observation. But just let us look a step further and see what we get in this bill. I am not going to weary the committee, but I want just one thing to be considered. You come to this section, the governing section which deals with the principle, and then you get down to clause 11:

No goods or passengers shall be transported by water, from one port or place in Canada to another port or place in Canada, either directly or by way of a foreign port or for any part of the transport, by means of any ship other than a ship licensed under this part.

Well, Great Britain's greatness grew up largely as a mercantile and commercial country because of what she did in connection with shipping. We might as well be perfectly fair about it.

Mr. HOWE: And there is no shipping to-day so regulated as the British shipping.

Mr. BENNETT: Does my hon. friend the minister suggest that any part of it is licensed except those vessels licensed under the board of trade for crossing the Atlantic ocean and carrying passengers?

Mr. HOWE: Every one is in a passenger or tramp conference of some kind, and the rates are regulated by board more or less sponsored by the government.

Mr. BENNETT: Not sponsored by the government.

Mr. HOWE: Oh, absolutely.

Mr. BENNETT: The North Atlantic conference, of which—

Mr. HOWE: That is a passenger matter. I was talking more about the tramp shipping.

Mr. BENNETT: I am talking about the freight conferences. There are two conferences, the passenger on the one hand and the tramp on the other. All passenger ships which go into a British port are licensed, under that board of trade regulations; having the Plimsoll mark and the prescribed load line and everything of that sort. And the accommodation of these ships that fly the British flag and are licensed to carry passengers is controlled. Any passenger who crosses the Atlantic can see the certificate fixing the number of passengers that may be carried, the number of lifeboats, and so on. The tramp ships may have a cartel or arrangement amongst themselves; but they are subject to the competition of the foreigner, the Scandinavian ships, and latterly the 20 knot freight ships of Japan.

Mr. HOWE: But they are in the same conference. Every boat which has come into the St. Lawrence this year has been a member.

Mr. BENNETT: The Japanese have not been members of that conference in what you call competitive territory. The minister of course has made this his business, and I have only met it incidentally as a subject for investigation. I discovered magnificent Japanese freight ships of 20 knots. Those ships were getting the traffic. Belonging to this conference or that conference is not a matter of importance; because of their speed they get the traffic in the area they serve. And the result has been that the Vesteys have five magnificent ships running between Great Britain and Australia and South Africa. They do not carry passengers to the extent of requiring a medical man on board, but they have accommodation with baths for about twelve passengers. A great many of our fast freight boats now have that accommodation. But they are not licensed as this section provides. And if they are, this is not going to take anything away from them on the one hand or give them any advantage on the other. All we say in this bill is that no goods shall be transported by water from one port in this country to another unless these ships have a licence from this bureau, never mind their standard of equipment. The ship may be class A1 at Lloyds for one hundred years, the highest classification there is; but under this bill we authorize our customs officers to hold that ship up because we have not given her a licence to carry a passenger from Vancouver to Halifax. Why should we add that? Every provision for safety has been made; every accommodation has been provided. But now we are going to say: One more river to cross; one more bureau to meet; one more licence to get. I do not think that is going to help the business of this country, nor do

I see where it is going to be of value to the Canadian people; for we once had a mercantile marine; we no longer have.

Mr. HOWE: We did not have licences in those days; you cannot blame that on us.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not blaming the minister for something that has not yet been in operation.

Mr. HOWE: I was afraid the right hon. gentleman was.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no; I have no desire to be unfair to the minister. But this is the position; to-day we are without a mercantile marine. I remember as a boy that Canada's mercantile marine was rather extensive. But it disappeared; steel ships and tramps and that sort of thing wiped it out. The ships that have to get a licence now are not going to be Canadian ships, if this legislation is literally enforced. The ship that sails from Vancouver to Montreal with any cargo must have this licence. What is the purpose of it? It is to do one or both of two things. Licences should be granted in the public interest for the safety and convenience of the individuals who may be passengers on the ship, or for the rapid conveyance of the goods the ship carries; or second, the purpose may be to destroy competition. That was the point which the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) made. The minister, I am sure, has studied and realizes that open competition on the high seas has been the regulating factor in connection with ocean freights, notwithstanding cartels or tramp arrangements and everything of that sort; the sudden introduction into a harbour of a tramp flying a Scandinavian flag, or the flag of Germany or of some other mercantile power, has had the effect of adjusting freights at once. We know that in Montreal; we know it in Vancouver, and we know it in other parts of the world. That is the view to which I find it difficult to accommodate myself.

I wonder whether the minister remembers the case that was tested as to whether or not a freight rate was in the nature of a toll or tariff; having once been approved by the body which had to give its approval, no lower rate could be taken nor could a greater sum be exacted; and if a mistake were made the money could be recovered, because there is no power to alter a toll for freight which stood in the same position as a tariff. I once defended an action—unsuccessfully—from that angle. I point out that the really fundamental principle which has governed us for over thirty years has been equality under the law with respect to tolls and charges for the transport of goods in this country, and that no discrimination was possible and no differentiation by reason of the volume of traffic that the shipper had to offer to the carrier.

I ask that that principle be retained, and I submit that to exact a licence with the conditions to be imposed regarding an agreed charge is an inroad on that principle. When the minister suggests that I am favourable or anyone else is favourable to the relaxation of the rule, he has failed to understand the position we take. I am in favour of the maintenance of the principle I have enunciated, and I am opposed to any statutory provision which encroaches upon the application of that principle. The minister says that this does not interfere with it; but I say that any agreed charge, the benefit of which is not open to any man to receive, whether the traffic he has to offer be large or small, is not sound in principle. And the agreed charge contemplates that a man is going to tie himself up to a given condition for a given time in order that he may be able to secure a given rate. That, I submit, is contrary to the principle which I think should continue in effect in this country.

Without going into details, because the matter has been threshed out by so many members of the committee, although of course the jurisdiction of this general committee is still complete and we have the right to discuss it in any detail we please, I do not propose to enter into any further discussion with respect to general principles. I content myself merely by saying that I think it is a retrograde movement. If we were going to start de novo, I am not sure that I would not be in favour of the general application of a principle that utilizes the accumulated knowledge, scientific and otherwise, and the skill of mankind for the benefit of the citizens of this country as a whole. To think by legislation to turn back the hands of the clock and put ourselves in the position we were in when we started in this transportation business is, of course, not for a moment to be considered. Under these circumstances it is the inconsistency of our position that I present for the consideration of the minister, and I do submit that to license vessels which carry people from one part of Canada to another, not for purposes of safety, not for purposes of their well-being, not for purposes of expedition in the handling of freight but for another reason altogether, is contrary to the general principle upon which nations have built up their positions as commercial communities, and I believe will be detrimental to the best interests of the country as a whole.

Mr. HOWE: I have followed my right hon. friend's lecture on consistency very carefully; but as yet I do not understand why it is a good thing for a boat to be able to contract for freight over any period it wishes, and not a good thing for a railroad; why it is desirable that a boat should have the privilege of quoting a low rate to a large shipper and a higher rate to a small shipper, and why there should be grave danger that a bill designed to afford protection against that practice on all forms of transportation may permit such practice on the railroads. I was not able to follow the lecture on consistency quite that far, but I think perhaps we have dealt with that subject sufficiently.

On paragraph (d).

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Will the effect of this bill, Mr. Chairman, be to close out inventive progress? Are you permitting the general development of invention and progress, or are you going to cause everything to stagnate for the purpose of permitting the railroads and transportation companies generally to meet their expenses and pay dividends? If the latter, then I submit that we have not reached a solution of the problem. No stream dammed is stopped. The flow continues and the flood will carry away the dam sooner or later. I am quite certain that until you have tackled and definitely settled the immense problem of adjusting the capitalization and capital indebtedness of these transportation companies to their effective earning capacity, which can be done but which as yet has not been done, the problem of transportation in Canada or anywhere else will not be solved. Supposing in the next few months somebody comes along with a transportation method which will eliminate all these methods now before us. You may say, of course, that this is a highly hypothetical case. I grant that; but that principle being considered, does this bill prevent inventive progress?

Mr. HOWE: I think I can assure my hon. friend that it does not.

On section 6, subsection 1—Term of licence fees.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it contemplated that the fee will be based on tonnage, or is it intended to be only a nominal fee?

Mr. HOWE: It is purely a nominal fee. The purpose of the licence is only to afford a direct contact between the unit of transportation and the board of transport commissioners. Otherwise the licence has no significance. But naturally if we have a unit of transportation that is not complying with the regulations of the board, it is liable to have its licence revoked. That is the only purpose of it.

Mr. BENNETT: I see the fees are to be fixed by the governor in council, and I wondered what was the general principle.

Mr. HOWE: Purely a nominal fee.

On section 7—Fines payable to receiver general.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the word "over" is a bit of bad drafting. The section states:

> Every fine imposed under this act or under any regulation shall be paid over to the receiver general of Canada—

I think that word "over" might be taken out.

Mr. HOWE: I should think so.

Mr. BENNETT: But possibly it is put in to make certain in the event of any question about a magistrate receiving a fine in the first instance and paying it over. I do not like the word, but I assume it was put there deliberately.

On section 9—Limitation of proceedings for violations.

Mr. BENNETT: In connection with matters of this kind, where you have such a shifting population, should not six months be a sufficiently long period? I do not want to press the matter, but it is so difficult to deal with matters of this kind after a given time. Papers are lost; people move about, and when I read it over it did strike me that six months should be long enough.

Mr. HOWE: I am not sure what purpose is behind the twelve month period, but is it really serious?

Mr. BENNETT: No; I do not think so. I just put it to the minister.

Mr. HOWE: Perhaps I should prefer to leave it at twelve months.

On section 10, subsection 1—Board licence to ships.

Mr. STIRLING: Would a transport company owning ships, a railway and perhaps aeroplanes have three licences or only one?

Mr. HOWE: Of course the railway does not require a licence. The shipping and air craft would be licensed.

Mr. STIRLING: Two separate licences?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to labour the discussion on part II of the bill. I intend later on to speak more fully to another part; but I should like to say in regard to part II, which deals with transport by water, that I think it is an unwise policy to adopt to bring this shipping under the board, and to restrict, control and regulate in the manner proposed in the bill. I shall state in a few sentences why I take that position.

One of our major items of export, as well as one of our chief sources of new wealth, is found of course in the great wheat plains of the west. The handicap to which the Canadian wheat producer is subject is that his product is produced at a point a couple of thousand miles away from the seaboard. We are in competition chiefly with the Argentine, as well as with other countries, of course. But the Argentine wheat is the closest competitor to Canadian wheat. The Argentine grower virtually has water transportation at his door. Therefore anything that affects or is likely to affect the cost of the movement of grain from the western plains to the seaboard is a matter which should be very carefully considered by parliament.

This is not a new proposal by any means. It was introduced to the house very frequently in years gone by. Almost every year it was placed before the house by the hon. member who at that time represented Lambton. On every occasion I opposed it, and the bill which was introduced year after year did not become law, not because I alone opposed it but because parliament in its wisdom decided it was not advisable to impose restrictions upon shipping on the great lakes, because of the danger of affecting the cost of transportation on those lakes.

There is no need of subterfuge or evading the issue, and parliament ought to face the facts that the only possible effect of part II of the bill would be to raise the cost of transportation on the great lakes. That is its object; there is not any question about it.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege—

Mr. STEVENS: A question of privilege? Let us hear the question of privilege.

Mr. HOWE: Why impute motives to myself on this bill?

Mr. STEVENS: Mr. Chairman, surely the language I am using cannot be any—

Mr. HOWE: That is all right, to make a speech to the country.

Mr. STEVENS:—stretch of the imagination be considered as imputing motives. I am discussing a question of public importance, in connection with which I take a view directly opposed to that set forth in the bill. And to consider an expression of opinion of that kind as directed to any one individual is, to put it mildly, arrogating to that individual a position of importance that he is not entitled to have. I have not mentioned the minister, nor have I directed a single personal reference to him or to anybody else, except to mention the late member for Lambton, who introduced bills containing this proposal. I assume there is no question of privilege; certainly I cannot see one myself.

I was proceeding to say that anything which interfered with the movement of freight over the great lakes is likely to result in an increase in the cost of movement of those goods, and I added—and I repeat it now without hesitancy—that we must recognize in the language, structure and intent of the bill that its effect is to raise the cost of the transport of goods. There can be no other excuse for its introduction. The very essence of this part of the bill is to regulate and to license, and as the terms of the bill would show, so to regulate and restrict the freedom of movement of goods by vessel over the great lakes that vessels prepared to take them at a low price would be handicapped because of the licensing feature of this bill.

In the interpretation clause of the bill we have outlined a distinct and absolute limitation as to the goods which may be carried by bulk carriers which are not necessarily licensed under the bill. The rights are definitely limited, because we have forbidden them from carrying any goods other than those mentioned in paragraph (e) which reads:

"Goods in bulk" means the following goods laden or freighted in ships, and except as herein otherwise provided, not bundled or enclosed in bags, bales, boxes, cases, sacks, crates or any other container; grain and grain products, including flour and mill feeds in sacks, ores and minerals (crude, screened, sized, refined or concentrated, but not otherwise processed), including ore concentrates in sacks, coal and coke,

liquids.

The bulk carrier in the past has moved grain to ports such as Montreal and Quebec, and has been at liberty to pick up any kind of cargo in any quantity he wished, on a return trip. It is well known that the vessel hauling grain down there desires as quickly as possible to return to the head of the lakes in order to secure another load of grain eastward. The consequence of that method of movement was that they did pick up cargoes, sometimes only small portions and sometimes cargoes of a substantial size, on return trips. The more cargo they secured going west, the lower would be the rate on grain coming east. We are definitely restricting that. What I said a moment ago, to which the minister took exception, was that the committee ought to be fully seized of the effect of this part of the bill before it is finally passed.

I took this stand in the committee. It is true the bill passed the committee, but I now submit to the committee of the whole house that merely because a standing committee passed the bill is no reason why it should be passed here without discussion. The bill should be fully discussed; the committee should be seized of the import of it, and the possible effect it may have. In part II we propose to license ships on the great lakes and certain other ships running from the Pacific coast to the great lakes. These ships are to be licensed; they are to be restricted, and such ships as are not licensed are forbidden to carry certain cargoes westward on the great lakes, which at present they are privileged to carry.

Let me give one illustration of the far-reaching effect of this bill. One of the main items of cargo moving westward is sugar. Sugar is something that affects the livelihood of every person in western Canada. A certain part of western Canada is supplied with its sugar requirements from the Pacific coast. I believe the Pacific coast refineries reach eastward as far as Regina.

Mr. BENNETT: At one time they sold as far east as Brandon.

Mr. STEVENS: A year ago they came as far as Winnipeg, but the dividing line has gradually moved westward and to-day Regina is approximately the point of division. That portion of the population of western Canada living between Port Arthur and Regina secures its sugar supplies via the great lakes. We are now prohibiting the bulk carrier moving grain eastward from taking cargoes of sugar westward, unless he complies with the regulated rates. As a regulated carrier he would have to file a tariff and comply with the rates under the direction of the board. Sugar is only one of many items.

My purpose in raising this point was to call the attention of the committee to this part of the bill and to register my objection to the regulation of traffic on the great lakes. The inevitable result will be to raise the rates, generally speaking, for the movement of goods eastward as well as westward on the great lakes. I think that is something of very grave importance to this country.

Mr. HOWE: I take exception with my hon. friend when he says that the effect of this bill will be to raise rates. In my opinion the effect of the bill will be to create a more efficient transportation system in Canada. As I said previously this evening, an efficient transportation system is less costly to operate. The people who pay the cost of operating our transportation systems are not the owners, they are the users of transportation. If we can reduce transportation costs by a more effective co-ordination of the various forms of transportation, we shall be benefiting the users of transportation. I do not think anyone will contend that regulation has increased the cost of railway transportation. I think it is quite obvious that by bringing order out of chaos in the way of rates, the cost of railway transportation has been somewhat reduced. My hon. friend seems to be the defender of everybody from the needleworker to the Montreal brokers. I suppose he is now the defender of the people against a government that are trying to increase transportation costs. There is nothing in this bill that justifies the position he is taking in that regard.

Mr. STEVENS: I have no apologies to make to anyone for being the defender of the needleworkers, as the minister has so facetiously remarked.

Mr. HOWE: The Montreal brokers.

Mr. STEVENS: Let me say to the minister that there happens to be about 40,000 of these needleworkers, and if there was any group of workers in this country that needed a defender, it was the needleworkers. I consider it as about the highest compliment that has been paid to me since I have been in the House of Commons to be called the defender of the needleworkers of Canada.

The minister attempts to brush the whole question aside by drawing a parallel between railway and water transportation. No student of transportation would for a moment accept such an analogy. There is no parallel at all between the two. The essence of sound policy in connection with water transportation from its earliest days down to the present has been freedom from control and direction and restriction. Freedom of the seas! The movement of freight on our inland lakes is virtually the same as the movement of freight across the seas. There is no difference between the two except that geographically the lakes happen to be within the territory of the United States and Canada, while the seas are open to all. In so far as the movement of goods by water is concerned, our inland lakes do not differ from the seas in any particular. As I said a moment ago, the essence of the policy down through the ages has been to keep water-borne transportation as free as possible from restriction and regulation. There is no parallel between the two.

My hon. friend said a moment ago that no one would suggest that the regulation of rail traffic has resulted in increased freight rates. If one examines the schedule of rates, his answer certainly will be disconcerting to the minister, because, generally speaking, freight rates are higher to-day than they were before the introduction of regulation. But that argument is not applicable to the case at all. I am not suggesting that the regulation of railway rates was improvident or unwise. The chaos that existed then is the very chaos which will exist if part V of this bill is put into force. What were the chaotic conditions that existed prior to the regulation by the board of railway commissioners in 1905? Then the railways were competing with one another. They were making secret rebates and giving special rates to favoured shippers and all that sort of thing. They were failing to supply the public with the proper facilities for loading and unloading goods at different points along their systems. But all of that was changed. All of that chaos was wiped out by the regulation of the railways. There is no parallel between that and water-borne transportation.

We might as well be frank about this. As far as the ship owners are concerned, this is being done for the Canada Steamship company alone. The minister knows perfectly well that practically all the other shipping concerns on the great lakes opposed this part of the bill. The Canada Steamship company will be benefited because it happens to carry the major portion of the package freight on the great lakes. I have nothing against that company. I should like to see it prosper, but I think it is unwise for parliament to pass legislation that will benefit this one company alone and be detrimental to other shipping concerns. In my opinion this legislation will tend to increase rates generally on the movement of grain eastward to seaboard points.

Mr. BENNETT: I probably fell into the same error with regard to wheat as has been suggested here. Wheat is not covered by this bill. It is definitely stated in section 12 that the provisions of this part shall not apply to the transport of goods in bulk. I was greatly concerned about that provision being inserted. The minister must realize that we did endeavour to regulate these matters at one time. The government of the day, led by the present Prime Minister, had almost to entreat the owners of ships to break the law because parliament was not in session. That was in connection with the movement of grain on the great lakes. I suppose it is within the memory of some members here that we undertook to regulate rates on the great lakes in connection with United States ships, and they said: All right. But in the fall of the year we had to take active steps to induce them to break the law.

Mr. HOWE: Just exactly what year was that?

Mr. STEVENS: It was when Mr. Low was Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I was not in the house, but I well remember the circumstances. Does the hon. gentleman remember what year it was?

Mr. STEVENS: About 1924 or 1925.

Mr. HOWE: There was no regulation of rates but rather a restriction on United States shipping.

Mr. BENNETT: But the effect on the rates was quite apparent.

Mr. HOWE: There is nothing parallel in this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: That bill applied to all commodities. I can send and get it.

Mr. HOWE: I remember it very well. I lived on the great lakes for twenty-five years.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. The hon. gentleman will remember the circumstances. That bill we had to get out of the way. Any effort we have ever made to control rates on the great lakes has been difficult, and we have not succeeded. There is one thing I would ask the minister: Do we contemplate being able to control by this means the movement of commodities—I will use the broad word, "commodities"—from a Canadian port to a United States port, and subsequently transshipped from a United States port to a Canadian port?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; we control that movement under this bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there not an international question there of the first order? Can we control a United States ship that loads at Fort William and goes down to Buffalo, unloads her cargo there, which is then loaded into another United States ship that sails from Buffalo to Montreal?

Mr. HOWE: It is illegal in the first place between two Canadian ports.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is not between two Canadian ports. In the case I put, the transit ends at Buffalo.

Mr. HOWE: You cannot load into another United States ship at Buffalo, except by a violation of Canada's coasting regulations.

Mr. BENNETT: The United States ship clears the next day from Buffalo for Montreal. A United States ship is allowed to go from Buffalo to Montreal.

Mr. HOWE: It is not allowed to bring goods from a Canadian port.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite. But the end of the transit was at Buffalo, and the goods were in bond.

Mr. HOWE: We stopped that several years ago.

Mr. BENNETT: I have seen it stopped in my life time, but I have also seen it unstopped. The United States authorities asserted their position.

Mr. HOWE: Unless the goods are duty paid in Buffalo they certainly could not make that voyage. They would be "through billed" from the head of the lakes to Montreal.

Mr. BENNETT: I have reference to a case where there is no through bill, where the goods lie in bond, and then are shipped from Buffalo to a Canadian port in a United States bottom, which is within the law. It will be recalled by the minister that at the time Mr. Low's bill became effective, the Americans lodged violent protests, and then we found ourselves in the position of asking them to do something for us, namely, to come and break the law. But that had to do with another phase. If the minister tells me he is satisfied he can control it, then I understand why the provision is there. But this whole part that we are now discussing is not intended to be put into force until it is proclaimed, and if the minister understands there are difficulties in the way, the proclamation will not be made until such time as he is able to iron them out?

Mr. HOWE: Quite so. The situation will be very thoroughly studied.

Subsection 1 agreed to.

Section 10, subsections 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On section 10, subsection 5—Board shall issue licence if satisfied service is required.

Mr. BENNETT: What about a ship "about to be built"? There was strong objection here yesterday evening to making provision for something about to be done; the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) will remember it. Here is a licence to be issued in respect of a ship "about to be built."

Mr. HOWE: It would be difficult to build a package freighter unless the builder were sure the licence would issue. He must show convenience and necessity.

Mr. BENNETT: The word "building" I thought covered that; but this is "about to be built," which might enable a considerable racket to be maintained.

Mr. HOWE: Would it not cover the case of a man considering building a ship, who represents to the board: "I want to build a ship, but first I want to know whether or not I can get a licence." He must show convenience and necessity.

Mr. BENNETT: The best evidence I think would be for him to say: "I have a contract here for the building of a ship." In my opinion it is a bad provision.

Subsection agreed to.

Section 10, subsection 6, agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 11, subsection 1—No goods or passengers transported except in licensed ships.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it quite clear that this does not contravene any provisions of the shipping act, which by agreement at the imperial conference is common to all parts of the British Empire?

Mr. HOWE: This licence has to do purely with rates; the shipping act has to do with safety. This has been carefully checked.

Subsection agreed to.

Section 11, subsection 2, agreed to.

On section 11, subsection 3—Power of detention.

Mr. BENNETT: It says that the collector of customs may, if he believes that any ship "has transported" passengers or goods. That puts him in the position of being a judge with respect to an alleged past offence. A collector of customs could always hold a ship that does not comply with the law immediately; but to say that he shall become a judge and deal with a case when he believes that any ship "after the coming into force of this part has transported passengers and/or goods without licence, in contravention of this part," is clothing him with judicial powers, which I really think should not be done. The rest of it I am in accord with, but that part puts him in the position of exercising judicial powers at once.

Mr. HOWE: I hardly think that the actual working out of the legislation will follow the implication of this part. A customs officer would hardly detain a ship of his own volition. He would detain it on instructions from the transport board.

Mr. BENNETT: No; that is the odd part. If the minister will look at the rest of the section, he will see what I mean. It says that he "may detain the ship pending the disposition of any complaint or charge and the payment of any fine imposed in respect of any such offence." If there is any complaint or charge, he holds the ship until such time as he gets further information. That was my difficulty about it.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 11, subsection 4—Suspension or cancellation of licence.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I think there is a contravention of an elementary rule there. It says:

> If the board is satisfied that a ship is operated otherwise than in accordance with the terms of a licence applicable thereto, the board may suspend or cancel the licence of such licencee in respect of one or all of the ships licensed.

I think it is elementary that the licencee must first have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. HOWE: Oh, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I mention that to the minister only because it is perhaps within the memory of some of the members of the legal profession that a judge was dismissed in one of the West Indies for very good cause; but the privy council found that, as he had had no chance to defend himself, his dismissal was wholly illegal. Here we have the loss of a licence without any provision that the licencee shall have an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. HOWE: Would it suit the purpose if we inserted the words: the board, "after hearing"? The board would not be satisfied without hearing both sides of the case, I suggest.

Mr. BENNETT: It is just for that reason that I suggest you add the words, "after hearing the licencee," or similar language. The minister will recall the Pilot case that I once spoke to him about. It was alleged that there was no opportunity for the party to be heard before certain action was taken. How would it be to say, "The board may, after hearing the licencee, suspend..."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver Centre): I move that subsection 4 of section 11 be amended by adding, in line 17, after the word "may," the words, "after hearing the licencee."

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: The paragraph reads:

> Between ports or places in British Columbia.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 12, subsection 5—Provisions not to apply.

Mr. REID: Even at the risk of being accused by the minister of delaying the bill, I am going to protest strongly in this chamber once again against the principle in this bill of giving special privileges to the east. Away back in 1897 there was passed through parliament the Crowsnest pass rates, giving the eastern central provinces special consideration. Later, in 1925, the act was amended, but still the eastern provinces retained their special position. The Maritimes Freight Rates Act was another measure enacted by this house which gave the maritimes special consideration, and now we have a provision in this bill exempting the maritime provinces on their shipments. Even at the risk of delaying the bill, I feel that, as a member from British Columbia, and knowing the fight I have put up for the past number of years in an endeavour to get a change in the act with respect to freight rates, I could not remain in my place without rising and strongly protesting. So strongly do I feel on this matter that I am going to move this amendment:

That after the word "lakes" in the forty-first line the words be added, "or between ports or places in British Columbia and the maritime provinces and ports or places on the St. Lawrence river."

There is less reason for including in the act the province of British Columbia than there is for including the maritime provinces.

Mr. HARTIGAN: "Less reason"? Does the hon. member say "less reason"?

Mr. REID: Less reason for including the province of British Columbia than for including the maritime provinces. There is less competition between the ships and the railroads in traffic emanating in the province of British Columbia than there is in the maritimes.

Mr. HARTIGAN: I think the hon. member has a wrong conception of that. This exclusion pertains only as far as Montreal, and on the maritime coast the coastal trade is presumed to come up the river to the port of Montreal. That is the legitimate territory through which maritime traffic moves, through which maritime trade always had its being up to tidewater.

Mr. REID: Yes. I can see the members from the maritime provinces are wonderful advocates in regard to having this change made; nevertheless I am sticking to my point in spite of the hon. member's argument.

Mr. HARTIGAN: As far as the—

Mr. REID: Never mind; I want a chance to finish my remarks as far as this is concerned. Speaking to the amendment, I feel that British Columbia should not be left out of the special provision of this legislation. I maintain that once more the maritime provinces and eastern points are receiving special consideration, even from the maritimes to the head of the lakes, by being exempted as they are under this section. The traffic obtained by any steamship line or steamers from British Columbia to Quebec, Montreal or the maritime provinces is not lost traffic to the railroads. It is competitive business, and lumber being sent there would not be sent were it not for the fact that at times there are ships operating which will carry that lumber at a somewhat lower rate. But if those ships were not taking that lumber, the railroad companies would not get that order. The fact of the matter is that, as they would be in competition with United States and other lumber interests, the orders to British Columbia would be lost. Why British Columbia should be included in this act when they are not in direct competition, in so far as shipping is concerned, with the railroads, I am at a loss to understand.

Knowing the difficulty of getting any change made when something is once put into a measure, I feel that this is the proper time to protest. I took occasion to make the same protest before the railway committee, so I cannot be accused of waiting until the bill came back here. I would ask all hon. members from British Columbia to take note of what is being done now, that we are being brought under the legislation, and the maritime provinces excluded. I am going to protest even if no one else in the committee does.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Regarding the hon. member's complaint, shipping from the Pacific coast ports to the maritime provinces or from the maritimes through the canal to the British Columbia coast will be in identically the same position. The east is not exempt so far as ocean shipping is concerned. Am I not right?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, of course.

Mr. REID: But if I may be allowed to answer that point, subsection 4 of section 12 reads:

The provisions of this part shall not apply in the case of ships engaged in the transport of goods or passengers

(a) between ports or places in British Columbia.

That is, ships operating on the Pacific coast from one point in British Columbia to another. But when it comes to the maritime provinces it does not say from Nova Scotia to another port in Nova Scotia; it is from a point in any of the maritime provinces to some point in any other of them. So there again they are favoured.

Mr. HARTIGAN: There is only one province facing on the Pacific ocean, but in the east the maritime provinces, although separate, are taken as an entity. The mere fact of their being divided into three provinces makes no difference in the coast-line. It is the same thing as shipping between different ports in British Columbia.

The hon. member seems to be very much concerned about maritime freight rates.

Mr. REID: I certainly am.

Mr. HARTIGAN: The preference given under that act is practically wiped out to-day owing to the lowering of competitive rates on other sections of the railways. It is practically nullified. In the case of maritime shipping to a British Columbia port we are placed in identically the same position as a ship coming from British Columbia to a maritime port.

Mr. REID: I do not understand the statement that the maritime freight rates preference has been wiped out. If so, why is this parliament paying so many hundred thousand dollars a year under the Maritime Freight Rates Act? That question requires some answering.

Mr. BENNETT: Because the rates were increased beyond the arrangement made when they came into confederation.

Mr. REID: But the hon. member says the whole thing is nullified. I cannot agree with that. But speaking to the point under discussion and the amendment before the committee, the maritime provinces receive great benefit by shipping up the St. Lawrence because this country has paid out millions of dollars to improve navigation there, whereas our waterway from British Columbia is the Panama canal, to which this country contributed not one dollar. Any ship going through there is charged $1 per gross ton, and for some ships the charge may amount to $9,000 or $10,000 for passing through that canal. So it still helps out my argument that we in British Columbia are being discriminated against by being brought under the measure, while the maritime provinces are excluded.

Mr. BENNETT: Under subsection 4 of section 12, ports in British Columbia are excluded from the provisions of the legislation. And the same applies between ports in the maritime provinces. As far as this is concerned, ocean-borne traffic pays the same licence fee if it originates in Nova Scotia or New Brunswick and goes to British Columbia as if it originates in British Columbia and goes to the maritime provinces. The only thing is that the provisions do not apply to ships engaged in the transport of goods and passengers between ports or places in the maritimes and ports or places on the great lakes, with the proviso that if they undertake to handle either goods or passengers on the great lakes they must pay. There is no exemption except for what is called in the maritime provinces coastal services, where the distance is not as great as it is up the coast of British Columbia. From the maritimes up the St. Lawrence is not as far as the distance up the coast of British Columbia, which is about—

Mr. STEVENS: Five hundred miles.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is more than that.

Mr. STEVENS: It is five hundred miles to Prince Rupert.

Mr. BENNETT: This is merely an assurance that the maritimes are to enjoy the benefits of coastal trade. My friend was not in this country at the time, and I was not born; but I was brought up on the talk of our coming into confederation, and the whole basis of this provision is maintaining good faith, the terms under which we entered confederation. For the same reason we are maintaining a railway to British Columbia; whatever happens, this nation has bound itself to see that that is done—contract in the west; contract in the east. One was crystallized into legislation in the British North America Act, the other in a later statute. This is merely to give effect to that understanding.

Mr. STEVENS: I think the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) has perhaps not made the point quite clear. Speaking for myself, I do not object to the exemption of the maritime provinces from this measure; in fact I supported it very strongly in the committee. The point is this: In recent years, say the last twelve years or thereabouts, we have developed an inter-coastal trade between Pacific coast ports and eastern Canadian ports, Montreal and places on the great lakes. The history of that is very interesting and important. Prior to the introduction of that service, which was inaugurated originally by the Canadian National Steamships, supplies for British Columbia came very largely from the eastern United States and Europe. By the introduction of this inter-coastal service a great deal of that business, that is, manufactured goods, was diverted to eastern Canada, Ontario and Quebec. Then, because of high rail freight rates, we were not able to ship lumber into eastern Canada to compete with southern pine from the United States. After the introduction of that service, however, we moved lumber from the Pacific coast to the east, and we took back manufactured goods; steel, sugar, etc. I saw a manifest the other day with, I think, forty different items on it from eastern Canada to the west. That is distinctly in the interest of building up trade within Canada.

The service was inugurated by the Canadian National Steamships and subsequently was taken over by Mr. MacMillan's company, which has maintained it ever since without any subsidy or assistance of any kind. Under this bill that service is brought into regulation. The reason that exemption was not included in the bill is that those who operate the service made no objection to being regulated, and I did not press the point. But they do object—and I am going to refer to it later—to the agreed charges part. There is a vital point there affecting their interests. But as far as this particular part is concerned, my view is that they would be better if they were not regulated; for it is obvious that a service running eight or ten thousand miles from British Columbia ports around through the Panama canal and up the St. Lawrence to the great lakes is not a local service, because the major part of it is a sea voyage; but my position in the committee was that, inasmuch as the operators of the service did not press to be exempted, I did not myself insist on the point. I would, however, submit to my hon. friend that the maritime provinces case should not be brought into comparison, because that stands on its own footing, and I think they had a perfect right to claim the exemption which they received.

Amendment (Mr. Reid) negatived on division.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Militia services—Engineer services and works —further amount required, $316,385.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give us some information with regard to this additional amount required for engineer services and works, particularly with regard to why these sums are required now when the main estimates are only a few months old?

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): Yes. In regard to the amount of $204,385, this includes revotes to cover the undernoted construction items which were not completed at the close of the fiscal year 1937-38:

Port Elgin, Ont.—Provision of gun shed, $3,360.

Barriefield, Ont.—Central heating plant, $6,222.

Saint Johns, P.Q.—Conversion of old married quarters to barracks, $5,200.

Montreal, P.Q.—Purchase of site for rifle range, $55,000.

Winnipeg, Man.—Extension to M.T. garage, Fort Osborne barracks, $6,130.

Kenora, Ont.—Extension to drill hall, $5,430.

Esquimalt, B.C.—Coast defences, west coast, $30,903.

Esquimalt, B.C.—Ordnance workshop, $77,835.

Kamloops, B.C.—Purchase of fencing materials for magazine area, $14,305.

The supplementaries consist of two items, one of $100,000 for interim plan, Pacific coast defences, and the other of $12,000 for the construction of a drainage culvert at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, to connect with a culvert at Green Bridge. That is in connection with the rifle range at Charlottetown.

Mr. STIRLING: Could the minister give the committee any information with regard to the magazine at Kamloops, as to its distance from the river and the height of its floor above the river?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have not that information before me at the present time, though I had it when the main estimates were up. I should be glad to get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. STIRLING: Has the attention of the minister been called to the fact that it is stated that the floor is below the level of flood water? I cannot vouch for the accuracy of this statement, but I am informed that there is not a sufficient margin of safety between the high water level and the floor of the magazine.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I can only say that I have not heard the suggestion until this moment. The engineers of the department made a very careful examination to ascertain the best available site in that vicinity, an examination which occupied them for some time, and of course this is in accordance with their recommendation. I shall be glad to look thoroughly into the matter.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister remember, from his own knowledge, how far the site is from the river? I do not know exactly where the site is.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have not been there since construction was commenced.

Mr. BENNETT: What other items of the department are standing?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is item No. 180 of the main estimates.

Mr. BENNETT: Will that be coming up to-night?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, after we deal with the supplementaries.

Mr. MacNEIL: The supplementary estimates follow a rather different plan from the main estimates, but in the public works vote I notice a number of items for the construction of armouries. What is the total amount of the estimates for the construction of armouries and barracks in addition to those included in the main and supplementary estimates of the National Defence department?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think these are mostly by way of revotes of amounts voted last year. For the armoury in Hull, Quebec, the amount is $260,000. Then there is the Craig street drill hall, Montreal, $75,000 which is not a revote; Cornwall, Ontario, partly a revote, $246,000; Broadview, Saskatchewan, for the purchase and alteration of a building for armoury purposes, $4,200; Moose Jaw, Saskatchewan, armoury reconstruction, $18,000; Esquimalt, British Columbia, dockyard office building, $16,000, including a revote of $8,000; and Salmon Arm, British Columbia, towards the purchase of a building for national defence, $1,650, or a total of $620,850.

Mr. MacNEIL: I do not wish to open up a discussion of policy on this item; but may I ask just why at this time, when according to the statement of the minister we so urgently require coastal defence, steps now should be taken to construct armouries at small points such as Cornwall and Hull?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I want to say immediately to my hon. friend that from the point of view of the Minister of National Defence we have not nearly enough armouries at the present time in Canada, especially following the reorganization of the militia that was effected a year or a year and a half ago, and the adaptation of mechanization processes to militia training. We find many new units of a technical nature, either artillery or engineering, with no proper armoury in which to drill or train. As a matter of fact, to be very frank, I should have preferred to see greater provision made for very necessary armouries. The only purpose of the armouries, apart from the community purposes for which they are frequently used, is to provide for the training of the militia forces of Canada for the defence of Canada.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does not the construction of armouries at a number of points make it more difficult to distribute to the units the equipment required for modern technical training? Would it not be preferable to have fewer training centres more completely equipped?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend will realize, of course, that sometimes we have a small section of a technical nature in a local centre, and naturally they want to have their training done at that point. I think one of the duties of any department of defence is to provide these facilities as far as that can be done.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister read his list rather rapidly, and I am not sure that I followed him. Was he taking out the national defence items from public works, and referring to them?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Then in this item No. 547 there is $136,000 over and above the revote—

The CHAIRMAN: We are still on item 546.

Mr. STIRLING: I beg your pardon.

Item agreed to.

General stores—further amount required, $530,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give the details, please?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is a revote of $394,300, making a total vote of $530,000. The revotes were partly for clothing ordered but not delivered within the fiscal year 1937-38; there is an amount for miscellaneous stores ordered but not delivered within the fiscal year 1937-38; an additional amount for new uniforms, clothing for the non-permanent militia, amounting to $50,000. That is not a revote; it is in the supplementary estimates. There is a revote of $59,000 for armament stores ordered but not delivered in the fiscal year 1937-38. For technical equipment required for repairs to mountings and for miscellaneous accessories for armament generally, west coast and east coast, there is an additional amount required for 1938-39, $20,000. There are a few small amounts in connection with search-light equipment, to provide for possible arrangements for purchase. Then, partly to complete the purchase of trucks, G.S. 15 hundredweight, an amount is required to meet increased cost of fifty-one vehicles included in last year's appropriations. For these purposes there is an amount of $50,000. There is also a small amount for coastal defence ammunition, and there is a revote of $30,300 for telephone, signal and wireless equipment.

If I may recapitulate, the table would be as follows:

Recapitulation of Stores and Equipment

	Revote 1937-38	Additional 1938-39
Clothing and miscellaneous stores	$ 75,000	$ 50,000
Armament stores	59,000	70,500
Ammunition procurement, progress	....	200
Telephone, signal and wireless equipment	30,300	....
	$164,300	$120,700

Mr. STIRLING: Is the contract for the Bren gun complete?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was dealt with in the main estimates.

Mr. STIRLING: Yes, and the minister announced that 7,000 of them would be for Canadian use.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Correct.

Mr. STIRLING: Has construction actually started on them?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The assembling of the plant and the preliminary processes necessary in the obtaining of equipment—I suppose the technical terms are jigs and dies—was commenced about two or three weeks ago. They are assembling some of the plant that we had in Quebec. It is being assembled at the plant in Toronto.

Mr. STIRLING: That is one of the pieces of work undertaken for purposes of defence as a result, I take it, of the work of the committee of inquiry into industrial possibilities?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Are any further purchases actually in hand or contemplated for other things? In one of his speeches the minister referred to search-lights, and I believe there was some reference to gas masks. There may be other requirements for defence, generally speaking. Can he give any information with regard to the developments we may expect shortly as a result of the committee's work in investigating industrial possibilities?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In regard to search-lights we have called for tenders and hope to have them produced in Canada. In regard to gas masks, may I say that we have been making the main portion of them in Canada. The experiments, which were of a difficult nature have been successful. We trust to have a production of so many a month, from this day forward.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Probably the observations I am about to make may refer more particularly to public works. But I must point out that Sydney is the centre of an important mining area, and from it a large number of recruits went to the last war and fought for their country. Apparently, from the standpoint of the defence department Nova Scotia begins and ends at Halifax. I think it is high time this aspect of the question was gone into by the authorities in the department, and that Sydney was given at least an armoury in which to train the units that exist down there.

Both Sydney and Glace Bay have first-class units. The men have given of their time gratuitously, and are doing good work. Stili there is an armoury, so-called, in Victoria park which the minister knows full well is a disgrace to any military district of Canada. We cannot expect those people to do the work, such as we see done around Ottawa, and expected of them by the department, if we do not provide facilities for them.

So far as the militarization of Canada is concerned, whether it be for internal or external defence matters not to me, if the shows put on around Ottawa, which we witness every other day in close proximity to this building, give an indication of how the money is spent, then I say that that is not a fair expenditure of the taxpayers money. If we want the whole-hearted effort of all Canada, the east as well as the west, moneys for militarization purposes should be distributed across Canada and not centered wholly in one place with the idea of putting on a show on certain state occasions. While they are all very well in their place, still I say that is not giving other sections of Canada a square deal. I do not believe Cape Breton has received a square deal from the defence department this year, because it has not been given proper facilities to train the units.

Mr. MacNEIL: I notice in the press mention is made of several public statements by the minister with regard to the survey of plants in Canada in connection with the manufacture of munitions. Did he in that survey include workshops and machine shops of the Canadian National Railways and those under the jurisdiction of the various federal departments?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe directions were given to the committee to survey those facilities.

Mr. BENNETT: Who had the contract for the Bren gun?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): John Inglis and Company in Toronto. They have two contracts, one from the Department of National Defence at Ottawa for 7,000 guns, and a similar contract from the British War Office for 5,000 guns.

Mr. BENNETT: That was secured through the good offices of the Department of National Defence, was it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; as a matter of fact I think negotiations were carried on entirely by the company's representative in England for the last two years, since 1936.

Mr. BENNETT: Have they facilities, either in the factory or otherwise?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They have an excellent plant there.

Mr. BENNETT: What kind of plant?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I cannot give the exact acreage.

Mr. BENNETT: What facilities for the manufacturing of guns?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): After the equipment is assembled, I believe they will have all the necessary facilities for the purpose. Of course, I do not pretend to be an expert on plants, in any way.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister informed the committee on the last occasion that a considerable quantity of machinery we have had stored at Valcartier all these years is to be adapted to this purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; I understand a valuation of about a quarter of a million dollars is placed upon that machinery. That much will be saved, as against the necessity for new purchases.

Mr. BENNETT: Did the minister sell it?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No; in one or two instances the principle has been followed of the government sharing with industry, the government purchasing equipment and retaining ownership. In this instance I understand the British War Office pays one-third of the price, and Canada pays two-thirds, with the entire ownership being vested in Canada.

Mr. MacNEIL: Has any consideration been given to the protection of the civilian population in points adjacent to those places which might be the targets of enemy forces?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): There is a committee to consider that question.

Mr. MacNEIL: Has provision been made for the purchase of equipment for the protection of the civilian population?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have not yet received a definite report, so I am not in a position to give the hon. member the information required.

Item agreed to.

Naval services — Royal Canadian Navy — further amount required, $122,875.

Mr. STIRLING: Would the minister give the information with respect to this item?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Of the $84,875, $73,875 is a revote of unexpended portions of the contracts for four mine sweepers. There is $5,875 held up in regard to the construction of the Venture. Then, there are stores and equipment, $38,000, required to complete the purchase of special stores and technical equipment for the new mine sweepers.

Mr. STIRLING: We were told by the minister that the Venture was in Halifax where she was receiving certain alterations in the dry dock. Is that $5,000 for that work?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe the work at Halifax cost $970, roughly speaking.

Mr. STIRLING: Can the minister give us any further information with regard to additional acquisitions for the Royal Canadian Navy. I believe the flotilla leader, which is in the A class, was obtainable, but I do not know whether Canada made any attempt to purchase it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): As far as my knowledge goes, no definite steps have been taken by the dominion government with reference to the flotilla leader. I know that to have the complement complete we should have a flotilla leader and possibly more mine sweepers, but there have been no negotiations entered into so far by the government.

Mr. STIRLING: When are the new ships expected to reach Canada?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): About the end of July.

Mr. MacNEIL: In a sessional paper tabled last session, it was stated that Canada had entered into contractual obligations to maintain naval bases at Esquimalt and Halifax. To what extent are we under obligation to defend those bases in the event of war?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am afraid that is a legal and constitutional question which I would rather refrain from answering with any definiteness.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Naval Reserves—further amount required, $30,000.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): This is for the naval reserves.

Mr. STIRLING: The new reserves?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Air services—Royal Canadian Air Force—permanent air force—further amount required, $884,900.

Mr. STIRLING: Would this item apply to contracts which were let, and in connection with which delivery has not been obtained?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Exactly.

Mr. STIRLING: What are the details?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They are practically all revotes. The details are:

Bombs and ammunition	$ 50,000
Miscellaneous stores	66,000
Airframes and new engines	390,000
Wireless telegraph equipment	25,000
	$531,000

Mr. STIRLING: What are the details in connection with the $884,900?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The details are:

Construction of buildings and works:
Dartmouth	$ 50,000
Trenton	114,948
Vancouver	63,451
Kamloops—magazine	5,500
Patricia Bay	25,000

There is a supplementary amount of $50,000 for Patricia Bay, and the extension of further facilities on the Pacific coast, $30,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Is the amount for Trenton to cover a new building?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The details are, in round figures:

Construction, stores building, $25,000.
Doors for hangars, $603.
Construction of barracks block No. 2, $19,000.
Supplying and installation of mechanical equipment for central heating plant, $15,000.
Construction of central heating plant, $4,500.
Underground telephone system, $7,300.
Construction of N.C.O's and airmen's mess building, $42,700.

Mr. STIRLING: Has the minister anything further to say with regard to the developments at Jericho?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The contract for the two hangars has been let. Negotiations are proceeding, but we are waiting for the exchequer court in regard to the property I have mentioned.

Mr. HARTIGAN: Does the department intend to proceed with the airport at Sydney?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I understand the report that has been received is not final or definite enough to come to a decision immediately. It is being considered at the present time.

Mr. MacNEIL: What are the qualifications required for recruits to the permanent air force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I had all that information in the other reference books in connection with the main estimates.

Item agreed to.

Non-permanent air force—further amount required, $48,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Does this indicate an extension of the non-permanent air force?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The amount for revote is to replace partly funds which will be returned to treasury at the close of the fiscal year 1937-38 and which cannot be replaced from funds included in the main estimates without detriment to the program contained therein. The details are:

Aircraft and engine spares	$ 2,000
Miscellaneous stores	6,000
Airframes and engines	32,000
Wireless telegraph equipment	8,000
All revotes	$48,000

Mr. STIRLING: Are the non-permanent air squadrons fully equipped with the necessary aircraft?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): They have what may be termed preliminary training equipment. Advanced trainers are not yet available, but we are taking steps to obtain them as quickly as possible.

Item agreed to.

Departmental administration, $425,720.

Mr. BENNETT: I had intended to make some rather extended observations with respect to the administration of the Department of National Defence, but at this hour of the evening I shall not endeavour to do so. However, I shall deal with this matter when the supply bill is under consideration and an opportunity is afforded for discussion. But there is one matter that I must bring to the attention of the committee to-night. This concerns the right of a deputy minister, because he occupies a position of importance, to libel a citizen of this country.

The department called for tenders for coal at Kingston. Tenders were submitted by Drury's, Crawford's, Norman's, the Morris coal company, and also by the firm of James Sowards company. Their tender was the lowest, whereupon the deputy minister advised the minister that the acceptance of the lowest tender, that of James Sowards company, was not recommended because of reports received concerning this firm. The minister passed on that information in his order in council and it became part of the permanent records of this country. I should like to know just what those reports are. Mr. Sowards is a large taxpayer and a reputable citizen. He does not support the government of the country; at the present moment he is a supporter of the opposition, and has been for some time. He made his tender, which was the lowest tender by thousands of dollars, and the deputy minister advised his minister not to accept that tender because, to quote his words, "of reports received concerning this firm." I have here the return in my hand. I have shown the return to Mr. Sowards. As a citizen of equal reputation with the deputy minister at least, he demands the right to know what those reports were that prevented the taxpayers of Canada from being relieved of a burden of many thousands of dollars. What right had the deputy minister to take this action? What right had any man in that position to do it? And that is only one of about twenty similar proceedings which I desire to discuss. The minister, of course, must assume responsibility for these things, as he does, because he passes them along; but when it is recorded that the deputy minister recommends such and such a thing, I rather doubt the right of any deputy minister to be the controlling factor in the language here used:

> The minister, on the advice of the deputy minister of National Defence, recommends that the tender of Messrs. Morris Coal Company, be accepted as follows:
> 1,000 tons bituminous run of mine coal, "Yatesboro" at $6.60 ton.
> 100 tons coke, nut size, "Hamilton or Lasalle" at $12 ton.
> Acceptance of the lowest tender, that of Messrs. James Sowards Coal Company is not recommended because of reports received concerning this firm.

That is part of the public records, and Mr. Sowards wants to know what those reports are. That is one of many matters in which the deputy minister, either of his own volition or under pressure, has become the instrument of political oppression. It applies to individuals; it applies to firms; it applies to contracts. Whether or not he did this of his own volition, it is for the minister to say, and whether or not he reflected the mind of the minister and the administration when he made this statement. But it is my duty to ask why a citizen should be pilloried in this way by any person who finds himself in a position of brief authority.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have not the documents before me at the moment with reference to the particular tender mentioned by the right hon. gentleman, but I definitely recall that complaints were made in regard to the carrying out of a previous contract by this same gentleman, with reference to a definite breach of the labour conditions in the contract. I shall ascertain the exact terms of the complaint and shall be glad to supply it to my right hon. friend or to any member of the committee.

In view of my right hon. friend's references to the deputy minister, I wish to say immediately that the minister of the department assumes full and complete responsibility for every action by the department, and I wish also to say immediately that in my whole experience there is not to be found in the public service of Canada a gentleman more devoted to his duty and more self-sacrificing in the execution of his duty than the deputy minister of National Defence. I know personally that he toils far into the night, probably at a great sacrifice of his own health, and I submit to the right hon. gentleman, with the utmost deference, that he has been misinformed with reference to this matter.

Mr. BENNETT: I am reading from a public document.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I submit to my right hon. friend that what he has read from that record will be substantiated, and that it does not refer in the slightest degree to the deputy minister of National Defence. I do not recall the exact circumstances, but very likely instructions came from the minister to the deputy. I shall be glad to look up the exact details and back up what I say because this is probably the only case in which the lowest tender has been refused in the department for the last two and a half years. I wish to state that there has never been an inquiry from the deputy minister to me of the slightest political significance, and that I have never seen a deputy minister more courteous to the members of this house of all shades of political opinion. The members of the opposition receive the same courteous treatment from him as do the supporters of this administration, and I regret very much that the right hon. gentleman saw fit to make the remarks that he did. I can assure him in reference to the contract he has mentioned that the information will be supplied to justify the statement made in that memorandum.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has entirely failed to appreciate the point that I made. He has seen fit to make a recommendation to council based upon a recommendation made to him by the deputy minister, which provided for the acceptance of a tender that was not the lowest, which lowest tender was declined because, it was stated, "of reports received concerning this firm." Did the minister take any steps to ascertain whether they were correct or not? Did he give the man an opportunity to make an answer? Did he communicate with him at all?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No.

Mr. BENNETT: No, and that is British justice. Right there in black and white is a document impugning the reputation of a firm that enjoys at least as good a reputation as the deputy minister, and he attacks it and gives no reason for it, and does not communicate with the man. Why? This gentleman could not get a set of the tender forms, not being on the list of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and not being able to get the forms, he puts in his tender and says: "I will fill out any form you require." The director of contracts felt that he could not deal with the situation, and so the minister says: "Do not accept the lowest tender; he happens to be a Conservative."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is not correct. It had nothing to do with it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Where is that stated, that he is a Conservative.

Mr. BENNETT: I will tell you where it is stated. It is stated right in the document where his tender was refused—not in terms, but that was the reason. I will show you his letter. He did not have a set of the forms sent to him. Oh, no, that was not done. But he wrote to the department:

Sowards Coal,
Kingston, Ontario,
June 26, 1937.

We the undersigned are prepared to supply the department at Kingston and Barriefield with coal and coke at the following prices:

Then follow the prices, and the letter concludes:

We will fill in regular form if supplied with same.

Yours truly,
James Sowards Coal Company, per J. F. Sowards.

There was no objection made to the fact that the tender was not on the regular form. No forms were sent to him to fill in. But the deputy minister, according to this document—the minister says he has no recollection of the circumstances at the moment—advised the minister that the tender of Messrs. Morris Coal Company be accepted, and that:

Acceptance of the lowest tender, that of Messrs. James Sowards Coal Company, is not recommended because of reports received concerning this firm.

The taxpayers of this country have had to pay thousands of dollars more for their coal, and no opportunity was afforded to Mr. Sowards to meet the anonymous assassin who stabs him in the back without giving him a chance to defend himself. And this is typical of the administration. The Minister of Labour is not in his place, but if the Minister of National Defence will apply to him he will get some information about the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I shall be very glad to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: I have been reading from sessional paper No. 170A as brought down, and when the minister has ascertained the facts we shall be able to deal with this and other matters of a similar kind that have also to be dealt with.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does the item stand, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If my hon. friend is anxious to have it stand, I have no particular objection.

Mr. MacNEIL: If you would, please.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

On motion of Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

Monday, June 6, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

THE LATE ALEXANDER McKAY EDWARDS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have again to ask the house to pause in its proceedings to permit mention being made of the sudden passing of another of our number, who but a few days ago was in his accustomed seat, to all appearances in the best of health. I refer to Mr. Alexander McKay Edwards, the deputy whip of the conservative opposition, who for nearly thirteen years past has represented the constituency of South Waterloo in this house.

At the end of the week before last, when the hon. the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) left Ottawa to address a meeting in the city of Galt, Ontario, in the constituency of the hon. member, the minister was accompanied by Mr. Edwards, who on the day following introduced him to his audience. Later in the day Mr. Edwards complained of not feeling well, and was obliged to rest. It was not thought, either by himself or by others, that his condition was serious. On Friday last this house had only begun its afternoon's proceedings when word was received that the hon. member had passed away.

Mr. Edwards was in his sixty-third year. He was born at Bothwell, Ontario, but at an early age went to live in Waterloo county. His personal, business and political interests were centred in the county of Waterloo, and, more particularly, in and about the thriving and industrial communities of Galt and Preston. His career, however, had its intimate association with the affairs of his native province and with the larger and wider interests of our dominion.

By marriage, Mr. Edwards was related to the late Hon. George Clare who for many years represented the constituency of South Waterloo in this parliament. Like the late George Clare, Mr. Edwards held an enviable place in the esteem and confidence of his fellow citizens. He was successful and prominent in business; the head of an important manufacturing enterprise, and the director of several others. For eight years he served the city of Galt as an alderman, and for two years as its chief magistrate. He was first elected to the House of Commons in the general election of 1925, and was reelected at each of the three subsequent general elections, representing the constituency in all, as I have said, for nearly thirteen years.

During his years in parliament, Mr. Edwards represented his constituents with fidelity and ability. He was held in high personal esteem in parliament as he was in his constituency. In this house he was regular in his attendance, was active in the work of its committees. When he participated in the debates he spoke to the point, and was listened to with attention and respect. As assistant to the chief whip of the Conservative party, he rendered services which were much appreciated by all parties in the house.

It is not without significance that his last public act should have been the one to which I have already alluded, an act of courtesy and chivalry towards a political opponent. It was the expression of a nature which was essentially kindly, cheerful, and generous, and which won for him many strong and enduring friendships among members of all parties.

We shall all greatly miss his pleasing personality. His was a career of quiet, unobtrusive conscientious service to his community and to his party, one which maintained and served to further the amenities of public and parliamentary life. Not his party only, but the entire membership of this house, has suffered in his passing a loss which will be deeply felt.

I extend to hon. gentlemen opposite, and to their leader, the very sincere sympathy of my colleagues and myself, and, indeed, of all hon. members on this side, in the loss of so old, trusted, loyal, and valued a colleague and friend.

I should like to express our sympathy as well to the constituency which the late member represented so faithfully over many years.

To Mrs. Edwards, and to her son and daughter, who have been thus greatly bereaved, and to the aged mother of Mr. Edwards, who shared his household and now mourns the loss of her son, the sympathy of all hon. members of this house goes out in fullest measure. It would, Mr. Speaker, be appreciated by all if this expression of our sympathy could be conveyed by Your Honour, to Mrs. Edwards, and to the other members of the family.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, may I first thank the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) for his kindly sympathetic and appreciative references to the gentleman whose loss we mourn to-day, one who was a prominent member of the official opposition. The house meets under the shadow of death of one of its members. This has happened so frequently during the present parliament that we are reminded of the saying that there is nothing certain about man's life but this, that he shall lose it.

As has been ably pointed out by the Prime Minister, the late Mr. Edwards by his activities in his home town and constituency was well qualified to be a worthy representative of that constituency in the House of Commons. He became a member in 1925, and since that time has continuously represented South Waterloo. His membership in the house was characterized by regularity of attendance, industry, careful attention to his many duties in the house and to the deliberations of the important committees upon which he served. His zeal for his constituency was outstanding, and the confidence of his electors was expressed as has been indicated here. Although his speeches in the house were not frequent, they showed careful preparation and a knowledge of his subject, and were delivered in a calm and reasoned manner which commanded respect, carried conviction, and made a lasting impression upon his hearers. His relations with his fellow members were cordial, and in a large measure he enjoyed their confidence.

The sympathy which will go out from this house and from the large number of people who knew the late Mr. Edwards will in a measure help to sustain his mother, his widow and family in their sad bereavement. With the right hon. leader of the official opposition and hon. members supporting him I join in requesting that Your Honour convey to them our expression of deep sympathy.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I desire to associate myself with what has been said respecting our late colleague, Mr. Edwards. I am sure it will be consoling to his family to know of the high esteem in which he was held by members of the house. In my association with him I always looked upon him as a kindly and generous man, one who had no hate in him. Such characteristics in these days are in certain quarters no longer regarded as virtues, and it is well that we lay special emphasis upon them. With the other members of the group to which I belong, I wish to associate myself with what has been so well said by those who have preceded me.

Mr. JOSEPH NEEDHAM (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, the group to which I belong wishes to associate itself with the expression of appreciation of services rendered and sympathy for the bereaved. When we met the late brother in the lobbies and through the various activities of the house, we learned to respect and honour him. With other hon. members who have spoken we would request you, Mr. Speaker, to convey our sympathy to the bereaved family.

[Mr. H. A. Stewart.]

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Mr. THOMAS VIEN (Outremont, for Mr. Moore) moved that the third report of the standing committee on banking and commerce, presented on June 1, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD—GRAIN HANDLING AT QUEBEC

Mr. WALSH:

1. Has any member or employee of the national harbours board, Department of Transport, or any other government authority, either directly or indirectly, entered into any special arrangement or agreement, verbally or otherwise, with any Canadian or foreign company, partnership or individual or with any carrier, to handle grain through Quebec or other government owned elevators in the St. Lawrence at other than published tariff, either by rebate, commutation, lump sum payment or any other medium, based on the quality of grain exported through the said elevators during a specified or unlimited period?
2. If so, what are the rates charged under this special agreement?
3. Were the terms of the said agreement submitted to and approved by the board of grain commissioners prior to its acceptance and completion?
4. Were any special arrangements made with any grain firm or carrier which would have the effect of reducing the cost of transportation and/or handling charges on grain already shipped, about to move, or to be forwarded in the future from Bayports to Quebec and through the Quebec elevator?
5. Will the free storage concession granted at Quebec be extended to grain exported from Montreal elevators?
6. If so, will this concession apply also to part cargo lots exported by liners?

Mr. HOWE:

1. No.
2 and 3. Answered by No. 1.
4. No.
5. Published tariffs apply.
6. Answered by No. 5.

MOTION FOR PAPERS

MANITOBA HIGHWAYS

Mr. BEAUBIEN:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, orders in council, agreements and other documents having to do with the construction of the Piney highway, Morden Sprague highway, Brandon Clear Lake highway, in Manitoba, carried on between the province of Manitoba and the dominion government, as well as all other correspondence in relation thereto between the Minister of Labour, the Prime Minister and any other parties, between the dates of August 20, 1935, and October 15, 1935.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

MEASURE TO ASSIST THE CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES —PROVISION WITH RESPECT TO LOW RENTAL HOUSES AND MUNICIPAL TAXES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved,—That it is expedient to bring in a measure which in part I thereof repeals The Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and reenacts certain provisions thereof with amendments and additions so as to provide inter alia that the amount of loans to be made and expenses to be incurred shall not exceed $20,000,000 less loans made under the said act, and to enable the Minister of Finance to guarantee approved lending institutions or local authorities against loss up to certain maximum amounts in respect of small loans in order to encourage the making of such loans in small and remote communities and in certain districts of other communities and to make payments to lending institutions to cover the special costs of making such loans; which in part II thereof authorizes the making of loans at low interest rates to local housing authorities to assist in the construction of houses to be leased to families of low income at rentals less than the economic rentals therefor, such loans not to exceed $30,000,000 in the aggregate; which in part III thereof authorizes the payment to municipalities of a proportion of the municipal taxes levied during a three-year period upon new low-cost houses constructed prior to December 31, 1940, for owners for their own occupation, but excluding houses constructed under part II of the act; and which authorizes the employment and remuneration of technical and clerical staffs and the payment of other expenses in connection with the administration of the act.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

INQUIRY AS TO INTENTION TO PROCEED WITH LEGISLATION AT THE PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, based on considerable correspondence, and also on copies of petitions I have received, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). I have been urged, and I have no doubt other hon. members have been, to support a measure, promised in the speech from the throne, which would set up in Canada a system of unemployment insurance. Will the Prime Minister inform the house whether he is likely to bring down such a measure during the present session? Perhaps he has a general statement to make in the matter; if so, I believe the country would be pleased to hear it at this time.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at the moment I am unable to recall the exact words which appear in the speech from the throne. So far as I recollect however they were to the effect that the government hoped to be in a position, through the cooperation of the several provinces, to bring in a national unemployment insurance measure. It has been understood from the outset that in the opinion of the administration a scheme of national unemployment insurance is the one which would be most in the interests alike of the provinces and the dominion. For that reason it has been hoped that the dominion would have the hearty cooperation of the provinces in permitting an amendment to the British North America Act which would give this parliament full jurisdiction with respect to the enactment of unemployment insurance. The hon. member who has just spoken, and no doubt all other hon. members of the house, know that the government has not received from some of the provinces endorsation of the view that this parliament should be given power to enact an unemployment insurance measure. We are still hoping that in this matter the reasons which may be actuating the provinces referred to will be further considered and that ultimately all will see the wisdom of cooperating in a national unemployment insurance measure. However, it is not the intention of this government to seek to coerce the provinces with respect to any legislative measure which is in the nature of a social service measure. Our aim rather is to be helpful and to further if we can mutual interests. We do not want to appear, let alone in reality, to seek in any way to coerce any province of the dominion. It would look at the moment as though it will not be possible to get that cooperation with respect to unemployment insurance before the present session comes to its close, but if it should be obtained the measure will be introduced.

The reference to this matter in the speech from the throne was as follows:

> The cooperation of the provinces has been sought with a view to an amendment of the British North America Act, which would empower the parliament of Canada to enact forthwith a national scheme of unemployment insurance. My ministers hope the proposal may meet with early approval, in order that unemployment insurance legislation may be enacted during the present session of parliament.

I may say we have the measure drafted and as soon as the proposal meets with approval, it will be introduced.

UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): I should like to inquire of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) if a satisfactory settlement has yet been reached with respect to the grievances of the single unemployed now occupying the Vancouver post office and the art gallery

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): My latest information is that the situation has not altered since the matter was last raised in this house.

AUTHORIZATION OF LOANS TO ASSIST MUNICIPALITIES IN MAKING SELF-LIQUIDATING IMPROVEMENTS

The house resumed from Thursday, June 2, consideration in committee of Bill No. 143, to assist municipalities in making self-liquidating improvements—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 2—Definitions.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): When this bill was last in committee, sections 2, 9 and 10 were allowed to stand in order to give me an opportunity to consider representations which had been made regarding the desirability of certain amendments. I think all the suggestions made were constructive in character. I have an amendment to suggest to section 2, which I shall ask my colleague to move, as follows:

That paragraph (b) of section 2 of the bill be amended by adding thereto at the end thereof the following words: "and also includes any board, commission or agency duly authorized to act on behalf of one or more municipalities in the construction and operation of a self-liquidating project."

Mr. CRERAR: I move accordingly.

Mr. DUNNING: A number of members thought that it would be desirable to have some wording which would deal with cases where a joint board was acting for one or more municipalities or where a municipality acted through a joint board with respect to a particular utility.

Mr. STEWART: This amendment would seem to meet every possible condition referred to by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). In Ontario we have public utility commissions and I assume that in other provinces there are similar organizations. It is possible that in the operation of certain utilities two or three municipalities may be united. I think it is fortunate that the bill has been broadened to enable these commissions or agents of municipalities to take advantage of its provisions.

Mr. STIRLING: What would be the procedure in connection with an unorganized district? With whom would the minister, with the approval of the governor in council, enter into an agreement?

Mr. DUNNING: Of necessity with the provincial government. There is no other entity in such a case. "Municipality" includes "a province where such province is administering directly territory not organized into county or municipal units." I suppose some provinces may think that we are degrading them by including them in this definition, but there appears to be no other way of dealing with an unorganized territory except through the only authority which has jurisdiction therein. It would mean a great deal to British Columbia particularly, and also to some of the other provinces, if there were not some method of dealing with the unorganized territories.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—Aggregate amount of loans.

Mr. DUNNING: As a necessary consequence of the amendment we have just agreed to, I must ask the reconsideration of section 6. The population relationships are affected by what we have just decided in relation to these boards. I am going to ask my colleague to move the following amendment:

That subsection 2 of section 6 of the bill be amended by adding thereto at the end thereof the following proviso:

"and provided further that in the case of a loan made to a board, commission or agency acting on behalf of more than one municipality, the aggregate amount of the loans to be made to such board, commission or agency and the municipalities concerned shall not exceed the maximum amount of loans which the municipalities would be entitled to receive if acting separately and shall be apportioned between the board, commission or agency and the municipalities concerned on a basis to be approved by the governor in council."

Mr. CRERAR: I move accordingly.

Mr. DUNNING: I think the difficulty which is sought to be remedied by this amendment will be obvious to all.

Mr. MacNEIL: What would be the position of a municipality whose affairs are being administered by a provincial commission?

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend mean a municipality at present in default?

Mr. MacNEIL: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: I think the definition is broad enough. It would still be a municipality within the meaning of the law and would not on that account be debarred from consideration.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): There is just the question whether the amendment covers the case of a municipality wishing a loan for itself while at the same time it is acting jointly with other municipalities under a board receiving a loan. Does the minister get my point?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I sent the amendment back to the law officers this morning to make sure that it would cover that point, and the language does cover it.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Thank you.

Mr. STEWART: Mr. Chairman, I gather that the purpose of the minister and of the government in introducing this legislation has been to assist in the relief of unemployment. Unemployment is most severe in several of the larger cities, and the bill contains a provision limiting a loan to any one of those municipalities according to the municipality's population in proportion to that of the rest of the dominion. I am inclined to think that in some respects that provision will defeat the purposes of the legislation, because the smaller municipalities that might desire to take advantage of it and come under its provisions have probably no great number of unemployed. For example, in a town of ten or twenty thousand or a city of fifty thousand there may not be many unemployed, but such municipalities come within the scope of this legislation. On the other hand, in Montreal there are probably one to one and a quarter million people in the city and surrounding suburbs; under this provision they would get for all that area possibly only one-tenth of this appropriation. So many of the smaller municipalities will desire or need to take advantage of the legislation that it seems to me a considerable amount of this money will not be employed if you impose this limit upon it. The whole of this money cannot be expended under the plan of this legislation unless every municipality takes advantage of it.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think my hon. friend is quite right in his conclusions. In the first place, I think he is wrong as to his premises.

Mr. STEWART: That would make it all wrong.

Mr. DUNNING: I think he is wrong in assuming that the smaller municipalities do not have any unemployment problem.

Mr. STEWART: I did not say they would not have any.

Mr. DUNNING: Or materially less in proportion than the larger municipalities; and he forgets probably one feature when he refers to the city of Montreal. Under this bill the city of Montreal is one municipality, the city of Verdun is another, the city of Westmount is another, the town of Mount Royal is another, the city of Lachine is another. These are all separate municipalities.

Mr. STEWART: Would that alter the proportion they could receive?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes; because the smaller municipality would be able to borrow up to the $200,000 limit, although by the population calculation they would not on that basis be entitled to it. Frankly I do expect this amount of money to be utilized if the provinces and the municipalities right across Canada take advantage of it in the manner contemplated. It all depends on them, of course, but judging from requests already coming in from municipalities from one end of Canada to the other for information regarding their ability to take advantage of this scheme, there is no doubt as to the desire of the municipalities for something of this sort to enable them to do work which in very many cases would have been done years ago but for the conditions which have prevailed. I am, in fact, very hopeful of this scheme, given that degree of cooperation which alone can make success possible.

Mr. MARTIN: We have had an intimation from the press that the Minister of Finance received a delegation from the mayors of Canada, and perhaps he might find opportunity to tell us their reaction to this proposal.

Mr. DUNNING: The delegation from the mayors who sought an interview with me expressed on behalf of the body they represent approval of the bill now under discussion. We had a general discussion about it, and there was no criticism but very evident appreciation of the purpose of the bill.

Mr. STEWART: In years gone by it was the custom once a year or oftener to call together the premiers of the provinces and to discuss their problems with them, particularly those relating to unemployment; proposals of this kind would be outlined and submitted for their approval, or sometimes initiated by them. Has this legislation been approved at any such conference with the premiers of the provinces?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. STEWART: When was the last conference of that kind held?

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot recall the date of the last dominion-provincial conference. I think there was none in 1937. There may have been one early last year, but I am doubtful about that.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 5—Securities for loans.

Mr. DUNNING: This section was allowed to stand because of the possibility of its requiring amendment consequent upon the change in the interpretation clause, but the words "or other securities" in line 35 fit in with the amendment to the interpretation clause, and therefore no amendment of this section is necessary.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Orders and regulations.

Mr. DUNNING: The leader of the opposition suggested the desirability of publication in the Canada Gazette of certain of the regulations covered by this section, and I therefore will ask my colleague to move that subsection 2 of section 9 be amended by adding thereto, at the end thereof, the following words:

and all such orders and regulations as are of general application or abstracts thereof shall be published in the Canada Gazette.

The object is a widely diffused knowledge of what is going on under the act.

Mr. CRERAR: I move accordingly, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. STEWART: I think it is quite in keeping with the practice that has been followed under these acts for the relief of unemployment, that the orders in council or summaries thereof should be published shortly after they are passed when the house is not in session, and laid on the table of the house when the house is in session. Perhaps it might be well to add that a copy shall be laid on the table of the house.

Mr. DUNNING: That is covered in the next section.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 10—Report to parliament.

Mr. DUNNING: This section was left standing because of the suggestion that it would be desirable to have the year made the calendar year instead of the fiscal year. I find that that would be very helpful to the Department of Finance, as in fact it would in connection with other matters requiring reports to parliament, if the year were the calendar year instead of the fiscal year, having regard to the time the house usually meets. I shall ask my colleague to move an amendment:

That section 10 be amended by striking out the word "fiscal" in line 34 on page 3 of the bill and substituting therefor the word "calendar."

Mr. CRERAR: I so move.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. STEWART: Was the minister correct when he said that section 10 provided for the regulations being laid on the table? All it provides for is a report. The report would not necessarily cover the regulations.

Mr. DUNNING: I have never tabled a report yet which did not include the regulations made under it.

Mr. STEWART: The report would be simply of the operations and number of projects and loans.

Mr. DUNNING: Loans made under the provisions of the act. A report could not be made which did not include the regulations. That is always the case.

Mr. STEWART: I do not agree with the minister. I think you could make a report as to the operation of the act, leaving the regulations out entirely. The only suggestion I make is to have it read: "report and regulations".

Mr. DUNNING: All regulations should be tabled here, in a report. If it is desirable I am quite willing to consider an amendment to make that certain. But to my mind a report would be incomplete and would not give parliament a chance to understand the basis of operation unless it included all regulations.

Mr. STEWART: I think I am familiar with some reports brought down which do not include regulations.

Mr. DUNNING: Departmental reports.

Mr. STEWART: However, if the minister will assure the committee that the regulations will come, I do not want to delay the passage of the bill.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING LEASES OF MINERALIZED AREAS AND ADVANCES TO ASSIST AGRICULTURE AND OTHER PURSUITS

The house resumed from Friday, June 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 138, to amend the Indian Act—Mr. Crerar—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Leases and licences to prospect for minerals.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): When the bill was before the committee the other day, two amendments were suggested to clause 1. As I recall, the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) suggested that after the words "Superintendent General" in the second line there should be something to indicate that the section related to Indian reserves. In the opinion of the law officers of the crown there is no objection, although their view is that it is not necessary, since the Indian Act relates only to Indian administration. But I suggest an amendment to subsection 2, which will be moved by my colleague the Minister of Public Works:

That section 1 of the bill be amended by adding after the words "Superintendent General" in line 2 the words "in respect of any reserve."

Criticism was made also of the last lines in subsection 2, which read:

. . . to issue leases upon such terms as may be considered proper in the interests of the Indians and of any lessee or licencee.

I explained at the time the purpose of the last four words. But in order to make it clear that it does not apply to any who may be getting mineral leases I suggest a further amendment to that section:

That the words "and of any lessee and licencee" in line 4 be struck out and the following substituted therefor: "and of any other lessee or licencee of surface rights."

This will make clearer the purpose of the inclusion of those words.

Mr. CARDIN: I so move.

Mr. NEILL: Would it not be better to say "Indian reserves"? There are a number of other reserves throughout the country. In the act being repealed the words "Indian reserves" are used.

Mr. CRERAR: "In respect of any reserve"?

Mr. NEILL: It is not proposed to issue leases on any reserves, but only on Indian reserves. Why not call them Indian reserves?

Mr. CRERAR: The section does not deal with anything but Indian reserves, but there is no objection to the inclusion of the word suggested by the hon. member.

Mr. STIRLING: The clause will now end with the words "in the interests of the Indians and of any other lessee or licencee of surface rights"?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: What lessee of surface rights could there be other than the lessee referred to here?

Mr. CRERAR: There might be a situation under which the surface rights to pulpwood or grazing or hay or something else had already been disposed of. Then subsequently you dispose of another kind of right, the right to prospect or mine. This merely provides that the leases may be issued upon such terms as may be considered proper in the interests of the Indians and of any other lessee or licencee.

Mr. NEILL: I submit that the word "other" is confusing. "Other" suggests something else from which you are making a distinction, but there is nothing else. The superintendent general is given power to issue leases in connection with minerals, and in my opinion the language, to make the meaning clear, should be "and of any existing lessee or licencee." That is the idea. If a man has the right to take pulpwood or firewood the superintendent general is given the power to make an arrangement that will be in the interests of the Indians, and of these prior holders. That is what it is intended to convey; but when you say "and of any other lessee or licencee" that meaning is not very clear. I submit that the words I have suggested, "and of any existing lessee or licencee," would cover the meaning which the bill intends to convey. As it stands it is rather obscure. "Other" implies two things (a) and (b). We have (b) but we have not (a). What is it to which "other" refers? It does not seem to be very clear. The minister wishes to take power to grant such licences as shall be fair to the Indians and to any existing lessee or licencee. That is what the section means.

Mr. CRERAR: That is the purpose of it. We explained that purpose to the law officers of the Department of Justice and this is the amendment that has been proposed. I think it is quite clear as it stands. There might be a difference of opinion as to whether the word "existing" should replace the word "other," but I submit the purpose is manifest.

Mr. NEILL: It is all right with me, but I submit that it is not clear.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: Did the minister agree to put in the word "Indian"—"Indian reserve"?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Will the chairman be good enough to make a note of that?

The CHAIRMAN: "In respect of any Indian reserve"; it has been noted.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Advances for assistance to Indians.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni the other day suggested the advisability of tabling a report on the transactions carried on under the operation of this revolving fund, and I have an amendment which I will ask the Minister of Public Works to move.

Mr. CARDIN: I move:

That section 2 of the bill be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"The superintendent general shall annually prepare a report with regard to loans made under the provisions of this section during the preceding calendar year, and such report shall be laid before parliament within fifteen days or, if parliament is not then sitting, within fifteen days after the beginning of the next session."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: The minister did not give consideration to the suggestion made by several members on this side of the house that it would be well if the act included some reference to the payment of interest. It merely provides that money shall be lent but there is nothing to indicate whether interest shall be paid. I am doubtful whether, if you asked a man to pay interest under this act, it would be authorized. You have not taken the power to charge interest, but only to lend money, and no limit is set regarding amount or time. Is it to be a kind of perpetual loan?

Mr. CRERAR: The regulations can provide for rates of interest. I am not prepared at the moment to suggest either a maximum or a minimum rate. It is possible that where there are different types of loans the interest rate might be varied to facilitate the carrying out of the purposes of the bill. There was another method by which we could have attained the end sought, namely, to vote it directly in the estimates year by year, but I explained why we were adopting this departure. It is experimental but I can well conceive that in certain instances it might be desirable to vary the rates of interest charged as between different types of loans. That, I think, might more wisely be left to be set out in the regulations that will govern the operation of the act.

Mr. NEILL: The minister did not quite catch what I meant. The other day I expressed the view that the rate of interest should be defined; to-day I am only suggesting that it should be made quite clear that some interest must be paid.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think there is any question about the scope of the regulations as to the charging of interest. My hon. friend, I gather, fears that some of the money might be lent without an interest rate being charged and he wishes to guard against that possibility. I do not think he need be apprehensive on that score. Certainly my conception of the administration of the act is that some interest rate should be charged. In some cases it might be low and in others higher, but that will be for the governor in council to determine in the regulations.

Mr. NEILL: The last time the bill was under consideration, the minister himself said that he might want to lend certain sums without interest. That, however, is not the point. The point I am trying to make is that, unless it is made clear, some man might be lent a large sum of money and in years to come, when asked for interest, he might reply that the act did not provide for any interest but only for the lending of money. Did the law officers say that it was thoroughly constitutional to pass a bill authorizing the lending of large sums of money and leaving to be defined in the regulations, which are more or less administrative, the fact that interest must be paid? That is the point.

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot say at the moment whether the law officers passed an opinion on that precise point, but I do not think there is any question whatever that the regulations can provide for rates of interest.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read a third time?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Next sitting of the house.

Mr. CRERAR: Can we not get rid of it now?

Mr. STEWART: I think it might be well for the minister to consider that point about interest, and possibly to have the advice of the law officers in that regard.

TRANSPORT COMMISSION

AUTHORITY TO CONTROL TRANSPORT OF PASSENGERS AND GOODS BY RAILWAYS, SHIPS AND AIRCRAFT

The house resumed from Friday, June 3, consideration in committee of Bill No. 31, to establish a board of transport commissioners for Canada, with authority in respect of transport by railways, ships and aircraft—Mr. Howe—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Sections 13 and 14 agreed to.

On section 15—Application of part.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder if the minister would explain subsection 2. What is the need for that provision?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Subsection 2 provides that the governor in council may by regulation exempt any aircraft or class of aircraft from the operation of this part. We have included that provision in each section; that is, in the shipping section and each of the others. It is simply that we are feeling our way, and we may find a situation that cannot be dealt with under the exact terms of the act. That is simply to leave a loophole while we are working out the details of the bill.

Mr. STEWART: Does the minister not think, having regard to the way in which the section is drafted, that it is open to the objection that there may be a chance for discrimination? I understood that the purpose of this act was to bring all these forms of transportation under licence, but here you say any of them may be exempted.

Mr. HOWE: The act provides that only aircraft travelling on regular schedules shall be brought under it, and it may be a little difficult to decide what are and what are not regular schedules. I have no particular objection to striking out that provision, but we do feel that we should not be tied up too tightly, in that we are breaking entirely new ground as far as regulation goes. I cannot imagine that it will be used, particularly as related to air transportation; but I do not think it is of any particular importance. I should prefer to leave it in, but if anyone else would prefer to have it struck out I would not object particularly.

Mr. STEWART: If the minister, having given careful consideration to the plan and purpose of the act, thinks this regulation will serve any useful purpose and that it will not give rise to charges of discrimination, I do not think we could have much objection to it.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Licencee subject to tolls.

Mr. STIRLING: This is giving the minister the same sort of discretion in administration, is it not? Subsection 2 provides that any tolls may be either for the whole or for any particular portion of the route of the licencee. It gives the minister a tremendous power in the application of the act, does it not?

Mr. HOWE: This does not give the minister any power; it gives power to the board. This is exactly the same as section 323 of the Railway Act. I think the section is all right; it is simply a recast of a clause in the Railway Act.

Section agreed to.

On section 17—Licencee to file tariff with board.

Mr. HOWE: This part of the act consists of relevant extracts from the Railway Act, I think in every case.

Mr. STEWART: This section does not in any way change the existing section?

Mr. HOWE: No. We wanted to make this act complete in itself, and we took out the relevant sections of the Railway Act and quoted them exactly.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—If licencee a corporation.

Mr. STEWART: What is the effect of the change there?

Mr. HOWE: A good many corporations appoint the rate-making authority by resolution rather than by by-law, and we simply added the word "resolution."

Mr. STEWART: I notice that the words "in respect of the transport of goods or passengers" have been deleted. Is it necessary to have those words out?

Mr. HOWE: That is covered by the definitions, and in committee it was felt that it was unnecessary to have those words in this section.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—Tolls to be as specified in tariff.

Mr. STEWART: Does the part of the act concerning agreed charges apply to this?

Mr. HOWE: The agreed charges section is separate from this, though both are parts of the same act.

Mr. STEWART: Does it apply here?

Mr. HOWE: No, I think this applies only to the ordinary tariffs of the board. There are three tariffs in addition to the agreed charges; the standard tariff, the special tariff, and the special competitive tariff. I think this chapter applies particularly to those. The agreed charge is a written contract between two parties, and the provisions concerning the agreed charges are dealt with in the next part of the bill.

Mr. STEWART: On its face it just looked as though compelling them to adhere to the tariff would be in conflict with the right to make an agreed charge.

Mr. HOWE: The apparent conflict is taken care of in the section dealing with agreed charges.

Mr. STEWART: Notwithstanding anything anywhere.

Section agreed to.

Sections 20 to 23 inclusive agreed to.

On section 24, subsection 1—Equal application of tolls.

Mr. STEWART: Does this section appear in the same form in the existing Railway Act?

Mr. HOWE: It is found in the exact language in subsection 1 of section 314 of the Railway Act.

Subsection agreed to.

Subsection 2 agreed to.

On subsection 3—No discrimination between localities.

Mr. REID: Does that mean there will be no discrimination with respect to prices between different localities, provided the mileage is the same?

Mr. HOWE: It means that taking everything into account there will be no discrimination in favour of one locality and against another.

Mr. STEWART: It is not as good as it looks.

Subsection agreed to.

Section agreed to.

Sections 25 to 27 inclusive agreed to.

[Mr. Howe.]

On section 28—Onus on licencee re discrimination.

Mr. STEWART: I assume these clauses are identical with those already in the Railway Act.

Mr. HOWE: They are all exactly the same. Every clause here is in the Railway Act.

Mr. STEWART: It would have been helpful if that had been stated on the opposite page.

Mr. HOWE: I made the explanation a few moments ago.

Section agreed to.

Sections 29 to 34 inclusive agreed to.

On section 35—Agreed charges; charges by agreement between parties.

Mr. STIRLING: When the bill first appeared I believe there was a considerable volume of opposition to agreed charges. I am not in a position to gauge the extent of the objections which reached the minister, nor have I had the opportunity of following in detail the proceedings before the committee. Would the minister give a short statement with regard to the principle of agreed charges, and deal particularly with what seemed to be an indication that people who disagreed with the agreed charges were of the opinion that the charges would be secret and that information as to details of arrangements would not be available.

Mr. HOWE: The principle of agreed charges is that the railways shall have the power, under conditions including wide publicity, to make a contract with a shipper to carry all or part of his goods at a special rate to be agreed upon. The conditions are these. If the railway and the shipper reach an agreement, such agreement is submitted for approval to the board of transport commissioners. That body in turn under the provisions of the bill must publish in the Canada Gazette a synopsis of the proposed agreement and give it as wide publicity as they would give the setting of a new rate. In other words they notify every important trade body and all important associations of shippers, boards of trade, chambers of commerce and municipalities affected by the charge. They give to the agreement what they have found by experience to be the widest possible publicity. Thirty days later a hearing is held at which any shipper or body of shippers or carrier under the act may appear before the board and make objection to the agreement, urging that it may be discriminatory in some way or would unduly injure the business of some shipper or carrier. When the agreement is made it must be made immediately available to any firm operating under substantially similar conditions. That is, if another firm is willing to agree to substantially the same provisions as to all or part of its freight, it is entitled to the same agreement. There is a provision that the rate shall be the same for one as for more than one carload. Other provisions, which will appear as we study the bill, stipulate that these agreements shall not be used to favour the large shipper as against the small shipper. The provisions are somewhat narrower than those of the British bill because rates must be quoted in cents per pound. The British bill permits a somewhat wider latitude in the making of agreed rates. In some cases the rate is a percentage of the gross value of shipments, but in this part the rate is restricted to a rate in cents per pound. A provision is also included that the agreed charges made by one railway are open to the other railways.

Mr. STIRLING: Is that obligatory?

Mr. HOWE: One railway cannot make an agreed charge to exclude the other. I think these are the main features.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister referred to publicity in connection with the proposed agreement. Then a hearing is held thirty days later. What publicity is given to the accomplished fact?

Mr. HOWE: Subsection 10 reads:

All agreed charges shall, when approved, be published in the manner provided by section three hundred and thirty-one of the Railway Act.

Mr. STIRLING: Is that in the Canada Gazette?

Mr. HOWE: Section 331 reads:

When any such special freight tariff reduces any toll previously authorized to be charged under this act, the company shall file such tariff with the board at least three days before its effective date, and shall, for three days previous to the date on which such tariff is intended to take effect, deposit and keep on file in a convenient place, open for the inspection of the public during office hours, a copy of such tariff, at every station or office of the company where freight is received, or to which freight is to be carried thereunder, and also post up in a prominent place, at each such office or station, a notice in large type directing public attention to the place in such office or station where such tariff is so kept on file: Provided that the board may by regulation or otherwise determine and prescribe any other or additional method of publication of such tariff during the period aforesaid.

Mr. STIRLING: After the hearing I assume that the board would give a decision, whether or not it acquiesced in the proposed schedule of rates. After that, I take it that that schedule would be published at the stations by the direction of the board?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. STIRLING: Every one interested would have the opportunity of ascertaining those agreed charges?

Mr. HOWE: Quite.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the minister anticipate any difficulty through interested parties on the Pacific coast having to come to Ottawa to make representations before the board, or is it expected that such parties will be represented by agents?

Mr. HOWE: The chairman and officers of the board explained the procedure to the committee. All that is required to start an investigation is a postcard addressed to the board. No one appears before the board in about eighty per cent of the cases. The majority of cases are started simply by a written statement. I believe the members of the board convinced the committee that there would be no difficulty in this connection.

Mr. BARBER: One point which came up in the committee was that those engaged in highway transport would not be able to appear before the board, because they do not come under this bill.

Mr. HOWE: That is correct. Those engaged in highway transport have all the privileges granted to shippers under this legislation, with the additional privilege that their rates receive no publicity whatever. They are allowed to and they do make contracts every day with the greatest secrecy. As the regulated transportation companies have no right to interfere in the agreements made by the highway transport companies, it was felt that the highway transport companies should not be allowed to interfere with the regulated companies in the making of rates.

Mr. BARBER: It was made quite clear that highway transport, particularly in Ontario, was being organized at the present time and that they intended to issue a tariff in the near future, if they have not done so already. That tariff would apply throughout the country. I believe it appeared to a number of the members of the committee that it was unfair that the highway transport people should not have the opportunity of appearing before this board of transport. Evidence before the committee, with the exception of that of the railways and one steamship company, was generally opposed to part V of the bill. The feeling was that it was unjust and discriminatory to a certain extent.

Mr. HOWE: The opposition came principally from those who are not subject to the provisions of this bill. The main opposition came from the motor transport and the bulk water carrier interests. These interests are left free to act in any way they like, and my personal opinion is that it is rather impudent that they, having the freedom of action they have, should insist upon taking a part in the regulation of the regulated carriers.

Mr. BARBER: I understand a number of the smaller shipping companies on the great lakes objected to this part.

Mr. HOWE: Only the bulk carriers.

Mr. MacNICOL: Did not the Canadian Manufacturers' Association object?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, they filed an objection.

Mr. NEILL: The minister seems quite clear in his mind that this legislation will work out reasonably and without undue delay. However, the procedure seems to be somewhat lengthy. The bill has been before a committee upon which was represented all the parties and we can only hope that it will work out as the minister suggests it will. There is one phase of this bill which I have not yet heard explained. Sometimes an argument can be made to better advantage when a concrete case is given rather than by theorizing. I should like to outline a situation that exists on the coast. There is competition, rather onesided I should think, between the shipping and rail companies in connection with the shipment of lumber from British Columbia. It is apparent that this competition must be very onesided, because it is much cheaper to ship lumber by water through the Panama canal than by rail. It has been suggested that the shipments by water are comparatively trivial, but I do not think that is the fact. A service of one and a half, so to speak, or two boats a month is maintained. The company do not necessarily own all these boats, but they charter the necessary boats to maintain their schedule. They have captured trade for our lumber people in British Columbia which would be utterly lost if they had to depend on the railways. Here is the picture that is presented, and if the minister can satisfy the people for whom I am speaking I shall be very glad. The railway board has authority to make cut-throat rates over a given period, and evidently that is the intention. Well, they make those cut-throat rates, and after they have been in force for six months or a year the shipping companies will be driven out of business, not being able to meet those rates. The net result will be that the lumber shipper in British Columbia, when the boat companies have been put out of business, will have no recourse except to use the railways, and it will be impossible to use the railways because of the necessarily high rates. We have a substantial market on the Atlantic coast, both in Canada and in the United States, which we may be in danger of losing under this legislation, and it will not benefit the railways either because once they have driven the shipping companies out of business and then have raised their own rates again, our lumber people will not be able to use the railways, and in that way we will be deprived of a very useful market, although perhaps not a very big one. If the minister will explain how that danger is to be obviated I shall be very much interested in his explanation.

Mr. COCHRANE: How much lumber does British Columbia ship by rail?

Mr. NEILL: Perhaps not very much unless they ship it to the prairies, which it is impossible to reach by boat. They cannot ship by rail to the east because of the high rates, and that is the danger I am pointing out.

Mr. COCHRANE: Where are your markets for shipments by rail?

Mr. NEILL: The only rail market available to us now is the prairies. The danger is that the railways will take this eastern business away from the shipping people by means of cut-throat rates, and then having put the shipping companies out of business, they will raise railway rates again and we will lose our Atlantic seaboard market which we have in Canada and the United States.

Mr. COCHRANE: By water?

Mr. NEILL: Yes, by water, and we want to maintain that market by water. We do not want water competition put out of business by a temporary cut-throat rate from the railways.

Mr. COCHRANE: British Columbia products are practically all shipped by water.

Mr. HOWARD: Not entirely.

Mr. NEILL: Not entirely.

Mr. COCHRANE: British Columbia lumber is shipped to St. John by water. I know something about it. How much lumber do you sell in the maritimes that is shipped by rail?

Mr. NEILL: I should not imagine we should ship any by rail to Saint John and we never will either. But if the railway companies are allowed by cut-throat rates to put water competition out of business, we shall be out not only rail traffic but the boat traffic which we now have and do not want to lose.

Mr. HOWE: I have had some experience in buying British Columbia lumber for use at eastern points, and the position is this, that if the lumber is needed for quick delivery it is forwarded by rail; if the buyer can wait two or three months for delivery, it is shipped by boat. There is a considerable difference in the rates, but I think at least fifty per cent of the lumber that goes into construction work in the east is shipped by rail. It is a matter of urgency. Ordinarily timber for heavy construction is cut to dimensions and forwarded for a certain work. I know in my own experience that in two cases out of three at least, we do not want to wait for delivery and so have shipments forwarded by rail—timber sheet piling, for instance. The rail rate is substantially higher, unquestionably, than shipment by vessel through the Panama canal.

But the position, Mr. Chairman, is this, that no one can be forced to make an agreed charge. An agreed charge is a voluntary affair, and if it is made it will be made because it is advantageous to the shipper as well as to the carrier. The lumber trade of British Columbia is very highly organized, particularly as to marketing, and I cannot believe that the lumber trade of British Columbia would make an agreed charge that would have the effect my hon. friend suggests. They would look far enough ahead to see that that might happen, and would get along without the agreed charge. However, I do not think the agreed charge is intended to operate in connection with a large commodity like lumber. I do not think any carrier would try to get all the lumber business of British Columbia by an agreed charge. I doubt if that is a case in point, and so far as the agreed charge is concerned I believe the effect on the lumber industry of British Columbia will be nil.

Mr. HOWDEN: I was a member of the committee which considered the bill, and if I know anything about the bill at all it gives control to the board of transport commissioners. There is also a clause in the bill which definitely provides that railway companies in making agreed charges shall have due regard to the actual cost of moving freight. If the bill means anything, it will be the function of the board of transport commissioners to see that the railways do not make agreements at rates that will be less than the actual cost of handling freight, and if the terms of the bill are carried out in that respect there is no chance in the world of the railways very seriously undercutting the boat companies.

Mr. GREEN: Our worry is that the shipping line or lines between British Columbia and eastern Canada will be put out of business. The great danger, as I see it, is that agreed charges may be made in the east on goods shipped from the east to British Columbia, making it temporarily cheaper to ship by rail than by water through the Panama canal, with the result that the shipping line would be put out of business. I believe that at present we bring quite a lot of merchandise to British Columbia from eastern Canada by water cheaper than it can be brought in by rail, and the fact that there is that water competition has kept down railway rates on other goods that are not brought in by the ships at all. It is to preserve that situation that we are so anxious. Can the minister give us any assurance that agreed charges cannot be used to wipe out the business which at the present time is being carried by ship from eastern Canada through the Panama canal to the Pacific coast?

Mr. VIEN: Does my hon. friend refer to liners or tramps? Tramps will always be available.

Mr. GREEN: There are no tramps. We have one line at the present time running a regular service from Montreal to the Pacific coast and back.

Mr. VIEN: Which is it?

Mr. GREEN: I forget the name, but their office is in Montreal, and they have materially helped in keeping down freight rates on commodities going from eastern Canada not only to the Pacific coast, but from there into Alberta.

Mr. VIEN: My hon. friend's remarks would apply only to liners, because, except under abnormal conditions, there will always be a plentiful supply of tramps.

Mr. GREEN: There are no passenger liners between Vancouver and the east. There are freight liners.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): This is a freight line with definite sailings.

Mr. VIEN: Yes, that is what I was referring to—freight liners as distinguished from tramps.

Mr. REID: I do not think the last speaker was correct when he said there will be plenty of tramp steamers available. My impression is that the tramp steamer will have to go to the board of transport for a licence and will have to show that that service is required; and my fear is that they will not be able to procure a licence, and it will mean that the steamship line now in operation between Montreal and Vancouver will be the only one granted a licence. Any shipper wanting to ship by tramp steamer will have to advise that line to go to the board of transport commissioners for a licence and must prove that there is not adequate transportation service either present or future.

Regarding the remarks of the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Howden) I shall be delighted if the board of transport commissioners can find out exactly the cost of hauling freight. It is something I have been trying to get for a long time. I can tell him that the chief counsel of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company stated on oath that there is no one in the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National or on this continent or any other who can tell exactly what it costs to haul goods by rail. How they will be able to compare the cost of hauling by rail with that of carriage by ships and by air I cannot understand.

Mr. COCHRANE: I feel that I can speak on this subject because I was born and brought up in the shipping business. I have brought many cargoes of Douglas fir from British Columbia and I can tell hon. members that Douglas fir is being shipped from Vancouver to Saint John to-day by water at $7 per thousand feet. The railways have no chance to compete with that; they cannot meet that price. It is all a matter of competition. How much lumber is shipped to eastern Canada from British Columbia by railway? I have seen cargo after cargo of Douglas fir from British Columbia at $7 per thousand delivered in Saint John, by way of steamers carrying 5,000,000 superficial feet.

Mr. REID: That is not what we are afraid of. Our fear is that there will be a wall placed around us so that no steamship companies can get in. That freight of which my friend speaks is business which would not be obtained by merchants in British Columbia but for the fact that the steamships are carrying it, because the railroad rate is roughly $27 per thousand feet. He is correct in saying that the railways will never be able to compete with the steamship lines, but tramp steamers and other steamers operating via the Panama canal are able at times to carry that business partly because they have freight for United States Atlantic seaboard cities as well as Canadian cities. Having a full cargo made up in that way enables them to carry the business, but they will not be able to do so in the future if they are prevented from obtaining licences.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): It is well to bear in mind that the carrying of lumber from British Columbia to the Atlantic is only one side of the question; the other is the obtaining of return cargoes. A freight line must be sure it is going to get a return cargo. When this service was first established between Vancouver and the Atlantic ports the draft of the vessels, and the width likewise, was governed by the depth of the Lachine canal. I do not know what governs now, but four years ago that was very definite—the draft had to be not over seventeen feet, I think.

Mr. HOWE: Fourteen feet.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Yes, I was not sure. They carry back from lake ports furniture, canned goods and similar freight. So both sides of the question have to be considered.

Mr. HOWE: Once again I may say that the railways are in no different position from the boat lines. Any agreed charges the railways can make the boat lines can make. I cannot believe that one will seriously affect the other. Neither can afford to cut rates to an unprofitable level. I look for no wild rate cutting. In England this practice has developed slowly, it is now in I think, its fourth year. In the first year there were about thirty-three agreed charges made, and now I believe there are about two thousand outstanding. Careful investigation there shows that the carriers believe it has been helpful and the shippers believe it is helpful. Here I believe the history will be much the same; the agreed charges will be entered upon very cautiously and develop slowly, there will be no great rush to make agreed charges. I think there will be only a few at the start. But I can see no serious damage to any part of the shipping industry or to the carrying industry arising from agreed charges, considering all the safeguards thrown about the making of them in this bill.

Mr. GREEN: Can the minister assure us it is not the intention to give the railways power to put this shipping line out of business by means of agreed charges?

Mr. HOWE: Yes, there are special provisions made against that sort of thing; there is a special section which deals with that. It cannot be used to put a competitor out of business.

Mr. GREEN: It is not the intention that the railways shall have these agreed charges to use as a club over the shipping lines?

Mr. HOWE: The shipping lines have the agreed charges just as have the railways. The only thing is that up to now the railways have been told to stand on a certain level, while all other carriers—motor trucks, ships—can go as much under that level as they like. The difference is that now the railways will not have to stand on that level.

Mr. GREEN: But the shipping is regulated also.

Mr. HOWE: The shipping can make agreed charges also.

Mr. NEILL: The minister says people are not likely to cut prices below normal. But that is a common everyday thing. I will not advertise the firm by giving the name, but a firm came into a town with which I am familiar, went to the established dealer in their line, and said: We will give you so much for your business. The men demurred as to the amount. Well, he was told, we will come in and establish a branch and will put you out of business. It may cost us $2,000 or $10,000, but we will do it, because that is our established policy when we make up our minds to take possession of a certain town with our line; we do it regardless of the cost, and we do it with a certain amount of warning to other people not to be caught in the same way. The minister says that the lumber people in British Columbia who are well organized will not be so ill-advised as to patronize railway cut rates to the extent of putting the boat line out of business. That is probably true because they are closely knit and well organized. But as the hon. members for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor) and Vancouver South (Mr. Green) have said, that line of boats cannot exist without return cargoes, and the return cargo consists of manufactured or package goods from the east.

Mr. HOWE: Anything they can get.

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: In other words they pick over all the high grade freight from eastern Canada to get one boat load every six weeks.

Mr. NEILL: The eastern manufacturer does not know about this theory of the boat being put out of business, and would be quite indifferent to it anyway. The average person buys in the cheapest market, and if he is confronted with a lower rate on the railway he will take the lower one. He is not going to listen to this yarn, as he will call it, that if you do not deal with us we will be put out of business. The result will be the imminent danger of that happening of which I spoke at first, that, perhaps deliberately, the price will be cut in order to put the boat out of business and then the higher railway rates will be restored. If it were only a question of people paying the higher rates, that would not matter so much perhaps from the point of view of the British Columbia producer, but it would mean to him that he would lose his market, because his market for a certain class of lumber in the Atlantic coast cities of the Unted States and Canada is dependent on his being able to ship by water at a low rate. The cargo is made up of goods partly in the United States and partly in Canada—partly one thing and partly another. It has not been satisfactorily explained to me, although I quite agree with the general principles of the bill and have supported the minister. I do see that danger, however, and the only hope that can be entertained is that it will not be effective in that regard, that is to say, that there will not be agreed charges on lumber. That is what the section is for, to allow a thing of that kind, and not to see that the board will prevent the railways from quoting a low price. But I see no provision that would prevent them from doing that; and as the hon. member for New Westminster has pointed out, what the exact cost of a certain freight is the railway companies themselves cannot say.

Mr. HOWE: As regards putting the boat line out of business or preventing freight from going west, this boat line goes all the way from the maritimes up the St. Lawrence and the great lakes as far as Hamilton and it takes whatever goods are offered at the most profitable freight that can be got. Unless all business in Canada were covered by agreed charges, how would it be possible to stop that boat from getting a return cargo, considering all the commodities that move from one coast to the other, without time being a great factor?

Mr. NEILL: The answer is that the elimination of the lumber traffic from British Columbia might make such a difference that they could not afford to operate profitably.

Mr. HOWE: But surely the lumber traffic of British Columbia would be the one business that agreed charges could never touch. In the first place it is too voluminous a traffic to trifle with; in other words, if any carrier made an agreed charge to handle all the lumber traffic at an unprofitable rate, or a rate that would take business away from the ships, that carrier would be bankrupt within twelve months.

Mr. BARBER: A representative of the Canadian industrial traffic league appeared before the committee and made clear the reasons for objections to the regulations of the intercoastal water movement between Canadian Atlantic and Canadian Pacific ports. The reasons given were as follows:

1. This service is different from other water services in that it is in direct competition with world-wide all water services, some of which are unregulated, and the Canadian intercoastal service would, therefore, be placed at a very great disadvantage if regulation of rate matters is insisted upon.

2. This intercoastal service is designed to transport goods between Atlantic and Pacific ports to enable shippers to lay their merchandise down in competition with these world-wide water services.

3. This world-wide competition means the movement of goods from the highly industrialized countries of Europe, the United Kingdom and the United States, whether produced at low wage rates due to low living costs or by means of mass production. It thus affords the keenest competition and this intercoastal service is designed to meet this situation due to its lower operating costs.

4. This competition being very keen, decision has very often to be made and contracts entered into at one or two hours' notice, and cannot wait for the involved procedure necessary and required if the intercoastal rate matters are to be regulated. It, therefore, requires the most simple procedure within which it may operate and enable it to obtain the benefits of its inherent advantages.

Those reasons applying to that service are clear and require very serious consideration on the part of the board.

Mr. HOWE: I might point out that my hon. friend is now discussing a part of the bill which was passed last Friday.

Mr. BARBER: This is in regard to rates; it covers agreed rates.

Mr. HOWE: Those extracts relate to part II rather than part V.

Mr. STEWART: Assuming that the agreed charge is filed and approved by the board and then it is desired by the organization that has entered into the agreement to have the charge increased; what is to be done?

Mr. HOWE: I do not quite get the question—increase what?

Mr. STEWART: The charge. Suppose one carrier comes in and files an agreed charge—

Mr. HOWE: An agreed charge is a contract.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. STEWART: —and comes back in six months with a request to have that charge increased?

Mr. HOWE: An agreed charge is a contract between the carrier and the shipper for a certain definite period and at certain definite rates, and it is binding, like any other contract in law.

Mr. STEWART: It is only a contract.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: It is binding for the term of the contract and the board has no authority to terminate it or grant relief from it.

Mr. HOWE: It can be reviewed after one year on the application of either party.

Mr. STEWART: If the contract is for five years, do I understand the minister to say that one of the parties may appear before the board and say, "Notwithstanding that we have a contract for five years we want it reviewed, we want a revision of it. It is true that we have not agreed upon any alteration in these charges, but we want you to review it."

Mr. HOWE: I would refer the hon. member to subsection 9 of section 35, page 13:

Where the board has approved an agreed charge without restriction of time:

(a) any shipper who considers that his business has been unjustly discriminated against as a result of the making of the agreed charge,

(b) any representative body of shippers, and

(c) any carrier,

may, at any time after the expiration of one year from the date of the approval, apply to the board for the withdrawal of its approval of the agreed charge, and, upon any such application, the board may withdraw, or refuse to withdraw, its approval, or may continue its approval subject to such modifications being made in the charge as it thinks proper and as the carrier and the shipper to whose goods the charge is applicable are prepared to agree to:

I think that gives any party, even the party to the contract, the privilege of appearing before the board after one year to have the charge re-examined.

Mr. STEWART: That is a case where there is a charge agreed upon without limit as to the time for its operation. They just say, "We have agreed upon such a charge", and that is good for the year; and after the year it can be varied.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: That is the effect of it.

Mr. HOWE: If two parties make a contract for a definite period no one can interfere with it, but it is always open to an outside party to object to the agreed charge on the ground that it discriminates against his own business.

Mr. STEWART: I was a member of the committee that considered this bill and unfortunately, owing to the meeting of two or three other committees at the same time, I was unable to attend its sittings regularly. I do know, however, that there was a good deal of opposition to this part of the bill, and I am going to suggest to the minister that, as the leader of the opposition desires to make some observations upon it, he allow this part to stand, or at least some section of it, in order that an opportunity may be presented of discussing the matter from the standpoint of the objections that have been raised. I am not in a position to enter into that discussion to-day. As regards the part dealing with harbour tolls, there are one or two members who have some objections to raise, but they are not here to-day. Possibly the minister would make as much progress if he would allow these parts to stand and take them up again.

Mr. HOWE: I should like to pass as many clauses as possible to-day in order to get the bill over to the other chamber; at least we have been requested to get it over there as soon as possible, in order that that chamber may have the necessary time to examine it. I think the leader of the opposition knew that this bill was coming up to-day and made no objection to its being considered. Would it satisfy my hon. friend if we left one subsection open?

Mr. STEWART: As long as it is left open with that understanding. I am not sure that there will be any amendments suggested, and I have no objection to passing upon these sections, with such suggestions as we may wish to make, leaving one section open upon which a general discussion of this part may take place. That would be quite satisfactory. I should think the first subsection would be the one to leave open, because that launches the whole proposition.

Mr. HOWE: Then I would ask that subsection 1 of section 35 be allowed to stand.

Subsection stands.

Subsections 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 35, subsection 4—Board approval of agreed charge.

Mr. STEWART: I notice that this is retroactive in its operation; it says:

—from which it shall be deemed to have become operative, shall be such date, not being earlier than the date on which application for approval was lodged, as may be fixed by the board.

Is the effect of that to make the rate retroactive to the date of the application, though it may not be approved until some considerable time later?

Mr. HOWE: It appears to give the board power to make the charge retroactive, though I cannot understand the purpose of it. I am told that this is taken from the English act, but I do not think there is any particular purpose in it. That is undoubtedly what the wording says.

Mr. STIRLING: Is this the subsection under which the approval of the board is established as necessary? I see it says:

The board may approve an agreed charge either for such period as it thinks fit or without restriction of time—

Mr. HOWE: That is only as to time. The following subsections cover the method of dealing with the application. Perhaps this subsection might be allowed to stand until I can examine the retroactive feature of it, which I think might be taken out. Frankly I had not noticed it.

Subsection stands.

Subsection 5, paragraphs (a) and (b), agreed to.

On section 35, subsection 5, paragraph (c):

Mr. NEILL: Is there any definition of a carrier?

Mr. HOWE: Yes; it is found in the definition section:

(d) "carrier" means any person engaged in the transport of goods or passengers for hire or reward to whom this act applies, and shall include any company which is subject to the Railway Act.

Mr. NEILL: Would that cover truck companies?

Mr. HOWE: No, a truck company is not a carrier under this act.

Subsections 6, 7 and 8 agreed to.

On section 35, subsection 9—Application for withdrawal of agreed charge—approval after one year.

Paragraphs (a) and (b) agreed to.

On section 35, subsection 9, paragraph (c):

Mr. NEILL: What about a case where the board has approved an agreed charge with a time restriction? Is there any procedure for reviewing the decision of the board?

Mr. HOWE: I think not. I think a contract made for a fixed time must stand during that fixed time. But I take it that after one year the board will consider a protest from a third party as to the injurious effect of that agreed charge on the business of that third party, and if a third party is injuriously affected that agreed charge may be modified. But I think undoubtedly as between the two parties to the agreement, an agreed charge for a fixed period of time must stand.

Mr. NEILL: Is there provision in the bill for a third party to come in after the expiration of a year, where the approval of the agreed charge is restricted as to time? It appears to be only where it is without a time restriction. Is there provision somewhere for a case in which there is a restriction of time, for a third party to come in? I cannot find it.

Mr. HOWE: I think it may be found in subsection 6. My officers advise me that if an agreed charge is made for a fixed time, no one can interfere with it; of course anyone can get the same agreement, but it cannot be interfered with. It is a definite contract between a carrier and shipper for a fixed time.

Mr. STEWART: And third parties cannot interfere with it in that regard; they can be heard only in the beginning, and then during the lifetime of the contract third parties are bound by it in the same measure that the parties who contract for an agreed charge are bound.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: But publicity was given to it at the time, and those interested had an opportunity to appear?

Mr. HOWE: Quite.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 35, subsection 10—Publication.

Mr. STEWART: What are the provisions for publication?

Mr. HOWE: I read them a short time ago. I can read them again if it is desired.

Mr. STEWART: Not if they have been read already.

Mr. HOWE: They will appear in Hansard.

Subsections 11, 12 and 13 agreed to.

Section 35, stands.

[Mr. Neill.]

On section 36—If agreed charge causes an unfair advantage.

Mr. HOWE: This is a general provision put in as a protection. It includes agreed charges for a definite period, and everything else. The section gives the minister power to act if he receives a serious complaint to the effect that an agreed charge is working unfairly either by way of putting a competing carrier out of business or by bringing about serious discrimination. The minister may send the case to the board for trial, and if it sees fit the board may in such case vary or terminate an agreed charge, even though it is for a definite period. There is a similar section in the British act, and it was included in our bill as a general safeguard to take care of unusual situations.

Mr. NEILL: The idea is an excellent one, but should we not include the phrase, "notwithstanding anything else contained in this act"? I believe otherwise it will be contradictory to section 9.

Mr. HOWE: No; I think if the hon. member will read the section carefully he will find it has other provisions. Where for some reason of national importance a minister may refer an agreed charge to the board, the board may vary the terms or terminate the charge.

Mr. STEWART: It would be upon complaint of a representative body of carriers?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: Not by an individual, a company or an organization?

Mr. HOWE: That is proper, in that there must be a complaint serious enough to have the support of a representative body of carriers.

Mr. STIRLING: It can come from only one side of the contract?

Mr. HOWE: That is correct. The carrier is bound by the charge. It must be something that has some effect upon the public.

Section agreed to.

On section 37—Rights preserved.

Mr. REID: I wonder if this section is properly worded, because chapter 5 of the statutes of 1897 contains the whole of the old Crowsnest pass agreement, which provides special rates, and subsidies for lines. Then we come to the Revised Statutes of 1927, and we find by subsection 5 of section 325 of chapter 170 a definite clause relating to the Crowsnest pass rates, a clause which is entirely different from chapter 5 of the statutes of 1897.

I am suggesting there is something wrong, and if it is the intention under the bill to insert the provisions of the Crowsnest pass rates I suggest that subsection 5 of section 325 of chapter 170 should be inserted. The sections are entirely different; I would draw attention particularly to that portion of section 325 which states:

Provided that, notwithstanding anything in this subsection contained, rates on grain and flour shall on and from the 27th day of June, 1925, be governed by the provisions of the agreement made pursuant to chapter 5 of the statutes of Canada 1897.

And here is the addition:

But such rates shall apply to all such traffic moving from all points on all lines of railway west of Fort William to Fort William or Port Arthur over all lines now or hereafter constructed by any company subject to the jurisdiction of parliament.

I am of the opinion that that is the section which should be inserted, rather than the one now indicated in the bill.

Mr. HOWE: I would suggest that the section stand, so that I might call the matter to the attention of the law officers of the crown.

Section stands.

Section 38 agreed to.

On section 39, subsection 1—Harbour tolls.

Mr. REID: Has the minister given careful consideration to the subject of harbour tolls? In connection with the shipment of goods from the Pacific to the Atlantic, has he given consideration in this part of the bill to the Panama canal tolls?

Mr. HOWE: I am afraid they are outside our jurisdiction.

Mr. REID: I suggest the section could say, "harbour or any other tolls," and be much clearer.

Mr. HOWE: Probably I should make a statement with respect to harbour tolls. I know that some will say that they should be automatic. We have provided, however, that there shall be a court to assist the minister. To-day the minister is responsible for harbour tolls in all public harbours. He deals with some himself and in other cases he makes recommendations to the governor in council. It is not proposed to transfer the minister's responsibility to a board. In other words, we are not setting up a board to fix harbour tolls, nor do we propose to do so. If any one wishes to go farther than is contemplated in this section, we would have no alternative but to withdraw it. We are not proposing to turn over to the board the fixing of harbour tolls, but it is desired to give the minister authority to refer a dispute to the board of transport commissioners for purposes of investigation.

We would like to have a board to consider all the facts and to make a report to the minister, for action by him. If there is any suggestion that we should go farther, then I must repeat that the only alternative is to withdraw this part of the bill. This is as far as we can go.

Mr. REID: It was that I had in mind, and I can visualize such matters coming before the new board of transport, and the argument being advanced by shippers that there are tolls on goods going through the Panama canal. The board of transport commissioners might say that there is nothing in any act about tolls on the Panama canal, but that they are simply general tolls, and that the board could not give consideration to such a matter. Personally I think we should go farther.

Mr. HOWE: I think the hon. member has intermingled two suggestions. He means that when we are considering passage through the Panama canal, the Panama canal tolls should be considered.

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: That would undoubtedly be the case, because in considering a rate any charges affecting the voyage would be material. The part of the bill on harbour tolls has to do with tolls in public harbours, and provides for a court of review to which the minister may submit disputes.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not wish to delay passage of the bill, but I believe I should point out that possibly there is no part of the dominion which would be more affected by the bill than that from which I come. Most of the people in my constituency are seafaring people who are familiar with the subject matter of the bill. I intend to support it, although possibly last year the minister may have felt I was not giving all the support I could have given. I must make it clear, however, that I am supporting the bill in its present form. After all, in my view the responsibility in this matter must fall on the government. Let us try out this measure, and if it does not prove satisfactory we may discuss it further at a later date. Certainly, in my opinion it is a move in the right direction.

SUPPLY

UNEMPLOYMENT—CONCENTRATION OF SINGLE UNEMPLOYED MEN IN VANCOUVER—STATEMENT OF MR. MACINNIS

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, before you leave the chair, I should like to say a few words in reference to a matter which has been drawn to the attention of this house on a number of occasions during the past few weeks. I refer to a situation which has existed in Vancouver since the end of April and which became acute during the latter part of May. A number of single unemployed men took possession of certain buildings in that city, including the post office and the art gallery, and after eighteen days these men are still in possession of those buildings. I have tried, along with other hon. members, to impress upon the government the fact that if this situation is not remedied serious trouble will result. We believe that something could have been done to prevent this situation from arising, and we believe that something should be done immediately to try to arrive at a settlement of the problem before trouble occurs. These men are being provided with food which indicates to me that in a large measure they have the sympathy of the people of Vancouver. Being confined in such cramped quarters, these men undoubtedly will become irritable and trouble is likely to be the result. Conditions in British Columbia and Vancouver are not as good to-day as they were even a year ago. I have before me a letter from the mayor of Vancouver under date of May 31, from which I should like to read briefly in order to show just what is the unemployment situation in that city. He said.

The employment situation in the city of Vancouver is not quite as good as it was last year at this time. We have not had the usual spring pick-up of work. The logging camps are not working at the same capacity they were last year and the pulp and paper mills have curtailed their output very materially causing reduction in their working time, in some instances close to half time.

As you are aware we had the usual drift to the coast last fall of quite a group of men from other parts of Canada who were taken care of by the provincial and dominion governments through the forestry camps and following their usual custom they have closed them for the summer. Usually a great many of those in the camps left the province to return to the northwest for spring work while the remainder generally succeeded in getting something to do in the province on the road work which the provincial government generally inaugurated.

Unfortunately nothing has been done along that line this year as the premier seems to have been unable to make any arrangements for a loan from the dominion as in former years.

And further:

The unfortunate part to those purely British Columbia men is, pending cleaning up of the situation with the men on the sit-down strike, nothing can be done for the former which makes the situation here still more difficult for the municipal authorities. I cannot see for the life of me why the dominion government, realizing that this situation develops every spring, does not tackle it in an independent manner and establish a program of public works to take up the slack which private enterprise and industry do not seem able to absorb. Surely by this time after all of the representations which have been made to them they should realize that this is more or less of a permanent problem and should be dealt with as such, in place of having this turmoil each spring and fall.

I think the mayor puts very clearly the reason why the men have at the present time the support of a great majority of the people of Vancouver. There is no opportunity of employment for these men. They are all employable unemployed under the age of fifty-five and are at the present time refused relief in that city.

I wish to say again, as I said a week ago, that if trouble develops in Vancouver the responsibility must be laid on the doorstep of this government. The circumstances are deplorable and are not at all in line with what was promised by this government in the compaign preceding the last general election. The present Prime Minister, speaking in Vancouver on July 31, 1935, promised:

Immediate abolition of the relief camps, and handling of the unemployment problem on a national basis, utilizing in adequately paid work of social value to the nation, those now unemployed.

These men now unemployed in Vancouver want that pledge of the Prime Minister carried out, and I feel satisfied that they would not be very insistent or particular as to the conditions under which they would work, but they do want some kind of employment that will give them a livelihood. At the present time they have not that employment, and there is no prospect of their getting it.

On the same date, and during the same speaking engagement, the present Prime Minister said:

> You have had one experience of being deceived by promises at a general election. Are you prepared to risk another? You have seen how long a period of time five years is—what opportunity it affords a ministry, if the ministry be so inclined, altogether to ignore, and even to defy, your clearly expressed will, and your most evident wishes.

I submit that the position of the present government in the situation in Vancouver is expressed very well in the words of the present Prime Minister when speaking in Vancouver on July 31, 1935. He continued:

> You have seen—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry I have to instruct the hon. member that it has been reported to me he is speaking on the same subject matter of a debate on a motion to go into supply when the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) raised this same question of the situation in Vancouver. Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, page 95, under standing order 41, citation 293, refers to certain prohibitions contained in standing order 41, and then goes on to say that a member, while speaking, must not refer to any debate of the same session. I think that at present the hon. member is referring to the subject matter of the debate which took place for over an hour last Tuesday.

Mr. MacINNIS: But the grievance, Mr. Speaker, still continues. It was discussed last Monday, if my memory serves me aright, and the leader of the opposition raised another phase of the same question on Wednesday, on going into supply. If the question could be raised on Wednesday after having been discussed on Monday, and on other occasions too, there is no reason I can see why it cannot be discussed now, and particularly when the grievance still continues. There are also new aspects to the case, and surely we are entitled when going into supply to bring our grievances to the attention of the government.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order I would point out that you did not read the whole sentence in citation 293. The prohibition is that a member must not:

> (a) refer to any debate of the same session on any question not then under discussion.

He must not, for instance, refer to a debate connected with tariffs while speaking now because that subject is not now under discussion, but apparently he is allowed to refer to any debate of the same session on the question now under discussion. I cannot think that the prohibition extends to the hon. member in debating a matter that has not been finally dealt with. There is a prohibition dealing with matters that have been dealt with already this session, but that means brought to a final conclusion, defeated or something of that kind. But the words on which Your Honour bases your position are that he must not:

> . . . refer to any debate of the same session on any question not then—

That is, not now.

> —under discussion.

I submit he is not doing that, and that therefore he is in order.

Mr. DUNNING: On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, if the interpretation now being placed upon the rule is correct, what it means is that on any occasion when the motion for supply is made on Monday, Tuesday, or, at this stage of the session, on Wednesday, it is perfectly competent for any hon. member to rise in his place in the house and repeat what he himself has or others have said with respect to any matter already brought up during the session. It seems to me that the main object of the rules, which is to expedite the business of the house, could be completely defeated if that were the interpretation of the rule. I have not any objection to listening to my hon. friend (Mr. MacInnis); but if this is to be a decision of importance on the rules, I think the far-reaching effect of it might well be taken into account by Your Honour.

Mr. HEAPS: Standing order 41, on which Your Honour's ruling is based, does not deal with the question of going into supply at all, and is not applicable to the remarks being made by the hon. member (Mr. MacInnis). I do not think he was intending to repeat what has been said on this question, but I believe rather he wished to make reference to certain grievances in the city of Vancouver which have arisen since the question was last raised in this house a few days ago. He would come under the clause dealing with grievances, and not under standing order 41.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to speak on the point of order?

Mr. MacINNIS: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I was quoting from anything that was said in this house in any previous debate. As a matter of fact, I did not quote anything that had taken place in a debate during this session, and I believe that is all that is referred to in the citation under standing order 41.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point is that the same subject matter shall not be debated twice in the same session. That, I think, is the principle involved. Otherwise we should be discussing questions over and over again. If my hon. friend has in mind simply referring to some new situation that has arisen, and wishes to obtain a statement from the minister upon it, which will help to improve the situation, I can see no objection to having the minister make the statement; but if his purpose is to provoke a discussion on a subject that has already been debated, then I think the rule which has been cited by His Honour the Speaker would apply, namely that a subject should not be debated twice in the same session.

Mr. NEILL: I would point out that the attitude and remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition were directed towards what he considered the duty of the government to empty the post office and the art gallery by force. That does not appear to be the intention or desire of the hon. member now speaking. He is speaking of a totally different point of view.

Mr. STEWART: On the occasion to which you have referred, Mr. Speaker, as I recall there was no amendment offered to the motion to go into supply. Therefore there was no specific subject which would otherwise appear by way of motion. I submit that this rule applies to a motion or subject which has been definitely made the subject of debate or resolution, and that the well-known and broad comprehensive rule as to the right of a member of this house on a motion to go into supply to discuss any grievance or condition which he thinks gives rise to a grievance still exists and is not impaired by the rule you have cited.

Mr. MacNEIL: I desire to point out that the information now reaching those interested in this matter presents an entirely new grievance for which we desire to seek redress. There is no intention to abuse the privilege of a member to state a grievance on the motion to go into supply; but there is an entirely new situation, or new elements within the situation presenting themselves, making an urgent situation and one which can properly be brought up at the present time. I would regret very much if the rules of the house are interpreted in such a way as to deny us privileges which have always been accorded in the past and which we have a right to expect under the rules.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

Mr. DUNNING: Without urging you, Mr. Speaker, one way or the other, I would call attention to citation 304 of Beauchesne, which, I take it, is a quotation from May:

> It is a wholesome restraint upon members to prevent them from reviving a debate already concluded; and it would be little use in preventing the same question from being offered twice in the same session if, without being offered, its merits might be discussed again and again.

Whether or not it is the same question, I am not sufficiently familiar with the debate that took place on a former occasion to say.

Mr. MacINNIS: "The question" refers to a motion, does it not?

Mr. STEWART: There was no motion. That is the difference.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is important to preserve as much latitude as possible in the discussion of grievances on going into supply. If what my hon. friend, who has just spoken, says is true, namely that he is not seeking to revive a question which was discussed the other day, but is taking up something entirely new, then I would say there is no reason why he should not proceed. But if, as I have said, he is seeking to debate over again a subject which has already been discussed, I think the rule cited by His Honour the Speaker would apply, and he should not seek to proceed in that way. Certainly the government have no desire to prevent the fullest discussion of a situation which to its members, as to all hon. members, is occasioning much concern. Any word that would help to improve the situation will certainly be welcome.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to assure the house that I have no desire to enter into a general debate, or try to get the house into an extended debate on this subject. If I could get one word of assurance from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) or some other member of the government that negotiations would be started to try to get a peaceful settlement of this matter, I would sit down now without saying another word. But I feel that if this situation is allowed to continue—and I think I appreciate the difficulties of the government in this matter—sooner or later we are going to have an ugly situation in Vancouver. How the government can get over the difficulty I do not know, but I am sure that if they were to put themselves in the position of these men they would realize that although their actions may not be considered right or according to the usual methods of dealing with grievances, it must be remembered that these men have been living under abnormal conditions, some of them for a number of years. And when people are living under abnormal circumstances their actions will of necessity be abnormal. I am sure the Prime Minister is anxious to deal with this question in a reasonable way, to avoid as much trouble as possible, because I believe that is his nature and temperament; and if he could give this matter the consideration which it deserves and begin some sort of negotiations which would lead to the men vacating the places they now hold, good service would be done for the city of Vancouver, the people of this dominion, and even the government itself. After all, the credit of the government will depend largely on how it deals with these day-to-day problems that arise.

It has been said that the men have been unwisely led. Suppose for the sake of argument we accept that; how are we going to get over the difficulty of that unwise leadership, unless we replace it by better leadership? The first thing necessary to get over that difficulty is to improve conditions, so that the men will feel that they have something to lose; then they will not follow unwise leadership. I think I know enough of men, and have been associated enough with men to know that when they have something to lose, when they see that certain action by them would be likely to make conditions worse for them, it is next to impossible to get them to embark upon such action. But these men, as I said, have been for a long time living in circumstances which could not be much worse than they are, therefore they feel they have nothing to lose. They feel that if they do not force the government to some action; their condition will be still worse. The result of the government's action is that these men are becoming disciplined and organized together so that it will take a great deal of training to get them to abandon the attitude they have adopted. I would suggest to the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour that they give this matter their most earnest consideration to see if something cannot be done to prevent such a situation developing as developed a few years ago in Regina and in other parts of this dominion.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): I do not intend to thresh over old straw; but in justice to the men concerned and the citizens of greater Vancouver I feel that certain facts should be stated, facts which were not disclosed in previous discussions in this house. It is not an easy matter to discuss, but it is much more unpleasant to anticipate reports of still more disagreeable occurrences in Vancouver. Some of us who have lived there have witnessed disturbances on previous occasions, and it is with dread that I pick up the morning newspapers now, lest I read the report of some serious trouble. The results of these disturbances were fully reported on former occasions. I have seen blood flow in the streets of Vancouver; I have seen people ridden down; I have seen men beaten up; I have seen inexcusable brutality exercised to deal with situations of this sort, and I would not be doing my duty did I not state in this house that which I have learned from reports reaching me daily now. A few days ago we did not have the information that we now have. One stubborn ugly fact stares us in the face, and cannot be disregarded. The men are without food and shelter. That was not disclosed before, because from the statement of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) we gathered that the deferred pay vouchers had been distributed in such a way that the men might carry on. On the minister's admission in the house the other day, however, the last distribution of pay vouchers took place on May 15, and I understand that no individual received more than $4 at that time.

These men are in a state of utter destitution; they are without food and shelter and without the means to move around and, as we say, "rustle" for work at any other point. You cannot expect men with empty bellies to face a situation of this kind in a calm and rational way. That must be understood. They feel desperate and they are likely to resort to desperate means to bring their predicament to the attention of the public. They are not, as has been implied, in a state of revolt against constituted authority. They feel they are engaged in a spectacular demonstration of the fact that authority as constituted in this country has denied them the elementary rights of livelihood.

May I quote their own statement appearing in what is known as the Post Office "Sit-downer's" Gazette, which is published by the men themselves with the aid of friends for the purpose of raising funds. They say:

> This paper is not published or paid for by the Department of Labour or the government of British Columbia.

This is the statement I wish to read:

> Please do not think that we do not fully realize the gravity of the situation we are facing. We know that this is one of the most serious problems that has ever faced the people and the government of Canada. We were forced to use this unusual method of bringing our case before you, the jury, when all constitutional means had been exhausted and the government and local authorities refused to act.
> We ask that you base your verdict upon considerations of common humanity and justice and upon the actions of the boys themselves which are all in accordance with peace and democracy. We are not a mob but a body of organized men with a very definite purpose, namely, to attain the status of Canadians with a chance to live a decent, human life.

We assure you that your property is safe in our hands. We, who are the workers and builders, without whom you would not have structures such as the art gallery and the post office, would be the last to injure or destroy that which our hands have created. We thank you for your loyal and generous support of our cause. We realize that without you our attempt to secure justice would be a complete failure. Your moral support will be the surest guarantee that all Canadian youth will enjoy a future worthy of a country which has such noble traditions of democracy and which is rich in all that should make life a thing of enduring happiness and prosperity.

That indicates the attitude of the men, and if they resort to desperate tactics there are provocative conditions leading up to such action. We should look behind the existing disorder, as some might term it, and consider the conditions that led up to the action of the men. They did exhaust every lawful means of presenting their serious plight to the authorities and were denied redress, and they have merely taken a spectacular way of bringing their problem to the attention of the people of Canada.

The second ugly fact is this, that not all of these men in Vancouver are non-resident transients nor should be so described. I am advised, on the statement of a responsible member of the Vancouver council, that approximately fifty per cent of them under existing regulations may claim domicile in British Columbia. That means that there is going on behind the scenes the usual passing the buck between provincial and federal authorities. I have been through it and I know exactly what it means—the provincial authorities trying to capitalize the situation in order to secure greater aid from the federal authorities, and the federal authorities disclaiming all responsibility and publicly announcing that they are relying upon provincial government advice. I have been through such negotiations in the past and I know just what they mean. The men have fallen between two stools and the citizens of Vancouver are now facing the grief. The civic authorities of Vancouver and district are playing their part. They now accept full responsibility for relief of the unemployables. Under a recent classification they have the full burden of the unemployables. But in addition to that they are extending relief to single employable men over fifty-five. They are extending relief to veterans over fifty years of age. As regards the mining and forestry training schemes for young men, they are receiving applications only from those between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five, so that no administration of relief is being carried on by the provincial government for single unemployed between the ages of twenty-five and fifty-five as formerly.

Mr. ROGERS: Would it be a correct inference from what the hon. gentleman has said that the only expectation of work which these men have is work provided by governments?

Mr. MacNEIL: No; that is not their only expectation; but I will come to that point in a moment. They are not presented with any opportunities for employment in any quarter, and I intend to deal with that. The city has met the situation as well as it possibly can with the resources at its command and is carrying a heavy burden in this regard.

The third point is that raised by the minister. These men have not been presented with opportunities to secure employment, and in their present mood you cannot stave them off with vague generalities about employment in the distant future. They need employment immediately in order to obtain meals to-morrow and the next day. A man who has not a postage stamp or street car fare cannot be put off with promises of something in the future. Before these men moved into the post office and art gallery they took pains to secure information as to employment opportunities across the prairies, and they received word from all the municipal bodies with whom they communicated that there were already local unemployed whose needs could not be met.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MacNEIL: Before the dinner recess I was attempting to explain wherein we were dealing with grievances distinctly different from those which were discussed on a former occasion. I refer to the fact that since the situation concerning the single unemployed in Vancouver was last discussed, approximately two hundred men have been arrested on a technical charge of obstructing the police in the performance of their duties. A number of them have been sentenced to varying terms of imprisonment ranging up to three months. Some have been released on their own recognizance under suspended sentence, and the cases of others have been adjourned because social service agencies have assured the court that in some manner they will be given food and shelter temporarily. Further, the men are attempting to solicit alms on the street corners, holding out tin cans to passers-by as has been their custom on former occasions. Not all of these men are being arrested, but in every instance the funds contributed by the public of Vancouver are being confiscated and are not being made available for the benefit of the men, and thereby their situation is being rendered more desperate.

A new feature in the situation is this, that there is some evidence of lawlessness which was not apparent before, lawlessness which has been dealt with very fimly by the men themselves. On one or two occasions men in the art gallery have suggested that they should slash or cut valuable works of art in that building, and these men have been forcibly and promptly ejected by the other men. Another grievance, and one that affects the citizens at large, is that since of necessity the police reserves are concentrated in the centre of the city where the unemployed are congregated, outlying districts complain of a minor crime wave, and lawlessness is evident there with which the police are unable to cope.

This, I submit, Mr. Speaker, presents a situation entirely different from that which was discussed previously. I attempted to show that we must understand the psychology of these men in order to deal adequately with the situation. Hungry men are very much like cornered animals. After all, they are not made of very different stuff from the rest of us: the instinct of self-preservation is still alive, and I think it is to their credit that they have shown enough spirit to organize. While we may not find it possible to condone the means they have employed, at least, as I have said, they have shown sufficient spirit to bring their case to the attention of the public in a spectacular way. This must be said of the situation, that previously they did make representations in a lawful and orderly way to the civic authorities and to representatives of the provincial government, explaining their plight. Had they not taken this action, absolutely no attention would have been paid to their need, and they would have been required to suffer in silence.

I further pointed out that the situation is obscured by the fact that some of these men, under existing regulations, may claim domicile in British Columbia. Some fifteen hundred of the three thousand men involved have a right to claim domicile in British Columbia. I endeavoured to show that the city had made provision for some; but while the provincial minister of labour, Hon. Mr. Pearson, has stated that British Columbia will care for her own, that statement does not square with the facts. It is simply a red herring across the trail. There is a large number of men who can turn to no other authority than the province of British Columbia; and, as I say, the province is unable, or has made no effort up to this time, to meet the necessities of those who are without work and without shelter, and who have no opportunity of getting work.

Before the recess the minister asked me if the men were relying on the expectation of work being provided by the provincial or the federal government. I do not think they are making a point in that regard. They are looking for work, anywhere, any kind of work. I know these men, and I speak of the situation feelingly. It is exactly similar to the situation which arose on previous occasions. The last time we had trouble in Vancouver I was requested by the men to appear on their behalf in the police court, which I was permitted to do by courtesy of the court. Each evening I interviewed the men individually in the cells of the Vancouver police station, and I took particular pains to find out their circumstances. Let me suggest to the minister that when a man is under arrest, in the police station, facing a serious charge in court, he is perhaps more likely to tell the truth than on any other occasion. Just before I came down to the chamber this evening I glanced at the notes I took in regard to some two hundred individual cases on that occasion, so I know some of the circumstances which go to make up the problem of these men described as single and homeless, a description which is stamped on their relief cards. I say we must understand the circumstances which led up to the situation in which the men find themselves to undertsand the action which they have taken to make known their needs.

The point has been made several times that their situation is due very largely to their own shiftlessness; that if they had displayed the initiative which many of us were expected to show in our earlier days, the problem would be much easier of solution. Not four blocks away from the Vancouver post office is the office of the Employment Service of Canada, a well equipped office with an adequate staff, not only possessing information with regard to employment needs in that city but with a bulletin service indicating employment needs or any labour shortage at all important points in British Columbia or, as a matter of fact, at any point touched by that service. In the ordinary course of events, when these men were released from the camps they would naturally apply for work and register with the employment service. Not only that; they have tramped down the "skid road," as we call it in Vancouver, where they might learn of work in logging camps; they have looked for work on the waterfront; they have written letters to friends at different points outside Vancouver, and after all this they have found no prospect of employment anywhere. As I stated, before they moved into the post office, the art gallery and the Georgia hotel, acting under the advice of his worship the mayor of Vancouver they took pains to telegraph to the principal municipalities across western Canada asking if work was available at any point. In response to every inquiry they received notice that in each municipality there was already a surplus of labour, and that the community could not absorb any additional single unemployed. They were made to realize in a very emphatic manner—

Mr. ROGERS: Were these telegrams sent before or after their refusal to accept the proposal of the provincial minister of labour?

Mr. MacNEIL: I understand the telegrams were sent by the men after they had been offered transportation to any destination in the western provinces.

May I add this: There are various organized bodies of responsible citizens in Vancouver interested in securing employment for these men. There is one such committee to which I should refer; that is, the committee of representative business men, associated with the various churches and the social service agencies, which takes a special interest in the problems of homeless men. These men know whereof they speak; they have gone through this experience on former occasions, and at the present moment these men are trying with all the energy they possess to find employment for those men in whom they are particularly interested, the men whom they think are of worth while calibre, worth salvaging from their present dilemma. But they cannot find work for them. Under normal conditions or even those of last spring, the constituency which I represent might be expected to absorb a number of these single unemployed in various seasonal industries. At the present time, as reports indicate, these industries are unable to take on any additional number of these men. The small logging operators, who are carrying on their operations with tractors, logging out small limits, pockets of timber that have been overlooked by the big operators, report that their bunkhouses are full or that for various reasons they have been forced to cease operations for the present, possibly on account of the fire hazard. At every point fishing boats are tied up. The pulp and paper industry has been working on a five day week for months, and is now working only half time. And so it goes. These are the reports from the various districts in the constituency which I represent, and which normally each spring would absorb quite a number of these men. The conditions are not, as stated by the minister, such as would enable the men to disperse and readily find employment at these various points.

Some reference has been made to the leadership which these men have accepted; that has been discussed in somewhat derogatory terms. There may be some truth in what the minister says in that respect; but may I point out whatever leadership is offered, these men would not accept it for twenty-four hours if they had opportunities for employment. They are not of that type. I know them. I have been present at their meetings, when they determined that leadership from among their own number, in a democratic way; where their own policies were determined in a democratic way; where they discussed ways and means of bettering their position in a proper and orderly manner. So I think it is idle to argue at this time that they have blindly submitted to leadership of a subversive nature. Within a few hours of any definite assurance that they could get employment at any point, there would not longer be any serious situation in Vancouver. It requires simply that we face the facts and apply common sense.

I would urge the minister to accept responsibility in his own department for direct negotiations with representatives of the men. It is hardly good enough to stand on the dignity of governmental departments. We should take a little of the starch and red tape out of negotiations now being conducted. On a former occasion when we had serious trouble in Vancouver a delegation largely representative of the Vancouver churches went to Victoria to interview the Minister of Labour. It happened that among the group was one representative of the men, and that man was denied admittance to the minister's office. The minister said he would receive only citizens, the implication being that these men were not to be regarded as citizens.

On other occasions the unemployed single men turned out to assist in connection with serious slides which interrupted railway and telegraphic communication. Some were killed because of their inexperience with railway signals. But officials grumbled because they were required to attend inquests; they said,

"The sooner these men are killed off, the better." The men are made to feel that they are no longer being treated like human beings. They have a hunted feeling. Under the conditions which have existed, they have been kicked about from pillar to post.

The minister does not recognize the difficulty in connection with the offer of transportation. I was brought face to face with this aspect of their problem when I interviewed one man after another. When I informed a man in the cells that his worship would in the morning probably advise him that he would be offered transportation to some destination named by him—his home, or wherever he claimed domicile—the man would probably answer, "I cannot go back; my people are in terrible circumstances now. If I go home I am not eligible for relief, and I cannot get work. They have told me there is no work, and I am not going back home to be a burden on my folks." Other men would refer to the situation in the drought area, and show how impossible it was for them to return to certain sections. Other men were without homes, and had been informed definitely in communities in which they had registered that, having forfeited domicile, there would be no relief and no work for them. If they go back they know they are going back to the same experience they have endured before, simply to be faced with an order from the police of that town to move to the next. They spend one night in the local hoosegow under orders to leave town in the morning. That has been in recent years the experience of thousands of young men across Canada. They have been moved from town to town on order of the police.

It is not a question of bad leadership at this time. By reason of circumstances preceding this situation they have reached a state of mind which is sad to contemplate, one in which they would rather go to gaol than endure that which they were required to endure previously. They have had the experience of living in box cars and in jungle camps, and of being hounded from town to town. They have told me of that. They have said, "We would rather take it here at the end of a policeman's baton; we would rather be knocked insensible on the streets of Vancouver, than to go back to the hopelessness of drifting about and searching for work about which they tell us, but which we can never find."

Mr. GOLDING: What advice did you give them?

Mr. MacNEIL: It was not my business on that occasion to give them advice. I was acting on their behalf, through the courtesy of the magistrate, to state the circumstances to the magistrate. And let it be said to the honour of the magistrate and the chief of police that they stated quite frankly in open court that it was not a criminal but rather an unemployment problem. The same scenes are again being enacted every morning in the Vancouver police court. Each morning they call long lists of men, and rows of men are formed three deep across the court room, while the police magistrate attempts to deal with the situation. It makes a burlesque of court procedure. Of course the men plead not guilty, and the police officers are called to the box to outline the circumstances. The men take the box, after pleading not guilty, and then admit that the circumstances as stated by the police officer are substantially correct. The magistrate in a friendly and informed manner discusses their circumstances and makes inquiries as to what may be done about them. He must resort to various devices, and try to deal with the situation in the light of extenuating circumstances revealed.

At the present time the gaol capacity is being taxed, and serious consideration is being given to moving the men by force to Pier's island, formerly a concentration camp for the Doukhobors. Over three hundred men were arrested and sentenced before. Two hundred have now been arrested and are awaiting sentence. It is not a question of improper leadership. The situation challenges the leadership of the Minister of Labour. If he could walk into the post office in Vancouver at this time, and persuade the men to leave that building and walk four blocks to the office of the Employment Service of Canada, what would happen? If each man registered and said he wanted work, what would he be told? The answer would be, "There is nothing for you to do; come back to-morrow." If they go to industrial firms anywhere around Vancouver, they receive the same answer, "No work; come back next week." That is the answer they have been getting, and that is the answer they will now get if they go to the very agency the administration of which is under the control of the minister. I say that the Employment Service of Canada is in touch with labour requirements in all parts of Canada, and has nothing to offer these men. I have known business men in the city of Vancouver spend hours on the telephone in communication with employers not only in and around the city of Vancouver, but in the company towns along the coast, to see if the executives in those concerns could take on at least a few of the men. But all that work has been in vain.

If with the facilities at their command they failed to secure employment for these men, how can we point the finger of blame at the unemployed man who, without the price of a postage stamp, finds it impossible to get work? The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) has shown that public opinion to some extent is behind these men. They are subsisting to-day on charitable contributions from the people of Vancouver. Those contributions are made simply because the people know that there is cause for the situation, that the men have a legitimate grievance and that there is no work available for them. Those people know that the unemployed are willing to work, if they are given opportunities to work. They know, too, that many of the men are without proper clothes to engage in heavy manual work. They know, too, that if they are sent to Swift Current or Moose Jaw or Battleford, or any points in the prairie provinces, they will not get work immediately. They will not have the opportunity to make immediate contacts for employment, and being out of funds, immediately will be picked up as vagrants, and dealt with by the police.

The Vancouver dailies are not prone to overlook or to defend any action suggesting lawlessness. But the editorial writers in those dailies are aware that there is a cause for the present situation. In editorial after editorial they have asked that some plan be initiated by the federal government. The following is a brief quotation from the Vancouver Sun of May 25, 1938:

> Human memories, on the average, are unfortunately short. The people of Vancouver however have good cause to remember that these young men, or others like them, have been put to this miserable expedient time and again in these last few years.
> On Saturday they had ample opportunity to observe that these men, most of them young but a few of them grey headed, were decent looking young fellows, capable and well set up. And, if they were given to thinking at all, they must have been appalled with the tragedy displayed before their eyes, of a generation going to waste. They should be serving their country. No doubt one and all would be willing to do so, given a pick and shovel or whatever tools they are capable of using.
> The federal Micawber government has dilly-dallied long enough with this problem, a problem affecting every citizen, a problem of wasting resources of man power—more valuable than any natural resources we have in our forests, hills and fields.

That editorial appeared in a paper which has given support to this government. The Daily Province of May 30 contained the following:

> Two front page headlines of the Daily Province last Saturday made strange juxtaposition. One said, speaking of Vancouver: "Army of Women Plan to 'Tin Can' for 'Sit-Downers'."

The other, speaking of parliament at Ottawa, said: "100 Millions for New Works." What sense could you make of those two statements, taken together?

You could make no sense of them. Nobody can make any sense of the condition which they describe. One of them meant that a thousand men had seized and occupied two public buildings of this city, in protest against the fact that they had no work and no other means of support. The other meant that the parliament of Canada was about to vote one hundred millions for "work, wages and business."

For ten days now Vancouver has been subjected to the humiliation and the ill advertisement of this crazy situation. For ten days the government at Ottawa has played discreditable politics about it, making stupid incantations to the effect that it supported the "policy of the provincial government."

For ten days the government at Victoria has stood upon its stubbornness, refusing to do anything for these men unless they will accept a scheme which would dump them off the railway at some prairie station where they may not be wanted and where there may not be anything for them to do.

A hundred millions at Ottawa for work and wages, and no word for Vancouver, where a thousand jobless men hold out in the post office and the art gallery making a mockery of all ordered government in Canada. No word except the word of folly and ineptitude, to match the stupidity and the impotence of the government at Victoria.

They are going to wear the sit-downers out. They are going to break the deadlock by a no-policy or forcible-feeble. They are going to twiddle their thumbs and pretend that if they pretend that Vancouver is not there then everything will be all right.

I have an item taken from a prairie paper which is relevant to the situation, reading as follows:

> Scores of transients passing through town daily looking for work. Westbound freight trains are the most popular means of transportation. Very few of the men looking for work during the summer season are able to get located as there is little farm work available here. Most of these men are forced to continue their westward trek trudging from town to town.

I suggest to the minister that it should be easily possible to establish direct negotiations with the men in such fashion as to break down this problem into what he described formerly as its component parts. Certain of these men belong to British Columbia, and some scheme should be devised to present them with whatever opportunities there may be for available work. If the minister insists that work is available, it should be possible to present some plan to introduce these men to that work. Most of the evidence before the men is to the effect that no work is available. The evidence is that work is not available for those men who belong in British Columbia and who must look for their employment opportunities in that province.

It should be possible to determine those men who should look for their employment opportunities elsewhere. If there are so many men who should go to Alberta; if there are so many men who should go to Saskatchewan, to Manitoba or to Ontario, it should be possible not only to offer them transportation but to say to them, "We have inquired of the Employment Service of Canada as to opportunities that exist in other provinces; we will see that you get a decent meal when you arrive at these points; if there is work available, you will be advised of it." They should be assured that they will be given every opportunity to work if they are willing to work. If no work is available, they must be assured of some form of food and shelter.

Our experiences in Vancouver have shown us that the alternative to this course is bound to be still more costly. It will be much more costly to send these young men to gaol. Why put them in direct association with hardened criminals of the underworld, with drug addicts, with thieves, with hold-up artists and gangsters? Many young men have told me that after spending two or three months in Oakalla they have been offered propositions by leaders in the underworld. This is a situation that cannot be ignored, and we must reckon with this cost if these men are rushed to gaol or concentration camps.

I was extremely perturbed when I heard the suggestion that force should be used. The acting Postmaster General (Mr. Euler) stated that this situation could not continue indefinitely, that some means should be taken to protect crown property. I know it is important to protect crown property, but it is of greater importance to remember that these men are subjects of the crown and that their welfare should be protected first. If force is used there will be broken heads, there will be blood shed and there will be the danger of lives being lost. That has happened before and it may happen again.

If you attempt to eject 700 men from the Vancouver post office, the resultant property damage will be beyond calculation. Throw in a few tear-gas bombs among 700 men, and the very attempt of such a large mob to escape will result in serious damage. I saw the damage in Hamilton Hall when the police attempted to eject men from that building. We know of the damage that was done to the museum when the police ejected men from that building on a former occasion. The damage will be much greater in the art gallery. If an attempt is made to use force in that building, within a few minutes valuable works of art may be destroyed. These have been gathered together through the years by endowments from generous citizens. The damage will be absolutely beyond repair.

The alternative is to use some common sense. An effort should be made to arrive at direct negotiations with these men. The minister will remember that after these men were refused a hearing by the provincial minister of labour, Mr. Pearson, he very courteously received a delegation of five or six of the unemployed. He heard with interest the story as told by the men themselves, and I may tell him that when they returned to the meeting place on Hastings street they told their comrades that the minister had been very decent and they felt they would get a square deal. Just the suggestion that there will be an effort to deal with the situation with some humane understanding means a great deal. I suggest direct negotiations in an understanding and friendly spirit. I suggest a registration of some sort that will determine the various elements and responsibilities in the situation. I suggest a simple plan which, in addition to the offer of transportation, will give these men the assurance that they will be brought closer to whatever work may be available. I can assure the minister that all they are asking is a chance to work, and in the meantime a chance to eat.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I promise the house that I shall deal briefly with this matter because it has been before us on at least two previous occasions. I have followed carefully what has been said by the hon. members from the city of Vancouver, but they have not set out a situation which differs materially from that which existed when this question was under discussion before. They have directed attention to the fact that thus far these men have maintained themselves in an orderly manner. Short of the fact that they have occupied public buildings, I believe that is substantially true. The hon. member who has just spoken referred in high terms to the character of the majority of the young men who have been involved in this situation. I take no exception to that but, on the other hand, I did take exception before and I do now to the type of leadership which has induced these men to adopt a course of action which I cannot but believe is opposed to their own interests.

I think the house should understand fully that this situation was anticipated to a degree. Before six o'clock my hon. friend referred to the fact that these men are well organized and disciplined. It would not be going too far to say that these men were organized for the purpose of the present demonstration while they were in the forestry conservation camps during the past winter months. That, I think, is a fact which my hon. friend will acknowledge. That is to say, the intention behind the present demonstration in Vancouver was to organize in this way in order to bring about the continuance of the forestry conservation camps during the summer months or to bring about special works projects for the employment of those who had previously been in these camps. That was very clearly the objective of the relief project workers' union. As a matter of fact, there was published in the Vancouver Sun some days ago an interview in which Mr. Campbell, one of the leaders, admitted this without any hesitation whatsoever.

The original proposal made by the minister of labour of British Columbia was to this effect, that those men who had previously been in the forestry conservation camps and had come to British Columbia from other provinces, should be given transportation back to their homes or places of origin. The minister of labour of British Columbia expressed the view at the same time that it would be possible to absorb the remainder of the single unemployed men in the industries of British Columbia or in such governmental work as might be in operation during the summer months. He referred in particular to the forestry training camp, which will be open in the summer months, and to the placer mining camp, both of these being under the youth training plans which are carried on in cooperation with the dominion government.

Mr. MacNEIL: What were the age limits?

Mr. ROGERS: From eighteen to twenty-five, but exceptions may be made up to the age of thirty years. As my hon. friend is aware, the projects under these youth training plans are agreed upon mutually by the dominion and provincial governments, and there is provision in the agreements whereby admission may be given to those above the age of twenty-five, but generally speaking the age group is from eighteen to twenty-five.

The number of non-residents who are affected at the present time in British Columbia is probably not more than 750. According to my figures the total number of non-resident transients who were in the camps in British Columbia during the winter months was 1,560. We had information to the effect that the deferred pay vouchers which were given to these men on leaving the forestry conservation camps were cashed outside the province to the number of 850, which carries with it the implication that some 800 of the 1,560 had gone to other provinces after the forestry camps were closed or after their term of employment in these camps had ceased. That leaves a remainder of about 700 non-resident single unemployed who are now in Vancouver. This brings me to the point where I agree with my hon. friend in his statement before six o'clock that certainly more than fifty per cent of those now involved in this situation are residents of British Columbia. From the beginning the provincial government of British Columbia has taken the position that it should deal with this matter as a question of relief administration within the control of the province, and it has been dealt with in that way. As I have explained to the house before, this government has proceeded upon the basis of consultation and cooperation with the provincial government. In doing that, we are following the course which has been followed in other years.

I should like also to add this with respect to the prospect of employment which lies before these men at the present time. We have it on the basis of our experience last year that some 2,500 of the men who were in the camps previously have not returned to the camps this year. A very careful registration is taken of those who passed through these camps, so when that statement is made we may accept it as being accurate. When one realizes that this was the experience last year, namely that 2,500 men either found employment elsewhere or at any rate did not find it necessary to return to the forestry conservation camps in the winter months, surely we need not assume that there is no opportunity whatever in British Columbia or in the adjoining provinces for absorbing these men.

Then, too, my hon. friend should recognize that the situation to-day is somewhat different from that which he described as existing at the time I was in British Columbia two years ago. On that occasion the transient problem was one which touched rather the opening of these camps during the winter months. The difficulty occurred in the month of November, as he will recall; but the present situation has arisen after these men have had winter employment for varying periods extending from October to the end of April, and certainly in many parts of this country there are men whose employment does not normally extend very much beyond the work that is afforded during the winter months.

My hon. friend suggests that the way to deal with the situation is to provide, through a simple plan, that employment shall be offered to these men in British Columbia. I wish it were as simple as that. I can assure my hon. friend that from one point of view that would be an easy way to deal with the situation. But I would put this question to him: If employment were provided for these men in British Columbia, would that help the solution of the transient problem in that province? His answer would be no. It could not be otherwise. If you create preferred conditions for this particular group of unemployed in one province, certainly you tend to attract to the province others of the transient group in the adjoining province. That has been the experience—

Mr. LANDERYOU: Why not do it in the other provinces as well?

Mr. ROGERS: I am coming to that. Clearly, if one were to provide employment for this group in British Columbia, it would be necessary to provide similar employment for this same group in the other provinces. There is no reason why one province should be preferred above another in that respect.

That carries us still further, and I am quite sure that my hon. friend who has just spoken would not overlook this further implication. Is there not an injustice in providing public works for these single unemployed in any province without at the same time finding employment for married men, the heads of families on relief, for war veterans on relief, and for dependents on relief above the age of sixteen years? Surely when one applies reason to this situation, it is evident that you cannot reach a satisfactory solution by conceding to these men, who have adopted this novel and spectacular means of bringing their situation to the attention of this country, opportunities which cannot at the same time be given to other groups of unemployed right across the country.

I should like, in furtherance of what I have just said, to give the house the substance of a telegram which I addressed to the head of the unemployed single men's committee in Vancouver on Friday last. This telegram was in response to a telegram from the single unemployed committee signed by Mr. John Matts, which was as follows:

> Two weeks the jobless have been in desperate circumstances. Vain efforts made to seek aid from all authorities. Your representatives turn deaf ear. All we ask is that public works program be started to employ us, that emergency relief be granted. Delay embitters public. Plight unbearable to men. Wire reply.

And this was the reply I sent to that telegram:

> Your telegram received this morning. As stated in my previous message the dominion government does not propose to take any action contrary to policy announced by minister of labour of province of British Columbia. Non-resident single unemployed previously in forestry camps should be advised to accept offer of transportation to homes. Resistance to this proposal chiefly responsible for situation referred to in your telegram. Such men returning to own province will be on same footing as others now unemployed for admission to youth training plans or for such other employment as is available on public works within federal jurisdiction. No works projects will be established exclusively for single unemployed by dominion government in any province but employment on public works will be apportioned as fairly as possible among unemployed married men, returned soldiers and single unemployed as in previous years.

I would submit to my hon. friend who has just spoken that if he were meeting this situation to-day with a full sense of responsibility, I doubt very much whether he would be prepared to go beyond the offer contained in that telegram. In other words, these men will be on the same footing as others who are now unemployed with respect to eligibility for youth training plans or other employment on public works projects. Surely you cannot justify placing them upon any other footing. Undoubtedly they have claims upon our sympathy; no one questions that. There is no member of this house who would not wish that employment might be made readily available for all who are now unemployed in this country. But I do suggest that these men now in Vancouver, who are non-residents of Bhitish Columbia, would be well advised to accept the offer of that province; and certainly every effort will be made to see that they with others who are now unemployed will be given full opportunity for such work as is available on public works projects. My own hope would be that many of those who are now taking part in this demonstration in Vancouver would find that when they really tried to secure employment apart from government projects they would succeed beyond their present expectations.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is such work available through the employment service?

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Departmental administration, $190,670.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works): This item covers administration, and relates more particularly to the office of the minister, the deputy minister, the secretary, the purchasing agent and the chief architect. When the item was under consideration some time ago, my hon. friend the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Stewart) inquired about the appointment of a clerk of tenders. The clerk of tenders who has been appointed is Mr. Rivard, whom he knows. He has been in the service since 1909 and was acting in the capacity of head clerk looking after the correspondence coming to the secretary's office and dealing with the tenders after they had been opened. The civil service commission was asked to reclassify Mr. Rivard as chief clerk, but after consultation the commission decided that the appointment should be made as clerk of tenders. It does not interfere in any way with the rule which has prevailed for many years as to the opening of tenders. Tenders are still opened by the secretary of the department; Mr. Rivard, the clerk of tenders, looks after the correspondence and the tenders before they are opened, and after they are opened he checks up the securities proposed by the tenderers. The appointment and classification have been made by the civil service commission.

Mr. STEWART: This item shows a slight increase from $177,000 to $190,000. The salary deductions which have been restored account for a little over $7,000, so that the increase is not very substantial when that is taken into consideration. However, I should like a little more information in connection with the appointment of this clerk of tenders, particularly as to his duties. As I recall it, before this change, and possibly since, when tenders are invited the tenders were sent to the secretary of the department and were in his custody and control until opened in the manner indicated by the minister. For a considerable number of years there was a vacancy in the office of assistant deputy minister. That vacancy has been filled, and the former secretary who had charge of receiving the tenders is now assistant deputy minister. Are the tenders received by the secretary as formerly? What are the duties of this clerk of tenders? Tenders for work are received over only a part of the year; the estimates go through, and tenders are invited up to the end of the working season; they are dealt with, and the contracts awarded, and then the department is through with tenders so far as dealing with them as tenders is concerned. From that time everything connected with the work comes under the chief architect or his branch, or the engineer's branch, or the accounting branch or some other branch of the department. Why, then, was it necessary to assign a clerk to the duty of looking after tenders? I notice there is an increase from seventy-nine to eighty-one in the number of the staff, which is not material. There appears to have been a change in the number of clerks. Of clerks grade 4 there were ten, and now eleven; clerks grade 3, there were eight, and now ten. There is also a decrease in the number of clerks grade 2 from six to five. Perhaps the minister would give us a little more detailed information in connection with the particular appointment to which reference has been made.

Mr. CARDIN: There has been practically no change in the duties of Mr. Rivard. He was in the office of the secretary of the department prior to his appointment as clerk of tenders. He had reached the maximum, and his case was submitted to the civil service commission in view of the work he had to do and the satisfactory services he had been rendering over a long period of time. The commission inquired into his duties but refused to appoint him as chief clerk, which would have given him a higher salary than that of head clerk; but they said that in view of the duties which he had been performing they felt he should be appointed as clerk of tenders. I do not hesitate to say that this gives him a little higher salary, but his duties are not changed. The practice in dealing with tenders in the department remains unchanged; for the secretary still deals with tenders in the same way as when my hon. friend was in office and, indeed, prior to that time. I repeat, there has been no change except in the designation of the position, giving him a little higher salary on account of the satisfactory services he has rendered. He has been in the service since 1908 or 1909, and the commission were of the opinion that there was justification for the reclassification.

Mr. STEWART: The only way in which the increase could be given him was by reclassifying his office, giving it a baptism and a new name.

Mr. CARDIN: That is really what it is.

Item agreed to.

Chief architect's branch—branch administration, $224,460.

Mr. STEWART: I notice what appears to be reorganization of this branch and a substantial increase in the expenditure. For 1937-38 the amount was $203,000 odd, and this year it is $224,000 odd. There is a new appointment, apparently an additional senior supervising architect, at $4,740. Then there are three supervising engineers of heating, electricity or steel construction: one at $3,960; one at $3,780 and one at $3,600. This makes a total new item of $11,340. I notice that instead of two senior construction architects we now have three. We have one senior mechanical engineer, heating and ventilation, apparently dispensed with. We come to another item that is inclined to arrest attention for the moment, namely seven senior assistant architects, two at $3,120 and five at $3,000, making a total of $21,240 in connection with this particular item. A little further down we find that the number of assistant architects has been reduced from twelve to eight, making a decrease of four; and immediately following we find a mechanical engineer, heating and ventilation, which is a new appointment, at $2,940. Further down we had last year one architectural specification writer and one assistant architectural specification writer whose services have been dispensed with. Then we have one mechanical draftsman, a new appointment, at $1,560, making an increase in the total of the staff from seventy-eight to eighty-three. Apparently there is some sort of reorganization of the department, and I should be pleased if the minister would outline the scheme of this reorganization and the reasons underlying it.

Mr. CARDIN: The increase in the estimates for this year is $20,892, which is made up as follows: The restoration of the five per cent deduction in salaries accounts for $9,000; there are five new positions; there are increases due to promotions, reclassifications and transfers; and there are statutory increases. These give a total of $22,692; but owing to the filling of vacancies at lower rates, there is a decrease amounting to $1,800, giving a net increase of $20,892. The five new positions are: one assistant mechanical engineer, $2,340; three stenographers, grade one; one office boy. These account for $5,340. The other cases my hon. friend has mentioned are reclassifications and transfers. The only new positions are the five I have just indicated.

Mr. STIRLING: Were the three supervising engineers of heating, electricity and steel construction promotions? Were they already in the service?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes; they are promotions.

Mr. STEWART: The minister might give a little more information with regard to the seven senior assistant architects. Has the policy of the department changed in any way in connection with the architectural services? We have a chief architect, an assistant chief architect, and a new senior supervising architect, and now we have these additional senior assistant architects. Two of these might consist of the architectural specification writer and assistant architectural specification writer, who may have been put in there. That would account for two, if that were so.

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that these seven senior assistant architects appear as a result of promotions and transfers. There are no new appointees with the exception of those I have mentioned.

Mr. STEWART: I should think there must be five additional appointees in that total.

Mr. COCHRANE: The item under consideration has to do with branch administration, and the ex-Minister of Public Works seems very much interested. I wonder if he could tell me something about the Amherst post office which was built in my constituency in 1935, as to why the contract was not awarded to the lowest tenderer.

Mr. STEWART: Well, Mr. Chairman, I have not the book before me—

Mr. COCHRANE: I have.

Mr. STEWART:—and have not a recollection of every contract that was awarded; but I fancy that if he will ask the minister he will find that it was done on the recommendation of those who were responsible for the action which was taken, and that there was very good reason for it. I do not recall just what it was, but I think he will find the record clean and straight in that connection.

Mr. COCHRANE: I have had the record in my possession.

Mr. CARDIN: The case to which my hon. friend just referred, and in regard to which he asked a question of the former Minister of Public Works, was covered by the Public Works Construction Act, and under the provisions of that act and the practice developed under it very often preference was given to a local contractor, but at the price of the lowest tender offered to the department. There was a change of name but not of amount.

Mr. STEWART: I wonder if my hon. friend would object to that. I thought that explanation was pretty good; that the idea was to give the contract to a local contractor in the town where the work was being performed, at the price of the lowest tender. The public interest was protected; the local interest was served, and the object of the act, which was to give employment in the municipality in which the work was being done, was accomplished.

Mr. COCHRANE: I wonder if the ex-Minister of Public Works is familiar with the construction of public buildings. I have gone over and studied the records, and I should like to know just how much the interests of the town of Amherst were served by giving the contract to a local firm when it was necessary for that firm to bring their key men from outside, and also necessary to import men from other parts of Nova Scotia to do the work. I think I am quite safe in saying that in the construction of that building not more than fifteen or twenty men from the town of Amherst obtained employment. I know something about the construction of buildings, because I was born and brought up in that business. This Public Works Construction Act permitted some strange things. Under this government the contractor who submits the lowest tender gets the job; nobody else gets it. The former government put the Public Works Construction Act into effect, and a friendly firm got the contract. We know that. We might as well talk facts. Everybody in the constituency, whether or not he is in politics, knew what was going on. I know what went on in my constituency, and later on I shall have something more to say about it. These are honest facts I am presenting to-night. The Quebec firm, which was the lowest tenderer on that building, was ignored entirely, and the job was given to a local firm because they were friendly to the government; there was no other reason. Under this Public Works Construction Act it meant nothing but pure politics. We all know that; the people in my constituency know it.

Mr. STEWART: Well, Mr. Chairman, all I have to say to my hon. friend, who seems inclined to inject politics into this discussion at this stage—

Mr. COCHRANE: I did not inject politics; you did.

Mr. STEWART: I have not injected any politics into anything.

Mr. COCHRANE: In 1935.

Mr. STEWART: No, not in 1935 or any year from 1930 to 1935.

Mr. COCHRANE: Who did?

Mr. STEWART: I do not know that anybody did; and I will say this, that if my hon. friend will speak with knowledge—

Mr. COCHRANE: I do.

Mr. STEWART: —and accuracy, fairness and justice, he will find that the administration of the Department of Public Works between 1930 and 1935, was as free from politics as it ever was. That is all I have to say in that connection, except that in nearly every case there was pressure—and I think reasonable pressure—to award the contract to a local company. I know there was great objection to contractors coming from the outside, from Quebec or New Brunswick or any other place, into Nova Scotia and doing work there. It was to meet that objection, which appeared reasonable under all the circumstances, that contracts were awarded to local contractors. That was the object. The public interest did not suffer; there was no overexpenditure, and the question of politics did not enter into the matter.

To get back to the item under consideration, has the policy of the department as to the employment of the services of local architects been abandoned, or has the staff been increased or reorganized in order that a larger amount of the work may be done within the department than was formerly the case?

Mr. CARDIN: The policy of the department as to acquiring the services of outside architects has not been changed, and the service has not been increased. There has been no change.

Mr. COCHRANE: I want to reply to the former Minister of Public Works. I can assure him that if it had been a firm that was not friendly to his party, they would not have received much consideration. There is no use in talking about not bringing politics into the matter.

Mr. STEWART: I want to say to my hon. friend at once that I did not know the political complexion of the firm, and do not know it yet.

Mr. COCHRANE: But those who made the representation to the hon. member knew it.

Mr. STEWART: There were no representations made along political lines.

Mr. COCHRANE: The file speaks for itself; the letters are there to prove what actually took place. I am only interested in knowing why these things happened. They do not happen under this government, so far as I have been able to see in the three years I have been here, whereas under the previous government these things went on not only in Amherst but in other places I could name where this so-called Public Works Construction Act was put into force. If that is the way in which the hon. member handled the money of the taxpayers, I think we should have some explanation of it.

Mr. STEWART: There is one question I desire to ask, and perhaps it is just as well to ask it under this item as under any other. The minister may not be able to give all the information to-night, but it will be equally satisfactory if he gives it at some other time. I should like to have the total of the estimates of 1935-36, including the main supplementary estimates and the items under the Public Works Construction Act that were under the control of the public works department. I should also like the total of the estimates for 1936-37 and 1937-38 under the same headings, and for this year as well. Also would the minister state what amount has been expended up to the end of the fiscal year 1938 by the Department of Public Works, and give figures as to the main, supplementary and special items?

Mr. CARDIN: The information I have before me shows that in the main estimates of 1935-36 there was an amount of $14,530,320, in the supplementary estimates, an amount of $2,906,150, and in the further supplementary estimates, a sum of $2,000, making a total appropriation of $17,438,470. Under the Public Works Construction Act there was a sum of $7,892,243, making a grand total of about $24,000,000.

In the main estimates for 1936-37 there was a sum of $13,411,570; in the supplementary estimates, $2,835,700, and in the further supplementary estimates, $12,800, making a total appropriation of $16,260,070. In the special supplementary estimates following the Public Works Construction Act there was a vote of $14,956,585.

In the main estimates of 1937-38 there was a sum of $12,504,420; in the supplementary estimates, a sum of $574,500, making a total of $13,078,920. Then in the special estimates there was a further sum of $12,550,000.

In 1938-39 there is a sum of $12,997,625 in the main estimates, and $13,731,548.57 in the supplementary estimates.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa, maintenance and operation of dominion public buildings and grounds, including rents, repairs, furniture, heating, etc., $2,540,700.

Mr. HEAPS: What progress is being made in Ottawa in connection with improvements undertaken by the government in Confederation square and in connection with the new post office for the city?

Mr. CARDIN: The works now contemplated are the supreme court building, the new post office, the widening of the plaza over the tracks near the central station, and the erection of the national memorial. So far as dealing with the city of Ottawa is concerned, there have been no special conversations in regard to the development or beautification of that section. I believe the old Knox church is being taken down.

Mr. HEAPS: When are the improvements in Confederation square likely to be completed?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed they will not be completed before next year.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the minister refer to the erection of the post office, the erection of the monument, or both?

Mr. CARDIN: Both.

Mr. HEAPS: Will it take as long as that?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that the monument itself will be erected this year, but the terrace to be built around it cannot be completed before next year.

Mr. HEAPS: When will the widening of the plaza, or the construction of the bridge, be completed?

Mr. CARDIN: The work will be started this year. Plans are almost at the point where tenders may be asked.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the minister receiving the whole-hearted cooperation and support of the city of Ottawa with respect to the changes taking place in this city, and particularly in the central portion?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that they are cooperating with the government and the department.

Mr. HEAPS: Are you receiving the cooperation that would tend to a beautification of the city?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: Is there any hope or prospect of doing something to fire-proof the East block? Every time I have occasion to go there I breathe a sigh of relief when I come out. It is a fire-trap of the worst description, the interior being built entirely of wood. One time when I was on the third floor I got someone to open a trap door I saw there, and I found a passageway possibly four feet by two feet, running the whole length of the corridor. There was a pipe running through this passage; but whether it was for heat or air, I do not know. It was quite obvious that this passageway would act like a chimney in case of fire. If a fire were to start down in the basement, it would be a matter of seconds only before the whole third floor would be a mass of flames.

At one time apparently it was felt advisable to put in so-called fire-doors, which supposedly would be shut in case of fire. This would be all right if the people in the building were all out, but there is one feature of these doors to which I should like to call attention. They do not open against the wall; they stand open at right angles to the passageway. If there ever were a rush of frightened women, it would be only a matter of seconds before some of them would be shoved behind the door; the door would be closed, the people would pile up against it, and a holocaust would result. It is a reflection upon us here that a building so dangerous should be so close to us.

I realize that these people are generally away at night and there would be little danger in that regard, but I can visualize a fire starting down below and it being only a matter of seconds before it would spread throughout the whole building and many people not be able to get out safely. The officials must be aware of the conditions that exist, and I should like to know if there is any prospect of anything being done?

Mr. CARDIN: I agree entirely with the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). Some time ago a study was made of this building with a view to making it fire-proof. However, the estimate of the cost was so high that it was not thought advisable to proceed with the work. My information is that it would cost $400,000 to make that old building entirely fire-proof. In view of the fact that the government had in mind erecting another building in the vicinity of the Justice building, it was not thought advisable to spend that large amount of money on the East block. I am informed that fire extinguishers have been distributed throughout the building. I am inclined to think, however, that the situation will have to be remedied pretty soon. When the new buildings are completed in a year or two, it is quite likely that many of the departments now in this old building will be removed.

Mr. DEACHMAN: There are three minor repairs which I should like to suggest to the Minister of Public Works. I should like to see an improvement made in the drinking fountains. I should like to see taps installed which would permit a man to take a drink without getting a bath at the same time. This need must be apparent to any hon. member who has occasionally had need of a drink of water in any of these wash-rooms. The other point to which I would direct attention is the air in the basement of this building. That air is positively the worst in the city of Ottawa. I do not know that I have sampled all the air; but I have certainly sampled quite a lot of it in the last ten years, and I do not know of any place where it is worse than in the basement of this building. I always feel sorry for those who have to work down there, especially in the summer time. The third matter which I should like to bring to the attention of the minister is the grass in front of this building. We used to have a beautiful sward of grass out there, but to-day it is largely a mass of plantain. I wonder if anything could be done to have grass on that lawn so that the passing wayfarer could look at it and not think this government was going to seed.

Mr. CARDIN: I can assure my hon. friend that I shall see the proper officers and have the drinking fountains improved so that there will be no danger of people having to take baths against their will. I shall try at the same time to meet my hon. friend in regard to the condition of the air. In connection with the plantain, as he calls it, may I say that the condition of the grass in certain sections of the grounds may be attributed to the fact that military corps are given the privilege of drilling on the grounds. However, my hon. friend must remember that plantain is very useful for the cure of certain wounds. I learned that in my early days. It may pay us to cultivate and sell it.

Mr. REID: While the minister is dealing with minor affairs, perhaps he could give me some information about a matter which may have a certain significance to some of us. I refer to the flag that flies on the parliament buildings. I have noticed that it is flown only five days a week; that it does not appear on the flagstaff on Saturdays and Sundays unless there has been a death in the membership of this house or of the Senate. This building is located opposite the United States legation building which has a flag flying every day in the week. If the flag flying on this building means that the house is in session, perhaps a smaller flag could be used on the other days. Surely a flag should fly seven days of the week on the parliament building of Canada.

Mr. CARDIN: My information is that we follow the practice which prevails in England.

Mr. REID: Perhaps we can improve on Great Britain.

Mr. STEWART: In connection with the maintenance of the grounds I was under the impression that this duty had been undertaken by the federal district commission.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes; that is right.

Mr. STEWART: So my hon. friend would be no longer responsible for the plantain?

Mr. CARDIN: No; I am not.

Mr. McIVOR: The best piece of grass to be found in the city of Ottawa is west of the West block. The reason for that is that we were given the privilege of using that for an occasional game of baseball. If they would allow us to play down in the front, it would improve the grass immensely.

Item agreed to.

Maintenance and operation of other dominion public buildings and grounds, including rents, repairs, furniture, heating, etc., $3,399,515.

Mr. HEAPS: A few minutes ago I asked some questions with regard to the construction work that was going on at the present time in Ottawa. I also asked if the minister was receiving full cooperation from the civic officials in that respect. I was tempted to ask those questions because on several occasions both in this chamber and outside we have heard statements made to the effect that the government is not doing sufficient for the city of Ottawa. Some few weeks ago the minister was good enough to give me certain figures which I shall read to the committee presently.

Personally I do not think the city of Ottawa itself is giving that cooperation which it ought to give the government in its endeavours to make Ottawa a capital worthy of the Dominion of Canada. I think the city itself in the past has been extremely tardy in recognizing Ottawa as being a capital city. It would be exceedingly hard for anyone looking around the city at the present time to discover any civic enterprise that goes to the credit of the city; for anything worth while that is being done is a federal undertaking. Any beautification that has been done has been done at federal expense. Yet whenever I meet people who live here, they always seem to complain that the government is not doing sufficient for the people of the city.

A few weeks ago the minister was good enough to give me a few figures which show what the government has done for Ottawa, and I will put these figures on record. In the past five fiscal years the government have let construction work in this city to the amount of $3,942,632; in the same period it has paid for improvements and repairs, $1,182,416; and for sundry maintenance, $676,679. During the same five years there has been paid out by the government for rents in Ottawa, to property owners within this city, $3,566,678. I shall not give the amount paid in salaries in Ottawa by the government, because I do not think that is necessary. But there is another item of $59,414 which the government paid out in Ottawa in the same period of five years for roads and bridges. There is another item which I shall give in detail. It shows the expenditures by the federal district commission on improvements in Ottawa in the same five-year period, a total of $1,598,939, made up as follows:

Fiscal year	Federal district commission
1932-33	$271,965
1933-34	231,377
1934-35	317,437
1935-36	351,771

In addition, the government also pays to the city of Ottawa annually the sum of $100,000. It also pays to the city of Ottawa a considerable sum each year in lieu of taxes on the foreign legations that are located in the city, a total, in those same five years, of $80,557. If the people of Ottawa were to undertake to carry on and maintain all these works and improvements themselves, and look after them as they should be looked after, I would be quite prepared to have the government pay taxes on all the government buildings in this city.

I would go a little further than that. When the government erects valuable buildings in Ottawa they are something more than fine buildings. They are in many respects a monument to the arts and culture of this dominion —expensive buildings like the parliament buildings, for example. We are told that we have exempted government buildings from taxation to the amount of $16,000,000, but it is erroneous to refer to it as it is often referred to in this city. I do not object to the government doing everything possible to make Ottawa worthy of the capital of Canada, but I do feel that in the past the government has not had the whole-hearted cooperation that it should have had from the people of this city. The government are spending vast sums of money in Ottawa, and I do hope that the people of this city will appreciate the money that is being spent here and will give to the government the cooperation that they have a right to expect.

Mr. STEWART: There is a substantial increase in this item over last year. Last year the amount was $3,295,000, and this year it is $3,399,000 in round figures. Some of the increase is no doubt due to restoration of salary deductions, but I notice there has been an increase in rents from $701,760 last year to $748,860 this year. One would have almost thought that with the new buildings which have been erected we might look forward to a decrease rather than an increase in rents. Perhaps the minister would explain to the committee this increase in rents, wheth r there has been any additional space taken, and, if so, by what departments.

Mr. CARDIN: The increase of $47,100 in rents is due to the following: forty-three new leases; seven increases in existing leases; forty-nine decreases in existing leases; increase in allotment for probable requirements, from $15,000 to $20,000; increase in allotment for probable requirements for National Defence, from $50,000 to $73,000. There is a net increase of $19,127 as regards the forty-three new leases, and there is an allotment of $23,000 for probable requirements for National Defence.

I can give the total amounts by provinces, of new leases and the amount of the decreases, if my hon. friend would like that information. The figures, in round numbers, are as follows:

Province	New Leases	Decrease
Nova Scotia	$ 1,300	$ 1,000
New Brunswick	2,400	1,600
Quebec	13,000	10,700
Ontario	39,500	23,500
Manitoba	420	540
Saskatchewan	1,700	1,300
Alberta	552	9,000
British Columbia	8,000	1,850

I have a list of all the new leases.

Mr. STEWART: No; I would not ask for those details. It seems a little strange that each year we are putting up new public buildings throughout the dominion to accommodate the services, and moving them in; yet at the same time our rents are increasing. It is the same old problem.

Mr. STIRLING: I noticed the other day the deputy minister made a dignified protest to the city with regard to the possible erection of a gas station on the corner of Lyon and Wellington street. I do not think the dominion government owns any of the land on the south side of Wellington street, but I wonder whether there exists any design accepted by the city, perhaps approved by the government, which will govern the erection of the buildings which will gradually be built along the south side of Wellington street opposite what will be a magnificent facade of dominion government buildings on the north side.

Mr. CARDIN: We have no understanding with the city of Ottawa as to the south side of Wellington street, but the letter of the deputy minister has been very well and favourably received by the board of trade. At the present time there are no plans supplying any detail as to the future development of the south side of Wellington street.

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. STIRLING: The dominion owns none of it?

Mr. CARDIN: No, none of it.

Mr. STIRLING: And the supreme court building will be next to the roadway just beyond the justice building?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the chimney of the heating plant be in the way?

Mr. CARDIN: I expect the architects have been considering doing away with the chimney somehow in order that it shall not interfere with the fine view that will be presented when the supreme court is there.

Item agreed to.

Telephone service at Ottawa, $96,000.

Mr. STEWART: Is the increase due to an additional number of telephones?

Mr. CARDIN: I understand it is due to a new charge of sixty cents per quarter mile per month on each local except those located in the centre block.

Item agreed to.

Construction, repairs and improvements of public buildings—Nova Scotia—Berwick—public building, $4,500.

Mr. CARDIN: This is a revote.

Item agreed to.

Ontario—
Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $125,000.
Fort Erie—public building, $4,000.
Kenora public building—imstallation of fittings and alterations, $6,000.
Kitchener—public building, $175,000.
Ottawa—Rideau Hall—improvements, $14,000.
Powassan—public building, $3,500.
Toronto — dominion building — improvements and repairs, $10,000.

Mr. STEWART: What is the nature of the improvements to Rideau Hall?

Mr. CARDIN: To provide for the replacement of two greenhouses, and alterations to Rideau Lodge at the entrance of the front driveway, requested by Colonel Mackenzie of government house.

Mr. STEWART: What is the nature of the improvements and repairs to the dominion building in Toronto?

Mr. CARDIN: Painting of the exterior of the building, and the interior decorating of the five floors of the west wing, basement and warehouse portion.

Mr. STEWART: That is not the old post office building, is it?

Mr. CARDIN: That is the customs house.

Mr. STEWART: The new customs building.

Item agreed to.

Manitoba—
Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $40,000.
Steinbach—public building, $3,000.

Mr. COCHRANE: In connection with the new public buildings to be constructed in Ottawa—I speak particularly about the new post office and the supreme court building—what type of stone is mentioned in the specifications for these buildings?

Mr. CARDIN: The specifications are not completed yet, but for the supreme court building it will be stone to match the Justice and Confederation buildings. For the post office it is granite or limestone, but the specifications have not yet been drawn up.

Mr. COCHRANE: My information is that in the contract or plan being prepared for the post office building Canadian limestone or Canadian granite is specified, alternate tenders. That applies only to two provinces where they can quarry that kind of stone; it does not apply to my province, which supplied the Wallace sandstone in this building, the Confederation building and several other buildings in Ottawa. My information further is that the reason Wallace sandstone has not been included in the specifications is the fact that they can deliver it here cheaper than any other stone. I should like to have some information on that point.

Mr. CARDIN: The government has been consulting a town-planning architect of great reputation, Mr. Gréber, and I am informed he suggests that the post office should be built of granite or limestone to match the monument, the base of which will be of granite. The Chateau Laurier and the station are also of light-coloured stone.

Mr. COCHRANE: If my information is correct, this and other governments have followed the policy of having all these buildings as nearly uniform in appearance as possible. I think we have rather gone astray in connection with the Bank of Canada, which was built of granite. Wallace sandstone is produced in the constituency which I have the honour to represent; but as a matter of fact very little labour is spent upon it in that constituency, because most of the stone is shipped to Quebec where it is turned out in its finished state. I know that the company in my constituency does not expect all the business; but I submit that at least it should be recognized when the specifications are being prepared, and I know that we have not been recognized in the post office specifications. In connection with the specifications for the construction of the Supreme Court building, I think the constituency I represent should be given some consideration, and I should like to have a definite statement from the minister in that regard.

Mr. CARDIN: My information is that up to the present Wallace sandstone has been used extensively in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. COCHRANE: In the past, yes.

Mr. CARDIN: Well, my hon. friend should not despair.

Mr. COCHRANE: I wish to be fair in this matter; but I would ask the minister, Why is it that Wallace sandstone was used in the past? It was a matter of price; that is all. Now, the taxpayers are paying for all these buildings, and if the department is going to discriminate against a particular company because it can supply stone cheaper than it can be procured elsewhere, that is not just and fair to all the producers in Canada. All I ask is that we be given a chance to bid. If, after the tenders are in, there is an objection to using sandstone, then I have nothing further to say; but as the representative of the constituency of Cumberland I feel I ought to bring this matter to the attention of the minister. I should like to have a definite statement as to what is to be used in the Supreme Court building. I understand that the designs are being prepared by a Montreal architect, and I would point out that seventy-five per cent of the labour spent on Wallace sandstone is spent in Quebec because the stone is shipped to that province in the rough state. After all, Ottawa is in one province, and I submit that we should have some consideration in connection with all these millions that are being expended here. I do not think I am unfair in making this request.

Mr. STEWART: What sandstone was used in the trimmings of the Confederation and the Justice buildings?

Mr. CARDIN: Wallace sandstone. That was used also in the parliament building and the national research building.

Mr. STEWART: I think my hon. friend will find that other dealers in stone complain that Wallace sandstone has been getting too much of a show in Ottawa. That has been the complaint in the past.

Mr. COCHRANE: On account of the price; that is the only reason.

Mr. STEWART: Not on account of the price. As I recall it, the sound practice of the Public Works department is not to specify any particular kind of stone, brick, hardware or other material.

Mr. COCHRANE: You are wrong; read the specifications.

Mr. STEWART: Perhaps I do not know as much about it as my hon. friend does, but the reason for that practice is that if you specify a particular kind of stone or granite you give a preference.

Mr. COCHRANE: I do not ask that.

Mr. STEWART: I am not concerned with what the hon. gentleman is asking. I say that the reason for not specifying a particular kind of stone is as I have indicated, and it is a sound one, because if they specified granite my hon. friend would be complaining that they should specify Wallace sandstone. For that reason, therefore, the specifications are left open.

Mr. COCHRANE: They are not left open.

Mr. STEWART: They are.

Mr. COCHRANE: Well, read them.

Mr. STEWART: They are left open to a large extent—

Mr. COCHRANE: Oh, no.

Mr. STEWART: —in order that the manufacturers of different classes of material will all have a chance to tender.

Mr. COCHRANE: My hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. STEWART: I will ask the minister if that is not the settled policy of the department. I do not know whether the hon. gentleman is trying to qualify for Minister of Public Works, but he seems to display a remarkable amount of inaccuracy in his information.

Mr. COCHRANE: I am not an old man; but I think I have almost as good a knowledge of this matter as some of those who have been in the office of the Minister of Public Works, and I do not care whether it is in connection with civil engineering, or anything else. If an engineer can design a building, I can build one, and that is more than some engineers can do. I am not saying anything against the hon. member, but he is wrong. He has not read the specifications for the new post office, and I can tell him what is contained in them. They provide for Canadian limestone or granite.

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. STEWART: Canadian limestone leaves it open to any province that has limestone.

Mr. COCHRANE: And how many provinces have limestone?

Mr. STEWART: Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba.

Mr. COCHRANE: I respect the Ontario members, but I want to read an article that appeared in the Engineering and Contract Record. It is headed:

Request Use of Ontario Stone in Ottawa Buildings.

Ontario cut stone contractors have circularized Ontario federal members seeking their support for Ontario Queenston or Rama limestone in the construction of dominion government buildings at Ottawa. There is no cut stone from an Ontario quarry in any of the major federal buildings in Ottawa, the brief states. The buildings have all been built with cut stone from the sandstone quarries of the maritime provinces or with granite from Quebec, with the exception of the Hunter building which is of brick trimmed with Tyndall limestone from Manitoba. The brief is signed by Robert Sharp, Hamilton, and George W. Ritchie, Toronto, on behalf of ten different cut stone contractors, including two firms in Ottawa, two in Hamilton, one in London and five in Toronto.

All that I ask is that the company in my constituency be given an opportunity to tender. They are not being given that opportunity in the specifications prepared for the post office, and I am making this plea on their behalf. As regards Canadian limestone, so far as Manitoba is concerned, we might as well forget it.

The CHAIRMAN: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member, but his remarks all have reference to buildings in the city of Ottawa. We have passed that item and are now discussing buildings in Manitoba.

Mr. COCHRANE: This is the first time I have spoken in the House of Commons although I have been here three sessions. I do not appreciate being ruled out of order. I am talking about dominion public buildings, no matter in what province they are situated. The particular buildings to which I am now referring are in the city of Ottawa. I do not appreciate the fact that I am called out of order—

Mr. STEWART: Mr. Chairman, is this hon. member to defy the authority of the chair?

The CHAIRMAN: I did not call the hon. member out of order; I pointed out to him—will he please resume his seat?

Mr. COCHRANE: I was born in the country, Mr. Chairman—

The CHAIRMAN: Will the hon. member please resume his seat?

Mr. COCHRANE:—so you will have to pardon me.

The CHAIRMAN: I am trying to be fair to the hon. member, but he has been talking about certain stone used in certain federal buildings in the city of Ottawa. I pointed out to him that those items had passed, and that the committee were now considering buildings in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. COCHRANE: Well, Mr. Chairman, I shall have to submit to your ruling. I did not know that it made any difference, when we were talking about dominion public buildings, whether they were in Manitoba or in any other part of the country, because after all we are speaking about Canada, and if my memory serves me aright all these provinces are in Canada. I am not trying to be unfair; I want to be reasonable, but I do feel that this company should be given an opportunity to tender on the post office building, and they have not been given that chance. I think I should have some explanation. I am told they have been eliminated on account of the fact that they can deliver the stone here more cheaply than any other firm. That is the whole story. Who are paying for these buildings? They are paid for by the taxpayers of the country. Are we going to put up buildings regardless of cost just because certain members make representations that certain stone should be used? I do not think we should.

Mr. CARDIN: My hon. friend is not fair when he says certain members have been making representations. In regard to the post office building that is to be put up here, the quality of the stone has been indicated by the town-planning architect who was consulted by the government. It is on his advice alone that it has been stated that the stone for the post office should be rather granite or limestone. There has been no other representation made in that regard.

Mr. COCHRANE: Is that in keeping with the policy which was laid down for these improvements in Ottawa? I do not think it is.

Mr. CARDIN: It is in keeping with the program for the beautification of Ottawa.

Mr. COCHRANE: My understanding was that the buildings should be uniform in appearance.

Mr. CARDIN: In that section, at least.

Mr. COCHRANE: Why should an architect have any authority to say what stone is going to be used? It is not the quality of the stone that is in question, because we can see it here in this building. I do not see why an architect should take away any authority from the government.

Mr. CARDIN: He is not taking any authority away from the government. The government consulted him, and it is on his advice that this kind of stone has been chosen for the post office, because it is a light-coloured stone. That was the suggestion of the architect whom we consulted, and that is the only reason for this decision. There was no intention in the world to exclude the quarries of the province which my hon. friend represents in this house.

Mr. COCHRANE: Well, as I said before, I do not want to be unfair; but the fact that the stone is of a light colour does not seem to me to be a very strong argument as to why it should be used. The quality of Wallace sandstone is shown in all these buildings here in Ottawa, and that stone has been used because of the price at which it can be delivered here. We built the Bank of Canada building of granite; but that will not contribute to the improvement of Wellington street, because there we shall have a building that will stand by itself and will not correspond with any other building. All I ask is that the Wallace quarries be given a chance to tender. Then, if the government does not want their stone, all right; but they have been given no opportunity to tender. They have been entirely eliminated. All I am asking, is that they be given an opportunity, and I think any company doing business in Canada to-day should be given an opportunity to tender. Then, if the government or the architect in charge does not consider that the stone is of the right quality or the right colour, that is all there is to it. We have many buildings here of the same colour, the Confederation building, the East and West blocks and this parliament building, and I have never heard anyone say anything against the colour. Surely we must consider the quality before the colour.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. COCHRANE: It is not carried with my consent.

Item agreed to.

Alberta—
Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $40,000.
Peace River—public building, $36,000.

Mr. KENNEDY: What is the $36,000 for in Peace River? Is that a new building; and, if so, where is it to be constructed?

Mr. CARDIN: That is a new building. This amount has been appearing in the estimates for a couple of years, but we have experienced some difficulty as to the site where that public building is to be erected.

Mr. KENNEDY: Then as yet it has not been decided where the building is to be erected?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. KENNEDY: What is to be the nature of the building?

Mr. CARDIN: It is for a post office.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia—
Dominion public buildings—improvements and repairs, $50,000.
Kelowna—public building, $10,000.
Powell River—public building, $58,000.
Prince Rupert—public building, $170,000.

Mr. NEILL: I notice this vote is described as having to do with public buildings, but of course it means post offices. Of these there are three: one at Kelowna, where the cost apparently is about $60,000; one at Powell River, costing $58,000—and I know that is long overdue—and another at Prince Rupert, costing $170,000. That also is overdue. I wonder, however, what has become of the vote for the post office in the city of Alberni, which, so far as age goes, antedates these others by a good many years. It was a settlement some ten or twelve years before confederation, while these others are comparatively of mushroom growth. During the years of the depression, while we were fully aware of the need for a proper building there, we put forward no claim, knowing the need for economy on the part of the government; but as things got better, last year and the year before, we thought we would put forward our modest claim. It happened to be opportune to have one of the head men of the Post Office Department visit Alberni. He walked into the post office and remarked that the accommodation was entirely inadequate for the business done.

[Mr. Cochrane.]

Some reference was made to-night with regard to a revote for a public building because the department were not able to get a site. As the minister is aware, the city of Alberni voted the government one of the best lots in the city, free of all charge, for the construction of this post office. The cost was very moderate; if I remember aright we asked that the government spend only some $17,000. That was the estimated cost, without paying anything for a site. The total cost of these other three buildings to which I have referred is $288,000, and an additional $17,000 would not have been a very great addition to that amount. There is no question that this post office building is needed, with the increase in the population of the city, and the business done there would fully justify it; so would the post office revenue. Would the minister indicate first what has become of the item that was put in for this vote, and also whether or not he can hold out any prospect of its being included in further supplementaries?

Mr. CARDIN: I am afraid this year it will be impossible to meet the request of the hon. member. The Minister of Finance has intimated to all ministers that he does not propose to introduce further supplementary estimates. The only thing I can say to the hon. member is that his project has taken the same route as one I proposed for my own constituency. I refer to a site which for a number of years has existed in one of the small towns in my riding. Until this time, however, it has been impossible to erect a public builidng on it. This year I tried to use all my power with the Minister of Finance, but I could not succeed. I am afraid my case is similar to that of the hon. member. May I point out to him, however, that he has my word that I shall keep the two matters in mind. The site at St. Ours was bought more than fifteen years ago, but the building has not yet been erected. I shall keep the two matters together, and when I feel that my power and influence is strong enough to have the building erected at St. Ours, I shall remember the claim of the hon. member.

Mr. NEILL: I thank the minister. But if it would meet the situation, I would not object if he were to cut out the vote for Kelowna for this year.

Item agreed to.

Generally—Dominion immigration buildings—repairs, improvements, etc., $35,000.

Mr. STEWART: The amount seems to be exactly the same as last year. Was last year's vote expended, or is this a revote?

Mr. CARDIN: This is a maintenance vote for repairs and renewals.

Mr. STEWART: How much was spent last year?

Mr. CARDIN: Practically the whole of it, I am informed.

Item agreed to.

National monument on Connaught place, $150,000.

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister give some information as to the total cost of the work, whether contracts have been awarded, when they are likely to be completed and so on?

Mr. CARDIN: The contract for the base of the monument has been awarded to the Cape construction company of Montreal. They are ready to start work as soon as we have disposed of the old post office. The granite is being cut and prepared, and they are ready to begin work on the foundation.

Mr. STEWART: What is the amount of the contract?

Mr. CARDIN: It is $118,603.

Mr. STIRLING: Where will the centre of the monument be? Will it be on the centre line of Sparks and Elgin streets?

Mr. CARDIN: It is a little west of the site of the post office which is being demolished.

Mr. STIRLING: I suppose there is cellarage under the old post office?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: And considerable foundation work will have to be done where the cellarage existed?

Mr. CARDIN: No; it is west of that point.

Mr. STIRLING: It will miss the post office?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Chief engineer's branch—Branch administration, $210,880.

Mr. STEWART: The details indicate that there is some reorganization or rearrangement. I note particularly that there are three additional superintending engineers at $4,980 each, and an increase in the number of clerks, the total number being increased from sixty-three to seventy-three. The total expenditure, including the restoration of salary deductions, amounts to $210,880, as against $172,541 for the last fiscal year. What is involved in the reorganization? Where are the three superintending engineers located? Are there any new divisions, and what necessitated the appointment of the additional engineers?

Mr. CARDIN: The increase shown is due, first, to the restoration of the five per cent deduction. That factor accounts for $6,969. There are ten new positions, and there are increases due to promotions and statutory increases. The new positions relate to the appointment of three superintending engineers, involving an amount of $14,940. These engineers have been promoted to Ottawa. Mr. Goodspeed was formerly in Winnipeg and Mr. Sabourin was in Quebec city. It was thought advisable to bring to the Ottawa office men who had experience in the various engineering districts of the country, so that they would be more familiar with the districts of which they are in charge. It is because of that fact they have been called to Ottawa to form a sort of board to advise the chief engineer as to what would be necessary, useful or practical in the various districts of Canada. There is one in Ottawa charged particularly with supervising recommendations coming from Ontario. One was brought from Winnipeg to advise us as to the needs of the western provinces, and the third was brought from Quebec to advise as to the requirements of that province as a whole. No new appointments have been made, the men being brought to Ottawa from the outside offices. The other cases are all promotions. The salaries of these different engineers total $27,420.

Mr. STEWART: Will the bringing in of these engineers involve the appointment of other engineers at a later date to do their work?

Mr. CARDIN: It is only a question of promotion from junior rank to a senior position. The junior positions were filled by the civil service commission.

Mr. STIRLING: The district engineer who was at Winnipeg has been promoted to superintending engineer and brought to Ottawa. Is the work of the Winnipeg district now being done by the man who was his assistant?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that in the reorganization the engineer at Charlottetown was promoted to the position in Winnipeg. The only new appointments that have been made by the civil service commission are those at the bottom of the list, the junior positions.

Mr. STEWART: Did I understand the minister to say that these engineers will now be located at Ottawa and will form a board to advise the chief engineer?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: That is a new feature. As I recall it, these engineers came in from the outside perhaps once or twice a year and consulted with the chief engineer. Now they are to be located permanently at Ottawa. In addition to the chief engineer and assistant chief engineer there will be three superintending engineers.

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that these positions have not been created. The engineers who previously made up this board have been retired. I am informed that there was a board in Ottawa which dealt with the same problem with which these supervising engineers will have to deal.

Item agreed to.

Engineering, including salaries of engineers, clerks, etc., $515,245.

Mr. STEWART: Will the minister explain the increase?

Mr. CARDIN: There is a gross increase of $25,000, made up as follows:

Return of five per cent deduction, $17,000.
Two new positions, $3,480.
Statutory increases, $4,200.

There is a decrease of $13,920 due to filling vacancies at lower rates and the abolition of the position of district engineer, grade 1. This leaves a net balance of about $11,000. The new positions are an assistant engineer for the Fort William and Port Arthur district, which is to be filled by promotion, and one stenographer at Charlottetown. The position at Three Rivers has been abolished, the work of that district being divided between Montreal and Quebec.

Mr. STEWART: There is only one additional engineer being appointed at Port Arthur and Fort William?

Mr. CARDIN: Just one.

Item agreed to.

Dredging—Maritime provinces, $375,000.

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister explain the substantial increase?

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. CARDIN: This amount of $375,000 is required to carry out dredging operations in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island by departmental plant, and to provide for the repair and maintenance of this plant during the fiscal year.

Mr. STEWART: I do not suppose the minister has laid out a program for this work.

Mr. CARDIN: A tentative program only.

Mr. STEWART: The principal increase seems to be in the work program, from $22,000 to $45,815. There is also an increase in new plant. What new plant is contemplated?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that some pontoons are required for dredge No. 12 and also a scow for dredge No. 13.

Item agreed to.

Dredging—Ontario and Quebec, $326,700.

Mr. MacNICOL: What is the work to be carried on in Ontario under this item?

Mr. CARDIN: This amount is made up as follows:

Permanent staff	$ 7,620
Wages	70,482
Maintenance and operation	91,458
New Plant	10,005
Contract and day labour works, inspection and contingencies and to supplement above allotments	147,135
	$326,700

The officers intimate that it is impossible to tell definitely what repairs will be required during the year, and the amount of wages to be paid depends on the length of the operating season, which is governed by weather conditions. No list has been prepared of the works to be undertaken.

Mr. STEWART: What are the particulars of the new plant?

Mr. CARDIN: There are two new 40 cubic yard dump scows for dredge No. 126 at $6,670, and one new 40 cubic yard dump scow for dredge No. 127, at $3,335, or a total of $10,005.

Item agreed to.

Dredging—Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, $110,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: This and the previous item link together several provinces. Item No. 302 covers Ontario and Quebec; and item No. 303, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Apparently the minister is not prepared to treat each province separately. I have no objection to the item, but I think it would be better if we had each province separate.

Mr. CARDIN: The suggestion of my hon. friend no doubt has some merit, but the vote has been carried in this way for a number of years and has worked out satisfactorily. Each province is considered on its merits, and the amounts spent in each province are practically equal. Probably the reason for having the provinces coupled together was that there would be fewer items of a similar kind in the estimates.

Mr. KENNEDY: I notice there is an increase for total salaries and wages in every province except the three prairie provinces, where there is a reduction in that item. Is this on account of a reduction in salaries and wages or a reduction in staff?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that there is no reduction at all in salaries and wages.

Mr. KENNEDY: Then the reduction of $2,382 must be due to a reduction in staff?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that it is due to not so many dredges being in commission.

Mr. KENNEDY: Where is the $46,000 new plant in the prairie provinces to be located?

Mr. CARDIN: That is for a new tug on lake Winnipeg, the old one having been condemned.

Item agreed to.

Maintenance and operation of graving docks, locks and dams, etc.—Champlain graving dock, $69,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: May I ask if graving docks are for the use of Public Works boats, or does the item also concern the Department of Transport?

Mr. CARDIN: The graving dock can be used by any vessel.

Mr. MacNICOL: As well as by Public Works vessels?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Is there any revenue from the public use of the dock?

Mr. CARDIN: There is a regular schedule of tolls, regulated by order in council.

Mr. STIRLING: Does the public use the dock to any extent? Is there a considerable revenue?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why is the dock at Saint John, New Brunswick, not in this list also?

Mr. CARDIN: The Saint John dock is a subsidized dry dock.

Mr. STIRLING: What does the revenue amount to?

Mr. CARDIN: The revenue for 1936-37 was $27,344, and the total revenue since 1921-22 has been $601,863.

Item agreed to.

Esquimalt graving dock, $83,000.

Mr. STIRLING: What is the revenue at Esquimalt?

Mr. CARDIN: In 1936-37 fifty-three vessels were docked there, and the revenue was $36,-156. The total revenue since 1926-27 amounts to $318,223.36.

Item agreed to.

Lorne graving dock, $40,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Where is this dock?

Mr. CARDIN: It is at Lauzon, opposite Quebec.

Item agreed to.

Maintenance and operation of locks and dams, $62,800.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has this item to do with the Rideau canal?

Mr. CARDIN: No; that is under the Department of Transport. This appropriation is to provide for the operation and maintenance of various locks and dams formerly charged to several general appropriations. The names of the dams are as follows: Rivière du Lièvre lock and dam; French river dam; Latchford dam on Montreal river; St. Andrews lock and dam; Cowan dam; Okanagan dam at Penticton, storage dams on the Ottawa river, Quinze and Timiskaming.

Item agreed to.

Maintenance and operation of snagboats, $41,000.

Mr. NEILL: This may not be the appropriate item, but I do not know any other. Would the minister deal with Ripple rock under this item? I noticed in the paper that there was to be a sum put in the supplementary estimates to survey it, but my impression was that it was thoroughly surveyed some years ago and the method for getting rid of it settled.

Mr. STEWART: It is a big job, likely to cost some $400,000.

Mr. CARDIN: I understand the department is informed as to the cost of disposing of that obstacle to navigation, and that it would be a costly proposition. We have not provided for that work this year. As far as investigation is concerned, I am informed by the officers of the department that they have practically all the information they require.

Mr. NEILL: That is obtained by some officials appointed by the government?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. NEILL: My impression is, speaking from a rather treacherous memory, that the cost would not be very great, I think about $125,000.

Mr. STIRLING: Nearer half a million.

Mr. CARDIN: It is vague in my mind, but I remember having seen some such report as my hon. friend speaks of, but it did not emanate from the department; it came from some other source.

Mr. NEILL: There was a notice in the Vancouver paper that information had been given out from Ottawa that a sum of $5,000 was going to be voted for a survey, and my information is that Mr. Forde, the district engineer, or someone under him, carried out a survey some years ago, and decided that the only practical way to do the work was to run a tunnel from the side under the bed of the Narrows—they had to go some ninety feet deep—and then go up under the rock and blow it up. The cost was estimated at somewhere around $125,000. There seems to be a difference between what is reported in the paper and the minister's statement. The minister says they have all the information they need.

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that a board of engineers was appointed and they had a public hearing some years ago. I am informed also that a request was made to the department to provide a further sum to make a survey, but we did not comply with that request because we felt we had all the information required. It was only a case of deciding whether or not we would do the work.

Mr. NEILL: And it has been decided not to do it this year?

Mr. CARDIN: Not this year.

Item agreed to.

Maintenance and operation of roads and bridges—Burlington channel bridge, $16,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: Why are six additional bridge men necessary?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that the staff has not been increased, but that some temporary employees have been made permanent.

Mr. MacNICOL: The list on page 185 of the estimates shows six more men for 1938-39 than for 1937-38.

Mr. CARDIN: As temporary employees their names do not appear in the estimates.

Mr. MacNICOL: Surely it does not take eleven men to operate the Burlington bridge.

Mr. STEWART: I notice that last year the temporary assistance was $4,320, and this year it is $500. Is the explanation that those temporary assistants have been appointed permanently?

Mr. CARDIN: These employees were paid as temporary, and now they are being made permanent. The number of men is the same; there has been no increase.

Mr. STEWART: Are they appointed by the civil service commission?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does that mean that eleven men are employed to operate the Burlington bridge?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Kingston, La Salle causeway, $10,500.

Mr. TUSTIN: I notice there is $2,274 for temporary assistance. The men on the Burlington bridge are made permanent. Why should these men at Kingtson be temporary?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that these men are not particularly looking after the bridge but rather are looking after the piece of land there.

Mr. MacNICOL: There is no land around the La Salle bridge.

Mr. TUSTIN: I should like to know the duties of these men. Surely the government does not keep two men to look after that land on La Salle causeway. There is no land there to speak of.

Mr. STEWART: Is there a wharf, or some part of the causeway used for landing of boats? I have noticed them tied up there.

Mr. CARDIN: I think that would be part of the duties of these temporary men.

Mr. STEWART: I was not sure whether that was operated by the Public Works department or the Department of Marine.

Mr. CARDIN: We look after the maintenance, repairs and operation of the combined roadway, wharves and bridges over the Cataraqui river at Kingston. I regret very much that I am not in a position to give a satisfactory answer to my hon. friend. I will undertake to supply that information on some other occasion when dealing with the estimates. There is still a good deal to be disposed of and I will supply that information, if the hon. member does not object to passing this item.

Item agreed to.

Ottawa, bridges and approaches, $26,200.

Mr. MacNICOL: To what bridges around Ottawa does this refer?

Mr. CARDIN: The Chaudière, the Laurier avenue and the union bridges.

Mr. STEWART: There seems to be a substantial increase in the amount to be expended this year. Where is it proposed to make this increased expenditure?

Mr. CARDIN: It is to pave the union bridge.

Item agreed to.

Nova Scotia—
Essential undertakings—Little Anse—breakwater reconstruction, $43,400.
Malagash—wharf improvements, $19,000.
New Harbour—breakwater repairs, $8,200.
Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $250,000.

Mr. STEWART: Why is this amount of $43,400 required in connection with Little Anse breakwater reconstruction?

Mr. CARDIN: This is required to provide for the reconstruction of the cribwork reinforcing block, 210 feet by 20 feet located on the harbour side of the breakwater. Attention is directed to the necessity of this work by district engineer Cox, who reports that the section of work to be rebuilt is badly damaged by action of the teredo, and in its present weakened condition is liable to be washed away at any time.

Mr. STEWART: Will the minister explain the item of $19,000 for Malagash.

Mr. CARDIN: This is required to provide for encasing the outer end of the public wharf with steel sheet piling, placing filling between the existing cribwork and proposed piling and laying a reinforced concrete deck four inches thick. Attention is directed to the necessity of the proposed work by the district engineer, who reports that this structure is in a bad condition owing to the ravages of sea worms. He reports also that pile work will not be as suitable as sheet steel piling, which will withstand to a greater degree the ice shoves at this place and will also better support the Malagash salt company's conveyer and the structure they intend to erect to house machinery of considerable weight.

Mr. STEWART: The principal traffic over the wharf is salt?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Prince Edward Island—
Under contract—Summerside—improvements to wharf, $3,100.
Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $75,000.

Mr. STEWART: Is this a revote or an extension?

Mr. CARDIN: It is to complete payments on a contract.

Mr. STEWART: What is the total amount of the contract?

Mr. CARDIN: The amount is $22,829.

Mr. STEWART: There was voted $25,000 last year?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: Was that all expended?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: And this is in addition to the vote last year?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, June 7, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

PETITION

Petition from Georges Roy and Jean-Paul Dumont, respectively president and secretary of L'Union catholique des cultivateurs d'Estcourt, praying for the annexation of part of the state of Maine to the county of Témiscouata.—Mr. Pouliot.

SEED GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) asked for certain information with regard to certain operations of the wheat board in connection with the supplying of seed wheat to the province of Saskatchewan. He made reference then to a car of wheat which had been delivered to a place called Coleville. I have a telegram with regard to that matter which I should like to read to the house. It is as follows:

Referring telephone conversation and reference to Coleville car. This small car of wheat ordered shipped to Coleville by Saskatchewan Department of Agriculture May ninth. Shipment was made May eleventh. We were advised by department this car had been ordered by a rural municipality in error and were instructed night of May twentieth to rebill to Lakehead. Instructions given railway morning May twenty-first and situation immediately dealt with. Accordingly this car arrived at Fort William May thirty-first.

My right hon. friend stated that according to the weekly statement by the wheat board there were apparently some two million bushels of seed wheat still left in the hands of the government.

Mr. BENNETT: Of wheat; I did not say "seed wheat".

Mr. EULER: Of wheat, yes. While according to the weekly statement of May 21 rendered to the department there was apparently a stock of wheat of something over two million bushels, the fact is that there is no wheat in stock. The wheat has all been disposed of as seed wheat. The reason it still appears on the statement is that it is the practice of the wheat board generally to have it appear, unless the wheat has actually been invoiced to a purchaser. It has all been sold, but not all invoiced.

A further question asked by my right hon. friend was with regard to cash on hand. I am informed by the chairman that it is impossible to make an accurate statement as a number of adjustments have still to be made.

PRIVILEGE—MR. POULIOT

QUESTION WITH RESPECT TO THE PUBLICATION LA RESTAURATION NATIONALE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I ask the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) if he assumes any responsibility for everything that is published in a paper entitled La Restauration Nationale—the National Restoration—which has his picture on the front page? He does not say anything.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, it is not open to hon. members to propound questions on the floor of the house in this way. As a matter of fact I know nothing about it, never saw it and I do not know what is in it. The hon. member has no right to catechize me—

Mr. POULIOT: No, no.

Mr. STEVENS: —about things which appear in the press.

Mr. POULIOT: No, but I will file it with the Purvis-Moore report.

THE KING'S BIRTHDAY

INQUIRY AS TO SITTING ON THURSDAY, JUNE 9

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if the government has yet arrived at any decision as to whether or not the house will sit on Thursday, June 9.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I understand the whips have concurred among themselves, and it appears to be the general wish of hon. members that the house should sit on Thursday. Last year the house in Great Britain sat on June 9, the king's birthday, and presumably would do so this year but for the fact that the house is in recess at the present time.

INDIAN ACT AMENDMENT

PROVISIONS RESPECTING LEASES OF MINERALIZED AREAS AND ADVANCES TO ASSIST AGRICULTURE AND OTHER PURSUITS

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the third reading of Bill No. 138, to amend the Indian Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

TRANSPORT COMMISSION

AUTHORITY TO CONTROL TRANSPORT OF PASSENGERS AND GOODS BY RAILWAYS, SHIPS AND AIRCRAFT

The house resumed from Monday, June 6, consideration in committee of Bill No. 31, to establish a board of transport commissioners for Canada, with authority in respect of transport by railways, ships and aircraft—Mr. Howe—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 35, subsection 1—Charges by agreement between parties.

Mr. STEVENS: Section 35, which introduces part V of the bill, contains a distinct departure in the matter of transportation control. I am not going to argue the matter at length because the bill was discussed thoroughly in the committee on railways and canals. However, when the bill was under consideration in the committee I made it clear that I was opposed to this part and particularly to these four sections, and indicated that I would oppose them when they came before the committee of the whole. I should like to state briefly the reasons for my objection to this part and to this particular section.

This section is a distinctly retrograde move. The board of railway commissioners was set up in 1904. For years previously chaos and discrimination and unfairness had existed in the railway transport business, both in Canada and in the United States. It will be recalled that powerful corporations in those earlier days would frequently secure privileges and advantages from the railway companies which were not open to smaller shippers or sometimes to other large shippers who were in a competitive position. These abuses were done away with in the United States by the appointment of the interstate commerce commission and the application of its code of laws, and in Canada by the appointment of the board of railway commissioners and the enactment of the Railway Act, with the various amendments that have been made since 1904.

I do not hesitate to pay tribute to the boards of railway commissioners that have been sitting in this country for the last thirty or so years. Almost always they have been presided over by able and distinguished men, sometimes by very distinguished men. Because of their findings a sort of case law has been built up which I believe is accepted. Their rulings are now recognized, generally speaking, as equitable and fair. The public interest has been well protected. It has been argued in support of this measure, which will set up a board of transport commissioners, that they will administer the law in the same manner as it has been administered in the past. I have no doubt they will, but the point is that by this part the board is instructed to permit agreements to be made between the railway companies and individual shippers.

Something that has been prohibited for years, something that has been recognized on no occasion, is now to become law: a private shipper and a railway company may enter into an agreement. I am quite aware it will be argued that this provision has been surrounded with the necessary safeguards, but the principle involved is a serious one. Under the Railway Act through the years unjust and unfair discrimination has been defined and its application guarded against. Furthermore, any discriminatory, competitive or special rate has been open to all shippers along the lines affected by the rate. Under this bill an agreement may be made with an individual shipper, and then provision is made to permit those who object to come before the board to state their case. If they can make good their case, there is no doubt in my mind that the board will do justice, but this is a reversal of the principle that has obtained in the past.

Furthermore, this part limits the application of this provision to those who are defined in the bill as carriers. A carrier is defined as follows:

> "Carrier" means any person engaged in the transport of goods or passengers for hire or reward to whom this act applies, and shall include any company which is subject to the Railway Act.

This bill does not apply to highway transport. I think it is quite clear that the intention of part V is to give the railway companies a weapon which will enable them to compete with the trucks on the highways. The trucking companies are not to have access to this court in order to present any grievance they may have, nor will private individuals who are not carriers under this definition be allowed to appear. My submission before the committee was that the word "carrier" should be changed to "persons," that any person in Canada should be allowed to appear before the board in the same manner as he is permitted to appear before any court for the purpose of securing redress of grievances. As I have stated already, under this bill a carrier is limited to those licensed under this legislation. This makes a definite distinction and limitation and is another reason why I am opposed to this part.

My main objection is that this bill introduces into our legislative control of railways the principle of granting permission to a railway company to make an agreement with a special shipper. Whether or not the agreement is unfair is to be decided after the agreement is made. If one will study the section carefully he will find that these are the words which control the possibility of a complainant making good his case:

Being the same goods as or similar goods to and being offered for carriage under substantially similar circumstances and conditions as the goods to which the agreed charge relates.

I submit it will be extremely difficult for a small shipper ever to demonstrate that he is prepared, although in competition with the big shipper, to ship goods under substantially similar circumstances and conditions as would the large shipper. For example, a large shipper may have outlets all over Canada. He makes an agreement with the railway company to carry all his freight, because that is the suggested excuse for this measure, that the railway can bargain to get all this shipper's freight and thus get away from their highway competitors some of the traffic the railways are now losing. So the shipper engages to ship all his freight over this line, and he gets in return a flat rate over different zones. Then the smaller shipper comes along. He perhaps serves only one section of the country. He is in direct competition with the large shipper so far as his goods are concerned, but he cannot show the same circumstances and conditions. The answer that will be made to him is obvious: You ship only a small quantity and operate only in a certain territory, while the large shipper ships all over Canada; therefore as the circumstances are not alike and the conditions are not similar you have no case. Yet, Mr. Chairman, the competition is there, and the small shipper will thus be more or less ruthlessly driven out of the market.

Mr. VIEN: Was it not made clear that the volume of traffic could not enter into the picture?

Mr. STEVENS: But that is not a question of volume; it is a question of distribution. Let me put another case. In eastern Canada there is a large factory manufacturing a certain class of goods and distributing them right across western Canada, or as far west as they can go. There is a small factory on the Pacific coast, in an entirely different section, shipping freight east into the prairie markets. Now this small shipper would have to show that he was handling his business under the same conditions and circumstances as the large shipper in eastern Canada. But there is no parallel at all. His territory is different; the direction of the movement of his goods is different, the rate is different. The man in the east gets a low rate, and thus gets a very definite advantage in the movement of his goods westward. The conditions might be reversed. But the point I am making is that it will be almost an impossibility to show substantially similar circumstances and conditions to obtain in connection with the distribution of goods.

Mr. VIEN: These words are already in the Railway Act.

Mr. STEVENS: No.

Mr. VIEN: The rate structure is predicated on similar circumstances and conditions, under the Railway Act.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, but when a rate is fixed under the Railway Act anybody who ships any quantity, large or small, over that route gets exactly the same rate. The tariff is there and it is open to everybody and at all times, but in this case it is not.

I will give another instance, where I think unfair discrimination might arise in the operation of this act. Suppose there are two different types of goods, each of which is interchangeable and in competition with the other. I have no particular commodity in mind, but there are many lines of goods for which an entirely different line may be used in substitution according to the desire or prejudice of the customer. One line of goods might get a special rate. The competing goods could not because they are not the same class of goods, but a different type of goods, although the two lines of goods are in competition. And so I might go on down the line, giving many illustrations of the grave danger in giving this power or right. The main answer that was given in the committee to arguments of this kind was that the board of transport would be a fair and just board and could be trusted to guard against any abuses being allowed to develop. I frankly admit that I believe in the board of transport, the board of railway commissioners as it now is. I believe it will be fair. I am not complaining about the board of transport. I am complaining about the law that will govern the board of transport as this law will. This law not only authorizes but instructs them to sanction or approve of agreements, and they have no option in the matter.

I am not going to labour the question further. I am going to move a clause in amendment to the whole section; and if, Mr. Chairman, I am in order, I can do it now, or if necessary I can wait until the end of the section is reached. Perhaps I had better move it now so it will be in the minds of the members of the committee when they are considering the section. I move to amend section 35 by the addition of this clause after subsection 10:

Notwithstanding anything aforesaid the provisions of this bill shall not apply with respect to the carriage of goods between points or places in Canada where such carriage is only performed by carriers subject to the authority of the board of transport commissioners, and the board of transport commissioners shall not approve any agreement submitted to them which includes such carriage in the agreement or as a condition attached thereto.

Briefly the explanation is this. If this part of the bill is required by the railways to enable them to compete with highway competition, then it should limit in its operation to places where that competition exists; and if that competition does not exist, the agreed charges should not apply. My amendment would limit it in that way.

The CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. member for Kootenay East that subsection 10 was carried yesterday.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, it can go after subsection 13.

The CHAIRMAN: Subsection 13 was carried yesterday.

Mr. STEVENS: It can go in after subsection 1, as far as that is concerned.

Mr. HOWE: It is just as appropriate there as anywhere, I think.

Mr. VIEN: I think I can summarize my hon. friend's argument under three headings. In the first place he urges that "similar circumstances and conditions" means that in some cases certain competitive shippers might find themselves embarrassed because goods might be different and the lines or directions of traffic might be different. Competitive shipping, competition between shippers, does not exist with respect to different types of goods. Under the Railway Act, the rate structure is predicated upon similarity of circumstances and conditions. There is no departure from that principle in this bill. The words used prohibit unfair or unjust discrimination when traffic is moving under similar circumstances and conditions. This is the very principle of the Railway Act. To be able to allege unjust or unfair discrimination you must show that traffic of a similar nature, moving in a similar direction, under similar circumstances and conditions, is being charged at an unfair rate. In this act, if different goods are moving in different directions, under different circumstances and conditions, namely by highway, how could unjust or unfair discrimination be alleged?

My hon. friend further alleges that "agreed charges," referred to in section 35, are a departure from the underlying principles of the Railway Act. I submit that that is not so. Under the Railway Act there are three different types of rates:

1. Standard mileage rates, which must be approved by the board. These rates are maximum rates. They cannot be exceeded; they must be submitted, approved and published. The board, after hearing, determines the maximum mileage rates permissible.

2. Special tariffs, applicable to lumber, grain or other commodities moving in large volume, in trainload lots, carload lots, with respect to which there are special loading or unloading conditions or certain market conditions which permit the particular commodity to be treated in a class by itself.

3. Competitive rates, which in their managerial discretion carriers may publish to retain traffic which would otherwise go to rail or water competitors. Competitive rates need not be approved by the board. They are under the level prescribed by the standard mileage rates, and they can be published, and put into effect unless complained of.

Mr. STEVENS: All shippers are upon an absolutely equitable basis.

Mr. VIEN: Exactly. Any shipper who contends that he is injuriously affected by competitive rates may make application to the board to object to their becoming effective, or for a revision or repeal of objectionable competitive rates.

In the exercise of its regulative power, the board never prevented a competitive rate from becoming effective without good reason. Competitive rates are permissible to enable rail carriers to retain traffic. In this act agreed rates are permitted to enable railway carriers to retain traffic which otherwise would go to their highway or water competitors.

Mr. BENNETT: They are under provincial regulation.

Mr. HOWE: Not as to rates.

An hon. MEMBER: Not in Quebec.

Mr. VIEN: I believe it is not so in almost all provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: They are regulated with respect to everything but rates, and may be regulated with respect to rates.

Mr. VIEN: In England they are regulated. Highway carriers must take out a licence to carry on their trade. In Canada they are not regulated in that respect. In England they are regulated with respect to vehicles; the vehicle must come up to special standards and is subject to periodical inspection. Furthermore, drivers must submit to periodical physical examinations. These are important regulations: licences to carry on, standard modes of conveyances, drivers physically and periodically examined and licensed. We have nothing of this kind in Canada.

Highway rates in England are governed by a rates tribunal; they come under the provisions of the transport act. We have no similar constitutional power in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: They regulate the weight of the machine that may cross certain bridges.

Mr. VIEN: That is with respect to road regulations. Departments controlling highways publish regulations to that effect. I do not believe they can be called as effective regulations between competitive carriers, as those proposed in this bill. Under the Railway Act, when competitive conditions exist between two points, between rail and water carriers, the rail carrier can publish competitive rates to retain traffic to his rails.

Mr. BENNETT: That is under the Railway Act.

Mr. VIEN: Under the Railway Act. This bill does not contain anything else. We allow rail carriers to publish rates likely to retain the traffic to their own rails.

Mr. STEVENS: That is scarcely right. They do not publish a rate. We allow them to make a private agreement with an individual shipper, and that is vastly different from publishing a rate.

Mr. VIEN: I hope to be able to prove to my hon. friend that there is no difference at all. The agreed rate is a competitive rate.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, no.

Mr. VIEN: I will at least attempt to prove it.

Mr. BENNETT: The latter words of subsection 1 of section 35 disprove what the hon. member says.

Mr. VIEN: No, I do not think so. Suppose a rate between points A and B, a rate of $1 per hundred pounds. If the rail carrier published a rate of 90 cents per hundred pounds, with a view to retaining traffic to its rails, the highway carrier would immediately publish a rate of 85 cents per hundred pounds. The rail carrier would then have to publish a rate of 80 cents to outbid him.

Mr. STEVENS: Under this they do not publish it at all.

Mr. VIEN: Let us not play upon words; if my hon. friend does not like the word "publish," let us say: "put into effect" a rate of 80 cents. This means a rate war, between the highway and the railway carriers. By agreed rates the rail carrier can go to a shipper and say to him, "If you will give me all your traffic, for such a period, I will give you such a rate." This is the proposed agreed rate. An agreement is entered into. It is a contract. No rate war is possible. If they agree, the shipper and the carrier are bound. Competitive rates are suicidal for both the highway and the rail carriers.

It therefore seems that there is no difference in principle between the Railway Act and this proposed legislation, because the Railway Act enables the rail carrier to publish competitive rates to retain its traffic; herein, to avoid a rate war, we propose to allow the rail carrier to enter into such agreements with the shipper as will oblige the latter to route his traffic by a particular rail route, without a cut-throat rate reduction. There is therefore no fundamental difference in the principle of competitive rates under the Railway Act and the principle underlying these agreed rates.

My hon. friend's third point was that it is improper to refuse the highway carrier the privilege of appearing before the board to complain against agreed rates. May I suggest that the highway carrier is not unjustly discriminated against. The highway carrier is not regulated. He cannot be compelled to come to the board. His rates are not submitted for approval. He therefore competes with the rail and water carrier without control or regulation. He enters into agreements with shippers, and the rail or water carriers have no say in the matter and no remedy.

I submit that the rail carrier should be given the right to enter into an agreement with his own shippers, without the interference of the highway carrier. If the highway carrier can establish an agreed rate in favour of a shipper, why should not the rail or water carrier be granted the same privilege? My submission is therefore that there is no departure from the underlying principles of the Railway Act. The only principle herein involved is that we allow carriers to come to an agreement with shippers so as to retain traffic which otherwise would go to uncontrolled and unregulated highway carriers.

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to refer a little further to what the hon. member (Mr. Vien) has just said about excluding the carrier from the right to appeal to the board. A shipper cannot appeal to the board unless that shipper has been shipping his goods by a carrier under the terms of this act. Take a shipper who is ten miles away from a railway terminal, and uses highway transport which competes with the railway. If an agreed charge is made with another shipper he would have no standing before the board, because the provision reads:

(6) Any shipper who considers that his business will be unjustly discriminated against if an agreed charge is approved and is made by the carrier, or that his business has been unjustly discriminated against as a result of the making of an agreed charge, may at any time apply to the board . . .

The general assumption is that that means any shipper. But turn to the definition of "shipper" and you find this:

"Shipper" means a person sending or receiving or desiring to send or receive goods by means of any carrier to whom this act applies.

That does not apply to a shipper who is not dealing with a carrier under this act. My point is that any citizen of Canada has a right to appear before any court in Canada, a court of law or a court of equity. That is one of the fundamental rights of a citizen. I cannot sanction a law which will in effect rule a man or a company out from appearing before the courts. Under this we simply blackball those engaged in the highway traffic business.

And we are not free from blame in this. This parliament has never occupied the field that it might have occupied in controlling interprovincial and international transport by motor truck. That is admittedly our field; why does not the Minister of Transport occupy it as far as he can? Recognizing that we cannot interfere with the provincial jurisdiction, let this parliament occupy that field as far as it can, and then give to the trucking system its inherent common law right, that of appearing before a court to argue its case. I object to the idea that a court can be set up in this country to which a citizen is denied access.

Mr. VIEN: A shipper and a highway carrier can establish an agreed rate. The rail carrier or any competitive shipper cannot challenge such a rate. Why should the highway carrier, or a shipper using the highway have the right to challenge an agreement between a rail carrier and a shipper using the rails?

Mr. STEVENS: The answer is very simple. In the one case there is no law which applies to the trucking system. If there is a law applying to the trucking system he can apply. The rail carrier and other forms of transport are covered by law, and it is the privilege of any person to appear before a court in this country and argue his case.

Mr. VIEN: But how can they claim the right to discuss a rail rate without allowing others the right to discuss their own rates?

Mr. STEVENS: That is simply because we have not found the machinery to control the trucks.

Mr. VIEN: We have no jurisdiction over highway traffic.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes, we have jurisdiction to control interprovincial traffic.

Mr. HOWE: This section was discussed quite extensively at the last sitting, and I have no desire, and I think hon. members would not wish me, to traverse the ground we covered yesterday. However I think something should be said about the point of restricting access to the board of transport commissioners in the matter of agreed charges. Any person can appear before the board of transport commissioners in the matter of agreed charges who is allowed to appear before any court in the land; in other words, he must show an interest in the matter being discussed. He is allowed to appear if he is a shipper or a prospective shipper, that is if he wishes to ship goods. He is allowed to appear if he receives goods by the carrier, or if he wishes to receive goods—is a prospective receiver of goods. He is allowed to appear if he is a carrier under the act. What other classes of persons than these could possibly have an interest in a matter affecting rates? I cannot imagine any other class of person who could come before the board and show an interest.

Then as to discrimination. A rate is applied after exhaustive hearings by the board. Anyone affected by the rate has two options. One is that he can have exactly the same contract if he is shipping under substantially the same circumstances; and I think the act makes it perfectly clear that the size of the shipment does not enter into the situation as far as the similarity of the service is concerned. That is safeguarded in several clauses. Then if the shipper is not in a position to take advantage of the contract, but believes the contract will injuriously affect his business, he is given opportunity to appear before the board and object to the contract on the ground that if made it will injuriously affect his business. When we consider all the latitude that the transport board will have, when we consider the composition of the board, which after all is, as the railway board is and has been, a board for the protection of the public, I can hardly imagine that these agreed charges can be used in a manner injurious to the public at large.

As to the amendment offered by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) it would of course be restrictive to a point which would make the operation of agreed charges practically worthless. Cutting away all the verbiage, it would be necessary before an agreed charge could take effect to show that the particular traffic is subject to truck competition. The amendment says "must be subject to competition other than by a carrier under the act." Bulk water carriers would hardly meet that requirement, since bulk carriers do not carry the class of goods which is regulated under the act. So it comes down to this, that the amendment would have the effect of prohibiting the making of agreed charges except for a particular route which is subject to truck competition. One sees at once that that would prevent the sending of goods from the eastern part of Canada to the west under agreed charges, for the reason that there are no highways through part of northern Ontario; therefore goods originating in the east could not move under agreed charges farther than central Ontario. Every movement of goods under agreed charges would have to be subject to the test as to whether truck competition could be proven. I suggest that the amendment offered by the hon. member for Kootenay East is a method of rendering this part ineffective, and I must oppose it.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, two days ago I pointed out what I conceive to be the dangers in the adoption of the principle of agreed charges, under the terms provided for by the bill as it now stands. I pointed out that the basis of the present law is equality as to tolls and facilities. I find that that is the heading of the section in the Railway Act —Equality as to Tolls and Facilities. The first subsection is headed "equal tolls to be charged"; the second, "no discrimination"; the third, "carload quantities"; the fourth, "localities"; the fifth, "duty of the board"; and the sixth, "competitive points". The sixth subsection reads:

> The board may declare that any places are competitive points within the meaning of this act.

Further it is pointed out in the Railway Act that no agreement can be made by which a railway company may give preference to any community or shipper. Certain well-defined classes of freight rates are also provided by the statute. As a matter of fact there are four: the standard tariff, the special tariff, the competitive tariff, and the joint tariff; with the addition of a special one which deals with exceptional circumstances such as bad crops and matters of that sort.

Then follows a provision with respect to how the tariffs come into operation, which I do not intend to discuss. The competitive tariff, as mentioned by the hon. member for Outremont, came into being for many reasons, principally, on this continent, because of water carriage.

Now, whatever may be said as to the justice or injustice of the law, or the desirability or undesirability of our Railway Act, I think everyone will agree that as a result of what took place in the United States prior to the passing of the Interstate Commerce Act, and in Canada prior to the inquiries that were set up by the late Mr. Blair, which resulted in the passing of the Railway Act, equal tolls were not charged to all persons, and preferences were given to individuals—sometimes because of the volume of the traffic, and sometimes for other reasons The difficulty that arose in the United States caused a great deal of friction, and, as I say, resulted in the statute to which I referred. The result of the statute in Canada was just what I read a moment ago as the heading of the section, namely, equality as to tolls and facilities. As I pointed out, tolls are covered by four different kinds of tariffs, in addition to the very special class which deals with exceptional circumstances which need not be mentioned here, and which has not been regarded by text writers as an additional classification.

We are to do away with that. We are to do away with the equality under the law which was the basis of our freight rate structure. The abuses which took place prior to the enactment of our Railway Act and the passage of the interstate commerce measure in the United States—all these are again to be possible, because there is no longer equality under the law with respect to freight rates. The minister says, or may say—and I judge from what he said the other day that he does say it—that it is no longer desirable to maintain that principle of equality under the law, and that agreed charges or charges that are agreed in contract rather than by parliamentary control shall prevail. An agreed charge is in essence a contractual charge. The present tariff toll is a statutory parliamentary charge, and until such time as under the existing law tolls are approved by the board they cannot recover a single cent. The law itself in terms declares that they cannot recover anything at all until such time as the tolls, whether they be one of the four classes I mentioned, any one of them, have been approved by the board.

Mr. VIEN: I think my right hon. friend is wrong.

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Mr. VIEN: That applies equally to the standard tariff.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. VIEN: The special rates and competitive rates enter into effect without the approval of the board.

Mr. HOWE: There is hardly a rate in practical effect that is specifically approved by the board.

Mr. BENNETT: They have to file them with the board. There is a provision that the filing of them with the board under certain conditions operates automatically as approval. That is what the former member of the railway commission desires to say.

Mr. VIEN: Implied approval.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is true; but that does not get away from the fact that in essence filing is essential in order that there may be objection, if desired.

Mr. VIEN: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the fair way of putting it.

Mr. VIEN: That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, the law contemplates equality of shippers under the conditions mentioned in the act, and that variations in the tariff rates under the four classifications provided, leaving out the special one, are open to action being taken, if any aggrieved person desires to take such action, after they are filed with the board. I think that is a fair statement of it.

Mr. VIEN: I think so.

Mr. BENNETT: That being so, we are certainly encroaching upon that rule—and nobody denies it. The only question therefore is this—

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): For good cause.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is the point.

Mr. VIEN: For good cause.

Mr. BENNETT: The whole question is a simple one: In the public interest are we warranted in departing from the rule which has been established during these years, and which resulted from the inquiry to which I directed attention the other day, and which I am not now going to repeat. That is the sole question—whether or not as a matter of high public policy we are warranted in departing from the existing law, which came into being because of abuses which existed before its application. That is the story, and I think no one will deny that it is a fair statement.

Mr. VIEN: But we are not departing from it.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Outremont says we are not departing from it. I only desire to point out that if the English language means anything we certainly are departing from it. Peradventure it does not mean what it says. But if it means we are departing from it, as my friend yonder says, for what good cause? I prefer to regard it as having been departed from, and I am not unmindful of the reasons which are given as to why it should be, and the force of those reasons. But to say the existing law is not departed from it is to do violence to one's understanding of the language. I will not do more than direct attention to these words:

Notwithstanding anything in the Railway Act—

And I have referred to the section in the Railway Act.

—or in this act—

The transport bill.

—a carrier—

And a carrier is defined by this measure as being a carrier to whom the act applies—I believe those are the exact words.

Mr. VIEN: By rail, water or air.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I just wished to have the exact words, and I find that—

"carrier" means any person engaged in the transport of goods or passengers for hire or reward to whom this act applies, and shall include any company which is subject to the Railway Act.

That is, it includes every company which is organized as a railway company by act of this parliament. That is fundamental.

We go a step farther and provide that the carrier, as thus defined—

—may make such charge or charges for the transport of the goods of any shipper or for the transport of any part of his goods as may be agreed between the carrier and that shipper.

Mr. HOWE: And approved by the board.

Mr. BENNETT: Just a minute. "As may be agreed to between the carrier and that shipper." Obviously that is contractual. That is, the carrier is authorized to make a contract with a shipper to carry his freight at any rate that may be agreed upon. But there is a limitation to that. That is the broad statement of the principle, but the limitation is:

Provided that any such agreed charge shall require the approval of the board—

Then there is the further provision:

—and the board shall not approve such charge if, in its opinion, the object to be secured by the making of the agreement can, having regard to all the circumstances, adequately be secured by means of a special or competitive tariff of tolls under the Railway Act or this act.

I hope the hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Vien) and the minister consider themselves as being answered. It states distinctly in the bill that you shall not use this provision unless you cannot attain your end under the present law. That is said so distinctly that it does not admit of any doubt.

Mr. HOWE: I always admitted that.

Mr. BENNETT: From what my hon. friend said this afternoon I gathered he thought differently. I felt that the hon. member for Outremont had not those words specifically in his mind. If under the existing law you can accomplish your end, then the matter will not be considered at all by the board. In other words, when you come to the board with your case, if it falls within the four corners of the Railway Act, the board must say, "You depart; we will have nothing to do with you on that basis under this act."

Mr. VIEN: That means that the competitive rates would degenerate into a rate war.

Mr. BENNETT: Talk of a rate war is quite beside the question. I hope my hon. friend will permit me to say that without being offensive. I think on reconsideration he will hardly admit the possibility of a rate war arising under the present law.

Mr. VIEN: The publication of a competitive rate might not have any particular effective result, because the highway carrier might publish a lower rate.

Mr. BENNETT: The highway carrier does not enter into this picture.

Mr. VIEN: He does.

Mr. BENNETT: You must keep in mind the fact that the highway carrier does not enter into this picture.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That is what the law was made for.

Mr. BENNETT: The point raised by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) was that we have not in any sense endeavoured to occupy that field. This legislation does not touch that. The minister nods his acquiescence. We are not in that field, and I ask my hon. friend to keep that in mind.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): We are not in that field because it is a constitutional field. We cannot go there.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: I hope my hon. friend does not conclude that I am suggesting that we should. This provision of the bill has given me much concern. It leaves it open to one of a group of carriers in a competitive territory to destroy the agreed rate.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): How is that?

Mr. BENNETT: Let me read the section:

—and provided further that when the transport is by rail from or to a competitive point or between competitive points on the lines of two or more carriers by rail the board shall not approve an agreed charge unless the competing carriers by rail join in making the agreed charge.

If one carrier holds out, there is no agreed charge.

Mr. HOWE: That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely my hon. friend did not mean that.

Mr. HOWE: That was not in the English act, but it is put in so that we would not contravene the provisions of the Canadian National-Canadian Pacific Act, which calls on the roads to cooperate. We do not wish to start rate competition between the two railways.

Mr. BENNETT: At Vancouver you would have the competition of the Great Northern, the Canadian National and the Canadian Pacific. If one of these three railroads does not agree to the agreed charge, then it is useless.

Mr. HOWE: Then you cannot have an agreed charge.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly. I point that out to my hon. friend from—I cannot think of his constituency.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): It is Laurier, a very nice name.

Mr. BENNETT: I assure my learned and hon. friend that he does great credit to it I do not think the minister intended to destroy the value of this statute or the value of the agreed charge at a competitive point by making it possible for one of a group of competitive carriers to stand out and make an agreed charge impossible. The interest of that competitive carrier might be very limited because of the territory which it serves, but it can make an agreed charge impossible. That is the situation as I see it. Is it a matter of practical wisdom and of high national policy to introduce a provision for agreed charges with those limitations? I am not unmindful of the effect that highway transport has had upon the traffic of the railways. All you have to do is to read the briefs which I am sure the minister received in this morning's mail.

Mr. HOWE: Lewis Duncan.

Mr. BENNETT: He certainly must be an eminent authority; for he has been considered by this government on more than one occasion as being well worthy of his hire.

Mr. VIEN: An eminent counsel.

Mr. BENNETT: My learned and hon. friend describes him as an eminent counsel. I assume that these briefs have been given the minute consideration that the minister thinks desirable. There is one saving provision in this bill, that is that it shall not come into force until proclaimed. If as a result of the investigation being carried on in Ontario in connection with highway traffic the minister is satisfied that it would not be in the national interest to proclaim it, I assume he will not do it. As it stands now, we are being asked to provide that a carrier and a shipper may make a contract for the transport of goods at a rate which encroaches upon the generally established rate of the country. It is further provided that that rate shall not be effective unless it is approved by the board, and further that it shall not be approved by the board if it is possible to secure the objective by other existing means. Lastly, it is provided that one of a group of carriers can destroy the contract by simply saying that he will not agree. I submit that that does not mean much. I first felt that the encroachment was very great, but after reading the limitations I felt it was very small. After reading the two together I feel it means nothing because it puts it in the hands of one of a group of competitors to destroy the agreement entirely; and I can conceive of such a situation being possible, although it might not be probable.

One thing further was said which I think on reflection the member for Kootenay East would regard as being too broad a statement. There is no right for anybody whose interests may be affected to be heard in a court of law unless he is a party to the transaction, and as we have not legislated with respect to the transport of goods on the highways such a carrier is not a party to the transaction and has no right to be heard in the court. Only recently in England in an important case in which a witness gave evidence and named half a dozen people in rather uncomplimentary terms it was suggested to the judge that these people had a right to be heard, but the judge decided that no witness has a right to be heard in a court of law if he is not a party to the transaction. The judge laid that down as the law. So my hon. friend's statement is too broad. This would be a correct statement of it, that you cannot deny to any party who has an interest in and is a party to the transaction the right to be heard in the courts. Every day decisions are made which affect the right of individuals who are not in the court but who are bound as a result of what has been decided in the court. The right of the truck owner to appear in the court is a right that does not attach unless he is brought into the court. The only people in the court here are the carriers under this act, and they are the only people who could be in the court unless we enlarge the field, which we have not done, in respect to highway traffic. Then the opportunity would be afforded for them to be heard.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, that on balance, with the limitations imposed, I cannot bring myself to think that it is sound to encroach upon the rule, which has behind it such a body of public opinion and of decisions as we have both in the United States and here. I pointed out the other day, and I am not going to do it again, the difference between conditions that prevail in Great Britain and here. They are so well defined that it is hardly necessary to do more than mention them for the differences to be at once appreciated. In England the field is divided into four strips of territory, if I might use that phrase; it is not very sound to institute a comparison between dissimilar things if you hope to arrive at any rule, and conditions in Great Britain and Canada are so dissimilar that I do not think you could arrive at any helpful conclusion by making the comparison. But knowing what I do of the history of the interstate commerce commission and of our own railway board, and knowing the time that was taken and the investigations that were made for the purpose of establishing the rule, I feel that we are taking a very great chance by providing for this encroachment upon that rule, which was a salutary one and worked out well, unless indeed at the same time we establish by adequate means jurisdiction over transport on the highway. Every province makes some regulations with respect to highway traffic. It is true that the regulations differ with the attitude of mind of the legislators of the nine provinces.

Mr. VIEN: And none applies to rates.

Mr. BENNETT: So far as I know, none applies to rates, but regulations have been applied as to the weight of the car, having regard to the safety of bridges, also with respect to the effect on the asphalt or the surface of the road itself. They have also exercised control in some of the western provinces to a very great degree, as, for instance, to those who might be licensed or regulated for the handling of traffic in a particular area. They went as far as that in one case, in a sparsely settled district in the far northern part of the country.

I think, Mr. Chairman, with the limitations as they read, the possibilities of the legislation being innocuous are very great. When the bill was first before the house and I read it, it had not that addition to the first part of section 35 which it now contains, but even with that I still think the minister is taking the proper course in providing that the act shall not go into effect until it is proclaimed, after he has satisfied himself by every means in his power as to just what will be involved if we make this encroachment upon a rule which I believe was salutary, which came into being because of great abuses, and a return to which we cannot as a Canadian people contemplate without realizing that the practices which prevailed before the interstate commerce commission or the railway commission came into being are not such as we can again tolerate in this country.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Chairman, I have very little comment to make, except to say that the provision referred to by my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) that the railways must act as a unit in making agreed charges is not a very serious curtailment. For many years the railway board has been the rate-making body for the railways, and it is the intention that it shall continue to be so. It is felt that it is not in the public interest for railways competing with each other to make special contracts, and the provision is there for that reason.

Amendment (Mr. Stevens) negatived.

Subsection 1 of section 35 agreed to.

On section 35, subsection 4—Board approval of agreed charge.

Mr. HOWE: Subsection 4 was allowed to stand for further examination. It has since been examined. It is an exact copy of the English act. The board of railway commissioners have been questioned regarding it, and it is felt that this is a desirable clause to have, taking into consideration the actual machinery of the board.

Mr. BENNETT: It defines the discretionary powers of the board within which they may grant their consent.

Mr. HOWE: Quite.

Subsection agreed to.

Section 35 agreed to.

[Mr. Bennett.]

On section 37—Rights preserved. R.S., c. 79 Crowsnest Pass agreement.

Mr. HOWE: The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) objected that the wording "or by chapter five of the statutes of 1897," which was the original Crowsnest Pass agreement, was not comprehensive enough to cover extensions of the Crowsnest Pass agreement since that time. I contend, and our solicitors contend, that the reference to the Crowsnest Pass agreement has no point in this act, because nothing in this act can possibly violate its provisions. But in order to meet the objection raised I will ask my colleague the Minister of Public Works to move that clause 37 be amended by striking out the words "or by chapter five of the statutes of 1897", in line 8 and substituting therefor the following words:

or by paragraph (e) of section 1 of chapter 5 of the statutes of Canada 1897, as extended and saved by subsection 5 of section 325 of the Railway Act.

Mr. CARDIN: I move accordingly.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the minister did not draft that. It is the first time I have ever seen salvation provided for by act of parliament. Had not the minister better say "preserved"? "Extended and preserved" would be better than "extended and saved".

Mr. HOWE: If the chairman will make that change, it is all right with me.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment is: that the word "saved" be deleted and the word "preserved" substituted therefor.

Mr. HOWE: "Preserved" as in strawberry jam.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, that is what it is intended for in some quarters.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

TURNER VALLEY OIL FIELDS: PROPOSED DUMPING DUTY ON MONTANA CRUDE—GERHARD NATURALIZATION CERTIFICATE—STATEMENT OF MR. BENNETT

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I desire to bring to the attention of the house before we proceed with supply a matter of some considerable importance to the part of the country in which I live.

The development of the oil fields of southern Alberta has proceeded very slowly. It is thirty-three years ago this fall since I organized a company for the purpose of searching for natural gas and oil in what has since become the Turner valley field. We made a discovery of what was known as crude naphtha and of large quantities of natural gas in which naphtha was held in suspension in globules, and it proved to be very valuable from the standpoint not only of the gas being used for illuminating and domestic purposes in Calgary and other communities, but also of the resultant oil which was taken by a process of refining, under which process the naphtha held in suspension was utilized. There have been continued borings and drillings in that area until at last large quantities of crude petroleum have been discovered at a depth in some instances of ten thousand feet or more. Anyone who has had to do with the drilling of a hole two miles into the earth's crust must realize something of the difficulties that have to be overcome and the risks incidental to the work, apart altogether from the cost, and will perhaps understand why so many years have passed since the first effort was made.

The discoveries that have been now made establish beyond question the fact that we have there an extremely valuable oil field. A very large number of oil wells have been sunk in that field. The so-called Turner valley has a width of approximately one mile; the length of field is at least sixteen miles, and perhaps a good deal more. During the last eighteen months or two years wells of increasing importance have been brought into production; wells have been drilled with a production of three and four thousand barrels of crude petroleum per day. But obviously, as is the case with many things we have in western Canada, we are confronted with great difficulties. The immediate market provided by a few people is of course limited. To lift crude oil over the Rocky mountains by means of a pipe line is a highly expensive process, if not an impossible one. It is not difficult to contemplate a pipe line of sufficient length to carry crude petroleum from the Turner valley oil fields to tidewater in British Columbia. Inasmuch, however, as the Turner valley is about half a mile in altitude, and the point in the Rockies over which it would be necessary to pass, unless one went south or north a great distance, is nearly a mile above sea level, it follows that the crude petroleum would have to be lifted—and I used the word "lift" advisedly—nearly half a mile, which is almost prohibitive from the standpoint of mere cost.

Then the question arises as to the market in eastern Canada, where the population is. To carry crude oil from Turney valley east to Fort William would involve the expenditure of many millions of dollars, and it would also involve a pipe line which would constantly have within it perhaps a million barrels of oil. That is a tremendous quantity. A pipe line of sufficient diameter and of the required length from Turner valley to Fort William therefore means the rendering unsalable for a time of a very large quantity of oil. When you reach the head of the lakes your troubles have only then begun, because the refineries in the east are to be found at Halifax, Montreal, Toronto and in other communities.

Mr. DUNNING: Sarnia.

Mr. BENNETT: The very large one at Sarnia is served by pipe line from the mid-continent field. Under the circumstances I think it is apparent to those who have been operating in western Canada in the Turner valley that they cannot hope, for instance, to displace crude oil coming from Colombia, Venezuela or Peru. That crude oil coming from those points is waterborne. It comes to Halifax, Montreal, Vancouver; and wherever you have waterborne crude oil it is quite obvious that we could not hope, from an inland community like Turner valley, to ship our oil to compete with these importations. But there is what is known as the mid-continent field, and that extends north as far as Montana. It was because we could never be convinced that the forty-ninth parallel shut off oil discoveries that there was continued prospecting in the hope of one day getting oil in volume, because just south of us at Montana there has been a large field of oil which has been constantly operated during the last few years and which has supplied a substantial quantity of crude that has come into Canada. That is not carried in by pipe line. It is brought in by trucks and tank cars. The average truck carries something like forty barrels. The largest shipment that came to our country in any recent day from the Montana fields was ninety-five truckloads on May 23 last—that is last month—but the average, as I understand, has been something like thirty-five trucks per day. Since the discovery of crude in large quantities at Turner valley, there has been a constant reduction in the price at which Montana crude has been offered in western Canada.

The price last week at which crude was being offered was as low as 80 cents per barrel, and contracts might have been made at a lower rate. In view of the fact that such importation limits to just that extent the use to which Turner valley crude can be put, those who are deeply concerned about the future of the industry in which they have invested their savings are strongly of the opinion that a dumping duty should be placed upon that product imported from Montana.

I am pointing out that there is no pipe line that conveys it across the country; it comes across in trucks. In the month of April last this country imported 51,523,000 gallons of crude oil.

Mr. DUNNING: That is, all told.

Mr. BENNETT: Of that quantity, 37,635,000 gallons came from the United States; 6,924,000 from Colombia; 3,793,000 from Venezuela; and 3,748,000 from Peru.

Mr. HOWARD: But it does not say how much came from Montana.

Mr. BENNETT: I said from the United States, and Montana is a part of the United States. I said that the average quantity of Montana oil imported per day was thirty-five truckloads, that a truck carried forty barrels, and that the largest shipment of trucks had been ninety-five on May 23 last. The statistical record is not complete with respect to the rest of it, but I am making that statement in order to direct attention to the volume that is coming into this country from the United States, and I wish to follow that with this statement: It is not suggested at the moment that Turner valley is capable of satisfying all the requirements for crude oil of the Dominion of Canada; for roughly the daily requirements of crude oil in Canada are about 110,000 barrels, but apparently it is within sight, for during the present year, if the wells now under drilling are completed and produce as do existing wells, we shall in that valley be taking out of the earth 100,000 barrels of oil a day, if a market can be secured. The fact that the market is not available necessitates pro-rating, as it is called, the production from the wells; and inasmuch as there is no pipe line and only rail transport at the present moment to carry crude east, it follows that there has been, as additional wells have come into existence, a reduction in the quantity taken from each. That is the net result of pro-rating the production. The more wells, the less the quantity to be taken per day from each to supply the requirements.

Recently the wells owned by those who have expended substantial sums of money on them have come into production, with the result that the pro-rating as provided for by regulation of Alberta has reduced the quantity taken from each, and the company that has a large number of wells is, of course, still producing in substantial volume, although each well is on the same relative pro rata basis. The request with respect to dumping duty arises out of the circumstances to which I have alluded; but the request that a duty be imposed upon the raw product is the complement of what I have just said with respect to pro-rating the output of those wells. And before the budget is delivered I am directing the attention of the government to these circumstances in order that, if it is thought well in the public interest, some action may be taken along the lines I have suggested.

But I want to go a step further. Some time ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) referred the matter to the tariff board and the board went west and made investigations. So fas as is known, the tariff board has made no report, and some of the Canadians who have been operating in that valley are very resentful that no action is being taken, and have expressed themselves in rather strong language. For instance, they refer to us in this parliament in terms which I hope will not be regarded as highly offensive:

> The Canadian tariff board "investigates" the Turner valley situation and adjourns forever. In Ottawa 245 costly politicians talk for five months and accomplish nothing.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): That is from an Alberta newspaper.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is an extract from an editoral in The Albertan.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Sent to every member of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not know that; I thank my hon. friend. That shortens the need for my observations, because I see that my learned and hon. friend has already read it.

Mr. DUNNING: It was sent to every hon. member.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the hon. member just observed that it was sent to every hon. member. That of course does not in any sense lessen its value.

Mr. DUNNING: No, it would be impossible to lessen its value.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I do not look upon the matter in just that way.

Mr. DUNNING: That kind of comment I do.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not so sure that having regard to my observation of the government of this country for the last five months one is not warranted in making that statement.

Mr. DUNNING: It says that 245 members of parliament talk too much. My right hon. friend is one of them.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course he is. But it rests with the government of the day to take the initiative. It is their job to see that something is done, for they only can expend money.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is too much talking.

Mr. BENNETT: They alone can take steps in regard to the tariff. They are the only ones who can deal with a dumping duty; they only can deal with unemployment, they only can deal with relief. What have they done?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Listened to speeches.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, they have been poor listeners; for the Prime Minister has not been in this house an average of an hour and a half a day since the session opened.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is not fair.

Mr. BENNETT: It is as fair as it was to say it about me when I was Prime Minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The Prime Minister is tired and has not been well for a few days. I do not think this remark was called for. We did not do the same to my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: You did not? Read the record. Day after day, week after week you referred to the fact that I was not in my place, because I was working long hours on work that I had to do. Now I say that the Prime Minister has not been in his place in this parliament on the average an hour and a half a day since it opened. Let there be no misunderstanding. Hon. members may have had to listen to speeches, and what is more, they may have to listen to more. One thing is perfectly clear, we have been here for five months and done nothing for the public good.

An hon. MEMBER: You have talked a lot.

Mr. BENNETT: What else was there to do? What was the government doing? It was the duty of the government to produce its program.

Mr. CHEVRIER: I am sure your government would satisfy the hungry people.

Mr. BENNETT: Do not let us talk about hunger. Just think of it! One hon. member, not here, saying that if you be hungry in Saskatchewan do not think of voting for this government. Do not think of voting for this government. If you be hungry think what will happen if you do not vote for the Patterson government. That is what the hon. member for Regina, (Mr. McNiven) has been stating to the people of this country, according to the public press. And the resources of civilization seem to be in striking evidence in various sections of that fair province.

Mr. VIEN: I recall a statement, "I shall cure unemployment or perish in the attempt."

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the hon. member may regard that as a clever observation. The employment that existed at the time we came into office vanished but was replaced by increased unemployment; what is more, we did perish in the attempt, and that is what will happen to this administration. No one ever heard a single regret expressed by me at any action the electors might take with respect to it. That was not the statement that was made; it has to be taken with the context that surrounded it. If hon. members will read what was said before 1935, if they will look at the hoardings, look at the picture of the nine provinces, if they look at the unity of then and now they will understand something about conditions. Look at Canada today, the federal power in Vancouver a joke; the fact held up to the eyes of all the world that the dominion's own property cannot be safeguarded by the Canadian people. You find that Alberta is now conducting the affairs of the nation. There is no national government; it is just what each province says.

Mr. BLAIR: Has this any connection with the dumping duty on oil?

Mr. KINLEY: Nova Scotia is still sane.

Mr. BENNETT: Now, I have been diverted from my theme. I was pointing out that the tariff board was considering this question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Pour some oil on the troubled waters.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but remember that the products of oil are highly inflammable. A spark sometimes ignites them, and even the vapour is a source of large quantities of power.

Mr. McIVOR: Louder.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh well, it is unimportant that my hon. friend should hear me.

Mr. McIVOR: I always like to hear the leader of the opposition because mostly he speaks sound common sense.

Mr. BENNETT: I was pointing out that the tariff board had had this matter under consideration and investigation. What I want to know is whether or not some steps can be taken without delay to ensure that this hard-won product may be utilized in this country by Canadians instead of importations being continued within the area served by this field. I am not foolish enough to suggest that Turner valley oil can serve the wants of Halifax, or even of Vancouver at the moment, but I am suggesting that this tariff board could make a report without delay, and that the government, before the budget is brought down, can deal adequately with it.

On another occasion it may be necessary for me to make some observations with respect to another aspect of the matter, but at the moment I content myself—not expecting that the government is going to announce a remedy at the moment; far from it—with saying that before the budget is delivered the government have the fullest possible opportunity for determining what action should be taken. Because it must be remembered that petroleum is one of the greatest producers of new wealth in a country. As soon as a well is in production new wealth becomes available. You do not have to wait three or four years as with the growing of cattle or sheep; you get your new wealth at once. It is for that reason that I direct the attention of the government to this matter, in the very earnest hope that they will take steps to remedy the situation, in order that the market which is available in that area—a very limited one, I am quite frank about it—may become available for Canadian products.

One step further. It must be in the mind of the government that we had on the statutes of Canada for I think a quarter of a century an act providing for giving a bonus for the production of petroleum. I dare say there are many hon. members who have forgotten that entirely. If that provision were in force today it would involve the payment of very large sums of money. It was repealed because it was thought that the country could not stand the strain if large quantities of oil were discovered, but it was utilized for many years in Ontario. Now they do not ask a bonus, but they ask for assistance if need be in transport. I happen to know that the railway companies are giving the matter consideration, to see whether they cannot get the traffic rather than involve the country and the companies in the construction of pipe lines. It is for that reason that I have ventured, before we proceed with supply, to bring this matter to the attention of the house, although I may possibly do so at greater length on another occasion.

One other matter I wish to speak of, and that is to direct the attention of the Secretary of State (Mr. Rinfret) to what I conceive to be the very urgent necessity of appointing a commissioner under the Naturalization Act to investigate the activities of Mr. Gerhard. I have received a detailed report from Edmonton, and from another section of this country within the last few days; I do not desire to prejudge in any sense the case of any person, but I do think that on the evidence that can be established, for him to have a certificate of naturalization as a British subject at the present time does violence, and great violence indeed, to my understanding of the requisites of British citizenship.

I shall be glad to place in the possession of the Secretary of State details of evidence which have come to me and which will enable him, I believe, if he will be good enough to appoint a commissioner without delay, to make an investigation which will satisfy him that the outstanding certificate of naturalization should be cancelled without further delay. I say that this action should be taken if the evidence proves to be in accordance with the information which I have.

I desire to make it abundantly clear that I have no wish to prejudge anyone's case or to make any declaration as to the value to be attached to the evidence in question.

Mr. A. H. MITCHELL (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, I have tremendous respect and deep regard for the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), but I shall have to disagree with him. I am sorry I had not known the matter was to be discussed, and also sorry that for a few moments the discussion turned into a political sabre fight, which got us exactly nowhere. I do know that many hundreds, perhaps thousands, of farmers between Lethbridge and Medicine Hat and the international boundary have tractors equipped to use Montana crude oil. It is a type of crude oil which can be burned directly in tractors, whereas the crude which in the past has been produced in the Turner valley has not been a type as easily consumed or as economically used. I know that many farmers in southern Alberta are using Montana crude oil, which they bring in at a cheap rate.

They haul it in off seasons of the year, and store it in concrete storage tanks below the ground. That would account for the importation of thousands of barrels to which the right hon. gentleman referred.

While it may be considered that opposition by the farmers to a dumping duty, for the reasons put forward by the leader of the opposition, would be selfish, I suggest that their particular case should be adequately presented to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and the government before any steps are taken. Furthermore, I am sure the Minister of Finance will agree with me when I say that while the dumping duty need not generally raise the price of crude oil or fuel in the west, past history and experience would tell us that it likely would have that effect. Goodness knows that gasoline and all other fuel products in western Canada, where there is an abundance of raw products, are selling at unconscionably high prices, for no really good reason. If we impose a duty to overcome the pro-ration in the Turney valley, or to offset the effect of the small importations by trucks, I believe, without having made a thorough study of the matter, that much more harm than good would be done, and I hope the government will keep that phase of the matter firmly in mind before making any change of the kind suggested by the right hon. member.

Mr. HARRY LEADER (Portage la Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I feel that I must add my word of protest against the suggestion of the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) when he asks that a dumping duty be imposed on crude oil entering Canada. I oppose the suggestion because I believe such action would increase the price of crude oil in Canada. I have the further reason that only recently in the city of Portage la Prairie a cooperative oil refining plant has been built, and I believe I am right in saying that such a tariff change would increase the difficulty of that cooperative. They would have to pay more for their raw materials.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not suggesting that they pay more.

Mr. LEADER: Perhaps not, but I believe from experience we can safely say that a dumping duty would have that effect. I raise my voice in order to make sure that in connection with any question of this kind the crude oil requirements of the cooperative refineries shall be considered before any dumping duty is imposed.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had no advance notice of this matter being raised, and therefore I have to speak entirely from memory with regard to it.

Mr. BENNETT: No motion has been moved.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not criticizing anyone, but am merely excusing myself if any statement I may make should be incomplete. I will endeavour to be sure that it will not be inaccurate.

With regard to charging the government with inaction in the matter, I do not think any of the producers in the Turner valley will join in such a charge. When last year the new production of the Turner valley first became certain the problems apparently arising in connection with that production were brought to the attention of the government by the producers' association in the Turner valley. They asked a thorough investigation into a situation which would be created by the development of a heavily producing oil field in Alberta.

There was a question as to what body available to the government would be best suited to conduct such an investigation. Obviously transportation questions were involved, but transportation questions were not by any means the whole problem. Problems of marketing were involved, but they did not constitute the whole problem. It seemed that there might conceivably be a tariff aspect to the problem. Personally I regard the tariff aspect as relatively unimportant in relation to the problem presented by the increased production in the Turner valley. I am willing to be convinced from evidence that my view in that regard is wrong, but that was the view I held when the parties concerned came to the government to discuss the matter.

In any event the government decided that in view of all the circumstances the tariff board was the body best fitted to look into the matter, partly because of the mass of information which was available to the tariff board as a result of its previous investigation of the tariff on gasoline and oil products generally, and partly because in Judge Sedgewick we knew we had a man who would use that information in order to extract everything possible on the subject which might be of service to the interested parties.

The inquiry proceeded. I think everyone connected with it will agree that although no report has been made, the results of the inquiry have been distinctly beneficial to those concerned. As a result of the inquiry as far as it proceeded negotiations have occurred between the producers and the railways and between the producers and the oil refiners which have materially improved conditions. The improvement has not been sufficient to eliminate the problem. I do not claim that for a moment; but there came a time in the progress of the investigation when it became apparent that the important thing to learn was: What is the potential volume of production from the Turner valley wells? If my memory serves me aright, in the early months of this year the Alberta government indicated that they were making a further test of potential production, but the hearings had reached the point where the independent producers' association requested the board to adjourn sine die. Those words have a bearing on the editorial that was read. The unfairness of the editorial is indicated by the fact that the adjournment of the hearings was at the request of the parties principally interested, the parties for whom my right hon. friend was so ostensibly speaking.

Mr. BENNETT: What does the minister mean by "ostensibly"?

Mr. DUNNING: I assume my right hon. friend was trying to help the producers. In his effort to help them he quoted an interview alleged to have taken place with one of them and blaming this government for killing off the inquiry, or putting it to sleep, which I think were the words used.

Mr. BENNETT: I read only four lines of the editorial.

Mr. DUNNING: Four lines did sufficient damage to the government for my right hon. friend's purpose.

Mr. BENNETT: That was not my purpose at all.

Mr. DUNNING: Having accomplished that—

Mr. BENNETT: I am going to raise a point of order at once. That is a misstatement of what I said. It is a habit the hon. gentleman is learning. I did not make the statement he attributes to me.

Mr. DUNNING: What is the statement?

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend states that I read the editorial for the purpose of injuring the government. I read five lines from the editorial which referred to the whole 245 members, as the hon. member has pointed out. The hon. member starts off by saying "ostensibly." If he is going to repeat what I said, he should give the words I used or their meaning, and not put another construction upon them.

Mr. DUNNING: If I am to profit in connection with that sort of thing from the instructions I am constantly receiving from my right hon. friend, I doubt whether it is a matter of congratulation so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman must realize that that is offensive. The other day he used a word which was offensive and he withdrew it at once.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly.

Mr. BENNETT: He is doing the same thing now, only worse. I recommend that he make himself a little more familiar with the rules which state that motives cannot be assigned to members. He says that I have been giving him instructions as to how to break the rules—

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the sense of his statement. It means that or nothing.

Mr. DUNNING: Mr. Speaker, I am in your judgment. I said no such thing.

Mr. BENNETT: What did the hon. gentleman say?

Mr. DUNNING: May I continue?

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister keep within the rules I shall not intervene. If he keep within the rules, he need have no fear of my objecting to his doing so.

Mr. DUNNING: I have sat here and smiled when my right hon. friend has seen fit to break the rules in his references to all and sundry, and I did not try to throw him off his argument.

Mr. BENNETT: Such virtue!

Mr. DUNNING: The hearings of the tariff board were postponed indefinitely at the request of the producers of the Turner valley speaking as an organized body. Within the last two weeks the results of the tests of the potential production of existing wells have become available. I am speaking from memory, but I believe I am correct when I say that the potential production of the existing wells is 37,000 barrels a day. At the time the hearings were postponed it was known that the consumption within that area of Canada which could be economically served from the Turner valley was approximately 15,000 barrels a day. The then known excess potential production over the 15,000 barrel consumption was not sufficient warrant, in the opinion of the producers, for the tariff board to continue investigating the matter with any hope of producing a constructive suggestion.

The situation has now changed. Within the last two weeks it has become apparent that 37,000 barrels a day is the potential of the existing wells. My right hon. friend speaks of other wells which are in the process of development and which will raise that potential to about 100,000 barrels a day.

Mr. BENNETT: I said it was believed that if they maintained the same rate of development, by the end of the year they would be getting 100,000 barrels a day.

Mr. DUNNING: May I point out that in connection with this increased volume of production this parliament and this government do not control the extent to which the Turner valley field shall be developed. This government and this parliament cannot determine whether the Turner valley shall be permitted to produce 37,000 barrels, 50,000 barrels or 100,000 barrels a day. That power and that right are in the legislature and the government of Alberta. We have for the first time in Canada the problem which has been the most difficult one that the oil producing industry in the United States has had to contend with during the past number of years. In every one of the oil producing states it has been a matter of serious difficulty, first, to control the degree of development in order to prevent every one from being flooded with oil which could not be sold at a satisfactory price and, second, to pro-rate the existing wells at a point which would be fair to everyone. For the information of hon. members from other parts of Canada, may I point out again that the control of the rate of production is in the province of Alberta, not in this parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: And is being exercised.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend says that it is being exercised. I believe there are measures in effect in Alberta looking to that control. Looking for oil is so indefinite, so far as results are concerned, that when control measures become necessary, they are seldom effective. That has been the history of the oil fields in the south. During the last two weeks Mr. Frawley, an official of the attorney general's department of the Alberta government, and who, I believe, represented the government during the tariff board inquiry, has been in communication with the chairman of the board with respect to the new development. The producers' organization has also been in communication with the board with respect to the new development. The last advice I received was that the producers' organization was meeting to-day in Calgary in order to determine what further steps it would be wise to take, having regard to the fact that the inquiry was adjourned on their own request just a short time ago.

Mr. BENNETT: A short time ago?

Mr. DUNNING: Not very long. I have not the date in mind, but speaking from memory, I believe it was two or three months ago. I give this information to the house for the purpose of indicating that the government is alive to the fact that there is a real problem in connection with the development of an extensive oil field in that part of Canada, the capacity of which to consume oil is readily ascertainable as being considerably below the potential productive capacity of the wells now being developed. I hardly think it is fair, however, to lay at the door of this parliament the responsibility for finding a market for an unlimited quantity of oil produced under conditions of geographical difficulty so far as its distribution is concerned. In that connection I would point out that it is not a question of losing the oil because it is not taken out of the ground to-day or to-morrow. It is merely a question of so organizing as to enable that wealth to flow into consumption at a rate which will best serve the interests of both the producers and the consumers of that wealth. The oil does not disappear because it is left in the ground. If it is not taken out to-day, it is still there to-morrow. I do not think anyone who has studied the Alberta oil formation will assume that it is at all likely that oil is being drained from the Turner Valley formation into any other formation which would permit it to be taken out of the ground, for instance, in a foreign country. There is no evidence of that.

The question then is merely one of how fast shall the oil be taken out of that reservoir which is in the Turner Valley. Those people who have drilled wells and put their savings into them, as my right hon. friend has suggested, are certainly entitled to and ought to have consideration because the adventuring of savings in the great enterprise of digging holes two miles into the ground without knowing whether or not you are going to get anything out is something we need to encourage in Canada. But I submit seriously that we should not put this question upon the ground of the national necessity of finding a market for an unlimited production of oil.

Mr. BENNETT: I was very careful to say that.

Mr. DUNNING: It is far better, as geological knowledge advances and as we get a better idea of how much oil is in that great pool in the Turner Valley, that we or the government of Alberta, or possibly both of us, should carefully consider measures to conserve the production of oil in that field on such a basis that the daily production will ensure its continuing to serve economically the people of those parts of Canada which can be served by it to the very best advantage.

In the meantime we have the problem of dealing with the present production. I do not believe that my right hon. friend's suggestion of a dumping duty with respect to that small quantity of oil which is coming in from Montana would have a hairbreadth of influence with respect to this great problem involved in a production of 37,000 barrels a day, which may possibly rise, as he himself says, to 100,000 barrels a day. I have no knowledge of the precise quantities that come over the Alberta border from Montana. The hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Mitchell) spoke of the effect of a dumping duty on the farmers who use the oil. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) spoke of another phase of the same matter. These factors must all be taken into consideration. But I do not believe that a dumping duty is a solution, although certainly the tariff board must take into account in their inquiry the effect on our national well-being of what is happening in the way of oil coming over in truckloads from Montana, and I feel sure that due regard will be given by the board to what the facts in the case reveal in that regard.

The question seems to me to be one of whether Canada can find some means of transporting oil over what are known to be uneconomic distances in order to find a market. The question is: Is it better to hold down present production in Alberta and thus continue the life of that oil field over a longer period of time, or is it the better course to enter into some artificially assisted means of getting the oil into a wider market than is at present economically available to it? I know I am merely posing the problem; I am not suggesting an answer to it, nor did my right hon. friend do so. I believe he put forward the dumping duty not as a serious answer to the problem, but just as one of the incidental features of it. I think he will agree, after hearing what has happened in connection with the matter, that the government has moved as reasonably as was possible under the circumstances; that the machinery provided for investigating this matter is the best that is available, and that the investigation is proceeding in a normal and reasonable manner to accomplish the end in view.

CLAIMS OF GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY PREFERENCE SHAREHOLDERS—STATEMENT OF MR. STEVENS

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I advised the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) last week that to-day I intended to bring to the attention of the house a matter which, I consider, deserves close thought and careful consideration. I may not be able, within the forty minutes which will be my limit, to cover fully what I wish to say. I may point out now that I have in my hand an amendment, which I do not wish to move because what I shall have to say is in no sense an attack on the government nor does it involve a question of want of confidence, so I shall content myself, Mr. Speaker, with notifying you that I have an amendment to move, if it is necessary, in completing the remarks which I desire to make.

The subject I propose to introduce to-day definitely in my opinion affects the good faith of Canada. It will be recalled that a couple of months ago the Minister of Finance made a very important speech in which he emphasized the desirability of the Dominion of Canada keeping faith in the matter of its contractual obligations not only with persons resident in Canada but more particularly with those resident outside this country, and I recall that his remarks on that occasion met with a general expression of approval by hon. members then in the house. I do not intend this afternoon to make a legal argument; I make no pretence of being qualified to do so, but it will be necessary for me to refer to some statutes dating back a considerable time. Rather I propose to make an appeal for equitable and just treatment based on the facts and as a contractual right.

The subject to which I refer is the claims of the first and second preference stockholders of the Grand Trunk Railway. It is an appeal to parliament for just and equitable treatment. I want to make it clear that I am not directing criticism or blame against any one. I am particularly anxious that what I have to say shall be received sympathetically by the ministry and considered by them—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): May I ask my hon. friend whether he is aware that this matter is still before the courts?

Mr. STEVENS: I am not aware of its being before the courts in a way that would make it improper for me to present a case here.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If my hon. friend will permit me, there was a case that went to the privy council, and judgment was delivered by the privy council a year or so ago.

Mr. BENNETT: The Lovibond case.

Mr. STEVENS: That is settled.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No; dismissing part of the action relating to the Attorney General of Canada, and the declarations that the Grand Trunk Railway acquisition stock was involved, and that the orders in council which were adopted by the governor in council subsequently were also of no value. The privy council decided that the matter should have gone there only by way of a petition of right. But they sent back the record to the Ontario courts on the question of damages which those shareholders might suffer by reason of the fact that their names have been removed from the register as owners of those shares, and the question of invalidity of the statute and the orders in council necessarily still arises in the procedure. The case is still pending, and is fixed for hearing for September next.

Mr. BENNETT: On the question of damages.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): On the question of damages, because the declaration of the invalidity could not be pronounced against the Attorney General of Canada because there was no petition of right, no fiat. I believe, however, that the country is interested because the Canadian National railway, which is the party in the litigation with those shareholders, is the people of Canada, and the matter of the validity of the statutes and the orders in council is questioned before the courts; so I really do not think this could be discussed while the case is pending.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. STEVENS: Of course, Mr. Speaker, I shall bow to your ruling immediately it is given, but before the ruling is given I should like to make a plea in this connection. I am not going to discuss the matter; I am going to make merely one or two little references. Several times it has been desired that this case should be brought up, and each time we have been confronted with the contention that the matter was before the courts. I had the impression that the case to which the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) referred had been sufficiently dealt with to clear the way for a discussion in the house. However, the minister has raised his point, and of course if you rule that I am not privileged to proceed I shall have to bow to that ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other member wish to speak to the point of order? The point raised by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is, I think, well taken. Under standing order 41 in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, citation 293, it is declared that:

—a member, while speaking, must not . . . refer to any matter on which a judicial decision is pending.

Reference is made to page 323 of May, thirteenth edition. I think the Minister of Justice has pointed out clearly that this matter is before the courts at the present time. Therefore I hold that the hon. member is not within the rules of the house in carrying on a discussion of this matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course my hon. friend will be able to proceed with this when the final decision is reached overseas. Meanwhile I shall be pleased if he will send me a brief or any memorandum covering the points which he desires to submit.

Mr. STEVENS: I should be pleased if the government would allow me to send them in that form what I wish to say on the subject. I have no desire to disturb or embarrass the government in any way in this matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I quite understand.

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): I do not wish to take part in this debate, but I want to make a very short observation in reply to some remarks which have been made by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) during the course of his speech. He has alluded again to the case of one Karl Rudolf Gerhard, naturalized by the Department of State in 1938, and the activities of a Mr. Karl Gerhard, to whom the press has recently referred. Whether there are one or two persons of that name, and if there are two, to whom should be attributed some of these activities, I must admit is not quite clear, either to the leader of the opposition or to myself. I gave the other day particulars of the naturalization which was granted to Mr. Karl Rudolf Gerhard in 1938 and indicated what we knew of his residence in Canada during these last years. The press has also alluded to a Mr. Emil Karl Gerhardt, and denials have been exchanged between Mr. Karl Rudolf Gerhard and another gentleman as to the activities of Mr. Gerhard; and I will admit that the situation has got to the point where it requires to be a little bit clarified. I may say that my department is now considering this matter, and I shall not fail to take into account the remarks made this afternoon by the leader of the opposition as to the inquiry that should take place in this case.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Chief engineer's branch—construction, repairs and improvements—harbours and rivers—New Brunswick—

Under contract—
Grand Anse—dredging, $7,500.

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works): I understand it is the desire of the committee that we proceed item by item instead of taking the vote as a whole. The first item is this amount of $7,500, including a revote of $4,800, required to complete the dredging under contract with the Maritime Dredging and Supply Company. This dredging is intended to dispose of the filling that has taken place there, with a view of providing better accommodation for the fishing fleet in the harbour of Grande Anse. Dredging was started last year but was stopped on November 20, owing to adverse weather conditions.

Item agreed to.

Caissie's cape—breakwater repairs and improvements, $17,000.

Mr. CARDIN: This is for repairs to the breakwater, which was seriously damaged by a severe storm in October, 1937.

Item agreed to.

Escuminac—breakwater improvements, $45,000.

Mr. CARDIN: This is to provide for strengthening the outer end of the breakwater by the construction of cribwork. The report of the district engineer is that there is constant damage along this section of the breakwater, and the work is necessary to protect the structure and add to its stability.

[Mr. Rinfret.]

Mr. STEWART: Is this just a matter of repairing and improving an existing breakwater, or is it an extension?

Mr. CARDIN: It is for strengthening the existing breakwater.

Item agreed to.

Wilson's beach—breakwater, wharf extension, estimated total cost $100,000, $50,000.

Mr. CARDIN: This amount, including the revote of $20,000, is to provide towards the construction of an extension approximately 235 feet long in connection with the breakwater wharf. The work is requested by the board of trade of Campobello island, by Mr. Newman of Wilson's beach and by the present member and ex-member of the constituency. The engineer recommends the expenditure.

Mr. STEWART: Was anything spent last year on this work?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Item agreed to.

Quebec

Under contract—
Rivière Laguerre—contribution towards completion of improvements, the provincial government to bear a like amount, $10,000.

Essential undertakings—
Cape Cove (Anse du Cap)—wharf reconstruction, $41,600.
Cacouna—wharf repairs, $13,000.
Grande Baie (St. Alexis)—wharf reconstruction, $26,600.
Manicouagan—wharf improvements. One-third of cost to be contributed by the Ontario Paper Co. Ltd., $31,000.
Rivière au Tonnerre—harbour improvements, $8,000.
Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $275,000.

Mr. CARDIN: In this vote the first item is Rivière Laguerre. This is a contribution towards the completion of improvements. The provincial government contributes a like amount.

Mr. STEWART: As I recall it, this work has been going on for a considerable time, and there is a joint contribution by the province and this government. Will this vote complete it, or is this another instalment?

Mr. CARDIN: It is supposed to complete the work.

Mr. STEWART: How much has been spent on it altogether?

Mr. CARDIN: The sum of $140,000. The total expenditure to March 31, 1937, was $124,695.

Mr. STEWART: Is it likely to be completed this year?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, in September. As regards Cape Cove, the amount asked for is to provide for reconstruction in steel sheet piling of the shore end of the wharf. The present wharf was constructed in 1904, and the shore end is now in a dilapidated and weakened condition. The work is recommended by the engineers.

Mr. STEWART: Where is this wharf situated?

Mr. CARDIN: It is near Percé in the peninsula of Gaspé.

Mr. STEWART: What is it used for?

Mr. CARDIN: Ten thousand cords of pulpwood are shipped yearly, and the value of other imports and exports moving over the wharf is over $50,000.

Mr. STEWART: Is there any revenue from it?

Mr. CARDIN: There must be harbour dues or wharfage.

Mr. STEWART: It would be under the Transport department. I do not expect the minister to state the amount, but I should like to know whether there is any revenue.

Mr. CARDIN: I will get that information.

Mr. STEWART: Last year there was a vote of $9.000, and this year it is $41,000. I assume the amount voted last year must have been spent because there is no revote mentioned.

Mr. CARDIN: I have a note to the effect that there was a probable expenditure of $2,700 out of the $9,000.

The amount for Cacouna is the result of a recommendation of the district engineer who reports that a 200 foot section of the south face of that structure is in an advanced state of decay and should be renewed. Cacouna is situated on the south shore of the St. Lawrence about 126 miles below Quebec.

The amount for Grande Baie is to provide for the construction of the inner end of the wharf, which is the only section used at the present time, the outer end having been practically abandoned, on account of decay. The other section has been repaired at various times, being cribwork that is not strong enough for the present traffic which consists largely of heavy trucks. It is proposed to fill the crib with rock and surface it with macadam. Business transacted at that point amounts to approximately $200,000 a year.

Mr. STEWART: In regard to Manicouagan, what is the arrangement there, the reason for it, the estimated total expenditure, and the contribution by the company? I understand that a paper company has a development there; that this wharf was built to get their product out, and that they are making a contribution towards the work. What is the total cost, and what proportion is the company contributing? How much has been spent, and when is the work likely to be completed?

Mr. CARDIN: This amount is to provide a share of the cost of construction of a cribwork structure to protect the stone approach to the wharf. A storm in 1937 damaged the wharf. Up to the present this company has contributed $266,882 in round figures, in various sums since 1929-30. The total cost is $825.992. The government expenditure has been $559,110 so that the company has contributed a little less than half.

The item of harbours and rivers generally, $275,000, is the general vote which is repeated year by year.

Item agreed to.

Ontario

Under contract—
Port Arthur—harbour improvements, $51,300.
Essential undertakings—
Cobourg—maintenance dredging, $20,000.
Owen Sound—harbour repairs and improvements, $49,000.
Sarnia—reconstruction of harbour works, $25,000.
Rondeau—reconstruction of East pier, $28,000.
Toronto—maintenance of eastern channel, $15,000.
Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $180,000.

Mr. CARDIN: Does my friend want to go over this item by item?

Mr. STEWART: Perhaps I could shorten it by intimating what information I think the committee should have. This item provides for some harbour improvements at Port Arthur. As I recall, we have another item in the supplementary estimates for work at Port Arthur. I think the committee should know what we have undertaken there, in both the main and the supplementary estimates, and whether this completes the work or is just an instalment on it. I find in the supplementary estimates, harbour improvements, a revote of $60,000 and a total expenditure of $155,000. Are they different works or are they connected? One is harbour improvements, a revote of $51,300, and then there is this other vote of $155,000 including a revote of $60,000. Are they two separate works?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, they are entirely separate. This vote of $51,000 provides for dredging. It is a contract awarded to the National Dock and Dredging Company for maintenance dredging in several elevator slips, and providing for repairs to concrete breakwater and deepening the ship berth at the outfitting plant of the Port Arthur Shipbuilding Company. The details of the amount are as follows:

Complete contract with National Dock and Dredging Corporation, $39,300.
Repairs to north pier head at south entrance, $2,600.
Deepening ship berth alongside outfitting dock of Port Arthur Shipbuilding Company, $9,400.

This is entirely separate from what is provided for in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. STEWART: The vote last year was $82,000. Do we understand that the difference between the $82,000 and $51,300, which would be roughly $30,000, was spent last year?

Mr. CARDIN: My information is that the $82,000 provided last year covered part of the work which is now covered by the supplementary estimates.

Mr. STEWART: How much was spent out of the $82,000 voted last year?

Mr. CARDIN: We have not the information here. We will get it when we reach the supplementary estimates item. This $51,000 covers only the dredging. All the rest of the work is covered by the vote in the supplementary estimates.

Mr. STEWART: But I gather that when it says a revote, that means it is part of the same item, the same appropriation of last year.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT SWEEPSTAKES ORGANIZED BY PROVINCES FOR BENEFIT OF UNIVERSITIES OR HOSPITALS

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bertrand (Laurier) for the second reading of Bill No. 28, to amend the criminal code.

Mr. E. J. WERMENLINGER (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, I shall not be long in what I have to say. May I at the outset express my appreciation of the courtesy which has been displayed in connection with the debate on this bill, as it was displayed in the debate on the bill introduced in 1934.

I intend to vote for the bill. I respect the opinions of hon. members, and of people outside the house. It is my view that if it is necessary either to repeal or to amend section 236 of the criminal code to make the bill effective, then for many reasons that action should be taken. I have received quite a number of communications concerning the proposed amendment, but I shall not take the time of the house to repeat all that has been said. I believe the whole story was outlined in 1934 after a sweepstakes measure had passed both houses in the province of Quebec and the Canadian Senate, but was afterwards rejected by the House of Commons.

As a life governor of a hospital in the city of Verdun, and being familiar with needs for hospitalization, I can say that I believe something should be done for the support of hospitals. I am well aware that there are conscientious objectors whose opinions I respect. Nevertheless we must all realize that each year large sums of money are sent to help hospitals in Ireland or Australia, or to a veterans' association in Newfoundland. To obtain the moneys prizes are offered in connection with the Cambridgeshire handicap, the Derby, or some other sporting event. That is a logical procedure to adopt.

To-day we are in the midst of gambling; there is no use in hiding the fact. I have no doubt that we should respect the opinions of those who conscientiously object to helping hospitals by means of sweepstakes. I would suggest, however, that if the hospitals do not wish to take that money, it could be diverted to some other useful purpose. Some who buy tickets on sweepstakes or lotteries may do so in a gambling spirit, but I suggest that if they did not spend the money for that purpose they would spend it in slot-machines, bingo games, barbottes, or other gambling devices.

This is not a political or party issue, nor was it a political issue in 1934. While I served as alderman of the city of Verdun I became aware, as all hon. members must have done, that circuses, fairs, midways and shows come from other countries, bringing their animal acts, to divert the attention of the children and adults. We learn, however, that if they had no gambling devices in their organizations they would not dare to come. They come with the idea of making money and then taking it back to the United States or some other foreign country.

I do not wish to enter into a discussion of foreign relations, but I do know that there are certain regulations set out by the Department of National Revenue with which fairs, shows or midways must comply. The agricultural and other societies sponsoring the shows are supposed to be bona fide. There must be conformity with forms 1914, B-18 and B-9. But the gambling devices are not included in those permits. If we are not to have lotteries or sweepstakes, then for heaven's sake let us not have circuses, shows and midways from other countries which come here with their gambling devices. Certainly those shows would not come if it were not for the gambling devices they carry.

I am glad this is not a political issue. I am urged to vote for the measure because I wish to help our institutions, and because I know that during June, July, August and September gambling devices do enter the country. Large amounts of money are wagered, and those sums are taken back to another country. Although I do not wish to speak at length, and should like to hear other hon. members or have a vote taken, may I point out that last year in Verdun people were arrested because they were operating gold-digging machines which came from the United States. They come through the customs under the present arrangement. Are we to allow gambling in that form and then not permit the provinces to deal with this question as they see fit? I am not afraid to admit that people were arrested in Verdun for using these gambling devices. These machines came from the United States and were not subject to duty. All that is necessary to get them in is for the secretary of some agricultural fair to state that they are bona fide exhibits. But they were not; they were money-making machines. Are people to be allowed to come from the United States to make money with these gambling devices? I contend that we should amend the criminal code to legalize something which is now being done illegally.

If there are certain hospitals or educational institutions that do not wish to accept money in this form, that would be up to them. Such funds could always be diverted to some other form of charity. We should be logical. I remember in 1934 when you, Mr. Speaker, introduced a bill to amend the criminal code in connection with lotteries, but the motion for second reading was negatived. Both the upper and lower houses of the legislature of Quebec have been unanimous in support of sweepstakes. We should try to do something to alleviate the burden of taxes upon the business man. He is forced to pay taxes to support charitable institutions, baby clinics, girls' and boys' camps and so forth. As a great man told me this morning here, we are on the road to chaos.

I am ready to agree with those who contend that this is bad economy; nevertheless I contend that a law which tries to prohibit everything, sometimes prohibits nothing. The argument is put forth that the legalizing of sweepstakes and lotteries would decrease philanthropic contributions. I do not see it in that way. A philanthropist is a born philanthropist; if he has the means he is able to find plenty of opportunities to demonstrate his generosity. In Montreal the millionaire philanthropists do not grow like onions. This amendment would provide an opportunity for many people who otherwise would not do so to contribute toward the assistance of their fellow citizens. Many people would not make such a contribution unless it was in the nature of gambling. We seem to be entering an era of gambling at the present time. I am sure if I looked in the pockets of many of my colleagues I would find sweepstake and lottery tickets.

Section 92, subsection 7 of the British North America Act provides that the provinces shall have jurisdiction over the maintenance and management of hospitals, asylums and charitable institutions, other than marine hospitals. It is paradoxical to have section 92 state that each province shall look after the maintenance of hospitals, while section 236 of the criminal code forbids their adopting ways and means of doing so. Why should we do something illegal? If the criminal code is not amended, the man who wants to bet will have to change his name. He may be called Jules, like myself, and he would have to change his name to Juliette. He may be called Albert and he would have to change his name to Albertina. I do not approve that.

Bad economy, good economy, we have it in our hands to decide. The slot-machines are simply a racket. Bingo is a racket. Tombolas are a racket. Under section 18 of the Customs Act, five or more cars containing nothing but gambling devices would have to pay only $250 when entering Canada. If there were less than five cars, the rate would be $125. If it were not for the gambling devices that these people are permitted to bring across the boundary line, they would not come at all.

The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) has introduced Bill No. 137, to amend the criminal code, which will be discussed at a later date.

This gambling device question will have to be settled to the satisfaction of all the people of this country. People should not be allowed to spend their money on these machines and then have that money go to another country. I understand that in 1934, one of the offices of the sweepstakes organization in Montreal sent $294,000 to the Irish hospitals.

As I said before, I respect the opinions of conscientious objectors, but we must remember that prohibition sometimes invites lawlessness, racketeering and profiteering.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, coming from British Columbia, I think it might be well for me to make a few remarks on this bill because its mover (Mr. Bertrand, Laurier), has referred to that province as being favourable to sweepstakes. The vote to which the hon. member referred showed that only a very small minority of the people of the city of Vancouver and of British Columbia were in favour of sweepstakes, and I do not think the vote indicated for one moment that the people of British Columbia are favourable to an amendment to the criminal code to legalize sweepstakes in this country. In fact, since this debate opened I have received a large number of communications from my district on the subject of sweepstakes, and only one of them was in favour of this bill. I admit, however, that I am not in a position to state what percentage of the people of British Columbia are favourable to the bill, nor do I think my hon. friend is.

The ministerial association of my city communicated with the attorney general of British Columbia asking his stand on sweepstakes, and under date of April 14 last he replied, "I would certainly refuse to sanction anything of the kind." I am personally convinced that the legalizing of sweepstakes would not, both from a moral and an economic standpoint, be in the best interests of Canada. I should not like to see the lottery business made a department of provincial government, with the tickets backed by the dignity of the province. Some suggest we might sell the tickets in the United States, competing with the lotteries of the petty republics of South America.

There is another reason why I think no member from British Columbia could support this legislation. Without doubt, if this legislation passed and Ontario and Quebec took advantage of it, tickets would be put on sale in the smaller provinces, and the result would be that in a province like British Columbia, with a much smaller population, our people would be contributing, not to our own institutions, but to those of the two larger provinces. So from that standpoint it would not be in the interests of the smaller provinces of Canada to support this legislation.

Great Britain and the United States have both had experience with agitations for legalizing lotteries and sweepstakes, and it is interesting to note that in reply to an agitation in recent years in Great Britain for reenacting legislation legalizing lotteries a commission was set up which inquired into the matter, and from its report I quote the following sentence:

> The existing general prohibition in this country of all lotteries, whether promoted here or abroad, should be maintained, subject to the exemptions referred to below, and the law against foreign and illegal lotteries should be strengthened.

That was the commission's recommendation, and the law in Great Britain to-day makes it illegal in connection with any lottery in Great Britain or elsewhere:

> . . . to print, sell, advertise, distribute tickets, or print or publish any description of a lottery or any prize-winners or winning tickets in one.

That is how the United Kingdom dealt with the agitation for the reestablishment of lotteries.

I do not think it is necessary for me to relate the experience of the United States. In 1834 lotteries were prohibited in that country after an experience over a number of years.

This bill comes before us, Mr. Speaker, clothed in righteousness. It is a little different from the bill before parliament some years ago in that it couples universities with hospitals. The last speaker (Mr. Wermenlinger) urged us to adopt this legislation in order to help hospitals, but I am convinced and I think every member of the house who has had any experience at all with sweepstakes realizes, that an individual purchases a sweepstake ticket not for the purpose of helping hospitals but for what he or she may get out of it. I am also convinced that the legalizing of lotteries and sweepstakes in Canada would not stop the sale in this country of the Irish sweepstakes tickets, because men and women who want to gamble would still pay $2.50 to buy a ticket with the chance of winning $150,000. It would not stop that for one minute.

Those of us who have had experience as public men know how often we are pressed to buy tickets for this, that and the other organization. Just imagine what it would be like if every province in Canada had a bunch of canvassers on the streets selling tickets for sweepstakes!

A peculiar thing about this argument that the sweepstakes are for the benefit of hospitals is that I have not come across one hospital board that was in favour of raising its revenue from the sale of sweepstakes tickets. In March, 1928, a resolution was passed by the Canadian Hospital Council as follows:

That the Canadian Hospital Council cannot support the principle of raising funds by means of sweepstakes.

The British Hospital Association, which claims to be the heaviest loser through the Irish sweepstakes, passed the following resolution:

That the British Hospital Association is not in favour of an amendment of the law affecting public sweepstakes which purport to be for the benefit of voluntary hospitals.

And they go on to point out many reasons why, but I do not think it is necessary for me to repeat them here in detail.

One thing which I think we should consider very seriously is that these institutions, no matter where they may be located in Canada, must necessarily receive additional financial support in addition to the revenue derived from the care of patients. This should be provided through our legislatures and other public bodies. I am of the opinion that just as soon as you set up some gambling device to raise money for hospitals, you will find that the people who now subscribe will direct their donations to some other object.

The hospitals point out that it will be impossible to finance our hospitals by means of a sweepstake. The maintenance cost of our hospitals, excluding capital expenditure, amounted, according to the last Dominion Bureau of Statistics figures, to $41,405,868 for non-mental hospitals and $10,484,937 for mental hospitals, or a total maintenance cost of $51,890,805. The amount contributed by patients was $21,197,612, leaving a balance of $30,693,193, which had to be raised from other sources. While some of this balance comes from non-governmental sources, most of it is made up of the government and municipal share of hospital support. To meet this amount of $30,000,000, the annual amount required from the people, on the basis of the Irish sweepstakes would be $150,000,000. Were the full cost of maintenance to be met, as is anticipated by many, the total amount required would be still higher. The Irish commission, it is pointed out, has received applications for grants from but seventy-three hospitals, and has the English speaking world to draw from. Canada has some 969 hospitals, of which 608 are public and therefore would be eligible, and would have to meet strong competition in selling tickets because of the huge prizes given elsewhere. The burden of supporting our hospitals would be shifted, to the extent of the sweepstakes contributions, to those least able to afford it. This has been repeatedly observed in Ireland, Spain and South American countries.

Let me repeat that I am convinced, after going thoroughly into this matter, as I think any hon. member would be who has followed the history of lotteries in other countries and the experience hospitals have had in regard to lotteries, that this legislation should not be enacted.

In speaking about the legislation I wish to refer to the bill that has been introduced. The bill was introduced and had its first reading on February 24, 1938. I find on my file two copies of the bill. The first bill introduced is the one that I think we are discussing,—the one which was introduced in the regular way, received its first reading and was up for second reading. But since May 9 another bill has been injected into the file, and it is altogether different. It has an explanatory clause and is underlined. That bill did not receive first reading in this house; it was not introduced in the regular way. So I wish to raise the point which the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) referred to in dealing with another bill on May 10. The Prime Minister at that time said:

Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, before we proceed any further, the rules of the house as adopted on June 14, 1923, among other provisions contain the following:

"In the text of the bill, on the left hand page, new matter shall be indicated by such typographical means as may best suit the varying circumstances of each case, such as brackets, italics, underlining, asterisks, etc. Opposite each clause, on the right hand page, the enactment amended thereby, or so much thereof as is essential, shall be printed with the proposed changes to be made therein similarly indicated."

I would point out that the bill which was introduced in the regular way and received the first reading does not contain the explanatory clauses to which the Prime Minister referred, and I contend that this bill is not in order.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I do not remember the number of the rule which was quoted by the Prime Minister. I wish the hon. member who has just spoken would mention it. But I read it at the time, and it applied to the presenting of the bill. The bill needed some explanatory notes on the right-hand side, and whether those notes were given at the time of the second reading, or before, does not matter. I cannot find the rule. I did not know that the point of order was going to be raised. But I read the rules at the time, and I found out what I have stated. If this bill is not in order, there are many other bills in the same position because I know that five or six government bills were reprinted after the point of order was raised by the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): This point has been raised two or three times. It has been accepted on each occasion that if the explanatory notes were on the bill prior to its second reading, the bill was perfectly in order. My hon. friend the member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) introduced a bill which had no explanatory notes at the time of the first reading, but the notes appeared there in the course of the second reading, and the bill was allowed to be declared in order. It is quite proper that this bill should be so declared.

Mr. BARBER: I might just draw the attention of the house to the fact that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni was required, I believe, to reintroduce his bill under another number.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He had two bills. In the case referred to, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) substituted a new bill.

Mr. SPEAKER: Upon the point of order raised by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) I will render my decision the next time the bill is called.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Generally — National Gallery of Canada, $115,000.

Mr. LENNARD: Will the minister explain the increase?

Mr. CARDIN: The increase is to provide a larger sum for the trustees for the purchase of more works of art.

Mr. LENNARD: What is the sense of buying more works of art when there is not a building in which to display the ones they have now? They are all stored away, or at any rate a great many of the valuable paintings are, and the public never see them.

Mr. CARDIN: A number of these works of art are sent to the different provinces for exhibition purposes, and the trustees have not abandoned the idea that some day parliament will provide them with a suitable building in which to display all the works of art we possess.

Mr. BENNETT: This estimate affords me an opportunity to say something which I have wanted to say during the last four or five years but never had a chance until to-night to express. I cannot but think a number of Canadian artists are not adequately represented in the National Gallery. I feel strongly about this. The last time I visited the gallery and looked over the Canadian pictures I certainly found a dearth of pictures by one or two artists who, I believe, might fairly be classified as ranking Canadian artists. I am bound to say that there is one picture which has not impressed me as being authentic. It would seem to be regarded as Van Dyck, and while I am not at all an expert I am inclined to think that it might be well if the word "After" were placed before the name Van Dyck on that particular picture. There is a substantial number of Canadian artists who are not at all adequately represented in the gallery. On the last occasion on which I visited the gallery I tried to make effective my criticism of some pictures there, but I did not succeed. Certainly they do not dignify the National Gallery, whereas some of the paintings of those who are not represented would be an ornament to almost any gallery in the world. It would be unfair, of course, to particularize; for that might be regarded as unkind; but I make that observation to the minister, and I suggest that if he has an opportunity to visit the gallery he might see to what extent Canadian artists are represented there. If he does, I shall be glad to have a discussion with him as to what his convictions are in that regard.

Mr. CARDIN: I am very much inclined to agree with the words of the right hon. gentleman as to proper encouragement being given to Canadian artists. Not being myself an art critic, I would not venture any opinion on the works of art there, though I must confess, even if I am a layman, that it is difficult to admit that certain works which are on exhibit in the gallery are masterpieces. I quite agree, however, that we should do all that we can to encourage Canadian artists as far as possible.

Mr. BENNETT: We have ample funds with which to purchase Canadian pictures. We have had the benefit of the services of excellent experts in the selection of old masters and of contemporaneous pictures as well. Some of the pictures that have been selected for us abroad are by men of great eminence and are permanent memorials to their greatness. About that there can be no doubt. We have works of most of the great artists, and I am not for a moment suggesting that we should limit our purchases. I must say, however, that I was disappointed—I put it in that way—when last I visited the gallery and looked over Canadian works. I do not think the display is a fair representation of the ability of Canadian painters; that is, those on exhibit. There may, however, be some put away that I have not been able to see.

Let me assure the minister that what I am saying does not refer particularly to his administration; in fact, it refers with equal, if not greater force, to the administration that preceded this. In my opinion, however, the principle is wrong of selecting merely a certain type of picture which apparently merits the approval of a certain type of mind but which does not commend itself to others. If we are to have representation of Canadian art, it should be not of one school only but of all schools, and as far as possible every worthy artist who has produced anything that merits a place in our National Gallery should be there. I suggest that no preconceived notions with respect to one school or one type of picture should prevail, but that all should find a place in the gallery. I admit that we have not produced many great pictures in this country, but at the same time there are one or two of our artists who have achieved very fine landscape. Some have attained great eminence in the painting of trees, which is not easy work. I have seen one or two productions of an artist who happens to be employed in the civil service here, and whose pastel work is particularly good. Some of his water colours have high artistic qualities. In discussing this subject I did not intend to particularize at all but rather wanted to suggest that there should be in the gallery scope for the exhibition of works of every school and of every artist whose work is worthy of a place among the collections of the works of Canadian painters.

Mr. CARDIN: I will undertake to place the views of my right hon. friend before the trustees. In order to show the favourable disposition of the trustees, I may say that during the fall there was in the art gallery an interesting exhibition of Canadian design.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): It is a far cry from the leader of the opposition to where I sit, and I am sorry to say I could not hear a single word he said. But I gather from the reply of the minister that he was recommending an increase in the cultural development of our country, and the setting aside of moneys in order to assist Canadian artists and the cultural development of Canada generally. These are the things that last. When we pass away these elements of art, whether carvings in stone or paint on canvas or music on paper, are the things which will be Canada. Unless we realize that even now, in our present hard-up condition, we must strive to perpetuate something of the conditions of our times, Canada will perish. We face westward with a blazoning on our peace tower of the words, "Where there is no vision the people perish." I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that $61,000 set aside for the acquisition of works of art is almost pusillanimous. If we consider the manner in which these things are cared for in other departments equally responsible for the protection of our culture, we ought to be ashamed. I sincerely hope the Minister of Finance and all others in the government will definitely determine to see that Canada is not backward in this matter.

Item agreed to.

Chief engineer's branch—construction, repairs and improvements—harbours and rivers—

Ontario

Under contract—

Port Arthur—harbour improvements, $51,300.

Essential undertakings—

Cobourg—maintenance dredging, $20,000.

Owen Sound—harbour repairs and improvements, $49,000.

Sarnia—reconstruction of harbour works, $25,000.

Rondeau—reconstruction of east pier, $28,000.

Toronto—maintenance of eastern channel, $15,000.

Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $180,000.

Mr. CARDIN: Before six o'clock we were considering the proposed vote for harbour improvements in Port Arthur. I was not then in possession of all the information to give a satisfactory answer to the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart).

The vote under consideration is for $51,300. It is for dredging and to complete a contract which has been awarded to the National Dock and Dredging Corporation. This vote has no connection with the works provided for in the supplementary estimates to the amount of $155,000. The difference between the amount in 1937-38 and 1938-39 can be explained as follows: The amount of $82,000 is made up of $57,000 voted in the main estimates of 1937-38 for harbour improvements. But it was found, when checking the estimate, that this amount would not be sufficient to pay for the proposed dredging in the harbour, and so in the supplementary estimates a further amount of $25,000 was provided for. This makes the total of $82,000 shown in the column for 1937-38. Out of that amount of $82,000 a contract was awarded. But the price that we got was so low compared with the department's estimate that this further amount was not found necessary. In fact, the lowest tender for the dredging was at the rate of 22¾ cents per cubic yard, although the estimate was between twenty-five and fifty cents a yard.

Mr. BENNETT: That was before you sold the dredges.

Mr. CARDIN: Oh, that was the National Dredging Company. There is no connection. Furthermore I did not sell them.

Out of this $82,000 provided in 1937-38 the expenditure was $30,700, leaving as a revote $51,300. Out of that amount we require $39,000 to complete the contract. We also provide in these estimates for two small additional expenditures which were not then contemplated: repairs to pier head at south entrance, $2,600, and deepening of ship berth alongside the fitting-out dock of the Port Arthur Shipbuilding Company, $9,400. These make up the total of $51,300 that we are asking.

Mr. STEWART: Is it expected that this will complete the scheme of improvement and development which the department has in mind in that port, outside the breakwater? There was an extensive breakwater under construction there. Has that been finished?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that there is always a certain amount of dredging to be done in Port Arthur harbour, because some filling takes place there every year.

Mr. BENNETT: You dredge it out of one side and put it on the other?

Mr. CARDIN: No; it is taken out.

Mr. STEWART: As I understand it, the department had a certain plan for improvement and development in Port Arthur harbour, consisting of a breakwater, dredging, and some other improvements. Will this complete the plan, outside what may be required for maintenance dredging?

Mr. CARDIN: I am inclined to think, from the information I have, that this will complete it.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. McIVOR: The work that has been started in Port Arthur has been completed, but when one thinks of that harbour and the multitude of shipping which goes in and out of it, this vote appears very small in comparison with the need, and for keeping that harbour and also Fort William harbour up to date.

Mr. CARDIN: The next item is $20,000 for Cobourg.

Mr. STEWART: That is maintenance dredging too?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. The next is Owen Sound. This amount is required to provide for improving the approach channel in the outer harbour and reconstructing a section of the wall at the south end of the harbour, which is in very bad condition. The district engineer reports that this wall is crumbling.

Another item is $25,000 to provide for the requirements of eleven timber pile clusters at Sarnia. The south side of the elevator is constructed of steel piles and concrete clusters. The existing wooden piles were driven in 1929. Two of these clusters are now broken off and the rest, according to the report of the engineers, are in bad condition.

Another item is for an expenditure at Rondeau. This amount of $28,000 provides for the reconstruction of a section of the pier. The engineer reports that the rebuilding of the timber portion of the east pier must be done without delay. There is an expenditure of $15,000 for maintenance of the eastern channel at Toronto. That is a dredging item. The item for harbours and rivers generally is a general item found every year in the estimates.

Mr. LENNARD: I notice a reference to harbours and rivers generally, for maintenance of services; what are those services?

Mr. CARDIN: Repairs to harbour works.

Mr. LENNARD: Is there any portion of these amounts for the maintenance of the large cruisers found in some of the harbours, and especially the harbours of Ontario? From what I can gather they are used principally for week-end parties, and are of very little use for harbour control work.

Mr. CARDIN: The vote does not cover such expenditure; further, those boats are not under the Department of Public Works.

Item agreed to.

Manitoba—essential undertakings—Red River —repairs to breakwaters, $35,000.

Harbours and rivers generally—for maintenance of services, no new works to be undertaken, $25,000.

Mr. LEADER: Has any definite action been taken in regard to the opening of Eagle Nest creek at Delta, Manitoba?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. LEADER: I should like to remind the minister that over three hundred ratepayers and other people belonging to the Delta beach association feel that this matter is not receiving the attention it should receive. I made a trip to Ottawa last year and took the matter up with the deputy. The question is that there is a waterway across some privately owned land used by other people, and it is impossible for the Delta beach association or any other public body or individual to gain access to the public shooting grounds which have been set aside years ago by the Manitoba government.

That creek has been used for years and years. People get into their canoes and follow Eagle Nest creek to get to the shooting grounds. The man who owns the land, a wealthy man from Winnipeg, has put an obstruction across Eagle Nest creek, thereby shutting out the public from access to the public shooting grounds. The Manitoba government has refused to take any action, declaring that it was a matter for the dominion government, and that Eagle Nest creek was a navigable stream and therefore under the jurisdiction of the dominion government. That is why I made the trip to Ottawa to find out whether or not it was under the jurisdiction of the dominion government. My advice at that time was that it was a navigable stream; that orders would be issued to the man in question to remove the obstruction, and that if he did not remove it, the department would undertake to do so and charge the costs of removal to the man who owned the land.

The owner of the land refuses to move the obstruction, but he made the promise that if the dominion government would open the mouth of Eagle Nest creek, which owing to the low waters of lake Manitoba a few years ago, had filled with sand, he would be glad to remove the obstruction. So far as we know, the last letter was received from Mr. Hunter, the deputy minister, on May 13, stating:

I beg to acknowledge receipt of your letter of the 12th instant, enclosing copy of a letter from Mr. R. H. Home of Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, secretary of the Delta beach association, concerning Eagle Nest creek.

The matter will be given the further consideration which you request, and you will be advised later what further action the department contemplates.

That is the last word we have.

In a letter from the secretary of the Delta beach association it is pointed out that if the creek continues to remain closed by the obstruction placed there by the private owner, the hunters and general public who wish to go to the shooting grounds would have to travel six and a half miles in order to reach those grounds, whereas they formerly ran their boats or canoes up Eagle Nest creek for a distance of only half a mile.

The minister has copies of all these letters. The last paragraph of the letter from the secretary of the Delta beach association is as follows:

Regardless of engineer's reports,—

His report was adverse to removing the obstruction.

—this creek was open to the lake for at least fifty years formerly. The delta at its mouth was formed during the recent few years of exceptional low water in the lake.

There is no doubt in our minds if the mouth of this creek was opened it would stay open so long as the water is held at its present level, made possible by the construction of the dam at Fairford.

We, the Delta beach association, demand that our request be given the consideration it merits by the government of which you are a supporter. We feel that there has been too much consideration given to the statements of Mr. Bain and that facts submitted to the government by this association have been treated too lightly.

I consider I am doing only my humble duty in bringing this matter to the attention of the government at the very first opportunity, and in declaring that the people I represent share with me the view that the government is not acting quickly enough to suit all concerned. I should like to have a statement from the minister in regard to what action will be taken, and when it may be expected.

Mr. CARDIN: I am not in a position to-night to give a definite answer. My information is that part of the area was sold by the provincial government to a private party, and that that party fenced the area he had bought from the provincial government. The request was made to the provincial authorities to force the party to take the fences away. There having been no success with the provincial government, representations have been made to Ottawa, and the federal government has been asked to interfere because a navigable stream has been blocked by the erection of a fence. The question offers some difficulty, and it might be difficult to determine exactly whether or not the stream is what may be called a navigable stream. If it is not, the federal government would have no authority to deal with the situation. We can deal with it only if it is declared to be or recognized as a navigable stream. Before we took any action in the matter, the question would have to be submitted to the Department of Justice. I have no hesitation in saying that I am not familiar with this situation, but I shall look into it and try to the best of my limited ability to see what remedy can be found.

Mr. LEADER: I have a letter from the minister's deputy, which was sent to me in answer to the representations I made in the early part of the winter. The letter reads:

The construction of a fence across Eagle Nest creek, lying just south of lake Manitoba, has received further consideration and it has been decided that, since no permission was granted under the Navigable Waters Protection Act, for this structure which effectually blocks the use of the creek for navigation, to advise the owner, Mr. D. H. Bain, of Winnipeg, Manitoba, that the construction of this fence is contrary to the terms of the Navigable Waters Protection Act, and to request him to have it removed.

I know that Mr. Bain was notified to remove this obstruction, but he absolutely refused to do so. He states that he will stand a lawsuit first. He makes a suggestion to the government which perhaps offers a way out. He says he will remove the obstruction if the government will undertake to open up the mouth of the creek which was closed during the time of low water by sand filling in. The engineer says that the mouth will fill up again, but there is no danger of that as long as the present level is maintained in lake Manitoba. That level will be maintained because a dam has been erected further north. I suggest to the minister that he undertake to clean out the mouth of Eagle Nest creek. Mr. Bain promises to remove the obstruction, and then all concerned will be happy.

Mr. CARDIN: My hon. friend realizes that I cannot give him assurance that this will be done without first ascertaining what amount of money will be involved. I can promise him that I will give this matter my best attention.

Mr. BENNETT: If anybody's right of navigation is being interfered with, he has a right to remove the obstruction.

Mr. LEADER: I thank the minister for his reply. If he would care to accept a private estimate of the cost, one was made by an officer of the Delta beach association. He estimates that the mouth of Eagle Nest creek can be cleaned out for $500 at the most, although others say it can be done for $300.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. CARDIN: I cannot make any definite commitment, but if it will not cost any more than that there is a possibility that my hon. friend's request will be met.

Item agreed to.

British Columbia—essential undertakings—Campbell river—wharf repairs, $8,800.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Is the minister prepared to do anything about the government wharf at Ladysmith? This is quite a progressive town and a number of vessels call in there to take away logs. There have been occasions when it has been quite difficult to reach the shore on account of the lack of a wharf. At one time a seaman on one of the vessels who was suffering from appendicitis was brought ashore under such circumstances that he died. Perhaps that cannot be laid at the door of the government, and I do not indicate that it should, but the fact is that a town the size of Ladysmith has been debarred from the convenience of wharf accommodation. The government wharf has been closed off because it was in a state of disrepair, and notices have been placed to the effect that pedestrains use it at their own risk. Is there anything in the estimates to permit something being done this year?

Mr. CARDIN: There is no special estimate, but I shall undertake to have the officers look into the matter. If it can be taken care of under the vote for repairs, I shall be only too pleased to order the work done if the cost can be kept within reasonable bounds.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): A little money would go a long way if it were properly expended. I should like to refer to the Robert's bay wharf at Sidney. I drew the attention of the department to the fact that the little shed at the end of this wharf had been dislodged from its position. Two or three strong men could have placed that back again, but I am informed that it has been taken away and destroyed. This seems to be an expensive way in which to handle a small repair matter. I am drawing this matter to the attention of the minister in order that he may know just what is the situation in Nanaimo riding.

Item agreed to.

Fraser river—contribution towards protection work at Rosedale, the provincial government and the municipality of Chilliwack each to contribute a like amount, $4,000.

Mr. STEWART: The vote last year was $2,000. Has some new arrangement been reached?

Mr. CARDIN: This amount is needed for the protection of the bank of the Fraser river at Rosedale.

Item agreed to.

Yukon—essential undertakings—Stewart and Yukon rivers—improvements, $5,000.

Mr. STEWART: What is the reason for the small increase here?

Mr. CARDIN: The increase due to statutory increases amounts to $440, and there is provision for the return of the five per cent salary deduction.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph branch—telegraph and telephone services—operation and maintenance—land and cable telegraph lines—lower St. Lawrence and maritime provinces, including working expenses of vessels for cable work, $133,000.

Mr. STEWART: Is this the cost of operating all these maritime lines?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. There is an increase of $1,000 due to a statutory increase.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph and telephone services—operation and maintenance—Alberta and Saskatchewan, $92,500.

Mr. STEWART: There is an increase of $5,000 in this item.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes; it is due to statutory increases and the restoration of the five per cent salary deduction.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph and telephone services—operation and maintenance — division superintendent's office, Vancouver, $12,300.

Mr. BARBER: Will the minister explain this vote?

Mr. CARDIN: It is to provide for the payment of salaries of the staff of the division superintendent's office at Vancouver. The staff is utilized in the maintenance and operation of all lines in British Columbia. There is a small increase due to statutory increases, also the restoration of the five per cent salary deduction.

Mr. STEWART: I notice there is an increase in the staff from forty-six to fifty-one. I thought the policy of the department was to get out of the telephone and telegraph business so far as possible, and some lines were disposed of. Has there been any further progress along that line, or have there been any additions or extensions?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that we are always building short sections of line in British Columbia. Certain additions are being made practically every year.

Mr. STEWART: Were there any extensions last year that caused this increase in the number of the staff?

Mr. CARDIN: I do not see it under this vote, but it might be under item No. 334, which covers the British Columbia northern and Yukon districts, reconstruction, repairs and improvements. It may be that under that item the extensions are listed.

Mr. STEWART: I was wondering why there was an increase in the staff from forty-six to fifty-one.

Mr. CARDIN: Unfortunately I have not the details here but I shall be glad to provide them later.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph and telephone services—operation and maintenance—British Columbia—Vancouver island district, $92,200.

Mr. STEWART: There is another increase here, $4,720.

Mr. CARDIN: The increase is due to the restoration of the five per cent salary deduction which accounts for $2,910, and there is an increase of $1,810 in the allotment for contingencies.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph branch—reconstruction, repairs and improvements—maritime provinces, $8,000.

Mr. STEWART: This is a new item. There was no similar item last year. What does this cover?

Mr. CARDIN: The amount of $8,000 is required for general repairs to the telegraph and telephone lines on Cape Breton island. The department maintains on Cape Breton island telegraph and telephone lines with a total mileage of 861 miles. The telegraph line mostly follows the coast. The principal line serves the north coast from Sydney to Baie St. Lawrence, providing an essential service to the large fishing and shipping interests in that section.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph branch—reconstruction, repairs and improvements — Saskatchewan and Alberta, $16,500.

Mr. STEWART: Is this for repairs only?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, general repairs and improvements.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph branch—reconstruction, repairs and improvements — British Columbia — Vancouver island district, $9,000.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Is there any particularization of this total?

Mr. CARDIN: This amount of $9,000 is required for general repairs and improvements on Vancouver island district lines, as requested by the general superintendent of the government telegraphs in his memorandum. There are 928 miles of lines.

Item agreed to.

Generally—To supplement, on approval of treasury board except where less than $200 is required, any of the appropriations of the Department of Public Works, $100,000.

Mr. STEWART: I notice that last year there was provided for this purpose $5,000, and this year it is $100,000. What has led to there being such a substantial increase in this item?

Mr. CARDIN: This is to cover cases where the estimate is short. Instead of contractors having to wait for a year for their money, when the expenditure exceeds the estimate we have provided this amount of money. This enables the contractors to avoid having to wait for another year.

Mr. STEWART: I understand that an item of this kind has been carried for a number of years in the department. What was the approximate amount in former years?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that in those days it was limited to an expenditure not exceeding $200. We now provide for payments over $200, but with the approval of treasury board.

Mr. STEWART: Well, was the approval of treasury board required—I have forgotten—when an item was under $200?

Mr. CARDIN: Not for items up to $200.

Mr. STEWART: Then the scope of the item has been enlarged?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: There was that small basket item to cover small excesses not to exceed $200, which amounts were paid without the approval of treasury board. Now the amount of the item has been raised to $100,000, and anything over $200 will require the approval of treasury board?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: And the $95,000 would be available for paying any of the items of the public works department, would it?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. STEWART: Any items in these estimates?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. Exactly.

Mr. STEWART: It has enlarged the scope of the item.

Mr. CARDIN: That is why the check of treasury board has been mentioned.

Item agreed to.

Chief architect's branch—construction, repairs and improvements of public buildings—Nova Scotia—Bridgewater public building—addition, $16,500.

Mr. HEAPS: What public building is represented in this vote?

Mr. CARDIN: This amount is required to provide for the construction of an addition to an existing public building, in order to provide increased accommodation for the postal service.

Mr. STEWART: Why is the additional accommodation necessary?

Mr. CARDIN: There was a request from the Postmaster General. His department advises that the accommodation is entirely inadequate as it is at present.

Item agreed to.

Halifax Rockhead hospital—reconditioning and improvements, $18,700.

Mr. BARBER: What hospital is this? A military hospital?

Mr. CARDIN: This is a Pensions and National Health hospital.

Mr. STEWART: There is a revote of $13,500. What was the amount of the vote last year?

Mr. CARDIN: The appropriation of last year was $30,000. This is required to complete the work. The contract was for $26,950.

Mr. STEWART: Was the contract let for $26,000 on an appropriation of—

Mr. CARDIN: The appropriation was $30,000.

Mr. STEWART: And $16,000 was spent, and there is $13,000 of a revote?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Halifax old post office building—alterations and improvements, $32,000.

Mr. STEWART: There was a very fine new public building erected at Halifax. What is the old one being used for?

Mr. CARDIN: It is to provide space for the Bank of Canada and the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in the old building.

Mr. STEWART: Do you get rentals for the use of the premises by the Bank of Canada?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: Where were the mounted police before this accommodation was provided?

Mr. CARDIN: They were in rented quarters.

Mr. STEWART: And I suppose that rental will cease?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: And they will be put in this old post office building?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: And the Bank of Canada will rent some of this space?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Louisburg—public building, $23,000.

Mr. HEAPS: In the case of all these public buildings, will the minister mention the population served by these buildings and at whose request the buildings are being erected?

Mr. CARDIN: In this case, at Louisburg, the population is 971.

Mr. BENNETT: How far along is that work?

Mr. CARDIN: The sum of $300 would be saved in rent in one case, and $200 in the other.

Mr. HEAPS: Do I understand that we are paying $500 per annum in rentals now in the town of Louisburg?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: And to make that saving the government is going to spend $23,000.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: On whose recommendation is this building being erected, and for what purposes is it to be used?

Mr. CARDIN: It is to be used for post office and customs purposes.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the Post Office Department requested the erection of a building?

Mr. CARDIN: I have no note as to a request from the Post Office Department, but I assume there is a recommendation, because in connection with all public buildings for that department there is a recommendation.

Mr. HEAPS: I think we should have that recommendation from the Post Office Department before us now, because apparently we are going to spend $23,000 to erect this building, apart from cost of maintenance, heating, janitor services and so on, all of which we are now receiving for $500 a year or about $10 a week. I can hardly conceive of the Post Office Department, looking at the matter from a business point of view, wishing to have such a building erected and having to pay one-half of the cost. I do not know how much revenue the Post Office Department gets in this town, but if there is a population of 900 I do not see that a building of that kind is necessary to serve the people there. I should like the minister to get that information for us. As he knows, I have strenuously objected to the erection of post office buildings in the indiscriminate way in which they have been put up in the past, buildings being loaded on to the Post Office Department whether they want them or not. I think we should have the letter from the Post Office Department on record before we agree to this particular vote.

Mr. CARDIN: This locality is visited by a number of tourists. It is an historic site in Nova Scotia, and there is an old fort there which is of some importance, besides a museum. I am afraid that my hon. friend is a little too severe in his criticism when he asks for justification from the point of view of dollars and cents for every building erected in Canada. As I have already said in this house, when large expenditures are being made in the larger centres of population to accommodate the people and provide necessary services, we should show some consideration at least to the small places where the rural population lives, and if we want to make those places attractive we should not refuse all the requests they make for the beautification—I do not hesitate to use that word—of their home towns. We are always advocating that people should live in the rural sections of the country and should remain there, and people in the cities suggest that those who cannot find employment should move to the country. That plea would come with greater force if we showed some consideration to the smaller localities and once in a while made a little expenditure on their behalf to prove our intentions. After all, the real strength of the country is derived from those sections.

Mr. HEAPS: I am quite prepared to deal as generously as anyone else with every district whether large or small, but the question whether this district is large or small has no bearing on the principle I am trying to lay down. If the Post Office Department wants a building, the request should come from that department. I object to any member of this house going to the Department of Public Works and asking to have a building put up in his constituency. It is bad policy; it is bad politics, and it is bad for the dominion. A post office building, about which I knew nothing, was erected in my constituency, and it is not fully occupied to this day.

An hon. MEMBER: Did the hon. gentleman take credit for it?

Mr. HEAPS: I certainly did not, and I do not want to take credit for having any building put up in my constituency. I do not think members are sent here to make pleas for buildings to be erected in their constituencies; they have more important work to do. If all that a member can think of is to have some little patronage in his own constituency, then I suggest he is not performing any real service to the dominion.

Mr. BARRY: Who should take credit for relief in Winnipeg?

Mr. HEAPS: The federal government, because they are responsible for the unemployment situation. In regard to this particular problem, I have laid down the principle that if a post office building is needed the request should come from that department. I have no objection to a building going up in the town of Louisburg if it can be shown that it is required. But on the figures placed before the committee this evening, showing that they are being accommodated for $500 a year and that we are now asked to authorize a capital expenditure of $23,000, I submit that the minister cannot justify the request unless he can show that there is a commensurate revenue to the post office and customs departments there. But the minister is not in a position to indicate that. If he can show that, I have nothing more to say. Under the circumstances the least the minister can do is to give the committee the information which it has a right to expect. I have no wish to object merely for the sake of objection, but hon. members will agree that my objection is a valid and sound one, especially when we are talking about governing the country on business principles. We should know exactly where we stand in connection with a self-contained utility serving the public; but how can the Post Office Department know what their position is unless they themselves are responsible in a matter of this kind?

Mr. CARDIN: The revenues derived in the locality are in the vicinity of $2,400 a year.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. HEAPS: The postal revenues?

Mr. CARDIN: Postal and customs.

Mr. HEAPS: What will be the cost of maintaining this building, allowing for the usual interest?

Mr. CARDIN: One-third, I suppose.

Mr. HEAPS: I would say offhand that it will cost almost as much to maintain this building and to collect the revenues in that district as the total revenues amount to. Just figure it out.

Mr. ISNOR: Figure it out on a four per cent basis.

Mr. HEAPS: I think I have a right to the information I have requested.

Mr. ISNOR: Perhaps the hon. member who raised the objection overlooks the fact that Louisburg is one of our old historic places in Nova Scotia and is perhaps worthy of a suitable post office building. I do not represent Cape Breton; but I know that ground, and I think hon. members throughout Nova Scotia and the maritimes would welcome an expenditure such as this.

While saying a word about Louisburg, I wish at the same time to draw the attention of the minister to requests in connection with some fast growing districts, in Halifax constituency. I have in mind a petition presented to the Postmaster General—and I believe it also reached the office of the Minister of Public Works—in regard to Armdale post office. A few years ago we had a population of two or three thousand; now we have something like seven thousand people residing in the immediate vicinity of what is known as Arm bridge. I respectfully draw the minister's attention to that request which was made last year and renewed this year. I am making representation as a member from Halifax; I differ from the hon. member who has just taken his seat (Mr. Heaps); I think it is our duty as representatives of different constituencies to place before the minister our representations on any matter affecting our constituency. I am doing that now, asking the minister not to overlook the request for a new post office or public building at Armdale.

I might add that there is also a request from Middle Musquodoboit for a post office, and another one comes from Sheet Harbour.

Mr. MacNICOL: Is this a new post office building to be erected at Louisburg?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then I want to say a word in its favour. I commend the minister for erecting a new building in that historic place. I visited it two years ago, and I went all over the town down there trying to find a place to buy stamps. There were about a thousand tourists there from all over the country, including many in United States cars. I am satisfied, now that these famous fortifications have been rehabilitated to a certain extent and marked so that tourists can, as they go around, study something of the historic events which took place there in the early days of settlement on this continent, that as they return home they will tell what an interesting sight it is, and I have no doubt that, as time goes on the number of tourists increases, so many postage stamps and post cards will be sold that it will go a long way to pay for this building in that historic centre.

Mr. STEWART: Has the contract been let?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: How could the contract be let under the treasury board act without a vote being passed? There is a provision in that act that you cannot let a contract for anything unless parliament has antecedently voted the money.

Mr. CARDIN: There was a vote last year of $20,000.

Mr. BENNETT: But there was no work done under it.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes; the order in council accepting the tender was passed on January 21, 1938, when the amount voted last year was still standing.

Mr. BENNETT: Who is the contractor?

Mr. CARDIN: The Fundy Construction Company of Halifax.

Item agreed to.

Mulgrave—public building, $28,000.

Mr. HEAPS: May I ask the same question in regard to this item?

Mr. CARDIN: The population is 1,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That must have been counted at the time the train was in.

Mr. CARDIN: The postal revenue is $3,371 and the customs revenue, $1,000.

Mr. HEAPS: Is this also an historic site?

Item agreed to.

Port Hawkesbury—public building, $22,500.

Mr. STEWART: I suppose the same convincing arguments that the minister used about the others would apply here.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes; they apply to all of Nova Scotia; the whole of Nova Scotia is historic.

Mr. HEAPS: Can the minister assure us in regard to both these places that the Post Office Department has requested the erection of these buildings?

Mr. CARDIN: I have nothing here from the Post Office Department. But I will undertake at another sitting to inform my hon. friend as to the requests or representations made by the Post Office Department in regard to these buildings.

Mr. HEAPS: Is the minister sure that the Post Office Department has requested the erection of these buildings?

Mr. CARDIN: I have a recollection that it has.

Mr. KINLEY: What do they elect members down there for?

Mr. HEAPS: I have sometimes asked that question myself.

Mr. BARRY: Does the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) consider himself under a moral obligation to oppose every vote for the maritime provinces?

Item agreed to.

Stewiacke—public building, $18,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the population of Stewiacke?

Mr. CARDIN: This is a revote.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the population was only around 450.

Mr. CARDIN: It is about 900.

Item agreed to.

Wolfville—purchase of property adjacent to public building, $1,500.

Mr. STEWART: What was the vote last year? I notice there is a revote of $1,500. Is there a revote of the full amount, and for what purpose is the property being extended?

Mr. CARDIN: It was the same amount last year.

Mr. STEWART: Apparently the purchase was not completed last year, and it is being revoted this year.

Mr. CARDIN: No; it was not completed last year.

Mr. STEWART: How much land is being taken, and for what purpose is it required?

Mr. CARDIN: Twenty-five foot frontage, on the main street, to a depth of thirty-five feet.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a good price.

Item agreed to.

Prince Edward Island—Charlottetown—public building—addition and alterations, $6,500.

Mr. COCHRANE: What about the tidal dam recommended to be built at Eatonville? The recommendation was made by the engineers of the department.

Mr. CARDIN: We are not discussing harbours and rivers.

Mr. COCHRANE: That is a harbour.

Mr. CARDIN: But we are dealing with public buildings. When we reach harbours and rivers I shall answer the hon. member.

Mr. STEWART: What is the reason for the alteration costing $6,500?

Mr. CARDIN: It is for the completion of a contract, to be paid to A. T. MacKinnon for the construction of a one storey addition to a building in Charlottetown housing the income tax branch. The addition is being made to a one storey brick structure eighteen by twenty-five feet. The additional accommodation is to be used by the Post Office Department.

Mr. STEWART: Will that terminate the rental we are now paying for space? Does it just afford additional accommodation for the staff?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes; it affords additional space for the staff already in the building.

Item agreed to.

New Brunswick—Bathurst—public building—addition and alterations, $15,000.

Mr. STEWART: What is the reason for the alterations?

Mr. CARDIN: It is to afford more accommodation for the Post Office Department.

Item agreed to.

Fairville—purchase of property adjoining public building, $3,500.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the size of the property at Fairville? The last time I heard of a sale down there, a man gave property away to escape taxation.

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. CARDIN: The property in question is owned by Mr. Collins of Fairville, and has a frontage of fifty feet. There is a fifty foot frontage on the main street and 100 feet on Charles street.

Item agreed to.

Minto—public building, $21,000.

Mr. STEWART: Was it the same amount last year?

Mr. CARDIN: There was an appropriation of $24,700, and expenditures of $1,930.

Mr. STEWART: Has the contract been awarded?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: For what amount?

Mr. CARDIN: For the sum of $15,500.

Mr. STEWART: When was the contract awarded?

Mr. CARDIN: November 18, 1937.

Mr. STEWART: Is the additional amount over and above the amount of the contract required for furnishings and equipment?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, post office fittings.

Item agreed to.

North Head—public building, $31,000.

Mr. CARDIN: This building is to accommodate postal and telegraphic services. The property is on the north side of the main street and was purchased in September, 1937.

Mr. BENNETT: How much was paid for the land?

Mr. CARDIN: The sum of $1,000.

Item agreed to.

Rogersville—public building, $13,000.

Mr. CARDIN: This is a public building to be erected under contract with J. S. Roy of Moncton; the contract does not include fittings. The building is to be located on the east side of the main highway. The property was purchased in 1937 for $700.

Item agreed to.

St. Leonard—public building, $15,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that not in Madawaska county? How many people are in St. Leonard?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, in the constituency of Restigouche-Madawaska.

Mr. BENNETT: The last time I was there, the population was about 200.

Mr. ISNOR: That was a long time ago.

Mr. CARDIN: There is a population of 2,245.

Mr. STEWART: What service will be accommodated in the building?

Mr. CARDIN: Post office service.

Mr. HEAPS: Perhaps the minister could satisfy me on a question regarding all the buildings connected with the votes being passed this evening. In all cases where post office accommodation is being given to the public, has the minister received requests from the Post Office Department to erect those buildings?

Mr. CARDIN: I cannot say positively that there is a request from the Post Office Department in every case.

Mr. BENNETT: It usually comes through a member.

Mr. CARDIN: I am under the impression that, in most instances there is a request by the Post Office Department. In this instance I am informed with some certainty that there is a request from the Post Office Department.

Mr. BENNETT: I should think in this instance it came from the minister's colleague.

Mr. CARDIN: The post office inspector made the recommendation.

Mr. HEAPS: I am glad the minister had a recommendation in this instance, and I hope he has in all the others. I look upon these post office buildings as being in a different category from that of other buildings which may be required. When we had these estimates under consideration last year we were given to understand that no more post office buildings would be erected unless recommendations were received from the Post Office Department.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would warn the minister not to take the Post Office Department too seriously. When the post office estimates were before the committee I brought up an outrageous affair that had occurred in my riding. A post office had been moved a couple of blocks, and the Post Office Department tried to pass this off on the Department of Public Works. I think the Department of Public Works should scrutinize carefully anything asked for by the Post Office Department.

Mr. HEAPS: Who is to be responsible for the buildings? I know of an outstanding instance where a post office building was erected some years ago which the Post Office Department did not want and has not wanted to this day. This building bears a sign that it is a post office, but it has not been used as such. This is one reason why I think the Department of Public Works should not erect a post office building until the Post Office Department makes a request for same.

Mr. BENNETT: Some of them are samples of the pork-barrel.

Mr. HEAPS: There is one of them I would not wish to emphasize too strongly at this particular moment.

Item agreed to.

St. Stephen — building for customs and immigration purposes, $21,000.

Mr. STEWART: Fairly extensive and expensive improvements are being made at this point. St. Stephen is on the international boundary, and on account of the density of traffic certain improvements were necessary and some new buildings were required. At one time consideration was being given to increasing the width of the bridge. Have all these problems been straightened out, and will this vote cover all that is required on our side of the line?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that this will clean up all our obligations.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a good sized building and is to serve immigration, postal and customs needs.

Item agreed to.

Quebec—Amos—public building, $50,000.

Mr. STEWART: What was the vote last year, and has the contract been let?

Mr. CARDIN: The appropriation was $55,000, and the contract for $39,842 was awarded in December, 1937, to the Walters Construction and Engineering Company.

Mr. STEWART: The lowest tenderer?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. Seven tenders were filed.

Item agreed to.

Drummondville — public building — addition and alterations, $7,000.

Mr. CARDIN: This is for the construction of an additional storey on the examining warehouse to provide increased accommodation as requested by the commissioner of customs.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a growing community.

Item agreed to.

Hull—armoury, $260,000.

Mr. STEWART: This is a rather large item for an armoury so close to Ottawa. What was the vote last year?

Mr. CARDIN: The vote last year was $100,000 towards the construction of the building.

Mr. STEWART: Was the contract awarded?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, and the work has been started.

Mr. STEWART: What was the amount of the contract?

Mr. CARDIN: A contract for $234,800 was awarded to Concrete Construction Limited, Montreal. I have no hesitation in saying that this contract was a little higher than we felt it should be; but the plans and specifications were checked by the Department of National Defence, and we were informed that this building was necessary to provide the accommodation required.

Mr. STEWART: The vote last year was $100,000, and yet a contract for $234,000 was awarded?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: Before this vote had been passed. Under what authority could the department award a contract for $234,000 on a vote of $100,000?

Mr. CARDIN: I understand that is done. We do not always vote the full amount required for the construction of a building. Sometimes we provide a certain amount towards the construction of such and such a building. If I remember correctly, last year when the item of $100,000 for this armoury was passed I stated that we believed the building would cost $200,000 but there was no use in voting too much money. When money is not to be spent in the particular year, it increases the amount of the estimates. I am informed that it is the practice of the department to award contracts provided we have received approval of a vote of practically one-half the amount.

Mr. BENNETT: Provided the expenditure is not greater than the estimate during the year in which the estimate is made.

Mr. CARDIN: When the item was voted last year we did not think we could spend even the $100,000, and in fact we did not spend that amount.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to ask the minister how he managed to get an appropriation for an armoury through council. I can recall the speech of the Prime Minister to the effect that the armouries scattered around the country spelled the loss of liberty and freedom of the people and demonstrated the growth of militarism. Here we have an armoury that overawes the capital itself. This is a serious matter. I have no doubt the minister got this estimate through council in the absence of the president of the council, who happens to be the Prime Minister. Otherwise, surely he would never have managed to get an appropriation for an armoury in Hull. As the poet says:

And freedom shrieked—as Kosciusko fell!

What a shriek there must have been when the appropriation for this armoury went through, in view of the denunciation of armouries one heard on the radio in the fall of 1935. The minister will remember it.

Mr. CARDIN: I do not.

Mr. BENNETT: That settles it. That is how it got through.

Mr. COCHRANE: I think we should have some explanation why this armoury is being built in Hull, costing the taxpayers of this country $270,000. Why is it being built? I want to know something about it.

Mr. BAKER: How many regiments are housed in it?

Mr. BENNETT: Where are the anti-militarists?

Mr. COCHRANE: I want an explanation of this item.

Mr. CARDIN: It houses the Hull Regiment, including the headquarters company and four rifle companies, with a total strength of all ranks of 470. The request came from the regiment itself and those interested in its welfare, and was approved by the National Defence department.

Mr. BAKER: It is just half a regiment.

Mr. STIRLING: The amount of the revote would indicate that $16,500 was spent last year; on what was that spent?

Mr. CARDIN: We paid $10,000 for a site. In addition, advertising for tenders, legal services and architect's fees account for the expenditure of $16,500.

Mr. STIRLING: An outside architect was employed?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Who was he?

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. Bournet, of Hull.

Mr. STEWART: What is the size of the site, because $10,000 seems a pretty substantial amount to pay for a site, if I know where this armoury is?

Mr. CARDIN: The size is twenty-one acres.

Item agreed to.

L'Assomption—public building, $24,000.

Mr. CARDIN: This is a public building already under contract.

Item agreed to.

Lennoxville—public building, $25,000.

Mr. STEWART: Is this just for a post office or a combination building for postal, customs and other services?

Mr. CARDIN: It is a post office on the government-owned site on the corner of Main and Belvedere streets. The postal revenues amount to $11,000.

Item agreed to.

Louiseville—public building—addition, alterations and improvements, $10,000.

Mr. CARDIN: This is to provide for an addition to the public building, for increased accommodation for the post office.

Item agreed to.

Montreal, Craig street drill hall—improvements and repairs, $75,000.

Mr. STIRLING: What are these repairs and improvements?

Mr. CARDIN: Last year, under a vote of the National Defence department, repairs were commenced to the front and back walls of the drill hall, just in front of the Champ de Mars, back of the city hall. When they had put the scaffolding around the building and started to make the repairs, the walls were discovered to be in such a condition that there was no use trying to repair them.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose the contractor discovered that.

Mr. CARDIN: The condition of the walls was such that they abandoned the idea of repairing them, and the idea now is to reconstruct the front and back walls. Their condition was such that the man who was undertaking the repairs was forbidden to take away the scaffolding for fear the walls would fall.

Mr. STIRLING: Had not a report of the department been prepared on which the tender was let? Was not the condition of the walls known before the letting of the tender?

Mr. CARDIN: They could not ascertain the real condition of the walls until after they had started the minor repairs they intended to make. The repair work was undertaken by the National Defence department last year, and the scaffolding is still around the building.

Item agreed to.

Montreal—old examining warehouse—improvements, alterations and repairs, $25,000.

Mr. CARDIN: This amount of $25,000 is to provide for alterations and improvements to the third floor of the old examining warehouse, to provide new accommodation for the food and drug laboratory of the Department of Pensions and National Health. The work was requested by the Minister of Pensions and National Health.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the place which was abandoned when they moved to new premises?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Montreal—public building—addition and alterations, $10,000.

Mr. CARDIN: This amount is required for cleaning the exterior of the old portion of this building, called the first unit, which was built in 1916, to make it harmonize with the new section of the building, called the second unit.

Mr. BENNETT: The harmonizing of ideas seems to have been one of the major operations of the government recently. Nice work that, their harmonizing of ideas.

Item agreed to.

Mont Joli—public building, $25,000.

Mr. CARDIN: This amount of $25,000 is to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection thereon of a public building for postal purposes in the town of Mont Joli, in the constituency of Rimouski.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a terminal point on the railway. A very important community!

Item agreed to.

North Hatley—public building, $13,500.

Mr. CARDIN: The contract has been awarded to Mr. J. A. Verret, of Sherbrooke, for the sum of $8,348.

Mr. BENNETT: Hatley has at least twenty-five residents.

An hon. MEMBER: With summer visitors.

Item agreed to.

Percé—public building, $15,500.

Mr. STEWART: Has the contract for this building at Percé been awarded? It is a small village. What is the revenue there? I recall that the postal accommodation was in a very small building.

Mr. CARDIN: The contract has been awarded to Mr. Laurent Giroux, of St. Casimir, for the sum of $9,408. The population is over 1,500.

Mr. STEWART: I was just wondering why, if the contract is for $9,000, we have a vote of over $15,000. Surely it would not require the difference for the fittings.

Mr. CARDIN: It includes fittings and boxes, $2,000; supervision, $750; lighting plant, $1,500; and contingencies, $1,840.

Item agreed to.

Pointe Claire—public building, $25,000.

Mr. STEWART: Has the contract been awarded at Pointe Claire?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. The contract was awarded in December 1937—

Mr. BENNETT: A kind of Christmas gift.

Mr. CARDIN:—for $19,000.

Item agreed to.

Pointe au Pic—public building, $28,000.

Mr. CARDIN: This is a building for postal and customs purposes, on a site on the public highway purchased in October, 1937.

Mr. BENNETT: It is open in the summer time, I suppose.

Mr. CARDIN: And in the winter time, too. The customs revenues are over $8,000, and the postal revenue, over $4,000.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a summer resort?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: It takes the money you collect in the summer to keep up the fire in the winter.

Item agreed to.

Quebec—postal terminal building, $300,000.

Mr. STEWART: What progress has been made with this building?

Mr. CARDIN: The plans are pretty nearly complete, and we expect to be in a position to call for tenders in not more than a month or five weeks.

Mr. BENNETT: It depends on how things go down in the convention.

Item agreed to.

Quebec quarantine facilities—improvements, $12,000.

Mr. CARDIN: The amount of $12,000 was requested by the Deputy Minister of Pensions and National Health for the following improvements to the quarantine facilities at Quebec: Savard park hospital, balance due on contract for erection of unit; amount required to provide metal screens on windows; amount required to repair boundary fencing; grading and planting trees; for fixtures such as dish sterilizer and refrigerator and so on.

Item agreed to.

Quebec West—public building, $12,500.

Mr. STEWART: This is a revote?

Mr. CARDIN: This is a revote required for the erection of building for post office services on a site on the corner of Fourth avenue and Third street, purchased in February, 1937. The contract is awarded for $7,775.

Item agreed to.

Rigaud—moving public building, $20,000.

Mr. CARDIN: This amount is required for the expense of moving the post office building. The provincial government is building a bridge over the river in the village of Rigaud, and the bridge comes just to the point where the post office was standing.

Mr. BENNETT: The province would pay for moving it, would it not?

Mr. CARDIN: We pay for moving our post office.

Mr. BENNETT: If their bridge takes away your post office, by expropriation, surely you are not going to pay for moving it, are you?

Mr. CARDIN: Well, it may not be a sound undertaking, but we have made it.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand you did that prior to the last provincial election.

Mr. CARDIN: Oh, it was done last year.

Mr. STEWART: Twenty thousand dollars seems a large sum for moving a building. Is it a considerable distance?

Mr. BENNETT: Why do you not build a new bridge?

Mr. CARDIN: It has to be moved several hundred feet. It is a solid brick building, so that is quite an achievement.

Mr. BENNETT: Could you not take it down and put it up again?

Mr. STIRLING: Did the provincial government provide the new site?

Mr. CARDIN: The site was given to us by the municipality.

Item agreed to.

Rock Island customs and immigration building—addition to site, $17,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This is an historic name.

Mr. CARDIN: It is indeed. This is to provide for the purchase of additional land known as the Bouchard property, in connection with the customs and immigration building at Rock Island. This was requested by the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. STEWART: Is there a house there, or are there any buildings on the land?

Mr. CARDIN: There is the Bouchard property, the purchase price of which is $13,000; for demolishing the building, and grading and levelling the property, the estimate is $3,800.

Mr. STEWART: What is the size of the property?

Mr. CARDIN: The Bouchard property has a frontage of eighty-three feet on Main street by a depth of ninety-four feet.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would not think the whole town would be worth that much money. How is an amount of $17,000 arrived at for eighty-three feet in a town that size? What is the assessment of that property? The government have a right to expropriate. They do not have to give three or four prices for a piece of property.

Mr. MARTIN: They must give the just price.

Mr. CARDIN: The officer of the department made the following report on January 22, 1937:

I visited Rock Island and examined the Bouchard property required by the customs to handle the vehicular traffic. This property, owned by Mr. Bouchard, consists of a lot, number eighty, situate on Main street at the junction of the bridge approach. It has a frontage of eighty-three feet on Main street by a depth of ninety-four feet on the approach to the bridge, and has, according to the official book of reference of the village, an area of 9,700 feet. On the land as it stands there is a three-storey building, sixty-one feet by fifty-seven feet. There are three shops on the first floor and four apartments on the second. The third storey is not finished.

Mr. MacNICOL: Then it is not vacant property?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Item agreed to.

Rosemount—public building, $25,000.

Mr. COCHRANE: I should like to know why some consideration is not being given to my constituency? I do not want to be unfair, but I submit that something should be done there.

Mr. CARDIN: When we come to Nova Scotia the hon. gentleman can bring up the question.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he is out of order. We are discussing public buildings in the province of Quebec.

Item agreed to.

St. George de Beauce—public building, $29,000.

Mr. CARDIN: The population is 1,500, and the revenue, over $8,000.

Item agreed to.

St. Pacome—public building, $12,500.

Mr. CARDIN: This is a new building. The population is over 1,200, and the postal revenue, $2,000.

Item agreed to.

St. Raymond—public building, $15,000.

Mr. CARDIN: The population is 1,800, and the postal revenue, over $4,000.

Item agreed to.

St. Scholastique—public building, $18,000.

Mr. STEWART: This is a new building. What is the justification?

Mr. CARDIN: The population is over 1,300, and the postal revenue, $2,200.

Item agreed to.

Scotstown—public building, $23,000.

Mr. STEWART: This is a revote, which indicates that the work has been undertaken. There has been a prior vote. As we have gone through these estimates what strikes one is the large number of revotes. What is the total amount expended last year out of the estimates? It seems to me there must be a very large discrepancy or margin between the votes of last year and the amount actually expended, because we have so many of these revotes. We have the figures of the total estimates, main, supplementary and others for each year; but I should like to know, if it is not too much trouble, the total amount expended out of the estimates last year to the end of the fiscal year?

Mr. CARDIN: I can supply that information the next time.

Item agreed to.

Thetford Mines—public building, $60,000.

Mr. STEWART: This is a large sum.

Mr. CARDIN: It is an important place. That is the asbestos town.

Mr. STEWART: They are all important.

Mr. CARDIN: The population of the town is 11,000; postal revenues were $20,000, and customs revenues, $52,000.

Mr. STIRLING: What will be housed in this building?

Mr. CARDIN: Post office and customs, and they are also providing accommodation for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. STEWART: Will this save rentals of buildings now used for these purposes?

Mr. CARDIN: A public building was built there in 1903, a one-storey brick structure. We are tearing it down and building a new one on that site.

Item agreed to.

Thurso—public building, $15,000.

Mr. CARDIN: The population there is nearly 1,300, and the postal revenues, $3,400. A fire occurred a short time ago which totally destroyed the building, and the post office has been moved temporarily to another site. That is the information from the Post Office Department.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

JUDGES NOT TO ACT AS COMMISSIONERS OR ARBITRATORS—TO BE BOUND BY DECISION OF COURT OF FINAL APPEAL

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 144, to amend the Judges Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. CHURCH: This bill contains two sections. The first refers to judges serving on royal commissions, while the other provides that a judge of any court referred to in the act shall be bound, when rendering decisions, by the last decision of the court of final appeal in respect to the application of the same question of law.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY—CONTRIBUTIONS BY FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

Mr. HAMILTON:

What amounts have been contributed, by years, since 1930, by the federal government towards the construction of the trans-Canada highway: (a) in Ontario; (b) to section White River west to Manitoba boundary; (c) to section between White River and North Bay; (d) to section between North Bay and Quebec boundary?

Mr. ROGERS: Statements of expenditure submitted by the province do not classify disbursements by the districts mentioned. The statement attached, however, sets forth payments made to the province of Ontario with respect to trans-Canada highway construction under each of the relief acts from 1930 to date on those divisions made by the province in submitting statements of expenditure, namely (a) Hawkesbury to Pembroke section, (b) Pembroke to North Bay section, (c) North Bay to Schreiber section, (d) Schreiber to English River section, (e) English River to Manitoba boundary section.

In addition to the above the Dominion paid $1,317,319.43 under Relief Legislation toward the cost of "Board Camps" established by the Province for Highway Work, but the portion thereof pertaining to Trans-Canada Highway cannot be determined from accounts rendered.

QUEBEC PROVINCIAL EMPLOYMENT AGENCIES

Mr. FOURNIER (Maisonneuve - Rosemount):

1. Is the dominion government participating in the expenditures of provincial employment agencies in the province of Quebec? If so, in what amount, and to how many of such agencies?

2. Has the transfer of such agencies to the exclusive jurisdiction of the dominion government been considered?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Yes. During the fiscal year 1937-38, under the terms of agreement between the federal and Quebec governments pursuant to the Employment Offices Co-ordination Act, 1918, the province of Quebec was reimbursed from federal funds to the amount of $34,659.66. The province maintains 19 employment offices in 11 different centres, and the above named amount was supplied in respect of the total expenditures incurred by the province during the period in the maintenance and operation of all these offices.

2. The subject of employment offices was mentioned in the recent correspondence between the Prime Minister and the premiers of the provinces regarding unemployment insurance, but no proposal was made for the transfer of these offices to the exclusive jurisdiction of the dominion government.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—SPADINA WHEEL SHOP, TORONTO

Mr. MASSEY:

1. Is work being done for the Canadian National Railways at the present time at the Spadina wheel shop in Toronto?

2. Has any such work been transferred from the Spadina wheel shop to shops in London, Ontario, or elsewhere?

3. If not, is it the intention to have such work, or any part thereof, so transferred, and to what shop or shops?

4. What number of employees of the Spadina wheel shop would be affected by such transfer?

Mr. MASSEY: I received information this morning from an authoritative source which answers this question completely, and, with the consent of the house, I would ask that it be dropped.

Question dropped.

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE PORTS AND OUTPORTS

Mr. FERLAND:

1. What are the locations of the various customs and excise ports and outports in each of the provinces of Canada?

[Mr. Rogers.]

2. What were the revenues of each of such ports and outports during the last fiscal year?

Mr. ILSLEY: To compile the information requested would require considerable time, but the information is already available in detail for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1937, in the report of the Department of National Revenue containing the accounts of revenue, and the report of the department containing similar detailed information for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1938, will be published in the near future.

UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): I should like to direct the attention of the government to a statement which appeared in a Vancouver newspaper and is attributed to a minister of the crown, to the effect that force will be used to deal with the single unemployed in Vancouver. I should like to ask if that statement is an expression of the present policy of the government.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I have not seen the statement to which my hon. friend refers. Any statement of government policy would be made in the house, not through the press.

MILITARY UNIFORMS

INQUIRY AS TO PURCHASE FROM DEPARTMENT AND RELIEF FROM DUTY AND SALES TAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. MARSH (Hamilton West): I should like to ask a question of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) in connection with the purchase of military uniforms by military units. The commanding officer of a military unit in the city of Hamilton made application to the ordnance department to purchase 35 summer drill uniforms at the price paid by that department, namely, $4.66 each.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MARSH: In order to make my question plain I shall have to give certain details.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should be as brief as possible in stating his question.

Mr. MARSH: My question is this: In view of the fact that the Department of National Defence and this government are appealing to manufacturers to grant men time off to go to camp, will this unit be granted permission to buy these uniforms direct from the department at $4.66 each rather than having to buy them from the supplier at a cost of $7.92 each, f.o.b. Ottawa? That is the recommendation made by the department.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): I was apprised of this question only a few moments ago, but I have a reply from the department which will possibly satisfy my hon. friend. It is as follows:

Limited quantities of khaki drill uniform, sufficient for the requirements of the permanent force personnel only, are provided by the Department of National Defence. The departmental vocabulary price is $4.44 per suit.

It has not been possible with the limited amount of money provided for the purchase of uniform clothing to build up sufficient stock to permit of issues on payment or repayment being made to units of the non-permanent active militia.

Authority, however, has been granted for units of the non-permanent active militia to wear khaki drill uniform at regimental expense, arrangements for the purchase to be made by the officers commanding units.

These uniforms are not available except for permanent force personnel.

Mr. MARSH: In view of the fact that a considerable number of items necessary to military uniforms have to be purchased outside of Canada, and duty and sales tax have to be paid on these articles—notably, that of Highland regiments in Canada; and, particularly, on sporrans, kilts, wool clothing, feathers and bagpipe parts—will the Minister of National Defence, together with the Minister of National Revenue, consider the matter of relieving such purchasers of this impost of duties, since such purchase is for national defence and in the interests of good citizenship?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the question asked by my hon. friend, numerous representations have been made in regard to the point he has raised. However, the question of tariff or rebate is not within the control of the Department of National Defence. We are considering it now.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

MEASURE TO ASSIST THE CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES —PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO LOW RENTAL HOUSES AND MUNICIPAL TAXES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider a proposed resolution to repeal the Dominion Housing Act, 1935, and reenact certain provisions thereof with amendments and additions thereto; and to make certain provisions with respect to low rental houses and municipal taxes.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this resolution is preliminary to the introduction of a national housing act. The new act will be divided into three parts, each distinct and whole in itself and attempting to deal with a specific phase of the housing problem.

Part I involves the repeal of the Dominion Housing Act and the reenactment of parts of it, together with important changes and additions designed to bring the facilities of this act to individuals and communities that have not hitherto benefited from it. This part of the legislation, part I, is intended solely for families who wish to own their own homes, and strong emphasis is placed upon facilities for families in the lower income brackets and in the small and remote communities.

Part II contemplates an experiment on a comprehensive scale in the low rental housing field, about which we have heard so much in this house and in the country in the last few years.

Part III is intended as an attack on the major obstacle retarding the building of new houses, the high level of real property taxes.

It is unnecessary for me, I am sure, at this stage to spend any time in dealing with the social and economic evils of insanitary, unsafe or inadequate housing accommodation or with the advantages to our people and our economy of raising the standard of housing conditions and restoring a more normal level of activity in the great group of construction and building supply industries which play so important a part in sustaining employment in normal times, which suffered perhaps more than any other industry from the effects of the depression, and which have been the most laggard of our industries in recovering from the depression. All these considerations are well known to the house. I can assume, therefore, that there will be a keen and sympathetic appreciation of the objectives which this legislation seeks, which I would define as (1) a substantial contribution to the elimination of unemployment in a field where it has been most heavily concentrated, and to the general stimulation of business recovery; and (2) a substantial contribution to the improvement of housing conditions, particularly for families of low income, at the same time giving our people, our provincial and municipal governments and the house building industry, a lead as to sound methods and policies that may be followed in the future.

While a real effort has been made to get substantial results and to get them promptly, I think a careful examination of the legislation which will follow this resolution will also indicate that care has been taken to safeguard the interests of the dominion and to surround the various parts of the program with provisions to ensure safe and sound businesslike procedure.

I said a few moments ago that part I repeals and reenacts part of the present Dominion Housing Act, with important changes and additions. It will be remembered that the present Dominion Housing Act was passed in 1935. It followed an examination by a committee of the house of the housing question and was the subject of extended debate in this house before it became law. Very little was done; in fact I do not think any loans were made under the Dominion Housing Act of 1935 by the former government. The act was there when the present government came into office, and we have been operating under its provisions ever since.

It early became apparent, however, that there were certain grave defects in the operation of the present Dominion Housing Act. The government endeavoured to meet those defects in so far as the powers contained in the act would permit the government to do so. We did, in fact, in September, 1936, by the changed regulations then put into effect liberalize the operation of the act very materially. However, I think it will be recognized by all who have followed the operation of the Dominion Housing Act that it suffers from at least two grave deficiencies; but before saying that I should at any rate give the Dominion Housing Act this commendation: It was the first effort in this country to deal with the problem of housing by the dominion parliament; and in spite of the defects and the weaknesses which have developed in operation, it should be noted that prior to May 31 of this year, 4,249 family housing units have been financed under this act, involving an aggregate expenditure of $17,350,000, and as of that date the average loan per family unit was $4,083.

[Mr. Dunning.]

As a consequence of the broadened regulations made available in September, 1936, there has been a considerable acceleration of lending activity under the act, but it nevertheless remains true that the total volume of this lending activity has been substantially less than is desirable. Moreover, the defects to which I have previously referred are as follows: First, the unwillingness of the lending institutions to make loans in many small and remote communities, and second, the reluctance of the lending institutions to make loans for small amounts in what they regard as the less desirable residential areas of the larger urban communities, despite the fact that these districts are, in many instances, the only areas in which it is possible for the people in the relatively low income groups to build houses for themselves.

Those are the main defects of the original legislation, and part I of the new bill seeks to remedy them. The new provisions of part I, I shall now endeavour to summarize briefly, but naturally I shall have to await the production of the detailed bill, which is necessarily somewhat complex, before entering into a general debate on the matter.

In the normal case of a loan under part I—and I use the word "normal" as distinct from the special low cost provisions to which I shall later refer—a housing loan may in future be made for from 70 to 80 per cent of the lending value of the new house, and of this total, whatever it may be, the dominion will advance 25 per cent, and the private lending institution or local municipal authority, as the case may be, 75 per cent. Under the old legislation the dominion's advance was 20 per cent of the lending value, and the maximum amount of the joint loan was 80 per cent, with provision made by regulation for 75 per cent and 80 per cent loans in certain cases as well. This change will simplify accounting, lessen bookkeeping costs, and eliminate the temptation to manipulate estimates of cost and of appraised value in order to bring the loan within the existing 70, 75 or 80 per cent categories. Provision will be made in the bill that in the case where the lending value does not exceed $2,500—that is the definitely low cost house—a loan may be made up to 90 per cent, of which the dominion is to advance its 25 per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: What relation does the lending value bear to the real value?

Mr. DUNNING: "Lending value" is defined in the statute as "the lesser of estimated cost of construction or appraised value, as the case may be."

Mr. MASSEY: It does not include the land?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I wish my hon. friends would be good enough to defer their detailed questions. I must admit this matter is quite complex, and I am desirous of making a detailed statement, after which I shall be glad to deal with questions.

I have just stated that one of the new provisions involves the possibility of a 90 per cent loan by the lending institution, in the case where the lending value is $2,500 or less, and of this 90 per cent loan the dominion will advance its 25 per cent. That is to take care of the case where it is difficult for the individual to put up a minimum equity of 20 per cent at the start. Under Canadian conditions, with the risks of change in property values and changing conditions of employment, I do not claim that 90 per cent loans give a sufficient margin of protection to the lender; nor am I sure that it is normally a kindness to the individual to encourage him to attempt the risk of home ownership with only a 10 per cent equity. Nevertheless I know there are in this country thousands of individuals in the lowest income groups who pay a large percentage of their total income for the rent of necessary housing accommodation, and consequently it is very difficult for them to put aside each month the small amount in savings that might be expected to give them, over a period of years, a 20 per cent equity in a home. The government is prepared, therefore, to try as an experiment 90 per cent loans in cases where the lending value of the property does not exceed $2,500. If an individual wishes to build a home at a higher cost than this, I think we are justified in requiring him first to build up a 20 per cent equity in the form of either a lot, or cash, or both. It will be clear, of course, that to justify lending institutions in making this type of loan, it will be necessary to give them a more effective inducement, of which I shall now speak.

I am confident, I may say, that we shall be able to get the consent of at least some lending institutions to make these small high percentage loans to deserving people in certain sections of our larger cities, in the suburban and rural areas, in fishing villages, mining towns, and small urban communities generally.

The most important change which we are proposing in this part of the bill to deal with, the matter to which I have just been referring, involves the application of the home improvement plan principle of a pooled guarantee, in respect of loans made by lending institutions and falling into certain definite categories. It will be observed that the home improvement act, which was put on the statutes a year ago, and under which some $17,000,000 have now been advanced for home improvements, involves the pooled principle; that is to say, the government's guarantee of 15 per cent under the home improvement act applies to the aggregate losses of the lending institution operating under the law.

As regards the experience up to date—it is a little early to speak of final results, though I can assure the house that the losses are running substantially below the amount of the guarantee—it is such as to warrant the government in attempting to apply the same principle with respect to the construction of low cost houses. In other words, we are asking for authority to enter into contracts with lending institutions under which we will guarantee them against loss up to a maximum of 20 per cent of the total amount of 80 per cent loans made by them which do not exceed $4,000 each for a single family dwelling, and made in such communities or districts as may be designated by the minister, and up to a maximum of 25 per cent guarantee in the case of 90 per cent loans. I hope I have made that clear. The application of the pooled guarantee principle is for the purpose of inducing and justifying the lenders in making loans in communities remote from the larger centres, small communities which as an ordinary business proposition do not commend themselves to lending institutions, both because of the cost of looking after a few loans involving considerable travelling expenses, and also because of the security factor involved in the low re-sale value of property situate where sales are infrequent, as is the case in rural communities as compared with our larger urban centres. So we say, to express that in another way, on all loans made in these areas, which must be defined by agreement, of $4,000 by a lending institution, a percentage guarantee against loss will be given to the lending institution, and the smaller the total amount of the loan and the larger the percentage which it bears to the lending value of the property, the higher will be the percentage of guarantee which the government will give as an inducement toward the financing of low-cost homes for owners thereof.

The figures I have just given, up to 25 per cent in the case of 90 per cent loans, are of course maximum figures. It is proposed not only to designate special areas, consisting of small and remote communities in which loans are not now being made, but also to develop a schedule of the amounts that the government guarantees, which will be graduated downwards in accordance with the size of the loan, say from three to four thousand dollars, and graduated upward in accordance with the percentage which the loan bears to the lending value, that is to say from 70 to 80 or 90 per cent. In other words, we may go up to the maximum of 20 per cent guarantee in the case of 80 per cent loans for $3,000 or less, but the guarantee which we will give with respect to a 70 per cent loan for an amount of $4,000 will be very much less, possibly, I should say offhand, 5 per cent. The development of a schedule of this sort is, of course, a difficult and complex process and cannot be fully detailed, I am afraid, in a statute.

A further important change in connection with part I is to make it possible for a payment to be made to a lending institution to assist it in defraying the special costs incurred in arranging loans, making appraisals, inspections and so forth in small and remote communities designated. This payment is not to exceed $20 for any one loan, plus a mileage allowance fixed by the minister for necessary travelling expenses based upon the distance from the nearest place from which the loan can be arranged and supervised by the lending institution. I am sure that members from many constituencies who have communicated with me from time to time about housing matters will appreciate the kind of difficulty which this amendment seeks to meet. I have had many communications from districts away from the larger centres complaining that no loans have been made in those communities. It is perfectly obvious that no lending institution can afford under present conditions to have its representatives make to such areas the several trips which are required in order to make a loan and inspect the house during the progress of construction. Nevertheless, residents of such communities naturally feel that they have as much right as residents of large urban areas to participate in the benefits of a national housing act. It will be necessary to designate the communities and areas in connection with which such assistance is to be given and to arrange for a schedule of allowances which will be payable in communities at varying distances from the nearest point from which the loan can be arranged by the lending institution.

Another new provision in part I increases the maximum amount which may be paid out by the minister in respect of advances, losses and expenses. A maximum of ten million dollars was the authority under the old act; it is proposed to increase this authority to twenty million dollars. Under the old act the dominion has already committed itself to $4,500,000 in respect of the $17,300,000 housing construction to which I referred earlier. The figure of $20,000,000 provided in the resolution now before the house gives us under the authority a leeway of about $15,500,000 which, together with the funds advanced by the lending institutions under the provisions of the act, should make it possible to make aggregate loans up to $60,000,000 or more under this part of the national housing act.

There are other minor amendments in connection with part I which I think can be very much better taken up on the bill itself in committee, but I have endeavoured to outline the broad provisions effecting the changes. Part I, as I said at the outset, is designed for people who desire to own their own homes and it is designed to make it easier for them to do so. It is designed to make it easier for lending institutions to make loans to enable people to own their own homes, and every provision which has been changed has been designed, to use the term I used before, to "liberalize" the application of the act. I did not use the word politically in any sense. The other day when I used the word "conservatively" some of my hon. friends opposite were welcoming a new recruit, but I did not use that word politically either.

With respect to part II, this is designed to make possible a comprehensive experiment in the field of low rental housing. It is based upon acceptance of the arguments advanced in this connection by the national employment commission, and it follows in general though not in detail the main lines of the program suggested by that commission. In this connection I wish to stress a point made in the preamble to the bill. The preamble will point out that in some areas the housing conditions fall short of minimum standards of health and decency, and that these conditions may affect not only public health and morals, but the employability and efficiency of our working population. While the primary responsibility for decent, safe and sanitary housing conditions must rest, under our constitution, upon the province and upon the municipalities, nevertheless, the proposed dominion program is justified by emergency conditions, because it is designed to create needed employment, to direct attention to the importance of the housing problem generally, and to provide a basis of experience upon which the provinces and the municipalities may follow sound and proven policies in the future.

Briefly, part II, low rental housing, provides that the minister, with the approval of the governor in council, may make loans to local housing authorities to assist in the construction of houses to be leased to families of low income. The aggregate principal amount of the loans under this part is not to exceed $30,000,000.

What are local housing authorities under the bill? Local housing authorities may consist of either of two types, depending upon whether on the one hand the municipality desires to enlist the cooperation of private enterprise in working out its low rental housing scheme, or whether on the other it desires to operate it entirely under the municipal authority. If the municipality desires to enlist the cooperation of private enterprise, private capital and business management of a private nature, it may do so through the medium of a limited dividend housing corporation with capital sufficient to provide for 20 per cent of the cost of the project. This capital, it is presumed, will be subscribed by public-spirited citizens who may be expected to plan, construct and administer the enterprise on sound business lines. They are limited in dividend on the capital they invest to a rate of 5 per cent, and from information I have it will be possible to organize such limited dividend housing corporations in some instances at a lower dividend maximum than this. Secondly, if the municipality desires to operate a low rental housing project under municipal auspices, it may do so through the medium of a commission or other body having authority to construct, hold and manage houses built as a low rental housing project, and in the case of a municipality doing the job itself in this manner it is required to put up an equity of only 10 per cent. In the case of a limited dividend housing corporation a 20 per cent equity will be required. In the case of a municipal housing corporation a 10 per cent equity will be required.

What will be the dominion's contribution? The dominion's contribution, which I think all will agree is substantial, is to be made on the basis of the dominion supplying the bulk of the funds, 80 per cent in the case of a limited dividend housing corporation and 90 per cent in the case of a municipality, at very low interest rates. In the case of a limited dividend housing corporation, where the equity subscribed privately must be at least 20 per cent, the interest rate will be 1¾ per cent per annum; and in the case of other local housing authorities, that is municipal bodies, where the equity required is only 10 per cent, the interest rate is two per cent per annum. Semi-annual payments must be made by the local housing authority to cover interest and to amortize the principal over a long period. In the case of a limited dividend housing corporation the semi-annual payment therefore will be seven-eighths of one per cent for interest and one per cent for amortization. In the case of a municipal local housing authority the semi-annual payment will be two per cent, of which one per cent represents interest and the remaining one per cent amortization. These rates of amortization in both cases will mean that the loans will be completely retired in between thirty-four and thirty-five years. That then is the dominion's contribution.

Let us now consider the provincial contribution. If the local housing authority is a municipal body, then under the same principle which was enunciated in connection with the municipal improvements assistance bill we must ask the provincial government to guarantee repayment of the amounts advanced by the dominion. As I stated on a former occasion, the municipalities are completely creatures of the provincial legislature. Changes made in municipal law by provincial legislatures may have the effect of rendering the security held by the dominion in connection with the project completely useless, and for that reason we believe we are justified, where the dominion is putting up 90 per cent of the amount to be invested in a low rental housing project operated by the municipality, in asking that the province should guarantee repayment to the dominion government of its loans in that regard. No such guarantee is asked of the provinces in connection with a scheme operated by a limited dividend housing corporation. Obviously the larger equity, double the amount, renders that less desirable, and from my point of view at least it has this advantage, that those municipalities which desire to undertake low rental housing projects will, I believe, be able to get going with the matter very much more quickly if they can interest public-spirited citizens in putting up 20 per cent of the cost through the medium of a limited dividend housing corporation than they will be able to do, by reason of delay due to changes in law which might be required in some cases before the municipal law would be sufficiently broad to enable them to operate municipally.

What must the municipality do? The municipality must have approved the project, and must have secured the guarantee from the province, if it is to be operated as a purely municipal project. The municipality must also agree that municipal taxes on the low rental housing project, during the period of its operation under this legislation, while there is any money owing to the dominion, shall not exceed one per cent annually of the cost of the whole project. We ask the municipality also in the case of the limited dividend corporation, in case they prefer this method, to agree that if the administration by that method involves a shortage in the amount due the dominion government, the municipality will reduce taxes still further to enable that amount to be made up. Not having the guarantee of the provincial government, we must there insist upon the closeness of municipal interest in the scheme and a degree of responsibility. The municipality must also agree not to levy taxes on the income of a local housing authority. Also, if the municipality is operating directly a low rental housing scheme, it must put up, as I said before, 10 per cent of the total cost, which of course may be and in most instances will take the form of land for the project. In addition, the municipality may—there is no "must" about this—make additional voluntary contributions to a rent reduction fund, which I shall describe a little later.

What about the rental provisions? No family housing unit in a low rental housing project is to be rented to a family whose family income is equal to more than five times the economic rental of the unit, unless there is no demand for the unit from families of lower income. The logic behind this provision is that a family can afford to pay about 20 per cent of its annual income for rent. If this 20 per cent is sufficient to pay the economic rental of housing accommodation, private enterprise should be able to provide sufficient housing accommodation without any special subsidy from the state. "Economic rental" is defined in the bill as a rental which gives a return of 9½ per cent on the cost of construction plus the annual municipal taxes. Families of low income are defined as families whose total family income is less than five times the economic rental of a family housing unit built as part of the low rental housing project. The annual rental to be charged a family of low income is to be not in excess of 20 per cent of the total income of such family. Provision is also made for the possible establishment of a rent reduction fund by voluntary contributions from the province or the municipality concerned. These contributions are not compulsory; but if it is desired by the municipality to lease the accommodation at lower rates than are made possible by the annual carrying charge of the project, that is at rates low enough to meet the needs of families in the very lowest income group, then the municipality and the province are in a position to reach this objective by making voluntary contributions to the rent reduction fund.

As far as safeguards are concerned, there will be provision that evidence of the need for a low rental housing project must be shown by the municipality concerned. The area must be adequately planned and zoned. The project must be of sufficient size to give reasonable economies. Economic design and sound construction will be required. The management of the local housing authority must be satisfactory. The terms of acquisition of the land must be satisfactory. The terms of the charter of any local housing authority must be satisfactory. The local housing authority must agree to keep the houses in a satisfactory state of repair, and keep books and accounts and make an annual report to the minister. A limited dividend housing corporation must give an option to the municipality to buy the project for the amount of the corporation's paid-up capital and any unpaid dividends. Let me repeat that in another form: If any municipality adopts the limited dividend housing corporation method of dealing with this problem, then the corporation, when formed, must give an option to the municipality enabling the municipality to take over the enterprise at any time, the amount to be paid being fixed by the amount of the paid-up capital of the corporation plus any accrued dividends. Thus those investing their money in low rental housing projects under the limited dividend corporation method are assured that they can at no time get more than 5 per cent return on their money, neither can they hope for any accretion in the capital value of their investment. A further provision is that if there is a breach of contract to pay, the amount of the loan may be declared due and payable or the interest rate may be increased.

Let us now consider the amount of loan which may be made in a municipality for the purpose of low rental housing projects. The total of the loans made in any municipality must not exceed that proportion of $30,000,000 which the population of the municipality bears to the total urban population of Canada on the basis of the 1931 census. That proportion, Mr. Speaker, will give ample opportunity for the development of large scale experiments, particularly in our larger centres, in the direction of low rental housing projects.

There may be some criticism at first sight because of the slightly lower rate of interest which it is proposed to charge a limited dividend housing corporation as compared with a municipality operating directly. After all, the private persons who organize a limited dividend housing corporation must put up an equity of twenty per cent, which is twice the amount of the equity required in the case of a municipal corporation. The private persons who organize such a corporation will be required to do a vast amount of work in connection with planning the project, supervising construction and managing the project during its useful life. Their dividends are limited to a maximum of five per cent, which is not a very high rate for individuals who are willing to risk a substantial amount of capital for thirty-four or thirty-five years. Then, of course, I have already referred to the other provision which ensures that the limited dividend housing corporation must give an option to the municipality which will preserve the right of the municipality to take over the project at the amount of the capital invested by the limited dividend corporation. Also I believe it desirable to give every inducement to get private capital to cooperate in this task of solving the problem of families with low incomes, on a non-profit basis. I am sure not all but many municipalities would very much prefer to have limited dividend corporations of this sort take up the burden rather than themselves assume responsibility for active participation in a housing scheme and the obligation connected therewith. In this connection, of course, we have the experience of the housing scheme of 1919 and everything connected with it. With one or two outstanding exceptions, such as the city of Winnipeg, the municipal administration of the 1919 housing effort is not something to which we can point with very much pride. However, either method is available to the municipality concerned.

One of the most important reasons, to which I referred briefly a moment or two ago, for making provision for loans at low rates of interest to limited dividend corporations, of course is that they can initiate their programs immediately, in most cases I believe without waiting for the action of provincial legislatures or governments authorizing the guarantee of loans made by the dominion. I suppose some hon. members will be surprised to learn that in at least one of our great cities—in fact I know it is the case in more than one, but in one particularly—the work has been very much advanced along this line. A great deal of preparatory work in planning a low rental housing project has been done already, and I believe the group to whom I am referring will be in a position to get this work under way very promptly: It should be noted also that the limited dividend housing corporation has been tried with conspicuous success in many instances in the United States, in Great Britain and in some other of the northern European countries. Many such corporations have had quite remarkable records, even during the depression. Those who have invested their capital have found not a lucrative but at least a fairly satisfactory investment for their personal funds, and I am hoping that as a result of the present program we may be able to induce leading business men in many communities to devote their time, ingenuity and experience to the organization and management of limited dividend housing corporations. While their monetary dividends will be small I think the dividends they will receive in personal satisfaction through having made a contribution to the solution of the housing problem ought to be ample compensation.

Mr. CAHAN: I should like to ask one question. Under the limited dividend housing scheme the limited dividend will be in addition to the entire cost of administration of the corporation, I presume?

Mr. DUNNING: Of course they must first pay the entire cost of administration before any money is available for dividends, and they may pay only five per cent under any circumstances.

I should now try to give some information as to the rentals which should be made possible under such schemes. It will be apparent, of course, that the rentals will vary as between different communities because of differences in the cost of construction of the average family housing unit. This in turn will depend on several factors; the cost of building materials in the community, the level of wages paid to building craftsmen, the relative efficiency of labour, the skill and ingenuity which are shown in designing and planning the houses, the care and efficiency displayed in supervising the construction in order to keep down costs, the size of the project and the extent to which large scale economies can be secured in the cost of land; also, last but not least, the efficiency of operating management. For the sake of illustration I think I am at liberty to draw on some of the results worked out in one of our largest cities, where building costs are high but where a great deal of time and ingenuity have been devoted to working out detailed plans for what was intended to be a low rental housing project to be built and managed by a limited dividend corporation. The group of responsible business men behind this scheme I think deserve the commendation of Canadians generally for getting down to hard work on a specific project rather than confining themselves to mere talk about housing, and I hope if this bill passes parliament they will be able to consummate the project on which they have been working for the past two years.

I use this project only as a possible typical instance, because it has been worked out very thoroughly and with great care. It involved the construction of a low rental housing project consisting of four hundred housing units in twenty so called X blocks, located on about twenty acres of land, thus giving ample space for landscaping and for plots of land in the front and rear of the buildings. Apartments of various sizes were planned for families of various sizes, but for the purpose of calculation they used as a basis an average dwelling providing accommodation for five adults or for two adults and six small children. Based on recent conditions as to prices of materials and wages they estimated that the entire project, including land improvement, will cost about $1,080,000, and that the average cost per dwelling will be slightly less than $2,700.

Let us for a moment assume that this project is constructed on this basis by a limited dividend corporation financed under part II of the bill which will be based on this resolution. Briefly this will be the financial set-up. The total cost of the project will be $1,080,000, of which the dominion first-mortgage loan will provide 80 per cent or $864,000. The equity of 20 per cent put in by the proprietors will amount to $216,000. On that basis the annual carrying charges are estimated as follows: interest and amortization on the dominion loan, at 3¾ per cent, which is the aggregate of both interest and amortization, $32,400.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that not too much?

Mr. DUNNING: It works out at about that.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought it was one per cent for amortization.

Mr. DUNNING: It is seven-eighths per cent half yearly for interest and one per cent for amortization; twice 1⅞ per cent is 3¾ per cent. A five per cent dividend on the twenty per cent equity would be $10,800. Municipal taxes at one per cent of the cost of construction would be $10,800. The cost of management expenses, heating, maintenance and repairs, allowance for vacancies, et cetera, has been checked carefully by many interested parties, and is put at $32,000. The total annual carrying charge on the project would be $86,000, which includes a five per cent dividend on the twenty per cent equity

This means an annual carrying charge per average dwelling of $215. The rental per month of a heated apartment would be just under $18. It must be remembered that this is an apartment project and that these rentals cover heating. For an unheated apartment the rental would be between $15 and $16 per month. Of course smaller units could be rented for a proportionately smaller amount. I give this merely for illustration purposes and as evidence of the work that is being done along these lines in some of our larger communities. In other communities where the average family unit could be constructed at a lower figure, proportionately lower rentals would be possible. If still lower rents are desired than are provided for by an estimate such as this, they could be secured by the municipality or the provincial government or both making voluntary contributions to a rent reduction fund. In other words, this program makes it possible for municipalities to attain any results they wish in the way of rent if they are prepared to make the appropriate contributions.

The third part of this bill is unique. It is designed for the purpose of making a direct attack over the next three years on what is believed by many to be the major factor retarding house construction in this country. I may say that the idea back of part III was communicated to me particularly by the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) in connection with a small scale experiment which has been made in the town of Burlington, and by other members who have not been following it quite as closely but who have called my attention to what has been made possible through a combination of the old Dominion Housing Act with the principle now laid down in part III of the bill now before the house.

While there are other factors, I think most will admit that the cost of real property taxes in our municipalities is the most important deterrent to the construction of new homes. In many municipalities the taxes are so high that many people prefer to live in a rented house and let the landlord worry about taxes and the carrying charges on his investment. If we ask why taxes are so high we find ourselves in a vicious circle. To an important degree taxes are high because relief costs are high. Relief costs are high because unemployment exists, and unemployment exists because, among other things, there is little construction work being carried on. It follows, therefore, that if we can stimulate the construction industry we will create employment. The creating of employment will decrease the burden of relief charges upon our municipalities and thus tend to lessen, other things being equal, the burden of taxes upon existing real estate.

It is therefore proposed in part III of the bill now under consideration that the Minister of Finance, with the approval of the governor in council, shall be authorized to pay the municipal taxes levied upon a house, the construction of which begins between June 1, 1938, and December 31, 1940, up to the following amounts:

100 per cent of such taxes for the first year in which the house is taxed;
50 per cent of such taxes for the second year in which the house is taxed; and 25 per cent of such taxes for the third year in which the house is taxed.

Municipal taxes are defined to include the general municipal tax and the school tax, but excluding special and local improvement taxes. The minister pays only the increase in such taxes due to the construction of the new house. The principal conditions to be complied with are relatively simple. As an evidence of good faith, having regard to the dominion's contribution under this part III, we think that municipalities owning considerable numbers of lots suitable for the building of low cost homes should cooperate by making such lots available at a figure not to exceed $50 each to people who want to build low cost homes. Many of our municipalities are doing this already in various ways and we think it should be a condition of the dominion's grant in aid of municipal taxation.

The second condition is that the cost of the construction of the house must not exceed $4,000. Municipal taxation assistance is confined entirely to low cost homes. I should have said in connection with the first condition regarding the municipality making land available that this does not mean that the assistance by way of grants from the dominion is confined to low cost homes built upon lands supplied by the municipalities. The assistance in connection with municipal taxation is intended to apply to the increased municipal taxation brought about by the construction of any home anywhere in Canada which costs under $4,000 to erect. The house must be built by a person for his own occupation and the owner of the house must be released by the municipality from paying any part of the taxes which the dominion pays. Naturally, this taxation subsidy is not given with respect to any house constructed under part II of the bill which deals with low rental housing, but it would apply to houses constructed under part I.

If we can by this means stimulate the construction of new houses which would otherwise not be built, we will have done a great deal to reduce the costs of unemployment and the consequent burdens upon our municipalities. Apart from the vitally important social advantages of restoring the employable unemployed to normal employment again, existing property owners should benefit in a direct financial sense by the consequent reduction in tax burdens for the relief of the unemployed and by the fact that there are being created a larger number of units to carry the burden of taxation. Of course, it is impossible to predict how many houses will be built prior to December 31, 1940, as a result of the stimulus given by this part of the new bill. However, if we assume that the houses eligible for this tax subsidy are constructed during the three years to the value of $100,000,000, we can make certain estimates as to the volume of employment created and the aggregate cost to the dominion.

We assume that as a result of this volume of construction municipal assessments will be increased by the same amount, namely, $100,000,000, and that the average tax rate is two and a half per cent of the cost. When we bear in mind that assessments of improvements are frequently on the basis of 60 to 75 per cent, or less, I think these assumptions are reasonably safe. In that case the total cost to the dominion would be less than $5,000,000 for the three-year period.

It has frequently been estimated that eighty per cent of every dollar spent in house building goes to labour, either direct or indirect. If this estimate be correct, the $100,000,000 spent on the construction of low cost housing during the next three years would provide $80,000,000 in wages to workmen in the construction trades and in the building material and supply industries, and the result would be, if that were true, that for every $1,000 paid in wages the tax subsidy would cost the dominion about $54.70—and that is very much cheaper than relief.

Some members, of course, will regard these figures as extremely optimistic, and prefer to make their own calculations. However, even after making a considerable allowance for a margin of error, I think the house will still agree that if employment can be created by this method it will be amply worth while to the Dominion of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, studying as I have studied during the last three years this housing problem and the manner in which it has been met in various countries, I reached the conclusion long ago that we would of necessity have to evolve in Canada a plan suitable for Canadian conditions. There is scarcely a country in which an attack has been made on this problem which has not experimented over a long period of years with different types of legislation before finding the best means of dealing with the problem. Indeed, in many countries which are most progressive in this regard there are several different types of schemes in operation. We have had the advantage up to date of our experience only under the Dominion Housing Act, supplemented during the last year with our experience under the Home Improvement Act. We believe that with the best will in the world this parliament cannot make a success of any housing scheme without a broad degree of cooperation from many sections of the Canadian public.

In the first place, to my mind it is most important to rid the mind of the man of small means of the fear which is there now of the responsibility involved in building even a low cost home for himself. Fear is very largely the cause of this depression, and on this continent particularly it is a fear which has not the same justification as it has in Europe. In Europe, close to all of the international difficulties now existing, people fear war. We may fear it on this continent, but at least, Mr. Speaker, the centre of disturbance is five thousand miles away from us. Our fears on this continent rest upon a different basis, and they have been existing now for several years.

The evidences of fear on the part of people of small means who have small savings are found in the growing savings deposits in our banks and trust companies. People in many cases would rather put their money into the safe keeping of institutions which they deem to be safe than attain the ambition of a lifetime by the ownership of a home of their own, involving a commitment for the future, rendered uncertain in their view because of the high taxation, the uncertainty of employment, and this widespread fear of depression.

If the government and parliament of this country can, by the degree of cooperation involved in the three parts of this act, stimulate the man of small means through the knowledge that his parliament and his government have faith in the future of the country, and that the people as a whole are willing to put their credit behind the small man, and are willing to give to him advantages--ease of payments, ease of cost, contributing towards his load of taxation—something worth while will have been accomplished.

[Mr. Dunning.]

I know what it means when a man is contemplating building a small home. The big costs come in the first year; a thousand and one things happen to increase his burden of expenditure during that period. I know what it will mean to thousands of artisans in this country to know that for the first year there will be no tax bill with respect to municipal and school taxes on that house; that for the second year there will be only fifty per cent, and for the third year only seventy-five per cent. I know what it will mean to people of small means to come within the provisions of the low cost housing features of this bill.

One of the great objectives, therefore, is to cooperate to cast out fear on the part of those who must initiate this scheme through their desire to own a home of their own, which is one of the most healthy aspirations in the breast of any man.

Secondly, and this is vitally important, we must have the hearty cooperation of those great trustee institutions of the savings of the people of Canada in the form of life insurance companies. The people of Canada have displayed their faith in life insurance to a degree that is exceeded by only one other nation on the face of the earth, and the sums entrusted to our life insurance organizations are immense. The responsibility for their investment is very great, and I know that those responsible for the investment of such funds feel their responsibility very keenly. I do say that this legislation is designed to cast out fear on the part of those investment institutions also, and to encourage them, as partners with the parliament of Canada, to make advances for the purpose of building homes not merely in our larger great centres where everything is easy, and where salability of property in case of foreclosure is relatively greater, but also in the smaller centres throughout the country. The tendency in the last few years with respect to the financing of homes has been to accelerate the growth of our great communities and to retard the normal growth of those small communities throughout Canada which are still the backbone of our country. We must therefore get the cooperation of the lending institutions. They have a great stake, and I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that they will see their way clear to cooperate one hundred per cent in the carrying out of the objectives of this bill.

Then we also require in connection with certain parts of the bill the cooperation, of course, of the municipalities, in the setting up of the local housing authorities, providing for adequate zoning and planning ordinances, granting the partial tax exemption called for under part II of the bill relating to low rental housing, and doing real constructive work on the planning of low rental housing objects.

We desire the cooperation of the provincial governments in providing legislation, where legislation is necessary, because of the character of their existing laws; in giving leadership, we hope, and direction to the municipalities within the province, and in giving the provincial guarantee where low rental projects must be carried on by a local housing authority which is municipal in character.

Last, but not least, the construction industry. I hope that none of my friends, members of parliament who may have connections direct or indirect with the building construction industry, will misunderstand when I say that this legislation is a challenge to the building construction industry of this country, and is so intended. It is often stated that of all our industries, the one most laggard in advancing, in taking advantage of possibilities of improved technique, of lowering costs, of the standardizing of commodities, is the building industry. I do not join in that criticism, but I do say that there is one way in which anything this parliament may do in connection with housing can be killed, and that is for the building construction industry, capital and labour, material suppliers and all the rest, to believe that they can, by reason of it, start a steady upward trend in the price of the commodities they have to sell, whether those commodities consist of capital, goods or labour. We require the maximum of cooperative effort from everybody concerned; also, and not least, from leading citizens in every community. In this connection we are doing as we did the other day in connection with municipal improvements; we are stepping into a field which hitherto has not been a field of the dominion parliament, a field which, according to the opinions held by very eminent gentlemen, we have no constitutional right to occupy, and which we can justify entering at all only as primarily an attack upon our great national problem of unemployment. We require, therefore, the cooperation not only of all members of the house, but of all citizens, in what I sincerely believe to be a constructive, long-range, national housing act.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): It is very interesting to have listened to the admirable address of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), which more properly might have been made on the second reading of the bill, when we would have had it in our possession and would thus have been able to follow the details of it. I think his original intention must have been to deliver it on the second reading, having regard to the words he used in closing his speech. On the other hand, there are certain promontories that stand out in the legislation, and we are enabled to understand the general drift of it, although so many details determine its success that it will be very difficult to express opinions on the bill until such time as we have them before us.

It is gratifying to know that the matter to which I directed the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) the other day was at least foreshadowed by a speech made by a member of the administration in the province of Saskatchewan. It will be recalled that it was indicated that we were to have this measure; and the minister was not quite sure, but "surely there must be some mistake" that the minister had said it would be approximately fifty million dollars. My information on that point, however, was accurate, as indicated by the press reports. In that regard I took the trouble to look up what happened to the Secretary of State for India, who published a telegram in India that had been sent from India to London; on his own responsibility he sent it back to India without consulting the prime minister or the members of the government; it was printed there and telegraphed back to London from India,—much as the speech made the other evening in Saskatchewan as to the intentions of this parliament with respect to a low-cost housing program came by telegraph to Ottawa and other centres of the country and was published before this parliament had been made aware of the proposal. In that case Mr. Lloyd George dismissed Mr. Montagu. A report of the incident will be found in the Annual Register for 1922. These words are rather important:

> In the middle of the month a political crisis of the first magnitude arose owing to the publication of a message addressed by the government of India to Mr. Montagu. The message stated that the government of India felt it to be their duty again to lay before his majesty's government the intensity of feeling in India regarding the necessity for a revision of the Sèvres treaty.

Then follow some details, and the record proceeds:

> The publication of such a message naturally caused a widespread sensation, more particularly when it became known that the publication had been sanctioned by Mr. Montagu without reference to his colleagues in the cabinet. Almost immediately following on the publication of this message came the announcement of Mr. Montagu's resignation. The resignation was announced by Mr. Chamberlain in the House of Commons on March 9.

The report in Hansard of what took place on the 9th of March is wholly beside the issue here. But Mr. Chamberlain took the opportunity to point out that the doctrine of cabinet solidarity was so important that it must be preserved, and that when the Secretary of State for India saw fit to send to India and permit publication through the press there of a message which had not been communicated to the prime minister or the government or to parliament, his resignation should be sought, as it was; and he ceased to occupy his position.

There is an issue here, as I think the Minister of Justice was quick to grasp the other day, an important principle. A very important proposal involving fifty millions of public money is made known to the people of Canada through a speech delivered by a member of the administration in the far-off province of Saskatchewan, which is then telegraphed to this city and to other cities of the dominion. Such, of course, is in contravention of the rules that govern in respect to matters of this kind. I only point out the Montagu case because it happens to be the most recent outstanding case where a departure from the rules governing cabinet solidarity brought about the enforced resignation of the minister who had offended.

The legislation which is to be based on the resolution must naturally be followed with great interest by every member of the house. I think it will be agreed that it will be almost impossible to follow the details of the legislation if you look at the terms of the resolution upon which the legislation is to be based; for the resolution is silent with respect to the details with which the minister has furnished us. For instance, there is no indication of the rate of interest. There are no indications of many other matters on which the success of the legislation depends. I am not complaining as to that. I do not suggest that the minister should be asked to furnish in great detail in a resolution the particulars of his impending legislation; but certainly matters relating to rates of interest have hitherto been held to be matters that should properly be indicated in a resolution upon which legislation is predicated.

Those who were then members of this house and who recall the meetings of the special committee which dealt with the question in 1935, and the discussions in this chamber on the legislation introduced by the former minister of finance, Mr. Rhodes, will recall that on that occasion he pointed out with great clarity that this was after all by way of experiment, and the authorization of ten millions of dollars was intended to be the beginning of the experiment which has resulted, as the Minister of Finance has pointed out, in a fair measure of success, some seventeen millions of dollars being invested in these enterprises. The principle upon which it was thought possible to undertake dominion participation in low cost housing was discussed by a committee of this house, and at length in this chamber. The minister a moment ago referred to our lack of experience in this country. I could not help recalling the words of Tennyson, that we are heirs of the ages. For the minister knows, as do those who are responsible for what has been said as well as what has been printed, that this legislation embodies in terms, with respect to one part of it, the experience of other countries in a similar field of activities. The minister nods his head affirmatively because he made a passing reference to the point in his admirable address. We have then the experience of other countries in dealing with this problem. We have in particular the experience of Scandinavian countries and we have had to a lesser extent the experience of the people of England who, by reason of their form of government, have confined themselves to a smaller number of methods than those which are contemplated by this legislation.

The legislation, Mr. Speaker, to be based upon this resolution contemplates our occupancy of three distinct fields of activity. With respect to one the dominion parliament has given its sanction to our thus occupying the field, and the experiments that have been made in the days that are past have been sufficient to warrant the view, as the minister has stated, that we should continue our efforts in that direction. After all, a year or two is a very short time in which to draw an inference or a conclusion from the operation of any statute, as has been found in practice. But to the extent to which, as the minister has pointed out, our experience warrants it, we certainly would be derelict in our duty if we did not continue the operations of the act of 1935. That act therefore, in its essential features, is to be maintained, but the amount of money to be made available is increased. Broadly, that is the position.

Mr. DUNNING: It is considerably more than that.

Mr. BENNETT: There are certain matters of detail. I will deal with one of them. The minister referred to the liberalizing regulations of 1936. Even in that regard the political aspect must not be overlooked.

He said that the liberalizing regulations of 1936 did something to widen the operation of the statute. Now, there was no amendment to the statute that warranted those regulations; they were within the ambit of the statute as passed in 1935; and the modification of the regulations came about by reason of the experience derived from the operation of the statute, which was the intention as expressed by the minister of finance of that day standing in the position which the present minister occupies.

The other phases of the legislation which are to be modified in the light of experience are changes that have been brought about in consequence of the knowledge which we now possess. I think the minister made that abundantly clear. But when you pass into the second field of our activities as indicated by the act, there you have indeed the application to Canada of principles that have been found useful and effective in other countries. But they have attained their end by different methods. For there are constitutional difficulties in this country as compared with other countries where there is but one legislature to be considered in dealing with these matters.

One must bear in mind, therefore, that there are certainly grave difficulties—if I followed the minister aright—that must be met. Unless the provinces are prepared, through the creatures they have created, namely, the municipalities, as well as by their own act, to take the necessary legislative action, part II will not become effective. I am leaving out for the moment the question whether or not the legislatures will be called together to deal with the matter, but there is one thing that is obvious to every hon. member and that is that no municipality, in the absence of specific legislation, can grant special rates of assessment.

Mr. DUNNING: There are some cases in which it is possible, but very few.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that in my recollection of the municipal law of this country the essential element upon which the supreme court acted in a well-known case was that the burden of taxation shall be borne ratably and proportionately according to the assessment made, and that no power rests in the municipality, unless specifically given it by the legislature, to make a distinction between one class of ratepayer and another as to payment of taxes only upon a given proportion of the assessment.

Mr. DUNNING: In some cases that authority exists as between the province and the municipality to a degree, though I am not certain that it is to a sufficient degree.

Mr. BENNETT: Bearing in mind the principles that have been applied by the courts in connection with assessments, I think it may be said that as a general rule there can be no such thing in this country as discrimination with respect to the amount of taxation that is to be paid by a given proprietor as distinguished from his contiguous proprietor. Now we are going to do that.

Mr. VIEN: That is correct in Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: It is generally correct.

Mr. SLAGHT: In Ontario, with the approval of the municipal board.

Mr. BENNETT: As the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) has said, instead of going to the legislature for many matters within the terms of the municipal board act, the approval of that board is equivalent to the approval of the legislature. That is in Ontario. But there is a limitation upon that, a very clear limitation, namely: the action taken by the board must be within the ambit of the jurisdiction conferred upon it by the legislature. That is a fair statement of its position, and in some instances it is very limited. That contemplates first the conferring of new powers upon the municipality; secondly, those powers can be conferred only by the legislatures; and thirdly, that involves obviously action being taken by the legislatures before this provision in part II can become effective.

I pointed out to the minister the other day how much I regretted that this measure had not been submitted before the legislatures had risen in order that effective action might be taken by them to deal with the matter at their recent sessions. I am not going to traverse the other points made by the minister as to the conditions precedent to the dominion exercising its lending power. I think that in two instances the minister overlooked the fact that guarantees are being given by the dominion to the lending companies in connection with the sums that they invest in these enterprises. There is just one matter to which I would refer, and I am sure it is in the mind of the minister, from what he said. The difficulty of private capital investing in these undertakings—and I do not greatly disagree with what he said with respect to fear—lies in the fear of action being taken by the legislatures which will impair the value of the security. Now, we cannot interfere in these matters ourselves. We have no power as a dominion to make these conditions except as conditions upon which the loan is made. The minister pointed out what those conditions were. But when they involve legislative action which cannot be taken by a municipality itself, it means that the legislatures of the several provinces must agree to the conditions and terms which we impose. Whether they will or will not is purely conjecture, about which I shall at the moment say nothing.

Mr. ROGERS: That is solely with respect to low rental housing.

Mr. BENNETT: No; both parts II and III are affected by it. I am coming to that in a moment. As to part II it is quite obvious that we have no legislative jurisdiction with respect to the major number of the conditions mentioned by the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no doubt about that, as to part II.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. The minister very properly has said, by inference, that we propose to make it a matter of contract—that is, acceptance of the conditions—before we will make the grant. That is the only method by which we can do it.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the only door open to us to do our part.

Mr. BENNETT: There would be another way, but that is a way of which the government does not think well, and about which I shall not enter into a controversy at the moment. The imposition of conditions precedent upon the borrower—I use the term "borrower" as a generic term—by the lender is again a matter involving property and civil rights, with respect to which action of the legislature may impair the value of the arrangement made. It is not like banking and commerce, where we exercise ancillary powers, as we did in connection with invading the field about chattel mortgages (Tennant v. Union bank), but here it is not a question of being ancillary within the decision within a more recent case in the privy council in connection with radio receiving sets. This cannot be said in any sense to be ancillary to it. In other words we have no legislative power to start with. Not having legislative power we are seeking to occupy the field by the imposition of conditions in a contract which we make for the purpose of lending the money —a contract not with the province, and not with the municipality, but direct with the borrower himself. The minister said just now that it is the only door open to enable us to operate in this field. I would say there is another method by which it could be done, but that method the government do not desire to follow; they have made it quite apparent that they do not, so we will leave it at that. It will be recalled that this question did arise in this parliament in the days of the assistance given to highways, and in the case of one other statute as well. It is not necessary to traverse that ground this afternoon.

With respect to parts I and II, I think I can summarize the position in a few sentences. First, antecedent to the exercise of our power, which must be by way of imposition of conditions under a contract, we have no legislative jurisdiction in the premises. That is apparent. Second, in the exercise of the powers we shall have to insist upon conditions being observed which, after they are merged in a contract, will not be subject to our legislative control. The minister nods his acquiescence.

Mr. DUNNING: Therefore the provincial guarantee.

Mr. BENNETT: I was just going to say, that is why the minister repeated to-day what he said a few days ago, that we must have a provincial guarantee. The reason given for it is, shall I say, ample from one angle, but it is a dangerous one from another angle, as the minister at once observes and understands, without going into details. I think however it is fair for me to say that having acquiesced in the principle in respect to part I in 1935, in the light of what the minister has said I see no reason why we should depart from the support of that principle. With respect to part II the principle is sound. But just how under our constitutional structure it can best be applied, I am not at the moment going to express an opinion, because the speech that was made was, as I say, more properly a second reading speech; for we would then have had before us the printed bill and thus be able to follow the details.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my right hon. friend will let me explain why I did not do that. I felt that I could not ask the house to pass the resolution without giving the particulars.

Mr. BENNETT: I appreciate that the minister departed from what was in his mind originally, and gave the house the benefit of his lucid exposition of the details; but it was quite obvious that the house could not follow it unless they had before them the printed bill. They will have to take Hansard and apply it to the printed bill. That will obviate the necessity of the minister making his speech over again on second reading. And he probably has afforded opportunity for the people of the country to have some knowledge of the proposal, although I doubt if they will have as clear an understanding as they might have had if the bill had been printed and the speech made on second reading.

With respect to the third field which the minister proposes to occupy, I shall be very brief. I need hardly say that the question of the federal government assuming taxes in municipalities is nothing new. The minister said it was unique, but during the last ten or fifteen years I venture to say there has not been a month during which communications have not been received from municipalities asking that local improvement taxes on crown property be paid by the dominion and that the property be made subject to municipal taxation. For instance corner lots are frequently occupied by federal buildings, and such lots when in the possession of other owners are heavily taxed for local improvements—that is, sidewalks, sewers, and the like. It will be within the memory of some that we have from time to time voted sums of money through the Department of Public Works for the purpose of providing some of these taxes. One of the submissions made to the so-called Rowell commission was that dominion property should pay municipal taxes. Now we propose to pay the whole of the tax for the first year after the construction of the new buildings. I point out that to do that, if it is on the basis of the ordinary assessment, which would be thirty mills in some communities, would call for a larger sum than the minister contemplates paying. That necessitates authority being given to the municipality to lessen and restrict its power of taxation with respect to properties covered by this bill, namely those other than part II. It will require some act of legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: To enable us to deal with part III we require legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not any doubt that it will, for this reason; the minister does not propose to pay the tax on the basis of the normal assessment rate.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: But in his speech he placed a limitation upon it.

Mr. DUNNING: We intend to pay the amount by which the municipal and school taxes have been increased by the erection of the building. The figures I used were based upon a calculation of cost rather than of assessment; they were used for the purpose of illustration. Whatever the taxes are we will pay them.

Mr. BENNETT: But not the whole tax.

Mr. DUNNING: No, the amount by which the taxation has been increased by reason of the erection of the building.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point exactly. Two factors complicate the situation. Taxes are on the basis of assessment, not cost. And the minister very properly pointed out that improvements are taxed in some municipalities at fifty or sixty per cent of their cost, in other cases a little higher. It would therefore follow that there must be an adjustment in each case, based upon cost, for the purpose of determining what our contribution should be.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: It could not be otherwise.

Mr. DUNNING: The only regulating factor is that we will not pay on a house which exceeds $4,000 in cost.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite; that is simple, and you are not going to pay the whole of the taxes.

Mr. DUNNING: We will pay that portion of them represented by the taxes on the building.

Mr. BENNETT: Precisely; you are not going to pay the whole of the taxes.

Mr. DUNNING: The taxes are usually divided under two headings, land and buildings.

Mr. BENNETT: The municipal tax notice that I receive for a piece of property in Calgary is for all the services that are supplied to me, or to my house, by that city. It involves many matters; sidewalks—

Mr. VIEN: Land and buildings.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. It includes sewers, sidewalks and so-called improvements, the latter being the buildings erected on the land. Under this measure the government propose to pay the taxes only on the difference that is shown by the cost of the building on that assessment.

Mr. DUNNING: No, by the assessment on the building, which was not there before, remember.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister made it perfectly clear that we are not going to pay all the taxes. That is the first point. The second point is that the portion of the taxes we are going to pay is that portion which would be represented by the increase in taxes consequent upon the construction of the building—

Mr. DUNNING: That is it.

Mr. BENNETT: —as assessed by the city, of course.

Mr. DUNNING: Surely.

Mr. BENNETT: It is conceivable that this would mean only half relief where the taxes are as high as fifty and sixty mills. I only point that out to the minister now, because it will be a matter requiring very careful consideration in committee when we come to deal with the bill itself. I know that in some of our municipalities the tax rate has risen to as high as fifty mills, and I believe in some parts of Canada—I am speaking now from my memory of Doctor Brittain's record—the municipal taxation has gone as high as sixty mills.

Mr. HEAPS: It all depends on the nature of the assessment.

Mr. BENNETT: It also depends to some extent on who makes the assessment, but at any rate that is true. What I have to say with respect to part III is that however anxious we may be, as I think we all are, to give some stimulus to the building industry and to create an interest on the part of people to have homes for themselves, to help in tying themselves to their communities more securely than otherwise they would, we have to remember what our constitutional limitations are.

Mr. DUNNING: That is an awkward thing to have to remember, but we must remember it.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree with the minister that it is an awkward thing to have to remember; yet we must remember it. That is why I have been so anxious that we should have a constitutional conference for the purpose of discussing the question of the amendment of our constitution. But I am not going to do more than reserve the right to discuss the details in the fullest possible way when the measure is before the house, and I shall content myself by merely saying that as to the general principle I should think there would be no conflict of opinion in any part of this house. But I must say that as the undertaking has been outlined here to-day I think our right to act is dependent upon too many conditions over which we have no control; and which, if acceded to by those with whom we deal contractually, are still subject to the very difficulties the minister quite properly pointed out, namely the question of the right of the legislatures or of their creatures legally authorized so to deal with the subject matter of the security as to render it practically valueless from our standpoint, having regard to the extent of our advance.

The question of the amount of our advances under different circumstances, and the question of the creation of corporations really with preferred stock not entitled to receive more than 5 per cent in interest, are really matters which concern the methods adopted to accomplish the purpose. In my judgment they may be improved upon by this house, by timely suggestions that may be made when the bill is in committee. We adopt the broad principle by supporting the resolution. We reserve in full the right to determine how best we may be able to achieve that end, having regard to the constitutional limitations which exist. Certainly at the moment I am not disposed to give my approval to an acceptance of the methods indicated by the minister, as being sound either in practice or in theory, as applied to this particular type of case, although I recognize that the minister has adopted one of two methods. There are only two methods open, and the method adopted is the imposition of conditions upon the exercise of a power, which conditions are to be embodied in a contract between the individual and the state, which contract is still subject at least to the general law-making power alike of the province and the dominion. In that way we may create a situation of grave difficulty from the standpoint of the country itself and in the administration of the legislation.

I want to make just one observation as to something which is sometimes forgotten by my friends who talk about cheap money. I think the largest of the building societies operating in England is the Halifax society. I believe at the moment its assets—

Mr. DUNNING: There are one or two nearly as large, but I imagine the Halifax society is the largest.

Mr. BENNETT: There are two very much alike, but I think that is the largest one If you look at the hoardings in London to-day you will find they are advertising money at 5 per cent, and they are getting the loans at 5 per cent.

Mr. McGEER: They raised the rate to 5 per cent, and building stopped in England.

Mr. BENNETT: I am only referring to what happened some two years ago, when building was at its height. I was not over there this year, but I was there last year. The English plan brought into being over a million houses and the building societies have never made as many loans. The rates that have prevailed have been between 4 and 5 per cent, and on the hoardings the advertisements gave the rate as 5 per cent. I merely mention that because it is doing a wrong to the people of this country to induce them to believe that money can be obtained in England for nothing or next to nothing. All you have to do is look at one of the handbooks recently published, having to do with the year 1937, and you will find what I have said abundantly demonstrated.

It is not correct to say that building stopped under those circumstances. That is not what happened. What happened was that the plan which had been enacted by parliament had completed its operations, and the building societies are doing a great business in every part of the kingdom, both in deposits on the one hand and in loans on the other. I merely mention that because sometimes I have heard men talk about the cheapness of money loaned by the building societies in Great Britain, and I made the matter the subject of definite and particular inquiry.

Mr. VIEN: Is the 5 per cent inclusive of sinking fund?

Mr. BENNETT: The loans are predicated upon monthly repayments, which in most cases involve amortization. I cannot say in detail whether that is so in all cases, but in many cases there is involved the making of 120 payments of so many dollars each, based upon an interest charge at the rate of 5 per cent per annum.

Mr. VIEN: That would be inclusive of amortization.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. DUNNING: Not always; only under some plans.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly; it is a matter of contract. That is a fair way to put it.

There is just one other thing I desire to say to the minister. I doubt if any wooden house would stand a thirty-five year amortization plan. I merely mention that because certainly it is a departure from the rule that is observed in other countries with respect to wooden houses. Other countries do not do much in the way of building wooden houses now. All these houses in England were of brick. The joists were not steel; they were wood, but the houses themselves were brick. In that case the amortization was not as high as thirty-five years. In most of the continental countries, especially in the Scandinavian countries, the houses are of brick; the joists and girders are not of steel, but of wood. Thirty-five years is a long term amortization.

Mr. DUNNING: Thirty-five years was mentioned in connection with the low rental housing scheme. Apartments might be built under part II.

Mr. BENNETT: I am dealing with part II. It seems to me that this is all that I can usefully say at this time. I should like to study the details of the bill which I consider to be of much more importance than the acceptance of the principle. In other words, there is no difficulty about the principle; but there may be tremendous difficulty, having regard to our constitutional limitations, in working out the details.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, it would be extremely difficult for any one to discuss the proposals made this afternoon by the minister without having before him a copy of the bill. One can discuss the question only in a general way. May I say at the outset that I desire to commend the minister and the government for the step they have taken in this resolution. In 1935 a report submitted by a committee of this house proposed a comprehensive national scheme, but nothing was done at that particular time. At last we are coming to grips with this most important question. In many parts of Canada house construction has lagged. Housing accommodation is required in many of our large industrial and urban centres. I believe the legislation to be based upon this resolution will give a decided fillip, may I say, to the building industry of Canada. It will provide homes and create employment. In addition it provides a self-liquidating scheme which will prove of inestimable value to many people in the Dominion of Canada. Some of the details referred to by the minister will have to be gone into quite carefully. The minister referred to municipal taxation, but this question is so involved that I would prefer to see the bill before passing any judgment upon the point. The minister stated that the taxation could not exceed one per cent of the value of the house built.

Mr. DUNNING: Under part II, one per cent of the cost of the project.

Mr. HEAPS: In other words, if a house costs $4,000—

Mr. DUNNING: Part II covers low rental housing schemes, and the one per cent relates to the total cost of the whole project. A project might include a number of houses or apartments, as the case may be.

Mr. HEAPS: Even so, the point I wish to make is the same. I have always objected to the creating of a preferred class of citizen in any community, especially in connection with taxation. Under this plan we are creating a class which is to be given preferential treatment over other sections of the community.

The minister has pointed out that under this scheme homes or apartments will be rented at from $15 to $18 a month. If those are suitable for accommodating small families, I believe that we shall be meeting the situation in a reasonable way.

Mr. BENNETT: Not by apartments.

Mr. HEAPS: If we can provide homes or apartments for the rental mentioned by the minister, I think we shall be going a long way to meet the situation. In many of our large industrial centres many people prefer to live in apartments rather than in self-contained homes. In other communities the reverse may be true, and the people may prefer the self-contained home to the apartment. In the colder parts of the country where people have to withstand the rigours of the climate, many of them do prefer to live in apartments where heat is furnished. If, as has been stated by the minister this afternoon, we can provide such accommodation for $18 a month, we shall be working toward a desirable objective.

Mr. DUNNING: I hope my hon. friend does not take my remarks this afternoon to be in any sense a guarantee. I gave an illustration which was based upon two years of work in one of our largest cities. The figures I gave had been evolved by a committee comprised of all classes of society and also experts. I took those figures and applied to them the interest rates and the conditions of the bill in order to arrive at an approximation of what that scheme would cost at the present time. That is why I made the reference to the importance of keeping costs down. It was just an illustration.

Mr. HEAPS: I feel the estimate given by the minister was a little low. It might be possible in certain parts of Canada where buildings do not have to withstand too cold a climate to furnish accommodation at that cost, but I think the cost might be slightly higher in those parts of Canada where the weather is more extreme.

Mr. VIEN: It would have to be on a large scale.

Mr. HEAPS: About twenty years ago I saw certain plans which might fit into a scheme such as was suggested by the minister this afternoon. I do not agree with the stipulation as to the income of the family. I do not think the minister should hedge the scheme around with too many "ifs" and "buts." I do not think it is fair to stipulate that the accommodation to be made available at from $15 to $18 a month shall be available only to those earning up to $90 a month. The man who is earning $100 or $110 a month should not be debarred from the opportunity of renting a low-cost house.

Mr. DUNNING: He would be debarred only if there was some fellow earning as low as $90 a month who wanted it.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think we should have even that stipulation. We should allow a little more discretion to the municipalities in choosing tenants. In my humble opinion the success of such a scheme depends upon the type of administration. As the minister pointed out probably the only municipality in Canada that was able to make a success of the housing scheme of 1919 was Winnipeg. I was a member of the council when the provisions of that act were put into operation. We borrowed money at 6 per cent and lent it to the borrowers at 7 per cent. With the difference in the interest rates that city has been able to make a slight profit on the undertaking all through the years. Many of the homes have been paid up. When we look back over the years it is almost inconceivable that certain municipalities got into the difficulties they did. My main purpose, however, in rising was to say that I am pleased indeed that the government has introduced this resolution, which is to be succeeded by a bill. I need hardly say that we will give it our wholehearted support.

Mr. T. L. CHURCH (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have had some experience with housing programs as head of a city, one in 1913. I opposed one in 1919. The city of Toronto negotiated with the federal government in 1919. A large sum of money was borrowed and many houses were built, but for the most part the scheme was a failure. The money was paid back by Toronto and the other municipalities. The result was that the general body of the taxpayers had to shoulder the deficit burden. In my humble opinion it would be far better if this government would give a certain portion of the income tax, say one-third, back to the municipalities by way of a subsidy, bonus or subvention and so aid building and construction. I think that would lead to more actual building of all kinds and construction than anything else. This bonus or subsidy to the municipalities should consist of thirty-three and a third per cent of the net federal income tax collected by the dominion and would help out real estate and bring lower taxes. In that way the municipality could prepare the way and build municipal institutions of all kinds looking to future requirements, as Italy has done. In the past four years Italy has been building various municipal institutions with federal aid of all sorts to take care of municipal expansion for the next forty years in that country and so aid recovery and give work. But in Canada our municipalities have been starved; they have had no money for any public works. Go over any municipal public building and you will see old paint, old doors, and a dilapidated building. No new construction can be undertaken, and the result is that taxes on real estate are such that nobody wants to own it. The average tax on property in a large city is a rent in itself, as every member knows, and through no blame to our municipal councils who get no aid and have their revenues taken from them.

I think the minister should do something about the mortgage and lending companies in Ontario. I live in the district of Eglinton, North Toronto, and at one time more than half the homes there, if necessary, could be taken over by the mortgagee. They are not worth the price of the mortgage. If the minister could rap on the doors of some of these large lending companies and force them to bring the interest rate down—6½ per cent is the prevailing rate in that locality where thousands of houses have been built and most of the owners cannot pay their taxes—he would be doing something worth while, and get cheaper money for mortgages.

A housing committee was appointed by this house in 1935 and it did good work as far as it went, but the committee was somewhat handicapped. One good thing it did was to go to the Ontario government and ask them to give municipalities the power to pass by-laws to allow renovations to homes to be undertaken, on the grounds of public health and to stimulate building activity. Much good was done in Toronto. The municipalities were allowed to make loans for that purpose, and hundreds of properties were renovated without expense to the federal government. But it would not have been so hard on the owners of the homes if renovations had been helped by a federal bonus, or subsidy as an aid to housing.

There should be some other form of subvention provided to assist the municipalities because people in the cities who are out of employment cannot possibly pay their taxes and are often out the rent, and it would be far better if the minister dealt directly with the larger municipalities and handed them back some of the money they have paid in income tax, and so aid municipal recovery and expansion and real estate.

As to the type of building, I have seen something of this class of construction, which no doubt will be built by local concerns under this bill, in the city of Cleveland, where large apartments have been built by the local authorities with federal aid. But one consideration, Mr. Speaker, is that the average workman will not move from the slums to another district. He wants to stay with his neighbour and the person from whom he gets his house supplies. That was brought out in the evidence before the l ousing committee in 1935 and was so in the case of Leeds, England. They want to deal with the same grocer and the same butcher and get credit, and so they hesitate to move to some new district where the local authorities are receiving governmental assistance in housing projects; they could not pay the rents anyway. The question of transportation also comes in for the suburban worker. It is one of the main factors in housing and slum clearance and all other factors depend on it.

I asked the government early in the life of this session if they were going to bring down any housing or slum clearing legislation, and the minister said no; there would be only the housing act and the home improvement plan legislation, and now at this late date this large sum of money is being provided.

I have read the text of the resolution, and in my opinion it will be a good thing for some people, and the loan companies, but the property owners are becoming very much scared of legislation of this kind. It is class legislation for the benefit of the big loan companies and other large institutions; that is all it is. If the minister wants to do something to help the building and construction industries, let him hand back one-third of the income tax to the large cities, as a bonus or subvention to industry, the income tax which they have paid. The cause of the suburban worker is also being forgotten, the man who owns his own little place. I fear the new deal will not be an improvement.

Mr. DENTON MASSEY (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I am sure it was with a good deal of satisfaction that those of us who have been particularly interested in this great national question of housing surveyed the resolution which is on the order paper to-day, and which has been so ably spoken to by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) this afternoon. I quite agree with the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) when he said that there should be no objection in any part of the house to the purpose of the bill which is to be brought down by the minister.

The house will recall, Mr. Speaker, that it was my privilege last session to introduce a resolution urging upon the government the necessity of considering this vital question in a practical and direct way, and accordingly it is with a good deal of personal satisfaction to-day that I have listened to the remarks of the minister. There are, however, one or two points that I should like to discuss at this stage and present to the minister for his consideration prior to the bringing down of the bill. I do not intend in any way, shape or form to discuss now the details of the bill because, despite the clarity with which the minister this afternoon has presented its purpose and principles, it is indeed a complex subject which cannot readily be grasped in the course of one hour, even though it has been so clearly presented.

But one point which I think is of extreme importance is the method of application of the moneys available to the municipalities on the basis of population. If one city has five thousand of a population and another city has five thousand of a population, in the one municipality, as a result of conditions in the last few years particularly, housing may be a serious problem, while in the other municipality of the same size, so far as population is concerned, housing may present no problem. There could be no more money granted in the one case than in the other, which seems to me to be inconsistent with the situation that may readily exist.

Mr. DUNNING: The criterion in this bill is the urban population of Canada.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, and I am speaking of a city. It may be a city of fifteen thousand people, any city the minister may conceive of, with a housing situation which is acute as a result of certain local conditions in that urban area, whereas in another city in another part of the province or in another part of the dominion, as a result of conditions prevailing there, there may be no housing shortage at all. Yet the first municipality, in which there is a housing shortage, and which needs more money than the second municipality, in which there is no housing shortage, can get no more money than the second, and that seems to me to be inconsistent with the situation which may readily exist. In other words, there should be some terms in the bill relative to the need of the municipality besides the consideration of population only, which is a cold-blooded-on-paper fact.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me just a word of clarification, I doubt very much whether a large enough scale low rental housing project under part II would be possible by a small municipality, for the reason that the costs incident to a small scale project would render it prohibitive for the purpose which part II seeks to serve.

Mr. MASSEY: I agree; but I was thinking particularly—and the minister will appreciate this, I am sure—of a municipality where, say, some new industry had moved in, and as a result there has been a sudden demand for housing, with no houses available in answer to that demand. The result is that you have a population inadequately housed even though the municipality may be small. There are such places in Canada where perhaps a mill, or whatever it may be, has been built, bringing in new workers and causing a demand for houses. I was going to suggest to the minister that he give consideration to that contingency arising and insert in the bill such sections as will deal with that particular point.

In the second place, the minister will be aware, from his knowledge of what has been done in other countries, that in Sweden particularly, and in the United Kingdom as well, large tracts of land in the suburban areas of municipalities have been purchased by the municipalities for the purpose of purchase by individuals for the erection of small homes. If this is to be done by municipalities under this legislation, the taxes from these newly purchased areas are found money to the municipality. True, the lands have been purchased; money has been laid out to purchase the land; but taxes on that land have not been received by the municipality at any time because it has not been within the boundaries of the city. According to the minister's statement, as I understand it, the portion of the taxes that is accruing as a result of the improvements to that land is to be paid by the government 100 per cent the first year, 50 per cent the second year, and 25 per cent the third year. Am I correct in that? On the other hand, these are new taxes accruing to the municipality. In the case of Sweden and, I believe, in the United Kingdom, although I cannot speak with authority there, these taxes have been absorbed by the municipality as not having existed before. Perhaps it might be possible in drafting this measure to bear that fact in mind; for it has been of tremendous benefit to the new home owner in a suburban area.

Mr. DUNNING: That is, that the municipality would absorb what the dominion did not absorb?

Mr. MASSEY: Exactly. In other words, the municipality carried its own burden.

Mr. DUNNING: That is worth thinking of.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes; I think that is a point the minister might bear in mind.

The next point is that a tremendous advantage has been given the small home owner in the way of price as the result of standardization of plans. One does not like to think of a row of houses, each one exactly the same as the one on either side of it. On the other hand, various plans have been presented by architects in countries such as the United Kingdom, Sweden and Denmark where the house is a standard house in the main as far as its construction is concerned, although there have been various changes here and there which have altered the outside appearance of the house so that it gives the impression to one who passes it of being a house different from the one next to it, although actually they may be the same. They have gone probably to greater lengths in that regard in Sweden, where they have three distinct types of house for various sizes of family. Further, in the development of their suburban areas they have made provision so that the houses are not located on the properties in exactly a straight line. In some instances the houses are staggered slightly; in other instances they are set forward or backward, as the case may be. But that is beside the point.

It would seem to me desirable, in view of the fact that this legislation emanates from the federal government, that some thought should be given to the question of obtaining designs for small low-cost standard houses.

Mr. DUNNING: We have that now.

Mr. MASSEY: I know we have that now, but not down to $2,500.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes.

Mr. MASSEY: As low as $2,500?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The last competition was specifically for that class, and produced quite remarkable results. My hon. friend will have to pay for it, I am afraid, but he can get a set of the designs.

Mr. BENNETT: They are copyrighted.

Mr. MASSEY: I have seen the designs. But I understood there was some question whether or not the houses could be built in all parts of this country for the figures estimated.

Mr. DUNNING: That, of course, will always be a debatable question.

Mr. MASSEY: A $2,500 house in Halifax may not be a $2,500 house in Vancouver. The aim was to have a $2,500 house. I fully understand that. But I was thinking more of the pre-fabricated or partly pre-fabricated houses, and it seemed to me that some thought might be given to that suggestion. It would have to be worked directly in connection with the municipalities where the houses are to be built. In the case of Sweden, where so much pre-fabrication is done, the houses are built of wood, whereas in England the same cannot be done, because the houses are built of brick. It might be worth considering that the government should work directly with the manufacturers or the mills in the matter of production of, for example, casements, frames and so on, which can be built to standard specifications. All these things tend to reduce the cost of houses.

I listened carefully to the minister's remarks, but I failed to hear anything with reference to any consideration to be given to the man who wished to assist in the building of his own home. There is a feature which, as the minister well knows, has been a most attractive one in Sweden, that if a man provides labour in the building of his own home, all that goes towards reducing his obligation, pro-rated, if you will—

Mr. DUNNING: It is possible.

Mr. MASSEY: —and because he supplies $200 worth of labour, the amortization is just that much less as far as he is concerned.

Mr. DUNNING: It is possible, under part I.

Mr. MASSEY: It is possible under part I? Again, I am not criticizing; I was just suggesting this, not having seen the bill. I am very glad to hear what the minister says.

Lastly—for I do not wish to delay the house any longer—it seems to me to be unfortunate that we introduce a bill to deal with this great national question of housing and neglect the blot which is upon the escutcheon of this country, namely our slums; for I can find nothing in the minister's remarks this afternoon that dealt with this ghastly situation. The minister well knows that those who are at present compelled to live in the slum areas of our cities will not find it possible in any way, shape or form under this measure to build their own homes.

Mr. DUNNING: Part II is designed especially for them.

Mr. MASSEY: But these men have no money whatsoever. They cannot shoulder 10 per cent and build their own homes.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend has completely misapprehended the scheme.

Mr. MASSEY: I think not.

Mr. DUNNING: Part II does not involve any investment at all on the part of the individual. It is wholly a low rental housing proposition for just the precise class of people to whom my hon. friend has now referred.

Mr. MASSEY: Quite.

Mr. DUNNING: Part II is intended specifically to take care of the problem to which he has referred.

Mr. MASSEY: To attack the position of those who now live in slum areas, those who at present are on relief, those who have no incomes, those who have no jobs? They are to be permitted to go to these new areas with nothing at the back of them, and no prospects?

Mr. DUNNING: The municipality can go even that far if it wishes.

Mr. MASSEY: But this rests with the municipality entirely.

Mr. DUNNING: They can go even that far.

Mr. MASSEY: But the minister will admit it is up to the municipality? How uncertain!

Mr. DUNNING: To a point. Does my hon. friend think there is any possible scheme of building houses for people to rent for nothing? That is what we come down to. If the only way to clear slums is to provide houses for people with no income at all to get them without paying anything for them, then I must confess I am stumped. I cannot face that one.

Mr. MASSEY: I do not think the minister is stumped by any manner of means; for if he looks to Sweden he will find an answer to that. That is exactly what has happened in Sweden. The municipality has built the houses. They found it cheaper to build the houses and move those who were in the slum areas to those houses than to attempt to maintain them where they are.

Mr. DUNNING: The municipality can do that under part II of this bill.

Mr. MASSEY: Exactly, but will the municipality do that?

Mr. DUNNING: Well, this parliament cannot make them.

Mr. MASSEY: Of course that is beyond the minister's control. I admit that. But here is a scheme which is designed primarily to assist the one who would be a small home owner, but on the other hand is there anything within this scheme which will assist the municipality itself to become the landlord?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. Part II.

[Mr. Massey.]

Mr. MASSEY: That is within the bill? I am glad to hear the minister make that comment.

I think we may congratulate the minister, not only upon his presentation of the scheme this afternoon but upon the fact that it has been brought down in the way in which it has been. I was greatly relieved to see the scheme in view of the fact that last year, as reported on page 748 of Hansard, during the course of the debate on housing the minister said:

> From the time of confederation all measures with respect to the building of houses have been provincial laws or municipal bylaws passed under authority of provincial legislation. We might as well face that fact. Recently we have been put in our place by a very high authority with respect to our powers. Our powers with regard to matters of this kind are limited very largely to paying out the money of all the people of Canada for the benefit of some of the people of Canada, under conditions which are largely affected if not governed by provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. DUNNING: That is it. That is precisely the condition.

Mr. MASSEY: It would seem to me, then, that that difficulty has been overcome.

Mr. DUNNING: Really, that is all we can do.

Mr. MASSEY: "That is all we can do," says the minister. One may hope then that this scheme will be accepted by the provinces; for if it is not accepted by the provinces, then the municipalities within those provinces which may not accept the plan will suffer as the result of the lack of action of the provincial legislatures. I wonder then, if when the bill is introduced the minister will be prepared to state what he considers to be, as a result of the contacts he has had with the various provinces, the chances of the provinces accepting the terms of this bill. In view of the fact that throughout the length and breadth of Canada this bill has been heralded, first in Saskatchewan, and now in this house, a tremendous amount of interest is being taken in it; the hopes of many people are being raised; and it would seem to me to be very unfortunate to raise the hopes of those who anticipate that day when they will be able to build and occupy their own home, only to have their hopes dashed by the action of some stubborn legislature in this dominion which fails to cooperate as we sincerely hope they all will.

An hon. MEMBER: What else can they do?

Mrs. MARTHA LOUISE BLACK (Yukon): May I say a few words, as probably the only member who can hope for nothing from this bill? It has been said that at thirty-five years of age the house would be too old. Our homes in Dawson are built largely on a glacier. The home in which I live, a frame house, is almost forty years old. It still stands; it is still comfortable and I expect to live in it as long as our people up there send us here.

Mr. O. B. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): From the experience of the last three years' operation of the Dominion Housing Act it would seem that it is almost hopeless to look for any loans from the lending institutions, apparently because the returns to the insurance companies have not been sufficient to induce them to take part in this work. I was glad to hear the minister refer to the insurance companies Last year I tried to obtain a loan personally from different insurance companies in Edmonton for the purpose of building a home for myself. I was prepared to put up more than the twenty per cent equity and to comply with all the regulations. I had plans for the home and I approached several of the insurance companies as well as mortgage companies, but they would not give the cooperation they promised in connection with the Dominion Housing Act. I even went to the mayor of the city of Edmonton and called up several insurance companies, but with the same result. They say they have not made loans for the last seven years in Alberta, and that suggested to me that it was not because of any opposition at that time to the social credit government.

The city of Edmonton during the fall embarked upon a plan with money obtained, I believe, from the dominion government for unemployment relief. The plan was quite successful. They built several apartments and private homes, apparently to the satisfaction of those who were in charge of the project. Of course, as the minister pointed out, the city has a large number of vacant lots and these were utilized for the purpose. The only fly in the ointment is the increase in the price of materials that have been going into homes. There has been a constant increase, in the western provinces at any rate, in the price of materials, especially plumbing. The remarks of the minister in that respect are therefore opportune and I wish at this stage to commend the government. I think they are to be congratulated on bringing in this legislation, because it is certainly required in the western provinces in both the urban and the rural municipalities. The municipalities themselves can make good use of the money. I would ask the minister what the maximum amount of interest will be to the private individual who builds a home. Will the maximum be 1¾ or 2 per cent?

Mr. DUNNING: I should prefer to answer questions when the Speaker leaves the chair.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): I will close by commending the minister, because I believe that this legislation will be beneficial.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: With respect to part I, the rates of interest remain, as under the old Dominion Housing Act, subject to arrangement between the dominion and the lending institution. The rate under the Dominion Housing Act is now five per cent on the combined amount—five per cent to the borrower, brought about by the dominion's contribution going in at a lower rate, as it has from the beginning, enabling the lending institution to collect slightly more than five per cent on its part. I shall have more information in that regard. It remains a matter of agreement. So far as part I is concerned, the rate to the individual borrower will remain at five per cent. With respect to part II, that is a community undertaking; no rate to the individual borrower is involved at all. I explained in my remarks the rates of interest which will be applicable in that regard.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): Has cooperation been promised by these insurance and loan companies?

Mr. DUNNING: To be frank with the house, I did not feel that I could discuss the precise terms of this legislation with any one of those at present under agreement with the minister under the old statute, before presenting the matter to the house. What has been discussed with a number of them has been the broad criticism that has arisen in the operation of the Dominion Housing Act, and I have listened to everybody's ideas. From the views expressed to me by representatives of lending institutions with regard to this, that and the other improvement that they think might be desirable, I have very high hopes that most of those who now cooperate will continue to do so more actively as a result of the changes made. But I have no direct assurances with respect to that feature. My hon. friend is speaking, of course, of part I of the bill. It can be readily understood that in listening to the views of many lending institutions there will be a large variety of opinions among them as to what will be the most effective and suitable method.

Mr. BENNETT: Depending upon what they pay for their money, some of them.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and depending upon the precise nature of their operations and sometimes geographical limitations. Hon. members of this house can do one service in connection with this act—I mentioned it once before when speaking of the old Dominion Housing Act. The parties who could render great service and who render the least are those local institutions, local to various parts of the country, which have direct and peculiarly personal connections with people of given localities, provinces in some cases and counties in others. They are the most difficult to get to cooperate in this matter. The great national institutions have given a good deal of effective cooperation—many of them, not all—but it is characteristic of the smaller localized institutions that, with the exception of the Caisse Populaire in Quebec and one or two others here and there throughout the dominion, in general there is a problem where local institutions which are most closely in touch with the local people will not come into our scheme.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): In respect to these corporations, would a credit union be considered such an institution?

Mr. DUNNING: The caisses populaires in Quebec are credit unions. For the minister to enter into an agreement with any institution, credit union or otherwise, it must be able to carry out its own end of the business.

Mr. BENNETT: It must have a local habitation and a name.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly, and it must be able to advance the money. The caisses populaires in Quebec which are under agreement with us have demonstrated their ability to advance the money to build a small number of houses under the scheme. I remember in one case a caisse populaire indicated that it desired to enter into an agreement, but its whole assets would not provide the money for one house. I did not feel justified in entering into an agreement with that institution because it did not seem to me that it could function as the housing act or parliament intended. A credit union having sufficient assets, being empowered to do this kind of business by the legislation creating it, and having a habitation, as the leader of the opposition said, and the ability to do the job, I see no reason why I should not enter into an agreement with it.

Mr. ELLIOTT (Kindersley): It could make a direct agreement with the government, one not requiring to be endorsed by the province?

Mr. DUNNING: There is no endorsement by the province of agreements with lending institutions. Lending institutions must satisfy the minister of their ability to do what is contemplated by the legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister is talking now about part I.

Mr. DUNNING: About part I entirely. There is no provision in parts II and III for agreements with lending institutions.

Mr. BENNETT: And the province does not figure in part I.

Mr. DUNNING: The province does not figure in part I at all. But when the hon. member asks whether a credit union would qualify, I cannot answer that question any more than I could if he asked me whether a life insurance company would qualify. It depends entirely on the situation of the institution. For instance, has the credit union the power under its incorporation to do that sort of thing? Certainly there is nothing to prevent a credit union, because it is a credit union, from entering into an agreement with the minister. As I say, I have agreements already with caisses populaires in Quebec in two or three instances, and they are credit unions. They are the best type of credit union we have in this country.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe that is true. There is one matter that I think the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Elliott) has overlooked in the case he put to the minister. There is in Edmonton, for instance, a life insurance company which has substantial sums loaned on mortgages. Owing to recent legislation in Alberta the solvency of that company is threatened. Therefore insurance companies have now, I think, practically concluded that it is unsafe to make any further loans in Alberta. The minute legislation was passed which took from insurance companies two per cent of their mortgages, they having predicated their reserves—that is the measure of their ability to meet their responsibilities—on the expectation of life according to the mortality tables and on a three per cent rate on their investments, this had the effect of reducing their capital by two per cent. And the other provision does away with payment of interest. The result is that the companies which have to maintain a reserve will not put it into mortgages in Alberta. That is the real trouble.

Mr. DUNNING: As far as Alberta is concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend was speaking about difficulty he had in making application for a loan himself. Hardly a day goes by that I do not receive communications, and I think one of the difficulties the minister should face fairly is the fact that the old spirit with respect to local institutions is gone. You cannot bring it back by merely invoking the spirit of the past; it will not come back.

Mr. DUNNING: I am afraid that is true.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry it is true. I will explain why it is true. Taxes. Our federal tax touched these companies just as much as it did the great companies. A case came to me; I cannot help but think about it; a man had a small private bank, and he had all the funds he borrowed invested in real estate mortgages. Between the operation of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act and other legislation he is ruined; he is through. It closed him up. The mortgages cannot be realized upon. The minister knows that the business of life insurance companies does not permit of experiments being made in connection with these matters. They have to know that the investment of the premiums received from their policy holders will return sufficient to pay their claims on the estimated dates when they become due according to the mortality tables. If they fail to do that, they come within the punitive provisions of the law. I think the minister should keep in mind that the local institutions can no longer be relied upon; in fact they are getting out of business just as fast as possible.

Mr. DUNNING: Not the local trust companies, in the maritimes for instance.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the maritimes have two or three. They have the Eastern, but it has an office in Montreal, it is no longer a local institution as it was when it started. Another one has an office in three of the provinces. The reason is that it is no longer possible for local business to carry on successfully.

Mr. DUNNING: They have to expand or die.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. BERTRAND (Laurier): Would this legislation apply to the building of summer homes? Around Montreal a number of people with very small incomes have been building homes outside the city. There is a small town called Plage Laval which was started a few years ago, nothing but summer homes there, but to-day I think there are between 1,500 and 2,000 houses.

Mr. DUNNING: Summer homes can be dealt with under part I.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no limitation of any kind.

There is one question I want to ask the minister. I did not quite follow him when he said 3¾ per cent. I understood him to say the rate is 1¾ per cent with respect to the 80 per cent advance, plus one per cent amortization, which would make 2¾ per cent. With respect to the 90 per cent, where the risk is greater, the rate he said was two plus one which would be three per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my right hon. friend might await the report, because he has confused two things, which it is quite easy to do because of the necessarily complex nature of the remarks I had to make. The 3¾ per cent represented a calculation of the cost to a limited dividend housing corporation operating under part II. Its interest cost would be 1¾ per cent, and its amortization would be two per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the minister said only one per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: One per cent half-yearly. seven-eighths plus one per cent half yearly. I may have got twisted on that myself.

Mr. BENNETT: I rather think the minister said one per cent per annum.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister referred a few minutes ago to the money being lent at 5 per cent. Is it 5 per cent to the borrower, or 5 per cent that the government are going to charge?

Mr. DUNNING: Five per cent to the borrower, under part I.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the rate now is.

Mr. HEAPS: At what rate is the government going to give that money to the loan companies?

Mr. DUNNING: Does my hon. friend mean, what is the dominion's share costing the loan company?

Mr. HEAPS: No. The money is to be lent to the borrower at 5 per cent. What rate is the government charging the loan companies that give this money to the borrower?

Mr. DUNNING: We do not charge the loan company anything. At present we make up 20 per cent of the total amount. Under the new part I we shall advance up to 25 per cent of the total amount lent; that is, the dominion will actually put that money in.

The rate which has been used, up to date, with respect to the dominion's share, if my memory is right, has been 3¼ per cent or 3½ per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: The profit, so to speak, has been from one to 1½ per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I shall have all that information when the bill is in committee; but at the moment, speaking from memory, I think the dominion's proportion is calculated on the basis of a cost of 3½ per cent.

Mr. HEAPS: There is just one other point. In his statement to the house to-day the minister said the average amount of the mortgages was $4,000. That is the total amount loaned by the mortgage companies on the homes built?

Mr. DUNNING: The average now is something over $4,000.

Mr. MITCHELL: I am sure the right hon. leader of the opposition did not wish to leave any false impression when he was speaking of the effect of the two per cent securities tax recently imposed in Alberta. I understood that was the tax to which he was referring.

Mr. BENNETT: He certainly endeavoured to leave the impression that it had had a most injurious effect upon the credit of the province, and that it had made it impossible for the insurance companies to lend money in Alberta. I want to make that perfectly clear.

Mr. MITCHELL: That is exactly the impression I understood the right hon. gentleman to wish to leave. I want to point out to the committee that the hon. member for Kindersley said definitely that last year, before that securities tax was imposed, he had attempted to borrow money and had been told by the various companies he approached that they had not been making loans in Alberta for the past seven years, at least such loans as he required, in connection with a home in Edmonton. I hope the right hon. gentleman will not object to my pointing out this fact in this connection.

Mr. BENNETT: I am obliged to the hon. member for Medicine Hat. I did not intend to imply that the application of the hon. member for Kindersley last summer was dealt with in the light of legislation passed this year; if my remarks were open to that construction, I very much regret it. What I did desire to say was that the legislation, even prior to this year, had had a most injurious effect upon lending by loan and insurance companies. It is a matter of knowledge to me they have indicated that in view of the legislation which had been passed with respect to foreclosures, with respect to the acquisition of equities of redemption and the undesirability of owning property with the taxes that prevailed, the directors had made up their minds that they would be derelict in their duty to their policyholders if they took the premiums and invested them in real estate mortgages in Alberta. That is the position.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 145, to assist the construction of houses.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, June 9, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

MISCELLANEOUS PRIVATE BILLS

Fourth report of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. Boulanger.

HIGH COMMISSIONER'S ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO PROVISION FOR SALARY, ETC.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 146, respecting the High Commissioner for Canada in the United Kingdom.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has been the practice for some years to pay a part of the salary of the High Commissioner for Canada in the United Kingdom, under the statutory authority given by the High Commissioner's Act, and a part of it as a vote in the estimates of the Department of External Affairs. The principal object of this bill is to repeal the statutory authority contained in the High Commissioner's Act, so that the whole of the high commissioner's salary may, in future, be included in the departmental estimates. This change will establish a uniform practice with respect to the salaries of the representatives of Canada abroad.

As certain other minor amendments to the High Commissioner's Act were also desirable, it was considered advisable to repeal the existing statute and to renact it in the revised form, which would bring it into conformity with present usage and terminology.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

ILLEGAL USE OF THE MAILS

Mr. FERLAND:

How many persons in Canada are actually forbidden the use of the mails?

Mr. EULER: It is difficult to furnish a definite figure, as the number fluctuates continuously. Upon evidence being received indicating that the mails are being used for the transmission of illegal matter, mailing facilities are withdrawn from the person or organization concerned. When this action is taken the illegal enterprise is either abandoned, or discontinued in so far as the use of the mails is concerned, or an endeavour is made to circumvent the post office action by use of different or fictitious names. As the new names and addresses connected with illegal uses of the mails are ascertained mailing facilities are withdrawn.

During the twelve months ending May 31, 1938, instructions were issued withdrawing mailing privileges in Canada from approximately 1,450 persons and 50 organizations. During the same period mailing facilities were restored in about 150 cases.

NARCOTIC DRUGS

APPROVAL OF CONVENTION FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF ILLICIT TRAFFIC IN DANGEROUS DRUGS, SIGNED AT GENEVA, JUNE 26, 1936

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the Convention of 1936 for the suppression of the illicit traffic in dangerous drugs (Geneva, June 26, 1936), signed on behalf of Canada by the plenipotentiary named therein, and, that this house do approve of the same.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the convention was brought down only yesterday and I have not had a chance to study its provisions as carefully as I should like. Perhaps it would not be asking too much to have the motion stand for approval until to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am quite prepared to have it stand.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not get a copy of it, and my colleague says that he did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I may say to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) that the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power), at the time of introducing his bill respecting opium and narcotic drugs in February last explained the convention very fully. The bill was in the nature of legislation to implement Canada's undertakings with respect to the convention. At that time the house, I think, had before it the convention, which I have since tabled. I shall be pleased, however to see that copies are sent to the leader of the opposition.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think it was printed. It was tabled yesterday, was it not?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I formally tabled it yesterday, but I thought it was before the house at the time the minister introduced his bill.

Mr. BENNETT: A reference was made to it, because my memory is that the completed document was not before the house until yesterday.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That may be correct, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I looked among my papers this morning and could not find a copy, and thought it might have been overlooked, but the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) says he has not one, so possibly it has been overlooked.

Motion stands.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

International labour conference, $15,000.

Mr. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): When this vote was before the committee previously, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) asked a question regarding the amount of the expenditure on the Washington textile conference. The item was before the committee for only a few moments, and I promised I would secure that information. The amount voted for the special conference at Washington was $5,000. The amount actually expended was $3,355.71. As I explained to the committee before, this conference was in the nature of a preparatory conference for the international labour conference which was held in June of last year.

Mr. CHURCH: What duplication is there in this item? The provinces do similar work. What does the dominion do?

Mr. ROGERS: There is no duplication in this item. It is pertinent for my hon. friend to suggest that there may be duplication in certain other items of the estimates before the committee. This item is intended to meet the expenses of the delegation from Canada which attends each year the international labour conference which meets in Geneva.

Mr. MacNEIL: Who are the delegates at present?

Mr. ROGERS: The government is represented by a delegate and advisers; the workers and the manufacturers respectively are represented in the same way. Each year we make the selection on the basis of nominations which come to us from the trades and labour congress of Canada, for the workers in Canada, it being the most representative labour organization, and also we accept nominations from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association with respect to the delegates of the employers. The government delegates, of course, are appointed upon recommendation of the Minister of Labour. The government delegates this year are Mr. Hume Wrong, who is Canadian representative in Geneva, and Mr. Gerald Brown, the assistant deputy minister of labour.

Mr. BENNETT: Anybody else?

Mr. ROGERS: The manufacturers' association is represented by Mr. Goldie, of Hamilton, who has attended the conferences for a number of successive years. The trades and labour congress of Canada is represented by Mr. Bengough of Vancouver. Those are the delegates attending this year.

Mr. CHURCH: I have been following this labour movement for a great many years, and am a strong supporter of union labour, but I fail to see what good these conferences are doing. They seem to provide patronage for the government with the official set in the trades and labour movement. This last week, for example, we read in the press that a gentleman from Vancouver is selected as "foreign ambassador"; he selects a man down here in Montreal as "technical adviser." Advice about what? Would it not be far better for the minister and the department to get jobs for Canadians in Canada instead of having all these Cook's tours which are made to these various conferences? They do not benefit the workers of this country a five cent piece, and I can tell you this, the quicker the government strike out some of these side shows and side trips from the estimates, the better provision they can make for jobs for Canadians in Canada. I am in favour of the trades union movement, but I have noticed that for years some of the same people have been going from Canada to this conference; it has been a fine side trip for them. Tens of thousands of dollars of the taxpayers' money have been spent, with no value whatever for the expenditure. The present Labour department in Canada is full of fads and frills, but it has no power. You ask the department to do something practical when a strike begins, and what happens? Last year they appointed a commissioner to go out and investigate with regard to coal. Whatever he did, he forgot all about the consumer. I fail to see why we should have these delegations to Geneva. All the countries of Europe send delegates to these meetings, but I cannot find five cents' worth of value in the report. If you cut the vote down to a dollar it would be about all the value it is worth. I know a lot of practical labour men who are not politicians and can never get on these trips, and they think they are of little or no value whatever.

Mr. ROGERS: The hon. member is incorrect when he states that this is a conference which has no value to this country. As a matter of fact, provision for the international labour conference was made in the treaty of Versailles, and this government has from time to time ratified conventions which have been adopted by the international labour conference for the amelioration of labour conditions throughout the world.

So far as appointments are concerned, as I explained a few minutes ago, we accept under the provisions of the act nominations of recognized organizations of employers and employees. The government has a selection only with respect to the choice of technical advisers, and for some time past these advisers have been taken from other labour organizations of the country.

Mr. HEAPS: Who were the delegates last year?

Mr. ROGERS: The delegates last year were: government delegates, Doctor W. A. Riddell, Mr. W. M. Dickson; advisers to government delegates, Mr. C. R. McIntosh, Mr. N. S. Dowd, Mr. Alfred Charpentier, Mr. Zenon David; employers' delegate, Mr. A. R. Goldie; adviser to employers' delegate, Mr. H. W. Macdonnell; employees' delegate, Mr. R. J. Tallon; adviser to employees' delegate, Mr. D. W. Morrison.

Mr. HEAPS: Has this years' delegation been appointed?

Mr. ROGERS: I gave the names a moment ago.

Mr. MARTIN: How many conventions are there not ratified by Canada, and what is being done in respect to these?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not that information immediately available. A great many conventions have been accepted by the international labour conference and a number of them have been ratified by Canada. A considerable number of these conventions have been outstanding so far as Canada is concerned. Obviously the dominion government has a rather limited power in the implementing of these conventions because of the fact that the jurisdiction over industrial matters rests very largely with the provinces.

Mr. SPENCE: Will the minister give the expenses of each delegate that he has named?

Mr. ROGERS: If it would satisfy the hon. member, I have the individual expenses for the delegation of 1936. There is no material difference in the expenses from year to year.

Mr. SPENCE: I cannot see why the minister should not have the expenses for 1937; we are well into 1938 now.

Mr. ROGERS: It is a matter of securing the information from the auditor general's report. I have the report for the year I have mentioned.

Mr. BENNETT: It would not be in the report yet.

Mr. ROGERS: No. I have the total expenses but not the individual figures, inasmuch as the auditor general's report for the last year is not available.

Mr. CHURCH: When the minister is cutting down on the municipalities for food for those on relief, I fail to see what value there is in this item. What qualifications have these technical advisers? Are they diplomats, ministers extraordinary or ministers plenipotentiary? What qualifications have they? Some labour man in Montreal is appointed; will he and the others travel by Canadian routes to go to the conference? What are the allowances and expenses?

Mr. ROGERS: The remuneration to the members of the delegation is $20 a day and travelling expenses. That has been established for a great many years. I am entirely in disagreement with the hon. gentleman when he suggests that the technical advisers are not qualified. They are chosen because of their familiarity with industrial conditions in this country, and generally speaking they are chosen from labour organizations.

Mr. STEWART: When the minister gave the personnel of the delegation I thought I heard him mention the name C. R. McIntosh. Is that right?

Mr. ROGERS: That was last year.

Mr. STEWART: Is that the member of this house who was chairman of the committee on industrial relations?

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Item agreed to.

Labour Gazette and other publications authorized by labour department act, $50,980.

Mr. BENNETT: Why the increase?

Mr. MacINNIS: What is the circulation of the Labour Gazette?

Mr. ROGERS: In 1937 there were 114,335 English copies and 25,245 French.

Mr. MacINNIS: For the whole year?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. MacNEIL: On what basis are the key cities selected as to cost of living?

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to get that information when we come to that item.

Mr. MASSEY: On page 98, giving the details, I find that the cost of printing and binding the Gazette has increased from $24,000 to $30,700. Is that due to increased circulation?

Mr. ROGERS: It is due in part to increased circulation and in part to the increased size of the Gazette.

Mr. MASSEY: Is it being published any more frequently?

Mr. ROGERS: No. It has followed the same course for a great many years.

Item agreed to.

Industrial Disputes Investigation Act, $20,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps at this point the minister will give us a short statement regarding the operations of this statute. The courts said the Lemieux act was ultra vires. We did certain things purporting to be done under its authority. Then the provinces passed legislation. I should like a statement of how it stands at the present time, because the other day I was asked in regard to something that was happening, and apparently I have not as clear an appreciation of it as I thought I had. Perhaps the minister will state how it does work in practice.

Mr. ROGERS: I believe the answer would be that after the decision of the judicial committee in the Snider case the authority of the compulsory sections of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act became limited to the setting up of boards to deal with disputes in dominion undertakings or interprovincial undertakings. That meant in effect that its operation was contracted with respect to disputes which previously had fallen within its scope, namely, disputes occurring in public utilities wholly within provincial jurisdiction. To meet that situation my understanding is that, following the decision in the Snider case, provincial legislatures enacted enabling legislation which gave the industrial disputes act full force and effect with respect to disputes arising on public utilities within provincial jurisdiction. I believe two provinces since then have enacted legislation which has had the effect of withdrawing disputes in provincial public utilities from the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act—British Columbia, and, New Brunswick.

Mr. BENNETT: That then clearly raises the issue to which I wish to direct the minister's attention. Is it competent for the legislatures of the various provinces to enact legislation which would have the effect of amending the constitution as interpreted by the court of last resort? And secondly, what is the effect of the withdrawal of two of the provinces by statutory enactment, if as suggested the effect of the original action was to confer jurisdiction in what had been decided by the courts to be an unconstitutional field for the dominion to occupy?

Mr. ROGERS: As to the first point, the right hon. leader of the opposition is more competent to express an opinion than I am on the legal question involved. But so far as I am aware no objection was ever taken to the efficacy of the provincial legislation, which did bring industrial disputes of the character described within provincial jurisdiction under the provisions of the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. I know of no case before the courts in which that question was ever raised. Certainly since the decision in the Snider case the industrial disputes act has been invoked in practically all provinces. I should think that the withdrawal of the two provinces I have mentioned would have no effect other than to restrict the operation of the act within their respective boundaries.

Mr. CAHAN: The withdrawal was simply the nullification of the provincial legislation passed.

Mr. ROGERS: Exactly.

Mr. MacINNIS: Do I understand the minister to say that the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act does not now apply to British Columbia?

Mr. ROGERS: It does not apply to utilities within the provincial jurisdiction. It applies otherwise.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. CHURCH: I fail to see why $20,000 is necessary for this in view of the Snider decision. I was acting for the people at the time. If that decision had not been as it was there would not be a public utility municipally owned in Ontario to-day. It is all right to have this amount of money provided for work on the dominion government properties or railways, but the minister must not forget that by the Snider case property and civil rights, the law of employer and employee and the law of contracts are involved. Why did the minister interfere in the Oshawa case? It seems to me this department is very largely a technical department. It is difficult to get any satisfaction when there is any real dispute on; they back out and leave it to the province.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the minister answers I should like to make one statement. I confess that this matter is one of great difficulty. I have myself, without analysing it more carefully than I have been able to do from time to time, the very gravest doubt whether by acts of all the legislatures you can change the constitution of this country. Certainly there is no power to amend the British North America Act lodged in any parliamentary organization or institution other than the parliament at Westminster. To say that a legislative act on the part of all the provinces could have the effect of conferring constitutional power upon this parliament which the courts have said it does not possess is a proposition which I regret to say I cannot accept. In view of a conversation I had I looked up section 94 of the British North America Act, to which I think Professor Scott of McGill made some reference. This clearly applies to three provinces only:

> Notwithstanding anything in this act, the parliament of Canada may make provision for the uniformity of all or any of the laws relative to property and civil rights in Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and of the procedure of all or any of the courts in those three provinces, and from and after the passing of any act in that behalf the power of the parliament of Canada to make laws in relation to any matter comprised in any such act shall, notwithstanding anything in this act, be unrestricted; but any act of the parliament of Canada making provision for such uniformity shall not have effect in any province unless and until it is adopted and enacted as law by the legislature thereof.

I cannot think this is one of the statutes that falls within the provisions of that section. Therefore I question whether we have any right at all—and I think that was the view held in my time by certain of the law officers—to undertake industrial disputes investigations except with respect to—(a) matters within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada, and (b) such matters as relate to the operation of industrial or other activities in two or more provinces. That is my understanding of it.

This is a matter of some importance at the moment. Recently I noticed in one of the morning papers that some difficulty had arisen in connection with one of our canals, and the tie-up of one of our ships. Obviously canals are solely within the jurisdiction of this parliament. A canal is a public work owned by the Dominion of Canada. I have no doubt about our jurisdiction in that regard under this statute, and I cannot think that the province has any jurisdiction at all with respect to it, although their officer did go down.

Mr. ROGERS: If my right hon. friend will permit me to interrupt, I do not think an officer of the Department of Labour in Toronto went to Cornwall.

Mr. BENNETT: No, the officer went down for the purpose of maintaining law and order.

Mr. ROGERS: I believe that is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: My information, gained from reading the press, was that an investigation was ordered by this government, by the Minister of Labour. And since I read it, certain papers were sent to me, and I propose to mention the matter at the appropriate time. This could not seem to be the time, because the Department of Transport is also involved; it is not a matter relating solely to the Department of Labour. But I am interested in the large question of jurisdiction. It is constantly arising. It did not arise for the first time with this government, but ever since the Snider decision that question has arisen. It was the opinion of certain of our legal advisers that we had no jurisdiction in one case, although we thought that peradventure we did have, and the province thereupon took the appropriate steps to conduct an investigation. The reason I ask is that in consequence of certain correspondence I was asked what the present position is. I have stated my understanding of it to the minister; but I have added to it this, that I do not believe it is competent for the legislatures of the provinces of Canada, in effect, to confer upon this parliament legislative jurisdiction with respect to a matter which the courts have said is beyond our constitutional competence. In other words you cannot indirectly effect an amendment to the British North America Act, which in my judgment can be brought about only by an act of the parliament at Westminster.

Mr. ROGERS: The point raised by the leader of the opposition is pertinent and very interesting. In the application of the act, as set out in the text—

Mr. BENNETT: Is that since the decision?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, this is since the decision.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the federal act?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. I think I should read that in the first place, because it may throw some light on the other question; the scope of the act is defined as follows:

(i) works, undertakings or business operated or carried on for or in connection with navigation and shipping, whether inland or maritime,

(ii) lines of steam or other ships, railways, canals, telegraphs and other works and undertakings connecting any province with any other or others of the provinces, or extending beyond the limits of the province,

(iii) lines of steamships between a province and any British or foreign country,

(iv) ferries between any province and any British or foreign country, or between two provinces,

(v) works, undertakings or business belonging to, carried on or operated by aliens, including foreign corporations immigrating into Canada to carry on business,

(vi) such works as, although wholly situate within the province, have been or may be declared by the parliament of Canada, or for the advantage of two or more of the provinces—

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think we question the "have been" but we do question the "may be."

Mr. ROGERS: Quite.

(vii) works, undertakings or business of any company or corporation incorporated by or under the authority of the parliament of Canada;

(b) Any dispute which is not within the exclusive legislative authority of any provincial legislature to regulate in the manner provided by this act;

(c) Any dispute which the governor in council may by reason of any real or apprehended national emergency declare to be subject to the provisions of this act;

(d) Any dispute which is within the exclusive legislative jurisdiction of any province and which by the legislation of the province is made subject to the provisions of this act.

The last, I take it, is the particular clause that raises the point in the mind of the right hon. leader of the opposition. Obviously the Minister of Justice would be in a better position to express an opinion on this point than I am.

Mr. BENNETT: There have been varying views with respect to it, but I would not ask the hon. gentleman to define the legal position. That would not be fair.

Mr. ROGERS: Quite so, but I wonder if this is not the case. Take the province of New Brunswick, for example, before it passed recent legislation taking this authority to itself. If a dispute occurred in a public utility in that province, such as a coal mine, it is true that we would set up a board under the provisions of this act, but I would assume that such board would derive its authority from the provincial statute.

Mr. BENNETT: I would have agreed with that were it not for the fact that the federal power exercise the appointing power, and they cannot do that as delegates of the executive of a province. Do I make the point clear?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, I understand that; but evidently, in order to remove the possibility of doubt, you also have this section in the dominion act. How far that is effective I am not in a position to say, as my right hon. friend realizes.

Mr. CAHAN: What is the date of that act?

Mr. ROGERS: The original act was passed in 1907.

Mr. BENNETT: But this is since the decision?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, this is in the revised statutes of 1927.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has placed upon the statute the construction that I should like to see placed upon it if it were valid, but I doubt the validity of such construction; for I think we will all agree, layman and lawyer, that a province cannot set in motion by its legislation the exercise of its power by the federal executive, and the federal executive is exercising a discretion which cannot spring from provincial legislation but which in fact is said to owe its origin to provincial legislation. That is, the province has passed a statute which in terms confers upon the federal power a right to do something which the privy council said the federal power could not do, and the question whether or not a provincial legislature can clothe with effective executive authority a federal body, namely the governor in council of the whole dominion, is a proposition to which I am sorry to say I cannot give assent. I wish I could; for I tried to use it and failed in connection with the marketing act. We were under the impression that there should be no difficulty in getting over what seemed to be an obstacle, the one I mentioned, by suggesting that they would have the power to make us their agents only, and thereby not involve the exercise of the executive authority; because there is a vast difference between creating an agency and authorizing the exercise of discretion. That is, the provincial legislature can hardly press a duty on the federal executive, but the provincial legislature should be able to authorize any branch of the public service in the dominion to act as agent if it would so act.

I must say I have never thought the case was put fairly before the courts. I cannot see why, if the minister, acting as a federal power, desires me as a provincial power to act as his agent, I should not do so; and, e converso, there should be no reason why I, as a provincial power, should not, if the federal power is willing, authorize and request them to act as my agent. That was the basis of what we endeavoured to do with respect to the marketing act. As I say, I hope I am not being unfair, but in reading such reports of the arguments as I was able to obtain I do not think that point was clearly put to the court, either here or in England. I cannot, I repeat, see why the minister, speaking for the parliament of Canada, should not say to me as a province, "Will you act as my agent in connection with this matter"? I say, "Yes." Nor can I see why I, acting as a province, should not say to the federal power, "Will you act as my agent in connection with this matter"? And the dominion says, "Yes." That would ensure certain results which we were endeavouring to ensure in connection with the marketing of products.

Mr. CAHAN: That would be inconsistent with section 94.

Mr. BENNETT: I read section 94 just now; it refers only to three provinces, and there is no provision for other provinces being included under it. Obviously it did not include Quebec, because of the civil law.

Mr. CAHAN: I think there is strong ground for the argument that it includes all the provinces except Quebec.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Scott referred to that in an article published recently, and I am bound to say that I found it inconclusive, though of course that does not say the argument may not be sound. I am only putting to the minister the difficulty I see in our utilizing this act under those circumstances; for if the proposition is sound that by this section we can amend the constitution of the dominion, obviously the theory under which we have been operating is invalid. We have always believed that it required a statute of the imperial parliament to amend the act.

I think it would relieve the Prime Minister, for instance, of a great deal of worry if he felt that he could amend the constitution in that way, because it does not require all the provinces to do it; it requires only three of them, those three being Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

Mr. ROGERS: I believe a number of the provinces, if not all, reenacted the provisions of the industrial disputes act.

Mr. BENNETT: If they did they left the executive discretion to be exercised here.

Mr. ROGERS: There is an executive discretion.

Mr. BENNETT: In the province as well.

Mr. ROGERS: In certain contingencies. As my right hon. friend is aware, the selection of the members of a board is made rather by the parties to the dispute.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and that was so before the courts decided as they did.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, quite true.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no change in the result.

Mr. ROGERS: True.

Mr. BENNETT: The argument as put now by the minister merely means what we all agreed upon, that it is competent for a province to pass legislation exactly in terms with the federal legislation, and, the federal legislation being declared to be invalid, obviously the other would be valid. Whether or not they can be both valid, by reason of action of that kind is a proposition to which I direct attention, but to which I cannot accede.

Mr. MacINNIS: When was British Columbia taken from under the industrial disputes act?

Mr. BENNETT: It took itself out.

Mr. ROGERS: By legislation enacted a year ago by the province. It was done entirely by the province, and of course applies only to disputes arising within provincial jurisdiction. It does not extend to dominion undertakings.

Item agreed to.

Employment Offices Coordination Act, administration, $63,925.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I really think the minister, who occupies a very peculiar position by reason of his distinguished academic training, should be made aware of the fact that these employment offices have become purely partisan establishments. The men who occupied positions in them were dismissed when a new provincial government came into office, and the people in those communities—and I will give him illustrations if he wishes—can obtain employment only through the committees of the Liberal executives in communities where they exist. That in my opinion is exactly contrary to what was intended when this statute was enacted. It places in the hands of governments a power which was never intended with respect to employment.

I have a large number of instances under my hand, which I brought down, of cases which state what was required to be done to find employment. It is hardly to be expected that a minister would keep in mind all of them, or remember where those various places may be. No one expects a minister to do the impossible, but I will mention to him one in his own community of Kingston. I refer to a person in Kingston who was the representative of the government—appointed by the province, it is true; I wish to make it clear the minister is not responsible for that—but who was dismissed with the change of provincial administration, and another man put in. Well, the minister knows the difficulty in connection with the other man. Open charges are made, and there is a willingness on the part of people to prove them, with respect to his conduct and the conduct in the transaction of business. It has become just a little partisan organization. I do suggest that we should not put ourselves in that position at a time like this. I do not wish to use harsher words with respect to it, but I would ask the minister if he does not think that he could show a great example to the community at large by enforcing his personal views, against his political views, in a matter of this kind. Despite all that may be said, it threatens the life of this democracy at the moment. Especially is that true when you have in a house a very small minority opposed to the government. And it becomes doubly important that if possible the administration should be free from any such disputes, having regard to the fact that these offices came into being by virtue of an international arrangement.

Mr. ROGERS: International?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, they were really part of an international agreement. In the peace treaty itself were made certain provisions with respect to labour, and at the labour meeting at Washington we undertook to do certain things, some of which we could do and some of which we could not do. We made a compromise which involved, shall I say, joint action on the part of the dominion and the provinces. And that joint action was for the purpose of ensuring, so far as it might possibly be done by joint action, that employment bureaux should be established for the purpose of providing opportunities for employment to men who were unemployed. I believe that, shortly, is a fair way to put it.

If we introduce the partisan element into the institution we not only destroy the purpose for which it was created, but we create such conditions as make it impossible for governments in this country to function. That is really what it gets down to. Of course in good times no one bothers much about questions of partisanship and patronage, in that sense, or in the sense in which I am now using those terms. But everybody knows that in days like these, when there is depression, when employment is difficult to get and when opportunities for gainful work are denied so many, it is a terrible thing if an institution set up by a government for the purpose of providing employment shall be subject to the control of the representatives of a political party.

It is to that end I direct the minister's attention to the matter without going into a great wealth of detail involving discussions which might necessarily be acrimonious and would not serve the purpose I have in mind. If by a moderate statement of the evil I could induce the minister to direct his mind to its suppression, I think it would be far better than any advantage which might arise from the exposure of conditions in various parts of this country which I believe are working injury to the body politic.

Mr. ROGERS: I may say without hesitation whatever that I would prefer to see the employment service of Canada, or employment services, conducted from offices absolutely beyond partisan control.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe that.

Mr. ROGERS: I say that without hesitation.

Mr. BENNETT: And I believe it.

Mr. ROGERS: As a matter of fact, under the Unemployment Insurance Act, which was declared ultra vires, provision was made whereby the employment services would ultimately be under the control of a commission.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. ROGERS: And certainly it has been my view, as expressed on various occasions, that if we were able to establish an unemployment service which could be truly national, it would be preferable to have it, as allied with a scheme of unemployment insurance, under the control of a commission.

I will not say for a moment that complaints have not reached me with respect to employment services—not in one province, but in various provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, quite; I said that.

Mr. ROGERS: And on the basis of those complaints I am inclined to agree that from time to time employment services have been used for political purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, there is no doubt about it.

Mr. ROGERS: How that can be controlled I am not prepared to say. As my hon. friend is aware, the dominion government does not control any appointments.

Mr. BENNETT: But we pay the money.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, but—

Mr. BENNETT: Not the whole of it.

Mr. ROGERS: A rather small proportion of it, as a matter of fact. I believe it is about one-third. We pay about one-third of the total in the province, under the provisions of the—

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is between a third and a half.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; as expenses have gone up our proportion has tended to decrease. In the beginning I think it was more.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, as the expenses not under our control made by the provinces have increased, our amount has proportionately decreased.

Mr. ROGERS: Exactly. I can recall some time ago receiving protests with respect to the dismissal of the head of an employment office in one of the provinces. I believe there is no reason why I should mention the name here. There was nothing which we as a dominion government could effectively do in the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that, yes.

Mr. ROGERS: The appointment was made by the province, and it rests entirely in the discretion of provincial governments to make dismissals as they see fit. The matter has given me, I may say, some concern because of the various complaints that I have received. Obviously, whether or not there is justification for them, they should go to the provincial governments concerned and be dealt with accordingly. I realize also that with respect to relief work it is very important that the employment service should act in a non-partisan way. There again the problem is not as easy of solution as appears at first glance.

Mr. BENNETT: Not as long as the province exercises the control which now it has over these offices. That is clear.

Mr. ROGERS: That is true. It is simply a matter of where the responsibility lies. But I certainly will not go so far as to say that in all provinces there has been a failure to recognize that obligation.

Mr. BENNETT: Neither would I.

Mr. ROGERS: I would also suggest that in all provinces there are employment offices which are conducted on an efficient and satisfactory basis.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true.

Mr. ROGERS: I know that in certain instances attempts have been made to set, for example, a quota of those who should be employed through the employment service,—

Mr. BENNETT: —of a political character.

Mr. ROGERS: —which I do not like.

Mr. BENNETT: I discovered that myself.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think it is at all a satisfactory way of dealing with the situation.

Mr. BENNETT: It certainly is not. It is a wrong standard.

Mr. ROGERS: It is a wrong standard to apply. I am not prepared to say just what method should be adopted to correct the situation, short of the dominion taking over the responsibility; and even that does not solve the problem in every case. You do not, as we have discovered on several occasions, solve a problem by transferring it from one jurisdiction to another.

Mr. BENNETT: I have a suggestion to make to the minister in that regard. Let it be known that we do not propose to pay unless the conditions which the minister has outlined are observed. That may have some effect. It is the only way that is left to us. It is perfectly obvious that we have no right at the moment, having regard to the decision of the privy council, to exercise general control. I cannot but regret it. On the other hand I do think we have power to say, despite the provision of the statute that we shall make a certain contribution, that we are not to make it blindly, that the expenditures must be made to our satisfaction. The minister knows just as well as I that one or two cases are little short of a scandal, and also in one or two cases the offices are conducted so efficiently and effectively as to occasion no cause of complaint by anybody. The one illustrates how well it may be done; the other illustrates how badly it may be done.

The minister is quite right; there are in my judgment several in which the duties of those in charge are performed with as high a regard to the public weal as any of us can possibly ask for, and no political consideration has governed in connection with the work. I am glad the minister anticipated what will have to be dealt with later, the question of relief matters, because that is where the most glaring examples have occurred. If the minister thinks we have no appreciation of his difficulties he is entirely in error, because I know in detail some of the cases to which he referred. For instance, I remember very distinctly this quota being put up to the cabinet. It was said "The vote last time was so and so; we will have 15 of one type and we will have 35 or 40 of another type of political faith, and that will satisfy the situation."

Mr. ROGERS: I believe that a quota was actually followed for a time.

Mr. BENNETT: I was told that it was followed, and I believe it was. Obviously that does not enable us to get one hundred cents value for the expenditure of a dollar of the public money, and it is not a standard that should be applied with respect to it. It is merely an invitation to go on the payroll on the basis of an understanding arrived at between political parties and has nothing to do with the character of the service rendered for the money paid, apart from every other consideration. I think the statute is broad enough to enable us to make some limitations of our obligation to pay, unless at least the ordinary rules of conduct in times like these are observed.

Mr. CAHAN: I suppose it is not worth while for me to repeat a view which I hold, and which I am probably the sole member of the house to hold, that the evils which have occurred arise out of the fact that the parliament of Canada has endeavoured from time to time to entrench upon the political autonomy of the provinces and to assume the right, by votes of money, to deal with matters, connected with, for instance, labour, which are not under the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament. We have gone the wrong way, and we have gone very far; and the time must come at no distant day when parliament shall attempt to recover the ground which it has lost, and take solid footing on matters which are within its legislative competence.

The evils are very many. We vote large sums for relief. I do not know how matters have been adjusted, but I know that when we were in office in one city of the dominion over $2,000,000 of federal money had been expended and there were no vouchers obtainable from the provincial government or from the municipality with regard to these expenditures. How they have been dealt with since I do not know.

Mr. BENNETT: Some, I see by the reports, have been adjusted—not all.

Mr. ROGERS: Oh, no. Some are outstanding.

Mr. CAHAN: Furthermore, take the political aspect of it. Money voted by this parliament for relief in the provinces is in fact being distributed by the aldermen of the cities. The aldermen of a city will obtain, in each aldermanic ward in which that money is distributed, a strong political influence, which may be used against members on one side of the house or on the other, but which should not be available or be used for the purpose of securing the election of federal members or for preventing the election of federal members.

Take the city of Montreal to-day. Hon. members on the other side of the house who represent constituencies in Montreal, in order to ensure a reasonable prospect of being elected at the next federal election, must endeavour to secure so far as possible the support of the aldermen in their federal constituencies who have control of the distribution of federal funds in matters of relief. I attempted not long ago in connection with an election in Montreal to take the civic lists of those who were receiving relief and the boundaries within which those lists were compiled, and I believe I arrived at a fair computation when I say that between four and five thousand of those who were entitled to vote in that election were in receipt of dominion relief, inasmuch as the money or a large part of it came from the dominion. Yet that money was distributed by municipal agencies over which this parliament has no control at all, and in many instances the distribution by municipal agencies is made for partisan political purposes. This is a condition which cannot continue without strong protest, and the solution of the difficulty must be found in a firm decision on the part of this parliament, which, I suppose, parliament would be afraid to take before the general election, because any person who voted either one way or the other would probably be subject to reprisals in the electoral district which he represents.

But parliament must either acquire control over industrial employment and over certain elements of the labour situation, or it must withdraw from the field and refuse to vote large sums of money for the purpose of enabling a provincial or municipal authority to distribute it. We had better reconsider the matter. We have got to face it. At the present time it affects hon. members on the other side of the house far more than it affects those on this side. A larger number of constituencies are represented on the other side of the chamber. I am dealing with the province of which I am one of the representatives, as it affects many of the existing constituencies in the city and island of Montreal. It affects very closely many of those who represent those constituencies and who must again apply as candidates for political support in general elections and in by-elections. Now, that condition is wrong. If I employ a stenographer in my office to do my work and she types my letters during an election campaign, she is deprived of her vote, because she is paid by me for writing letters which are mailed to notify my constituents where they vote or to notify them of public meetings which I hold. If she writes those letters and then votes for me, she is doing an illegal act. Many employees refuse to vote under those conditions, even if their employment is permanent employment and they are on a monthly or yearly wage. But here we have a vast expenditure, amounting to millions of dollars, going to electors who now have the full right to receive those moneys and to vote in federal elections under the persuasion of the distributors of those funds. There is something wrong there, grievously wrong, and if we wish to avoid a general system of electoral corruption—and such corruption seems to be increasing—the government, as the leader of opinion in this house, whose duty it is to formulate public policies, must reconsider the situation and deal with it, and, I trust, will deal with it effectively.

Mr. MacINNIS: The evil of patronage is becoming very serious in this dominion. The question is not one that I am greatly concerned with personally; I have very few complaints and I am not often approached in cases where patronage can be or is being used. But I do not think we can complain about patronage in provincial affairs when we accept it in our dominion affairs. If we desire to do away with patronage in the provincial sphere, and expect as a parliament to have any influence in this direction, we shall have to make first a definite clean-up of our own house. I have often felt, and I suppose it is natural shyness about approaching certain people which has prevented me from following the impulse, that I should personally approach the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition and ask them to use their great personal influence with their followers to try to do away with this deadly evil. By common consent we say in this house that patronage or political partisanship should not apply to relief work, and yet in the same breath we say that it is quite natural that patronage should apply in public works. Well, public works and relief works are financed by the taxpayer's money—Liberal, Conservative, socialist, cooperative commonwealth, communist and what-not—and if it is wrong to allow patronage in relief works it is equally wrong in public works. So that until we are prepared to go the whole way and abolish all patronage the evil will grow despite the sporadic efforts we make to scotch it now and then. I appeal to those who have great influence in their parties, such as the Minister of Labour, the Prime Minister and many others on the other side of the house as well as the leader of the opposition and the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, who are all, I am quite satisfied, opposed to this policy, to use their great influence with their party followers in order to eradicate this evil from our political life.

Mr. GREEN: What coordination is there in the work of the employment offices in the different provinces?

Mr. ROGERS: The expenditures of the dominion government under the Employment Offices Coordination Act are applied to the maintenance of an office in Ottawa which acts as a clearing house for the records in the different provinces. We have also undertaken, under the special arrangement following the war, whereby certain placement officers were attached to a number of offices in the larger cities, to give special assistance to disabled war veterans. Our expenditures are confined to these two functions: the maintenance of an office here, which is a clearing house for information from the provincial employment offices, and the special provision of these placement officers.

Mr. GREEN: We might help to solve this problem of the transient unemployed by having employment offices say in Ontario in close touch with the offices in British Columbia. There may be opportunities here to take care of some of these men. Is there no system of cooperation between the offices in the different provinces?

Mr. ROGERS: There is cooperation particularly between adjoining provinces, and in addition to that information is supplied by the federal office, which receives data from the employment offices in all of the provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: There is practically no shifting of labour in this country.

Mr. ROGERS: Mobility of labour has suffered greatly, partly as a result of relief regulations.

Mr. GREEN: Is there any way in which the cooperation could be improved? Could parliament not do something to strengthen it? It would help a great deal in regard to the transient unemployed problem.

Mr. ROGERS: I know of no handicap suffered by the transient in applying for employment in a particular province. There is no restriction, apart from provincial public works, which would prevent transients securing employment generally within a province. If such a transient came from Manitoba to Ontario and applied at a branch of the employment service, he would, as I understand it, be under no disability as compared with residents of the province in his application for work.

Mr. GREEN: The unemployed cannot go to an employment office in Vancouver and ascertain whether there is work in Manitoba, under the present arrangement.

Mr. ROGERS: There is really no difficulty in the Vancouver office securing that information because the dominion office exists in part for that purpose, and it would need simply a telegraphic request for information.

Mr. CAHAN: The fact is that there is a dearth of employment for the so-called transients. I am not speaking in any way as lauding my own efforts, but for twenty years I have known a great number of young men growing up from boyhood and they throng my office to seek employment. Take the months of August and September and early October of last year. I believe I could have secured employment for 2,000 young men if I could have found them—young men with such training in manual employment that they could perform elementary work in the mechanical trades in the operation of machines. But there is now no way in which they can secure employment. Most of the employers are willing to give employment, but under the existing trade union arrangements and agreements they are not able to take them on as apprentices to learn the elements of employment in their particular industries, and so the young men who are untrained do not obtain employment. In many cases employers, in charge of manufacturing and industrial employment generally, are unable to secure the right kind of employees to start with.

When I was a lad in Nova Scotia, the boys of nearly every family were taught for a year or two by apprenticeship the elements of industrial work so as to fit them for earning their own livelihood in case other employment into which they later entered proved unsuccessful. But at the present time we are not educating the youth for manual work and the trade union arrangements do not permit of the employment of apprentices to learn the industrial trades as they did in the past. That is one reason why so many young men in a large city like Montreal find it practically impossible to secure a start in industry in which manual education or apprenticeship is necessary. If the Minister of Labour could bring about an agreement between the employers of industry and the employees so that both would recognize the duty of assisting in giving elementary work in industry to the youth of the land and so encourage and enable them to qualify themselves for industrial employment, he would be doing more to obtain relief from this so-called prevalence of unemployment than any vote of money that the minister could possibly get to assist in technical training. You cannot, under the present arrangements between the labour union and employers, secure employment for young men in the elementary work which they formerly secured by apprenticeship, even if you train them in your technical schools for that purpose. If the minister has any influence with labour unions and with employers of labour in industry I wish he would bring to their hearts and minds a full appreciation of the responsibility which they both have for the conditions of distress which prevail in many of the large cities owing to the unemployment of youth.

Mr. MASSEY: It would be of great interest if the minister would be good enough to give a sketch of the functional activities of the various offices. For instance, how does a man register and what happens after he registers?

Mr. ROGERS: I am not sure that I can answer my hon. friend except to say that the service rendered by the employment bureau is one of receiving applications and making placements where possible. The process of registration is one which is based upon forms which are uniform throughout the service. I should have mentioned that the dominion government also assists in that direction in arranging that there shall be uniform forms available for registration purposes. The extent to which the employment service is able to make placements depends of course upon the degree to which it is utilized by industry. On the whole the record of the employment service in Canada, with respect to placements, compares favourably with employment services established in other countries. It is still true, however, that many of the larger industries prefer to take on personnel through their own personnel offices rather than work through the employment service of Canada. As a matter of fact I have had representations on a number of occasions from the manufacturers' association and chambers of commerce suggesting that the employment service of Canada as at present organized was not serving industry to the extent that it might. I am not prepared to say how far that is due to the employment service itself or how far it is due to the unwillingness of industry to give its full cooperation to that service. No doubt a part of the fault lies in each direction.

Mr. MASSEY: One receives at times various complaints regarding almost everything, but it has been stated to me by many different persons that they have registered for a certain class or kind of work and weeks have gone by and they have heard nothing. In the meantime several others have been placed who came later and registered subsequently to the time of registration of the persons to whom I refer. Does the federal department exercise control over these offices, or are they entirely in the hands of the provinces?

Mr. ROGERS: That aspect of it would be, but if any complaints of that kind are received I see no reason why they should not be brought to the attention of the provincial authorities by the director of employment service in Ottawa.

Mr. MASSEY: To what lengths does the office go to ascertain whether the claims made by a man as to his experience and training are bona fide? If a man registers as a skilled mechanic with nineteen years' experience with a certain type of lathe, for example, does the office satisfy itself that he is a mechanic of that class or kind, or does it simply take his word and send him to an industrial firm with the recommendation that he is a mechanic of that type?

Mr. ROGERS: It would depend upon the officials in charge of the employment office. Some officials would have the means of determining qualifications of the kind described by my hon. friend; others would obviously not be able to determine such qualifications. In that situation it would really rest with the industry to which the man had been sent.

Mr. MASSEY: If a man were to present himself to one of these offices with credentials or recommendations or references or letters "to whom it may concern," saying that he had held some reasonably important position, would he be likely to get a preference over a man who had registered a month before but who had not the same qualifications?

Mr. ROGERS: That is so obviously a matter of internal administration that I cannot give a definite answer. I should certainly assume that in making selections for openings those in charge of the employment office would be guided by priority of application and the qualifications of the candidates.

Mr. MASSEY: Has the minister any figures as to the numbers who were placed through these offices during the last year?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. It might be useful to place these numbers on Hansard. This is from the beginning. The Employment Offices Coordination Act was passed in 1918, and I have the figures from that date forward:

1919 (10 months)	305,905
1920	445,812
1921	355,756
1922	393,522
1923	462,552
1924	366,132
1925	412,825
1926	410,155
1927	414,769
1928	470,328
1929	398,367
1930	368,679
1931	471,508
1932	352,214
1933	352,097
1934	406,091
1935	353,802
1936	331,450
1937	389,526

The number has fallen off to a marked degree as from 1928.

Mr. MASSEY: How many offices are there altogether?

Mr. ROGERS: There are across Canada 69 centres in which offices are established. In larger cities there are three or four offices.

Mr. MacNEIL: In some respects the national employment commission put its finger on certain definite needs in the service. At page 19 it recommends:

> Prompt establishment of a modernized employment service, under national direction so far as all broad principles and policies are concerned, but with such measure of decentralization as will provide effective handling of problems peculiar to each province. This service to provide the administrative local units required to bring about the separation of employables from unemployables, and to formulate such local plans as will increase "employability." To this employment service would be attached regional and, where necessary, local advisory committees, of community-minded citizens, including representatives of employers and labour, in order to ensure that such plans are really practical instead of theoretical.

My experience has been that the service has abandoned the policies which were inaugurated by the late Senator Robertson back in 1919-20. At that time there was formed The Employment Service Council of Canada to advise the Minister of Labour. In several provinces steps were taken to form provincial advisory committees thoroughly representative of employing interests and labour, and in some cities committees were formed. In that way the employment interests felt some responsibility to cooperate with the service. At that time it was possible to secure agreement to abandon the independent employment agencies which were in competition with the government offices, with results which in some ways were disastrous. Is it not possible to implement the recommendations of the commission in such a way as to revitalize this employment service, making some effort to establish the regional and provincial, as well as national, advisory committees, see that the work of the service is properly publicized, and that there is effective cooperation on the part of all interests? In connection with the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green), is it not possible to return to the effective exchange of information between all points in Canada, so that if a shortage of labour exists at one point and a surplus at another a quick and effective exchange may be accomplished; also to deal effectively as far as possible with the seasonal labour requirements in Canada? I think there is much to be said for the terms of this recommendation.

Mr. ROGERS: As to the exchange of information, I am informed that that is done at the present time. Obviously in these last few years the information respecting available employment has been rather limited, and in most provinces has extended rather to certain trades than to general labour, in which, and particularly in the building trades, there has been a surplus rather than a shortage. But the facilities exist for the exchange of information.

As to the setting up of these advisory committees, I agree that there is much to be said in support of the idea, but our experience with committees of that kind has been that if they are to succeed they must be focussed on some concrete task. Simply to have a general advisory committee to deal with the employment service would not be very effective. The national employment commission in making its recommendation had in mind that the employment service would also be utilized in connection with youth training plans and the rehabilitation of the unemployed. I am far from saying that even in the existing organization more might not be done in that direction; I simply point out that in setting up these committees, if one expects results from them it is very important to see that they are focussed on the particular task.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Would it not be possible to obtain greater efficiency by having a national clearing house to which these various offices would send their returns? Is that done?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, that is done. That is one of the functions discharged by the dominion office.

Mr. GREEN: Is there no possibility of the dominion government taking over the employment service, as the Purvis commission so strongly recommended? Why can we not establish our own dominion employment agencies in the different provinces, or, if some provinces did not want it, let them carry on as they are? I am sure that certain provinces would be willing to allow the dominion to take over the field.

Mr. ROGERS: That is a question I have had occasion to discuss before in this house. It is true that there are certain provinces that would even now consent to the employment service being taken over by the dominion. It so happens however that these are provinces in which the problem of unemployment is less acute with respect to industrial labour; I refer particularly to some of the western provinces. I would question the desirability of the dominion setting up a competing system of employment service. From time to time this government and other governments have been attacked on the ground of duplicating services. I have discussed this matter with a number of the provinces. I am bound to say that while some would be agreeable, others are definitely opposed, and while some of the larger industrial provinces are opposed to having the employment service nationalized, I question the wisdom of our proceeding in a piecemeal way.

Mr. MacNEIL: What steps are being taken to coordinate the work in the various provinces. The minister is aware of the necessary movement of labour from point to point between the great lakes and the Pacific coast to take care of seasonal requirements. Is there any coordination so that men move as efficiently as possible from one job to the next as it may open up, without being released in large numbers and then picked up again in a more or less haphazard way? Is there a general plan in effect in that respect between the four western provinces?

Mr. ROGERS: An effort is made to collate all information with respect to available employment and seasonal opportunities for employment. For example, special arrangements have been made with the railways to see that when there is definite promise of employment no man shall fail to reach that employment by reason of the fact that he is unable to meet the railway charges.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is the service equipped to deal with a situation such as that in Vancouver to-day? It has been suggested that work is available at various points and that these single unemployed men should apply for it. Can we safely give assurance that work is available for them?

Mr. ROGERS: I would not suggest for a moment that one could say that on a given day all of a certain group of men can be given employment in one province or another. The employment office in Vancouver would be advised of possible opportunities for employment in other provinces. But as my hon. friend fully realizes, in the past few years in most of the provinces there has been, generally speaking, a surplus of general labour and of workers in the building trades. We are hoping that this situation will be very largely rectified shortly. Of course it does not follow that all employment in a city or province must be obtained through the Employment Service of Canada.

Mr. LOCKHART: Having regard to the apparent evils that are in the minds of all hon. members and have been expressed to the minister, would he from his contact with the provincial officers up to the present time express an opinion as to whether such abuses are being rectified? Is there a willingness on the part of the employment offices to cure some of the evils that have been so apparent, and that I know are in the minds of those who are in close touch with employment offices? Does the minister feel like expressing an opinion as to whether there is any indication on the part of the employment offices that they are ready to assist in eradicating these evils, or are they indifferent to the whole situation?

Mr. ROGERS: Certainly I would not go the length of saying that the directors of the employment offices in the various provinces are indifferent to the situation or are not desirous of correcting such abuses as exist. On the other hand I would not feel myself in a position to pass censure upon the employment service as it existed generally in a particular province. Undoubtedly there are weak points; possibly there are weak points in all provinces, and I would imagine that in all provinces there is a growing opinion that the employment service of Canada should be modernized, as suggested by the national employment commission, and made even more useful than it has been in the past. In all this criticism I think we should recognize that generally speaking the Employment Service of Canada has done a very good job with respect to placements for a number of years, but undoubtedly much can be done to improve and modernize it. If that cannot be done by nationalization it ought to be done by more effective cooperation between the employment services in the various provinces.

Mr. LOCKHART: There are one or two points in particular I have in mind, and no doubt the minister has encountered places where perhaps greater evils have crept in. Are definite efforts being made by the department to have difficulties eliminated at particular points that may have been brought to the attention of the minister? I imagine he is familiar with certain points. I know of one or two. Is a real effort being made by the minister to impress upon those in charge at those points the importance of having the difficulties remedied, difficulties that have been so apparent particularly within the last year or two? Is the Department of Labour bringing its influence to bear upon points where evils have crept in?

Mr. ROGERS: The answer to that question would be that the Department of Labour is and will be anxious to bring about an improvement in the Employment Service of Canada, and to correct any weaknesses that may exist. So far as personnel is concerned I have explained to the committee that it is effectively beyond our control, but certainly I would not say that the difficulties as to personnel are confined to any year or any period of years, and I am sure my hon. friend will agree with that. Possibly difficulties with respect to personnel in some respects go back to the beginning of the service. Certainly we will do whatever lies within our power to improve the service, but the question of personnel is one that actually lies within provincial control.

Mr. MacNEIL: May I ask exactly what facilities are available to a transient in British Columbia, now unemployed, whose domicile is in Saskatchewan or Manitoba? Can he go to the office in Vancouver and register, even though he is not a resident of British Columbia, and secure definite advice or assistance in connection with employment that may be avilable in the province of his domicile?

Mr. ROGERS: Clearly that would be a matter of internal administration. Personally I would feel that if the information were available which would disclose possibilities of employment in the province of domicile, he would be assisted by the officer of the employment office towards obtaining such employment. I cannot go beyond that.

Mr. MASSEY: A few moments ago the minister very kindly gave the number of jobs that had been obtained through these sixty-eight offices throughout the dominion. Has he any record of the number of applications that were handled, in order that we may have an idea of the success of these offices?

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps it would serve the purpose of my hon. friend if I gave the number of applications in a given year and the number of placements in the same year.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes.

Mr. ROGERS: The year is from March, 1936, to March, 1937, inclusive. The number of applications was 680,183. The number of placements was 332,195.

Mr. MASSEY: Would the 680,183 be different individuals, or might an individual apply two or three times in the course of a year?

Mr. ROGERS: These would be the actual placements. A man might be placed several times in the course of a year.

Mr. MASSEY: And the same would apply in regard to applications?

Mr. ROGERS: One man might be placed a number of times in the course of a year, and each time would be included as a placement.

Mr. MASSEY: The 680,183 would be the total number of applications, and a man might apply several times in a year?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. MASSEY: Would the minister be good enough to tell the committee if the offices in the various centres advertise that they have registered with them mechanics, drill hands, and so on, whatever may be the various types of skilled labour available? Do they advertise at all in the daily press in order to notify employers that they have available men of the type referred to a short time ago by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not believe they advertise.

Mr. MASSEY: They do in some centres.

Mr. ROGERS: They may in some centres; that would be entirely a matter of provincial administration, as to whether money was available for that purpose. But apart from that, as my hon. friend knows, all employment offices have a bulletin service, and to some extent that meets the need.

Mr. MASSEY: On page 32 of the final report of the national employment commission these words appear:

> The national employment commission feels, however, that it would be failing in its responsibilities if it did not record its opinion, formed out of its experience with problems of unemployment and "relief" that since the dominion government has already invited the cooperation of the provinces to achieve a national system of unemployment insurance it would be in the interests of sound and economical administration that a unified and coordinated system of nationally administered unemployment insurance, unemployment aid and employment service be instituted.

That would seem to me a recommendation that all these employment offices be placed under federal control. Would the minister care to state to the committee whether he personally feels that that should be done?

Mr. ROGERS: I believe I have already stated—

Mr. MASSEY: In a particular way, I mean.

Mr. ROGERS: —to the committee that I can see many advantages in having a national employment service, but I do not believe one can answer that question without regard to the control of other industrial conditions which now lies within provincial jurisdiction. I refer particularly to the fact that under our federal distribution of powers the provinces are in effective control of working hours and conditions; and in fact the provinces generally are in more constant contact with industry than is the dominion. That recommendation of the national employment commission was made in such a way as to indicate clearly that in the future if we had a national system of unemployment insurance we could have an effective national employment service. It is generally agreed that with a national system of unemployment insurance, and the employment service that would be established as a corollary of unemployment insurance, there would be established a continuing contact between the employment service and industry in a way which would not occur otherwise. I do not see that the dominion could establish an effective employment service without at the same time having either a national system of unemployment insurance or a control over other industrial conditions.

Mr. MASSEY: In connection with the suggestion recently made to various provinces for an unemployment insurance plan, was it suggested that the unemployment services be given over to the dominion, or was that assumed to be the case?

Mr. ROGERS: In the original letter—and I am speaking from recollection—the reference was to unemployment insurance, and to employment offices as a necessary corollary of unemployment insurance. But in the letter which referred to the constitutional amendment the reference was rather to unemployment insurance. However, it was the opinion of the law officers of the crown that with the power to deal with unemployment insurance there would be no question as to the power to set up employment services.

Mr. BENNETT: Ancillary to it.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, employment services ancillary to it.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): It must be recognized that these placements are costing the dominion government a considerable sum. In 1937 the placement of 389,000 cost forty cents a placement. That is a big item, and unless the minister is perfectly satisfied that the organization is really doing good work it seems to me it is very costly. There must be some better way by which placements can be effected.

Mr. ROGERS: I suppose it is a matter of opinion as to whether or not a service is costly, when it means an expenditure of forty cents per placement. I would not agree with the hon. member in that regard. I have not compared the figures in connection with unemployment services with other countries, but I would feel that a cost of forty cents per placement was not by any means excessive.

Mr. GREEN: In what way are young men and women receiving youth training helped by the employment agencies? Is there any tie-up which enables the agencies to help these young people?

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps that question might better be reserved until we discuss an item in the supplementary estimates. However, if the hon. member wishes I shall deal with it now. In the past we did seek to have special placement officers attached to the employment service to deal particularly with those who received training under the plans for unemployed young people. This year I feel still more strongly that this service should be improved and possibly extended, because clearly the final justification of plans of that kind is the placement of those who have received the training. I am not suggesting one could reasonably expect that all could be placed in employment, but I would agree entirely with the hon. member when he suggests it is important that training be linked up with placements through the Employment Service of Canada, or in some other way.

Mr. GREEN: Are all those young people registered with the employment offices?

Mr. ROGERS: I am quite sure when they have received their training they are registered with the Employment Service of Canada. Perhaps the hon. member would allow that question to stand, and I shall secure the information and give it to him when the other item is before the committee.

Mr. MASSEY: The minister has said that he feels the services of the various employment offices should be extended. In view of the fact that the administration of these offices is in the hands of the provinces, how does he go about seeing that those services are extended?

Mr. ROGERS: Well, Mr. Chairman, there are always the powers of suggestion and persuasion. I suppose in our agreements with the provinces we could under the statute require that the services be extended in certain particulars. If we did so I suspect the provinces concerned would say, "Very well; we will conduct the service if you will pay for it." Of course that would involve the question whether or not the dominion government should increase its present allowance for the maintenance of the employment service in Canada.

Mr. MASSEY: Do I understand that in the granting of this vote, amounting this year to $63,925, we make no inspection of those offices at all, and leave the matter entirely to the provinces?

Mr. ROGERS: Inspections are made from time to time. The director of employment services does visit the employment offices and makes a report, a portion of which is usually included in the report of the Department of Labour.

Mr. MASSEY: Is the visit anticipated, or does he just arrive?

Mr. ROGERS: My information is that he arrives unheralded.

Mr. MacNEIL: It is extremely important to consider the operation of the service, particularly with relation to a crisis such as we have in Vancouver. Is it possible through the facilities of the employment service to make a quick survey of other provinces, and to determine whether or not work of any type is available for the men who have concentrated in Vancouver? Was there any definite tie-up between the government service and the forestry camps, prior to the release of the men from the forestry work?

Mr. ROGERS: I am not able to say at this time whether there was a connection established between the forestry conservation camps and the employment service of British Columbia. I would assume—and I believe the hon. member so stated the other day—that when those men left the forestry conservation camps they registered with the employment service in Vancouver. Again I can see no reason at all why those in charge of employment services in Vancouver could not be advised of employment opportunities in other provinces. In other words, transients who were non-resident, and whom it was proposed to return to their own homes or places of origin, might have received information as to possible employment opportunities. But again I believe it is important to point out that the information available in employment offices would not necessarily limit the employment opportunities in any province, because there are a great many employment opportunities which are filled otherwise than through the Employment Service of Canada.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is it correct to assume that even in this present serious crisis the minister has not been advised as to whether or not the employment service is able to offer any work to non-residents, through the Vancouver office?

Mr. ROGERS: Well, it is quite evident I believe that in almost every province where unemployment exists at the present time no head of an employment service could give an assurance that there is work available for all. The availability of work would depend upon the qualifications of the applicants and also upon the priority of the application.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does that not boil down to this, that if an agency such as the government service is unable to indicate employment opportunities, actually no work is available for those men?

Mr. ROGERS: No, I would not say that.

Mr. MacNEIL: What evidence exists that there is work anywhere for them?

Mr. BENNETT: That is the whole trouble.

Mr. ROGERS: The only answer I can make to the hon. member is the one I have already given, namely that many men, to the number I have indicated, are placed regularly through the Employment Service of Canada. But we know that there are many others who are placed directly through their own applications, either to industry or to other employers of labour. So that it does not follow of necessity that because the Employment Service of Canada cannot state that men can be placed at work in a given province, no opportunities for employment exist in that province.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does it not follow, though, that if there were employment in any province generally speaking the employment offices would know about it? If employers were seeking workers, and those positions were not filled, it would seem that an approach would be made to the government service. As the hon. member for Vancouver North has said, if there are no positions with the employment service it would seem to be a clear indication that employment is not available. It is quite true that a person may obtain employment—and many do—without approaching the government service. But if the agency cannot supply all those who make application for jobs I think it is a clear indication that work is not available, and that there is a residue of unemployed persons who cannot find jobs.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is it not true that at the present time in every office of the employment service in western Canada there are more men registered for work than there are positions available?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not that information at hand. May I say that for many years at any given time a considerable portion of our population has been unemployed. That is so because of the seasonal nature of much of our employment.

Mr. MacINNIS: But is there not this difference between the present situation and that which obtained in other years, namely, that in other years the amount of work was sufficient to carry the men from one job to another, whereas at present the wages made at one job are eaten up before the men can get to another. They are out of clothing and are behind in their rent—provided they have some one who trusts them for rent. All those payments have to be made out of a job, and when that job is completed they are on relief again, or have to obtain employment in some way. Is it not really that which makes unemployment a matter of concern to the government? When a worker could maintain himself from one job to the other, unemployment was not regarded as something bad; it was considered useful because it enabled employers to buy labour cheap. But the situation is altogether changed when the unemployed man cannot carry himself from one job to another and becomes a burden upon the government or upon the state.

Mr. GREEN: Perhaps the minister will excuse me if I bring up the question as to when the summer training camps, the forestry training camps, will be opened in British Columbia. I understand they will provide for a great many of the younger men, and presumably some of the men who are sitting in the post office at Vancouver will be elegible for these camps. When will the camps be opened?

Mr. ROGERS: I would assume that they would be opened in the very near future. I have no definite information on that point. My hon. friend knows that the training camps, as distinct from the forestry conservation camps which have been in operation during the winter months, fall within the youth training plans. There is no reason that I can see why the training camps should not be opened in the very near future.

Mr. GREEN: They will accept men up to thirty years of age, will they not?

Mr. ROGERS: There is a possibilty of accepting them up to thirty years of age. Normally the age limit would be eighteen to twenty-five.

Mr. GREEN: Well, if these men will be eligible for those camps, and the camps will be open in a very short time, would it not be possible for the government to make some arrangement to care for these young men in the interval? It will be only a matter of two or three weeks or perhaps a month. Could they not be cared for in some way or another, perhaps by having one or two of the winter camps opened, and the young men who would be eligible for the training camps placed in these winter camps meanwhile?

Mr. ROGERS: I see no reason why some of these young men may not be eligible for training in the forestry camps. As to their care meanwhile, those who would be eligible would be residents of British Columbia, and any care extended to them meanwhile would be a matter entirely of provincial administration.

Mr. GREEN: Of course it is an unfortunate situation that exists in Vancouver, and it affects the whole dominion. I think it would help a great deal if arrangements could be made to take out that particular class of young man. Surely the government could go that far. It might solve the whole difficulty if two or three hundred of these younger men could be gotten out in this way. Cannot something be done along that line?

Mr. ROGERS: I have already presented to the house a copy of a telegram which set out very clearly that single unemployed men would be upon the same footing as others in a similar position, with respect to their eligibility for youth training plans or employment offered on public works projects. I cannot go beyond that statement.

Mr. GREEN: Could steps be taken to find out now what proportion of these men in the post office and the art gallery are eligible for such training? That at least would show that steps are being taken, and I believe the fact that some move was being made by the government would help a great deal.

Mr. ROGERS: The answer to that is that the information is already available so far as the men who are in the forestry camps are concerned. All were registered while they were in these camps. It is known where they came from. It is on the basis of that information that the offer of transportation was made to them in order that they might return to their places of origin.

Mr. MacNEIL: I do not wish to be unduly insistent or to be unfair to the minister, but I fail to understand his unwillingness to accept suggestions that special action be taken to deal with an urgent situation. It is difficult to interpret the minister's remark that he recognizes the gravity of the situation in Vancouver at this time. I am receiving daily resolutions from responsible persons and organizations. For instance, I have one under my hand now, signed by Archbishop DePencier of Vancouver, who is extremely perturbed about the situation. The minister says he is relying on provincial government advice and it is purely a matter of provincial government administration; but by this vote we are contributing to the maintenance of this service, under an agreement which gives the minister some degree of supervision of the operation of the service. I fail to understand why some special effort may not now be made to meet this situation. May I point this out, that the federal government will no doubt contribute in part to the expenditure of a considerable sum of money for transportation of these men—they have already offered it—to various other provinces. Surely, if that money is to be expended, it is reasonable to suggest that it be expended on a business-like basis, and that when a man receives transportation through the facilities of a particular service he will have the assurance of assistance to his destination and a share of any employment that may be available. He should not be simply removed to another point and cast adrift.

Another point I wish to stress is that if some action is not taken, an increasing number of men will be sent to gaol; it costs the provincial government over a dollar a day to maintain a man at the Oakalla gaol, and that is not good business, quite apart from the fact that the men are thrown into association with hardened criminals.

Here we have an employment service. Surely it is possible, with the facilities existing in this service, to set in operation some plan to meet the situation, first with regard to those who are resident in British Columbia, and then to move those who are non-residents to points where they will either be offered work or receive food and shelter under some suitable arrangement.

Mr. ROGERS: I have tried to say to my hon. friend, although I may not have succeeded, that the facilities of the Employment Service of Canada have been available from the beginning with respect to these men, are available now, and will be made available to them, but upon the same basis as such services will be made available to others who are in the same condition of unemployment. It is not possible to go beyond that.

Mr. MacINNIS: What are those conditions? If the Employment Service of Canada cannot find jobs for these men, its service is finished, is it not? Is there anything further it can do? When the minister says that the Employment Service of Canada is available to these men on the same basis as to others, what use is it to these men or to others if no jobs are available?

Mr. ROGERS: The purpose of the employment service, my hon. friend is aware, is not to create employment—

Mr. MacINNIS: I am quite aware of that. It cannot create jobs.

Mr. ROGERS: Exactly—but rather to offer assistance to place unemployed in such opportunities for employment as may be available. That service will certainly be extended to those in British Columbia.

Mr. MacINNIS: I am sure the minister will not be under any misapprehension of my understanding of what the employment service is. I assume it is a place where employers can register that they have places available for men, and where men can register for jobs. If there are no jobs available with the employment service, that is the end of it as far as any aid it can give to the men is concerned. I suppose this is true, that were it not for the fact that men are compelled to register before they can get relief, there would be far fewer registrations in times of intense unemployment than there would be in normal times, because once the men have registered and have received no results from the registration they are not going to go there from day to day. I know that from experience in visiting these employment agencies and finding out the circumstances for myself. I think the minister must admit that work is not available for these men in British Columbia. The other day I read a letter from the mayor of Vancouver stating that conditions were worse than they were last year, and that because of the arrangement between the province and the dominion the city is carrying a greater burden. Unless the minister can demonstrate in some effective way that there are openings for employment, I cannot see how these men can be denied relief.

Mr. MacNICOL: For some time I have been wondering whether this particular expenditure is not more or less wasted.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MacNICOL: In the old country, of course, the branch which corresponds, although in name only, to this department does a great deal of work. I assume that what is done in the old country under the branch of the labour department which looks after the same work that this is supposed to look after, is done in this country by the provincial governments. I have been wondering for what purpose we give these sums of money, large in some provinces and small in others, to the provincial labour departments. In 1937 a little less than $4,000 was given to Nova Scotia. What could the federal representatives in Nova Scotia do in assisting in the administration of the labour department in that province in connection with the employment business when they had only $4,000? I do not find anything in the auditor general's report to show what was done with that $4,000, and I cannot see what could be done. I believe there is an office in Toronto?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, several offices.

Mr. MacNICOL: An unemployed man passing the dominion government labour office naturally assumes that he will at least learn something about employment. He goes into the office and says that he is a carpenter or machinist, or whatever he is, and is looking for a job. What does the federal representative in Toronto do?

Mr. ROGERS: There is no federal representative in the employment office in Toronto except for the handicapped ex-service men. The personnel in the employment service in the province and the whole administration of it are looked after by the provincial governments through their departments of labour. The dominion government under the Employment Offices Coordination Act assists the provinces through a grant in aid to maintain the employment service. Under the same act we also provide for a clearing house of information at Ottawa.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is really not a clearing office in the sense that such a labour department in the United Kingdom is. I have sat in a labour office in London for many hours watching how they operate it, and I have discussed matters with the officials and with men coming up to the counter, because the officials were kind enough to let me sit behind the counter and talk with the men. What I cannot understand is what the Canadian federal offices do with a vote like this. We grant to Ontario nearly $62,000. What does the provincial government do for that sum, which is granted by this government for a service which the province is already carrying on inasmuch as it has its own offices everywhere? I shall be glad to support anything that will help men to get work, but it seems to me this is another instance of duplication and we are throwing away $150,000 a year for practically nothing. I do not know when it was started; but the time has come, seeing that we are getting no results, to change or put a stop to it and put the money to better use.

Mr. ROGERS: It has been in existence twenty years. This is not a case of duplication but a grant in aid made by the dominion government to assist in establishing an employment service right across the dominion.

Mr. MacNICOL: Does the federal government pay the salaries?

Mr. ROGERS: The federal government contributes on the basis of actual expenditures in each province in relation to the total expenditures across the dominion. In other words, the $150,000 we pay is allocated to the provinces on that basis, and in addition to that we maintain an office here for the purpose of collecting information from all the provincial employment offices in order that there may be this clearing house of information with respect to employment opportunities.

Mr. MASSEY: The total amount of the vote is about $114,000, which, incidentally, is 11·4 per cent of the total amount which was voted last year for the vital item of youth training. This amount of $114,000 is a substantial sum of money, and it is reasonable to expect a substantial return for it. The success or failure of the employment offices, as suggested, rests with the service they can render to those who employ labour. After all, if they can convince employers of labour that the men whom they have registered with them and whom they will send to employers are men such as are asked for, then the offices will be working in close cooperation with industry. Several employers whose word I must rely upon have told me that there have been times when the men whom they have asked for have not been the men they have received. Let me cite one instance of a man who applied to the employment office in one city with a request for a workman who was capable of operating an automatic lathe. He said the reason he wanted a man for a short period was that the regular operator was away ill, and he was in the midst of a rush job and wanted a highly skilled mechanic for the position. He was informed that such a man was available and would report the next morning. The man reported; but he turned out to be a drill hand, utterly unfamiliar with the operation of that lathe. One or two experiences of this sort have had such an effect on that particular employer that he no longer has any confidence in the employment office in his particular municipal centre, and the result is he is seeking men from some other source.

As the minister told us a short time ago, the inspectors occasionally visit these offices, unheralded, it is true; but that is really not good enough. It is highly desirable that the department should conduct a proper survey of all these offices, to see whether or not this money we are voting is applied to the fullest possible advantage; and by that I mean the advantage of the men, because after all the whole purpose of these offices is to obtain jobs for the men. We vote this money with that idea in mind. The most effective way in which these offices can carry out their purpose is by establishing contact with employers of labour—and such contact as has proved itself to be of value. When men have two or three experiences such as the one I have related, they tend to lose confidence in the employment offices. I asked whether any advertising was done, and the minister properly answered that that was in the hands of the local office, and that if the province was willing the money should be spent for advertising, and skilled labour was available, it would be done; otherwise it would not be done. As the hon. member for Davenport has said, however, one cannot help feeling that in some ways this money is not used to the fullest possible advantage, unless it is used in such a way as I have suggested. Would the minister be willing to state that in the past this money has been applied to the best possible advantage; that the provinces are cooperating fully, and that the offices are discharging their functions as well as possible for the benefit of those who apply to them.

Mr. ROGERS: I believe I have already answered or tried to answer that question on a number of occasions. I fully agree that in the administration of the employment service in some sections of the country—I am not prepared to say how extensive the weakness may be—such a weakness does exist. As a matter of common knowledge it does exist in some sections and ought to be corrected. I believe that we as a federal Department of Labour should do what we can to see that such abuses are corrected, but it is quite another matter to say when the abuses began. Possibly they began from the inception of the service itself. Certainly I would not say, nor would my hon. friend say, that these abuses have come into existence only in the last two or three years.

Mr. MASSEY: Certainly not.

Mr. ROGERS: We have had periodic inspections. I had a report a year ago from the director of the employment service after a journey across the country. There are certain improvements that ought to be made, but whether they should be made by increasing the dominion grant in aid is another question. I should doubt very much whether that would accomplish the desired result, but undoubtedly we have a power of suggestion and perhaps of persuasion which has been exercised before and will be exercised again. Our one desire is, if we contribute to a service, to see that it is made as efficient as possible.

Mr. MASSEY: Has the minister any idea what proportion of the money is spent for administration, how much for rental of offices, advertising and so on? Is there any break-down?

Mr. ROGERS: That detail would appear in the provincial accounts. We have a certain item for our central administration. There is, in addition, $150,000 a year which is paid to the different provinces in the proportion which their expenditures in carrying on their employment services bear to the total expenditures of the employment services throughout the dominion.

Mr. MASSEY: Then the item of $63,925 is the federal expense? That does not go to the provinces at all?

Mr. ROGERS: No; the $150,000 goes to the provinces.

Mr. MASSEY: How is that apportioned among the various provinces?

Mr. ROGERS: That is what I just explained. It is divided on the basis of the expenses of a single province in maintaining its employment service, in relation to the total expense of maintaining employment services in all provinces.

Mr. MASSEY: That is, in accordance with the existing set-up?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. MASSEY: In other words, the minister does not suggest, if province A provides perhaps a better service than province B, that there should be greater service extended in province B and the grant be increased proportionately?

Mr. ROGERS: No.

Mr. MASSEY: Is that not a reasonable suggestion? Assume that province A has conducted its service in a highly beneficial manner and rendered much greater service than province B.

Mr. ROGERS: The province which spends most, and which by inference is most interested in maintaining the service, will receive a larger grant from the dominion.

Mr. MASSEY: True, but though it may spend most, it may get fewer results; it may be because more have achieved success in getting a job not in industry but in the employment office itself. The amount of expenditure does not necessarily indicate the ratio of success. After all the measure of success is the number applying and the jobs obtained.

Mr. BENNETT: I come back to my old question. I should like the minister to give effective assurance that conditions which now obtain will be discontinued. I am not at this moment going to give names, but I have the papers and can give the names of the individuals I have in mind. A returned soldier applied to the employment office for a position. He knew of a vacancy. He was told to go and see the chief of the Liberal organization in the community. He went to him and told him the situation. He went back with a letter from the chief of the Liberal association to the job which was being carried on. There they rather laughed at him, because there seemed to be a fair understanding that that was not going to get him anything. He was not able to get anything to do. The minister has said—what I expected he would say—that he does not approve that sort of thing. But I suggested an alternative method of dealing with it as far as we are concerned. It may be that under the terms of the statute and the agreement which we made we are precluded at present from lessening our contribution. The minister did not make this arrangement; it was made before he came. The late government did not make it, it was made immediately after the war. In 1918, I think, we undertook to make a grant, and according to my memory the grant has been $150,000 direct, in addition to a varying sum depending upon administration, which I understand is our administration cost. Is that right?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: We are dealing with expenditures of the dominion government with respect to this item. And the next item we have been considering with relation to it is the payment of the $150,000 which we do not expend but which is expended by the provinces. Now, having regard to the terms of the agreement of 1918, I realize the difficulty of the minister saying, We are not going to make this payment. But I do ask him to say definitely that this sort of thing must stop. And it is easily stopped. All we have to do is to have someone who represents us with respect to these undertakings. The undertaking I have in mind involves an expenditure well on to a million dollars. The work is on a cost-plus basis. It is monstrous—I use that word again, at which the minister sometimes smiles—that a poor unfortunate cannot get a job because he cannot get a letter to the employment office from the head of the Liberal organization.

The other day the Prime Minister made his position clear, and the minister has done so again this afternoon. But that is no good. What I want is some action; and the minister can give it if he will. He knows quite well how to stop this sort of thing if he wants to do so. It can be stopped. We who pay at least half the money for the job are not going to permit someone to tell us that a man cannot get a position unless he does certain things, and even then it does not always get him the job. I would ask the minister to give some assurance that this sort of thing is going to stop. The other evening, as I say, the Prime Minister on behalf of the government made his position perfectly clear. He said that this sort of thing should stop. We were dealing with a specific case, but he went far beyond that.

The conditions under which we live have so changed that when you find a minister thinking it necessary to write letters to a selected list of people only, saying, "We are going to buy so many onions and so much canned goods, etc.," you are going to have trouble. Who are the largest taxpayers? Not members of the Liberal party alone. I am a very heavy taxpayer, and I am told that my taxes cannot be used to pay for the work of a man who wants employment and cannot get it because he is a supporter of mine. And I am told furthermore that a man who lived in Calgary for only a few months and who was a candidate running against me is determining whether or not men shall get a job. They must be Liberals, and my money in the form of taxes must pay them, but my friends cannot get work. Under conditions of normal prosperity there might be a different attitude. But this is laying the foundations for anarchy. Mark it!

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend is not suggesting for a moment that this practice has begun within the last two or three years?

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. ROGERS: I think he ought to make that perfectly clear to the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: But I make it perfectly clear that to my knowledge it was not done under the relief administration.

Mr. ROGERS: I am afraid it was.

Mr. BENNETT: I can only say in my own constituency it was not. The names were put in a hat and drawn out by the mayor of the city.

Mr. MUTCH: How were the names put in the hat?

Mr. BENNETT: The names of all the unemployed were taken just as they came along. If you desire information on that point all you have to do is to write to the city clerk of Calgary. I am speaking of what I know.

Mr. ROGERS: That was not true in Kingston, absolutely not.

Mr. BENNETT: It may not be, but conditions have become so intensified. Sometimes I wonder whether our friends realize that we are living on the edge of a volcano in this country. I am not going to take the time, but I could start at Vancouver island and go to Cape Breton and point out what is happening in this country. The worst case is that occurring in the Vancouver post office. The hon. member has made it clear again this afternoon. It is apparent that there is no place to which those men can be sent in this country and get a job. There is no sense in getting into an acrimonious discussion with the minister, but I can give him the names and addresses, of the men and the day they went to get a job and were told they could not get it unless they got the imprimatur of the head of this organization. This man of whom I spoke is a returned man, going to be turned out of his house because he cannot pay his rent; he cannot pay his rent because he could not get work, and he could not get work because he did not support the present administration. I am bound to say that the president of the association gave him a letter, but when the contractor got it he just laughed. Whether or not he had been communicated with by telephone, he said, "You are not one of ours." That was the sense of it.

Mr. ROGERS: The contractor said that?

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the foreman.

Mr. ROGERS: I am surprised at that.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, there are many surprises, I am sorry to say. For instance, I had a letter from a man arising out of the discussion we had the other day. He said he had talked to a gentleman who is a minister of the crown, and he had told him to keep in touch with the head of the Liberal organization. He said, "I have done it, but I cannot get anything to do."

All I ask the minister to do is to give this committee some assurance that the policy indicated by the Prime Minister the other evening to be the policy he believed in will be made effective, and that this sort of thing will be stopped. There are no words to describe it adequately. It is a rather serious thing, in view of the burden of taxation imposed on the people of this country, to say that because a man does not support a particular political party all the taxes paid by a man who opposes that party must be available only for those who oppose him. That is what it means. Surely there are some humanitarian principles left in this country somewhere. I can give case after case proving that it has been noticed in various parts of Canada. We should not say much about social credit and promises of $25 a month in view of what has happened in Saskatchewan during the last month. That also must have repercussions throughout this country. Do hon. members realize that this is the first time in the history of democracy when a majority of the electors are on relief? Never before in Canada have we had such a condition. And we have those who are responsible for providing the relief telling them that if they do not vote Liberal they will be hungry. The effect of that upon the institutions of this dominion I put to this committee.

Mr. ROGERS: Surely that is a reflection as well upon those who are on relief. Does my right hon. friend suggest for one moment that because a man is on relief, even if there were dictation of that kind it would be submitted to? I suggest that is an impossible statement.

Mr. BENNETT: I at once say yes to my hon. friend's question; and what is more, I know. A man with a wife and family is not taking chances on their starvation. I know about what I am speaking. I have had them tell me; I have their letters. Very reluctantly they have been compelled to take this step; but when a man looks upon his wife and children and is told that they must suffer want unless he is prepared to give allegiance to a particular party, you know what he will do. It is all right to talk in these high-sounding phrases and say this is a reflection upon them. It is human nature. The man is driven by a force he cannot possibly withstand; it is his wife and family against his convictions. So he says, "I will sacrifice the one to save the other." That spells anarchy in this country in the end.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Will the right hon. leader of the opposition give the committee the name of a single individual who stated to anyone that unless he voted in a certain way he would go hungry?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Regina City is reported in the press to have said that the reason why the electors of Saskatchewan should return Liberal candidates in that province in yesterday's election was that they had obtained more money than they would have obtained if there had not been a Liberal government there and a Liberal government here; that they had been supplied with feed and fodder, clothing and things of that kind.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The right hon. leader of the opposition is now talking about something that is reported in the press. A moment ago he said he was talking of something of which he knew of his own knowledge. I ask again: Does he know of his own knowledge of any case where a man has been told that unless he voted in a certain way he would be allowed to go hungry?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: I said I was not going to read these cases, but I shall read one letter in that respect from a man who lives in the neighbouring city of Kingston. He writes:

> I heard of an opportunity to get a place at Barriefield, working at camp 42. I went to the employment bureau and was told to see Mr. A. E. Stansbury. He gave me a letter to the foreman but when I gave him the letter he only laughed, for I am known to be a Conservative, and so I was not wanted.

Mr. Stansbury's letter is now in the possession of a friend of his, whom he names.

Mr. ROGERS: What is the signature?

Mr. BENNETT: I was not going to give the signature, but I will:

> I am a war veteran without pension. It is almost impossible to get work because I am not a Liberal, and am about to be put on the street for arrears in rent. I would like to ask if there is any possible way of you be able to help us by your influence to obtain work of some kind to enable my family to be able to have a home without being put out, because relief won't pay rent when we are out of work.
> Yours very truly,
>
> R. E. Rollands,
> 23 Elgin Street,
> Kingston.

And there are other letters here from Kingston to the same effect. Some of them have asked me to say this, but that I should not use their names, because the effect of it would be that they would lose any possible chance of any kind to get anything to do. These are not isolated cases; I could give others. I also have a file as large as this in regard to Saskatchewan.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, Mr. Chairman, on that point, since the right hon. gentleman has raised it now, would he suggest for one moment that there were not similar cases, which presumably he would regret equally, under his own administration, and with respect to the administration of relief camps at Barriefield?

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to Barriefield I cannot say, but I do say this, that because I heard of just such evils as these to which I refer I did endeavour to prevent them. In my own community I know that effect was given to that endeavour by putting the names in a hat and having them drawn. I can assure my hon. friend to my right that he is in error when he suggests that all the names were not put there; the names of all the people who were unemployed, with the numbers, were put there. At the appropriate time I shall read what happened the next spring, when they were finishing those barracks on top of the hill, and give the names; I am permitted to do that. They had to have letters from the defeated candidates before they could get jobs, as compared with what they had done before. I do not say for a moment that evils did not exist, but I do say we endeavoured to stop them.

Mr. ROGERS: In what way did my right hon. friend endeavour to stop them?

Mr. BENNETT: Just the way I have mentioned without regard to the political faith of the individuals the names were drawn to determine where they should work.

Mr. ROGERS: Will my right hon. friend suggest at the same time that in connection with the administration of relief camps and the very large purchases made by the relief camps, of many kinds of material, the names of those who were allowed to tender were drawn out of a hat?

Mr. BENNETT: No, not for a minute.

Mr. ROGERS: Was it not based upon a preferred list consisting entirely of friends of my right hon. friend?

Mr. BENNETT: Not entirely, to my knowledge.

Mr. MacINNIS: Is that any reason why it should be done now?

Mr. BENNETT: But remember, this is the thing that was not going to happen. This is where my hon. friend was going to change it all. This is where the professor was going to see that decency prevailed. That is the way I put it.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall speak with a little less heat than my right hon. friend, but possibly with a little more light. The right hon. gentleman has dealt with this question on three different occasions.

Mr. BENNETT: And he is going to deal with it again.

Mr. ROGERS: Quite so, and his whole purpose has been, by a number of vague charges in the beginning, which I have no doubt were designed to bring more definite charges, to seek to create the impression that I as Minister of Labour had definitely connived at the violation of the terms with respect to employment under relief agreements.

Mr. BENNETT: And he will prove it in this house.

Mr. ROGERS: When my right hon. friend brought the matter up in the first place I said definitely and categorically that as far as relief work in my own constituency or elsewhere was concerned, politics had not entered into it with my knowledge or consent. I stand absolutely by that statement. But I went further and said that there were two different kinds of employment provided in Kingston, and probably in other constituencies as well. There were works covered by relief agreements with the provinces, in which there was a definite undertaking that there should not be discrimination of the kind I have described. That was one type of work. With respect to that I said that I was absolutely in accord with that provision against discrimination, and would seek to see to it that it was observed. But with respect to other employment, casual vacancies occurring in the administration of various departments, I said I had accepted recommendations from my local executive and had sent those recommendations on with my approval, and I would not be hypocritical enough to say I had done otherwise. It would be dishonest to myself and to this house to say that I had done otherwise.

Mr. BENNETT: And you will remember that I said I agreed with you.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think my right hon. friend said he agreed with me at that time. Then my right hon. friend mentioned the name of Mr. Stansbury, who at the present time happens to be president of the Liberal association in Kingston. In the first place he suggested that Mr. Stansbury was a director of the Frid Construction Company, which had the contract in connection with the restoration of Fort Henry. I immediately dealt with that question; I preferred to get accurate information before making any statement in connection with it. I secured the information, and later my right hon. friend made a retraction and admitted that his recollection was faulty when he said that Mr. Stansbury was a member of the Frid Construction Company.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. ROGERS: But it was the most ungracious retraction to which I have ever listened.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, because I know a great deal about Mr. Stansbury's dealings. That is the reason.

Mr. ROGERS: Very well, but what the right hon. gentleman then said was that there were several other construction companies; there was the Campbell Construction Company and the Frontenac Construction Company, his whole purpose being to leave the inference that Mr. Stansbury was connected with one of these other companies; and he was not.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not suggesting that he was.

Mr. ROGERS: To my knowledge Mr. Stansbury has had no connection whatever with any one of these contracting companies. To my knowledge he has not had any part in the awarding of any government contracts from which he has benefited in the slightest degree. But his predecessor—

Mr. BENNETT: We shall see about that. What about his garage? What was it built with? Where did the stone come from?

Mr. ROGERS: He has no garage, to my knowledge.

Mr. BENNETT: Near his house, on his lot?

Mr. ROGERS: As to that I do not know.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, find out.

Mr. ROGERS: Certainly my right hon. friend seems to have made a special purpose of conducting a minute investigation in the constituency of Kingston, if he is now coming down to the question of the garage in the yard of the president of the Liberal association of that constituency.

Mr. BENNETT: If he built it with public property, that is my duty.

An hon. MEMBER: Did he?

Mr. BENNETT: He certainly did.

Mr. ROGERS: Let my hon. friend make a charge and I will make an investigation. Probably my right hon. friend is no more correct in that information than he was in his earlier information. I am quite content to have the matter investigated at once; I want to make that perfectly clear.

Mr. BENNETT: What is more, there has been interference with the course of justice with respect to it.

Mr. ROGERS: With respect to those other appointments, casual vacancies which have occurred from time to time in the operation of the departments, it is a matter for this house to determine whether or not all these appointments should be brought within the Civil Service Act. If they are brought within that act, then certainly it becomes our duty to observe that act. But my right hon. friend may recall an order in council which gives the Prime Minister certain prerogatives having to do with the appointment of deputy ministers, senators and judges. My right hon. friend was also Secretary of State for External Affairs. He had it within his power to determine who should be appointed to high diplomatic posts. What is patronage? As I understand patronage—and I endeavour to deal with this thing in the open, not in the language of scribes and pharisees—patronage is giving preference to friends of the political administration in office. Will my right hon. friend describe it otherwise? And if that is so, is he prepared to rise in his place and say that with respect to these high appointments he did not exercise patronage in that sense of the word? My right hon. friend smiles. Why does he smile? Is it prerogative for the rich and patronage for the poor? Is that the explanation? Or, if that is not the explanation, what is it? The whole truth of the matter is—

Mr. BENNETT: That is good.

Mr. ROGERS:—that it is infinitely better that we should deal with this question frankly and openly. I told my right hon. friend when he first brought it up—and he will agree with me in this—that so far as these relief works are concerned, there is a clause providing against political discrimination, and I am for the observance of that. It is my duty and my inclination. So far as these other appointments are concerned, while they remain outside the civil service I have accepted the recommendations of my executive; and I doubt if there is another member of this house, whose party has been in power, including the right hon. the leader of the opposition, who has not done precisely the same thing. I think that should be understood distinctly while we are discussing this question.

Mr. BENNETT: I was careful enough when I first spoke of this matter to point out that I was not hypocrite enough to say that those who desire to deal with patronage in the ordinary sense had a right to do so. The minister has merely repeated what I said. I made that exception. I made it in his favour because I realized just what the situation was. But I might remind the minister that it is a little unfortunate that my own party friends have blamed me because they said I did not, when I had the right to exercise certain appointing powers, select sufficiently strong partisans.

Mr. STREIGHT: You did pretty well.

Mr. KINLEY: That is a common complaint.

Mr. BENNETT: That has been the complaint of my own friends.

Mr. McCANN: The common complaint. Your record will stand on that.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, indeed it will. I am happy to say it will. Men with fitness were appointed, and not men whose great claim was that they had political pull. I will say that right away. With respect to the appointment of judges may I say that I notice in England they have the habit of discussing in the public press the fitness of men for positions. One great appointment was discussed at great length, even in the columns of the Times itself. I am prepared to discuss every judicial appointment that was made during the time I held office.

Mr. ROGERS: If my right hon. friend will permit me; I am not suggesting his appointments were not good; I am suggesting his appointments were restricted to the supporters of a political party.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say that is not so with respect to judicial appointments, and complaints were made on that account by my own political friends.

With respect to senators, in the main it is assumed that they are supporters of the Conservative party. I am bound to say complaints were made in that regard also, and the minister perhaps knows the occasions on which complaints were made.

With respect to high diplomatic posts there remained in office at Paris and Tokyo two gentlemen both of whom had been violent opponents of the Conservative party. And if my hon. friend will remember what the Minister of Justice said last session, he will understand why that right hon. gentleman at least would have recalled one of those men, had he been similarly situated, and the gentleman had been his political opponent.

But what I complained about was the ordinary—I used the word "casual"—appointments. I was not concerned with those which are beyond the civil service commission.

Mr. ROGERS: If my right hon. friend would permit me on that—

Mr. BENNETT: Just read the exact words.

Mr. ROGERS: —he referred specifically to a return of certain appointments which were casual appointments outside the Civil Service Act. He took exception to the fact that recommendations with respect to those casual appointments had been made by A. E. Stansbury, whom he described as president of the Liberal association. And I say with respect to those appointments I would not deceive the house for a minute by saying that I had not received such recommendations and had not endorsed them.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not the minister who made the recommendation; but my point was that on the records of this house occur six or eight times, one after the other, the answer to the question, "On whose recommendation"? was "A. E. Stansbury."

Mr. ROGERS: I would remind my right hon. friend that the president of his association in Kingston did precisely the same thing. I do not know how long the practice has been established.

Mr. BENNETT: But he did not make a recommendation to the government. He made them through his member, it may well be; but the answers to the questions asked in this house as to the source of the recommendations were, not the Minister of Labour, or the hon. member for Kingston, but that the recommendations had come from A. E. Stansbury, who turned out to be president of the Liberal association.

Mr. ROGERS: Exactly.

Mr. BENNETT: The ministry should accept the responsibility, as I understand it always has, since the earliest days of this country. What I was referring to in that particular case was the fitness of one man who found employment, was appointed on October 1, and spent the nights of the third and fourth in gaol for impersonating an elector in the provincial elections. That is what I was talking about.

Mr. ROGERS: Of whom I had no knowledge whatever.

Mr. BENNETT: It was in the newspapers. The name of the appointee was there. The name of the recommender, Stansbury, was there. He was an impersonator, came in and impersonated another man at an election, and was taken and locked up. So far as the records show, he is still in the public service. I believe he is wearing the uniform of the country at the present time, if he has gone to the branch of the service to which he was destined. That, I say, is where a recommendation coming from an outside individual, and not a member of parliament or a minister, is wrong. I am quite content that casual appointments be made by a minister, and I have made it quite clear that I have no objections to that practice. I am content that recommendations be made by a member of parliament in regard to casual appointments not within the civil service. I am content with respect to matters other than relief work. But on relief work there is one consideration only, and that is, "Has a man a job?" If he has not a job, and there is work to be had, he should have it, regardless of what his affiliations may be, have been, or anything else. There is only the necessity for a job. That is what relief is for; it is not to apply to a preferred class.

It was rather unworthy of the minister to talk about prerogative and patronage, rich and poor, when men have gone so far that they do not know where they will get their next day's bread, and are unable to get a job because they are not members of a certain political party and cannot command the support and the recommendation of the president of an association.

Mr. ROGERS: That is not true; I will deal with it later.

Mr. BENNETT: What is not true?

Mr. ROGERS: Certainly it is not true to say, as my right hon. friend has implied, that one cannot obtain a job on the relief work done in that constituency except through being a Liberal.

Mr. BENNETT: Excepting he had the recommendation of the president of the Liberal association.

Mr. ROGERS: Or even that.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, then, I am going on; the minister has answered the question himself. He knows as well as I do that when he puts that provision in the contract it was the province which made the contract, not the dominion, and he had no control over it at all.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, there does not seem to be a quorum of members. The rule seems to be standing order No. 3, but section 48 of the British North America Act is the section that governs. That section reads:

> The presence of at least twenty members of the House of Commons shall be necessary to constitute a meeting of the house for the exercise of its powers; and for that purpose the Speaker shall be reckoned as a member.

Standing order No. 3 reads:

> Whenever Mr. Speaker adjourns the house for want of a quorum, the time of the adjournment, and the names of the members then present, shall be inserted in the journal.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Item No. 108 was under discussion. Now the objection will be in order.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, it is not a question of objection. Unless there are twenty members in the house, the house cannot transact business; if there are twenty, it can.

The CHAIRMAN: I will ask the assistant clerk to count the members.

And there being only sixteen members present, including the chairman, the chairman reported accordingly to the Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall ask the clerk to count the house.

Mr. NEILL: Would it not be possible to adjourn the house for half an hour?

Mr. SPEAKER: No.

Mr. BENNETT: That is one of the things you cannot do.

And there being only seventeen members present, including Mr. Speaker, the names were taken down and the house adjourned, without question put, at 8.10 p.m.

Friday, June 10, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

PETITION

Petition of A. A. McLeod and 8,219 others, praying that an embargo be placed upon the shipment of war materials to Japan.—Mr. MacNeil.

NARCOTIC DRUGS

APPROVAL OF CONVENTION FOR THE SUPPRESSION OF ILLICIT TRAFFIC IN DANGEROUS DRUGS, SIGNED AT GENEVA, JUNE 26, 1936

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

> That it is expedient that parliament do approve of the convention of 1936 for the suppression of the illicit traffic in dangerous drugs (Geneva, June 26, 1936), signed on behalf of Canada by the plenipotentiary named therein, and that this house do approve of the same.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as I mentioned yesterday, the subject-matter of t'e convention was considered by the house at the time the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) introduced his bill with respect to opium and narcotic drugs. That was in February of this year. The bill was to implement any obligation on the part of Canada which might be incurred under the terms of the convention. Its main purpose is to make more severe the penalties which have existed in the past with respect to illicit trafficking in opium and other drugs.

The convention was drawn up by the international conference for the suppression of the illicit traffic in dangerous drugs which met in Geneva under the auspices of the League of Nations. The objectives of the conference were, first, to secure international cooperation in stiffening penalties for breaches of legislation implementing the earlier opium conventions of 1912, 1925 and 1931, and, secondly, to strengthen police efforts to repress the illicit traffic in narcotic drugs.

The draft before the conference was the result of two years' preparatory work initiated by the opium advisory committee. A first draft had been submitted to all governments signatory to the opium conventions in 1934. Their observations and criticisms were taken into consideration in preparing a revised draft which was circulated in 1935. It was only after this thorough canvass of the competent national authorities had established the expediency of endeavouring to draw up an international convention that the decision to hold the special conference was taken.

The Canadian government was represented at this conference by Colonel C. H. L. Sharman, chief of the narcotics division, Department of Pensions and National Health, who is also the Canadian representative on the opium advisory committee and who had taken an active part in the preparatory discussions of the draft convention.

The convention requires ratification. It will enter into force ninety days after the secretary general of the league has received the ratifications or accessions of ten states.

It has been signed on behalf of thirty-two countries and ratification has been completed, up to date, by India, China and Belgium.

When parliament has approved the convention the governor in council will authorize ratification.

I do not know that I need say much more. If hon. members wish to know the main provisions of the convention I can give them by quoting one or two of its articles. The convention itself has been distributed among hon. members, and that may not, therefore, be necessary.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

PROVISION FOR ANNUITIES ON RETIREMENT AND REDUCTION OF SALARIES OF SUPERIOR COURT JUDGES RETAINING OFFICE AFTER AGE OF SEVENTY-FIVE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee of the whole at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Judges Act to provide certain annuities upon retirement, to judges of the Supreme Court of Canada, the Exchequer Court of Canada, and the superior courts, and for reduction in the salaries of superior court judges retaining office after reaching the age of seventy-five years.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BANK OF CANADA

ACQUISITION BY THE GOVERNMENT OF SHARES NOW IN HANDS OF THE PUBLIC

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Bank of Canada Act inter alia to provide for the redemption by the Bank of Canada of the 100,000 class "A" shares of the Bank of Canada of the par value of $50 each at the price of $59.20 per share and accrued dividends; to reduce the capital of the Bank of Canada from $10,100,000 to $5,000,000 divided into 100,000 shares of $50 each; and to authorize the Minister of Finance for the purposes of such redemption and reduction of capital to surrender to the Bank of Canada 102,000 class "B" shares of the Bank of Canada of the par value of $50 each, of which 2,000 shares shall be cancelled and 100,000 shares shall be exchanged for 100,000 new shares of $50 each to be issued by the Bank of Canada to the Minister of Finance and to pay to the Bank of Canada the additional amount necessary to pay the difference between the purchase price of the shares to be redeemed (excluding any amount paid by way of dividend) and their par value.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MOTION FOR COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): It will be observed that in to-day's orders of the day, under government orders, there does not appear the usual item, "House again in committee of supply." This is due to the circumstance that the committee of supply was compelled to rise yesterday for want of a quorum and consequently did not report progress nor ask leave to sit again. A motion must now be made for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply and I therefore beg to move, seconded by Mr. Dunning:

That this house do now resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

THE BUDGET

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO PRESENTATION ON THURSDAY NEXT, JUNE 16

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I should like to state to the house that I hope, all being well, to be able to bring down the budget next Thursday.

UNITED KINGDOM MUNITIONS

REPORTED PROGRAM FOR CANADIAN INDUSTRIES—QUESTION OF FOREIGN POLICY AND BRITISH COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): In this morning's Gazette I notice the report of an announcement that United Kingdom war orders to the amount of $200,000,000 are being given to various Canadian industries. The dispatch indicates that this will mean the necessity of Canada making more definite decisions with regard to foreign policy and our relationship to the British commonwealth. I should like to ask the Prime Minister: Are the arrangements with regard to these orders for munitions made direct with the industries? Are they made with the sanction of the Canadian government, and does the program commit Canada to any supplementary or complementary arrangements?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Possibly I had better allow the Minister of National Defence to answer the question. I am in a position to answer it but I should prefer to leave it to him.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): I have seen the article referred to by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and I wish to assure him at once that the Department of National Defence has played no part either directly or indirectly in these negotiations. With reference to any orders to be placed in Canada, we have no more information than is in possession of the hon. member who asked the question. I think that that is as definite as I can make the statement.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

PRIVILEGE—MR. GOLDING RECORDING OF NAMES ON ADJOURNMENT ON JUNE 9 FOR WANT OF QUORUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. GOLDING (Huron-Perth): On a question of privilege, I wish to draw the attention of the house to the votes and proceedings in which are listed the names of members who were present last evening just before the house adjourned. I wish to say that I was in my seat when the count was taken and on looking over the list I find that my name is not there recorded. I do not know what the system is of recording the names of those present on such an occasion, but I do think that this house ought to have some system under which an injustice cannot be done to an hon. member who is in his seat when the count is taken. I wish to call attention to this matter and have it corrected.

Mr. R. W. GLADSTONE (Wellington South): One of the most faithful in attendance in this house is the hon. member for Huron-Perth (Mr. Golding), and if it were necessary at all to vouch for the accuracy of his statement—

Some hon. MEMBERS: No!

Mr. GLADSTONE: —I can assure the house that I saw him in his place last evening.

GOVERNMENT HARBOURS AND PIERS

APPOINTMENT OF WHARFINGERS FOR WHARVES ADMINISTERED BY DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): May I ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) whether it is the intention of the government to appoint wharfingers for all the wharves throughout the dominion which are not directly under the control of the national harbours board. If so, to whom shall such applications be made?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The appointment of wharfingers is mandatory under the Government Harbours and Piers Act. It is quite separate from any legislation relating to harbour boards. The Government Harbours and Piers Act makes it mandatory for the Department of Transport to appoint wharfingers to all wharves placed under the department for administration and the department endeavours to carry out its obligations under the act in all parts of Canada.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): In view of the reply given by the Minister of Transport, and realizing the fact that many wharves are incapable of producing revenue from the actions of any wharfinger, is it the intention to bring in an amendment to the Government Harbours and Piers Act this session?

Mr. HOWE: A matter of government policy is not usually discussed, but I may say that this department has no further legislation for the present session of parliament.

NATURAL RESOURCES

CONFIRMATION OF CERTAIN AGREEMENTS BETWEEN DOMINION GOVERNMENT AND PROVINCES OF MANITOBA, SASKATCHEWAN AND ALBERTA—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 106, to amend the Manitoba Natural Resources Act, the Alberta Natural Resources Acts, and the Saskatchewan Natural Resources Acts.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): The amendments made in the Senate are really for the purpose of meeting what I conceive to be a valid objection as to the exercise of its powers by this parliament. Whether or not that is being done I am in doubt. The proposed amendments provide that this act shall be read and construed as one with the following acts: The Manitoba Natural Resources Act, the Alberta Natural Resources Acts, and the Saskatchewan Natural Resources Acts. The effect of that is to seek to remedy the difficulty to which attention was directed and treat the amendments now made as though it were part of the original agreement, so that they should be read together as one agreement. Whether or not that is achieved I have some doubt, but certainly it does give a semblance of authority to this parliament to deal with it by endeavouring to make it appear that the proposals now made were proposals that appeared in the original agreements. To that extent I am certain that it does greatly improve the situation; but I still have grave doubts as to whether it may not be considered an amendment of the constitution. That in itself requires the approval of the imperial parliament to give it validity, in view of the fact that we did specially reserve the water under the lands, and did not include it in the transfer of resources. But the amendment as proposed will at least have this effect: it will link the statute under consideration with the original agreement, making them read as one.

Motion agreed to.

HIGH COMMISSIONER'S ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO PROVISION FOR SALARY, ETC.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved the second reading of Bill No. 146, respecting the High Commissioner for Canada in the United Kingdom.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Appointment.

Mr. CAHAN: Has the government considered, as a matter of policy, the expediency of Canada appointing high commissioners to one or more of the autonomous dominions?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The government has been considering that matter. The committee I think may expect an appointment to be made before very long to at least one or two of the other dominions.

Mr. BENNETT: Would not legislation be required?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, I think it would.

Section agreed to.

Section 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Officers and clerks.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be observed that it was provided in the former act that the high commissioner shall:

(b) take the charge, supervision and control of the immigration offices and agencies in Great Britain, under the Minister of Immigration and Colonization.

That apparently is dropped.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is dropped for the reason that there is no longer a minister of immigration and colonization.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is merged in another department.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. Under the old act the high commissioner took his instructions from different ministers. Under the new section the governor in council determines the powers and duties to be carried out by the high commissioner, and it is proposed that he shall take his instructions from the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it would be adequately covered, except that it was specific in the one case. It will be recalled that there is a sort of immigration office attached to the high commissioner's office in London; they do deal with that matter under the Department of Immigration. The effect of the change will be to transfer it to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, subject however to the provisions of the order in council that will enable it to be dealt with by the high commissioner there. As it stands now there is no doubt that there is a branch of our immigration department in the building, and that the high commissioner exercises his powers by virtue of the old statute. It is true that the name "the Minister of Immigration and Colonization" has disappeared, but the duties are performed by the Minister of Mines and Resources. Under the new bill, he has to carry out the instructions of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and he also is to give effect to any orders in council which may be passed for the purpose of conferring upon him power and authority to do and perform duties which may be therein mentioned.

The only point I desire to make is that as it stands it will require, I conceive, an act on the part of the Minister, Secretary of State for External Affairs, or an order in council, to continue the position that obtains there at the present moment.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What the right hon. the leader of the opposition has in mind is covered I think by subsection (c). He has been referring more particularly to subsection (b). Subsection (c) reads as follows:

(c) subject to the provisions of the preceding paragraphs, supervise the official activities of the various agencies of the Canadian government in the United Kingdom.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is broad enough to cover all the others.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. The immigration office at the moment I understand is not in the high commissioner's office; it has been moved elsewhere. But under the order in council passed some time ago the supervision of the immigration office was placed under the high commissioner. The situation had therefore been covered in the past under the general order. The only change which in reality is being made is with regard to instructions of a specific kind making it clear that they will go to the High Commissioner through the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. BENNETT: The only reason I raised the question is that the general power was contained in a section of the old act in somewhat different language. It says that he may carry out such instructions as he receives from time to time respecting the commercial, financial and general interest of Canada in Great Britain and elsewhere. I raised the issue merely for the purpose of directing the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that that is omitted, deliberately I take it, to be covered by subsection (c) of section 3, and the instructions will come from the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

There are two words left out which I think the Prime Minister may regard as valuable, having regard to the appointment from time to time of the high commissioner to Geneva. Those words are "and elsewhere" at the end of the section, which enable us from time to time thus to deal with his position. The words "and elsewhere" are deleted. The minister may desire to send him to France or Switzerland, but if there is a limitation imposed on his authority "in the United Kingdom" I doubt whether the power is conferred upon the minister to give the general directions which might become necessary.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am inclined to think that the government would have power to direct any servant of the crown to go to any place to which it might be desirable to send him on public business. For example we have frequently sent the minister in France to Geneva. I do not think that as matters stand we would need to amend the section.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Officers and clerks.

Mr. CAHAN: Does this section mean that the officers and clerks in the office of the High Commissioner for Canada at London are to be appointed under the Civil Service Act?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They have not been appointed under the Civil Service Act in the past, except in a few cases. The minor positions have not been filled by the civil service commission, but some of the higher positions have. It has been found rather difficult, and I think my hon. friend will appreciate the reasons, to expect promotions from the junior positions in the high commissioner's office to the senior ones.

Mr. CAHAN: I was dealing with the exact words of section 4: "There may be appointed in the manner authorized by law." Is there any existing law other than the Civil Service Act under which appointments can hereafter be made? The law under which they have been made is the passing of an item year by year in the estimates.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is right.

Mr. CAHAN: Now, in order that you may have an appointee who will appear in the estimates, are those words sufficient?

Mr. DUNNING: The Civil Service Act has provision for exceptions, intended to cover cases of this kind.

Mr. CAHAN: I grant that there are exceptions, but I wonder whether they provide for exceptions which cover this case.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that section 4 of this act is exactly the same as section 5 of the old act which we are repealing. The old act contained the same words, except that we have added after the words "the high commissioner" the words "for Canada," as high commissioners may be sent to other countries later on. It was thought advisable to make clear that this section applied to the High Commissioner for Canada in London. The old act provided:

There may be appointed in the manner authorized by law such officers and clerks in the office of the high commissioner as may be necessary for the proper conduct of the business of the office.

Mr. BENNETT: That would be before the Civil Service Act was passed.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes, and the high commissioner's office has never been brought under the Civil Service Act, any more than have the legations in the different countries.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so. Then the appointments will be made by a special item in the estimates from year to year?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Is it considered unnecessary to make any reference to the remuneration of the high commissioner? That was done in the old act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hereafter the salary of the high commissioner will have to be voted in the estimate of the Department of External Affairs under the item which deals with representation abroad. Hereafter the amount will be set out in the estimates as given to parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the effect of section 4, passed subsequent to the enactment of the Civil Service Act, will be to bring the high commissioner's office under the Civil Service Act. Those are the appropriate words which are used in other statutes to accomplish that purpose. The broad general statement at the beginning of the Civil Service Act is that all appointments shall be made in the way indicated in the act. As long as the high commissioner's act was prior in point of time to the Civil Service Act, obviously it did not apply. Now we are repealing the old act and passing a new one, containing the language that is used in other statutes for the purpose of bringing all appointments under the Civil Service Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my right hon. friend that I would not take any exception whatever to the high commissioner's office being brought under the Civil Service Act; and, if that is the effect of it, all that will be necessary in respect to appointments that cannot be best made in that manner will be to indicate that they are made notwithstanding anything in the Civil Service Act.

Section agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Employment Offices Coordination Act, Administration, $63,925.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, in view of certain statements made yesterday by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) I am obliged to ask the committee to give attention for a few moments to a garage in the yard of Mr. Stansbury, president of the Liberal association of Kingston. Perhaps I can best illustrate the point by quoting from page 3702 of Hansard:

Mr. Rogers: To my knowledge Mr. Stansbury has had no connection whatever with any one of these contracting companies.

That was in regard to a previous reference by the leader of the opposition.

To my knowledge he has not had any part in the awarding of any government contracts from which he has benefited in the slightest degree. But his predecessor—

Mr. Bennett: We shall see about that. What about his garage? What was it built with? Where did the stone come from?

Mr. Rogers: He has no garage, to my knowledge.

I was speaking of a garage in the commercial sense.

Mr. Bennett: Near his house, on his lot?

Mr. Rogers: As to that I do not know.

Mr. Bennett: Well, find out.

Mr. Rogers: Certainly my right hon. friend seems to have made a special purpose of conducting a minute investigation in the constituency of Kingston, if he is now coming down to the question of the garage in the yard of the president of the Liberal association of that constituency.

Mr. Bennett: If he built it with public property, that is my duty.

Some hon. Members: Did he?

Mr. Bennett: He certainly did.

Mr. Rogers: Let my hon. friend make a charge, and I will make an investigation. Probably my right hon. friend is no more correct in that information than he was in his earlier information. I am quite content to have the matter investigated at once; I want to make that perfectly clear.

In conformity with that undertaking I immediately placed myself in touch with Mr. Stansbury in Kingston. My information is that the building used as a garage in the yard of Mr. Stansbury was possibly built before confederation, in the sense that it is an old stone building such as may be seen in many parts of the country.

Mr. BENNETT: Don't cheer yet; he knows perfectly well the building I referred to. Call it a garage, or any other name you like. You know the building I refer to.

Mr. ROGERS: I am making this speech.

Mr. BENNETT: I know.

Mr. ROGERS: The building itself was constructed many years ago.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. ROGERS: There was a renovation of that building within the last two or three years. No public property went into the renovation of that building. There was at the time a pile of loose crushed stone in a cutting near the site of camp 37. Mr. Stansbury, I am informed, with the permission of the officer in charge, and on the understanding that he would pay the cartage, received four cubic yards of waste crushed stone, which was not placed in the building of the garage but on the roadway leading to the garage. I am informed that the actual price of the stone if sold by a contractor would be somewhere between $2 and $3. And as I have said before, Mr. Stansbury asked for permission to use this stone and received it accordingly. There was no public property that entered into the building of this garage referred to by my right hon. friend.

This is the third time the leader of the opposition has made this statement about Mr. Stansbury, who is a member of the city council of Kingston, and a highly respected citizen. He is at the same time the president of the Kingston Liberal Association. The first statement made by my right hon. friend was that Mr. Stansbury was connected with a contracting firm while president of the Liberal association. He was not. But the former president of the Conservative association of Kingston did receive contracts from the then government, and on a very large scale. We shall hear more about that later.

I am perfectly aware of the tactics pursued by my right hon. friend. He has made these charges on at least four separate occasions.

Mr. BENNETT: And he will make them for the fifth time in a minute.

Mr. ROGERS: And he has had to retract them.

Mr. BENNETT: He has not retracted any of them, except the one with respect to Mr. Stansbury's contracting firm, and that was accidental, as is known.

Mr. ROGERS: Will he now retract them?

Mr. BENNETT: He certainly does not intend to; he is going to repeat them.

Mr. ROGERS: We know the tactics pursued by my right hon. friend. He makes these statements, knowing perfectly well that the correction seldom catches up with the charge. And he probably hopes and believes that there are some who will see the charge on each occasion, and will not see the correction, and would in due course receive the impression that the Minister of Labour from Kingston is a villain and a blackguard. If that is the kind of tactics pursued by my right hon. friend I would suggest that he should alter his ways, as quickly as possible.

He has pursued these tactics on more than one occasion during the present session of parliament. Now I have made my position clear with respect to these several matters which have been brought up. I have made it clear beyond doubt that if complaints exist with respect to governmental matters in the constituency of Kingston I shall be obliged to have those complaints brought to my attention, and if they are brought to my attention I will do my utmost to rectify them. Naturally I cannot keep under my eye at all times everything that goes on in the constituency of Kingston. My duties keep me here at Ottawa during the greater part of the time. But I suggest to my right hon. friend that he would probably add something to his own stature, and contribute something to the business of this country, if instead of making these charges, without himself undertaking to prove their truth or otherwise, he should bring them to the attention of those who are able to deal with them and who are in a position to rectify them if they are well founded.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I directed attention to the city of Kingston and the constituency of Kingston for a very special reason. The Prime Minister opened his electoral campaign in Kingston in 1935, and charged me with being a Hitler, a Mussolini and a Stalin, all combined.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Don't flatter yourself.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not in the least flattering myself. I am merely pointing out the language used by my right hon. friend the Prime Minister at Kingston. And he indicated further that the conduct of the administration of business in this country was such that it was highly essential that it should be changed. And at the same time the present Minister of Labour became the candidate in Kingston.

Kingston has been a stormy spot in the politics of this country ever since I can remember coming to this chamber, so far as patronage is concerned. I can recall in 1911 and 1912 the difficulties in connection with the penitentiary, and I recall too the charges made by the late member for Kingston, Doctor Ross, as to the lack of attention to patronage matters by the late administration.

Great hopes and expectations were raised when it became apparent that one who had the high qualifications of the present Minister of Labour was to stand as candidate in Kingston. He is an eminent scholar. He has had long experience at Ottawa in the capacity of private secretary, a position which enabled him to know something about the machinery of government. And no one for a moment suggests that he has had other than the strongest desire to improve conditions, so far as the administration was concerned. I therefore made myself the promise that I would watch and see whether or not these high hopes and expectations would be realized or whether what is known as the machine would crush the minister, and he would be overborne by it, rather than overbear it; whether or not the political patronage committee in Kingston would be able to compel the minister to conform to their mind, or whether he would be able to give effect to those high principles, those noble sentiments he expressed so frequently during the campaign.

And I did watch, with great care. I have made many inquiries. Many questions have appeared on the order paper in the house, both last session and the present one, with respect to the administration of matters in Kingston. There were two camps in and around Kingston. Camp 42 was one and camp 37 was the other. Both camps were closed by the government. There was much clothing and supplies in one of those camps. They were placed in a storehouse. They were sold. In a public meeting one of the electors of Kingston, at Sydenham, gave illustrations as to the prices received for them and the method of their disposition—horses, wagons and costly equipment. Who got it, and at what price? It is a singular coincidence that within four hours after the conclusion of that speech at Sydenham the storehouse was on fire.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman, I might as well deal with that now.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no; excuse me—to use the language of the minister, I am making this speech.

Mr. ROGERS: Then I will have ample opportunity later.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, quite.

Mr. ROGERS: There isn't always that opportunity, though.

Mr. BENNETT: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon?

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend sometimes makes these charges about half past ten or a quarter to eleven.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, that shows after all that the high expectations with respect to the minister were indeed not realized. That shows the calibre and the type. This is a five-cent attitude of mind; that is what it is.

Mr. ROGERS: I will deal with that later.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a five-cent attitude of mind. I now go a step farther.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Always speak a little louder, if you desire to be heard. If not, don't mutter to yourself so as to interfere.

An hon. MEMBER: Penny ante.

Mr. BENNETT: The penny ante does not come with very great force from the hon. member. Now, to proceed a step farther: The storehouse was burned down. It was destroyed, and the report was made with respect to the fire. The minister has it in his possession.

Mr. ROGERS: Which minister?

Mr. BENNETT: The minister of defence. The relations are so close it does not make much difference.

Mr. ROGERS: I have not seen it.

Mr. BENNETT: I am going to point out that with respect to matters that arose out of that very case we find that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) has placed a considered answer on Hansard and has indicated that he has accepted the recommendation not of the member for Kingston (Mr. Rogers), not of a member of this house, but he has made appointments to the signal corps on the recommendation of Mr. Stansbury.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To the signal corps?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, Bernard Curran. That is what was said, rightly or wrongly, and the answer appears on the records of this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will my hon. friend quote it?

Mr. BENNETT: It was on March 28. If my colleague will turn up Hansard of March 28, I shall read it. That is what happened in connection with the storehouse. A quarry was being operated by the government not far from camp No. 37, and it is a fact that stone was taken to Stansbury's property for the purpose of making improvements thereon. The word "garage" is offensive to the hon. gentleman, so let us drop it.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend said a garage was built with public property.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say it was built entirely with public property. I heard what he read the other day and I know what he said.

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend said:

If he built it with public property, that is my duty.

Mr. BENNETT: I said "if."

Mr. ROGERS: And then my right hon. friend said:

He certainly did.

Mr. BENNETT: And what is more, I stated that the stone did not come from the spot the hon. gentleman said it came from, part of No. 2 highway. I want to make it perfectly clear that Mr. Stansbury has been very active in connection with all these matters and that stone was taken to his property by a man named Drinka. It is said, not by himself, but in a statement that the minister makes in this house for him, that he had permission. The man who had charge of that particular work is no longer there. His name is Bissonette. If the minister will take the trouble to make the necessary inquiries he will find what quantity of stone went there. He will find he took it there. He will look in vain for any consent in writing, at any rate up to this date, for that purpose.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. ROGERS: What difference does it make whether it is in writing or not?

Mr. BENNETT: It makes quite a considerable difference when you are dealing with public property, as I shall presently point out. It should make a great difference to the minister if he is the custodian of public property, as I suggest he should be. I think this was March 28.

Mr. GRAY: An employee of the signal corps.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My right hon. friend said before that the recommendation was for appointment to the signal corps. There is a vast difference which my right hon. friend must definitely appreciate.

Mr. BENNETT: He is an employee of the signal corps.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He is an employee at the camp which is the headquarters of the signal corps.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a question asked by Mr. Ross (St. Paul's):

Are W. Anderson, T. J. Lennon, B. Curran, W. J. Trenhaile, employees at the signal corps, Barriefield, under the Department of National Defence?

Here is the answer by the Minister of National Defence:

3. All recommended by district officer commanding, military district No. 3, Kingston, Ontario.

That is not the one that comes within the class I mentioned yesterday.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, a few minutes ago my right hon. friend said that the Minister of National Defence has made an appointment to the Royal Canadian Signal Corps on the recommendation of Mr. Stansbury. I wish him to withdraw that remark, because it is absolutely and definitely inaccurate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: Excellent. I told the hon. gentleman that I did not have the book beside me, but I would look it up. I have now read the question and answer from page 1740. Reference was made the other day to the various appointments that were made on the recommendation of Mr. Stansbury, and the minister surely remembers the answer he gave in the house with respect to this. If he wishes, I shall take the time to turn them up.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise to another point of order. If the right hon. gentleman will consult the records of Hansard he will find that he made a statement this afternoon that the Minister of National Defence had made appointments to the Royal Canadian Signal Corps on the recommendation of Mr. Stansbury. That was an absolutely untrue statement of fact and I desire that it be withdrawn.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. BENNETT: Do not get excited. I said to the hon. gentleman that I would look at the record.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Just wait a minute until I finish. When he asked me for the authority I found that Mr. Bernard Curran was not one of those who was appointed on the recommendation of Mr. Stansbury, that his appointment was made on the recommendation of the district officer commanding.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise again to a point of order.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not finished.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise to a point of order. My right hon. friend knows the rules of the house and he should sit down when I rise to a point of order.

Mr. CAHAN: There is no point of order at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am as competent to judge what is a point of order as the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan). The point of order is this: A statement has been made this afternoon by the right hon. leader of the opposition which I say is definitely untrue and should be withdrawn.

Mr. SPENCE: You have said it three or four times.

Mr. BENNETT: "Untrue" is an improper word to use in this house and it should be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order raised by the Minister of National Defence, my opinion is that it is well taken and I ask the right hon. gentleman to withdraw the remark to which the minister takes exception.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I object to the language used by the minister in making his point of order. There can be no point of order if the language used is unparliamentary. That is number one. When the point of order is made in parliamentary language I shall make my reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The right hon. gentleman is correct. Instead of using the word "untrue" I should have said that it was unparliamentary and not in accordance with the facts.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw.

Mr. BENNETT: There will be no difficulty about withdrawing. I have the record. It is that the appointment of Mr. B. Curran as an employee of the signal corps was not made on the recommendation of Mr. Stansbury; it was made on the recommendation of the district officer commanding.

I turn now to page 1846 of Hansard and I find a series of questions put to the minister by the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Clarke). The hon. member asked questions in connection with a Mr. Robinson, a Mr. Graham, both of whom were employed as carpenters at the signal corps, Barriefield. Then another question was asked in connection with John Doyle, an employee at the signal corps, and one in connection with Harold Johnston, also an employee at the signal corps. In each case this question was asked:

On whose recommendation was he employed?

And in each case the answer was, "Mr. A. E. Stansbury." That is the position. The only difference is that Mr. Curran's appointment was recommended by the district officer commanding, whereas the others were recommended, without giving them one after another, by Mr. Stansbury.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise again to a point of order. The right hon. gentleman is leaving the definite implication that the gentlemen mentioned by him were members of the Royal Canadian Signal Corps.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a bit of it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I want definitely to correct that impression and say that no recommendations to the Royal Canadian Signal Corps under the Department of National Defence have been made at any time by Mr. Stansbury. Let that be very definite.

Mr. BENNETT: I read from the record.

Mr. DUNNING: You did not.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): He did.

Mr. DUNNING: He read part of the record, not all of it.

Mr. BENNETT: I read from the record as to the class of employment of Mr. Robinson and Mr. Graham, both employed as carpenters at the Royal Canadian Signal Corps under the Department of National Defence.

Mr. DUNNING: Why not read it all?

Mr. BENNETT: Those are the words I used. Are they right or wrong?

Mr. DUNNING: They are not complete.

Mr. BENNETT: But they are part of the question.

Mr. DUNNING: They do not convey the facts at all.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Who is reading them?

Mr. BENNETT: I admit that the minister of defence is a past master on that side of it. Now let us read the whole question.

Mr. DUNNING: That is better.

Mr. BENNETT:

1. Is there a Mr. Robinson employed as a carpenter at the signal corps, Barriefield, under the Department of National Defence?
2. If so, what days and hours has he worked?
3. What total remuneration has he drawn?
4. On whose recommendation was he employed?

Answers:

2. During the year 1935—67 days.
   During the year 1936—36 days.
   During the year 1937—11 days.
   During the year 1938—7 days (as at March 25).
3. $718.55.
4. Mr. A. E. Stansbury.

In reply to the next question, it appeared that Roy Graham is an employee of the signal corps, Barriefield. Question 4:

On whose recommendation was he employed?

Answer:

Mr. A. E. Stansbury.

The next question refers to an appointment recommended by the Ontario employment agency, and is with respect to William Fowler. The first question is:

Is William Fowler an employee of the signal corps, Barriefield, and if so, when was he appointed and on whose recommendation?

Answer: "Yes; appointed October—"

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, my right hon. friend, probably unintentionally, misread the question.

Mr. BENNETT: In what respect?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He is "an employee at"; the right hon. gentleman said "of".

Mr. BENNETT:

Is William Fowler an employee at the signal corps, Barriefield, and, if so, when was he appointed and on whose recommendation?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is correct now.

Mr. DUNNING: A difference of one word makes a lot of difference.

Mr. BENNETT: Answer:

Yes; appointed October 1, 1937; recommended by Mr. A. E. Stansbury.

2. If the present apopintment was by the civil service commission, was he previously appointed by the department, and on whose recommendation?

Answer:

Yes; recommended by Ontario Employment Agency, 409 Bagot street, Kingston, Ont.

The next question has to do with the location of the electoral district in which the signal corps is located. When you turn the page you will find a similar question with respect of John Doyle, an employee of the signal corps, Barriefield.

4. On whose recommendation was he employed?

Answer:

Mr. A. E. Stansbury.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Once again my right hon. friend used the word "of." It should be "at."

Mr. BENNETT: Where?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Before "signal corps."

Mr. DUNNING: He said "of the signal corps" again. He is not an employee of the signal corps. He is employed at the signal corps.

An hon. MEMBER: The right hon. gentleman is an expert at that.

An hon. MEMBER: Withdraw.

Mr. BENNETT: "Is John Doyle an employee of the signal corps, Barriefield, under the Department of National Defence, or has he been an employee?"

Mr. DUNNING: "At" the signal corps.

Mr. BENNETT: The answer is:

During the year 1935—76 days.
During the year 1936—44 days.
During the year 1937—nil.
During the year 1938—10 days (as at 25th March).

And then the fourth question is:

On whose recommendation was he employed?

And the answer is "Mr. A. E. Stansbury."

Harold Johnston is the next employee referred to, and the answer to question No. 6, on whose recommendation he was appointed, is "Mr. A. E. Stansbury." The question was with respect to Harold Johnston, "an employee at the signal corps, Barriefield, under the Department of National Defence." That merely indicates one thing, that Mr. A. E. Stansbury, whoever he may be, is responsible for the appointments being made at this signal corps. One of the men is a carpenter, another is something else, a third is something else.

Now I took the case of B. Curran, and I pointed out that the answer there was that the recommendation was by the district officer commanding. There was a further question as to how long he had been there, and the answer was that he had been appointed on the first day of October. I pointed out that on the fourth he had been arrested for impersonation at the provincial election and taken to the police court, and that he was released. I put the facts as they are on the record as to why he was released. I believe that those who have anything to do with and any regard for the administration of law and order will be amazed when they see the ground on which the charge was dismissed. It was on the ground that the magistrate, Mr. Shea—and I believe the minister will acknowledge that Mr. Shea is very actively connected with the Frontenac Construction Company, which came into being since this government assumed office—

Mr. ROGERS: What connection has that with this?

Mr. BENNETT: I say that he sat as a magistrate in this case.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, what connection has it with this?

Mr. BENNETT: It had a great deal to do with this case. When he sees the grounds on which, in the magistrate's police court in the city of Kingston, this man was dismissed, and when he hears the evidence, I believe the minister will say that it is time something was done. Here are Mr. Shea's words of wisdom.

Mr. GRAY: Surely that is a matter for the crown attorney.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the crown attorney was there, but apparently, as it was a matter affecting the provincial election, his activities were not very great.

An hon. MEMBER: That is not fair.

Mr. BENNETT: Here is what Mr. Rigney says, at page 9 of the record:

There is no jurisdiction for you here, that's my submission, in reference to which I have already drawn your attention.

His Worship: Cases of this kind are ordinarily triable by an election court. I agree that this case does not come under the Controverted Elections Act and I have no jurisdiction to try it.

The charge was dismissed on the—

Mr. SLAGHT: Does the right hon. gentleman charge Mr. Rigney with breach of duty?

Mr. BENNETT: I only say Mr. Rigney appeared there and participated in that case.

Mr. SLAGHT: In accordance with his duty, surely?

Mr. BENNETT: That may be his duty, but why was it not his duty to proceed under the criminal code, as the charge was laid? That is what a crown attorney in my country would do, or in any other country I know anything about. When you have an offender before the court and the magistrate says it does not come under the elections act, Mr. Rigney—

Mr. SLAGHT: The right hon. gentleman may remember that Mr. Rigney, who is also a friend of mine, was the appointee of the Conservative party during his own regime, though not while he was prime minister.

Mr. BENNETT: He was not appointed by the federal government at all, therefore the last observation has no relevancy. May I draw attention to the second point? Mr. Rigney says:

I think it is necessary for the record to have evidence but it is apparent that the information purports to have been signed by Doctor Sands, but I don't know who the returning officer was.

His Worship: What evidence have we got about the information and also about the swearing?

Mr. T. J. Rigney, K.C. represented the crown; Mr. W. H. Herrington, K.C., the accused; Magistrate J. Ambrose Shea, presiding. I point out that, as a result, this man was not in any sense punished for impersonation on that day.

The declaration made by Robert McKee, of the city of Kingston, contractor, was as follows:

On Monday, October 4, I was present as outside agent for Thomas Ashmore Kidd, a candidate for election to the legislative assembly of the province of Ontario for the riding of Kingston, at the advance poll for the city of Kingston situate in the city council chambers in the said city.

In the afternoon about 3 o'clock I saw a man approaching the said advance poll from the northerly side of Brook street whose coat collar was turned up and who was wearing sun glasses.

I thought this man looked like one Bernard Curran who was known to me but did not question him.

After this man had entered the poll I opened the door and asked Stewart Jenkins, inside agent for the said Thomas Ashmore Kidd, what name this man had given and was advised that he had given the name of Gerald Morrison of 172 Wellington street, Kingston, Ontario, and after signing the usual declaration, handed to advance voters, to that effect, had received a ballot from the returning officer, one Bert Derry. I then entered the poll and after being sure of the identity of the said Bernard Curran I told the said returning officer not to deposit the ballot of this man and asked him to make out a warrant for his arrest as an impersonator, but the said returning officer refused to make out the warrant and said if I wanted him arrested to do it myself.

I sent for a city constable and Sgt. Leslie Clark of the police force of the city of Kingston came to the poll and arrested the aforesaid man at my request and on my advice that he was Bernard Curran and not Gerald Morrison and put him in the police cell. I later signed a sworn information accusing this man of impersonation, and this man after some delay was arraigned before the magistrate for the city of Kingston and my testimony was taken by the court.

That is Robert McKee's statement, solemnly declared on the 23rd March, 1938, before the commissioner.

I merely mention that as an indication of the fact that Mr. Curran is the same man who, on the recommendation of Mr. Stansbury, is employed with the signal corps.

Mr. ROGERS: Not on the recommendation of Mr. Stansbury.

Mr. BENNETT: Of the district officer commanding, in this particular case. I pointed out that there is a large store here, and there are large quantities of supplies. I have taken the trouble to investigate what has happened to the supplies. Nearby there was work being carried on for the reconstruction of the old Fort Henry—or is it Fort William?

Mr. ROGERS: Fort Henry.

Mr. BENNETT: A question was asked in this house as to whether the work was done by contract or otherwise, and the answer was given, partly by contract and partly by day's work. What are the facts? The facts are that the specifications call for a piece of work which was shown on a plan so as to indicate what was included in the proposed work, and that several people tendered, and the contract was let for $70,000 or thereabouts. The expenditure at Fort Henry has more nearly approximated $1,000,000 than $70,000. The Frid Construction Company had a contract for the $70,000 job. Who has done the rest of the work and on what terms? Was it cost plus or not? The statement in Hansard in answer to the question is "day's work." The contractors apparently assume that they are doing the work on a cost plus basis, and this government is contributing one-half of that cost. And more, the Frid Construction Company had a contract at that very time for the construction of work on the campus of Queen's university, the Crain building, I believe it is called.

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the name of the building. The government of Ontario supplied the cement for the Fort Henry work; the specifications said that they would supply it. I find that this is what happened with respect to part of that cement—and I am going to give the hon. gentleman the number of the car so that he can have no misunderstanding in making inquiries, and as to where the car stood, who took the cement away, and where it was taken. Canadian National car No. 421639 was laid on the siding in Kingston, and on the eighth day of June, 1937, Louis Drinka, who was doing the trucking for the Frid Construction Company, residing at 298 Montreal Street, unloaded part of the cement from that car on to his truck, a motor truck, alleged to be a two-ton motor truck, and he took that cement to Queen's university and there unloaded it in storage bins which were connected with the Crain building. He did that with more than one load—how many loads I do not know—and then from the same car cement was actually taken to the Fort Henry work.

Mr. DUNNING: What are you reading from?

Mr. BENNETT: From my own notes. I am reading from my own handwriting of my notes taken from information I have, and if the hon. gentleman would like to see it I will gladly show it to him. There it is.

Mr. DUNNING: But the other sheet, which you put down.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a typewritten note under my dictation.

Mr. BRADETTE: Who gave you that information?

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman knew that, he would probably know more than he should know, but he would not know quite as much as he thinks he does.

Mr. BRADETTE: I would like to know who gave that information from which the leader of the opposition read just a moment ago.

Mr. BENNETT: I am making that statement—

Mr. BRADETTE: Is he trying to be a detective lately?

Mr. BENNETT: There is one member of this house who is always interrupting, and usually his observations indicate his profound ignorance. Sometimes they are impertinent; on this occasion they happen to be the latter. He boasted the other day that he never made personal observations, but now he asks if I have turned detective, and he thinks that is clever.

Mr. BRADETTE: I think I am in order. I asked who gave the information for the statement he read a moment ago. Surely I am in order. That is not showing ignorance.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On a point of order, on page 98 of Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms the word "impertinent" is listed among unparliamentary terms. I would ask the right hon. gentleman to withdraw the expression.

Mr. BENNETT: It depends upon how the word is used. It has been held to be unparliamentary, but if it is used to express the exact meaning it is not unparliamentary. It depends on whether it is used in that sense or not.

Mr. BRADETTE: On a point of order, I have never yet been called ignorant and I ask that the word be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. On the point of order raised by the Minister of National Defence—if the right hon. gentleman will sit down for a moment—

Mr. BENNETT: I had not noticed that the chairman was standing.

The CHAIRMAN: The word "impertinent" is unparliamentary and is listed on page 98—

Mr. BENNETT: I am familiar with it.

The CHAIRMAN: —and I would ask the right hon. leader of the opposition to withdraw it.

Mr. BENNETT: I will say "not pertinent" and withdraw "impertinent."

Mr. BRADETTE: Following your ruling, Mr. Chairman, I would like the word "ignorant" to be withdrawn also. I do not think it behooves the leader of the opposition to make such a statement against members of this house, unless he is included in it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a nice way in which to raise a point of order. To continue—

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Cochrane; the word "ignorant" is unparliamentary. It is listed on page 97.

Mr. BENNETT: "The hon. member is lacking in learning;" the word "ignorant" is withdrawn. I am thoroughly familiar with the fact that the words "impertinent" and "ignorant" have been held to be in other parliaments unparliamentary, but I am well aware of the fact that they have been used in this parliament frequently and I would like to think that Your Honour has at last concluded that the rules of order shall be enforced.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. DUNNING: That is a reflection on the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a reflection on the chair. I desire to compliment the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would point out to the right hon. leader of the opposition that the first point of ruling I had to make in this chamber in 1936 was to ask the leader of the opposition to withdraw the word "impertinent" which he had applied to the hon. member for Moose Jaw.

Mr. BENNETT: I quite recall the circumstances. But it is an amazing thing how frequently it has been used since. That is all I have to say.

An hon. MEMBER: By whom?

Mr. BENNETT: Now I propose to proceed. We have cement provided by the taxpayers of the country for use on the Fort Henry job, and we have the Frid Construction Company with a contract under specifications for $70,000 only. We have many hundreds of thousands of dollars—we shall know exactly before we conclude this discussion how much money has been expended by the Frid Construction Company, and we shall expect to see a list of those employed and the salaries paid to them during the progress of the work. We have the cement being taken from the car, and I have given the car number; other information can be supplied, but that will do for the purpose. It is taken to the Crain building, put there, and the empty bags, in order that the count may be complete, were taken to Fort Henry. Keep that in mind. That is the sort of work that is going on there.

Mr. ROGERS: Does my right hon. friend vouch for the accuracy of that?

Mr. BENNETT: I can vouch for the accuracy of part of it, the observations I make—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Which part?

Mr. BENNETT: The statement I gave with respect to the cars, with respect to the movement of the cement, the movement of the empty bags, are facts beyond peradventure. The comments I make and the inferences I draw may not be those which others would draw.

Now to show just what has been going on there, it will be recalled that I pointed out that cement went to the Crain work and cement went to Fort Henry, for which it was destined, from the government of Ontario, and that Mr. Drinka hauled it to the work on the Crain building, also being done by the Frid company. In the fall of last year one car of cement at least was purchased and taken to Fort Henry. As to why that should be done I am not at the moment making any observation, but that car was purchased by the Frid Construction Company from the Drury Supply Company—I do not know the exact name—and it went to Fort Henry. Just realize what that means. We have here what the ministers in their answer the other day said was a contract for Fort Henry, and part was done by day work. As a matter of fact these men were working on a cost plus basis, the worst plan in the world for graft at any rate.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. BENNETT: I am going to deal with this.

Mr. ROGERS: The worst of it is the statement is incorrect.

Mr. BENNETT: I say the statement is correct.

Mr. ROGERS: Very well, I will let my statement wait and establish it later.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the minister's privilege. Now let me summarize this.

Was the car of cement to which I have referred directed by the government of Ontario for use at Fort Henry?

Was it placed on a siding at Kingston?

Was a portion of it taken to the Crain building, also being constructed by the Frid Construction Company?

Was a portion of it then taken to Fort Henry?

Were the bags, after being emptied of cement at the Crain building, taken to Fort Henry?

Did the Frid Construction Company last fall, after discussions were becoming prevalent, purchase a carload of cement and take it to Fort Henry?

[Mr. I. Mackenzie.]

I have no knowledge as to whether this was in replacement of what had been taken, but Mr. Drinka was the man who hauled both. I have given his address; he is the man who has been doing all this trucking. I want to know where the money of the taxpayers of this country went with respect to that work at Fort Henry, and I want to know whether it is true that this was a cost plus job and not a day work job as was stated in answer to a question asked in this house. Everyone knows that when you spend a sum like $100,000 or $200,000 on work of that kind on a cost plus basis it is but an invitation to extravagance. To that I am now directing the minister's attention, because this has to do with something else.

Rubble stone was hauled during the evening by the Frid company's rig to the Crain building, and also by Mr. Drinka's rigs. Then there is another thing; the question of the scaffolding used on the two works. It seems to be abundantly clear that what happened was that certain timber, bolted together and painted blue was transported to the Crain building by Drinka in a Frid Construction Company truck, and on completion of the building on the campus was taken to Fort Henry. That I think can be established. That is a case in which the government of Canada is paying for work being done at some other place.

Mr. DUNNING: Is it?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. HOWE: How does my right hon. friend know that? It is a very common practice in cost plus work.

Mr. BENNETT: It went back to Fort Henry. The work at Queen's was not cost plus work.

Mr. HOWE: It is a very common thing for a contractor to move scaffolding from one job to another. He makes allowance for doing so on every cost plus job.

Mr. BENNETT: But the scaffolding was going to a private job.

Mr. HOWE: What difference does that make, as long as the bookkeeper keeps track of it?

Mr. BENNETT: A contractor has a job of public work on a cost plus basis, and he has a private job, and he uses the public work scaffolding for the private work.

Mr. DUNNING: The mere moving of the scaffolding does not prove anything wrong.

Mr. HOWE: It is done every day.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, if that is the basis upon which the business of Canada is being conducted—!

Mr. HOWE: It is a matter of bookkeeping, whether the scaffolding was charged properly to the second job, as my right hon. friend knows as well as I do.

Mr. ROGERS: Why did not my right hon. friend write me a letter about this? I would have looked into it.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, this I think is in order, having regard to the mutterings of one of the hon. members of this committee in the distance. Since man first emerged from the condition described by Darwin, mutterings are supposed to have disappeared and speech has taken their place.

Mr. BRADETTE: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, I am not muttering. I said the right hon. gentleman is quite a spectacle, and if people could see him now they would judge him.

Mr. BENNETT: We now come to a question that was touched yesterday, some facts I wish to get from the minister. He said: Write me a letter and I will give an answer. What I want from him is a public statement; for it is a matter affecting the public and not the individual. The question is whether or not this work at Fort Henry was done on a cost plus basis; also whether or not the contract was extended. There is nothing on the record to show, because it was done by day work. Now what day work was it, cost plus or by contract?

Mr. ROGERS: I will get the information, gladly.

Mr. BENNETT: If it was done by contract, why were tenders not asked for, in accordance with what was said the other day? In the case of the work done under the Department of Highways, with respect to the first contract tenders were called for, and many people tendered, but that was a little $70,000 job; we have now spent nearly a million dollars, and no opportunity, public at any rate, has been given to anyone to tender. I should like to know the reason for that. I pointed out the other day what was the situation. This I think the minister must have seen; he says part of it he has not seen, but part at least he must have seen. I wonder if he realizes that a citizen of Kingston was charged with the non-support of his wife—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: He was charged with non-support—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. DUNNING: It certainly was not my right hon. friend or the Minister of Labour.

Mr. BENNETT: And the answer he gave as his defence, according to the press—and I have verified it as well—was this: He said that if he could secure a job he would take care of his family, but he did not have sufficient funds to provide Mooers—who was at one time the president of the Liberal association in Kingston, and who is superintendent of the employment agency, the man we were speaking of yesterday—with a beer account at the Prince George hotel. He said if he could get sufficient funds to provide Mooers with a beer account he would be all right, but as he could not do so he could not get work. That is a matter of public record; and what is more—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, it was in the newspaper; he appeared before the police magistrate, who adjourned the case advising the man that he would investigate the matter and bring him up again after he had done so. The case still stands adjourned.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

An hon. MEMBER: Free beer.

Mr. BENNETT: You see, Mr. Chairman; this indicates how little people do care. One of the ministers of the crown says, "Free beer."

Mr. DUNNING: Which one? Who said that?

Mr. BENNETT: I heard it just now; one of the four ministers there.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not hear it, and the ministers sit closer to me than to my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: I heard the words "free beer."

Mr. DUNNING: No minister said any such thing.

Mr. BENNETT: I say they did; that is the difference.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend must retract that.

Mr. BENNETT: No. I say they did and the minister says they did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I did not say it.

Mr. DUNNING: I did not say it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I did not say it.

Mr. ROGERS: I did not say it.

Mr. DUNNING: Be a man; retract it.

Mr. KINLEY: When a member asked me what the beer account meant, I said "free beer." I suppose that is what the right hon. gentleman heard.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman accepts the position of a vicarious sacrifice for others.

Mr. KINLEY: I said it.

Mr. FRASER: If you had used the phrase "Barnum was right"—

Mr. BENNETT: Now, Mr. Chairman, perhaps you would exercise your powers and direct attention to the fact that the observation just made by the hon. member for Northumberland is unparliamentary.

Mr. DUNNING: What is unparliamentary about it?

Mr. BENNETT: I just raise the question and leave it to the chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: The word "Barnum" is not on the list—

Mr. DUNNING: He was a great man.

The CHAIRMAN: —of unparliamentary words, and in my judgment I cannot rule it as such.

Mr. BENNETT: Very good, Mr. Chairman. I am glad you have so ruled, because it gives me a chance to say what I wanted to say but did not for fear of being called to order. I desire to say that Barnum did say, "You can fool some of the people all of the time and all of the people some of the time—"

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: At least that is attributed to him, but it may be that the Minister of Finance has a closer association with Barnum than I.

Mr. DUNNING: But I can read; that was Lincoln.

Mr. BENNETT: It must be a matter of profound satisfaction, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. DUNNING: Mixing Barnum with Lincoln is terrible.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact Lincoln did not say it; it was Barnum.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the leader of the opposition know that of his own knowledge?

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. BENNETT: It might be regarded as a very great offence even to refer to one as Hitler, in some sections of the country; but he occupies such a warm place in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite that I assume I may accept that as a compliment.

Now, Mr. Chairman, may we deal again with Mr. Stansbury for a moment. I said there were quantities of supplies in this storehouse. I said they had been sacrificed; horses, Bain wagons, tarpaulins—one of which was found and the offender sent to penitentiary—and concrete. And there were twenty-five cartons of white lead that went from Fort Henry after midnight, with the knowledge and assistance of the storekeeper. Do we know anything about that?

Mr. ROGERS: Do I? Certainly not.

Mr. BENNETT: I see.

Mr. DUNNING: Does my right hon. friend know anything about it?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, he does.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend is making a charge against a civil servant on his own responsibility.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, he was dismissed for it.

Mr. DUNNING: Well, that answers it; he was found out and dismissed. Why not say so?

Mr. BENNETT: But he was given a new position at the Rockwood hospital, on the recommendation of Mr. Stansbury.

Mr. DUNNING: What hospital?

Mr. BENNETT: Rockwood; that is an Ontario hospital.

Mr. GRAY: Is that a federal institution?

Mr. BENNETT: Not as far as I know.

Mr. DUNNING: How does that reflect on the Minister of Labour?

Mr. BENNETT: It indicates the type of recommendations that have been made by one who has been making them to the minister, who has acted upon them. That is what I am putting to the committee. I want to indicate to this committee, sir, that this whole business in Kingston is as bad as it is possible for anything to be, and reeks to high heaven. That is what I want to make clear. What is more, I want to say this, and I said it the other day: I do not believe the Minister of Labour would do it. I made that clear to him. It is no good for him to say that I am endeavouring to make charges against him with respect to these matters, for I do not believe he knew these things. But I say it is his duty to know something of them.

Mr. ROGERS: In several of these cases why did not my hon. friend bring them to my attention at once by letter, and have them corrected?

Mr. BENNETT: I will tell you why.

Mr. DUNNING: Because he wanted to make political capital out of it.

Mr. BENNETT: I will tell you why, and I will start with what I said at the very beginning. I was very, very much interested in Kingston in view of the Prime Minister's opening speech and the speeches made by the Minister of Labour when he was a candidate; I was anxious, as I am now, to see whether or not this political combination could destroy him and the principles that he asserted on the platform, his high principles, or whether he was going to be strong enough to control and stop them. That is the reason. I want to put it up to the minister as publicly as he put it up to the people of this country how he would conduct the public business if he got a chance; that was what he said when he was a candidate in Kingston. I say more, I say to the hon. gentleman and to all hon. members of this house that it is not good enough to say what your predecessors did. That does not constitute a defence. Why, Mr. Chairman? Because hon. gentlemen opposite asked for support, and got it, on the ground that they were going to do better than their predecessors; on the ground that they were going to improve on what had been done previously. And there never has been a worse condition prevailing than that in and around Kingston during the last eighteen months.

That is the position, and what has been done about it? Has a single thing been done? There you have the public press, and just think of the labour office, the employment office to which returned men went, as I indicated yesterday from a letter which I read. Did they get employment? They did not. Why? Because you have in charge of that office one who, it is true, has been investigated by the superintendent, or whoever it may have been; yet in the courts of the country, before the magistrate, we have it asserted by the man who is charged in the dock that if he could get a job he would not be so charged. But he said, "I cannot afford to make a contribution to this beer fund."

Mr. TUCKER: That statement was not sworn; it was an idle statement made before the magistrate.

Mr. BENNETT: The magistrate adjourned the case to make an inquiry.

Mr. TUCKER: The statement was not sworn to.

Mr. BENNETT: And the case has not since been heard.

Mr. TUCKER: What has that got to do with it?

Mr. BENNETT: Nothing, I take it.

An hon. MEMBER: A great deal.

Mr. BENNETT: What about the question of supplies I have mentioned? Now we have it asserted by Mr. Stansbury that he had the consent of someone to take the stone. Who gave the consent about the white lead? It was removed—

Mr. DUNNING: Do you allege Stansbury took the white lead?

Mr. BENNETT: Did I say that?

Mr. ROGERS: Who took it?

Mr. BENNETT: I asked who gave consent.

Mr. ROGERS: You suggested it.

Mr. BENNETT: I suggested nothing.

Mr. ROGERS: Where did it go?

Mr. BENNETT: I did say it was the duty of my hon. friend to find where it went.

Mr. ROGERS: Where does my right hon. friend get this information?

Mr. BENNETT: He has had it for some time.

Mr. ROGERS: He has not been anxious to have it followed up, apparently.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, because the storekeeper is there yet at Rockwood.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no. My right hon. friend himself said the storekeeper was dismissed. And Rockwood is not a federal institution. How can he say it is there yet?

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say "yet"; I said it was at Rockwood.

Mr. DUNNING: Those are the words; I will leave it to Hansard,—"the storekeeper is there yet."

Mr. BENNETT: By "yet" I meant at Fort Henry. He is not there yet, but he is at Rockwood.

Mr. DUNNING: He is not in the employ of the federal government.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but Mr. Stansbury recommended him to the position which he holds; I happen to know.

Mr. FRASER: Wait until the people of Canada read the press in the morning.

Mr. BENNETT: Now, I do not know, Mr. Chairman, whether the last observation made by the hon. member for Northumberland means that a cooked report of what has been said is to be made; but it is, of course, open to that construction. He may be able to make it, I don't know. He has great powers in many directions.

Now, I want to go a step farther. The minister says I did not communicate with him. A question was put on the order paper as to how the work at Fort Henry was being done, and the answer was that it was being done partly by contract and partly by day work.

Mr. ROGERS: I have the answer right here. Does my right hon. friend want it?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. ROGERS: Does he wish it now?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. ROGERS: The right hon. gentleman has asked how much was the cost plus and I sent out for the information. In the first place, cement never became part of the work, until it was replaced after a loan was arranged for with the provincial government representative. The first contract was about $70,000 on a unit basis, similar to the method prevailing in the Department of Highways of Ontario. The next year tenders were again called in the public press, and the contract ran over $200,000, on a unit basis. The only cost plus work was for the mounting of guns, and other unusual work, not over $35,000, of the total sum. No changes at any time were made in the unit prices quoted in the tenders. That is the information.

Mr. BENNETT: Then, it is not correct to say, partly by tender and partly by day work.

Mr. ROGERS: The only cost plus is for the mounting of the guns.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the answer given in this house.

Mr. ROGERS: The only cost plus item was for the mounting of the guns.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is all the information in Hansard. Would the minister give me the date of the second tender?

Mr. ROGERS: I will send up for it; I have not it here.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister obtain copies of payrolls?

Mr. ROGERS: I can secure them, and will gladly do so.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Does he, as a matter of fact?

Mr. ROGERS: As I recall it, the payrolls on any work for which dominion government contributions are available. They are examined from time to time by the inspectors in order to determine whether or not the relief quota has been lived up to.

Mr. DUNNING: It is provincial government work.

Mr. BENNETT: It is half and half. Do we get copies of the payrolls? Does the minister get copies of the payrolls?

Mr. ROGERS: Not on all projects.

Mr. BENNETT: The department, then?

Mr. ROGERS: I am not able to say that. I will find out.

Mr. BENNETT: In some cases, it will be remembered by the minister, we do have copies of payrolls in order to authorize payments. They were obtained in some cases, and in some cases they were not. In order that we may be able to study out for ourselves the difficulties in connection with this stone, and other matters, will the Minister of National Defence produce the report of the commandant of the Royal Military College with respect to stone?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not aware of it at all; I will look into this question right away.

Mr. BENNETT: To be conclusive on that point, with respect to the utilization of these supplies. Obviously I have not seen or had any connection with the commandant, and therefore I will have to place myself entirely in the hands of the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Supplies for the Royal Military College?

Mr. BENNETT: No, utilization by Mr. Stansbury of stone which went from the property known as the Royal Military College at Barriefield, camp 42.

Mr. ROGERS: If my right hon. friend will permit me, I have the information he asked for. I should like to make a correction with respect to the second contract. I believe I gave the figure of approximately $200,000, and the actual figure is $305,448.50.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the date of it?

Mr. ROGERS: March, 1937.

Mr. BENNETT: Was that done by tender?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, by tender.

Mr. BENNETT: What papers were they published in?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not that information, but I will get it later for my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister will produce the commandant's report I think that will throw a lot of light upon this matter. With respect to the—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am not aware of any report at all on the matter, but I will look into it right away.

Mr. BENNETT: There was one, I am informed.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would my right hon. friend indicate the nature of the report?

Mr. BENNETT: The report was merely as to the question of the utilization of this stone by Stansbury, on his property.

Mr. ROGERS: Is this more stone, or is this the same old stone?

Mr. BENNETT: It sounds very ingenious, most ingenious.

Mr. ROGERS: I want to know.

Mr. HOWE: Is this the four dollars' worth?

Mr. BENNETT: I am glad the Canadian people have an opportunity to appraise the value of the government, at least, and its methods of transacting business.

Mr. HOWE: Four dollars is a lot of money.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not much to a millionaire, like the hon. member. It might be to some people.

Mr. HOWE: The right hon. gentleman certainly could answer on that.

Mr. BENNETT: The stone I had reference to was the stone hauled to Mr. Stansbury's place and utilized there, and a report was made to the Minister of Labour.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was the stone to which the right hon. gentleman refers used in connection with the activities of the Department of National Defence?

Mr. BENNETT: I beg your pardon?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Was the stone used in my department?

Mr. BENNETT: The contracts were contracts made with the Department of Labour, and—

Mr. ROGERS: No, no; my right hon. friend is speaking about a report of the commandant. The commandant has not anything to do with the Department of Labour.

Mr. BENNETT: The contracts were contracts made through the Department of Labour with the Department of Public Highways of Ontario, as a matter of fact. The specifications bear the imprint of the highways department. Before that there were camps known as projects 37 and 42. I want the report of the commandant with respect to the withdrawal from within the curtilage of the Royal Military College of stone that went to this place of Stansbury's.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Where did my right hon. friend get the information? He knows more than the minister does, because the minister has not seen or heard of this report. How does he know there is a report of the commandant of the Royal Military College?

Mr. BENNETT: I will tell you my knowledge. In the course of my inquiries with respect to it, I inquired as to whether or not the military college authorities had taken action, and my information was that their people did inspect it. That was as far as it went—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Inspected what?

Mr. BENNETT: This stone that was taken away, and therefore I concluded there must be a report. I said at the very start of it—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask my right hon. friend: Does he know, or does he not, if there is a report, because the minister does not know about it?

Mr. BENNETT: I said I placed myself in his hands with respect to the report which I believe was made by the commandant, and certain information given with respect to the removal of stone from land within the curtilage of the Royal Military College.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I thought my right hon. friend said there was a report.

Mr. BENNETT: I said I placed myself in the minister's hands. I believed there was a report and I mentioned my reasons for so believing. Obviously I could not communicate with council. That is the position. The point I wish to make with the minister is that there exists a condition which he should remedy. It is no good to refer to what somebody else did because he was elected to make it better than it was. That was his job. If these conditions continue, then his job is to see that they are stopped. The issue is a simple one: Shall these conditions continue or shall they cease? That is all. It is to that issue that I directed the minister's attention. If he had been as careful yesterday as he was on former occasions, he would have realized that what I was trying to do was to direct attention to these conditions, not because I believed he had created them—I do not believe that yet—

Mr. ROGERS: The impression was left that way, whether it was intentional or not.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not think one could use stronger language than I used to free the minister from the intention to do it. I made it clear beyond peradventure that what I was asking him to do was to cure the condition by having proper steps taken to end it. I cannot see how anyone could think otherwise unless they wished to do so regardless of the language used. What is more, the hon. minister will remember the occasion when I first mentioned the matter. Attention was directed to the fact that I did not think the minister himself had done these things. One who is as familiar with history as he is and desires to do what he did; one who made the speech he did, that he was going to clean up that mess, could not believe otherwise. I pointed out the condition to which he referred.

Mr. ROGERS: Let me just refer to the debate of yesterday. At page 3701 of Hansard I am reported as follows:

> Quite so, and his whole purpose has been, by a number of vague charges in the beginning, which I have no doubt were designed to bring more definite charges, to seek to create the impression that I as Minister of Labour had definitely connived at the violation of the terms with respect to employment under relief agreements.
> Mr. Bennett: And he will prove it in this house.

Mr. BENNETT: Not prove connivance, prove the charges.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: No, no, because I followed that up.

Mr. ROGERS: I simply read the words. If my right hon. friend says that he did not mean that—

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly did not revise that Hansard, and I certainly did not say that the minister had connived. I said the charges could be proven. I say that yet. That is what my statement referred to. I gave the letter from Rollands, and I can give other cases with respect to this matter from what I regard as fairly accurate sources.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend surely will take steps to correct Hansard.

Mr. BENNETT: If the Minister of Finance will correct his own Hansard, it will be a good deal better.

Mr. DUNNING: I would not do an injustice such as that to any man.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not seen the occasion when if he could, he did not. That is all I can say.

An hon. MEMBER: Shame.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not out of order. I say to the minister that I was dealing with the charges and I was not dealing with his connivance.

Mr. DUNNING: I rise to a point of order. The Minister of Labour has just quoted yesterday's Hansard and has shown a plain charge by the right hon. leader of the opposition in connection with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers).

Mr. BENNETT: That is not so.

Mr. DUNNING: The minister read the words, and the right hon. leader of the opposition said only a few moments ago that he did not intend to say yesterday that the Minister of Labour connived, but he refused to move to have Hansard corrected in accordance with his explanation of to-day. My point of order is that under these circumstances and in view of the fact that those words have gone out all over the country doing an injustice to the Minister of Labour, you, Mr. Chairman, acting in your capacity of chairman of this committee should order that the words used yesterday by the leader of the opposition be corrected in accordance with his statement of to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: A little more knowledge of the rules would have prevented the Minister of Finance from making that statement. The chairman has no such power.

Mr. DUNNING: The Speaker has.

Mr. BENNETT: The Speaker has under certain conditions.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order raised by the Minister of Finance, the right hon. leader of the opposition is correct in saying that the chairman has not authority, but the chairman can report to the Speaker.

Mr. BENNETT: What can you report?

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the point of order? I submit there is no point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: Oh, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: What is it?

The CHAIRMAN: As raised by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: In the judgment of the Chair, it is a point of order.

Mr. BENNETT: That settles it. What is the point of order?

Mr. DUNNING: I am content to leave it to the house and to the record of to-day's proceedings as contrasted with the record of yesterday.

Mr. BENNETT: No one in this house ever thought for one moment that I said that the minister had connived. I was dealing with the charges. He then went on and stated certain things which, of course, were not within the rules. Here is the record:

Mr. Bennett: But remember, this is a thing that was not going to happen. This is where my hon. friend was going to change it all. This is where the professor was going to see that decency prevailed. That is the way I put it.

Mr. Rogers: I shall speak with a little less heat than my right hon. friend, but possibly with a little more light. The right hon. gentleman has dealt with this question on three different occasions.

Mr. Bennett: And he is going to deal with it again.

Mr. Rogers: Quite so, and his whole purpose has been, by a number of vague charges in the beginning, which I have no doubt were designed to bring more definite charges—

Of course, that is improper—

—to seek to create the impression that I as Minister of Labour had definitely connived at the violation of the terms with respect to employment under relief agreements.

Mr. GRAY: Read the next.

Mr. BENNETT: And then I said:

And he will prove it in this house.

That referred to the charges; it dealt with nothing else. How could I deal with the state of mind of the minister? He was imputing motives which he had no right to do at all. I was dealing with that, and I am dealing with the same question now—with the charges that I made with respect to the administration in Kingston of this department, and the Department of National Defence. I said I would prove it, and I have. The hon. gentleman knows that some of these matters cannot be dealt with because they are not within the fiscal year for which the auditor general's report has been issued. I took the trouble to look that up to see whether they were, and they will not appear until the report for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1938, has been placed in the records of this house at the next session. That is what I mentioned to him yesterday. No one suggested that he had connived at these things. The sentence used prior to that is the particular one to which I direct attention. He said he was going to cure them. He saw the conditions at Kingston. He said they were bad.

Mr. ROGERS: I said the relief camp would be closed.

Mr. BENNETT: I meant the administration. What is more, when Doctor Ross spoke there, I remember a full page advertisement that was issued. I do not think the minister was responsible for that. The condition was going to be cured. The minister's speeches were on that high plane, and I said yesterday, and I repeat, that that is what we are looking for. We do not want references to what somebody else did; what we want is a cure. We want these evils set aside. I want this question cleared up and adjusted.

Mr. ROGERS: When a complaint comes to the Department of Labour with respect to the relief act or any other function of the department, it is investigated at once. I may say I have received only one complaint from Kingston with respect to discrimination in connection with the matter to which my right hon. friend has referred, and that has been investigated. I know of no instance where a complaint has been made and has not been investigated. If my right hon. friend would bring these matters to my attention, they would receive immediate and careful attention.

Mr. BENNETT: I am only pointing out that that was the issue. The statements made by the minister were public statements, and I have made a public statement in connection with the conditions that I believe obtain and prevail and can be proven. I ask him to take steps to cure them. I have made my statement publicly because his statements as to what he proposed to do were made publicly on the hustings. Now, to come back and say, "Well, that is what you fellows did, only worse," is not exactly the appeal which was made to the electorate. But it is an old story—

Mr. ROGERS: Let me correct that, if I may. I know my right hon. friend wants to have the record straight. I said in the first place, We will deal with the complaints as they arise. That is the first thing; in other words, correct the situation. It was only in the second place that I dealt with conditions which had existed before; and I think that was a position which was entirely logical.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it would not have sounded very convincing if the hon. gentleman had gone to the people and said, "Elect me rather than General Ross, because we are going to continue and improve on the patronage methods that he has adopted in the constituency."

Mr. ROGERS: I should say there has been an improvement.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister says there has been an improvement. Then, all I have to say is that it must have been very bad before, because no one will say, just on the statements which have been made by the minister himself, that these conditions do not call for change. The idea of a man taking stone and then saying he has somebody's permission to do it though it belongs to the public! These things are not to be done in that way. There is also the whole question of appointments being left in the hands of a man who has the right to say whether or not men shall be permitted to work, and that my taxes and other people's taxes shall be used for the purpose of providing employment only for a given type of person. That is wrong. It is wrong when you are dealing with relief. What is more, if the minister is fair he will realize that the first time I talked about the matter I spoke of these casual appointments being within his jurisdiction, and the criticism I was making with respect to—

Mr. ROGERS: I am sorry that my right hon. friend on that very occasion read from that return and made a specific charge that with respect to opportunities for employment in relief acts, there had been discrimination.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. ROGERS: And yet the references were not to those who had been employed on relief works whatsoever.

Mr. BENNETT: I said, on relief acts. I tried to make it clear that I regard relief acts as an entirely separate thing from everything else. I believe that everybody, regardless of political faith, has the right—

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend did not make that explanation in the first instance.

An hon. MEMBER: And it was done under his political regime.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. BENNETT: In respect to circumstances I have knowledge of, the hon. gentleman from Winnipeg will not say that employment on the sewage disposal plant was limited to a certain type of person in that city. Oh yes, an hon. member is nodding for him to get up. He will get up any time and read the letter of Mr. R. H. Webb to Mr. Bennett. The hon. member nods to the hon. member for St. Boniface to make his little speech and read his little letter, and he will do it. That is an answer, of course, to observations on the present administration; he is going to read that letter. But remember that it was put on the file. Remember that it was found on the file.

Mr. FRASER: Somebody made a mistake.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I do not think so. I want to make clear beyond peradventure to the minister that I do believe that conditions there call for the remedy of the evil. I repeat that I am not going to stop now. I am going to continue to watch that condition, because a singular situation has developed. It is a situation different from that in any other constituency; for the hon. gentleman was a different candidate from other candidates. More was expected of him. He was going to do these things; I believe he wanted to do them, and I have been interested to see whether or not he would allow what has been called the machine to overpower him or whether he would make the machine run decently. That is the position; that is the whole reason and purpose behind this. I made up my mind when those speeches were made by the Prime Minister and by the hon. member for Kingston that I would continue to follow the matter. If God gives me health, I propose to do so, because we have received these definite assurances. When President Wilson went into public life he made certain statements of the same kind—

An hon. MEMBER:—and lived up to them.

Mr. BENNETT: One knows his history in New Jersey. He joined issue with the machine; it was his own party's, but he broke it, and it paid him to do so. I am curious to ascertain whether or not, when we get men of the high type and calibre of the Minister of Labour in the public life of this country, with his academic training, with his outlook and his historical knowledge, when he makes these statements as to the methods that are to be followed in connection with the conduct of public business, he will give effect to those assurances. I look to see it done, and that he is not to be overawed or diverted from his endeavours to accomplish it by the machine which has hitherto controlled, and which, unless the minister takes a strong position, will continue to control, the patronage situation in that constituency. Certainly the language of the Prime Minister the other evening gave me reason to say "splendid" in response to what he said, because it indicated he realized that under relief conditions in this country we have a situation which is not free from danger, very great danger, and the only way we can remedy it is for men of the type and standing of the Minister of Labour to see to it that the whole force and strength of the government are utilized to prevent the continuance of this evil.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have listened for a good many days of this session to lessons by the right hon. leader of the opposition on the political morals which should obtain in this country. Also I have very often heard him use the expression "bribery of the electors" either by the expenditures of public funds or the promise of expenditures of public funds, and I have come to the conclusion—and if the term is parliamentary I am going to use it—that I think the right hon. gentleman is posing as a holier-than-thou leader, when I am convinced that he is about the biggest hypocrite who ever entered this house.

Mr. BENNETT: I take it that the chairman will probably ask that that be withdrawn.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The word "hypocrite" is unparliamentary, and I would ask the hon. member to withdraw it.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Well, then, Mr. Chairman, I never saw the practice of hypocrisy to the degree I have listened to it to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: That, unfortunately, is in the same position.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Now, what happened—

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I rise to a point of order. That expression is just as unparliamentary as the other.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order, in my opinion, is well taken.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Then, Mr. Chairman, I will bow to your ruling, and I withdraw those words.

Mr. BENNETT: Having thought them out very carefully, and feeling better for having said them.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The right hon. gentleman in 1930 started the game of bribery—

Mr. BENNETT: That again, Mr. Chairman, is unparliamentary.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: —by going throughout Canada and making promises—

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): That is just as unparliamentary as "hypocrisy."

Mr. DUNNING: What is?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): "Bribery."

Mr. DUNNING: The right hon. leader of the opposition uses it every day.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member said I "started the game of bribery."

Mr. DUNNING: The right hon. gentleman can use the word "bribery" better: he is a clever enough lawyer to use it properly.

Mr. BENNETT: That word is not properly used, Mr. Chairman. On a point of order, one hon. member cannot allege that another member of this house started a "game of bribery." I have always voted against lotteries, and thus far I have escaped being charged with bribery. But there are cases in which—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Will the right hon. gentleman speak louder, so that I can hear his point of order?

Mr. BENNETT: The point of order is that it is unparliamentary to make that observation.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have a right to speak on the point of order, have I not? To my knowledge the right hon. gentleman has used the word "bribery" hundreds of times in this house. He used it in connection with the by-election in St. Henry, Montreal. He used it on many other occasions. I leave it to you, Mr. Chairman, whether I have not the right to use the same term as the right hon. gentleman has used hundreds of times in this house.

Mr. SPENCE: In a different way, though.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order raised by the right hon. leader of the opposition, I am of opinion it is well taken, for this reason, that it might be inferred from the remark that there was something personal in the way of bribery on the part of the leader of the opposition. I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the expression.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I again bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and withdraw the word "bribery." But I will read one or two promises which the right hon. gentleman made in 1930 and leave it to your good judgment whether these promises have not a slight connection with the word "bribery." Here is what he said in Victoria. According to the Colonist of June 17, my right hon. friend said:

> You have my promise that if the Conservative party is returned to power that as soon after July 28 as possible, parliament will be called together to deal with the problem of unemployment by providing, not doles, but work, and that legislative action will be taken to bring about the future security of our country and the well-being of its people . . . We cannot tolerate the dole. Men and women of this country want work, not charity.

Did the right hon. gentleman carry out that promise? Did he not inaugurate a dole system in this country, and in doing so did he not do more damage to Canada and probably place our democratic institutions in such a position that to-day they are not very much respected?

Mr. MASSEY: Has the present government changed it?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I am making my own speech; the hon. gentleman can make his. Speaking in Calgary, the leader of the opposition said, as reported in the Calgary Herald of June 13:

> I am not a genius—

He did not have to tell anyone that.

> I am not a genius . . . I am a man just as you men who are here, one of your fellow-citizens. I have responsibilities as every man in this position has, and I must not lightly make statements that I am not prepared to the last syllable to carry into effect, and I will not.

Then, on June 21, at Brandon, he said, as reported in the Mail and Empire:

> Endorsation of the suggested Mafeking cut-off to afford Manitoba a shorter route to the Hudson Bay railway was voiced by the Conservative leader. Supporting the proposal, Mr. Bennett said that this would be a proper national undertaking to be started to relieve unemployment, and he asserted such was his intention.

When the leader of the opposition made the statements contained in the three quotations I have read, he knew he could not carry them out and therefore he knew he was deceiving the electorate. He has deceived them because none of these promises was carried out while he was in power for five years. In 1935 we had an election, he knew the promises he made in 1930 he could not put into effect, and so in 1935 he thought he would use other means; he would use public funds, and under his legislation of 1935, under peace, order and good government, which gave him a blank cheque, to do what he liked with, the province of Manitoba came to Ottawa to make arrangements for expenditure on unemployment relief. They entered into an agreement in April, 1935. In that agreement the Department of Labour, through the Hon. Mr. Gordon, took the definite stand that no money would be spent on road projects except on the trans-Canada highway. And when Mr. Gordon or any other ministers in the last government took a stand, it came from the leader of the opposition, who was then Prime Minister, because in those days we had a one-man government and none of the ministers acted without his sanction. From that time on the Conservative candidates and my right hon. friend's henchmen and machine were going around the ridings in the province of Manitoba and saying to the electors. "The federal government is prepared to spend money to build these roads. If the provincial government is prepared to put up dollar for dollar, the federal government will also lend the provinces' share to them." Why, in my riding they promised a road from every place to every place, and they promised so many bridges that if they had all been constructed it would have been necessary to hire a machine to dig rivers to put the bridges across, because there were not enough rivers in the constituency.

Prior to July 23, 1935, the then Minister of Labour took the stand that no money would be expended on roads in Manitoba, except on the trans-Canada highway. The minister of public works of Manitoba, the Hon. Mr. Clubb, wrote as follows to the Minister of Labour on July 23, 1935:

Dear Mr. Gordon:

> A large delegation interviewed the honourable premier and myself this morning in reference to the construction of a road, as a relief project, from a point four miles east of the town of Morden, thence easterly through the towns of Plum Coulee, Letellier, Dominion City, Stuartburn, Vita, Caliento, Sundown, Menisino and Piney, to the town of Sprague, an approximate distance of 115 miles.
> Roughly estimated, this road will cost around $10,000 per mile, plus the construction of a bridge over the Red river at Letellier, which will cost in the neighbourhood of $125,000.
> The delegates were very desirous of having this road constructed as an unemployment relief measure, and intimated that the dominion government would favourably consider same.
>
> If you are prepared to do this as a relief measure, the province will undertake to do its part.
>
> Yours very truly,
> W. R. Clubb,
> Minister of Public Works and Labour

Then, on July 27, the Hon. Mr. Clubb wrote another letter to the Hon. Mr. Gordon in the following terms:

Dear Sir:

Last month when I was at Ottawa discussing relief projects that might be undertaken in this province, I submitted to Mr. Dickson, deputy minister, a list of same and in which was included the project known as the Piney highway.

This road was started in 1930 as a relief project and considerable work was done in that year and continued in 1931.

The list referred to above, I understand, Mr. Dickson referred to you but in your letter of June 27 you stated that you could not see your way clear to approve of any of this work other than that on the Trans-Canada highway and the Peace Garden road.

Since my return, I have had numerous requests asking me to again take up with you the matter of the completion of the Piney highway and to ask if you would be prepared to reconsider your previous decision.

He then describes the highway, and closes with this:

I would appreciate it if you would let me hear from you in this regard.

Then one of my right hon. friend's political henchmen, the head of the machine in Manitoba, Ralph Webb, came upon the scene. He classifies himself as director of the Conservative organization in the province of Manitoba, and on August 23, 1935, he wrote to Mr. Gordon—

Mr. DUNNING: In 1935?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Yes; 1935 was election year. He wrote:

Dear Mr. Gordon:

I would appreciate it very much indeed if you would kindly read the enclosed carefully. It does explain the situation,—

Mark those words "it does explain the situation."

—and means so much to us, and in view of the new conditions that have arisen owing to the rust and extreme heat on the crops, it might be good justification for really doing something at this time as a special consideration. There is not the question of a doubt that if we do not do something, many hundreds and thousands of these people in these districts will be applying to the provincial and federal governments for assistance this winter.

Yours very truly,
R. H. Webb,
Director for Manitoba.

In that letter he enclosed this letter which he had written to the Prime Minister, addressing him as "My dear Chief"; he also says that he is sending a copy to Mr. Gordon, Mr. Lawson and Mr. Manion. The letter is marked private and personal, but it is on the file and I am going to read it:

August 23, 1935.

The Right Hon. R. B. Bennett,
P.C., K.C., M.P.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

My dear Chief:

I have just come in from the constituencies of Lisgar, Provencher and St. Boniface particularly, and the situation at the moment is very good there politically, but it needs the necessary impetus to carry on.

I have already written to the Hon. J. E. Lawson, the Hon. R. J. Manion and the Hon. Wesley Gordon and the Hon. T. G. Murphy with regard to the two roads in these three constituencies that are vital factors in this election campaign, and they have the whole story in detail, both verbally and in writing.

In 1931 the federal government appropriated moneys for both of these roads. Both trunk highways enter the province of Manitoba, and as an unemployment relief measure, quite considerable work was done, which I think was shared by the federal and provincial governments fifty per cent each. The provincial government have or did apply again for these two roads to be carried on as an unemployment relief measure, but for some reason or other were more or less turned down as a matter of policy.

A new problem has arisen lately, which may be a good reason for reconsideration. As you know rust and extreme heat have destroyed the larger portion of our Manitoba wheat crop, and in some parts of Lisgar and Provencher especially it has created a very serious problem, and has left the farmers in a serious situation. My thought is that if your government will cooperate with the provincial government as an unemployment relief works measure, that work could be done on these roads that would give the farmers of these three constituencies plenty to do and help them to earn something, whereas if it is not done they possibly may appeal to the provincial and federal governments for some form of relief and for which we will get nothing, but on the other hand are perfectly willing to work themselves and use their teams and equipment. As a political measure, it assures us without any question of a doubt these three seats which we badly want to win, and which look very good for us at the present time.

The Liberal federal members in these three constituencies, supported to some extent, under cover, by provincial government members, are endeavouring to blame the federal government for the fact that these two roads have not and will not be built, and it has become such a strong factor politically, that a great deal rests on a favourable decision being made.

I feel that we should play the game politically, call the provincial government's bluff, who have stated positively to delegates that they are prepared to put up dollar for dollar with the federal government in the building of these two roads as an unemployment relief works measure, and I understand, although I am not sure, that the provincial government have forwarded on letters of approval for both of these roads. They certainly did in their original letter of March or April 27 because I have a copy of it, and it was discussed at Ottawa with the Minister of Labour and the Hon. T. G. Murphy.

If the federal government would advise of participation in these two roads, it would be good politics; it would call the provincial government's bluff; it would kill the propaganda that the Liberals are carrying on at the present time; it would assure us of a victory in these three seats, and in my humble opinion, will not have cost the federal government anything, because by the time the work is organized, the election will be over, and winter will be upon us, and perhaps very little work will have been done before the end of the present financial year.

The Hon. W. Gordon, the Hon. Dr. R. J. Manion and the Hon. T. G. Murphy know all about these two roads. They have the details, map locations and I believe thoroughly understand the situation. Our candidates are very alive to the situation, and no doubt have also been in touch with your own good self and the ministers, pointing out the actual situation and what it means. If it was not the right thing to do I would be the first to turn it down, but they are essential to the welfare of the province as a whole, running through two very thickly settled parts of the province, in fact the oldest settled parts, and there is not a road anywhere east of the Red river other than mud roads, and the people there are naturally aroused. I am not saying that it is a federal matter at all, we all know that, but as an unemployment relief works measure it is thought that something might be done, and particularly in view of the serious situation that has developed through rust and extreme heat in the crops of the farmers, and politically it means victory for us.

Yours very truly,
R. H. Webb,
Director for Manitoba.

What happened? After the right hon. gentleman received that letter, which he must have received, after the Hon. Mr. Gordon, the Hon. Dr. Manion, the Hon. Mr. Murphy and the Hon. Mr. Lawson getting copies, here is what the right hon. gentleman sent to Mr. Dickson. We, who were here from 1930 to 1935, all know, that at any time the right hon. gentleman signed his name to any document it meant that you had to carry it out or stand the consequences. Here is what he said:

Ottawa, September 4, 1935.

W. M. Dickson, Esq.,
Deputy Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Mr. Dickson:

I have received a telegram from the Minister of the Interior reading as follows:

"Regarding further works in the province of Manitoba which might be commenced for the relief of unemployment the following should I feel receive serious consideration. Construction of a highway leading southeasterly from Winnipeg to the international boundary known as the Piney highway. Construction of a highway from Morden eastward to connect with the Piney highway. Construction of a highway from Russell to a point near Erickson to connect with the highway leading to the Riding Mountain park. Construction of a bridge known as the Lens bridge, Swan River district. The provincial government has addressed correspondence to the Department of Labour intimating their willingness to consider the construction of such highways and bridges as may be mutually agreed upon and to enter into a supplementary agreement in regard thereto."

Yours faithfully,
(Sgd.) R. B. Bennett.

Then, on September 4, 1935, the Hon. Mr Clubb wrote the following letter to the Hon. W. A. Gordon:

Dear Mr. Gordon:

Yesterday Senator Mullins, Mr. R. Peden, of Rossburn, and the Hon. Mr. Griffiths interviewed me with reference to the proposed gravelling of the road from Russell to Clear Lake via Silverton, Angusville, Birdtail, Rossburn, Olha, Oakburn, Menzie, Elphinstone, Sandy Lake and Rackham to Clear Lake highway.

This road, Mr. Peden informed me, had been approved by the parties interested at a meeting which he had attended. In discussing this matter Mr. Peden also informed me that Senator Mullins and himself had just returned from Neepawa where they had discussed the building of this road with the Hon. Mr. Murphy. They stated that Mr. Murphy had said that if I would write you requesting that this road be approved by you as a relief project on the usual basis it would be built. If this information is correct, and your government accepts this proposition, which we submitted to you on a previous occasion and which you refused, I take it that you would be prepared to draw up an agreement embodying this project and forward same to me for signature.

Then, there are some figures with regard to the mileage of the road, and the letter is signed by W. R. Clubb. I have another letter from Mr. Clubb to Mr. Gordon under date of September 4, 1935; reading in part as follows:

Under date of July 27th, 1935, I wrote you with reference to the Piney highway and also under date of July 23rd with reference to the Sprague-Morden road. To date I have not heard from you with regard to the above projects and would appreciate it if you could give these matters your attention, and oblige.

Then there is some correspondence with Colonel MacLean, and by the way I might just interject here a word with regard to this gentleman. When Colonel MacLean was in charge of the employment office in Winnipeg you could not get a job unless you were a fourth degree Conservative.

An hon. MEMBER: And your grandfather before you.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Yes. After this letter of August 23 had been written to the right hon. gentleman, what happened? On September 12 Mr. Gordon sent the following telegram to Mr. Clubb:

Reference your letters fourth instant Piney highway Sprague Morden road and Russel Clear Lake road stop Governor in council has now approved of supplementary agreement which authorize federal assistance to construction on the above highways also certain bridges and memorandum of agreement is being forwarded at once to the province.

The letter from Ralph Webb was dated August 23, and on it action was taken by the federal government. I am going to deal with my riding particularly, because I am more familiar with it. In my riding this agreement entailed an expenditure of $575,000 on the part of the dominion and a further expenditure of $250,000 as the federal share of the Piney highway. In other words, there was an expenditure contemplated in those three ridings, including the 50 per cent share of the province, of $1,525,000. Right up to September 12 the then Minister of Labour had refused to have anything to do with road construction in Manitoba except on the trans-Canada highway. When Mr. Ralph Webb, the henchman of the right hon. leader of the opposition, comes into the picture on August 23, this expenditure is provided on the representations of that gentleman. I should like to go back to a clause in Mr. Webb's letter to the right hon. gentleman which I think deserves to be read again:

If the federal government would advise of participation in these two roads, it would be good politics; it would call the provincial government's bluff; it would kill the propaganda that the Liberals are carrying on at the present time; it would assure us of a victory in these three seats, and in my humble opinion, will not have cost the federal government anything, because by the time the work is organized, the election will be over—

Can you beat that for trying to bribe the electors by the expenditure of public money? You can scrutinize the records of this house, and I do not think you will find anything as glaring as this. Then there is the order in council authorizing the work, which is P.C. 2851 of September 10:

Certified to be a true copy of a minute of a meeting of the committee of the privy council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 10th September, 1935.

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated 9th September, 1935, from the Minister of Labour, submitting:

(1) That parliament has enacted legislation which may be cited as "The Relief Act, 1935";

(2) That clause 2 of the act provides, inter alia, that the governor in council may, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein;

(3) That the government of the province of Manitoba has signified a desire to enter into an agreement with the dominion under the aforesaid act respecting relief measures in the province, supplemental to the agreements authorized by orders in council P.C. 1769 dated June 28, 1935, and P.C. 2396, dated August 8, 1935.

The minister, therefore, recommends that he be authorized to enter into an agreement with the province of Manitoba on behalf of the dominion under the provisions of The Relief Act, 1935, in accordance with draft attached hereto.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

E. J. Lemaire,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

I do not think I should read the entire agreement, but there is one clause I want to read to show that this whole project was carried forward for political purposes only. Mind you, I am not saying that these roads were not needed, but this whole project was started for the purpose of winning the three seats, bribing the electors into voting for the Conservative candidate. This is what clause 11 of the agreement provides:

This agreement shall be effective from and including the tenth day of September, 1935, and shall expire on March thirty-first, 1936, but shall not apply to any project on which work has not been commenced by the tenth day of October, 1935.

And voting was on October 14. Well, Mr. Chairman, I do not think I need say very much more. I hope my right hon. friend will stop accusing everybody else of doing something wrong and of suggesting that he always did the right thing. As I said before, as far as Manitoba is concerned, when his government was in power you could not get a job anywhere unless you were a full-fledged fourth degree Conservative. That was the practice. Preferred lists? You had to show your initiation certificate before you could be put on the preferred list for any commodities that were bought by any department, and my right hon. friend cannot deny that.

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly say that is inaccurate; and that without regard to political considerations men found jobs on relief projects, notably in the city of Winnipeg in connection with the sewage disposal plant.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Whenever a statement is made my right hon. friend always denies it; that is the easiest thing to do, but the facts are there.

Mr. BENNETT: They are.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: And they could not exist without the right hon. gentleman being aware of them, because when he was Prime Minister of this country he was running the whole show; he knows that. I do not think I need go any further. Even with the bribery that my right hon. friend and his henchmen tried to use by way of public money—

Mr. BENNETT: Surely that is not in order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. gentleman can use the word "bribery," but not in that sense.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I shall withdraw the word and say the impetus which they tried to provide to unduly influence the electors, through the expenditure of certain large sums of money. I want to tell my right hon. friend that it will take ten leaders like him to influence the good electors of Provencher, because they are intelligent people. You can see that, because they have returned me to this house so often. I will tell my right hon. friend that despite the various kinds of impetus he tried to use in the election campaign in the constituency of Provencher. I was elected by the largest majority any man ever received in the riding. This money was being expended on road projects which were started for one purpose, and one only, namely, to win the election in those three seats. Thank heaven the electors turned it down and told the right hon. gentleman exactly what they wanted.

Mr. GLEN: Mr. Chairman, naturally I wish to take some part in this discussion, because one of the roads in question goes through my constituency, and I think I can speak with some degree of certainty with regard to what happened there. I must say at the outset I am not at all in favour of the tu quoque argument, and I very rarely apply it or use it. But when I read yesterday's Hansard, and listened to the speech delivered to-day by the right hon. the leader of the opposition, I think the very high ground he took in those speeches certainly calls for some comment as to the conduct of the Conservative party while they were in office.

Yesterday, when referring to patronage, he used the word "monstrous." As reported on page 3698 of Hansard, he said:

> It is monstrous—I use that word again, at which the minister sometimes smiles—that a poor unfortunate cannot get a job because he cannot get a letter to the employment office from the head of the Liberal organization.

Further on down the same page, referring to a man living in Calgary, he said:

> Under conditions of normal prosperity there might be a different attitude. But this is laying the foundation for anarchy. Mark it!

In reply to the Minister of Labour, he stated that he wished to make it perfectly clear "that to my knowledge it was not done under the relief administration." Then, further down on the same page he said:

> Sometimes I wonder whether our friends realize that we are living on the edge of a volcano in this country.

To-day we had the right hon. gentleman taking a very high ground again with regard to the attitude which should be adopted by the Minister of Labour in connection with conditions in Kingston. For that reason I think it only right that I should recall at this time some of the things that have been done by the administration of which the right hon. gentleman was the head.

As I said before, I do not like this kind of argument, but I think the people of the country must know exactly what happened during that period. During the election campaign of 1935 we were faced with the project of a road running through my constituency from Russell to Erickson, joining with the Clear Lake road to Riding Mountain. The Tory candidate was saying that the road was to be built by a Conservative government. I told the electors that this was an election road. I told them from the platform that if it was an election road, and they wanted it, the best thing they could do would be to vote for me, because a Liberal government would be administering it after the election. I believe to a certain extent that appealed to them, and is one of the reasons why I was elected. Probably it was not for that reason alone.

But when we see the letter that has been submitted by the hon. member for Provencher, I will suggest to the committee that I do not think there ever has been or could be a stronger indictment against the form of patronage that was carried out by the administration under the right hon. gentleman opposite. I never thought for one minute when going through that constituency, and saying the things I said, that .they were to be borne out one hundred per cent by the letter addressed by Mr. Webb of Winnipeg to the right hon. the leader of the opposition.

What I do not like—and I will say it frankly—is the fact that the leader of the opposition should be in a position to know the terms of that letter, and confirm the terms of it by the telegram which he sent and which has been read and put on Hansard by the hon. member for Provencher. I refer to the telegram which was sent by the right hon. gentleman to Mr. Dickson.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it was on the basis of a telegram from Mr. Murphy, and so says on the face of it. The telegram was from Mr. Murphy. What does the hon. member mean by saying that?

Mr. GLEN: I mean this: A letter was addressed to the right hon. gentleman by Mr. Webb. It is dated August 23, 1935, and has been read in extenso by the hon. member for Provencher. One must assume that the letter was duly received by the leader of the opposition, and that he was aware of the fact that there was a desire on the part of Mr. Webb and on the part of the Conservative organization in Manitoba that these roads should be built.

Having received that letter and seeing its terms, we note that Mr. Webb bluntly says that the work was for political purposes, and also the further statement that even if the government of the right hon. gentleman did agree to carry out the building of the road, no money need be spent upon it, because the winter would be upon them and there would not be the opportunity to carry out the project.

What I do say is this—and I do not like to say it; I hate to have to do it—is that the right hon. leader of the opposition having received that letter and having again received a telegram from Mr. Murphy on September 4, asking for the construction of these roads, was bound to know and to have acceded to and be entirely cognizant of all the conditions under which these roads were to be built.

This casts the reflection upon the right hon. gentleman that for political purposes he was willing to aid the Conservative association in Manitoba at the request of his organizer. The statement is blatantly made, that it was for political purposes only. It is true that in the letter he made reference to relief, but that is negatived absolutely by the statement that there could be no relief given that year because of the lateness of the period in which the contracts would be let and the work begun.

Mr. BENNETT: What about the provincial government, without which it could not be done?

Mr. GLEN: The provincial government prior to that had already made the request that these roads should be built.

Mr. BENNETT: And they renewed it.

Mr. GLEN: Excuse me; I should like to finish.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. GLEN: The request was made on July 27, 1935, and was refused by the then Minister of Labour in the government headed by the right hon. gentleman. The provincial authorities had been anxious all along to build these roads, and had made requests to the government of the day. Those requests had been refused. But when a meeting took place in my own constituency where the then Conservative candidate, Mr. Peden, attended, with Senator Mullins, the former member, it was agreed to build these roads at the request of citizens in my constituency. And it was after that that these letters were sent and the road was ultimately agreed upon by the federal government.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not agreed upon by the federal government. My hon. friend must not misunderstand the facts. The federal government agreed to contribute half of the cost, and the province again urged that the road be built, and gave reasons for their attitude.

Mr. GLEN: The roads were built in agreement between the federal and provincial governments. That agreement was duly signed. The contribution was made by the federal government, and the roads were to be and since have been built under that agreement.

But when my right hon. friend speaks about patronge, let me tell the committee that not a man in my constituency, known to be a Liberal, could be employed in Riding Mountain park. At one time there were fifteen hundred to seventeen hundred men in the park. They had to have the consent of the then Minister of the Interior, Mr. Murphy, or his committee, and also the consent of the committee in my own constituency, before they could be employed. Let me give an illustration.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member must be misinformed. A large number of single unemployed persons were sent to that park, and hence the number there was so very large. No one knew anything about their politics.

Mr. GLEN: Not one of them dared declare he was a Liberal.

Mr. BENNETT: There was no question of their politics. They were unemployed and they were sent there from every part of Canada.

Mr. GLEN: Let me give my right hon. friend an illustration.

Mr. BENNETT: I know what I am talking about.

Mr. GLEN: When this park was opened, invitations were sent all around, but they were so anxious to keep out Liberals that they did not even invite the three members who had secured the park for Manitoba, the hon. member for Dauphin, the hon. member for Neepawa and myself.

Mr. BENNETT: You were not members of the house at that time.

Mr. GLEN: We were not members of the house, but we had secured the park for Manitoba. When I went into the park on the opening day I was astounded to see a man directing traffic who had been one of my strongest supporters. I stopped and asked him what he was doing there. He replied, "For heaven's sake, Jimmy, don't speak to me; if anyone sees me speaking to you, I will lose this job."

Mr. BENNETT: That is conclusive. That is helpful.

Mr. DUNNING: He did not hear that; he experienced that.

Mr. BENNETT: It is hearsay.

Mr. GLEN: That is what was happening all the time. Let me give another illustration. This story was told to me as being true. The Hon. Mr. Murphy certainly did well for the constituency of Neepawa. He provided plenty of jobs in that park. The day after the election when he was defeated, a man came up to the garage man in Neepawa and said to him, "What happened yesterday at the election? How was Murphy defeated?" The garage man said, "Just let me whisper this to you; we killed Santa Claus." That is how they viewed Mr. Murphy, as a Santa Claus.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid that is a manufactured story. That story originated in the United States.

Mr. GLEN: It was told to me as the truth.

Mr. BENNETT: That story is told in every election.

Mr. GLEN: I want to refer to the principle that was involved in the construction of works under the leader of the opposition. I do not know that there has ever been a time when one could say more positively: Here is political patronage at its very worst. A letter was sent from Mr. Webb, a gentleman who had been mayor I believe seven times and who is now a member of the provincial legislature, to the head of the federal government of that day, stating reasons why certain roads should be built. That request was granted by the leader of the government of that day. It has been suggested to me that they were to be started before October 10. I think it ill behooves the right hon. leader of the opposition to take the position he has taken to-day with regard to matters in the constituency of the Minister of Labour. If he had shown the same desire and regard in the past for proper dealing, then his argument to-day might have been much stronger. I do not defend patronage of that kind and I do not practise it. My constituents tell me that there are Tories now working in this park when a Liberal could not get a job during the Tory administration. I am being blamed for that. I agree with the statement made by the Prime Minister to the effect that we should endeavour to eliminate patronage in all forms of the civil and political service. I agree that we ought to do that in our political and public life. I believe the leader of the opposition has been ill advised in bringing to light these matters at a time when he is passing from public life. I felt I had to say what I have said because I know the facts in connection with patronage in that park.

Mr. MacNEIL: When this item was under consideration last year the minister intimated that he had under advisement an extension of the follow-up service with regard to the placement of young women, particularly in domestic service. I should like to know what steps have been taken to implement the assurance given last year?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not recall the precise statement to which my hon. friend refers. The federal government does not appoint the personnel in the various provincial employment offices. This is simply going over the ground that we covered yesterday when this item was under discussion. I shall be glad to look up the point mentioned by my hon. friend. There has been certainly no intentional oversight with respect to the matter, but I do not recall at the moment the precise point raised last year.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before this item carries, may I ask the right hon. leader of the opposition if, in view of the existence of the documents that have been read and placed on Hansard, and the statements contained therein which reveal a conspiracy to use public funds to corrupt the electorate in three constituencies on the part of himself and three other ministers of the crown when he was occupying the office of Prime Minister, he has nothing to say in defence of his action before this matter is allowed to drop?

Mr. BENNETT: The observations that I shall make will be made when the house resumes this evening. There is no warrant for any such language as that used by the Prime Minister. What is more, there is no authority for his statement in the letters that have been read. A personal and private communication written to me by a man outside the House of Commons is made the basis of an attack against me personally. I know there is no minister here this afternoon who has not received personal communications from various people complaining about the political effect of certain works to be done, but not one has been read from this side. But the hon. member read a personal communication which had been written to me marked "personal and confidential." A copy of that letter was read in this house by the right hon. gentleman's mouthpiece. The right hon. gentleman would not do it. He would not disgrace himself by doing that.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

PAUL SANSON WHITE

The house in committee on Bill No. 125, for the relief of Paul Sanson White—Mr. Hill. —Mr. Howden in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Right to marry again.

Mr. POULIOT: Mr. Chairman, speaking to this bill and others of a similar kind, I strongly object to having a bill of divorce in the statute books. I have protested already.

To my mind it is a shame that we should act as a tribunal just to dissolve marriages. Those people should be refused legislation of this kind; they should be sent to the provinces where there are courts of divorce. It is a real shame to see the long tale of divorces that is in every statute book of this parliament.

Section agreed to on division:

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

LOUISE MAUD THOMAS GREGORY

The house in committee on Bill No. 126, for the relief of Louise Maud Thomas Gregory —Mr. Factor—Mr. Howden in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Right to marry again.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Howden): Carried?

Mr. MARTIN: On division.

Mr. POULIOT: What do we know about these people? We have never seen them; we are not interested in them; we have never heard evidence concerning them; and we are acting as rubber stamps for these divorces. I strongly protest again.

Mr. SPENCE: Somebody else has seen them.

Section agreed to on division.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed on division.

EMMA KATHLEEN LAVERY FORESTER

The house in committee on Bill No. 127, for the relief of Emma Kathleen Lavery Forester —Mr. Graydon—Mr. Howden in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. POULIOT: I repeat, Mr. Chairman, this is rubber stamp business. I find this legislation foolish and disgusting. We know nothing of the parties and have to take for granted the evidence that is given in the Senate. Moreover, you will notice the type of investigators who give evidence in most of these cases. They are fellows who peep through keyholes—a disgusting kind of fellow. One of them once saw people misbehaving, when the curtain was about six inches from the window sill; and though he was three hundred feet away he saw everything that happened in the room and gave evidence. Another one looked through a keyhole. They are known as people who make money by blackmail most of the time. There is connivance. The senators ask the parties, "Is there any connivance?" The answer is, no; and they are satisfied with that answer, when there is evidence that there is connivance. I protest. It is a shame for this house to pass such legislation.

Mr. McIVOR: I understand that a bill on divorce is coming from the Senate, and I suggest that that will be the time for the hon. gentleman to make all the speeches possible. He will use his good judgment at that time.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I suggest to the hon. member that he advocate setting up real courts in Quebec such as there are in other provinces.

Mr. POULIOT: In answer to that, let me say that I am not an advocate of divorce courts or divorce mills, but when there are already divorce courts or divorce mills in any province those who want to take advantage of them can go where they are.

Mr. SPENCE: They do.

Mr. POULIOT: This is stupid legislation we have in front of us.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EDITH MARGARET CAMPBELL QUINN

The house in committee on Bill No. 128, for the relief of Edith Margaret Campbell Quinn —Mr. Hyndman—Mr. Howden in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. POULIOT: Here, again, I will make a valuable suggestion to the committee—I already made one the other day—that the Senate and the House of Commons refuse to pass such legislation. My suggestion to-day is that all parties who come here for divorce shall be sterilized before divorce is granted.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

DOROTHY MAUD DORAN GAY

The house in committee on Bill No. 129, for the relief of Dorothy Maud Doran Gay—Mr. White.—Mr. Howden in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. POULIOT: This is no gay matter and I protest again. I find the legislation stupid and I say that seriously. It is a shame for this parliament to pass such legislation and it is time for it to stop. Action must be taken and those who try to play the fool with us must be told this fact. Perhaps it would bring about reconciliation between them if they deserve to live in peace together.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

KATHLEEN BARNSLEY PRICHARD HARTNEY

The house in committee on bill No. 132, for the relief of Kathleen Barnsley Prichard Hartney—Mr. Jacobs.—Mr. Howden in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. POULIOT: Owing to the numerous protests against these bills, I suppose they are all adopted only on division.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Howden): Yes, they are carried on division.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

THOMAS RUSSELL

The house in committee on Bill No. 133, for the relief of Thomas Russell—Mr. Emmerson. —Mr. Howden in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Howden): Shall the section carry?

Mr. POULIOT: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

MARIE MARGUERITE AGNÊS MARCELLE DUPONT ROSS

The house, in committee on Bill No. 134, for the relief of Marie Marguerite Agnès Marcelle Dupont Ross—Mr. Jacobs.—Mr. Howden in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Howden): Shall the section carry?

Mr. POULIOT: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

WILFRED AUGUSTUS COTTLE STEAD

The house, in committee on Bill No. 135, for the relief of Wilfred Augustus Cottle Stead—Mr. Lennard.—Mr. Howden in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. Howden): Shall the section carry?

Mr. POULIOT: On division.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

CELIA CAPLAN TUCKER

The house, in committee on Bill No. 136, for the relief of Celia Caplan Tucker—Mr. Heaps.—Mr. Howden in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. POULIOT: I rise on this bill. It happens that I went through the evidence, which is of a most shameful and disgusting type. According to the evidence, the whole thing was arranged by the father-in-law, who organized the so-called frame-up, which was admitted by the husband. Notwithstanding that, the Senate declared itself favourable to the divorce. It is a repugnant case of a frame-up organized by the father-in-law, to the previous knowledge of the husband, and it is declared by the husband right there. I submit that the bill should not be voted upon like this in committee until hon. members have had an opportunity to read the evidence. It is of the most shameful and disgusting type; it is just a frame-up. I shall not say more because there are ladies in the gallery, but it is something revolting. We are making fools of ourselves by such legislation.

Section 2 agreed to.

Mr. POULIOT: On division.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

IRENE THOMAS SMITH

The house in committee on Bill No. 139, for the relief of Irene Thomas Smith—Mr. Walsh. —Mr. Howden in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. POULIOT: I do not object any more to-day, although I am against it, because I was so much disgusted by the evidence in the Tucker case which I picked up that I did not go through the others.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

SYLVIA SALZMAN UDASHKIN

The house in committee on Bill No. 140, for the relief of Sylvia Salzman Udashkin—Mr. Lawson.—Mr. Howden in the chair.

On section 1—Marriage dissolved.

Mr. POULIOT: It is something abominable.

Section agreed to on division.

Section 2 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed on division.

51952—237½

CONSIDERED IN COMMITTEE—THIRD READINGS

Bill No. 99, to incorporate the Maritime Provinces General Insurance Company.—Mr. Isnor.

Bill No. 121, to incorporate The Roman Catholic Episcopal Corporation of Hudson's Bay.—Mr. Boulanger.

Bill No. 130, respecting The Mail Printing Company.—Mr. Slaght.

Bill No. 131, respecting the Globe Printing Company.—Mr. Slaght.

Bill No. 141, for the relief of William Dougald Stanley Campbell.—Mr. White.

Bill No. 142, for the relief of Mildred Varner Macleod.—Mr. MacLean (Prince).

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Employment Offices Coordination Act, Administration, $63,925.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: When the house rose at six o'clock the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), speaking in reference to the correspondence which had been read to the committee by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien), made the statement that I myself would not have read this correspondence to the committee, but that I was using the hon. member for Provencher as—henchman I think was the expression used.

Mr. BENNETT: No, "mouthpiece" was the word I used.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As a mouthpiece to perform that service on my behalf. I wish to say at once that I had no word direct or indirect with the hon. member for Provencher with reference to his action in the committee to-day. I never said a word to him about any of the correspondence; I did not instruct anyone else to say a word to him on my behalf. His action was entirely his own as far as I know. That is the truth with regard to that matter.

Now, with respect to what actually took place, as will be recalled, some time ago an order was passed by this house for a return showing certain correspondence. This is what was called for and what was brought down. It was brought down yesterday, a return to an address to the House of Commons dated June 6, 1938 showing:

—a copy of all letters, telegrams, orders in council, agreements and other documents having to do with the construction of the Piney highway, Morden Sprague highway, Brandon Clear Lake highway, in Manitoba, carried on between the province of Manitoba and the dominion government, as well as all other correspondence in relation thereto, between the Minister of Labour, the Prime Minister and any other parties, between the dates of August 20, 1935, and October 15, 1935.

That was the correspondence which this house ordered should be tabled, correspondence to be taken from the files of the government department. The Minister of Labour, performing his obligation as a minister of the crown to bring down the correspondence asked for by this house, undoubtedly requested his deputy minister or some other official in his department to bring to him or to send to the Secretary of State all the correspondence on file and to have that correspondence prepared so that it might be tabled in this house by the Secretary of State, who would subsequently table it. The correspondence that was tabled came from the office of the Minister of Labour. It was all correspondence that related to the subject which this house had ordered should be dealt with in the return. The correspondence dated back to previous years and was laid on the table exactly as taken from the files of the department, not those of the present minister but in part those of the previous minister, the files that he had left in the department as a matter of record to justify his actions. I ask the committee to keep that circumstance in mind. We are being told by the right hon. leader of the opposition that certain letters which were on the files of the ex-Minister of Labour, and which he had left in the department as a record to justify his course, should not have been brought down.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say and did not suggest that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is the insinuation.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not suggest it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then we will come to what was actually done. What was the correspondence that was there? Here was the first communication, and I will ask the right hon. leader of the opposition if he will say that this letter should not have been brought down:

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Conservative Dominion Headquarters
Province of Manitoba
408 McIntyre Block,
Winnipeg, Man.,
August 23, 1935.

The Hon. Wesley Gordon, K.C., M.P., Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Gordon:

I would appreciate it very much indeed if you would kindly read the enclosed carefully. It does explain the situation and means so much to us, and in view of the new conditions that have arisen owing to the rust and extreme heat on the crops, it might be good justification for really doing something at this time as a special consideration. There is not the question of a doubt that if we do not do something many hundreds and thousands of these people in these districts will be applying to the provincial and federal governments for assistance this winter.

Yours very truly,
R. H. Webb,
Director for Manitoba.

I ask the right hon. leader of the opposition: Does he say the Minister of Labour should not have brought down that letter, when it was in the files; a letter making a straight appeal from one who, if I am not mistaken, was at the time the mayor of Winnipeg, or who certainly had held that position for many years; a letter addressed to the minister in his capacity as a minister of the crown; making an appeal to the Minister of Labour to do a certain thing to help relieve a situation; to use money of the federal government, which was intended for relief purposes, in order to provide for the construction of roads.

Mr. GLEN: That is not marked "confidential" either.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am just coming to that. This letter is not marked "personal and confidential." It was on the file as a public letter, a strictly official letter. It is not for me to say anything about what were the relations between the former Prime Minister and his colleagues, but I have pretty good reason for saying that Hon. Mr. Gordon, I have no doubt, felt the necessity of protecting himself with regard to all actions that were taken by his department; and I assume one reason why he left this letter on the file—if there was any reason why it should not be left there—was that he felt the necessity of being able to affirm what it was which occasioned the action that was taken. Now may I come to the next letter, but first let me refer again to these lines:

I would appreciate it very much indeed if you would kindly read the enclosed carefully. It does explain the situation and means so much to us . . .

"Read the enclosed carefully." What is the enclosed? There is only one enclosure, and that is the document which the leader of the opposition says should not have been brought down. He says that I would not have produced it, but that I had my mouthpiece, as he said, read it instead. I ask hon. members of the committee how the Minister of Labour, being ordered by the house to produce the documents that were on the file of the ex-Minister of Labour and lay them on the table, could have taken out of that file a communication that was not marked personal or private or a communication which was attached to a letter, which was referred to therein as "the enclosed" and which, it was stated, was placed there in order to explain the situation and explain it very carefully. The enclosure, when one looks at it, is not so much a personal, private letter. A personal, private letter is a communication that is sent to one person for his personal, private information, not to be passed on to others. This letter was much more in the nature of a circular than a personal, private letter. It was a circular letter to other ministers of the government of the day. It is headed:

Copy to the Hon. Wesley Gordon, K.C., M.P., Ottawa, Ontario.
Copy to the Hon. J. Earl Lawson, K.C., M.P., Ottawa, Ontario.
Copy to the Hon. Dr. R. J. Manion, M.P., Ottawa, Ontario.

Then after the words, "private and personal," and the date, August 23, 1935, there is the address:

The Right Hon. R. B. Bennett, P.C., K.C., M.P., Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

It is written to the right hon. gentleman as Prime Minister, and begins:

My dear Chief:

I need not read the whole of the letter, but here are some of the essential parts; this is what Mr. Webb was telling the Minister of Labour he must consider as the reasons why the government of the day should appropriate a large sum of money for the construction of certain roads. The amount, I believe, was something like $1,365,000, and here are the reasons set forth why that amount should be appropriated for the purpose mentioned:

My dear Chief:

I have just come in from the constituencies of Lisgar, Provencher and St. Boniface particularly, and the situation at the moment is very good there politically, but it needs the necessary impetus to carry on.

I have already written to the Hon. J. Earl Lawson, the Hon. Dr. R. J. Manion and the Hon. Wesley Gordon and the Hon. T. G. Murphy with regard to the two roads in these three constituencies that are vital factors in this election campaign, and they have the whole story in detail, both verbally and in writing.

The house is denied the whole story as the ministers of the crown of that day had it. I am not at all sure that it would not be advisable for us to call the public accounts committee together and get the whole story. I agree with the right hon. leader of the opposition that this business of trying to corrupt and bribe constituencies with public money is something that must be stopped if it possibly can be; but I do not think to that end we need waste the time of this House of Commons as it has been wasted in these last two days with the right hon. leader of the opposition devoting two complete sessions of this house to what? To talking about what I think is generally described as one of the lowest forms of ward politics; insinuations as to how this man and that man, whose names are unknown to anyone or were unknown until placed on Hansard to-day, received or were denied this or that consideration, or were expected to do this or that for some political reason. I say it is wasting the time of this parliament to talk of that sort of thing when you have the written evidence that a prime minister and several of his colleagues sat together and conspired—that is not too strong a word—to see how three constituencies in a province could be won, by means of money appropriated by this parliament for purposes of relief, and worked hand in glove to that end with the political organizer of a province. That is the kind of thing that needs looking into, and that is the sort of thing that needs to be stopped. That is what we have in the correspondence tabled to-day. Let me read more:

As a political measure, it assures us without any question of a doubt these three seats which we badly want to win, and which look very good for us at the present time. . . . I feel that we should play the game politically . . . If the federal government would advise of participation in these two roads, it would be good politics; it would call the provincial government's bluff; it would kill the propaganda that the Liberals are carrying on at the present time; it would assure us of a victory in these three seats and—

Then comes—and I do not think it is too strong a term to use—the most contemptible part of it all:

—and in my humble opinion will not have cost the federal government anything, because by the time the work is organized the election will be over, and winter will be upon us, and perhaps very little work will have been done before the end of the present fiscal year.

Ending up with:

And politically it means victory for us.

The right hon. the leader of the opposition said he was watching with interest to see whether the new Minister of Labour, with his high ideals in public life, would be able to destroy the machine, the political machine, or whether he would be overborne or crushed by it. And yet the leader of the opposition himself when Prime Minister of this country was conspiring with his colleagues not only to help that political machine, but to oil it and to give it power to destroy free will and its expression at the polls of the people of Manitoba in three specified constituencies. How far this was the method generally adopted, who can say?

I have not time to go through the correspondence; I wish simply to bring home some outstanding points. Looking at the order in council, and its date in relation to this earlier correspondence, the whole story is there, as complete as it can be—an order put through on the eve of an election, just for the purpose of letting these poor people who were then so hard pressed in the province of Manitoba—starving, many of them, as the right hon. the leader of the opposition would say—believe that at last help was coming from the public treasury.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: And the work was to be there by the tenth of October.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And the work was to be there, and all would be well. But in the back of the minds of all these gentlemen there was the knowledge or intention that as soon as the election was over—no more work—whether the people starved or did not starve. I say that in all Canadian history there has never been an exposure of corruption and corrupt political methods so disgraceful.

Mr. BENNETT: Read this! Beauharnois! Beauharnois! Read that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Beauharnois is a shadow compared with this thing. The right hon. the leader of the opposition comes along and shouts, "Beauharnois"! And after all his talk about Beauharnois, he sits in a cabinet and as Prime Minister does something that is infinitely worse than anything ever done by any of those connected with Beauharnois, more than anything that was done by men who were not even members of the House of Commons.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite; and neither was Webb.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, but my right hon. friend was Prime Minister.

Mr. BENNETT: And so were you!

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But I had not any knowledge of the evils my right hon. friend speaks about.

Mr. BENNETT: The record shows you had.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I had not, and my right hon. friend knows it. He himself was the engineer in this whole business. He sent directions as to what should be done over the head of his own minister, telling what was to be done.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact, it does not say in the telegram what he was to do.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Why did you send it, then?

Mr. BENNETT: He intimated to me that it had been received from the Minister of the Interior. The record is there, and I say the Prime Minister is bound by it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend has spoken about Beauharnois.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He talks about Beauharnois in this house, and he talked about Beauharnois across this country from coast to coast, with what results? With the result that he came back to this parliament with his party defeated, with his party emasculated, well-nigh annihilated, and without a following behind him worthy of the name, leaving some of the provinces of this country without a single Conservative member, and with what further result? The Conservative party is not only obliterated for the time being, but, as we saw by the election two days ago, is obliterated possibly for all time as a party. And what at the same time was the verdict, with respect to myself, by the people of this country? The man whom he sought to condemn is sent back to this parliament with the largest following any leader of a political party or any Prime Minister in Canada has ever had. I tell my right hon. friend that for what has been disclosed to-day the people of this country will pass judgment upon him some day.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to this matter he will get out of all this before judgment is passed in this house; but let me tell him that the judgment which will follow him is the record of this House of Commons of to-day; the record of his own words will follow him for the remainder of his term in this house; they will follow him to the end of his days, and they will remain a judgment against him as long as a record of this parliament remains.

Mr. WALSH: I assume this house is still discussing item No. 103, is that right?

Mr. BENNETT: Item No. 108.

Mr. WALSH: There were certain items discussed during the course of this afternoon that did not create a very gratifying reflection upon the present government. I notice that whenever a person or a government is confronted with a difficult proposition, it attempts to cover up by the throwing of mud, and the raking up of past history. I do not see that what the Prime Minister has said to-night, or the snickering grin and laughter of the Minister of National Defence—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Thank you.

Mr. WALSH: —in any way eradicates the suggestion that was made from the opposition benches this afternoon in connection with the work that is being done in and around the city of Kingston.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. WALSH: It was my privilege to visit—

Mr. BENNETT: The commandant's report.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have it here.

Mr. WALSH: —my native city last week-end. I want to say to the committee that it is common gossip on the streets of Kingston—

Mr. DUNNING: "Gossip" is right.

Mr. WALSH: Yes, gossip is right. And I want to say this in passing, to the Minister of National Defence, that when the opportunity comes to look into the details of his department we shall then be able to see to what extent political debauchery and corruption have crept into that particular department of government.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Do it now.

Mr. BENNETT: No; that item is not before the committee.

Mr. WALSH: It is not possible to do it now, but the time will come when we shall look into it.

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. WALSH: I shall come back to the city of Kingston.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): You had better.

Mr. WALSH: I can go there with my head in the air, and be respected by the citizens of the city of Kingston. I was saying that it is common gossip—

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, gossip.

Mr. WALSH: I was saying that it is street gossip, everyone is talking about it in the city of Kingston, as to what is being done in connection with public works there. I want to say this in passing, that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) personally is not in any way being blamed for the condition that has arisen there.

An hon. MEMBER: Blame your leader.

Mr. WALSH: I say that in all fairness.

An hon. MEMBER: You cannot be fair.

Mr. WALSH: I could not be fair with some people, because some people do not know what the word "fair" actually means. I do not consider that the Minister of Labour himself has in any way connived at what has developed there. Unfortunately, what has developed is the creature of our political system. The sooner the two major parties and the two minor parties of this house get together as public-spirited men and women, the sooner shall we eradicate this sort of business from the political life of our country. As I sat here and listened to what one government was said to have done in the past, and to what another government was said to be doing at the present time, I wondered what the people of Canada were going to think when they read their daily newspaper to-morrow morning or to-morrow evening. The reflection that has been cast upon democracy as it exists in Canada to-day is not at all gratifying. For this government to sit here and suggest that they are doing these things because it was done to an even greater extent in the past—

Mr. DUNNING: That was never suggested by anybody.

Mr. WALSH: Why rake up past history? Why go into old history to bolster up what I consider to be a rather weak case? The question before the committee is a serious one as far as public life is concerned. The right hon. Prime Minister boasts of a very large following. Fortunately for him and for his party they are the creatures of peculiar circumstances. He takes credit for the great victory achieved by the Liberal party in 1935. Any person with any degree of knowledge of past political history will be able to analyse the situation that developed in 1935 and made it almost impossible for any other action to be taken by the Canadian people. From 1930 to 1935 this country was governed by a leader and a government who did everything in their power to remedy a serious condition. During that time they received little or no assistance from those sitting in opposition. The country went through a difficult period, and if we analyse the conditions of that time we can see readily how the people had not the time prior to 1935 to appreciate what had actually been done by the government which was in office from 1930 to 1935.

Mr. GLEN: What about Saskatchewan?

Mr. WALSH: I do not think the Liberal members can take a great deal of real satisfaction out of the victory in Saskatchewan. If you will have written on the records of Hansard; if you will have published and broadcast from one end of Canada to the other exactly what did take place in Saskatchewan, I can assure you that the people will be more disgusted with that phase of democratic government than they will with what exists here in Ottawa at the present time. Everything that was possible to be used was used in Saskatchewan.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Does my hon. friend not agree with the decision of Saskatchewan?

Mr. WALSH: I do not agree with the conditions that brought about the decision in Saskatchewan. Any one who does agree with those conditions has no right to continue in public life.

Mr. TURGEON: What are the conditions with which you do not agree?

Mr. WALSH: You are more familiar with them than I. I have an idea of what took place out there, but it is not as good an idea as my hon. friend's.

Mr. McNIVEN: Does my hon. friend agree with what happened in Manitoba prior to the 1935 election?

Mr. WALSH: I want to come back to this discussion. The Liberal party has complained of third parties in the field.

Mr. DUNNING: Never.

Mr. BRADETTE: The more the merrier.

Mr. WALSH: You have complained of the "more," but not of the "merrier." There is every reason to expect third parties in the field in Canada, and fourth parties as well. If conditions in public life, as exemplified by the statements of the leader of the opposition and the Prime Minister, are allowed to continue unremedied, the people of this country are bound to ask for a different form of government. If any member of this house is interested in the survival of democracy in Canada, he will not aid and abet what has taken place and what is taking place in our public offices, but will make a serious endeavour to clean the slate, start over again and give democracy a real chance. I do not see why we cannot be businesslike in the expenditure of public moneys. I do not see why we cannot expend public money just as we expend our private funds. I do not see any reason why there should be a suggestion in this house that there is a conspiracy to give only Liberals jobs when a Liberal government is in power.

Mr. DUNNING: We cannot prevent you from saying that. That is the trouble; you say it whether it is true or not.

Mr. WALSH: I would not say it if it did not exist. I started out like the Minister of Labour. I was in an academic institution, and during the course of my campaign in 1935 I gave utterance to words very similar to those uttered by the minister. I had my high ideals and, like him, I still have them. I hope I am going to be able to maintain them despite what I have had to listen to in this chamber during the course of this evening and this afternoon. If we had less laughter from the treasury benches and more serious contemplation of what is taking place in government circles, this matter would be remedied.

Mr. DUNNING: What we want is more truth in opposition statements.

Mr. WALSH: There are several points that could be brought up, but I see no reason for doing so. I think this matter has been emphasized sufficiently, and I feel sure that members of the house have come to the realization that something must be done in order to prevent a continuation of a practice that apparently has grown up and rooted itself in our democracy. This practice does not belong there. I feel quite sure that the Minister of Labour will be among the first to make an effort to eradicate this system, root and all. I have sufficient confidence in the Prime Minister and in those associated with him to feel that they are ready to assist this country out of the quagmire in which it is at present. It is unfortunate that this discussion has developed. It is unfortunate that we have had to refer to conditions that exist in Kingston. I do not associate those conditions with the Minister of Labour, but I do associate them with what we have allowed to grow up. As parliamentarians we ought to be bigger men. We should rise up in firm determination to eliminate these conditions from the public life of Canada so that the people may have their faith reestablished in the democratic form of government that exists in Canada to-day.

Mr. ROGERS: I assure members of the committee that no one deplores more than I do that two full days should have been occupied in the kind of discussion we have had here. I am in the judgment of the committee when I say that, in view of the statements made on several occasions by the leader of the opposition, I had no recourse but to meet those charges, and my colleagues had no recourse but to meet such charges. My hon. friend who has just spoken has expressed the view that as Minister of Labour I have a certain sense of obligation with respect to the duties of my office. I hope I have.

When the leader of the opposition first brought these matters to the attention of the house, I asked him to let me have any complaints which he might have received, and said that I would take the earliest opportunity of dealing with them. He referred specifically to Fort Henry, and he certainly designedly created the impression that no one but a Liberal could secure employment on the work at Fort Henry. I told him without the slightest hesitation some days ago that in my view, on relief work which is done in cooperation with the provinces, for which money is paid out of relief votes of this parliament, there should not be discrimination, and that whenever I received complaints of discrimination they were investigated without the slightest delay. My right hon. friend simply made the statement, that so far as he understood—he occasionally admitted that his recollection was faulty—none but Liberals would receive employment on the work at Fort Henry.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say that.

Mr. ROGERS: I beg the right hon. gentleman's pardon.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say that.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, that was certainly the implication of what my right hon. friend said.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not say that.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall look up Hansard to correct that impression if it is incorrect. Immediately after that, I wrote to the Frid Construction Company, which had the contract for that work at Fort Henry, and I also wrote to the chief relief officer in the city of Kingston. I received first from the chief relief officer in the city of Kingston this letter; it is from Colonel Pense:

I have spoken to Mr. J. K. Fraser, chairman of the social welfare committee, in regard to your letter of the 16th instant.

There is no hesitation in saying that no political considerations have ever entered into the administration of the social welfare department of Kingston; any names that have been submitted to the employment office were submitted without regard to any political affiliations the person might, or might not, have.

The letter from the Frid Construction Company is in the following terms:

Your letter re selecting applicants for employment on our contract at Fort Henry duly received, and I am glad of the opportunity of explaining this to you.

The clause re labour in our contract stated that our company was allowed to employ twenty-five per cent of our own men. The other seventy-five per cent we were obliged to take through the government employment office in Kingston.

From the beginning when men were required we called the employment office, and these men were all sent to us with an employment office card. These men as far as our superintendent was concerned were never asked as to their political affiliations. We required only that the men employed must be able to perform their work in a satisfactory manner, otherwise they were paid off.

Regarding the twenty-five per cent which we were allowed to hire ourselves. They of course were of our own selecting, mostly foreman, clerks and skilled workmen. In each case we naturally picked the best men available for the different positions.

It has never been the policy of our company either on this or any other job, to ask the employees questions pertaining to their political affiliations or religious beliefs. In every case the prime requisite for employees is their ability to handle work well and efficiently.

In one or two cases only, men were recommended to us by friends, and we did see they got work under our twenty-five per cent quota, and if they turned out to be good men we kept them on.

I am enclosing some private correspondence I had regarding these workmen for your information.

I am reluctant to mention these few cases as the men given employment were heads of families and in very dire straits, and we did feel justified in doing this, as their employment meant so little when compared to the total number of men employed.

Our company has carried out the labour part of our agreement very carefully and we believe to the satisfaction of Mr. Hudson who is general superintendent, Ontario government office, employment service of Canada. I am enclosing letter we received from him under date of April 14, 1937, which speaks for itself.

In that enclosure the head of the Frid Construction Company does acknowledge that he did receive certain recommendations from a member of parliament, and I think I should say that to the members of the committee. Does the leader of the opposition feel there was anything out of the way in that?

Mr. BENNETT: Not the slightest—

Mr. ROGERS: I am glad that he does not.

Mr. BENNETT: —because the contract provides that the head of this company is to have his own foremen and that he is to get the balance of the labour under the Ontario employment commission.

Mr. ROGERS: Precisely.

Mr. BENNETT: And it is because the head of the Ontario employment commission took the position he did, as I indicated yesterday, that I complained. I never complained about the Frid Construction Company.

Mr. ROGERS: I am entirely in agreement with that statement, because the only letter he received from a member of parliament was from a member on the opposition side. And I may say that two and possibly three men were placed because of requests made by one of the friends of my right hon. friend. I should also say this, that two of the sub-contracts on the work at Fort Henry were given to Conservatives in Kingston, and those actively in charge of the work are members of the Conservative association in the city of Kingston and control entirely the employees whom they use on that part of the work.

My right hon. friend complained this afternoon of the cost of the work at Fort Henry. He said it had already reached close to a million.

Mr. BENNETT: I said it was nearer a million than seventy thousand.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, that is correct, but my right hon. friend allowed himself considerable latitude in making that statement.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what he said.

Mr. ROGERS: That is quite correct. That is the statement he made, that it was nearer a million than seventy thousand, but certainly the inference was that it was a gigantic expenditure.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that it was several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. ROGERS: Strictly, up to date the expenditure has been $498,000, of which the dominion government has contributed one-half, which is under $250,000. I gave the committee this afternoon the conditions respecting the tenders which were invited for that work. I might say that in each year, 1936 and 1937, tenders were publicly advertised, advertised in the public journals, in the Globe and Mail, and in certain trade papers.

Mr. BENNETT: Could the hon. gentleman give me a little information respecting that? I have a copy of the specifications respecting the first tender, June 30, 1936. Can he fix the date of the second?

Mr. ROGERS: My information is that the second tender was awarded in March, 1937. The first tender was for $72,000. The work was actually extended beyond that on the same unit prices, as I explained this afternoon. The second tender was for $305,000. That is the information I have.

Mr. BENNETT: Were tenders called for the second contract?

Mr. ROGERS: Tenders were called for the second contract.

Mr. BENNETT: Public tenders?

Mr. ROGERS: Public tenders, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not a copy of these specifications.

Mr. ROGERS: I am giving my information. My right hon. friend also went on to say this afternoon that in connection with the disposal of certain huts which were left when the relief camps were closed, there had been irregularities.

Mr. BENNETT: Not huts. I said—

Mr. ROGERS: Equipment. These are his words:

> There were two camps in and around Kingston. Camp 42 was one and camp 37 was the other. Both camps were closed by the government. There was much clothing and supplies in one of those camps. They were placed in a storeroom. They were sold. And in a public meeting one of the electors of Kingston, at Sydenham, gave illustrations as to the prices received for them and the method of their disposition—horses, wagons and costly equipment. Who got it, and at what price? And it is a singular coincidence that within four hours after the conclusion of that speech at Sydenham the storehouse was on fire.

Mr. DUNNING: That is what he said.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; that is what I said.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, certainly my right hon. friend must have had it in his mind to create some impression by his statement. I am bound to say that after reading that statement I am not yet clear as to what precisely he had in mind. Actually the disposal of the equipment of the relief camps was undertaken by the salvage officer of the dominion government. The huts themselves, as I explained previously to the committee, were not given to friends of the administration in power; they were disposed of at a nominal price to various welfare organizations. I have a list of them here, if my right hon. friend desires them.

Mr. BENNETT: I made no observations about the huts.

Mr. ROGERS: As to the fire, my information is that the fire occurred in a hut which was used for storage purposes by the signal corps at Barriefield. The contents of the hut were fully insured and the insurance was paid. That is my information at the present time. Obviously, therefore, there is nothing whatever in that statement. My right hon. friend also made some charge with respect to the movement of cement from one contract held by the Frid Construction Company to another contract held by the same company in the city of Kingston. Here again I have lost no time in securing information, and if he had written me a letter I could have given him the information within twenty-four hours and saved the time of the house by doing so. The cement for the Crain building, which is being constructed at Queen's, was borrowed from the Fort Henry job with the consent of the provincial authorities, and it was returned to that job on the following dates: November 1, 1,000 bags; January 17, 750 bags.

Mr. BENNETT: Why were the empty bags taken to Fort Henry?

Mr. ROGERS: My information is that talk about the returning of empty bags to Fort Henry is utter rot; that is the memorandum I have. It reads:

> The talk about returning the empty bags to Fort Henry from Crain building is utter rot. In the old days when cement was put up in canvas sacks they were returnable and had a value. For quite a few years the department of highways has been purchasing its cement, as do most users, in paper bags which are not returnable. The cement referred to in two items above was ordered by Frid, charged to Crain job and then transferred to the Fort job.

Mr. BENNETT: I made it perfectly clear that they were paper sacks.

Mr. ROGERS: So that there is nothing left of that charge.

Mr. BENNETT: Were they sent up there at night, and if so, for what purpose?

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend is confusing his charges. The cement was not taken at night.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that; I said the bags.

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend said that twenty-five containers of white lead were taken after midnight.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not cement.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, the committee will pardon me if I confuse the cement, white lead, cut stone and various other materials—

Mr. BENNETT: Cut flowers and cast-iron pipe.

Mr. ROGERS: —that have been brought into the discussion; but up to the present time I have not been able to discover that there have been at any time on the Fort Henry job or at camp 42 as many as twenty-five containers of white lead. My information is that at camp 42 there had never been more than one or two cans of white lead required for their purpose, and not more than one can had been required for work at Fort Henry. What, therefore, is left of that charge, I confess I do not know. I have tried to get the information, and that is as much as I have at the present time.

My right hon. friend also had something to say about some stone which apparently had gone in some clandestine way from the Royal Military College to the grounds of Mr. Stansbury. Again, to the best of my ability, I have not been able to discover the slightest scintilla of evidence which would support that charge. I dealt this afternoon with his first charge, that Mr. Stansbury had built his garage from public property, and my strong conviction is that there is just about as much foundation for his second charge as there was for his first. My right hon. friend, in speaking of the way in which he dealt with employment, said that in Calgary the names were put into a hat and drawn from the hat. Am I correct?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I was told; I was not there.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. BENNETT: Everyone knows that I was not in Calgary. The mayor told me that was the way in which it was dealt with.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think it is unfair to suggest that it would have been a very good thing if that hat had been preserved in some way, because it was the only hat used for that purpose when my right hon. friend was in power. However, I will read a letter which was sent to the leader of the opposition on May 23, 1935, from Charles E. Scott, recording secretary of local No. 1779 of the Carpenters and Joiners of America.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister any idea when the letter was received?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It was a letter that came to me when I was leader of the opposition. It was sent by the union. It was sent by the carpenters' union when I was in the position now occupied by the leader of the opposition. It stated what was taking place in Calgary in the matter of giving employment to men, and the letter was put on Hansard at the time.

Mr. BENNETT: To whom is it addressed?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I was then leader of the opposition and it was addressed to me as such.

Mr. ROGERS: The letter refers to the barracks then being built at Calgary under the Department of National Defence.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister said that it was addressed to me.

Mr. ROGERS: I correct that statement; it was addressed to the present Prime Minister when he was leader of the opposition. That, of course, need not affect the subject matter of the letter.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a bit.

Mr. ROGERS: The letter reads:

The members of the above local wish to inform you that when the building of the barracks at Calgary was announced it was generally accepted that the available work would be spread out to afford a maximum of assistance to the various classes of craftsmen which it might employ.

Contractors opened lists for the carpenters who had worked for them at various periods, and many workmen hoped that after waiting many months for the work to begin that at least they would be able to get a few days' employment. Now we are to understand that the only hope of ever getting work on the barracks job is when his name is on the approved list which is furnished to the contractors.

The members of Local No. 1779 request that when parliament is opened a protest be vigorously made against the practice of using this patronage list, as it is debarring carpenters who are loyal and have been citizens of this country for the last twenty-five to thirty years, also a large percentage of the members being ex-service men. Owing to this approved list being used certain carpenters are being given employment by the various contractors on the scheme, thereby making it impossible for others to get employment.

Trusting you will give this appeal your greatest consideration.

Yours truly,
per Charles E. Scott,
Recording Secretary.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the date of it?

Mr. ROGERS: It is in Hansard of May 23, 1935. It will be found at page 3035. Now, in view of my right hon. friend's statement yesterday, surely he will agree that there is a sharp contradiction—

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. BENNETT: Not in the least. The list furnished was the list provided by drawings from the hat. That is exactly what happened.

Mr. ROGERS: I am content to read the letter again, but that is what I might regard as an extremely forced construction of the letter as it stands.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not there, but the mayor told me that that was how they brought peace and harmony into the field.

Mr. ROGERS: So far as I am concerned—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My right hon. friend did not say that it was the mayor. What he said was:

In my own community I know that effect was given to that endeavour by putting the names in a hat and having them drawn.

Mr. BENNETT: I know from the mayor's statement that he did it. That is sufficient for my purpose.

Mr. POULIOT: Why is not the hat produced as evidence?

Mr. ROGERS: In conclusion, may I say that with regard to employment at the present time I propose to continue to see, so far as in me lies, that when that work is conducted as relief work we shall obtain the strictest observance possible of the clause with respect to discrimination.

As far as other casual vacancies which become available from time to time are concerned, if these are to be taken under the control of the civil service commission, well and good; but if they are not, I do not hesitate to take responsibility as a member of parliament for any recommendations which I make. I am not prepared to say whether or not that is the best course finally to follow. But in conclusion I would suggest that a great deal of this debate, perhaps all of it, could have been avoided if my right hon. friend, instead of accepting these rumours and suspicions and gossip which came to him from sources which I think I know in Kingston—which gossip and rumours he made no real effort to corroborate before bringing to this committee—had made an effort to test the truth of them, or had brought them to the attention of the department best fitted to deal with them, he would have rendered a far greater service to the country than he did yesterday and this afternoon.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Having been mentioned this afternoon and again this evening by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), it is my desire now to refer to three specific issues raised by the right hon. gentleman in the course of this debate. He referred to a question which has been dealt with in part by my colleague the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) with respect to the sale of certain supplies from projects 37 and 42 in the vicinity of Barriefield. I have here a departmental memorandum which describes in the fullest and most complete way all the transactions that took place at Barriefield, and apart from what was mentioned by my colleague, that most of the equipment there was given to charitable institutions, I find that two sales were made from project 37 through the salvage officer, who is an officer of this government, and who was not a member of the Department of National Defence. One sale was to J. Cohen & Company of Kingston from project 37, as follows:

1 concrete mixer with motor.
1 buggy, concrete.
2,800 feet steel rail.
16 wheelbarrows.
1 drill.
2 cars, side-dump.

The other sale, made to M. J. Dolan, 289 Princess street, Kingston, consisted of:

9 sets harness, artillery, converted.
228 lamps, wall.
Total, $101.58.

The records of the department indicate that vehicles were transferred from project 42 to other government departments as follows:

Carts, concrete, 7, transferred to Department of Public Works.
Wagons, dump, 3, transferred to Department of Mines and Resources.
Wagon gear, 1, transferred to Department of Mines and Resources.

This committee heard this afternoon certain suggestions made with reference to horses, etc. The official departmental memorandum is as follows:

In September 1937 representations were received to the effect that certain stores and equipment, that is, cement, paint, and Bain wagons, were given or sold at inadequate prices to neighbouring farmers. The matter was investigated. The report received indicated that the only Bain wagons used at project 42 were privately-owned and were brought in with hired teams of horses; also that there were no shortages in stores, including paint or cement.

With respect to this alarming fire with which the right hon. gentleman tried to stir up the waning enthusiasm of his miserable remnant over there—

Mr. BENNETT: A matter of order, Mr. Chairman. The hon. member is very apt at that sort of thing to-day. But he cannot call any hon. members of this chamber miserable remnants. The rule is very clear on that point.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Well, if the remark is in the slighest degree unpleasant, I have the greatest pleasure in withdrawing it.

Mr. BENNETT: No, I rise again to a point of order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have withdrawn it. With respect to this fire, this sinister fire, in the cold hours of the angry dawn, about which the right hon. gentleman was endeavouring to stir up a tremendous suspicion, I wish to tell the committee that a most thorough investigation was held by the Department of National Defence, and no blame was found attributable to any individual. A meeting took place, and four hours after the meeting a fire. Hence this scandal referred to this afternoon by the right hon. gentleman.

Now we have something still worse. Where does all this tittle-tattle come from? Where does this street gossip of the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) come from? I think I know. And I am going to tell. The other afternoon in the house, referring to a tender of the Department of National Defence the right hon. leader of the opposition made this accusation: He said we did not give the contract to the lowest bidder, and so lost thousands of dollars to the country. Well, I want to tell the committee something about the gentleman whom the right hon. leader of the opposition was defending. I had some evidence before me; it was not of a political nature I can assure my right hon. friend; but his information has been derived from a gentleman concerning whom I shall read an affidavit, showing that he was guilty of the most vicious malpractice with reference to contracts with the government of Ontario. Possessing that knowledge which came to me as a responsible minister, I refused, and instructed my deputy minister to refuse, to allow the contract to go to that gentleman. Why? This is not street gossip. This is an affidavit of Alfred Leonard Gibson of the village of Kemptville in the county of Grenville, superintendent:

1. I am superintendent of the Eastern Dairy School of the Ontario Department of Agriculture.

2. The Eastern Dairy School was carried on at Kingston, Ontario, until April, 1936.

3. During the period August 1, 1932, to July 31, 1933, coal was supplied to the said school by Sowards Coal Company of Kingston, Ontario, at the price of $6.50 per ton, four deliveries of coal having been made during that period; the amounts of the deliveries being 63 tons, 1,060 lbs.; 63 tons, 1,303 lbs.; 63 tons, 1,410 lbs.; and 55 tons, 250 lbs. respectively, the total cost for the period being $1,599.08.

4. During the period August 1, 1933, to July 31, 1934, coal was supplied to the said school by the Sowards Coal Company of Kingston, Ontario, at the price of $6.50 per ton, five deliveries of coal having been made during that period; the amounts of the deliveries being 54 tons, 1,700 lbs.; 50 tons, 345 lbs.; 56 tons, 550 lbs.; 42 tons, 500 lbs.; and 32 tons, 1,140 lbs. respectively, the total cost for the period being $1,534.75.

5. During the period August 1, 1934, to July 31, 1935, coal was supplied to the said school by the Morris Coal Company of Kingston, Ontario, at the price of $7 per ton, four deliveries of coal having been made during that period; the amounts of the deliveries being 40 tons, 1,425 lbs.; 30 tons, 1,030 lbs.; 41 tons, 230 lbs.; and 40 tons, 385 lbs. respectively, the total cost for the period being $1,067.73.

6. I measured the coal storage at the said school and according to measurements and the cubical contents of the said storage space it would be impossible to put more than 50 tons of dry coal into the coal storage space.

And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing it to be true . . .

The declaration was sworn before George J. McIlraith on June 4, 1938.

I want to reiterate the essential portion of that declaration. During the winters of 1931-32, 1932-33 and 1933-34 the average cost of coal purchased per annum was $1,422. All these purchases were made from the James Sowards Coal Company of Kingston, at a price of $6.50 per ton for all the coal with the exception of one small order of forty-one tons at $7 a ton. For the winters of 1934-35 and 1935-36 the average cost for coal for the same institution was $854. This coal was purchased not from the Sowards coal company but from another Kingston company which supplied coal at $7 a ton.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the name of the firm?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): So I ask the committee to consider this: If it cost that institution $1,422 per annum for its fuel requirements when dealing with one company, and $854 per annum when dealing with another company at a higher price per ton, if you please, certainly to me it would appear quite obvious that it was not in the public interest to deal with a company like the Sowards company in any part of the Dominion of Canada. The one who is the chief informer in regard to the comedy we have witnesed during the last two days, who has been endeavouring to shove sixty-three tons of coal into a fifty-ton storage bin, does not deserve the support of any self-respecting minister of the crown in Canada.

I come now to something else. Did you hear these sinister, subterranean, surreptitious whispers this afternoon about a report that was made by the commandant of the Royal Military College at Kingston, some report dealing with rock, some mysterious rock that disappeared in the night? I asked one of the highest ranking militia officers in the department—not my deputy minister—to telephone the commandant of the Royal Military College with reference to this report; and, Mr. Chairman, there is no report. It was all a fabrication; it was all imagination, a dream on the part of the right hon. gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT: At last.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I want now to deal with the hon. member for Mount Royal, who made the statement a few minutes ago that there was debauchery—I think that was the word he used—in the Department of National Defence.

Mr. WALSH: For want of a better term.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I want to tell my hon. friend right now that he has certain duties and obligations in this house, and if he knows anything against the honour or integrity of the minister or any officer of this department let him have enough manliness to rise in his place now, make a charge and place his seat in jeopardy, as a gentleman of honour, with reference to these rumours he has been pretending to tell about.

Mr. WALSH: Would the minister permit me to suggest—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think I am in order, Mr. Chairman. I cannot imagine anything more despicable than such action on the part of any hon. gentleman. I might remind the hon. member that at the commencement of this session I offered the right hon. leader of the opposition the hon. gentlemen opposite the opportunity, by a special resolution of this house, to call together the public accounts committee one year in advance of the time that is fixed by parliament, in order to investigate any single feature of any of the business of the Department of National Defence. What did they do? They refused that offer, but now the hon. member for Mount Royal rises in his place and talks about debauchery and something else. Will my hon. friend follow that up? Will he do it now? I challenge him; I dare him; I defy him to do it now, instead of slinking in his seat, skulking in his place. Let him do it like a man; let him place his seat in jeopardy and make some specific charge with reference to the Department of National Defence. For two days now, Mr. Chairman, we have listened to these sinister rumours. Why, if we wanted to recall what occurred between 1930 and 1935, what could we say? I know what happened in Calgary; I know what happened in Vancouver; I know what happened in the relief camps of British Columbia; and I think I know now, for the first time, what happened to "my dear chief" in Manitoba.

However, the business of the country must be carried on, despite these unfortunate interruptions; and the right hon. leader of the opposition never did himself less justice than he did this afternoon. According at least to the accepted rumours in the journals of the country, this gentleman of great experience, who has been Prime Minister of this great nation, is leaving public life. He should have gone out with the halo of public esteem about his head; but he has misspent the last two days in imputing motives, repeating petty rumours about some stone that cost two or three dollars, while on the other hand a letter was read from the mayor of Winnipeg, the director of the Conservative party in Manitoba, involving a total expenditure of $1,365,000. I want to tell my right hon. friend and hon. gentlemen opposite, on the eve of this convention of theirs, that this government is in a fighting mood and is going to go right through with the Liberal policy, to sweep through this country as it did once before.

An hon. MEMBER: Waking up at last.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My hon. friend may wake up about ten years from now. He will certainly wake up after the Tory convention is over. I want to tell my hon. friend that on the record of this government for the last five months, especially this magnificent piece of legislation introduced by the Minister of Finance, and the record of three years of solid achievement, with the rebuttal of these foolish, sinister and subterranean charges and rumours, we shall go on and on, fighting the battles of the people as we believe in fighting them for the cause of real progress, real democracy and real Liberalism.

Mr. SLAGHT: Mr. Chairman, I rise to make some observations with reference to the attack launched during the last two days against the Minister of Labour and the government by the right hon. leader of the opposition. His speeches and statements, shortly afterwards withdrawn as untrue because they were forced down his throat on three separate occasions, are typical of the policy that he adopted for five years, the policy which brought the condemnation of the people in greater measure than at any time since confederation. They are typical of the policy that has been adopted in this house during this session which, together with the general conduct of this leader and his followers, was in no small degree an issue in Saskatchewan. The right hon. gentleman returns from Saskatchewan, as the Minister of National Defence pointed out, having lost nothing because nothing from nothing leaves nothing.

In his remarks this afternoon the right hon. gentleman referred to circuses and disclosed that he is a student of the great, deceased P. T. Barnum. He undertook to quote to the committee what he probably treasures in his mind as a gem of wisdom, a remark made by that great circus man, that you can fool some of the people part of the time. A few weeks ago we received a lecture on political morality and corruption across Canada. We did not know then what he and his esteemed colleagues had in mind. I was interested to hear the name of Hon. Mr. Manion mentioned, a gentleman who occupied a cabinet post in the last administration. I have no doubt that the receipt by that gentleman of the letter which the Prime Minister also received, and his participation in the contribution of $1,365,000 to buy three seats in Manitoba, will commend that gentleman to his colleagues in this house at the coming convention. At least he is not stingy in spending public money to buy the voters in elections. If I read the judgment of the people of Canada aright, he is going to have to raise the ante if he is to be accorded the leadership of the party; and he is going to have to exceed the $355,000 per seat in order to endeavour to fool the people some of the time.

After the lessons in political morality and on the evils of corruption that we have received, the right hon. gentleman has spent this afternoon in what I think is the most grotesque exhibition that it has been my privilege to witness since I have been in this House of Commons. Why do I say that? Is that fair or unfair?

Mr. LENNARD: You have not been here much.

Mr. SLAGHT: Perhaps the hon. member is right; but if he can match the exhibition of this afternoon, then he perhaps will take the palm. But let me point out to the committee what happened this afternoon. The right hon. gentleman rose in his place and laid bare some charges, and when he was asked whether he knew of these from personal knowledge his answer was, "I know from personal knowledge that some of these misdoings occur." I wonder if he will tell us which one. I wonder if he was playing the mysterious Mr. X, or whether he was acting the part of the sleuth—I do not believe he was—or whether he was "keyholing" outside the bins in Kingston, and that the personal knowledge he had of what went on over there was acquired in that manner. Do not let him forget that men who look through keyholes, as was illustrated to-night by the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot), in discussing other legislation, often get hatpins in their eyes. And the hatpin in the eye that the right hon. the leader of the opposition has received during the last few hours ought to cause him to pause before he utters loose, idle, scandalmongering and slanderous statements against men of high standing and integrity in this country who are not in this house to defend themselves.

What did he do? He said with regard to the Minister of Labour that he gave him a clean bill of health. He made it clear that he did not impute to that minister any personal knowledge of the derelictions of which he was accusing these men. And he offered no suggestion that any other hon. member in the house, either on the government benches as ministers, or elsewhere, are accused by him of having the slightest knowledge of or participation in any of these rascally practices that he dug out of his fertile imagination. What does that mean? It means that he has seen fit to occupy hours of the time of the house —why? In an indictment of the conduct of any member of the house? No. In a suggestion that any member has committed the slightest impropriety? No. But he from the sheltered privilege of his seat in this house has led a miserable, scandalous and vicious indictment against a close friend of mine, Mr. Rigney.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, on a point of order, the expression "scandalmongering" is against the rules of the house and so are the words, "slanderous" and "miserable" and "vicious." I merely direct attention to that, as a matter of order. I do not wish to interrupt any more than I find absolutely necessary.

Mr. DUNNING: What point of order?

Mr. SLAGHT: The right hon. gentleman is too quick to take to himself the term I was using. If he will—

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, as a matter of order—and that statement is clearly wrong; it does not require argument to present that fact—when he has used language which is contrary to the rules, and before you rule I direct attention to it, and he says, "The hon. gentleman is too quick to take it to himself," this is making it just doubly against the rules.

Mr. POULIOT: Speaking to the point of order, Mr. Chairman, no member can take any objection to anything said in the house until the sentence is finished. And there was a semicolon, not a period, when the hon. member was speaking.

Mr. SLAGHT: May I explain what I said—and I think you will find in Hansard that I am accurate—was that the gossipy, scandalous, miserable stories which were given to my right hon. friend, and which he has been using in this chamber, were properly so styled, and I have a perfect right to style them so. I did not accuse him of scandalmongering, or even gossiping.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the hon. member did.

Mr. SLAGHT: I am not at all sure but that the word "miserable" is both parliamentary and properly applied to the right hon. gentleman, in so far only as this incident is concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: On a point of order, if you will recall, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member made reference to my being at a keyhole, and he applied that language not to alleged reports, but to me personally. I was not going to interrupt, having regard to the source from which it came, but I thought I would now direct attention to it, in view of the fact that it has been repeated. It is a breach of order.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order raised by the right hon. gentleman—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no point of order.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the right hon. gentleman say there is no point of order? I raised a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: The leader of the opposition has raised a point of order.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: What is it?

The CHAIRMAN: That the remark in regard to scandalmongers by the hon. member for Parry Sound was referring to the leader of the opposition. I have listened attentively to all the speakers to-night, and I am of the opinion that the remarks of the hon. member for Parry Sound were not directed against the leader of the opposition.

Mr. SLAGHT: Certainly not.

Mr. BENNETT: Very well, Hansard will show.

Mr. SLAGHT: Then, let me make it clear to the right hon. gentleman, if he feels any doubt in his mind as to my intention, or if there is any ambiguity in my language, that I would not think of using such remarks with regard to him personally. But let me just point out what I was about to call to the attention of the committee, and it is this: Having made it perfectly clear that no member of this house is concerned, and that he has no charge to make against them, he rises in his place in this house sheltered by the privileges of parliament, and against whom does he lay the most serious charges, which means crimes? In the first place he lays such a charge against Mr. Stansbury of Kingston, whom I do not even know: But I am informed that he is a gentleman highly respected in his native city—

Mr. ROGERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SLAGHT: —who has many times been returned to the council of his city, and is to-day an alderman in the city council, and trusted by the people of that city with a more or less important office. He is not here to defend himself.

The right hon. gentleman next attacked one of his majesty's magistrates in Kingston, whom I do not even know, but who, I understand, has a long and honourable record, and ten years service to his country. That magistrate, of course, is not here to defend himself, either.

Then he attacked the crown attorney, Mr. T. J. Rigney, K.C., a Kingston man. I went through law school with this gentleman who was placed in this important position to administer justice by a Conservative government of Ontario. My right hon. friend wants to dissociate himself from that party, and after the exhibition made in the last provincial election by the hon. gentleman who sits beside him, I do not wonder at his action. But he attacked this gentleman, one of his majesty's counsel, respected and learned in the law, and imputed to him dishonourable action in attending at the police court and stating honestly to the court that there was no proper charge upon which His Majesty the King could proceed against the poor, unfortunate man in question. What would he have him do? Would he have him go on with a trumped-up charge and proceed to hear evidence which was not applicable? Would he have him proceed with a charge which the court had no right to hear? Is that the standard of administration of British justice that he would set up in Ontario? I wish we had more crown attorneys who, after investigating cases, would walk into police courts and take the responsibility of saying that certain charges should not be proceeded with. There is no foundation for these charges. Is a crown attorney with a long record of integrity and service, a gentleman against whom no breath of suspicion has ever been sounded, to be indicted and labeled for dereliction of duty which would justify his dismissal? Why has the right hon. gentleman in the closing hours of the session sought to deal with silly gossip that has been poured into his ear, I do not know by whom?

Then, because he takes in considerable territory when he starts swinging his arms, he attacks a salvage officer of this government whose name fortunately was not mentioned. Let me tell the committee what I consider was the duty of the right hon. gentleman in connection with these charges. He was asked how long he had the particulars. He stuttered a little and he said he had had them for some time. I suppose he has been sleeping with these charges or has locked them up in his bosom. Perhaps these charges were given to him by means of an anonymous letter. He was invited to disclose their source, but he would not. If that mysterious man is not ashamed of his name; if the right hon. gentleman is not ashamed to disclose it, why does he not do so? He has practically written the charge of blackguardism against the names of four reputable citizens of this country. His course as a distinguished member of the bar of this country was clear and plain. He should have said to the scandalmonger who gave him his information, "Go to the attorney general of Ontario, the Hon. Mr. Gordon Conant, a man whom everyone respects because of the manner in which he discharges his duties, a man of high honour and integrity, lay these charges before him, and within twenty-four hours he will grant you an investigation of these scandalous charges against the crown attorney and the police magistrate of that county." Did he do that? No. He thinks more of making political capital out of something like this than he does of punishing wrong-doers who break the laws of Canada. That is the charge I make against him.

I do not desire to show any heat in connection with this discussion. I believe the tirade of the last two days is the result of the Saskatchewan election. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has returned from the fray. He made a creditable fight and the position of his party has been bettered. The members of the social credit party fought their fight along the lines as they saw them. No doubt they are greatly disappointed, but they can take it. The leader of the opposition cannot take it. That is why he has indicted the Minister of Labour, of whom it can be said there is no finer administrator in any country in the British commonwealth. I would like to have seen the right hon. gentleman avoid the last two days' discussion. Whether he will accept it or not, I have a high personal regard for many of his qualities. I believe he has made some worth while contributions—without being scornful at all, I may say he has perhaps made more while in opposition—to the discussion of measures that have been introduced in this house. We all admire his indomitable courage, his great industry, and those high qualities of mental attainment which enable him to assist those charged with government in solving their problems. I think every one of us must pay a tribute to the contributions he has made to the debates in this house.

What a happier stepping away from the turmoil of public life it would have been if this had not happened! How much happier we on this side would have been if we had not been compelled to point out the type of attack that had been made upon innocent men of standing and integrity, men who had no sponsor or spokesman unless I can be treated as such! How much better it would have been, not only for the right hon. gentleman's reputation, if I may suggest that, but for the honour of public life in the Dominion of Canada if he had taken an entirely different course in connection with this miserable, trumped-up episode!

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, on previous occasions I have listened to similar discussions in this chamber. When I listened to acrimonious discussions such as we have had yesterday and to-day I almost came to the conclusion that all parties in power are absolute sinners while all parties in opposition are absolute saints. Such discussions are neither edifying nor useful. We know that patronage goes on no matter what party happens to be in power. I have made the plea in the past to abolish patronage, whether the Conservative or the Liberal party was in power. I hope that some day the two major parties may see the error of their ways and do away with this whole vicious system which seems to be permeating part of the public life of this country. During the course of this discussion numerous points of order have been raised by one side or the other, but I am of the opinion that probably three-quarters of the whole discussion has been out of order. We are discussing the administration of the Department of Labour, and we have attempted to discuss contracts entered into by the Department of National Defence, and various other types of contracts. We would be serving a far more useful purpose if we kept strictly within the item now before the committee and got on with our business.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) made some remarks this evening regarding the recent Saskatchewan election. I did not catch his exact words, but I gathered that he said if the truth were known about the Saskatchewan election, those members who had taken part in it would be ashamed to take their seats. I am here to tell him that I took some part in the Saskatchewan election and I am not a bit ashamed—I have no reason to be ashamed—to take my seat here. Further, I should like to tell him the reason why the Conservative party did not elect a single member. I wish to take only a few minutes of the time of the committee to indicate why that was the case.

Mr. HEAPS: Has that anything to do with the item under discussion? I think I shall raise a point of order, as a good many have been raised. Has the Saskatchewan election anything to do with the administration of the Department of Labour?

Mr. DUNNING: It is rather late to raise it, though.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, this debate all day has gone very wide.

Mr. SPENCE: Gone haywire.

The CHAIRMAN: A great deal of latitude has been granted by the chair, and I do not feel disposed at this time to call the hon. member to order, because strictly, according to the rules, many speakers to-day were out of order. The discussion, however, was so vital that points of order were not raised by the chair. I therefore think it would be rather unfair to the hon. member who has the floor for me to tell him to confine his remarks now to this item under discussion.

Mr. TUCKER: There was in Saskatchewan a Liberal government which appealed to the people, and the government of Alberta undertook to take part in that election. The government of Alberta presumed, under the leadership of Premier Aberhart, to name the social credit candidates in Saskatchewan. Those candidates were named, regardless of the wishes of the people of Saskatchewan, by Premier Aberhart, three of his cabinet ministers, and an hon. member of this house, and announced from Edmonton. The Liberal party took the attitude that this was a denial of one of the fundamental rights of democracy; that in a democracy the people should have the right to name their own candidates, and that no one man should assume to name candidates for the legislature; that only under dictatorships is such a thing done. Members of the Liberal party denounced that as a step toward dictatorship; members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation denounced it. They also stood for democracy. But what did the Conservative party do? It temporized with the situation. The Conservatives had twenty-three candidates nominated. They had no hope of electing a majority of the next legislature, because they would have had to elect at least twenty-seven members to have had a majority—more than those nominated. Yet they issued an advertisement, published in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, sponsored by the Saskatoon Conservative association, asking for a vote for ex-Premier Anderson and Mr. McEachren, and saying this:

> The Conservative members will control the government.

The advertisement further on says:

> If you who are attracted to social credit feel that you must register your support in some way, we suggest you give one vote to social credit to serve this purpose and your other vote to either of the Conservative candidates.

That was the attitude of the Conservative party. They temporized with Premier Aberhart in that attack on democracy. That is one reason why they did not elect a single candidate.

There is another reason. Premier Aberhart came into Saskatchewan attacking the Canadian constitution, taking this attitude: "Yes, we passed ultra vires legislation—"

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. TUCKER: "—and we propose to go on passing ultra vires legislation until the courts get tired of disallowing it."

The CHAIRMAN: Order. In permitting the hon. member to inject the Saskatchewan election into this discussion I had no intention that he should make a speech on it. I would ask him to shorten his speech and confine his remarks to the item before the committee.

Mr. HEAPS: I notice that on this item there is an increase of $5,582. Would the Minister of Labour explain the increase.

Mr. WALSH: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. TUCKER: I was interrupted—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The minister is getting some information.

Mr. WALSH: Mr. Chairman, I have the right to the floor. I had the floor before the last speaker.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member will get the floor when the minister has replied.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman, I had not finished. Unless you rule me entirely out of order, I wish to continue.

Mr. SPENCE: Let the hon. member tell us where his party got all the money to run the election.

Mr. TUCKER: Our party had not as much money as the hon. member's party had in past elections.

Mr. ROGERS: In answer to the question of the hon. member for Winnipeg North, the increase of $5,000 is accounted for in the following way: permanent salaries, increase $1,822.50; temporary salaries, increase $2,760; printing and stationery, increase $1,000.

Mr. HEAPS: What part of the administration of the Department of Labour is this item for?

Mr. ROGERS: That was explained to the committee at the beginning of the session yesterday. The sum of $63,925 is for the administration of the central office of the employment service of Canada; that is to say, the office which is maintained in Ottawa, which provides a clearing service for information from the other offices. It also provides the salaries of the special placement officers dealing with handicapped ex-service men.

Mr. HEAPS: The other day, when the minister was giving information to the committee on this point, he discussed the number of placements the department had made during the past year. Has the minister the number of applications that were made to the employment service of Canada during the same period?

Mr. ROGERS: I gave both.

Mr. HEAPS: Well, it was not given yesterday. The minister gave the number of placements made during the past year, but I do not think he gave the number of applications which were made for positions to the employment service of Canada.

Mr. ROGERS: The employment opportunities for 1937, the calendar year, were 418,388. The applications in the same year were 712,223. The placements were 389,536.

Mr. MacINNIS: And the number of applications?

The CHAIRMAN: Order.

Mr. WALSH: It is not my intention to allow the remarks of the Minister of National Defence and the hon. member for Parry Sound to pass unnoticed. I can inform the minister that loud noises and erratic wanderings have not the least effect on my participation in debate. I prefer to debate a subject rather than a person. He suggests that I should place my seat at stake on account of actions which are taking place within his own department and which I have drawn to his attention on two occasions in this chamber without receiving any reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Which were they?

Mr. WALSH: One was when a gentleman came to Ottawa from Montreal to see why he did not receive even advice that the Department of National Defence wanted to purchase supplies. Although he had been supplying the department for thirteen years, for a period of over a year he had not received any intimation that there were supplies to be purchased. He visited the Department of National Defence. At first he was told, "Well, your firm is an English firm." But when he said that his goods were manufactured in Canada, one of the minister's officials told him—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Which one?

Mr. WALSH: I can get the name of the official. I am giving the minister information in just the same way as the minister gave it to me.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Will the hon. member tell me the name of the official?

Mr. WALSH: No, I will not tell the name; but I have the floor, and I will remind the minister that he kept me in my seat when he was speaking. This official told the gentleman that he would have to get his name approved by the patronage committee in Montreal before he could even receive a form of tender on which to tender for supplies.

An hon. MEMBER: Name the official.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Who was the person in question?

Mr. WALSH: I draw to the minister's attention the manner in which he conducted the political campaign in the city of Victoria.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, and Victoria replied.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. WALSH: Victoria did not reply, but it will reply in due course just as the rest of Canada will do when it has an opportunity of replying.

I should like to go back to the city of Kingston. The Minister of National Defence and the hon. member for Parry Sound suggested that the leader of the opposition spoke from the shelter and privilege of a seat in this house. But the Minister of National Defence spoke from the privilege of his seat in this house and said things here with respect to a man who has a very high reputation in the city of Kingston, which he would not dare to say outside this house.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I read an affidavit.

Mr. WALSH: The minister read an affidavit which in no way lowers the reputation of Mr. Sowards, who is head of the Sowards Coal Company of Kingston. Indeed, he could not read any affidavit that would in any way lower that gentleman in the estimation of his fellow citizens of Kingston. Mr. Sowards has been in the coal business all his life. He started that business as a coal yard and he himself grew up in that business. He has served that city and most likely supplies seventy-five per cent of its homes with coal and wood, and the people there all seem to be well satisfied. It was not on account of prices that the Minister of National Defence would not take cognizance of the lower tender from the Sowards company, but purely and simply because Johnny Sowards was president of the Conservative association in the city of Kingston—that and no other reason.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That has nothing to do with it.

Mr. WALSH: Certainly, and the Minister of National Defence knows that better than I do.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I say that has nothing whatever to do with it, and my statement must be accepted.

Mr. WALSH: I do not have to accept that statement.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The hon. member must. I raise the point of order.

Mr. WALSH: My statement is as good as the minister's.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I rise to a point of order. The rules are clear and explicit.

Mr. WALSH: Read them.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): When an hon. member makes a statement that statement must be accepted.

Mr. WALSH: But I, too, have made a statement, and I expect my statement to be accepted just as the hon. minister expects his statement to be accepted. I did not suggest that he was not speaking the truth or anything of that sort. I simply put my statement in contrast with his, and I leave it to the members of this house and to the people of Kingston to judge which statement is correct and which is incorrect. That is a perfectly fair position. I do not think I am breaking the rules of the house in making a statement of that kind by way of contrast, particularly when a man whose reputation has been slandered in this house has no means of defending himself against such slander.

Mr. ROGERS: It is a sworn statement.

Mr. WALSH: There is no sworn statement that can be presented to this house that would show that Johnny Sowards of Kingston is anything but a reputable citizen. The Minister of Labour, coming from that city, knows that as well as I do. He need not go further than the Liberal executive of the city of Kingston to know the good reputation and the good character that are borne not only by Johnny Sowards but by every member of that family who is interested directly or indirectly in the coal business of Kingston.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not want to anticipate another discussion of this matter, but I could not and I do not defend the situation which was set out in the sworn statement given to the committee some time ago by the Minister of National Defence, nor could any other member of the house.

Mr. LENNARD: Do you mean you do not defend the minister's statement?

Mr. ROGERS: I could not defend the situation set out in the sworn statement, which shows that the Sowards company delivered coal ostensibly to amounts of sixty-three tons when only fifty tons could possibly be put into the bin. Not only that, but I have a further statement that there was the greatest difficulty in getting forty tons into the bin.

Mr. BENNETT: A cheese-maker's estimate of a bin.

Mr. WALSH: I know that we sometimes feel the same way when we have coal put into our bins. We think the bin will hold seven or eight tons and are surprised when we get a bill for nine or ten tons, and yet I assume the dealers are honest. I feel that the Minister of National Defence has gone out of his way to slander a man who bears a very high reputation, and I do not think he is justified in doing so; nor do I think the statements are justified that have been made with respect to the leader of the opposition. Some members on the other side of the house sat here in opposition while the present leader of the opposition led the government, and I am absolutely surprised at the attitude they take towards him in this discussion—

Mr. FRASER: He asked for it.

Mr. WALSH: —suggesting that he is going out of public life with anything but honour. The leader of the opposition has not been given credit for what he did during the five years in which he held office. Hon. members on the other side of the house should bear that in mind when discussing a public question. The item before us relates to work that is done not only in the city of Kingston but elsewhere. It is an item that comes under the Department of Labour, and it has been criticized from the point of view of certain things that have taken place in and around Kingston. It is, in my opinion, unfortunate that the discussion went as far as it did. It has not raised the people's estimation of democracy or of this house to a very high level.

Mr. FRASER: Who started the dog fight?

Mr. WALSH: It is those on the other side of the house who are responsible for the state into which this debate has drifted—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. WALSH: —and the insinuations that have been made during the course of the debate. It is all very well for the hon. member for Parry Sound to rise in his place and say he regrets the debate, and for other members to regret it, but the result of the debate is attributable altogether to hon. members on the other side of the house who have introduced into the discussion something that had no bearing on the item under discussion, with a view to shielding themselves behind something that took place five, six, or seven years ago.

Mr. FRASER: You have been on a merry-go-round.

Mr. WALSH: Yes, but I have never been drunk.

Mr. FRASER: It would do you good if you got drunk.

Mr. WALSH: It might, but I hope I shall always maintain myself in my sober senses so that at least I shall know what I am talking about, like a sensible human being. From the way in which some members have been talking on the other side this evening, one would almost think something of what the hon. member has suggested had taken place.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. FRASER: Cheap.

Mr. WALSH: Cheap, because you cheapen the debate.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member is definitely out of order, and I must ask him to withdraw that remark.

Mr. WALSH: Absolutely; I withdraw it.

Mr. FRASER: Why do you not sit down now that you have a chance?

Mr. WALSH: Probably if the hon. member who is intruding into the debate would take an intelligent interest, we would make favourable progress.

Mr. FRASER: The hon. member would not understand it if I did.

Mr. WALSH: Give this side of the house an opportunity to understand something from the other side and we will appreciate it. We have been here for five months, and during the course of the debate to-night someone suggested something about what had been done during the last five months. If we asked any member of the government to rise in his place and enumerate what they had done in the last five months, it would not take him more than five minutes to do so. I am hoping that as a result of this debate we are going to have a more careful administration of public funds. It is all right for a government, entrenched as this government is, to sit there and laugh to scorn the suggestions made by the opposition, to throw ridicule upon the opposition because they are small in number, and to cast reflection upon individual members of that opposition because they do not happen to be endowed with the same degree of mental ability as hon. members on the other side of the house profess to have. We are here elected by the people to do a duty, and it is our intention to do our duty in a full and complete measure, and to give as good an account of ourselves as we possibly can under the circumstances. We ask the government to meet the opposition in the same spirit. We have to criticize; our criticism should be met in the spirit in which it is intended, for the ultimate good of the country, and not for the destruction of democracy, which is sure to follow if members of the government continue to administer the affairs of the dominion as they have allowed them to be administered as shown to-day.

Mr. MacNEIL: Now that the political grudges have been thoroughly ventilated, perhaps we may return to the needs of the unemployed which must be met at least in part under the vote now before the committee. One might not think so, listening to the debate this afternoon, but there are still unemployed in Canada, unemployed who do not benefit by the distribution of political patronage. Having heard the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) so eloquently pledge himself this evening to fight the battles of the people, I cannot refrain from reminding him that at this moment there are thousands of single unemployed men in his own city who are without food and shelter or work. I hope that when the matter is again before the committee he will make some satisfactory explanation of how he proposes to fight the battles of the people when their needs meet with such apparent indifference at this time.

This afternoon I asked the Minister of Labour with regard to the situation as it affects single homeless women. I wish to remind him that when this vote was under consideration last year I pointed out that some evidence had been placed in my possession regarding the method by which such women were victimized in Vancouver. We have a migration of young women as well as young men to the coast. Many of these young women register with the employment service. They are sent out by the officials of the service to various employment opportunities as reported to the offices. At one stage apparently no endeavour was made to check those reported openings in order to protect these young women against victimization. I was taken to task on one occasion by a gentleman who was then attorney general of British Columbia for mentioning the recruiting for a chain of brothels in British Columbia. I am not concerned at the moment about proving whether or not brothels exist, or in discussing law enforcement in British Columbia; but it is known to all who are interested in public affairs at the coast that a certain degree of recruiting does go on. I am asking the minister to explain to the committee to what extent facilities have been developed so that these opportunities are checked by some follow-up protection, in order that young women placed through the employment service are adequately protected against exploitation either by those who seek to take advantage of their destitution by imposing low wages, sweat-shop conditions, or against actual victimization by agents of the underworld.

Mr. ROGERS: When my hon. friend raised this point before six o'clock I did not recall the discussion of a year ago. I do recall it now. I am not at present able to give my hon. friend the information for which he has asked. I did leave word for communication to be made with the director of the employment service there to see what action had been taken, after the discussion of last year. I have not that information yet, but will secure it as soon as possible.

Mr. MacINNIS: In the discussions we have had during the last three or four weeks in regard to the single unemployed in Vancouver, the minister, if I understood him aright, has taken the position that employment is available in British Columbia. I do not know exactly what the situation may be to-day; possibly the minister has the information; but I have the May issue of the Labour Gazette, and I find that there were almost 10,000 registrations at the labour offices in British Columbia during March, and that there were only 2,518 placements. As a matter of fact, about one-third of the placements are for a duration of around one week, and the remainder for longer periods of time. At the end of March there were over 13,000 unplaced who had registered for work. In the face of figures such as those, how can the minister take the position that the unemployed in Vancouver at the present time can find work?

Mr. ROGERS: My information is that last year in British Columbia the placements were as follows:

	Men	Women
In regular work..	18,786	3,574
In casual work..	26,109	3,902
Total placements in British Columbia..		52,371

At any given time, as my hon. friend is aware, the applications for employment would exceed the placements. But it does not follow—and it was this point I endeavoured to make yesterday—that all placements in British Columbia or any other province are obtained through the facilities of the employment service of Canada. So I do not think the figures given by my hon. friend are conclusive in that regard.

Mr. MacINNIS: They may not be conclusive, but they are just as conclusive as the figures given by the Minister of Labour. I have here the figures for March of this year. There was a decline of nearly thirty-four per cent in the number of positions offered through the employment offices in British Columbia. Would the minister say that this would not have any effect on the number of positions offering in the labour market generally in British Columbia? Is it not to be supposed that when there is a decline in the number of positions offered through the labour offices there is likely to be a corresponding decline in the number of positions offered in other ways? I say again that the position taken by the minister in regard to the situation in Vancouver and British Columbia, where men are unable to get work and are refused relief, is not at all in accord with the high sentiments we heard expressed this afternoon. I ask again that the minister take the situation under his consideration and see whether something cannot be done immediately to avoid the trouble which will undoubtedly take place there unless something is done.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is the Ottawa office of the department represented in Vancouver at the present time? If so, who is the individual representing the department there in regard to the situation?

Mr. ROGERS: In regard to the situation which has been under discussion from time to time in the last few weeks, the representative of the department who has been in Vancouver is Mr. Humphrey Mitchell, who has been director of labour transference in the department during the last two and a half years.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is he an officer of the employment service?

Mr. ROGERS: He is not an officer of the employment service.

Mr. MacINNIS: What is his standing within the service?

Mr. ROGERS: He is a temporary employee of the department, appointed under the Unemployment and Agricultural Distress Act of 1936.

Mr. MacINNIS: What is the salary in connection with that position?

Mr. ROGERS: It does not come under this item, but it is $500 a month.

Mr. BENNETT: The item under consideration involves payments to the labour employment service maintained in several provinces and at various points in many provinces. During the progress of the discussion, the minister made a statement with respect to the item, in reply to a question as to how that office was conducted in the city of Kingston, which is operated by a man named Mooers; I think that is the way it is spelled.

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: I presented to this committee, as was my duty, evidence that indicated his complete unfitness for that position; and I read from a public print that reference had been made to his practically holding up people for contributions to his beer fund or liquor fund in order that they might find employment. I did more; I produced a letter from a reputable person who had gone to that office for the purpose of securing employment and had been sent to the president of the Liberal association, or told that without the approval of the president of the Liberal association he could not find employment. I followed that by saying that Mr. Stansbury did in fact give him a letter to the Frontenac Construction Company—

Mr. ROGERS: He did what he could to secure employment for him.

Mr. BENNETT: —to secure him a job, and that it was laughed at. That involved the conduct of the man in charge of this office in Kingston, and I say to the minister that the evidence completely establishes the man's unfitness for his position. It is true that he was not appointed by this government. He was appointed by the provincial administration, and I pointed out to the minister that under those circumstances such a man was not a fit and proper person to be charged with that responsibility. I also referred to a contract, because during the course of his statement the minister said that conditions were inserted in the contracts for tenders which made it incumbent upon those who sought additional labour on contracts to get it from this body or through this office. The language in the bids for the Fort Henry property is as follows:

Contractors may use machinery, wherever desired.

The men selected by the Department of Labour shall not be rotated on the job, and may be dismissed if their services are not satisfactory. A written statement shall be supplied to the representative of the Department of Labour, indicating the reason for dismissal, in each individual case, and contractors are urged to give men a second chance, if they fail to make good on the job for which they were originally selected.

That follows the conditions that are to prevail with respect to the hiring of labour:

All labour to be supplied on these contracts shall be supplied through the Ontario Department of Labour. Contractors will be permitted, however, to supply such men as are required for supervision, and special work approved by the department, but the number of men so engaged by the contractors shall not exceed fifteen per cent of the total number on the job.

Mr. ROGERS: That was later changed to twenty-five per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I am only reading from the bid that was circulated, because it is only fair to point out that with respect to the Fort Henry job it was through the department of highways of Ontario that tenders were asked, and the tenders called for indicated that a certain defined work as mentioned in the plan was the work to which the contractor was to direct his attention. I find nowhere a provision such as would constitute any safeguard for the dominion in that bid. There may be in some bids, or there may be in the final contract, but in this bid so far as I can see—and the typewritten portion with respect to labour is made separate —there is no provision to safeguard that position.

I do say to the minister, to the hon. member for Parry Sound and to the hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches, that we should not have the taxpayers of Canada providing half the cost of this undertaking and have the control of the labour in the hands of a man of the type that the evidence indicates he was and is. No one for a moment has suggested that any statement made with respect to him is not true. No one has risen in his defence, not even the hon. member for Parry Sound. No one has said that he was attacked behind his back.

Mr. ROGERS: Surely the charges of my hon. friend are charges which ought to be and which will be investigated.

Mr. BENNETT: My point was that the investigation should have been made long ago, because this, in the language of the great apostle, was not done in a corner. The hon. member for Parry Sound says it is street gossip; but it is more than that; it reaches the public press in a case that is tried in the police court.

Mr. ROGERS: If my right hon. friend will permit me, he has made certain definite statements with respect to the present officer in charge of the employment service in Kingston.

Mr. BENNETT: I quoted from documents.

Mr. ROGERS: But those statements certainly did not go to show in any way that Mr. Mooers has used his position in such a way as to discriminate wholly in favour of Liberals and against Conservatives. I do not believe there is any basis for that charge in what my right hon. friend has said.

Mr. BENNETT: I read a letter from a reputable citizen of Kingston who went there for employment.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, one person.

Mr. BENNETT: But there can be others secured, as I told the hon. gentleman. This man was told, "You will have to have a letter from the president of the Liberal association."

Mr. ROGERS: Not for relief work at all.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I gathered that part of the Fort Henry work was treated as a relief job.

Mr. ROGERS: This was at Barriefield.

Mr. BENNETT: Rollands heard there was a vacancy at Barriefield, but he wanted a job anywhere. Let us have no misunderstanding about it; that is the position. I have another letter here, which is signed by Mr. J. Marshall, rural route No. 1, Kingston, Ontario, dated May 10, 1938, which is not very long ago:

Sir:

A few lines hoping to be excused. I have been asking Mr. Rogers for a job for the past fifteen months but all he tells me to keep in touch with Mr. Stansberry. I have seen him several times but all he tells me their is nothing doing. I cooked in camp 42 for over two years and as not be able to get very much since I hope that you will try and get me a job as it is very hard for me to give without working.

Hoping to hear from you soon,

Yours truly,

J. Marshall.

I do not know who he is.

Mr. ROGERS: If my right hon. friend will permit me, I did not know the other people to whom he referred, but I do recall Mr. Marshall. He has applied to me for a position; he has written to me on various occasions. I believe at one time he was a cook attached either to camp 42 or camp 37. I have not the slightest idea what his political affiliations are.

Mr. BENNETT: Was he referred to Mr. Stansbury?

Mr. ROGERS: If he says so, I would not deny it, for this reason: When I go back to Kingston I am approached by men who ask for jobs. I have had to leave with my local executive such contact with such openings as do occur in Kingston.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. ROGERS: That I have said quite frankly in the house at various times.

Mr. BENNETT: But it negatives a statement which the minister made in the heat of the argument this afternoon, that there were no cases in which he had referred anyone to Stansbury.

Mr. ROGERS: No, no, I did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: What he is saying now I have followed. What he said this afternoon is at variance with that, perhaps because he was dealing with another phase of the same matter.

Mr. ROGERS: I never referred anyone, or spoke to a contractor in Kingston in favour of any person, or instructed anyone else to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not discussing that phase of the matter. I am talking about the question of the minister referring this man to the president of the Liberal association for the purpose of getting a position. That at least is evidence of that phase of it.

Now comes the hon. member for Parry Sound who says, "You are casting a reflection upon Stansbury, upon Rigney, upon Shea and upon a salvage officer because their names are discussed in this house." Well, the other evening the Minister of National Defence, a minister of the crown, when speaking of the Sowards incident, he having submitted the lowest tender for coal, and when I had asked him about the reports received concerning the firm, and to quote the language of the order in council, used these words:

I have not the documents before me at the moment with reference to the particular tender mentioned by the right hon. gentleman, but I definitely recall that complaints were made in regard to the carrying out of a previous contract by this same gentleman, with reference to a definite breach of the labour conditions in the contract. I shall ascertain the exact terms of the complaint and shall be glad to supply it to my right hon. friend or to any member of the committee.

This evening there was read a statutory declaration dated June 4, 1938, a week ago to-morrow. And the order in council was pased in 1937. What does he mean?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Nothing; I just meant—

Mr. BENNETT: "Nothing," I thought so.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It is all very well to be clever. The information was given me at the time. I did not have it in my recollection at the time, and the information was given to me by my colleague the Minister of Labour, and was substantiated to-night.

Mr. ROGERS: That is right. Had I been in the house at the time I would not have hesitated for a moment to say that I had sent on the information. The information was not at that time in the form of a statutory declaration. But when I noted the manner in which it was regarded by the leader of the opposition I thought he would appreciate it more perhaps if it was in the form of a sworn statement.

Mr. BENNETT: It is Mr. Gibson who gave the statutory declaration of June 4, which reduced into writing what had prevously been ascertained. But Mr. Gibson is a cheese-maker; he is a dairy inspector.

Mr. ROGERS: And a very capable man, and the superintendent of a school.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, a very capable man and the superintendent of a school. Since when did a competent cheese-maker become equipped to tell the number of tons of coal a bin would hold?

Mr. DUNNING: A high-school boy can do that.

Mr. BENNETT: I will say to the Minister of Finance that it depends entirely on the kind of coal.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, what does the declaration say? If it is lump coal, the bin does not hold the same number of tons as if it is fine coal.

Mr. ROGERS: The same kind of coal in each case; the specifications require it.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not say what kind it is.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I gave the figures as to cost.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not help. It depends on how you put the coal in the bin, and how much is in the bin, and the cubic contents of the bin can be ascertained without difficulty, provided it is honestly measured. The computation as to the number of tons the bin holds is not difficult, after you have the cubic contents.

But everything depends upon the kind of coal you put in. If you put in buckwheat you can get in more tons than if you put in run of mine. And if you put in nut coal you certainly can get in more tons than if you put in lump coal. I am merely mentioning that because it shows what a minister of the crown will do, and it gives point and effect to the observations of the hon. member for Parry Sound.

I used the same language the other evening with respect to Mr. Sowards as my learned friend from Parry Sound has used with respect to these men. I used the exact language, that they were being attacked without a chance to be heard. Mr. Sowards defence is that he offered to supply coal cheaper than somebody else, and that the taxpayers of Canada would gain thousands of dollars. But we will not have that contract, because the reports received concerning this firm—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was $600 or so, more expensive than the other.

Mr. BENNETT: Now it appears that the reports have come from the Minister of Labour, who lives in Kingston, where Mr. Sowards lives. That hearsay evidence, if I may so describe it to my hon. friend from Parry Sound, is based upon—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Sworn evidence.

Mr. BENNETT: No; the hearsay evidence of the minister is based upon the information received from Mr. Gibson. And a week ago to-morrow Mr. Gibson, who is a cheese-maker, swears with respect to the contents of the coal bin.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is wrong with a cheese-maker doing it?

Mr. BENNETT: Not a bit.

Mr. ROGERS: He swears not only as to the contents of the bin, but as to the bills for coal deliveries.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, certainly, the number of tons supplied.

Mr. DUNNING: And the cost.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and the cost. And the same things I have heard with respect to the present supply of coal in other portions of this dominion. I have always said that coal is one of those things in connection with which it is impossible to estimate the number of tons unless you know definitely the size of the coal which goes into the bin.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but if the item comes up again I am prepared to have corroborative testimony with respect to even larger contracts supplied for the Rockwood hospital at Kingston.

Mr. BENNETT: It will be observed that it is a provincial institution.

Mr. ROGERS: Taken from the public accounts.

Mr. BENNETT: It might also be well to remember that Mr. Gibson is an employee of the provincial government, and Mr. Sowards has been supplying, as the lowest tenderer, coal to the dominion public undertakings for years. What is more, Mr. Norman who was the lowest tenderer the year before in Kingston, received his coal from Mr. Sowards. And Mr. Norman I am informed was advised he could not do so any more. That is the position.

There is the story as I understand it. It is a singular thing that it should be a minister of a federal department who should go to a provincial department for the purpose of determining this question. John Sowards has been supplying coal to the Dominion of Canada since he was a young man. The accounts are there in the auditor general's reports during all those years, and never have I heard such a statement as that now made. Is it not singular that it comes from the provincial authorities, and from an employee of the provincial government, who is a cheesemaker or an instructor.

With respect to the magistrate, and also with respect to the crown attorney, I will say this to the hon. member for Parry Sound, that at least it is laid down in the books that when they have jurisdiction, and an individual is charged with an offence under the criminal code, it is the duty of the law officers and the duty of the magistrate to see that appropriate proceedings are taken, when it is clear that the present proceedings are under a statute that has no availability.

Mr. SLAGHT: Surely my right hon. friend would not carry that doctrine to the length of saying that where a crown attorney honestly investigates facts and alleged charges, and decides they cannot prevail, he should still scrape up some other charge to lay against a man.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. SLAGHT: Surely not.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what I said. What happened in this case was that the magistrate said, "I have no jurisdiction; these cases have all been dealt with under the elections act. It is true this is not under the criminal code, and I will let him go."

Mr. SLAGHT: He was quite right.

Mr. BENNETT: Was he? Well, that is the first time I have heard any reputable counsel say so. The court of criminal appeal in England said just the opposite, rightly or wrongly. With jurisdiction over the time, place, subject matter and the man—here is a man who has impersonated another—the criminal code provides for this; an information has been laid under the code, and yet the magistrate states that he has no jurisdiction. The crown attorney did not investigate the merits of the case at all. On the contrary, he made it quite clear that he did not propose to do so. My contention is that this is merely part of the general laxity that prevails. I used it for that purpose as an illustration.

Mr. SLAGHT: I am glad my right hon. friend has made this explanation, because if he will look up his own language he will find that perhaps in the heat of debate it was much stronger.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the thing is perfectly reasonable. Yesterday we were dealing with the question of employment offices. I say they are no use for the purpose of providing employment. Then there was laxity with respect to the conduct, not only of law and order but generally. The whole atmosphere was saturated with the political viewpoint when these matters were being dealt with.

Mr. ROGERS: Surely my right hon. friend does not say that they are no use in securing employment.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, they are no use.

Mr. ROGERS: Here is the record of the placements. My right hon. friend has not submitted any evidence to justify a general indictment.

Mr. BENNETT: I have submitted evidence, and I say more to my hon. friend; I say that an office which is presided over by a drunken blackmailer is no good.

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend was applying it to the whole employment service of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that any office which is presided over by a drunken blackmailer is no good.

Mr. ROGERS: No one would contest that for a moment, if true.

Mr. BENNETT: Then our case is settled on that phase of it.

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend was speaking of the employment service generally and said it was no use in providing employment.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister knows perfectly well I am confining the present discussion to Kingston, so he cannot generalize in that way. I asked the minister to investigate. The hon. member for Parry Sound is perfectly right when he says that gossip is not evidence, but it is slightly different when it is circulated generally in the community.

The minister is to investigate this. There are two men in Kingston, Sam and Harry Abrahamsky, who are furniture dealers. They have stated in the presence of competent and creditable witnesses that they paid $100 to Mr. Stansbury to be placed on the patronage list in order to sell furniture to the government of Canada. Upon investigation it was found that the minister's private secretary had sent a letter to Kingston saying that the executive had not considered the matter and they were not on the list. These men want their money back. I agree with the hon. member for Parry Sound that street talk is not evidence, but it is striking evidence when a letter from the minister's secretary, written in his absence and seen by others, indicates that that is the condition which prevails, namely, that the executive had not considered the matter and they were not on the list. So much for that.

We come now to the question of the utilization of material. Here is the tender of the Frid Construction Company for the repair work at Fort Henry. This is contract No. 36-87, and it contains this phrase:

> Cement will be delivered to the owners' railway siding for this work.

In the body of the contract appear these words which I shall quote so that there will be no misunderstanding:

> Cement shall be Portland cement supplied by the owner, delivered on the site.

And again:

> The department provides free of cost to contractor and f.o.b. owners' private railway siding all Portland cement.

That cement is the property of the crown. If it is fraudulently converted, that is, used for some purpose other than for which it was consigned—

Mr. ROGERS: I gave my right hon. friend the—

Mr. BENNETT: Just wait a minute, I am speaking. There must be some valid reason. The Frid Construction Company say they made an arrangement with the government, but I ask: When?

Mr. ROGERS: With the deputy minister of highways.

Mr. BENNETT: When?

Mr. ROGERS: Is my right hon. friend now attacking the reputation of the Frid Construction Company?

Mr. BENNETT: I am saying the Frid Construction Company took cement which, under the terms of their bid, was for Fort Henry, and used it on the Crain building at Queens.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. ROGERS: With the consent of the provincial department of highways.

Mr. BENNETT: When? Before or after they did it?

Mr. ROGERS: I shall get that information.

Mr. BENNETT: They replaced that cement in November, as the minister said. Keep in mind it was in November it was done and the cement had been taken months before. Let me deal now with the question of paint. Where did the white lead go?

Mr. ROGERS: Where was it in the first place?

Mr. BENNETT: The man who lost his job will tell you where it was. One step more. The Minister of National Defence says he has not been able to find the commandant's report, and I ask him to look for it more carefully.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. I said definitely he had been communicated with and had said there was no report made at any time to Ottawa.

Mr. BENNETT: Who said?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The commandant, this afternoon.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to stone?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes; that is my information.

Mr. BENNETT: Did the quartermaster say so?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I did not consult him.

Mr. BENNETT: Consult the quartermaster.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On a point of order, before recess the right hon. gentleman made a definite statement.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, he did. He asked if a report had been made by the commandant of the Royal Military College and I said that there was no report.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of National Defence should have about him at least some measure of appearance. I said I was in the hands of the minister. Those are the exact words I used. Obviously I had no knowledge, but I understood that there was a report from the commandant with respect to this stone and I wanted the minister to produce it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): During the recess the adjutant-general telephoned the commandant, and my information, as a result of that conversation, is that there is no such report. I am giving that information to my right hon. friend as it was given to me.

Mr. BENNETT: My information is that there is a report. The quartermaster-general may be the man who made it. That is a matter on which the minister can satisfy himself.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think we had better clear that up.

Mr. DUNNING: If it is not the quartermaster-general, who would be next?

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the question. The question is. Was a report made by any officer of the Royal Military College to the government here with respect to that stone?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was not the question.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the question now. The Minister of Finance says that is a proper question.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): My right hon. friend did not say that before six o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: He said he was in the hands of the minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If he will look up Hansard he will find that he said, "I believe there is a report by the commandant of the Royal Military College.

Mr. BENNETT: But I said I was in the hands of the minister with respect to who made it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I inquired during the recess and there is no such report.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to know if any officer of the Royal Military College made a report on the movement of stone to the Stansbury property by Drinka?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed there was no report made to Ottawa by any officer of the Royal Military College.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report items Nos. 109 and 110 which could not be reported yesterday because the committee was forced to adjourn due on account of there being no quorum?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Yes.

Mr. ROGERS: I believe a correction should be made. Item No. 111 was the first one taken up and passed yesterday.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before announcing the business for Monday, if the house will permit me to do so I should like to say just a word as to the adjournment of last evening. Hansard records the fact that there was not a quorum in the house when it met at eight o'clock. I think it is only right that there should be on the records of Hansard the fact that yesterday was the day on which we were celebrating the King's birthday, and that in front of the houses of parliament there was from seven o'clock until nine the ceremony of the trooping of the colours, which brought very large crowds to the front of the buildings. As a matter of fact, the crowds were so arranged as to make it impossible for hon. members to come from the central gates by the direct approach to the parliament buildings as they are accustomed to do in attending meetings of the house. Several hon. members I know of—myself among them—experienced difficulty in getting to the House of Commons because of the crowds that were about at that time. However, the fact is that most hon. members who were not in the house at the time had been or were witnessing the ceremony of the trooping of the colours. It may have been an excess of patriotism on the king's birthday, or some excess of loyalty towards the flag or the sovereign, but that surely was excusable in the circumstances. I believe that if the hon. members already in the house had waited just a moment or two, as the corridors were pretty well filled with members at the time, it would not have taken above a minute or two to have had the house well filled.

The business on Monday will be any bills that may be on the order paper, and will continue in supply with the departments of Labour, of Mines and Resources, and possibly Public Works. I cannot say in which order they will be taken up.

Mr. BENNETT: Before the house rises, dealing with the matter mentioned by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), I think it is only fair to point out that those who were here would have been quite ready to have become parties to an extension of time; but as there is no house unless there are twenty present, no motion could be put, nor could the house be adjourned until nine o'clock. It was suggested that it might be adjourned until nine o'clock; but the house cannot be adjourned unless there are twenty people in it, because the constitution itself provides in section 48 that it is necessary to have twenty people in order that the house may exercise its powers. Therefore there is no house unless and until there are twenty people in it, and a motion of any kind cannot be made.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am not taking exception to the fact that attention was drawn to the bell, but if the bell had been kept ringing a little longer there would have been enough members present.

Mr. BENNETT: We waited five minutes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps if the house had sung God Save the King for five minutes, the chamber would have been filled.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): If the house had sung it for all that time there would not have been anyone left.

Mr. STIRLING: It would have been a thin house.

It being eight minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, June 13, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO ROAD CONSTRUCTION IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. HANSON:

1. What amount has been contributed by the federal government, since 1930, towards the construction of arterial highways in British Columbia, giving each year separately, and showing: (a) number and names of projects; (b) how much to each project per year?

2. What amount has been contributed by the federal government, since 1930, towards the construction of mining roads, trails and bridges in British Columbia, showing each year separately, and: (a) number and names of projects; (b) how much to each project per year?

FEDERAL CONTRIBUTIONS TO TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY CONSTRUCTION IN QUEBEC PROVINCE

Mr. SYLVESTRE:

1. Did the dominion government contribute to the cost of straightening and rebuilding that portion of the trans-Canada highway between Berthierville and Three Rivers, and to the cost of eliminating the railway crossings on that section?

2. What total amount was paid to date by the dominion government for the project, and what other payments, if any, may be expected in the future from the said government in relation thereto?

3. When were such works started, when were they concluded, by whom were they performed, and at what total cost?

4. Was the project performed under a definite price contract awarded after public and regular call for tenders?

5. If so, in what newspapers were such calls for tenders published, and what persons or corporations tendered?

6. Was the contract approved by the dominion government? If so, in what way, and upon the report of what officer?

7. When were the plans for the said project completed by the Quebec highway department, and on what dates, if any, were requests made by the provincial government of Quebec to the dominion government in connection with the said project?

8. What amount was contributed by the dominion government to the provincial government of Quebec for the improvements of the trans-Canada highway between August 7, 1930, and October 23, 1935?

COMPANIES EXEMPT FROM CORPORATION TAX

Mr. GREEN:

1. What companies have been exempted from corporation tax under the provisions of part XIII of the Income War Tax Act which came into force on May 1, 1936?

2. In respect of what mine or mines have each of the said companies qualified for such exemption?

3. Which of such mines have been classified as new, and which as old mines?

4. In what provinces are the different mines located?

5. What certificates have been issued stating a date upon which a mine is deemed to have come into production under the terms of the said part XIII?

6. What fiscal periods during which income derived from any such mine is exempt from corporation tax have been established in the respective certificates issued?

ROYAL COMMISSIONS

Mr. CASSELMAN:

1. What royal commissions have been appointed by the government of Canada since January 1, 1900?

2. What was the cost of each commission?

3. What was the subject matter investigated by each commission?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

GRAIN HANDLING AT QUEBEC AND MONTREAL—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF DOCUMENTS RESPECTING HANDLING, RATES AND ADMINISTRATION

Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of a letter written by Mr. Roberts, a member of the national harbours board, to Mr. Kaiser of the Louis Dreyfus Company of New York and dated April, 1938, and of a memo attached thereto setting forth an understanding regarding certain reductions of rates for the handling of grain through the port of Quebec.

Mr. HOWE: I desire to oppose this motion, but as it is not debatable under the rules I am unable to state my reasons for opposing it. I therefore ask that it be transferred to notices of motions.

Mr. STEVENS: On a point of order, I submit that it is not competent for the minister to suggest that this be transferred to the order for notices of motions, because that is an order which obviously will not be reached again this session; furthermore I have never yet heard of its being done without the consent or request of the mover. A third point is this—and I am not discussing the matter involved; that can be discussed on another occasion. It is a question of the rights of a member of the House of Commons. I contend that I have an absolute right, as has any other member of this House of Commons, to call for the production of this particular document. It is a document that has entered into the public business of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: He is debating it.

Mr. STEVENS: I am discussing the point of order in this sense, that it is my right to ask for the production of the document. It is the point of order I am discussing, not the subject matter of the motion. I contend that it is not competent under the rules for the government to take refuge in the possible fact that a document may have been marked "private," if the document affects or deals with public business. That is my contention in regard to this document. The matter has been standing for something like ten days, so that there has been ample opportunity for the government to look into it; otherwise I should not object to a request that it stand for the purpose of examination. But the facts are well known. I must respectfully insist that the right of members of parliament to request the production of public documents be upheld on this occasion.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Speaker, the matter which is under discussion is dealt with by standing order No. 51.

> Notices of motion for the production of papers which the member asking for the same intends to move without discussion shall be marked by him with an asterisk and shall be placed by the clerk on the order paper above "Notices of Motions" under the heading "Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers." All such notices when called shall be forthwith disposed of; but if on any such motion a debate be desired, it shall be transferred by the clerk to the order of notices of motions.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) has stated that a debate is desired on this motion, therefore no discretion is to be exercised; it is imperative that the clerk should transfer it to the other order.

Mr. STEVENS: I now rise to a question of privilege.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): What was it the first time?

Mr. STEVENS: It was a point of order. I am not going to allow my right hon. friend, with all the respect I have for him in matters of this and other kinds, to delude the house into thinking that the desire is to debate this motion. If the desire is to debate it, that can be done when the estimates are under consideration. But to transfer the motion to the order which the Minister of Transport has called for would remove it from the realm of debate, because it could not then be debated under any other order, and I should be precluded from discussing it. This matter ought to be discussed. Again I protest against the privileges and liberties of members of the House of Commons being interfered with or overridden by a subterfuge of this kind.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): On the question of privilege—a new matter—my hon. friend is entirely wrong. We have to observe the rules as they are. He says he will not be able to discuss the matter before going into supply or otherwise. Well, if he were doing me the honour of asking my advice I would give him a very simple way of doing it.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It seems to me the rule is very clear. Citation 436 under standing order 51 says:

> Addresses are moved for papers and dispatches from the imperial government; for orders in council; for correspondence between the dominion, British and foreign governments, or between the dominion and provincial governments, or between the dominion and any company, corporation or individual.

It seems to me this clearly comes under that head. Paragraph 437 says:

> The general rule is that information to be obtained from or through any of the revenue departments, any department under the treasury, or any department constituted or regulated by statute, is obtained by means of an order, whilst information to be obtained from or through a Secretary of State or the privy council is obtained by means of an address.
> 438. The information sought must relate to a matter of public importance and be obtainable through a public authority.

Surely there is no reason why this particular document should not be laid before the house. In any case on the point of order from which this discussion started I do not see that anything has occurred which gives it into the power of the minister to say that the moton should be transferred to another order.

Mr. BENNETT: There is another question which seems to me relevant to this discussion, namely, whether this paper should not be produced and laid on the table without any further discussion in view of the reference made to it the other day by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). I think if the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) would look into that phase of it he would be convinced—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is another question.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it is another question. He would be convinced I think that it is a document that should be laid on the table. The general principle of the rule is stated very clearly, that if a public document is referred to by a minister it must be laid on the table in order that access may be had to it by all hon. members of the house so that they may be able to understand and appreciate its contents. The rule is based on sound public policy.

As far as the immediate motion is concerned, it seems to me it cannot be said to be in any sense a debatable motion, because the contents of the paper cannot be anticipated in the discussion. The only question for debate is whether or not it is a public document, and inasmuch as it has been admitted that it is a document written by one of the members of what might be described as a governmental agency—that, it will be recalled, is the description given of it—surely it should now be produced. I am bound to say that I agree with what the right hon. gentleman has said as to the general question of debate, but this is not a debatable matter in the sense in which those words are used in our rules; because there it is, the contents are known, it is a specific document—specific, mark you. It is not as though this were a roving commission seeking to get something that is not known; there is the description of it: (a) the person who wrote it; (b) the person to whom it is written; (c) it clearly touches public business of, I think everyone will agree, the most outstanding kind, namely the question of rates.

I suggest to the minister, with great deference, that it might be well to let the order stand until it can be further looked into. If the Minister of Justice will examine the authorities with the care which he usually displays in matters of this kind I think he will conclude that having regard to all the circumstances this is not a debatable matter within the rules; and in any event the document should be laid on the table, having regard to the fact that the Minister of Transport referred to it in the terms in which he did the other day, and to the further fact that it is a specific document concerning which we have now the names of the addressee and the sender, and knowledge of the kind of public business to which it relates.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does any other hon. member wish to speak to the point of order?

I believe in this matter the Speaker has no discretion. The standing order states clearly that motions on which debate is desired shall be dealt with in a certain way, and, the minister himself having stated that debate is desired, I think the standing order must be followed and this motion be transferred to the order, notices of motions. I so rule.

Mr. STEVENS: With very great regret, Mr. Speaker, and I think for the first time in my twenty-seven years in the house, I am reluctantly compelled to appeal from your ruling.

Mr. SPEAKER put the question as follows:

Mr. Stevens having moved that an order of the house do issue for a copy of a letter written by Mr. Roberts, a member of the national harbours board, to Mr. Kaiser, of the Louis Dreyfus Company of New York, and dated April, 1938, and of a memo attached thereto setting forth an understanding regarding certain reductions of rates for the handling of grain through the port of Quebec; the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) having asked that the said motion be transferred to notices of motions, and the Speaker having decided that it is in order so to do, Mr. Stevens appeals from the ruling of the Speaker.

The house divided on the question: Shall the ruling of the Speaker be sustained? And the ruling was sustained on the following division:

Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, draft agreements or other documents during the months of February, March, April and May, 1938, passing between the Minister of Transport, the national harbours board or any member or official of the said board, and the Louis Dreyfus Company of New York regarding the handling of grain at the port of Quebec or the port of Montreal or dealing with proposed reduction of rates in the handling of grain at the same ports.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, there is no such correspondence except to the extent that this motion may refer to the previous motion. The motion then becomes identical with the previous one, and I would ask that it be disposed of in the same manner and transferred to notices of motions.

Mr. STEVENS: I simply rise to protest against this method of evading the production of public documents.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house that the motion be transferred to notices of motions?

Mr. BENNETT: On division.

Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other documents during the months of February, March, April and May, 1938, passing between the Minister of Transport, the national harbours board or any of its officials and the board of grain commissioners, its chairman, its secretary or any of its officials regarding the rates on the handling of grain at the port of Quebec or the port of Montreal or regarding the administration of the Canada Grain Act in relation to the said ports.

Mr. HOWE: Return tabled.

LANDRACE AND YORK HOGS

Mr. BLAIR:

A complete report of all tests made by the experimental farms of the landrace and York hogs, during the years 1936, 1937 and 1938.

AMOS, QUE., POST OFFICE

Mr. BLAIS:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents dated from 1935, with respect to the post office at Amos, Chapleau county, province of Quebec?

RADIO STATION CKGW

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale):

For a copy of the lease originally made by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation or by the Canadian radio commission for the leasing of radio station CKGW at Toronto;

Also, a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents passing between the proprietors of the said station CKGW and the Canadian radio commission and/or the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation;

And also, a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents passing between the proprietors of the said station CKGW and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation relative to the termination of the lease above mentioned.

Mr. HOWE: As the subject matter of this motion is now before the courts, I would ask that it pass with the usual reservation.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL PARKS

AMENDMENT OF EXISTING LEGISLATION AFFECTING WAWASKESY, ELK ISLAND AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND PARKS

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the National Parks Act and the Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island National Parks Act, 1936, to abolish the Wawaskesy national park in the province of Alberta and vest the land in the province; to change the boundaries of the Elk Island national park in the said province by adding to and parting with certain described areas and transferring the latter to the province; and to withdraw certain lands from the Prince Edward Island national park and vest the same in his majesty in the right of the province.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

SMALL LOANS

PROVISIONS RESPECTING INCORPORATION, POWERS AND LICENSING OF COMPANIES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce an act to regulate the cost of small loans, also with respect to the incorporation and powers of small loan companies, and to provide for the annual licensing of money lenders, for the administration of the said act, and the annual assessment of each licencee for the purpose of meeting the expense incurred by the government in such administration.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday the 15th of June next, and all subsequent Wednesdays until the end of the session, the sittings shall in every respect be under the same rules provided for other days.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the committees of the house are still sitting in the mornings, it is an intolerable burden to place upon hon. members to deprive them of the one night in the week in which they can catch up with their work. I think it must be known to all who are familiar with the work being done by the committees that they have been very busily engaged, and by having this one night in the week hon. members are enabled to do much of their work that has fallen in arrears. I think that until the committees have ceased to function in the mornings this night should be left free. When the committee work has been concluded then this motion could be adopted. That is my personal view.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If there is any desire on the part of hon. members not to sit on Wednesday evenings rather than to sit with a view to expediting the work of the house, I shall not press the motion. In view of what the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has just said I am quite content that the motion should drop. I do believe, however, that most hon. members of the house would much prefer to sit on Wednesday evenings with the idea of getting through.

Mr. BENNETT: I was very careful to say, until such time as the committees had completed their work.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall put a motion again next week for the Wednesday evening of that week.

Motion dropped.

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 28 RESPECTING COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the provision of standing order 28 respecting the committee of supply be suspended for the sittings of Thursday, 16th June and Friday, 17th June, 1938.

He said: As hon. members are aware, Mr. Speaker leaves the chair without motion being put on Thursday. As it is the desire of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) to present his budget statement while His Honour the Speaker is in the chair, I am asking the house to agree to the suspension of this rule.

Mr. CAHAN: Why mention Friday, June 17?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The Speaker also leaves the chair on Fridays without question being put, and I had assumed that it would be the wish of the house to continue the debate on the budget on Friday, in which event by the adoption of this motion, the Speaker would still be in the chair. However, if it were decided on Thursday night that it would not be advisable to continue the debate on the budget on Friday, we could return to the usual order of business on that day.

Mr. CAHAN: It has been usual to allow a day or two to elapse.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I shall be glad to allow to elapse whatever time hon. gentlemen opposite may wish. If the house will permit, I shall amend the present motion by striking out "Friday, June 17." The house perhaps will permit me to substitute "committee of ways and means" for "committee of supply." Either is quite correct, but I believe it would be more appropriate to have the Minister of Finance make his budget statement on a motion for the house to resolve itself into a committee on ways and means. The motion as amended would read:

That the provisions of standing order 28 respecting the committee of ways and means be suspended for the sitting of Thursday, 16th June, 1938.

Motion as amended agreed to.

MOTION FOR COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY SUBSEQUENT TO COMMITTEE RISING FOR WANT OF QUORUM—NECESSITY FOR UNANIMOUS CONSENT

On the orders of the day.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Before the house proceeds with the orders of the day I desire to direct attention to a matter which perhaps may be of more importance in the future than it is at the present time. On Friday last the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) moved:

That this house do now resolve itself into a committee to consider of a supply to be granted to His Majesty.

That motion was made in consequence of the committee having lapsed owing to there being no quorum on the preceding evening. Citation 47 under standing order 3 provides:

If the committee of supply, or ways and means, rises because there is not a quorum present, and therefore makes no report and does not ask leave to sit again, a motion with forty-eight hours' notice, unless unanimous consent is granted, must be made that the committee do sit again on some specified date.

I notice both in Hansard and in the Votes and Proceedings it does not appear that this was done by unanimous consent. I rise merely to suggest, having regard to future parliaments, that it might be desirable to add the words, "by unanimous consent," and thereby conform to the rule.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: As a matter of fact the house did give unanimous consent.

Mr. BENNETT: No, nothing was said about it.

PRIVILEGE—MR. ROGERS

PRESS REPORT OF PROCEEDINGS OF JUNE 9 CONCERNING THE EMPLOYMENT SERVICE OF CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, before the orders of the day are called I wish to rise to a question of privilege in connection with a Canadian Press report of the discussions of Thursday, which appeared in the afternoon papers of Friday. There is the following reference to dismissal of officials of the Employment Service of Canada, and the statement is attributed to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and is given in quotations. The statement is to the following effect:

The men who occupied positions in them were dismissed when he—

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

The reference being to me as Minister of Labour.

—came to office. That, in my opinion, is exactly contrary to what was intended when this statute was enacted.

The leader of the opposition made a number of allegations at that time, but I have not been able to discover this was one of them. In any event the statement as given is absolutely untrue. No federal employee of the Employment Service of Canada was dismissed or has been dismissed since the present administration came into office. I hope that the appropriate correction will be made.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the same question of privilege, I noticed what the minister has referred to. I was particularly careful to make it clear, and if he will look at Hansard he will see that it is removed from any possible doubt, that the removals or dismissals were by the provincial and not the federal administration.

Mr. ROGERS: I said, Mr. Speaker, that I had not been able to discover that he had made that statement.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

MEASURE TO ASSIST THE CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES—PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO LOW RENTAL HOUSES AND MUNICIPAL TAXES

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 145, to assist the construction of houses.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in view of the manner in which the house bore with me in a lengthy and detailed address on this matter when the financial resolution was before the house, I do not think I need at this time add anything to the remarks I then made. They will be found in Hansard of last Wednesday. The discussion which took place on the financial resolution should enable the house to make better progress with respect to this matter in committee than could be made by a further general discussion on the second reading, but that is of course, for members of the house to decide. For myself I think I said on the occasion of the introduction of the financial resolution all that I would desire to say on the second reading.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I intimated the other day that the speech made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) on the financial resolution was really a second reading speech, and if you will permit us to reserve our right to discuss the principles involved in this mesure, when we are in committee, I think the minister's suggestion will serve a useful service and expedite the conduct of business. There are certain matters in the measure as it stands that certainly I cannot think are workable, and therefore it will be my duty to point out that they will not be useful for the purpose intended; but there is no point in discussing them now if the question of principles can be referred to when the house is in committee and the appropriate sections are under consideration.

Mr. DUNNING: If the house will permit me, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that it is rather difficult to define closely the principle upon which we are deciding on the second reading of this bill. There is of course a separate principle involved in each of the three parts, and it is conceivable that certain members of the house might be quite in favour of the principle involved in part I but opposed to the principle involved in part II, or indeed in favour of any two of the three and against the third. So it will be necessary, I think, to permit discussion of the principle of each part of the bill as we proceed with the discussion in committee, and I certainly shall not stand upon any question of the principle of the bill having been passed upon on the second reading. I think we can expedite business by getting on with the committee stage.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (a)—"approved lending institution."

Mr. DUNNING: It will be seen in section 2 that there is some amendment of the definitions contained in the present Dominion Housing Act. Some of the changes are merely matters of language; others involve quite a change. I would call the attention of the committee particularly to paragraph (e) of this section, which defines "lending value" to mean:

—the estimated cost of construction of a house or its appraised value, whichever is the lesser.

There was no definition of "lending value" in the former act.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to (a) may I point out that "approved lending institution" as defined means those institutions that were existing as such under the housing act of 1935.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: The definition in (a) goes on to say:

—and any lending institution approved by the governor in council for the purpose of making loans under this part.

Is that sufficiently comprehensive to permit of the exercise of the power?—because it is the old definition that we are sticking to with respect to those that have been approved up to 1935. It is only the language I question.

Mr. DUNNING: The intention, and the legal draftsmen were so instructed, was to enable the existing agreements to continue, and that other lending institutions should have the capacity to enter into agreements. But more than that, in view of the fact that possibly a different type of agreement is contemplated by the new legislation, the intention was to enable new agreements to be entered into where necessary with lending institutions which are at present approved under the existing legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: I realize that, but I doubt if the language is broad enough to cover the case of new lending institutions approved under this section. That is the only thing I had in mind.

Mr. DUNNING: It says, "and any." It could not be much broader, could it?

Mr. BENNETT: It is only the way it is put.

Mr. REID: I wonder if the minister has a list of the approved lending institutions under the old act. In some parts of British Columbia, even yet splendid citizens are being turned down by the present lending institutions. I had a letter the other day from a member of the Vancouver police force, a man who had had a steady job for years, and the lending institutions would not approve of a loan on a house for him estimated to cost $3,000. I should like to have a list of the approved lending institutions of British Columbia.

Mr. DUNNING: The list at present consists of thirteen life insurance companies, all of which I think may be described as national institutions—certainly none of them are local to British Columbia; then there are thirteen trust and mortgage companies, and I do not notice any British Columbia address as the head office of any of these companies. Then there are three other lending institutions, of which two are Caisse Populaire in the province of Quebec, and one, the Western Savings and Loan Association of Winnipeg. I believe the only parties making loans in British Columbia at the present time are those national lending institutions to which I have referred. I will not now, on this definition section, debate the question whether loans were made that should not have been made; that is difficult to answer. I will tell my hon. friends from British Columbia, however, that at the present time there are more loans being made in British Columbia under the housing act than in any other province of the dominion.

Mr. REID: That is readily understood when one looks at the credit conditions of the province and realizes that as far as mortgages are concerned the situation there is one of the best. In the preamble it is provided that the localities are to be designated by the minister, and one question I should like to have answered is this.

The CHAIRMAN: I would remind the hon. member that we have not yet taken up the preamble; we shall come to that later.

Mr. REID: I realize that, but I thought that under this section it was competent to mention something that appears in the preamble.

Mr. DUNNING: The matter to which the hon. member was about to refer will come up properly under another section of the bill, and it will very much facilitate discussion of this rather complex type of legislation if we confine discussion as closely as we reasonably can to the sections under review. Of course, I am in the hands of the committee but I am sure that any question that arises in its proper place will be fully discussed.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Will the minister be good enough to put on Hansard the names of the lending institutions?

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. ESLING: All municipalities are designated as lending authorities, are they not?

Mr. DUNNING: They may be. Local authority means any province, municipality, society, association or corporation having authority to undertake a housing scheme.

Mr. ESLING: I was referring particularly to municipalities. Is it not a fact that in British Columbia no municipality can exercise its authority until the next provincial legislature amends the municipal act? It may be well to have that known right now in order to avoid a lot of useless correspondence.

Mr. DUNNING: That was true with respect to the period since 1935 when the existing Dominion Housing Act was passed, for the reason that the definition of local housing authority is the same in this part of the new bill as it was in the old Dominion Housing Act, so that any amendment which might have been necessary to the municipal acts in the various provinces to enable municipalities to undertake housing schemes could, and in some cases may, have been made by provincial legislatures in the intervening period. I am not sure whether in a number of provinces at any rate specific amendment would be required to enable the municipality itself to undertake a housing scheme under this part, but certain it is that work that has been done—over seventeen million dollars worth of building that has been done under the existing Dominion Housing Act—has all been done by virtue of agreements between the Minister of Finance, as provided for in that act, and lending institutions. There is no case in the dominion where the municipality itself has taken advantage of that provision under the existing statute. It was thought wise, in carrying forward important parts of the existing statute into this bill, to leave the provision which would enable municipalities to assume the position of lending authority by agreement with the minister if they desired to do so and if, of course, as my hon. friend points out, they have authority so to do from the provincial legislatures. We cannot compel it but we can provide for them to act in that capacity provided they have both the legislative authority from the province and the desire to do it.

Mr. ESLING: In order to clarify the situation it may be pointed out that there were several municipalities that did desire to take advantage of the housing act. The matter was placed before the union of municipalities and that body was asked to pass a resolution asking the provincial government to provide methods by which we could take advantage of the act. But it has not been done and therefore cannot be done until the next meeting of the provincial legislature in Victoria. That should be known and well known in order to avoid a lot of useless correspondence, because so far as British Columbia is concerned, the act cannot become operative until the next session of the legislature.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend is going rather too far. The act can become operative, but the particular method of operating it by municipal action under this part cannot. He may be right in that, but certainly the other method provided by this part of the bill can continue as it is continuing at the present time to operate in British Columbia. I am pleased to be able to make this statement to the hon. member for New Westminster as well as to other members from British Columbia, who have questioned me about the matter. I undertook some time ago to have the director of housing in the Department of Finance pay a visit to that province in an endeavour to find a means of meeting problems which have arisen there, and I have very encouraging reports from him as to the manner in which the provisions of the present housing act can be extended particularly to the interior of the province, from which locality there have come very many complaints of lack of facilities for obtaining loans under the act. I do not say that we can remove every difficulty. Of course, my hon. friend from Kootenay West is quite correct when he says that so far as the municipality acting is concerned, a change in provincial legislation in British Columbia will be necessary; but no municipality anywhere in the dominion has yet taken advantage of this particular feature of the present Dominion Housing Act. At the same time we felt it wise to retain the opportunity for them to do so if they received the necessary authority from the province and desired to take advantage of it.

Mr. MASSEY: Would the minister be good enough to give the distribution by provinces and by years of expenditures so far under the old act?

Mr. DUNNING: Up to May 31 is the last figure I have. I will give the number of family units and the value of loans approved. I have a good deal more information but it will be simpler to stick to the expression "family units" than to complicate the number of loans with units provided.

Mr. MASSEY: This is the total to date?

Mr. DUNNING: Total to March 31, 1938, by provinces:

	Amount loaned	Family units provided
Prince Edward Island	$ 54,034	10
Nova Scotia	1,532,983	351
New Brunswick	328,917	78
Quebec	4,953,627	1,057
Ontario	7,910,287	1,959
Manitoba	425,414	87
Saskatchewan	8,200	2
Alberta	....	....
British Columbia	2,136,942	705
	$17,350,404	4,249

The average loan per family unit as of May 31 was $4,083. I think that covers the information for which my hon. friend asked.

Mr. SENN: I think the minister said the other day that it is the desire of the government to extend the benefits of this legislation to all parts of the country, to the rural sections and particularly the villages. In the last year or two there has been reluctance on the part of some lending institutions to visit these rural communities and look over applications. Is there anything in this bill which makes it obligatory for an approval lending institution at least to investigate an application from a man residing in a rural district? I understood the minister to say that certain financial aid is to be given, but even then it might not be considered profitable for the company to do it in an isolated case in a particular locality. Is there anything in the bill to oblige the companies to treat all applications on exactly the same basis?

Mr. DUNNING: No, there is nothing in the bill to compel people to lend their money. That positively is not in the bill. But if my hon. friend will wait until we reach section 4, that whole range of questions will then come under review.

Mr. SENN: I was asking if they were being compelled not to lend money but to investigate the application.

Mr. DUNNING: We can induce, but I doubt if we can compel.

Mr. McNIVEN: Have any of the lending institutions in making their applications for approval indicated unwillingness to lend money in certain parts of Canada? I notice that in Saskatchewan there were only two loans, both in the city of Prince Albert.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not recall lending institutions having indicated unwillingness to lend in certain parts of Canada particularly. In fact since I first had anything to do with the act we have endeavoured in every way to get lending institutions to make agreements with the dominion. It has been a slow process to persuade them to enter into agreements at all. I think I can say that it is only during the last year or year and a half we have had anything like the swing of progress in that direction which I should like to have seen. We have not attempted to dictate to lending institutions where they should lend. We have however endeavoured to persuade them to look for business in areas from which it was apparent, from correspondence coming to the department, that a demand existed from people who were able to give the necessary security and under conditions which would enable lending to be done with, in our opinion, reasonable certainty that the loan would be repaid. It will be seen however from my speech of last Wednesday, and from the contents of this bill as we proceed with it, that the great effort with respect to part I is to overcome the deficiency which I pointed out on Wednesday last, that there are considerable areas in all provinces which up to now have not been able to get loans under the provisions of the housing act. When we come to section 4 we shall have opportunity of discussing the precise means by which we propose to overcome that situation. I think discussion on section 4 will clarify the intention in that regard.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The minister said these lending institutions were reluctant to enter into agreements. What reasons did they advance, or did they advance any reasons, for being reluctant?

Mr. DUNNING: Not always the same. There is, to begin with, the general reluctance to enter into an entirely new method of doing business. That had to be overcome by a process of education as to what the Dominion Housing Act really meant from the standpoint of the lending institutions. And there are many institutions which do not particularly like the idea of being in partnership with the government. The process is one of educating the lending institutions in this method of cooperating with the government in meeting a problem. As to specific objections, there was the general question of the cost of operation. We were forcing quite a low rate of interest for the borrower from the standpoint of the lending institutions, and at the same time expecting them to make loans. The cost of making loans under the existing housing act, particularly in the smaller communities, averaged quite high. My hon. friend of course can understand that it is very much cheaper to make loans in a city where one man can inspect the construction of twenty or thirty houses at one time than it is in a community forty or fifty miles away from the company's office where only two or three or four loans are involved. That is a problem which we hope to solve by section 4 of the bill.

Mr. MASSEY: With respect to the tables the minister gave showing the expenditure and number of units, can he say how many of the 4,249 housing units were rural houses?

Mr. DUNNING: In what sense does my hon. friend use the word "rural"?

Mr. MASSEY: In rural communities rather than in municipalities.

Mr. DUNNING: In small urban communities rather than in cities?

Mr. MASSEY: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Of course this is not a farm loan act.

Mr. MASSEY: I agree.

Mr. DUNNING: I have here a list of about one hundred communities in Ontario.

Mr. MASSEY: It has been stated that there was difficulty in getting some of these institutions to come and investigate a situation outside of cities or small towns such as a farmhouse away from a municipality. Is that reflected in the number of units already built under this plan?

Mr. DUNNING: There is a very wide distribution among small urban communites in Ontario, but not nearly so much so in other provinces. As to the province of Quebec, apart from the fifteen or sixteen municipalities which are comprised in the metropolitan area of Montreal there are about a dozen communities in which loans have been made; but Quebec is one of the provinces from which complaints have come. For instance, there is the Gaspe peninsula. It can be readily understood that while there are a number of thriving small communities on the Gaspe peninsula, it is difficult to get the lending institutions to undertake the expense of making loans, taking care of the cost of inspection during construction, and so on. That is one of the areas I have in mind that may be helped by section 4 of the bill. In New Brunswick there are about a dozen districts in which loans have been made. In Nova Scotia I should say there were about fifteen communities. In Prince Edward Island there is only one, Charlottetown. In Manitoba, apart from the district that might be called the Winnipeg metropolitan area, there are only three places in which loans have been made. My hon. friend from Regina was not quite correct with regard to Saskatchewan; one loan is in Prince Albert and one is in Yorkton. In British Columbia, if we exclude the Vancouver metropolitan area, there are only nine municipalities in which loans actually had been made up to the end of May last.

Mr. NEILL: That is in municipalities, but I think my hon. friend was inquiring more about rural districts. The minister used the word "urban". That indicates an organized district, but I should like to know if any loans have been made in rural communities not big enough to be towns or villages, just settlements of five or six hundred people.

Mr. DUNNING: Frequent reference is made here in this list of areas in which loans have been made to townships, but of course I must make it clear that this is not a farm loan act. Under this bill, it is not possible to make loans on farms. The loans are on the homes, and as a practical question one can see immediately how difficult it would be to have a separate mortgage on a farm house with the farm under a farm mortgage. It was never contemplated by the authors of the original bill, I am sure, that it should meet that situation. But there is no reason why, with the changes we are proposing in section 4—and you are still compelling me to discuss that section before we reach it—the object of the bill should not be attained, which is to widen the application of the principles of the housing act in its relationship to communities which are not now being served by it, no matter what their class may be; but of course I cannot pretend that it is a farm loan act. We have a farm loan act on the statute books, and we have a farm loan board operating. Under this bill we cannot make loans on farms, but the lending institutions can make loans on rural homes.

Mr. NEILL: But they are not doing it.

Mr. DUNNING: I am not prepared to say definitely that they are not doing it at all at the present time, but I am prepared to say they are not doing it to the extent to which it ought to be done. One of the major objects of the present legislation is to encourage the development of that sort of thing. That will be clear as we proceed with the bill, I am sure.

Mr. MASSEY: The point I had in mind was that a house is a house, whether it is on a farm or in the middle of a thriving community, and if the farm exists before the house is built that farm mortgage cannot possibly take in that house, because it was not built at the time the mortgage was obtained. This loan is to be advanced on the new house that is to be built.

Mr. McCANN: You cannot separate them.

Mr. MASSEY: Why not? The house has not been built; the two did not exist together.

Mr. DUNNING: The house has not been built, but if the farm is under mortgage the land upon which the house will be built forms part of the security for that mortgage. How can you arrange to take a piece of land out of an existing mortgage and place another mortgage on it? And what security value would attach to the house if there was not also the security of the land on which it was built? It is an impossible thing, from a practical point of view.

Mr. MASSEY: But the value of the property increases to the extent of the value of the new house to be constructed on that property.

Mr. DUNNING: It may be, and that can be dealt with under the farm loan act.

Mr. MASSEY: But if the mortgage is held by one of the existing lending companies, as it may be, then the position is not jeopardized from the point of view of the company.

Mr. DUNNING: May I clear that up immediately. If the mortgage on a farm is held by a lending institution which is willing to advance to that farm owner enough money to build a house, there is provision for that already; but when you try to visualize a situation in connection with which one mortgagee would have a mortgage on the house and another mortgagee would have a mortgage on the rest of the farm, it becomes impossible.

Mr. MASSEY: I did not have that in mind.

Mr. DUNNING: The situation where one mortgage exists is already dealt with otherwise than by this statute.

Mr. THOMPSON: Would not the same condition exist in an urban municipality where there was an existing mortgage?

Mr. DUNNING: Well, there could not be a mortgage on an urban property.

Mr. THOMPSON: On the land.

Mr. DUNNING: The land has to be brought in as security before the house can be built on it, under this law. It would have to be cleared off to enable the mortgage to be given on the whole property, the land as well as the buildings.

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (b)—"Cost of construction."

Mr. ISNOR: I think the other day the minister said it was under this part that he would be willing to advance sums to these companies or firms to carry on their investigations. Would that come under this paragraph?

Mr. DUNNING: No; that is dealt with later on.

Mr. BENNETT: I think this section uses language rather too broad in regard to legal expenses. In the old act we limited it to expenses in connection with the loans. As it stands now it might involve litigation in connection with the acquiring of title, and matters of that sort. The cost of construction should be considered only in respect to the loan itself, in my judgment.

Mr. DUNNING: The view expressed by my right hon. friend is that the words should be "connected with any loan," and we are proposing to make it "necessary to complete the house." That is a minor amendment, but it has arisen out of the experience the legal officers have had with odd, peculiar cases. That is all.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I had in mind. Should we pay legal expenses for the purpose of completing the house, where it may involve litigation in no sense related to the loan, but which must be disposed of before the loan can be made? I have particular cases which have arisen in which litigation was pending. A man wants a loan, and he gets that litigation wound up and acquires title. In doing so he spends $150 or $200. As this reads now it is broad enough to include that amount in the cost of the house, and in my judgment it has no relation to such cost. I think there was some discussion along that line either in this house or out of it. It is always difficult; you cannot cover every case, and we finally arrived at the conclusion at that time that it was wise to say "connected with any loan."

Mr. DUNNING: Would my right hon. friend read the definition of "lending value" in paragraph (e) in relation to paragraph (b)? We were of opinion that that covered the probability of the extraordinary case.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps it does.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Under paragraph (c) would money be loaned to any of these lending companies by the government for the erection of apartment houses?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; it is being loaned to-day.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph (c) agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (d)—lending institution.

Mr. BENNETT: In paragraph (f) we say "association or corporation." I notice that in the old act, which was prepared hurriedly, the same words are used, but I think it is desirable to use the same language when we are dealing with the same thing. The words "company" and "corporation" are used for the same purpose. It should be either "company" or "corporation."

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend means that in both cases we should use either the word "company" or the word "corporation."

Mr. BENNETT: I submit that, yes. Of course there may be some reason for having it otherwise.

Mr. DUNNING: There are some insurance companies which are not companies; they are associations.

Mr. BENNETT: That is all right. The word "association" is all right, and should be left in the paragraph.

Mr. DUNNING: It is intended to cover in those two definitions all possible types of institution which could be dealing in this matter; up to now there has been no difficulty.

Mr. BENNETT: A trust company is not in the same class as an insurance company, and I assume that under this measure trust companies are making loans. We will need to add the word "trust."

Mr. DUNNING: We have a number of trust companies.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the word "trust" should be inserted after the word "insurance," because in this I believe we scarcely regard a trust company as being in the same class as the other classes mentioned.

Mr. DUNNING: If my colleague will so move, I will agree to including the word "trust." There will be a comma after the word "insurance," and then the word "trust."

Mr. ROGERS: I so move.

Mr. McIVOR: Do these lending institutions have to be guaranteed by the provinces? Whether they be insurance companies or private companies, must they all be guaranteed?

Mr. DUNNING: Not under this part of the bill. There is no guarantee by a province contemplated under part I of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: No more than there was under the old act.

Mr. DUNNING: That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: It would remove any possible chance of difficulty if we used the words "company or corporation" in line 17, and then in line 23 the same words—"association, company or corporation." I say that because we refer to the Toronto General Trusts Corporation and to the Royal Trust Company, which is incorporated by statute.

Mr. DUNNING: I see no difficulty in accepting that.

Mr. BENNETT: I suggest it only to avoid possible difficulties.

Mr. ROGERS: I move that the words "or corporation" be added after the word "company" in line 17.

Mr. DUNNING: The right hon. gentleman indicated an addition after the word "association" in line 23. It could scarcely be a company in that connection. It is a borrower.

Mr. BENNETT: In its present form the paragraph reads,—

"Local authority" means any province, municipality, society, association.

We would add the word "company" before the word "corporation."

Mr. DUNNING: "Having authority to undertake a housing scheme."

Mr. BENNETT: The minister dealt with a case the other day of a municipality creating a separate branch of its activity, and giving it a name. That is why I suggest that the word "company" is hardly an apt word to use. Neither is the word "corporation."

Mr. DUNNING: "Association or society."

Mr. BENNETT: "Association" is hardly right.

Mr. ROGERS: Do you mean "housing commission"?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I mean.

Mr. DUNNING: "Association or corporation."

Mr. BENNETT: I think the expression "association or corporation" covers it.

Mr. DUNNING: And after the word "corporation" we could add the word "commission."

Mr. BENNETT: I would not make the suggestion were it not for what the minister said the other day in respect to independent bodies, which are really corporations, but which operate to all intents and purposes as though they were separate entities.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps the Minister of Labour would be good enough to move that the words "or commission" be inserted after the word "corporation" in line 23.

Mr. BENNETT: And take out the word "or" before the word "corporation." I am taking up the time of the committee only in consequence of what was said the other day as to what might be desirable to meet the case.

Mr. ROGERS: I move accordingly.

The CHAIRMAN: That is an amendment to paragraph (f).

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Have we finished with paragraph (e)?

Mr. DUNNING: We had better pass the amendments first.

Mr. NEILL: We have not yet passed paragraph (e).

Mr. BENNETT: We were going to have the amendments first, so as to get them out of the way. The section has not yet been passed.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps the chairman would be good enough to read paragraph (d) as amended, so that we could carry it.

The CHAIRMAN: It is as follows:

(d) "Lending institution" means a loan, insurance, trust or other company or corporation authorized to lend money on the security of real or immovable property;

Paragraph (d) as amended agreed to.

Mr. DUNNING: We will now discuss paragraph (e).

On section 2, paragraph (e)—"Lending value."

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I have encountered a certain indefiniteness and have had some difficulty in understanding paragraph (e). It states:

"Lending value" means the estimated cost of construction of a house or its appraised value whichever is the lesser;

If that paragraph is taken literally, then of course the land is left out.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Under paragraph (b) the cost of construction is intended to include the land.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, absolutely.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): For the sake of clarity I suggest, if it meets with the approval of the minister, that single quotation marks be placed around the expression "cost of construction".

Mr. DUNNING: From the standpoint of legal construction I am advised that there is no doubt about it. I can tell my hon. friend that when this section came to me I raised the same point. The legal draftsmen assured me that having defined the cost of construction as including the cost of the land, it automatically applies in other respects.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): All right.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. HEAPS: Before the section is carried may I say that under paragraph (c) it would appear that a "house" means a building intended exclusively for human habitation, comprising one or more self-contained dwelling places. If a person wishes to erect a building containing four dwellings can he do so under this measure?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, surely.

Mr. HEAPS: If it is an apartment block?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, it is being done to-day.

Mr. HEAPS: I wonder if that is the intent and purpose of the bill?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes. Under the existing housing act we make loans on apartments.

Mr. BERTRAND (Prescott): Would a loan be considered on a schoolhouse?

Mr. DUNNING: No, it must be used for human habitation.

Mr. McGREGOR: This would not apply to a store with a house attached?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Paragraph (e) agreed to.

On section 2, paragraph (f)—"Local authority".

The CHAIRMAN: There is an amendment to paragraph (f). I shall read the paragraph as it is amended:

(f) "Local authority" means any province, municipality, society, association, corporation or commission having authority to undertake a housing scheme.

Mr. BRADETTE: I do not know that that would cover all sections of Canada. In the northern parts of Ontario and Quebec we have what are known as unorganized districts, in which there are no local municipalities. There would be no machinery through which they could apply for loans under this scheme.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, they could apply as individuals. Paragraph (f), dealing with "local authority" applies to a certain way of operating under part I. It has no reference at all to the individual applying for a loan. He may apply just the same. It does not matter where he is situated.

Mr. BRADETTE: He will have to apply to the provincial government.

Mr. DUNNING: No, not to any government, but to a lending institution. This part of the bill has nothing to do with the administration of a housing scheme by a municipality except that we are continuing the provisions of the existing Dominion Housing Act whereby a municipality, if it wishes, may assume the position of a lending institution to lend to its own people. The reason for the definition in paragraph (f) is to define those classes of municipalities, commissions, corporations and so forth which can, if they wish, become lenders under the act to their own people. None have done so up to the present and I do not anticipate any great move in that direction. So far as a new borrower is concerned, normally he would get into touch with a lending institution which has entered into an agreement with the minister, as contemplated in paragraph (d).

Mr. BRADETTE: The minister realizes that lending institutions do not operate in those sections of the country to which I have just referred.

Mr. DUNNING: That matter could be discussed under section 4.

Mr. NEILL: What is covered by "association"? Does that mean an incorporated body, and, if so, under what law or laws would it have to come? Out in the west we have the habit of calling a dozen or so men who get together for some purpose an association. There is no formality or legality about it at all.

Mr. DUNNING: The concluding words, "having authority to undertake a housing scheme" indicate the meaning of the clause.

Mr. NEILL: The association would have to have that power?

Mr. DUNNING: That would have to be among its powers.

Mr. NEILL: How would it have to be incorporated, under the Benevolent Societies Act, or what?

Mr. DUNNING: The incorporation is not nearly so important as the next step which they would have to take, that is, satisfy the Minister of Finance that they could effectively and reasonably safely lend money under this act. The necessary qualification under paragraph (f) is that an agreement must be entered into with the Minister of Finance for the purpose of lending money. An association would have to satisfy the minister as to its ability so to do and as to its authority under whatever laws may exist in the province in which it is situated and in which it is likely to lend money. Otherwise the minister would not enter into an agreement.

Mr. McIVOR: Does that mean that a group of men who were sound financially could not operate a scheme of this kind?

Mr. DUNNING: They would have to band themselves together in a manner which would permit them to enter into an agreement with the minister. The manner of banding together is the only point that would arise under this clause.

Mr. McIVOR: A group of men who were sound financially could not make an agreement with the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: They would have to have some corporate existence in order to undertake a scheme over a period of years. There must be continuity. I should be pleased to see individuals of the type referred to form themselves into companies for the purpose of making loans under this scheme. They would have to demonstrate financial soundness and guarantee the necessary continuity to carry on the scheme.

Mr. McIVOR: I think that is one of the fine things in the bill.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How would the cost of a house be estimated under paragraph (e)?

Mr. DUNNING: Plans and specifications, quantities, contract prices and all that sort of thing would enter into it.

Mr. LANDERYOU: In the various areas?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Paragraph (f) as amended agreed to.

Paragraph (g) agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph (a)—Investigations and plans.

Mr. DUNNING: A change has been made from the present act due to the fact that there is now no economic council. Under this section the minister is given the power, with the approval of the governor in council, to investigate certain matters which were to be dealt with by the proposed economic council under the former legislation.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How is it intended to set up investigations?

Mr. DUNNING: That would depend upon the thing to be investigated. A decision would have to be reached in each particular case. For instance, at the present time the director of housing has been sent to British Columbia because of a particular type of complaint that has developed there. He is meeting boards of trade, municipal authorities and interested people who want to borrow money and is advising and helping them in connection with taking advantage of the provisions of the act. That is one type of investigation. I can conceive of others where a community will desire to do something in the way of a community effort in the development of a particular area. We are being written to constantly by people who do not understand all the implications of the act. We are continually putting people, either in groups or as individuals, into touch with the lending institutions in order to facilitate the general move forward in connection with housing. There are a thousand different things that arise from time to time requiring investigation. In connection with plans we have had two competitions, both dominion-wide. These were for low cost houses, and in connection with these competitions we had the cooperation of the architects' organizations. Prizes were awarded for the best plans and the judging was by a committee of eminent people who were representative of the different parts of the country and classes of business. At the present time these low cost housing plans are available to anyone who wishes them for $10 per set. There are ten different sets of plans, all for houses costing $3,000 more or less, varying with different localities. We have already sold a considerable number of these plans. All of this work is intended to stimulate public interest in better housing, particularly in low cost housing.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Would this investigation include a survey of slum areas in the large cities?

Mr. DUNNING: That would not come under this part of the bill.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Is there any intention to carry on an investigation of that kind?

Mr. DUNNING: I would not say that we have the power to investigate slum areas, but part II of the bill is designed to provide a remedy for those conditions. We must remember that housing and public health in our cities are matters within the jurisdiction of the principal governments. We must step carefully and not get into that too deeply. When we come to part II it will be found that inducements are offered to municipalities to provide low rental housing, which is a specific form of attack on the slum problem. Nowhere in this bill do we assume to take the power, which in any case this parliament could not give us, to eliminate slums as such. I think my right hon. friend will agree with me that there is no question constitutionally that we cannot attack directly this problem as such. However, by providing cheap money we can bring about, with the consent of the provinces and the municipalities, the erection of more low rental houses, which of itself will be one of the best means of getting rid of our slums.

Mr. BENNETT: Paragraph (d) of the old section provided for an investigation with reference to slum areas. I agree with the minister that we have no power to deal with it according to the act.

Mr. LANDERYOU: There is plenty of building material and labour in the country, and I was wondering if the investigations carried on under this section would result in a report being submitted to parliament as to the real reasons why people have not been building houses in the last five or six years.

Mr. DUNNING: One of the reasons for bringing down legislation of this kind is that we all know that people have not been building as many houses as they should have. This whole bill is designed to facilitate the building of more houses because of the opinion we all have that Canada and the people of Canada need houses to a greater extent than they have been provided in the last few years.

I would not undertake to send out an investigator to find out why people did not build houses. I would much prefer to bring down legislation such as this, which is intended to help them build more houses, because the reasons why they have not done so during the last number of years would range over a very wide variety of opinions. One man's opinion would be one thing, another man's opinion would be another, and the reasons would differ in various parts of Canada. So I doubt if any practical good would come of appointing people to find out why houses have not been built in sufficient numbers. I should prefer to proceed on the constructive lines which this bill contemplates of making it easier for houses to be built in the future.

Mr. THOMPSON: Does the minister not think that this bill will further retard the building of houses by private capital?—because two per cent will not carry the building of houses in any municipality. When the government undertakes to supply money below cost—for the government cannot today borrow long-term money at two per cent—what inducement will there be for private capital to invest in housing? In my humble opinion houses are not being built because a man cannot build a house in any city or town in this country, rent it and pay the taxes, and make money. He simply cannot get a profit, and that has tied up building operations. This legislation I believe will put a further damper on the investment of private capital in building, because private capital cannot compete with the government's two per cent money.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will forgive me, he is speaking constantly of two per cent money. There is no provision whatever for two per cent money in connection with part I of the act. The money to which my hon. friend refers is in connection with part II, which is solely for low rental projects, if the municipality and the province desire to get into them. There is no two per cent money at all under the part we are discussing.

Mr. THOMPSON: Unless the municipality agrees with the minister to borrow the money.

Mr. DUNNING: And in that case they do not get two per cent money.

Mr. THOMPSON: They do not get two per cent money?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. THOMPSON: If the government would do something to lower the taxes, it might be of greater assistance. We should not be burdened with the taxation we have at present. There is enough money lying in the banks in Canada, drawing one and a half per cent to supply all the houses that would be required, and when the government steps in to remedy the housing situation it is to my mind putting the cart before the horse. What we really need is a reduction in taxation, to encourage private capital to invest money in housing. The more the government goes into business in this country the worse it will be for the people of Canada. What we should do is to cease hampering and impeding private enterprise, and lower the taxation.

Mr. DUNNING: May I just reply to my hon. friend, because I am very anxious that in this discussion we should endeavour to stay on a constructive plane, as I believe is everyone's desire. The taxes to which my hon. friend refers as retarding the building of houses are, I think he will admit, mostly municipal taxes.

Mr. THOMPSON: Not entirely.

Mr. DUNNING: Not entirely, but for the major part. I know that in the district in which I live just outside this city the great deterrent on building houses is the municipal rate of taxation which applies. That is not to the discredit of that particular municipality. It is true of many others. That is the major problem. We have enough responsibility in this parliament, goodness knows, and it should be made clear that we are not responsible for municipal taxation except in so far as it may be said that municipal taxation is increased by virtue of relief costs. To that extent I suppose we must take our share of responsibility.

Mr. BENNETT: There is the sales tax.

Mr. DUNNING: The sales tax enters only in a small degree into the mill rate of a municipality.

Mr. BENNETT: The builder pays the sales tax on what he has to buy.

Mr. DUNNING: The individual has to pay sales tax, but that is the man who is building houses, and what my hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Thompson) was speaking of was the house that exists to-day, to which no sales tax applies. It is the present taxes on that house which he says prevent the landlord from being able to rent it at a figure which will enable him to make any money.

Mr. THOMPSON: You cannot build a house to-day and make money, because there is a sales tax of eight per cent on everything you buy. Even if a man does make a profit, the government comes along and taxes his profit in the form of income tax. It is plain to-day that capital is running to cover, putting its money in government bonds at two or three per cent, or leaving it in the bank. That is what is the matter. We must get to the place where a man can build a house and rent it and pay taxes on it and make a profit.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The hon. gentleman believes that private capital should not be interfered with, that the government should not give assistance to the people in the building of homes. Private capital has had plenty of opportunity in the last few years to assist in the housing problem, but they have not invested their money in building houses for the simple reason that they have had no faith in the ability of the people to pay back the money they borrowed. I am glad the government is taking steps to solve this housing problem by advancing credit to assist in the erection of houses; but I cannot agree that the minister is bringing down very constructive legislation, because, after all, it is simply adding $100,000,000 to the debts of the country.

Mr. DUNNING: No, it is not.

Mr. LANDERYOU: You are lending $100,000,000. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I cannot see anything else but that you are lending $100,000,000 for the erection of houses—

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. LANDERYOU: —thus adding to the public and private debt. I cannot see how these people are going to be able to pay it back, with municipal taxation as high as it is to-day. An investigation would prove that it is the high tax rate of municipalities that is holding up many building enterprises.

The minister says that we are not responsible for the taxes and debts of the municipalities, but constitutionally we have jurisdiction over interest, and we have done nothing to lower the interest rate on municipal debts. These high debt charges have increased municipal taxation throughout Canada. The minister is making provision in this bill for the government to pay the taxes on these houses one hundred per cent the first year, fifty per cent the second year, and twenty-five per cent the third year. But what is going to happen in the fourth year? How do we know that the citizens will be able to keep their houses? There are so many people throughout the country to-day who are losing property, and if people with homes cannot keep them now, if they are losing them through foreclosure, I do not see how we can very well advance $50,000,000 to add to public and private debts at five per cent in order to encourage the building of homes, even by paying a certain amount of the taxes, because we have no assurance of economic stability. We do not know whether the people will be able to pay off the debt.

Mr. McIVOR: I have listened to speeches loud, long and emphatic on this side of the house pointing out why the government should embark upon a cheap housing or rental scheme, and I was enthusiastically behind those speakers, because that is one of the needs of the time. Now I am wondering whether that is what those speakers meant or wanted.

Mr. ISNOR: Before section 3 passes I wish to say I looked through the bill and failed to find any other section dealing with investigations and complaints. Reading paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e), we find that practically all these provisions have already under the act been carried out, but I should like to ask the minister what form of investigation he proposes in regard to the actual construction of the homes after the work is started. I have in mind a recent investigation in Halifax county, particularly in connection with the town of Dartmouth, when there were two groups of houses constructed, one a group of twenty and the other a group of ten. The construction was faulty. I believe the director of housing visited that section of the country; the contention that construction was faulty was borne out, and it was suggested that a waste of the investors' money could possibly have been prevented if some form of investigation had been carried out in connection with these groups of houses. I quite appreciate that the minister may say this is a matter for the company who had advanced the money, but it seems to me that there should be some further form of investigation, and it is in that particular respect that I am asking the minister whether he could not add another clause to those already included in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), (d) and (e) so that there would be stricter supervision in connection with the construction of houses.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps I should be perfectly frank in expressing my opinion as to that kind of suggestion. There is a limit to the extent to which the government can wet-nurse both the lending institutions and the man borrowing money for the construction of a house in which he is to live. We cannot possibly undertake, as a parliament or a government, to see to it that the contractual relations between the parties are carried out to the satisfaction of all concerned. As a matter of fact there are three parties, because the contractor enters into the matter. With respect to the Halifax incident, because of noise made locally, I felt it desirable to send the director of housing to see what exactly the condition was, and in that connection I have a report indicating that the matters referred to were very much exaggerated. Here is a man borrowing money from a lending institution to build a house; here is a lending institution putting in at least sixty per cent of the total amount of the loan; and here is the contractor.

Mr. BENNETT: Without guarantee.

Mr. DUNNING: And without guarantee. Then people say that the government should see to it that these three parties play square with one another. The lending institution and the owner are both interested in seeing that the house is built according to the specifications, and they are there right on the ground watching their own interests. Why call upon the dominion government to step in between two parties who have a definite contract, the specifications of which have been approved under the dominion housing scheme? We simply cannot undertake as a government to wet-nurse the parties to these contracts, I put it bluntly. Surely they are capable of looking after their own interests in a reasonable way. The owner of the house is interested in seeing that the contractor carries out his contract; the lending institution, which is risking sixty per cent of the money, is interested in seeing that a good job is done. The government has taken an interest in the matter to ensure that the specifications on which the house is to be built, the specifications included in the contract, shall be those of a reasonably well constructed house of the type desired, but it seems to me that is as far as the government should be expected to go. After that, the interests of the various parties ought to ensure that the house is built as it should be. I believe there was some deficiency but not nearly the deficiency that the reports indicate. But one should remember that the Dominion Housing Act has enemies to-day, and the new housing act will have enemies, self-interested enemies. I say nothing against them, because they have a perfect right to criticize; but if we approach this legislation in the belief that everyone will hold up both hands to help us, then we are ignorant of the facts. The fact is that criticism will develop from all those sources which are interested in some other method of dealing with this problem. I am saying nothing specific about Halifax in that regard, but from my point of view the average man who intends to own a home of his own will see to it that the specifications under which the home is built are carried out.

Mr. BENNETT: If he does not, he should not have a loan.

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly.

Mr. ISNOR: I quite agree with the general thought expressed by the minister, but the dominion government has laid down certain rules, plans and specifications. The minister admits that the government has approved the plans and specifications, and it is true that the insurance company advances sixty per cent. But I still contend that a certain obligation rests upon the government to supervise the carrying out of the plans to the extent of making sure that the builder is putting up a house that is in accordance with those specifications. I do not believe there are any enemies of this scheme in Nova Scotia. In fact, as one of the representatives of that province, I wish to congratulate the minister upon this forward step. In Canada in 1935 building permits amounted to $140,988,228; in 1936 this had increased slightly to $142,628,800, and in 1937 for the first ten months of the year it had risen to $198,576,800. Therefore there has been a considerable improvement in our building program in the dominion, and I have no doubt it will increase still further. Fully realizing that, I was merely offering a constructive suggestion which I thought the minister might take into consideration. I do not think he helped himself by adopting the tone he did, because he rather resented the suggestion. I offered it in good faith, and I think he should accept it in that spirit. I hold that there should be further supervision of any housing scheme in connection with which the dominion is in the position of guarantor.

Mr. BENNETT: There is in the bill a provision empowering the minister to supervise.

Mr. ISNOR: If there is, it is all right, but it is not stated in that particular section, and that is the only section which applies to investigation.

Mr. DUNNING: If I owe my hon. friend an apology I am glad to tender it right now. It was not that I resented the suggestion, but I do deprecate any idea going out from this house that in some way the government will nurse along every man who wants a home, will even see that after he has made his contract, made all his arrangements for his loan, the government will step in and make sure that the contractor puts every nail in its place. That is the idea which would go out if we undertook to become responsible for seeing that the ordinary contractual relations between borrower and lender and prospective home owner and contractor were lived up to. It would require an army to undertake any such thing. That is why I spoke as I did. This is a big, a tremendously wide country. To undertake specific governmental supervision of every house built under this legislation is impossible. I am sorry I gave the impression of heat to my hon. friend; I did not intend to do so with respect to his suggestion; but certainly harm would be done if the idea went abroad that we could undertake supervision of that kind.

Mr. ISNOR: If I remember rightly, under the home improvement act there was a penalty imposed if a person borrowed money and did not carry out the plan for which he borrowed it. Is there any penalty under this bill for a person who borrows to build a certain type of building according to certain specifications and then does not follow those specifications?

Mr. DUNNING: No, there is no penalty.

Mr. ISNOR: Possibly that would overcome it.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Paragraph (a) is what we are discussing. The minister may:

. . . carry on or arrange for the carrying on of investigations as to housing conditions and the adequacy of existing housing accommodation in Canada. . . .

"The adequacy of existing housing accommodation." Surely investigation would have to be made in at least the large centres of Canada, if not in the rural centres, as to just what slum conditions do obtain, so that we would have a general idea of the amount of money that would have to be spent really to abolish slums in Canada. The minister says there is to be no investigation of that. Then how did he arrive at $100,000,000 as being sufficient to meet the problem this year? Is it because we cannot increase the amount, or why is it limited to $100,000,000 and no investigation to be made as to the need for more?

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend look through this bill carefully in the next five minutes and find that $100,000,000 of which he speaks?

Mr. LANDERYOU: Well, we got some idea regarding the amount of money that would be issued; we expected $100,000,000 would be the amount.

Mr. MASSEY: The other day the minister pointed out that the distribution among municipalities would be on the basis of population.

Mr. DUNNING: Not in part I, solely with respect to part II.

Mr. REID: Do the regulations require lending institutions to confine loans to houses in zoned areas, that is town-planned areas?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: What has been the average rate of interest payable by borrowers under the act of 1935?

Mr. DUNNING: Five per cent, always five per cent.

Mr. LANDERYOU: How much money is involved? Is it $30,000,000?

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend mixes up two things when he speaks in terms of money. The provision in this part of the bill is clear, as will be seen a little later; it is $20,000,000 as far as governmental expenditure is concerned under this part. One may estimate what the total amount of building made possible by the dominion putting in $20,000,000 will be; that is a matter of estimate. Under the existing act the dominion has invested up to the present about $4,500,000, if my memory is correct, and $17,000,000 of building has resulted. If we apply the same proportions to the $20,000,000 authorized by this part of the bill, it would give somewhere in the neighbourhood of $80,000,000. Then in part II provision is made for $30,000,000 to be advanced by the dominion for low rental housing schemes. In connection with that, either ten per cent in the case of a municipality undertaking the scheme or twenty per cent in the case of a limited dividend housing corporation must be added to what the dominion puts in. Under the third part of the bill we make a taxation subsidy. If you add the whole thing together you might get $100,000,000, you might get $120,000,000. The bill is intended to stimulate the investment of capital by the man who wants to own a home and by the institution which has money seeking an outlet but which is afraid of the risk; and part III is to help for a period of years in connection with the taxation on new low cost homes. That is the whole principle of the measure. I did not intend by this legislation to bring in the millennium, but it represents a carefully thought out means of assistance in connection with what we all recognize to be a serious problem; one in connection with which, as I said the other day, we have only limited jurisdiction; we can assist only financially, and some eminent authorities even question our authority to do that. It is intended as an attack upon this particular problem, not as a means of bringing about a new heaven and a new earth.

Mr. KINLEY: I think there is another aspect of this bill to be kept in mind, that is that it will have the effect of bringing down interest rates generally on real estate. I do not think the lending institutions are going to let the government get all that business; if they are going to continue in business, and legislation like this is a competitive feature, they will have to lower their rates, and that is desirable, because as regards interest rates on real estate security, as they are charged, especially in Nova Scotia, and I may say in Halifax—and there is no city in Canada where trust companies do a better business, and do it more efficiently perhaps—if the secondary effect of this bill is to bring down the interest rates charged by trust companies in this country, that will be salutary.

Mr. HEAPS: The statement was made this afternoon that private capital may be scared away by the legislation now under consideration. I am of the opinion that the result will be the very reverse. Perhaps the minister is in a position to state at this time how much money was actually lent by private institutions under the old housing legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: I said a moment ago that up to date it is $17,350,000 of which the dominion is responsible for $4,500,000.

Mr. HEAPS: In other words the fear of some hon. members that private capital is going to be frightened away is ill founded; the result has been the very opposite. This legislation may have the effect of stimulating the lending of money where previously they did nothing of the kind.

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph (b).

Mr. McNIVEN: I notice we have authority here to undertake investigations elsewhere than in Canada. Have any such investigations been undertaken by the department; for example, in Sweden, Great Britain or any of the countries which have housing schemes, so that there will be information available for municipalities which decide to undertake such a scheme?

Mr. DUNNING: We have not made investigations by way of sending officials to other countries, except to the United States. The director of housing has been in touch with the housing authority at Washington with respect to the schemes which are operating in that country. Of course we have all the detailed information we could secure from Sweden, which was mentioned by my hon. friend; in fact, only a week or so ago a member of the Swedish parliament who is also an economist—which is an unusual thing—was in the city, and I had a long talk with him about housing and other matters in Sweden. The officials of the department also took advantage of his presence here to learn a great deal about it. But there has been no sending of officials there. It must be remembered that the act we have been working under, the Dominion Housing Act, was designed—as is this part of the new measure—to fit Canadian conditions, which are not similar to conditions in some other countries to which reference is frequently made; and by studying the plans in operation in those other countries we can get a pretty good idea of just what parts of such plans will be applicable to our conditions. We have too, of course, full information with respect to the British housing plans, and I do not think it necessary to send anyone to that country. The inclusion of this section, which is similar to section 3 of the old act, was merely to give authority to the minister to get information when and where and how it could be obtained. There really is no necessity for debate on it; it is really the old section, substituting the Minister of Finance with the approval of the governor in council for the former economic council.

Mr. BENNETT: With some amendments.

Mr. DUNNING: Some small amendments.

Mr. DUFFUS: Perhaps I should have asked this question under paragraph (b) section 2, but as yet I have not ascertained whether it is the intention to permit the building of houses at a lower cost than $2,500; for example, $1,500?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no limitation in this part.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I did not hear the remarks of the minister, but this does appear to indicate some investigation and research, does it not?

Mr. DUNNING: It makes it possible, if conditions render it necessary.

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph (c).

Mr. McNIVEN: When the home improvement plan wes inaugurated, almost immediately there was a twenty per cent increase in the cost of building materials. It seems to me there is a great probability of a substantial increase in the cost of building material once this plan is launched, which will render null the minister's well laid plans.

Mr. BENNETT: This has been in operation for two and a half years.

Mr. McNIVEN: I was wondering whether under this section there was any power in the minister to deal with such a situation, or if he would have to invoke the good offices of the Minister of Labour under the Combines Investigation Act to preserve some degree of certainty as to the cost of building material.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend started with a statement which I can neither confirm nor deny, with respect to a twenty per cent increase in the cost of building materials. I do not know whether or not that was the case. There is nothing in this legislation which will enable the minister to control costs, but I would direct attention to what I said last Wednesday:

—this legislation is a challenge to the building construction industry of this country, and is so intended. It is often stated that of all our industries, the one most laggard in advancing, in taking advantage of possibilities of improved technique, of lowering costs, of the standardizing of commodities, is the building industry. I do not join in that criticism, but I do say that there is one way in which anything this parliament may do in connection with housing can be killed, and that is for the building construction industry, capital and labour, material suppliers and all the rest, to believe that they can, by reason of it, start a steady upward trend in the price of the commodities they have to sell, whether those commodities consist of capital, goods or labour. We require the maximum of cooperative effort from everybody concerned—

With respect to investigations, the laws of Canada provide through the combines act and other legislation means of dealing with some of the matters to which my hon. friend refers. In connection with this section I had in mind that if abuse of a national kind was alleged, this would offer another means of securing the facts of the case. There are no punitive measures in this bill. The combines act and other similar acts which are on the statute books exist for that purpose. This bill is brought down with the desire of cooperating with all those engaged in the building industry, and I believe the people engaged in the construction industry will see in this legislation a great opportunity. From the messages I have received, from both capital and labour in the building industry, I have every reason to believe that they are desirous of cooperating and that they appreciate the spirit in which I spoke the other day, as I have just quoted.

Mr. MASSEY: I understand that at the moment there are plans, at the rate of $10 per set, available for the $2,500 houses.

Mr. DUNNING: Three thousand dollars and under.

Mr. MASSEY: This paragraph says, "as to the feasibility by any means of securing economies and increased efficiency in such construction." Under that I assume the possibilities of pre-fabrication would be considered, not only in regard to whole sections but also in regard to casements, doors and so on. Has anything been done so far in that respect?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; we have quite a lot of information with respect to pre-fabrication and the concerns which undertake it. At this stage I cannot elaborate on it; in fact I have not it all in mind, but I can say that the department intends to follow up every development both in the United States and in Great Britain particularly, where there appears to have been more in the way of taking advantage of mass production methods as applied to the construction industry than has been the case elsewhere. There is some question as to the extent to which what has been done elsewhere in that regard can be made applicable here because of our climatic conditions.

Mr. MASSEY: And our fire laws, and so on.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; particularly our extremes of temperature, but that is also in mind in connection with the power to make investigations.

Mr. MASSEY: In connection with the plans the minister has in his possession, do they contemplate houses of brick or of timber, or both?

Mr. DUNNING: Some of each.

Mr. MASSEY: Would the minister tell the committee what plans are available?

Mr. DUNNING: There are ten different types of small houses. The basis of the computation was a house that could be built for $3,000 under average conditions in Canada. There would be variations above and below that $3,000, depending upon the conditions prevailing in various parts of the country.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I assume a general sketch is first obtainable?

Mr. DUNNING: Any one of ten different types.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): But how do you know which one you want unless you have all ten before you?

Mr. DUNNING: The general plans have been published in all the newspapers, and we also have a booklet which contains the general designs. I can assure my hon. friend that he will not have to buy a pig in a poke. He will be able to get a look at the pig anyway.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I ask these questions for the benefit of those who will read Hansard, and discover what the bill means.

Mr. DUNNING: I understand that.

Mr. McNIVEN: Does the figure of $3,000 apply to every part of Canada?

Mr. DUNNING: I said under average conditions. It would vary above and below the $3,000, according to local conditions in the different parts of Canada.

Mr. McNIVEN: I recall that last year—and I believe it was when the estimates were before the committee—this matter was discussed. The minister mentioned that a house could be built for $2,500.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. McNIVEN: I made inquiries and found that was a pre-fabricated house, built in the city of Hamilton. After I obtained the plans and specifications, I submitted them to contractors for construction in western Canada and found that to build the same house in that part of the country it would cost $4,000 to $4,200. I was wondering whether local conditions in western Canada had been considered when the price was fixed at $3,000.

Mr. DUNNING: That will be taken into consideration. I hope, however, that the hon. member will bear in mind that some people do not welcome changes in technique which involve pre-fabrication. I need not say more.

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 3, paragraph (d).

Mr. LENNARD: In connection with low cost housing may I ask if there is any determination as to rates of wages to be applied among the different building trades?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. LENNARD: That is not considered?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. LENNARD: Then how is the cost arrived at?

Mr. DUNNING: Those factors are all considered when we are arriving at specifications.

Mr. LENNARD: Are standard wages considered?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; it is based upon standard wages.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph (e) agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 1—Advances.

Mr. SENN: In connection with a former item I asked the minister what the government intended to do about extending these privileges to the country districts. May I state a case in point?

Mr. DUNNING: I would suggest that the hon. member read paragraph (g), and that he make his observation on that paragraph. If that were done, we would get along faster.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 2, paragraph (a)—Conditions.

Mr. DUNNING: This paragraph is the same as in the present act.

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 2, paragraph (b).

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister explain why the paragraph makes it mandatory or compulsory to borrow not less than seventy per cent? Suppose a man wishes to borrow only fifty per cent; would that not be all right? Why is he compelled to borrow seventy per cent?

Mr. LAWSON: Is not this the part of the bill which relates to individual loans?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: Is not the whole scheme one of helping those who have not enough money to finance the building of houses?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. There is the further point, that those loans smaller than seventy per cent are loans in connection with which government assistance ought not to be required. When a man has an equity of forty per cent or fifty per cent of the cost of the proposed house, then the lending institution ought to be able to fill the bill, without the assistance of the government. The tendency has been, in areas where loaning has been done under the Dominion Housing Act, for the rate effect of the act to become visible in connection with loans which were made not under the Dominion Housing Act, but for smaller percentages in the form of straight loans by lending institutions. That is a by-product of the Dominion Housing Act.

Mr. McCUAIG: It seems to me, if I may be permitted to follow up the question, that seventy per cent is too high a figure. In many municipalities it is very difficult to borrow money privately to a point as high as seventy per cent. I know in my own locality if a person had $2,000 and wanted to build a house valued at $5,000, he might be able to borrow the $3,000. Therefore a man wanting to borrow between sixty per cent and seventy per cent would be outside this section of the bill, and yet the amount he would have to borrow would be higher than he could borrow from a private individual. It seems to me it would be advisable to reduce the amount to a point below seventy per cent. Perhaps it should be as low as sixty per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I noticed that the old section provides that the advance made by the minister shall not exceed twenty per cent of the cost of construction of the house or its appraised value, whichever is the lesser. Then it goes on to say that the interest payable shall be so and so. Under the present measure, whether a man likes it or not, he has to borrow seventy per cent. He must borrow not less than seventy per cent or more than eighty per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: If my right hon. friend will read farther on, he will see that the results are about the same.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but I am talking about this paragraph. The advance made jointly by the minister and the lending institution or local authority shall not, according to the paragraph be less than seventy per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and not more than eighty per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: On a $2,000 house he must borrow from the lending institution and the government $1,400. But suppose he needs only $1,000.

Mr. DUNNING: We have been operating under paragraph (c) of section 4 in the old act, which states:

The advance by the minister shall be made only if the lending institution or local authority lends, in addition to the amount of the advance, sixty per cent of the cost of construction of the house or the appraised value—

And so on.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. DUNNING: And it continues:

—whichever is the lesser: provided that the governor in council may in any class of cases fix the percentage at less than the sixty per cent aforesaid.

And under that power the regulations were made on a graduated scale of seventy, seventy-five and eighty. It is the result of experience that has made us put in the seventy per cent provision.

Mr. BENNETT: If a person does not require that much, why should he be compelled to take it? It precludes him from doing business with the government, and compels him to go somewhere else and pay a higher rate.

Mr. DUNNING: No; the effect of it strangely enough has been that a man in the position of the one described by the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. McCuaig) has been, by virtue of this legislation, enabled to borrow from the lending institution itself on terms approximating the terms under the Dominion Housing Act, in cases where such person may have a larger equity than is contemplated by the act. That has been one of the by-products. That is the way in which the act has been working up to now, in actual practice.

Mr. NEILL: But it has not worked out. The trouble is that in British Columbia the lending companies do not make loans outside the big cities, and there is a demand for houses in the smaller municipalities. The people in those municipalities cannot borrow from the lending institutions, because they are simply met with the statement—and I have approached them on behalf of some people—"We will not go into that town." The lending institution will not go outside the big towns.

Mr. DUNNING: Has the hon. member read paragraph (g)? We have not reached that part of the section which enables me to discuss the methods whereby we hope to overcome the difficulty.

Mr. McIVOR: If a man making a loan wishes to make payment before the time stated, has he permission to pay off the whole loan?

Mr. DUNNING: It operates under an amortization plan, of course. But the contract usually contains a provision whereby a loan may be paid off. I forget the exact terms. I may say, however, that there is such a provision.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall paragraph (b) carry?

Mr. BENNETT: I must say I cannot follow paragraph (b) in its present form.

Mr. DUNNING: I am willing to consider taking out the seventy per cent. My right hon. friend is speaking of the minimum?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: The suggestion is that we should extend government assistance to the man who is able to put up fifty, sixty or seventy per cent of the amount and is taking only a small loan. If that is done, a large part of the dominion's proportion will be taken up by people who have the capacity to make private arrangements to borrow money. I am anxious not to open the door too widely. Would the committee think sixty per cent would be too much?

Mr. BARBER: No.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not want these companies to be trying to make low percentage loans only.

Mr. BENNETT: Let me demonstrate how it works out. Let me take the case put to the committee by one of the members. This paragraph reads:

The advance made jointly by the minister and the lending institution or local authority shall not be less than seventy per centum and not more than eighty per centum of the lending value of the house.

Suppose the lending value is $2,000. As this section now stands, the man, whether he wants to or not, would have to borrow $1,400 of that sum. The government would put up twenty-five per cent of that $1,400, which amounts to $350. In other words, the lending institution would put up $1,050 and the government would put up $350. The man must do that. I see no reason why we should make it compulsory that he should borrow seventy per cent. Perhaps I have not made myself clear.

Mr. DUNNING: I am at the disadvantage of having to try to get these companies to make loans sufficient in amount to enable people in the income group that build $2,400 houses to get a loan. It has been rare in my experience to find a man with $600 who is willing to live in a $2,000 house. The great complaint against the existing housing act is the exact opposite of that, that is, it does not come down low enough to reach the man in the income group concerned. That is why we are making provision under paragraph (g) to go up as high as ninety per cent of the total lending value.

Mr. KINLEY: It might help out the rural situation if you brought it down to sixty per cent. It would be then more attractive to the loan companies to go into the rural communities.

Mr. BENNETT: Because of its being guaranteed by the government?

Mr. KINLEY: It makes a better risk.

Mr. DUNNING: I am sure the committee will appreciate the position of the lending institutions. Naturally they try to be as selective as they can. They want the maximum security and it is their duty to get it. If we pull down that percentage, I am afraid we shall be placing an inducement in the way of the lending institutions to look for the people who have the most money. What I want this bill to do is to help those who have the least money. The principle of selectivity enters into the matter. We have had this difficulty up to date. I am not worrying much about embarrassing the man who has more money than this bill calls for, but I am worrying a great deal about the fellow who is just able to get together the amount called for by this bill. That really is the difference between us. The lending institutions will always look for the maximum security and will tend to be unwilling to make loans to those who have only a little money. We want them to make loans to those people who have only a little but who have the other essentials, the character and the desire to own a home and the ability to work out a plan under this scheme whereby in many cases the rent they are paying will pay for their homes over a period of years. That is really what we are after. I am sure it will be found in practice that the lower the percentage requirement is put, the more the lending institutions will tend to concentrate on those people who have the most money. We want to induce them to consider the other class.

Mr. KINLEY: I am concerned about the people in the rural communities. The loan companies do not like to make loans in rural communities.

Mr. DUNNING: The inducement is offered under paragraph (g).

Mr. KINLEY: If a man in the country had a little more money to put into a project, it would be more attractive to the loan companies and we would likely get more action under this bill.

Mr. DUNNING: Our experience is just the reverse.

Mr. NEILL: The minister says that we must induce the loan companies to lend to the man who has just a little stake; otherwise they will be looking for the man who is the best risk. That argument pre-supposes that the lending institutions have only a limited amount of money to lend, whereas they have all kinds of money. If you lower the percentage to sixty and induce them to go into the small country villages, they will take on everything that comes. If you do not encourage them to go in, then the people of whom the hon. member behind me speaks will be simply out of luck. We have found by experience that these loan companies will not go into the country places.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend and the hon. member behind him keep on debating the problem which paragraph (g) seeks to meet. I am trying to save my own energy as much as I can, and I shall not follow my hon. friend in attempting to debate just how paragraph (g) seeks to overcome that problem. I do not recognize that the problem suggested by my hon. friends has any material relationship to the seventy per cent provision, but it does have a most important relationship to the new principle we are inserting in paragraphs (g) and (h) of this subsection. I may tell my hon. friends quite frankly that under the existing housing act our experience has been directly the opposite of what they suggest.

Mr. KINLEY: If the percentage were lowered to sixty per cent, the security would be increased in connection with rural loans.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall answer that, although it is in advance of the question. I am sure that difference would not be sufficient to induce the loan companies to go into the rural areas.

Mr. NEILL: It would help.

Mr. DUNNING: You may think it will help if they have ten per cent more, but what are the problems with which they have to deal in making loans in small areas like that?

Mr. NEILL: There are not enough loans.

Mr. DUNNING: There are not enough loans over which to distribute the cost of overhead. Next, there is a relative lack of salability of the security. The third problem is that of collection. An increase of ten per cent in the original equity would not be sufficient to overcome those difficulties. That is why we are introducing an entirely new principle, so far as the Dominion Housing Act is concerned, in paragraphs (g) and (h). We are attempting to make the lender feel more secure when lending money in these communities. However, I would prefer to take that up when we come to those paragraphs. Probably I have not quite grasped the point raised by the leader of the opposition in connection with the seventy per cent provision.

Mr. BENNETT: The sixty per cent provision would work adversely to the view which the minister has presented. It would have to be eighty per cent to make it effective. In order to make his point, he would have to increase it instead of decreasing it. Consider a $2,500 loan. If we are to advance seventy per cent, that would be only $1,750. If we say it is to be eighty per cent, it would be $2,000. If we say sixty per cent we have hardened the position as against the borrower; for sixty per cent of $2,500 is $1,500, and then he has to find somewhere another $1,000. It is putting the sixty per cent the wrong way, not in favour of the borrower, but against him.

Mr. DUNNING: No; that is my whole point.

Mr. BENNETT: The difficulty I see is the rigidity when you say seventy per cent. As the old act stood, there was elasticity and discretion.

Mr. DUNNING: Not below sixty per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes. It said that the advance made by the minister shall not exceed twenty per cent of the cost of construction of the house or its appraised value, whichever is the lesser, and the advance by the minister shall be made only if the lending institution lends sixty per cent of the cost of construction of the house.

Mr. DUNNING: In addition to the amount advanced by the government.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite, and the government was finding not more than twenty per cent of the cost of the construction of the house or its appraised value, whichever was the lesser. But we have changed that, and it is the rigidity which the minister has introduced which I think is unfair. He says positively: You have to get seventy per cent from the lending company. The introduction of that rigidity may make the legislation impossible of operation. I am not concerned about the seventy and eighty per cent, and that sort of thing. All I want is to have some elasticity so that the situation that develops later under paragraph (g) shall not be the only situation to which that applies, and I still think that perhaps the old method was the better. You may say: The advance of the country and the lending institution together shall not exceed so much. We are taking not more than twenty-five per cent of the loan; that is clear, is it not? On a $2,500 loan we may go up to ninety per cent; that is, not more than ninety per cent of the lending value shall be borne by the country.

Just take this case. You have a $2,500 property, and we are going to carry ninety per cent of the load of the loan. How much is the loan going to be?

Mr. DUNNING: Not ninety per cent. We do not carry ninety per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: No, twenty-five per cent, I should say.

Mr. DUNNING: Twenty-five per cent of ninety per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: And ninety per cent of $2,500 is $2,250, and that $2,250 is not borne by the lending institution alone. That is the maximum loan which can be made against the property.

Mr. DUNNING: Of which we bear twenty-five per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so, or $562.50.

Mr. DUNNING: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: Now, $562.50 from $2,250 leaves the amount that is borne by the lending institution, namely, $1,687.50. Is that correct?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the lending institution's part of the load, and our part is $562.50. Why should we not leave some elasticity with respect to the matter? Why should we say, not less than seventy per cent and not more than ninety per cent? I am not forgetting the provisions in paragraphs (g) and (h), but we are dealing now with another class of case altogether. I confess I do not know why there should be that rigidity. I am quite content that the other form should be used, namely, that the advance made shall not exceed such and such per cent, of which we bear twenty-five per cent. But doing it in this way makes it absolutely rigid, and we say to these borrowers: You have to borrow seventy per cent to avail yourself of the provisions of this section and get the dominion's contribution.

Mr. DUNNING: I am quite prepared to let paragraph (b) of subsection 2 stand for further consideration, although I do not think I can express any more plainly than I have already done the reason for it.

Mr. BENNETT: I had no difficulty in following the minister, but the difficulty I see is in having that rigid provision there.

Mr. DUNNING: I intended to explain that in practice we have not been advancing up to date under the Dominion Housing Act any loans of less than seventy per cent of the lending value. Seventy per cent is the way in which it works out at present.

Mr. BENNETT: Because the statute is there. That is the reason.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and it has worked. The only reason we are changing the incidence of the dominion's proportion is in order to meet the problem which arises by the possible juggling of valuations to make them come within a particular percentage.

Mr. BENNETT: We have met that by our definition.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, we have met that by our definition and by the fact that the dominion will take not more than twenty-five per cent with respect to any percentage of loan which is made.

Mr. BENNETT: Twenty-five per cent of the advance is our maximum?

Mr. DUNNING: Exactly. It will simplify bookkeeping and help tremendously in avoiding that difficulty of people trying to get an appraised value which would bring them under the wire.

Mr. BENNETT: Have you not covered that, making it inflexible and still keeping your twenty-five per cent? There is no flexibility now, but there is rigidity with respect to our liability, namely, twenty-five per cent of the advance by the lending institution and the crown. The only thing that remains is flexibility as to the amount to be advanced by the lending company.

Take the case put by the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley) of a man who had more money but did not want to go the whole seventy per cent. I am quite content that the minister should still have power between seventy and ninety per cent, but I do not wish to make it obligatory and say the man must take seventy per cent.

Mr. BRADETTE: I would not be in favour of making it too low. If it is not made of interest to the lending companies, they will not lend money in the unorganized sections, and we suffered from that in my part of the country last year and the previous year. The higher we make it, the more inducement there will be to the lending companies to loan in the unorganized sections, where we are suffering from not being able to get money for new homes.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Indian Affairs branch—branch administration, $53,362.50.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I desire to speak on the potlatch custom. Would the minister prefer to have it spoken to now?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Perhaps we might pass the first item, branch administration, dealing with expenditures in connection with the head office of the Indian Affairs branch. Remarks on the potlatch might better come under item No. 163. However, it is immaterial.

Mr. BENNETT: The whole administration of the Indian Affairs department must necessarily have undergone some change by reason of the consolidation of departments, and as this is the first opportunity the minister has had to explain what changes have been brought about in the administration, and this being the administration item, he might be able to make a short statement as to what is now the administrative practice with respect to Indians as covered by this item.

Mr. CRERAR: Very few changes have taken place in the administration since the consolidation of these various departments under mines and resources; that is, if the question of the leader of the opposition has reference to organic changes in administration. Previously the Indian Affairs department was a separate department of government; I believe it was associated with the Department of the Interior, under one minister.

Mr. BENNETT: And he was Superintendent General of Indian Affairs.

Mr. CRERAR: The Superintendent General was the Minister of the Interior of the day. There was a deputy superintendent general, who under the set-up of the new department becomes director of Indian administration. The work of the Indian Affairs department continues as it has been hitherto, prior to the union of the various departments into the Department of Mines and Resources. It is concerned with education, medical care, welfare work, administration of agencies all over Canada and the like. We are endeavouring to make some changes in the administration, not in the organic sense, but more in the direction in which the work relating to this very important department is carried on.

In my opinion, Indian Affairs administration is one of the problems of this country. There was a time, if we look back thirty-five or forty years, or to more distant periods, when the consensus of opinion throughout Canada was that the Indian problem, if we had an Indian problem, would probably solve itself with the effluxion of time. At that time there was a decline year by year in the Indian population of Canada. That has changed now and our Indian population is on the increase, increasing at the rate of about one and one-half per cent per annum. That is due to better care. If we compare the expenditures in medical services alone at the present time with what they were thirty-five or forty years ago, we see that there has been a vast increase in the amounts of money voted by parliament each year for medical care, hospitalization, and general welfare work. All this has tended naturally, as it was intended to do, to lift the standard of living of the Indians. Better medical care and better hospitalization mean lower mortality, and they are the factors which I think may be said to be mainly responsible for the change-over from a declining to an increasing Indian population.

For instance, in these estimates we have included $275,000 looking towards the eradication of tuberculosis in our Indian population. Tuberculosis has been one of the most difficult diseases to combat among the Indians, and we find that as our various provincial administrations have taken steps to deal with it in the white population it is necessary to deal with it among the Indians. As I intimated to the committee a year ago, representations have been made from practically every province urging the federal government to take some steps to reduce and control mortality from tuberculosis among the Indians. Every reserve was a centre of infection, and consequently pressure of public opinion in that direction has moved on further towards inducing the federal administration to take some preliminary steps this year in a program looking to that end.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, it has been going on for years.

Mr. CRERAR: Not directly with tuberculosis.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes.

Mr. CRERAR: Well, we shall not quarrel over that.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I am only glad it is so.

Mr. CRERAR: The point I want to make is that the effect of all this is simply to decrease the mortality and accelerate the increase in Indian population.

We have another problem, in this sense, that practically one-third of the Indian population of Canada are known as hunting and trapping Indians; that is, Indians who live by the chase. They are mostly in the northern parts of our provinces. The reserves where they are located are not suitable for agriculture. They live by fishing as far as their food supplies are concerned, and by the chase and such purchases of other food as they may be able to make from their meagre income.

Mr. BENNETT: Some of them get treaty money.

Mr. CRERAR: The treaty money is a comparatively small item. No one can say that the treaty money was a generous provision for the Indians; it was not. But the effect of all this is being seen more clearly as the years pass. Since the resources were turned over to the western provinces there has been a marked increase in the number of white trappers trapping in these areas where formerly the Indian had free sway. Owing, I think, to rather short-sighted policies which governments of Canada have at times followed, there has been a decline, and in some places almost complete eradication, of the fur-bearing animals. As the number of fur-bearing animals went down, the natural means of livelihood of the Indians went down also, and they were thrown in greater degree from year to year into dependence upon the federal administration. That, to my mind, is one of the serious problems we are facing in respect to at least one-third of the Indian population of this country. It is estimated that the Indian population to-day is about 118,000, and at the present rate of increase it will not be many years before it reaches 150,000. If some steps cannot be taken to enable our Indian population to depend more upon their own resources, it is a safe assumption that they will become an increasing burden upon the state. To-day many of these Indians desire to become more or less independent. That was one of the reasons behind the legislation I introduced a few weeks ago to set up a revolving fund from which advances might be made to individual Indians, or to Indians on reserves in a communal sense, or to Indian schools, for the purpose of providing materials to educate Indian girls and boys in handicraft arts.

Mr. BENNETT: Would it interrupt the minister to ask the relative number of the 118,000 in the east and the west?

Mr. CRERAR: British Columbia has about 24,000.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, who live by the chase and fishing?

Mr. CRERAR: Well, some live by fishing; some work in the lumber or logging camps.

Mr. BENNETT: And canneries.

Mr. CRERAR: But in the main they live by the chase. Alberta has about 11,000; Saskatchewan, 12,000; Manitoba, 13,000; Ontario, about 30,000; Quebec, 13,000, and there are about 4,000 altogether in the maritime provinces and the remainder in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. That is a rough approximation of the distribution of the Indian population.

Mr. BENNETT: Of that type, or of the whole?

Mr. CRERAR: The whole population.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister said one-third of the Indians lived by hunting and fishing, and then he said that number was 118,000.

Mr. CRERAR: No; the total number is about 118,000; roughly one-third of those are regarded as hunting and trapping Indians, or something under 40,000.

Many of the reserves are suitable for agriculture, and efforts are being made on those reserves to induce the Indians to take up that mode of livelihood. In Ontario many of them find opportunities for work, some of them adjacent to mining camps, others in the pulpwood industry and the like. I recall a few reserves east of Port Arthur where this work has been taken up; contracts were made for the delivery of pulpwood; they also engage in the manufacture of canoes, snowshoes, skis, and I believe they have taken some contracts for supplying grain doors for railway cars and that sort of thing.

The problem is an interesting one, and difficult in some aspects. It must be borne in mind that since the beginning of Indian administration they have been regarded as wards of the state. Under the terms of the surrenders of their lands there is a definite responsibility in wardship on the part of the federal government to the Indians. But I think the methods we have followed in the past have tended to perpetuate that idea among the Indians themselves. I recognize the difficulty of changing that state of affairs. I am not optimistic enough to think that change will be other than gradual and slow. But I do think we can shape the policy of Indian administration to that end, not only in the administration of the reserves, but as well in the whole field of Indian education.

I wish to pay tribute to the splendid work done by the various churches in the field of Indian education. I know I shall not be misunderstood if I say that I think there were times when a somewhat different direction might have been given to education and much better results thereby secured. If mistakes have been made in the past in that respect, it has been in the effort to graft the white man's way too quickly upon the Indian population. I know of Indian girls and boys coming to the residential schools at the age of six or seven, remaining perhaps ten or twelve years, acquiring an education in the sense we ordinarily understand, the ability to read and write and figure, the three R's, learning habits of personal cleanliness, how to operate an electric washing machine and an electric iron; but when they left the school there was only one place for them to go, namely, back to the reserve, and often the education they received in the schools was not adapted to that mode of living. I may say that I have discussed this matter with many of those engaged in educational work in connection with the churches, and I have found nothing but the finest spirit of cooperation when I offered some suggestion as to where I thought improvements might be made in that respect. I think the education could be made more vocational in character, with much better results.

So far as the organic set-up of the branch is concerned, those members of the committee who are interested will find the details on page 188 and succeeding pages in the report of the Department of Mines and Resources, tabled at the beginning of this session, for the year ending March 31, 1937. Generally speaking, there are five divisions in the branch, with some subdivisions. First, there is the division of field administration, which has to do with supervision of the various Indian reserves and agencies throughout Canada. Second, there is the medical service, which has grown to very considerable proportions. There is next a division that has to do with reserves and trusts. For instance, there is something between thirteen and fourteen million dollars of trust funds, or band funds as we call them, in the branch. Some of the bands have very large funds. The greater number, however, have very little if any; probably a majority of the reserves have no band funds at all. The next division is the welfare and training service, which has to do with the educational side of the activities of the department and the general welfare work. Then there is a records service, where all the records of the administration are kept and classified, so that information going back as long as there has been an administration may be available.

That very briefly sets out the five general divisions into which the Indian administration work is divided. Possibly this brief summary, given in a rather fragmentary fashion, will give members of the committee an idea of the general set-up, and I shall be glad to supply any additional information when we discuss the items in detail.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the members of the committee appreciate, as I do, what the minister has said. I confess that to me the Indian problem has always been one of great interest and, I might add, of considerable concern. I know that the changes which have been made during the last ten years have been marked and very striking indeed. We have provided for the care of the Indians in this country a medical service which in my judgment is as good as that of any country in the world, if not better. It has involved the expenditure of substantial sums of money, but I think the reasons given by the minister as to why we should deal with tuberculosis and other diseases in the manner in which we are endeavouring to deal with them need not be amplified by me.

There are essentially two problems of which we have to think in connection with the Indian. The one concerns his living, which is very important, and the other concerns his health, which may be divided into his mental and physical health and his spiritual well-being. The churches are not lacking in their efforts to care for the latter; and upon us rests the responsibility for caring for his body and mind, and in a broad and general way I think we have made great advances in that regard. The minister has detailed them. I need not go into them now, because there are some about which I may have to offer some little criticism as we proceed. As to his getting a living, after all the Indian regards that as important, and in my observation he is not alone in that regard. How is he to get a living? At some points in the east they have splendid reserves. They farm; they are agriculturists in the large sense of the term, and they do very well. In some of the western reserves, for instance at the Blackfoot reserve at Gleichen, they have their coal mines and their cattle on the ranges, and grain is grown in considerable quantities. You have the cattle ranges of the Indians at Macleod and in that section of the country; and then you have the Stoneys who are essentially hunters. On the rocky reserve which they inhabit the Stoneys are unable to make for themselves an adequate living. So you have two classes to consider when you come to the question of a living: one class that lives by its hunting and fishing ability, on the proceeds of the chase—and each year it is getting more difficult, as the minister has pointed out, to make a living in that way—and the other class.

How are you going to care for the first class? That is a real problem. There are forty thousand people who must be cared for. We exercise supervision over them. We have given them reserves, and they have surrendered their rights to surrounding territory. The reserves are not sufficient, either in area or in quality of soil, to produce a living. That problem we have not mastered. We have played with it, and I do not mean that offensively. We have attempted to deal with that branch of it, but we have had no settled policy to deal with it, and I do not know what policy we could adopt. You could not confine those Indians to those particular reserves; they are going to go out and hunt and fish.

Then you have the second class, who derive some benefits from agriculture, from farming in the large sense, including cattle raising, and from mining. In some instances they get something from their forests, because some of them did have a few trees scattered around their reserves, though in the main these reserves are not near forests. Well, we have provided them with farm machinery; we have provided them with supervision; we have provided them with pure bred stock to lay the foundation of their herds; but as yet we cannot say that we have established them in lines of endeavour that ensure their livelihood. I think that is not an unfair way to put it. I think the effort to stimulate the activity of the individual Indians, as indicated by the bill passed the other day, by means of the revolving fund, may have some beneficial results; but, Mr. Chairman, the Indian is still an Indian. He cannot change his racial characteristics, which are as firm and as well marked to-day as they were when this country was discovered. They have been weakened by contact with the whites; they have suffered the consequences of contagious diseases which they have contracted; they have been weakened physically; but essentially the Indian is still an Indian.

I am going to say something that may be regarded as almost heresy, but I do not think the efforts we are making to educate the Indians are worth any fraction of the money we spend in doing so. This is not a sudden conversion; I have had this conviction for many years. I have looked into the matter pretty closely, and frankly I do not think we are getting from our endeavours to educate the Indians results that are at all comparable with the results that might be obtained by the expenditure of the same money in endeavouring to make the Indian economically independent. I believe that a limited expenditure of money towards education, and generous expenditures towards developing his tendency to improve his own position economically will give us excellent results.

I happen to know of three or four cases which came to my direct attention. As the minister stated, we take ten or twelve years to educate a boy or a girl. I have in mind a boy—I believe the minister spoke about a girl —who six months after the time he was out of school was back to the reserve, the only place where he could go. I am sorry to say that boy was just plain ignorant. What is more, Mr. Chairman—and I regret to say this—from the standpoint of his tribe and his contribution to the life of his band, he is not as good as was his contemporary who did not go to school at all; for it has unfitted him, unless he drops straight down into the stratum from which he came.

There is the difficulty. I know the minister is deeply interested in the matter. I confess one never talks to an Indian of intelligence without looking at him and wondering what is in the back of his head; for he has a tradition; he has an uncanny way of knowing things. He has a knowledge of everything about him which makes him one of the most wonderful studies to be found in this world. He looks out across the great prairie and you see in his eye something more than the mere looking at the land, the trees, the forests or the mines. You see something which makes you realize that he is thinking of days and generations which have gone by, when he had handed down to him from sire to son, and on and on and on, the story of their past. If you could only get them to tell you about it, you would realize how difficult is the problem to make of them something they are not. All you have to do is to visit the burial ground of the Blackfoot tribe and see where their old leader was laid away, and the provision they made for his future. You see how he was to go to the Happy Hunting Ground, and the way in which he was to carry on when he got there. You see the provisions that those who had been left behind made for him as he went, the little covering they placed over the supplies which were to serve him in that Happy Hunting Ground. You need only to see these things to realize how difficult is the problem of dealing with them.

I assure the minister that any assistance which can be given to improve their physical condition, their health, their happiness of mind, or anything which bears directly on their happiness of mind or on efforts to strengthen their physical resistance to the very conditions to which the minister referred, is time well spent. Speaking as a Canadian I am extremely proud of the way in which we have handled our Indians. True, at times we have made mistakes; but in the main we have treated them better than have most countries. If we have deprived them of their inheritance, we have at least paid a price for it, and we shall continue to do so till the end.

I want to say this to the minister: He will find it impossible to induce the Indian to part from the thought of wardship. What does he say to me? He produces his silver medal, a great medal as large as a saucer, which the great White Mother gave to his father or grandfather. That means that so long as the sun shines and water runs he will be cared for. In that sense wardship crops up in the most unexpected moment; it is an amazing thing. I can recall talking to one old fellow and hearing him say, "White man take my land, my home; great White Mother, she say we never want as long as sun shine or water run." That thought is handed on from generation to generation, and will continue.

I think we must frankly recognize the sense of wardship, to which the minister has referred, as the basis of our policy. On the other hand I venture to direct the attention of the department to a complaint I have received. They sent a man out to try to ascertain what the conditions were with the Stoneys and the complaints made with respect to the Kootenays. I must say I did feel for a moment a little bit ashamed of my country, because a citizen of the great republic to the south was talking to me on the train about the way in which these Indians were being cared for. He has expended of his own substance for the purpose of keeping them from starvation. That is a condition which the minister cannot help, but which we must frankly realize involves us as a nation in spending money to keep them alive, whether we like it or not. That is what they look upon as the obligation which we assumed when we took from them their land and gave them these reservations. The Kootenay band is not far from Cranbrook, and certainly they put in a terrible time last winter. I know of a citizen, not of this country, but of another, who did take them supplies and provided them with, shall I say, a few of the necessities of life to keep them alive.

In eastern Canada one is not so familiar with the story, but one does know something about the great band which lives in the reserve near the St. Lawrence river where the bridge crosses. They have a very interesting history, and in the main, I would say, not an unhappy one. I refer to the Caughnawaga tribe. Among them have been men who have accepted education in an amazing way. I suppose the minister has come in contact with a number of them, and must realize that education there has accomplished a very great deal. Then, when we come to Ontario, around Brantford and that section of the country, we find a high type of Indian. When I have come in contact with some of them especially during the great war, and have had occasion to talk to them, I have realized they were men who differed from their white brothers only in colour, in the straightness of their hair, and in those small physical attributes which distinguish the Indian from the white man. That was what I found when I came into personal contact with some of them. I saw their farms and homes, and realized that the problems they had to face were entirely different from those of the Kootenays, the Stoneys or some of those other Indian tribes in the far north, who rarely come as far south as Edmonton in Alberta or as Prince Albert in Saskatchewan. Certainly they do not get farther south than the northern towns of Manitoba. They live, fish and hunt in the far north.

I can only say to the minister that I for one would personally be glad to expedite any grant which would involve greater medical attention and care for the Indians, but I am more concerned about their economic life, which does not consist in keeping them in schools for a while, and then letting them go back to the reserves where they may revert to savagery. I do not refer to the savagery of old times, but to the refined type of savagery which has developed from their contact with the white man, which has come about as a result of our having appropriated their property, and given them reserves.

Mr. MacNICOL: When a previous item was under consideration I intimated to the minister that I should like to say a word or two about his department. In my travels over Indian reserves I have known where the minister has been, and have strongly endorsed his endeavour to improve the lot of the Indians. I have listened with interest to what he has said to-night. If he continues along present lines, I believe the Indians may have a better time than they are now having.

I first became interested in the Indian problem through using Indians as guides, motor mechanics and canoeists in travels I have made in the northern country. I expect to use them again this summer in northern Ontario where I propose to go again. I shall do my level best to see that these Indian lands in northern Ontario are not exploited by the diversion of the Albany river into the great lakes.

On leaving there I visited about five different reservations and I shall refer briefly to one or two matters that came under my observation. The minister and the right hon. leader of the opposition have both referred to the education of the Indians, and I believe they both recommended some improvements. I visited many homes of Indians, but in one home in particular the daughter had just come back from school. She was a fine looking girl of about eighteen years and had been trained in the Indian school on the reservation.

As the minister relates, she had been taught to read and use the different utensils now employed in modern homes. She had been taught how to cook and preserve. I saw some of the work that had been done when I visited the school later on. But one fact struck me most strongly. When that girl returned home, to what did she return? She returned to nothing but a hut. I measured this particular hut myself; it was ten feet by twelve feet, and six people were living in it. You could see out through the walls and the roof in every direction. There were two bunks in the one room which made up the hut, and I suppose the two old folks slept in one, while the four children, including this girl of eighteen, slept in the other.

What is the use in sending these Indian children to school to teach them modern civilization and then having them come home to something like that? We should give some consideration to the homes of these Indians as well as to providing schools on the reservation. I saw many of the children attending these schools and they appeared just as bright as other children, but they seemed to lose their brightness once they left school. It is not right that they should receive this education and then have to come back to living conditions such as I have described. This hut was one, not the worst, on the reservation.

I found the officials to be very good. The doctors, the Indian agents and the police officers were a fine type of men. I found the teachers in the school on the reservation to which I refer to be excellent. The doctor on one reservation discussed the matter of tuberculosis with me. He suggested that on those reservations where there are no hospitals, hospitals should be provided. The Indian parents love their children just as much as other parents, and they do not want to have them sent to hospitals many miles away from the reservation. In order to prevent this, they try to hide the fact that their children have tuberculosis. This doctor told me that if I lifted my voice at all in this connection, I should try to persuade the minister and the department to establish hospitals on those reservations where there is none. Then the Indian father and mother could visit their child in the hospital on the reservation. It was felt that this would mean the saving of many lives.

There is one thing I found to be very satisfactory. I do not know how long this practice has been in force, but on this particular reservation prizes have been given for the last few years at Indian fairs. Perhaps the minister could tell us if prizes are granted to Indians on all the reservations. This encourages the Indians to raise various kinds of vegetables, and they are pleased with the idea. One suggestion I would make is that instead of buying vegetables and so on from whites to be used for the relief of Indians, these commodities should be purchased from the Indians. When I came back to Ottawa I checked up on the Indian estimates and I found that large supplies of potatoes had been shipped in to one particular reservation for relief purposes. These potatoes had been purchased from whites a hundred or a hundred and fifty miles away, whereas there were on that reservation large piles of potatoes that had been frozen and rendered useless because the Indians did not take care of them. If these supplies were purchased from the Indians, they would be encouraged to that extent.

In some of the reservations in northern Ontario I found a growing feeling of resentment against the whites. The newspapers all over the country have indicated just what is going on. I shall not read any of these articles, but perhaps the headlines will be illuminating. Some of these read:

> Geographer deplores wresting of hunting grounds from former native owners.
> Indian rights being defended.
> Indians organize league, demand return of "rights."
> Chief urges fair chance for Indians.
> Indians claim rights invaded.
> Fear hunting war will flare between whites and Indians as game preserves depleted.

A few days ago I made a brief reference to what I had found in northern Ontario.

Mr. BRADETTE: To what section of northern Ontario is the hon. member referring?

Mr. MacNICOL: North of lake Nipigon, where I propose to go again this summer. Many miles north of that lake I found the hunting grounds and the old trails to be as they had been for perhaps a thousand years. Over the height of land to the Albany and towards James bay the trails were as they had been since the earliest record of the whites. But what did I find? I found that the Indians are not engaged by the government as guides and fire rangers. My opinion is that they should be. I asked the Indians if they could do this work, and they told me they could. It may be that they are not efficient. I am not saying that they are, because I am not familiar with their habits.

Mr. BRADETTE: That would be provincial.

Mr. MacNICOL: Going up and down the rivers I met white trappers, and the Indians who were with me told me that when white trappers came on a river where Indians trapped, the whites simply took their trapping places and interfered with their natural bent to trap and fish. I do not think that should be allowed. The country I was in is further west than that of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette). That country is still unsettled; but if it becomes settled, where are the Indians going? Are they going to be driven further north where the climate is more severe? I have surveyed this Indian question, and in my travels in the last five years I have visited the places where they had their origins in America and first came in contact with the whites, and visited also every reservation in the Mohawk valley. In the early days there were great men among those Indians. Brant was a great man; Half King was a great man; Redjacket was a great man, and so were many other Indian chiefs of those days. They must have had ability; they were dealing with the whites in those early days. I am afraid—I may be wrong—we are not perhaps, as the minister himself said a few moments ago, directing our efforts to the best advantage so far as the Indians are concerned, and if the department has any new plan for directing the Indians along lines where they will become more self-sustaining and tend to get out of the class of being simply wards of the government, it would hold out the hope of a very great advance being made.

Why should the red man be so backward? The coloured people are able to take their places with the whites. The coloured people of South Africa, for example, vote to elect members to the parliament of South Africa. Last year when I was in London I read of a bill that was to allow the natives of South Africa exclusively to elect three members, Europeans, to the legislature and two to the senate, and we may be sure that those members elected solely by the coloured people of South Africa will look after their interests in the legislature. But we have nothing like that here. I wonder if the time will ever come when Indians will be able to return a member to this House of Commons to present their views.

During the last eight years, of my attendance in this house, every time the Indian estimates have come up they have been voted one after another usually with just a "carried," "carried," "carried." In fact, when I rose to speak this evening a colleague on this side of the house said to me, "Sit down; you do not know anything about the Indians; you have none in your riding; what are you going to talk about the Indians for?" That may be quite true; but somebody has to speak for the Indians and try to help them; I propose to make a more thorough study of their conditions, visit more Indian reserves and come in contact with more of the Indians so that I shall be better able on some future occasion to say a word on their behalf, and I shall be glad to support any measure that will help to improve their lot.

Mr. CRERAR: I appreciate the suggestions that have been made by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) and by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). The committee may rest assured that I wish to get all the assistance I can in dealing with this Indian problem.

The hon. member for Davenport referred to his experiences in northern Ontario, north of lake Nipigon, and I quite agree with his observations. The fur has been depleted in that region, and it has been depleted largely by white trappers who have too frequently frightened the Indians off their usual trapping grounds. Unfortunately that is something we cannot control. The Indians in northern Ontario, and indeed in several provinces, are now segregated almost entirely upon reserves. It is true they have been given permission to trap over areas outside their reserves; but we cannot control the white trappers, and while we do the best we can to assist the Indians, that is a problem over which we have no control.

But on the Indian reserves in the more settled communities, undoubtedly progress can be made. In western Ontario, for example, we have a reserve on which the relief bill in the past year has been cut in two, on account of the fact that a year ago we started community gardens on the reserve, where under the supervision of a foreman the Indians produced enough vegetables, properly looked after, to supply their needs throughout the winter. These community gardens were started on a great many reserves in 1937, and the plan will be extended to more reserves this year. The director just tells me that on a reserve a very considerable distance north of Prince Albert they have planted a community garden from which the Indians will get vegetables that will help to carry them over next winter.

There is one aspect of Indian administration which I think may be of interest to the committee. My observation has led me to the conclusion that one of the most important cogs in the wheel of Indian administration is the Indian agent in charge of the reserve. In Indian agent requires qualities that cannot be assessed in the ordinary way. I should say that some of the necessary, almost indispensable qualties that he needs are firmness, sympathy and understanding, and a little bit of the missionary spirit. He must win the confidence of the people he is looking after; for in many respects they are like children, and my observation has led me to conclude that where we have Indian agents of a certain character, type and quality, there you will find the reserves that are doing the best. In the Nipigon area, for example, to which the hon. member for Davenport referred, the Indian agent secured contracts for taking out ties cut from timber on the Indian reserves, and this year some $18,000 worth of ties have been taken off the reserve by the Indians. As a result of this agent's work practically no relief has been necessary on a number of the reserves in his agency during the last three or four years. In other words, he has brought the Indians to a point where they are sustaining themselves. That can be done in a great many instances, I am convinced, but it is by a process of education and of building up.

The leader of the opposition referred to conditions in the northern areas. It was, I think, unfortunate when the resources were transferred to the prairie provinces several years ago that areas were not reserved for Indian trapping grounds, particularly in the northern parts of the western provinces. We are now negotiating with the three western provincial governments to get back sufficient areas where we hope to build up the fur-bearing animals.

Mr. BENNETT: We still have the northwest territories.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, but the Indians of northern Manitoba do not wish to go to the northwest territories, and I shall say a further word about that in a moment. In Manitoba we are endeavouring to secure an area of, roughly, 175,000 acres east of The Pas. We are negotiating to lease it from the provincial government at a very low rental so that we may get control of it, and then we shall make a survey—there is an item in the supplementary estimates to cover it—and probably build some dams or cut some ditches to secure uniform water levels, and then we shall endeavour to bring back the muskrat, because that territory is the natural home of the muskrat.

In another part of Manitoba we are trying to secure a block of 300,000 acres. We had a survey made of it last summer. It is an excellent beaver country, and we are planning to take beaver from our national parks, where they are becoming a bit of a nuisance, and to leave them in this area and let them multiply.

Work of this kind has been carried on by a few private individuals across Canada. There is one not far from Ottawa, and some in Manitoba, proving beyond reasonable doubt that fur-bearing animals can be brought back by proper conservation measures. I am told that the state of Louisiana went into the muskrat industry a number of years ago, and as a result of the application of simple methods Louisiana is to-day one of the great producers of muskrat pelts. In northern Canada we have the natural habitat of the muskrat, and I am satisfied that if we can get control of the areas and forbid white trappers trapping there we can restore these animals. The Indian is naturally a conservationist; he is so by tradition and training, and no difficulty arises with him. But when an Indian sees white trappers trapping everything ahead of them, he considers he may as well do the same and get all he can while it lasts, and the result is a complete loss of fur-bearing animals.

In Alberta I have had conversations with the minister of resources; and while there has been a great deal of criticism of the Alberta government, I have had the fullest cooperation with the minister there in getting areas in northern Alberta taken care of. I have discussed the matter with the authorities in British Columbia and they are sympathetic. In the province of Quebec we have recently secured a considerable area south of James bay where we have about a thousand Indians, and we hope to introduce the beaver and other fur-bearing animals. If that policy is carried out consistently over a period of years we shall, as time passes, reach the point where many of the Indians can, at any rate, largely sustain themselves by trapping. In the northwest territories we have better opportunities. In the Mackenzie basin we have recently set aside on the west side of the Mackenzie river a very large area running into tens of thousands of square miles, and we shall control it as far as fur is concerned. At present we are closely regulating trapping permits in the northwest territories. No outsider can come in and get a licence to trap fur there to-day. He must have been a resident of the territories for at least four years. We are contemplating even stiffer restrictions so far as trapping there is concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: Is a permit required for trapping in Hudson bay?

Mr. CRERAR: They require a trading permit, I am told. These are all problems relating to administration. We shall have another problem in the eastern arctic before a great many years in connection with the Eskimo. So far as the administration of Indian affairs is concerned, I think I can say this of all the officials, that they are alive to these problems that are developing. We can learn from experience of the past, and I have no doubt that as regards the northwest territories, where the area is completely under federal control, we can maintain conditions of life that will enable the Indians to live.

We are trying an experiment this year. In our parks we have taken several bright Indian boys from the Indian schools and are training them to be guides. That is a field which may open up useful employment for boys from Indian schools. Only last summer I was told of a gentleman from Minneapolis who, with a party of four or five including his wife, went to northern Manitoba. They wanted an Indian guide, a good canoe man who could build fires, cook, and wash dishes. They could not find one for several weeks to fill their requirements. That is something which might be taken up by the Indian schools. Why could we not direct the education of Indian boys to this sort of thing, for which they are naturally fitted? I have offered this suggestion to one or two residential schools in the northern part of these provinces, "Why do you not develop a fur farm adjacent to your school?" We find fox farms and mink farms all over Canada in the older settled communities. Why cannot that be adopted as part of the education of Indian boys in Indian schools? Then there is the making of snowshoes and canoes. We are having an increasing tourist business in Canada, and I am quite sure that by wise and judicious methods we can gradually increase the number of tourists coming to Canada. One of the things these tourists desire to buy is Indian handicraft work. They go to a store in Winnipeg and buy some goods that are supposed to represent Indian handicraft work, but if you trace it back you will find that it was probably made in some city of eastern Canada or possibly in Japan. It is not the genuine article. I have suggested to some of those in charge of the Indian schools that they teach Indian girls work of this kind. We hope to supply the materials, get these things made and find a market for them in the tourist traffic of the country.

There are many ways in which opportunities can be made available to the young Indian lads in the future. There is one other point and that is with regard to the observations made by the leader of the opposition touching the East Kootenay reserve. I recall the occasion on which he brought it to my attention.

Mr. BENNETT: I telegraphed from Victoria.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, and I immediately had an investigation made. As it happened, the Indian commissioner for British Columbia had been there a short time before. When I got back to Ottawa I found that representations had also been made to the Prime Minister; knowing the source from which they came he passed them on to me, and a very complete investigation was made. I am bound to say that in my opinion Mr. Drayton, the gentleman in question, was misinformed. I checked up with the Indian agent who is very well regarded in the administration, the district nurse of British Columbia in the community, and the Indian doctor who had had many years of service on the reserve. I checked up on the amount of relief that had been distributed month by month to the reserve, and I could come to no other conclusion than that the gentleman who had made complaints had been misinformed. As a matter of fact he wrote a letter later to the Prime Minister regretting that a good many of the supposed facts upon which he had based his representations were not well founded.

When I am travelling around the country and have opportunity I talk to the Indians. A year ago I was in a little northern town in Manitoba where the Indian chief came to see me with two or three of his councillors to talk about some grievances. I listened, and then I said, "Have you anything else?" And he started another story of grievances. I continued with that for the better part of an hour, and I think if I could have remained for five hours the chief and his councillors would have kept on digging out new grievances and complaints. In considering these things you have to take into account the Indian character. I assure my right hon. friend that I was grateful to him for bringing to my attention the matters to which he referred, because the only way by which these things can be checked is to have them brought to one's attention. But they were investigated very fully, and I do not think there was much ground for the complaint made.

Mr. McIVOR: Perhaps what I have to say might be said on the next item; but when Thunder Bay district is being considered that, of course, is treading on ground with which I am quite familiar. I cannot agree altogether with the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). I have visited those reserves ninety-five miles up lake Nipigon, and I have frequently visited the other bands. I find in Squaw bay that the agent there was instructing the Indians in making canoes and motor boats and snowshoes, such snowshoes that when even a white man goes out in the snow with them on he will feel almost as fleet as an Indian. When I visited the bands on lake Nipigon with the agent and the inspector of schools I was delighted to see the condition of those schools. When the hon. member for Davenport said that the Indians are living in huts I do not think he was referring to the whole district, because if he visited one band he would see the cottages placed in crescent shape just as they would be at a summer resort on the shore of lake Superior.

Another thing that interested me very much was about thirty acres of potatoes. If anything gladdens the hearts of an Irishman it is a fine crop of potatoes, clean, juicy and tasty. I have not seen anything better since I left the Green Isle. There was a reason; these Indians were encouraged by the agent to fertilize. They could not buy fertilizer very well, so they went to the lake and took out fish, coarse fish, by the wagon load, and filled the drills with fish. They planted the potatoes, Wee McGregor or Irish Cobbler, and those potatoes grew in abundance the like of which I had not seen before. They were able to sell enough potatoes to buy their groceries for the winter and to store enough potatoes for their own needs in fine root houses; I have not seen anything better in the west. If I had as good an imagination as the hon. member for Davenport, and sat down to a plate of those potatoes properly French-fried, I would not have much trouble in imagining it was fish and chips.

Mr. MacNICOL: Let me interject that anything I said was not imagination. I spoke about what I saw.

Mr. McIVOR: I never doubt my hon. friend; he is as truthful as I am. I will do the imagining for him. I would have no trouble sitting down to a plate of those potatoes French-fried and feeling that they were just as good as fish and chips.

Having taught in an industrial school, I know that the Indians respond to leadership. I took a group of Indians from the industrial school at Regina, and in at least one instance we were able to put it over the civic football team of that city. The Indians respond in other ways. They get more like the white man every day, and I am convinced that with agents like Mr. Jerry Burk the Indians are not going to take second place to the white man even on the reserve.

Mr. WARREN: I have not had much experience with Indians, but these references to the education of the Indian remind me of a little experience I had during the past year which tends to prove that the Indian, if educated, can take his place among any Canadians. Last year a young woman came to visit me; I was surprised to find that she came from the Indian reserve at Golden lake. She had been holding a good position as stenographer for eight or nine years. She came to me because she was interested in a young brother who had attended public school and had gone to continuation school for two years. She said she did not want that brother to be idle; she wanted to get him at some kind of work. Eventually that boy got into the Royal Canadian Air Force as a labourer. I have met that boy two or three times since then; he is as bright and happy and capable looking a young man as I have met, happy at his work and sending money home to help the family. The father of that family is working all the time as sectionman on the railway. On that reserve we have Indians who are just as good bushmen as any whites. If we give the Indians the education and opportunities that we give our own people, I do not see that the education will hurt them at all. Apparently, if they have the necessary education, they are just as able to fill important positions in our everyday life as any of the rest of us.

Mr. NEEDHAM: I congratulate the minister upon what he is trying to do for the Indians. I should be interested if he would explain something more in regard to administration on the reserve. Last summer I spent some time on several reserves, and I find they have this difficulty: They feel that too much is left to the agent or the department at Ottawa, and they are kept in the dark as to their financial standing. Will the minister explain whether the agent makes an accounting to the tribe of how they stand with the department and how each individual stands in relation to the tribe? I found this to be one great difficulty, that they did not know whether they had a credit or a debit, what was coming to the tribe or what was in trust for the tribe and whether they could or could not use it. They were absolutely in the dark. I talked with two of the chiefs and some of the young men who have been through the schools and are fluent, bright young fellows, and they are anxious to know where they stand. They do not seem to be getting the encouragement they think is their right.

In addition to other things, they feel that they should be consulted more than they are in connection with what is planned for them. In regard to education, they think they should have some say in the selection of the teacher on the reserve. That, I understand, is left largely to the church which has charge of the school. The church selects the teacher; the Indians have no say in the matter, and when they are discussing these matters they say very often they get a lemon or someone who does not apply himself, because he is responsible only to the church. There is another point as well. You may have two reserves very close together, without even a fence between them. On one reserve there will be an Anglican school and on the other, a Roman Catholic school. That does not make for harmony, and I think matters of that kind should be rectified in some way.

On the reserves I visited I had some conversation with the farm instructors and also with the Indians. In one instance I found that the stock was greatly depleted. I asked the instructor how long he had been there and he said, "Some twenty odd years." I asked what was the amount of stock on the reserve when he went there, and he told me. I asked what the stock amounted to then at the time of my visit, and found it was less than half what it had been in the first place. As a consequence the Indians are putting up hay, getting a permit, peddling a load now and then, and doing the same with firewood and things of that kind. I should like the minister, if he would, to explain the system and show how the Indians stand with the department at Ottawa, and how they may get an accounting of the funds held in trust for them.

Mr. CRERAR: I think what the hon. member is referring to is the matter of band funds on the reserve.

Mr. NEEDHAM: And how their yearly production, whether it be in stock or grain, is accounted for.

Mr. CRERAR: I am dealing with the point raised in regard to the Indians getting information as to the position of their band funds. The chief and counsellors of the tribe can always get that information from the Indian agent. If he has not that information he can easily obtain it, and there is no reason why it should not be given to the Indians. As a matter of fact I think we have the right to use the increment of the fund for the purposes of the Indians without their consent, in connection with certain matters such as relief and medical care, but no disposition can be made of band funds without the approval of the Indians themselves. On the other hand the Indians cannot dispose of the band funds without the approval of the administration. In other words, before band funds can be utilized for any purpose both the Indians who are interested in the fund and the department which administers it must agree as to its disposition. As I have already said, so far as I know there is no reason why the chief and his counsellors should not be able to ascertain at any time the standing of their fund and the disposition that has been made of it.

With reference to the other point, of course I do not know the reserve to which my hon. friend refers. I think what he has stated is true on some reserves; that is, that if anything they have progressed backward in their agricultural methods in the last twenty or twenty-five years. That is due perhaps to, shall I say, indifference in administration; or perhaps a farm instructor gets into a rut, as human beings sometimes do, and does not take his job seriously enough. The check on that I think is better and more constant supervision. I am bound to say this, that I think in the past administrations have perhaps erred on the side of too much economy in the administration of these services. If I could induce my colleagues to expand the Indian vote, I think I see where I could spend another $100,000 to excellent advantage. But even without that I hope a steady improvement will take place.

I wish, however, to say this to the committee. I do not think there is any more important unit in the administration than the man who has charge of the reserve, the farming instructor on the reserve, and those who have to do with the Indians in their day to day contacts. If there is understanding, sympathy, firmness and intelligence in dealing with situations as they arise, unquestionably you get better results. On the other hand if, as unfortunately may be the case in some instances, officials lack those qualities, then you have a certain amount of suspicion, distrust and retrogression. Probably that is the situation in the reserve to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. NEEDHAM: I am very happy to hear that expression of opinion on the part of the minister, but I am given to understand that the agent will not give the chief or his counsellors information as to how the band stands with the department at Ottawa. Supposing they have a credit which they wish to invest in stock or in a fur farm such as the minister referred to, as I understand the situation, that band has the right to utilize that money in that way.

Mr. CRERAR: Is my hon. friend referring to the vote we are now considering or to the revolving fund to which earlier reference was made?

Mr. NEEDHAM: I am referring to any credit that the band may have with the government.

Mr. CRERAR: The circumstances of each individual case will be studied. If you have a reserve that is adapted to the rearing of cattle, I would hope that we would be able to put some stock, at any rate, on that reserve, and see that hay was put up to feed the animals and that they were properly looked after. If the venture were properly handled there would be a natural increase, and there is no reason on earth why on a reserve that is adapted to stock raising there should not be a substantial herd of cattle. In some instances some of these animals may be owned by individual Indians; or it may be a communal effort on the part of the band, but again I stress the importance of supervision and care in dealing with these questions. Sometimes, by his traditional way of living, the Indian becomes careless in looking after stock, and it is necessary to have someone to see that the stock is properly cared for. That is all part of the whole scheme of general welfare and improvement among these Indians. I know it is going to be a long, patient business, but I do think it offers some possibilities of getting many of these people into a much better position than they are in to-day. At any rate that is the principle which is guiding us in this action.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to express to the minister my appreciation for the vision which he manifested in his speech regarding the development of fur farming and other activities among the Indians. It is my feeling that he is producing very fine results, and I should like to encourage him. I believe he certainly should have that other $100,000 because beyond question there is arising among the Indians a very definite need. May I use as an illustration the reserve in my own constituency. For a long time the Indians have been able to go off the reserve and work at such jobs as picking up potatoes, harvesting beets, and working in the grain fields. The returns from that kind of labour supplemented their regular income. However, since the coming of the depression it has been virtually impossible for the Indian to get any such work, with the result that many of them are suffering painfully. Unless something is done on the reserve to replace the revenue they have lost through their inability to get employment, manifestly the Indians are going to tend to decay in numbers and morale.

I believe the minister is thoroughly justified in asking for sufficient money to develop industries on the reserve. He has mentioned fur farming and stock raising as being possibilities. The reserve in my constituency would be well adapted to stock raising and also to grain growing. A good deal of the ground has been ploughed up, and in many instances grain has been grown. In some respects, however, some of the Indians do not find themselves adapted to farming, though others do it very well. A number of them have found that the grasslands from which they cut their hay have been depleted, and for that reason they have been placed in a difficult position. If money were available and if the Indians who were adapted to fur farming were encouraged to go into it, it would be a great blessing.

I greatly appreciate what the minister has said, and I for one will certainly support him in any requests for additional money he may make to help the Indian. I believe the Indians are a very important element of our growing population.

Mr. LOCKHART: Is there any coordination between the minister's department and the tourist bureaux? I refer particularly to the contact with guides.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; we are trying an experiment this year, which will probably answer the hon. member's question. We are taking over some bright boys who have been recommended to us by the principals in Indian schools. They are to be given training to act as guides in our parks, under the supervision of experienced park wardens. If the experiment works out satisfactorily, we shall expand the effort. This plan may give opportunities to a number of these lads to become engaged in useful occupation.

I have suggested to some who are in charge of the more northern schools that the boys be given some training in the art of guiding—because I am told it is an art—so that on occasions they may find useful work. So far as the matter of correlation with the tourist industry is concerned, I am not just sure what the hon. member had in mind, but I believe it is possible to link up the production of handicraft work among the Indians with a sales system for the benefit of United States or English tourists who may come to Canada. That matter is now being studied.

I am satisfied if we can encourage the development of handicraft work, we shall be doing the Indians a good service. Some excellent specimens of work come from the teepees away back in the northern land. The Indians seem to have a natural capacity for this kind of work. I feel sure means can be found to find a sale for their work, and to transfer the proceeds of such sales to the credit of the Indians who produce the goods. In that way we could help them to be more self-sustaining.

Mr. LOCKHART: Perhaps the minister did not clearly understand my question. It has been my privilege to cooperate to a considerable extent with tourist bureaux. I believe I have given service to at least one hundred and fifty Americans who travel as far south as Mexico, and who are in the habit of coming to Canada periodically to travel in the far north. On two occasions by personal contact with one of the reserves I have been able to provide qualified Indian guides. On several occasions I have been asked if guides were available, and it occurs to me that in view of the fact that an experiment is being made this year, at the time advertising is being sent out to certain individuals it would be helpful to have those men, who are enthusiastic about the great Canadian north, supplied with Indian guides, and to have a condition whereby those guides would be available without great trouble, and would be found trustworthy and reliable. I pass that suggestion on because it has come to my attention particularly in the last two years.

I should like to make one further observation with reference to the matter of co-operation about which the minister has spoken. This may be a matter which is more or less within provincial jurisdiction, but I pass it on for what it is worth. I feel that it has some bearing on federal jurisdiction. About two years ago the great niece of General Brock came to Canada from the Guernsey Isle to place a wreath on the monument at Queenston Heights. On that occasion some eminent Indian chiefs attended. Had the minister been able to read a verbatim report of the speech made by one of the Indian chiefs, I believe he would have been impressed with the resentment expressed concerning the way in which the Indian is sometimes neglected. In passing, I would suggest to the minister that in his negotiations with the provincial government—and I assume he was referring to the Ontario government—consideration be given to this matter. On the occasion of the celebration one of the chiefs said pointedly that no recognition had ever been given of the part played by the Indian in the history of Upper Canada. I would point out that those tribes in southern Ontario would greatly appreciate some recognition of the part they played in the great war in which General Brock fell. I know the Indians would appreciate any recognition which could be given of the help they gave at that time.

Mr. STIRLING: There is one phase of the Indian question to which I should like to refer for a moment, and when I have concluded I should like to hear the minister's observations on the matter. In southern British Columbia we find a considerable number of reserves. In my own constituency they are dotted all the way down the valley of the Similkameen river, and through the Okanagan valley. There is no doubt that in times past the Okanagan band must have covered a very considerable part of what is now the state of Washington, and have reached well into the present province of British Columbia. The difficulty to which I allude is that by intermarriage and constant visiting a mix-up has developed between United States and Canadian Indians. At times there is evidence of unrest, and when the trouble is looked into it generally boils down to a question of jealousy between United States and Canadian Indians. I often wonder whether this difficulty is confined to this particular part of British Columbia. It does not seem to me to be reasonable that there should be Indians of the same tribe resident on reserves in the state of Washington who are receiving certain benefits from Canada, while there are Indians resident on our reserves who are receiving official assistance from the United States government. I wonder if it would not be possible to arrive at some solution of this problem so that there might be a definite understanding between the two governments, or at least between the two departments of government that administer the matter? Perhaps a separation could take place between the Indians who are definitely Canadian and those who are definitely United States. If this were not a cause of friction, there would be no reason to raise the question, but I am persuaded that it is. I have had it up with the minister and with the deputy superintendent, and I should like the minister to let us have his observations.

Mr. CRERAR: The only places where the difficulty referred to by the hon. member is to be found is on the Okanagan reserve in British Columbia, and in Manitoba, perhaps to a lesser degree, in connection with the Sioux Indians. As my hon. friend says, there are Indians living in the United States who get money from Canada, while there are Indians who were born in the United States, who are now more or less residents of Canada and who receive treaty money from the United States government. There are some Indians living in Canada who own property in the United States. So far as I am aware, there has been no discussion between the two governments in connection with the matter referred to by the hon. gentleman. I suppose the free movement from country to country could be prevented, but I do not think the difficulties arising therefrom are such as to warrant anything in the nature of restriction. I am inclined to think that as time goes on the problem will tend to solve itself. This has been the experience in Manitoba.

Mr. DUFFUS: I desire to compliment the minister and the committee upon the sympathetic attitude displayed toward these original Canadians. They are obviously permanently among us, and our duty is to improve their circumstances in every way possible and to do everything reasonable in providing education. We should try to attract these people to the soil because they make splendid farmers. A large number of ploughing matches are held throughout Ontario every fall. For some years it was necessary to have the Indians in separate classes at these matches, but more recently they have resented this and have asked that they be placed in the same classes with the white men. In many instances they have carried off the championships. I believe there should be strong supervision, both temporal and spiritual, on these reserves. This is the duty that we should accept as a matter of course, since they are wards of the government.

Mr. WALSH: I listened to the minister with some degree of interest when he referred to the educational policy being pursued by the government. It naturally gladdens the heart of an educationalist to hear that modern methods are creeping into the administration of the schools on the Indian reserves. I am hoping that the minister will persevere along this line so that the Indians may have the benefit of modern improvements.

Has the minister any further information as to the condition now prevailing on the branch reserve at Oka? I understand this is a branch of the Caughnawaga reserve. I have taken up this matter with the department, and I am interested to know whether there are any further developments and a possibility of a permanent solution of this problem.

Mr. CRERAR: The Indians at Oka have not title to the lands upon which they are living. This story goes back into ancient history. The order of Sulpicians was given a grant over two hundred years ago to land in this particular district, and my information is that at that time the Indians were allowed to stay. Some question has arisen in more recent years as to their right to be there, and this has given rise to some local difficulty.

Mr. BENNETT: If I remember rightly, they claim title by prescription.

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised that a case was carried to the privy council, and the ruling was against the Indians staying there.

Mr. BENNETT: I knew of their claim, but I had forgotten about the decision.

Mr. CRERAR: It is a difficult problem, and I may say to the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) that it has engaged the attention of the department for some time past. I am not prepared at the moment to say just what will be the final solution, but it is a rather knotty problem.

Mr. WALSH: I understand the land has been sold by the Sulpician order to a Belgian concern, and the Indians have lost their rights to the woodland. At the present time I think the department have to purchase the wood and deliver it to the Indian reserve. Of course, the Indian still desires to go into the same bush he and his ancestors have been going into for some two hundreds years, and they are constantly being arrested for trespassing. It is giving rise to a certain amount of discontent among the Indians and considerable apprehension among the whites living in the immediate vicinity. I took the matter up with the department and received every consideration. I know the department is anxious to find a reasonable solution, and I was wondering if we had come any nearer to a solution or if the plan might be to move these Indians to a more desirable place, perhaps even to some other province, where they might be located to better advantage. I know the Indians would be loath to leave that particular spot which they have inhabited for several hundred years. Their old burying ground is there, and naturally they have an attachment to that particular part of Canada and feel that they have been deprived of their rights; but with a little gentle persuasion from the department, the Indians, if they were tactfully handled, could, I believe, be induced to move to a more desirable place where they would enjoy more freedom than they are enjoying to-day.

In the courts of St. Jerome this winter there were several prosecutions, which the Indian interprets as persecution, and if it continues for another year conditions might be more serious. Even last winter, as probably the minister knows, when certain police officers went there in the discharge of their duties there was friction that pretty nearly resulted in a charge of murder. It was only an accident that a murder was not committed. It would be deplorable to have such a thing happen if there is anything we can do to settle the difficulties amicably so that the Indian would feel that the white man was not trying to drive him into the lake of Two Mountains or out of existence. I know I have the sympathy of the department and that the officials understand and sympathize with the position, and I have no complaint whatever to make of the department, but I just wanted to impress on the minister the desirability of making further progress towards a complete solution of this thorny problem in that particular district.

Item agreed to.

Indian agencies, $714,952.

Mr. BENNETT: How many agencies are there?

Mr. CRERAR: There are 114.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Chairman, I feel constrained to impose somewhat on the time of the committee to deal at some length with the custom of the potlatch among the Indians of British Columbia, and especially those Indians of the Kwawkewlth agency, of which the head and front might be said to be Alert Bay. In the session of 1936 the government introduced an amendment to the Indian Act designed to establish greater strictures against this custom of the potlatch; but owing almost entirely to the efforts of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), the member for the district in which this agency lies, the minister withdrew his amendment, and the act remains in statu quo ante. In that controversy I had myself taken some part, and predisposed thereto by a principle I have long held, supported the hon. member in his contentions. This principle was that customs of native peoples in contact with the culture of the present day, or the culture of any day for that matter, tended to sublime and the bad features of the custom to fall away and become only an interesting memory.

However, the situation in one part of British Columbia is quite different. About a year after the above discussion took place I received a very earnest communication from the Reverend F. Comley of Oak Bay, near Victoria, pleading for my cooperation, and to this letter I replied immediately stating that, if possible, at a later date I would investigate the condition nearer to its happening. In the meantime I developed considerable correspondence in an effort to discover whether there was a real grievance in and around the agency. I could read here copious extracts from this correspondence and detail much of the information I have received; but I am disposed to be very much the other way in the general objection to the potlatch which many of my correspondents voice, because it has always been my impression that the wisdom of the real conqueror, of the real colonist, of the real leader of people, is best demonstrated when he permits his conquered people or those over whom he exercises dominion to retain their customs and tribal traditions.

In this Kwawkewlth agency, however, I believe we are definitely facing a traditional rite and custom from which some of the bestializing elements have not been sufficiently or speedily enough removed, and it appears to me to be our duty to listen to the protests that are being made, to discover the reason and to remedy the cause.

My own inquiries made in Alert Bay and elsewhere from both potlatch Indians and those who have already renounced the potlatch leave me only with this conclusion: It is admittedly very difficult to understand the genesis of the potlatch; but if one goes outside the Indians ample evidence throughout history abounds of emissaries from one nation visiting a strange or neighbour nation bearing gifts to the potentate, arranging peace pacts, and returning to their own ruler with the largess of the country they have visited. The Arabian Nights, that cradle of our romantic literature, abounds in just such stories. Holy Writ has also complete evidence of the fact that these things had existed from ancient times. It is extremely likely that along the coast of British Columbia, with its many islands, there were in former times many self-contained tribes or phratries of Indians of widely differing origins just as there are to-day, and that because they could not read or write or count or estimate, it became necessary for them to rely upon memory for such records of history as, for instance, the marriage of the scion of one tribe into another or any other historical circumstance, which the tribe wished to record and remember. The ceremony of marriage, birth or death must under such circumstances be observed by the largest possible number of people even if they had to be brought from far cape Flattery in the south or from Fort Simpson in the far north. Such a gathering, invested with all the traditions of the people, was coloured by dancing and made festive and notable by gifts.

Undoubtedly it formed in the history of these primitive peoples a definite encouragement to peace and promoted a union of interest as frequently as it did also union of blood. In the primitive lives of these people, living on the bountiful products of nature, gifts were simple in themselves or at the most they represented the deft workmanship of the worker, either weaver or carver, or some other clever or deft workman and were unique and valuable for that reason. There is great difficulty—and I have asked many questions about it—in discovering the origin of the word "potlatch," but it does appear to have come out of the Chinook jargon and to be definitely related to the giving of gifts. The giving of these gifts has always taken place at these large gatherings of which I have spoken, although the mere giving is only a part—quite an important part, I grant, but only a part—of the ceremony of the potlatch as we understand it. At the same time, irrespective of the meaning of the word, the customs to which it is annexed are rooted in the social structure of the people, and these customs have tended to become in some measure depraved instead of becoming sublimed—in contact, that is, with our present type of civilization. The people themselves are now increasingly realizing that their responsibilities to one another, translated in terms of dollars and cents, are beggaring them beyond hope of recovery, and that the solace of the creditor Indian is poor indeed; for all he frequently obtains is the knowledge that the individual obligations of the many people to whom he has given gifts may some day be met, but that in the meantime all his security is the memory of the debtor supported by the age-old traditions of his people.

Of course, it can be easily understood that in largess there is the implication of a return of largess. Among the Indians this has been an inexorable condition. When the man or woman makes a gift in the potlatch there is the silent but otherwise entirely inescapable obligation to return the gift not less than twofold. When a blanket is given two blankets or their equivalent is the debt assumed for all time by the donee and his family. If the gift be made to a poor person, the debt then is more difficult to redeem; for often 250 per cent and even 300 per cent is required in settlement. Imagine the involutions of a custom where a poor man borrows at 250 per cent to potlatch a 200 per cent obligation.

But, as I have said, the giving of gifts is only one of the outward and visible ceremonies apparently indispensable to the gathering together of a large number of tribal members to whom will be advertised the changes in the tribal history of the person or persons drawing the people together. Nor is the giving indiscriminate. In its proper functioning there is an order of precedence as rigid and as impenetrable as that of any court or the list of the filtered drops from the distillation of the social elite. Then, also, each tribe has an order of precedence which has been established for all by their original spirits, or temenwos, in the progress of the creative birth of these people; as for example, in the definite case of the eagle tribe, which is highest in importance, the eagle bird itself is, or can be invested spiritually by any of the original spirits of the tribe; and in like manner at will departed from. And, be it understood, these spirits are not spirits of departing Indians or members of the eagle tribe of Indians, but they are the transcendent original spirits or temenwos, responsible for the investiture of human beings on earth with their own spiritual qualities. So it is with the wolf tribe; so it is with the bear tribe; so it is with all the other tribes.

Now that is a very highly-developed conception of creative conditions. Such a religious conviction of their creation is, to the Indian, as profoundly inspiring as is the Biblical story of creation to the Hebrew or the Christian. In such a background then, the incidents of birth, adolescence, marriage and death are sacredly sealed; it is with these incidents that the ceremonies are developing, and it is for these ceremonies that the potlatch of goods is both a card of invitation and an inducement to attend. The incidents of birth and death in Indian ceremonies have little enough which we can criticize, and I believe that the Indians in the Kwawkewlth agency are permitted to bury their dead according to their own rites. But the incident of marriage is entirely different. Girls in the tribe speaking the Kwawkala tongue are not married as we understand it. I am not now referring to the licensed marriage according to our laws or religion when I say that. These girls do not select their own husbands; they are not even sold by their parents; they are transferred to their husbands in perpetuity, shall I say, subject to the repayment of the mortgage by which they are held. In tradition, nothing, not even death, releases them from their biological mortgagee. Release can come only by repayment of the money received in the original transaction. This physical bondage, of course, does not prevent the separation of so-called married people or the development of illegitimacy.

Let me enlarge on this so that the committee may understand completely and definitely the gravity of the situation. A certain man dies and leaves behind him a widow and one or two girls. To bury him and forget him the superior position he occupied in the tribe and among the phratries generally would be a crime against the traditions of the people, unthinkable to a true Indian, while the Indian wife herself would become definitely an outcast. There is no money, there is no property; none has been left by the deceased. There must be some declaration. Therefore there must be a potlatch. How can it be financed? The matter is settled by borrowing money for the potlatch, secured by mortgage on one or both of the girls. The girls, however, are only six and eight years old respectively. So, until they are ready for marriage, the mortgage over one or both may change hands several times. And neither the widowed mother nor the growing girls can know who the man will be who will claim the girls when their time comes.

Let me take another case. A chief has a son. It is time the boy was married. How fine it would be if the boy could one day be a chief like his father! The chief looks around the various tribes and discovers a man with a daughter, who may be an idiot but is otherwise eligible because her father has a copper, representing a potlatch value of some $5,000 or more. Negotiations are opened, and the girl's father agrees that he will permit the copper to become the property of the young couple by way of dowry with the girl, subject, however, to payment of the $5,000, paid as to a deposit of $200 on the sealing of the agreement, and a further $1,000 paid at the ceremony in reduction of the balance of the $5,000. The ceremony is held; the potlatch takes place; the mortgage money is paid over in part; the couple are mated, and thereafter day in and day out they—yes, they and all their friends and relatives—save and slave to complete the payment for the copper. It is easy to conceive the misery which will develop in the lives of that young couple, and to realize the truth that often the girl's body swells the fund which will make the copper their own sacred property.

The copper, let me explain, is the token coin, shall I say, of wealth among these Indians. It carries a varying and generally an accumulating value in the community; its possession is a hallmark of substance to its owner. It is handed down from generation to generation, or sold as a sacred asset. The grudge against or the hatred of a man for his neighbour is in no way more maliciously and bitterly expressed than by the breaking of a copper and throwing the small fragments at the enemy, or, if he be dead, by nailing it over his coffin. Eternal woe follows the curse. Friends and relatives alike will struggle relentlessly to remove the burden.

Of course all this is not according to Canadian law, and is actually forbidden. But there is no policeman at Alert Bay, or at any of these ceremonies, and the Indian agent can do nothing. The Indians can fool the agent and the government, and they can fool the church too; for they will get married now in church and all will be well. And although the minister, the agent and the others know what has been done, the Christian ceremony proceeds and the Indian laughs as he dances, laughs as he potlatches, because in his clever, sly way he has fooled the white man. In 1935, just three years ago, three out of four girls trained for years in residental school in that area, on completing their term of scholarship went to their homes and were raped by their biological mortgagees, their Indian husbands. Well, some people will say, that is all right; that is their tradition, and that is their right to do things. But I charge all when I say that with knowledge alone comes responsibility. As we implant in these boys and girls our ideas of life and living, our codes of right and wrong, our whisperings of the romance of love and the selective choice of the loved one, we impose on them also the spiritual responsibility attaching inexorably to that knowledge, and we do not fail to attach it to ourselves. They live in the closely regulated atmosphere of school life and unconsciously develop their romances, and then, having learned enough of the viewpoint of their Canadian guardians, the government, they are dragged back into the worst feature of their native tradition and are lost to the finer ideals which we have struggled so hard to implant in their minds. True they often marry in church; but on both sides it is a hideous farce; for the minister too often senses if he does not know that the couple are thus seeking the religious cloak to cover their native susceptibilities.

In 1916 the last public potlatch was held at Alert Bay, when Charlie Newman married Lucy the daughter of Charlie James. All the tribes except the Cape Mudge Indians were present at this festivity. Since 1917 the potlatch has been going on clandestinely, although the facts leak out before or after. While I was in Alert Bay many Indians of the surrounding tribes were gathered at Gilford island and Village island, and many from Kingcome inlet had been there for weeks. They are bold now and are carrying on these practices consistently. The government is aware of these facts from its own agents as well as from many other sources, and it is essential that action be taken on that knowledge. The Indians know how utterly impossible it is for an agent to be a policeman as well, and in consequence they hold the law in contempt.

Within the last day or two I have received a further letter from the Reverend F. Comley of Victoria, B.C., which is so related to what I am saying that I think it well to read it here. The letter is dated May 9, 1938:

Dear Mr. Taylor:

You will remember we had an exchange of opinions re the potlatch last year. You requested that if anything else arose in connection with the potlatch that I thought might be useful, would I send it along. During the past winter the Indians of the Kwawkewlth tribes have had a large gathering at Gwyas-dums. This is an Indian reserve on Gilford island about twenty-five miles from Alert Bay. It is isolated and the Indians have not used it very often during the past twenty-five years, but when I went to Alert Bay thirty years ago it was a popular winter resort for their winter dances, especially "the red fir dance." That should be "the red bark dance." They take the red bark, the fibrous matter under the outer bark, and colour it, bind it around their heads, arms and bodies, also a huge band around the neck. The principal character is the "Hamatsi." He is sent naked into the woods and comes out surrounded by a bodyguard, he is called "the wild man." I have seen this awful dance from beginning to end at Cape Mudge, Alert Bay, Village island and Kingcome inlet. It is one of the most ghastly spectacles I have ever seen. Everybody bitten by the "Hamatsi" must give a potlatch. It was forbidden years ago and seems to me very closely related to the famous sun dance of the prairie Indians. I have only seen it once during the last twelve years, but this year, gaining confidence by being left alone, the Indians returned to Gwyas-dums and ignored all law and order.

This is very bad for the Indians in every way as you know; children are neglected, nothing matters but this hideous dance goes on night and day. I brought this matter up in our provincial synod on Thursday, April 28th, and the following resolution was passed unanimously:

"Resolved—That this provincial synod of B.C. in session assembled unanimously endorse the action of Mr. J. S. Taylor, M.P. for the Nanaimo division of British Columbia in petitioning the government at Ottawa to have the present potlatch law enforced among the Kwawkewlth Indians of Vancouver Island and the adjoining islands and mainland."

Moved by Rev. F. Comley.

Seconded by Rev. H. C. R. Gibson.

The secretary should send this to you, but if he forgets you will know what we tried to do.

More power to your efforts is the desire of all real friends of the Indians.

With kind regards,

Very sincerely yours,

F. Comley.

In order that you may realize that this is a matter which I have taken up entirely apart from Rev. Mr. Comley, I may say that I have never met the gentleman, and have dealt with him entirely by correspondence.

P.S. I am saying not what someone has told me but what I saw as I lived with these people at Kingcome, Fort Rupert, Alert Bay, Cape Mudge, etc.

The reverend gentleman's letter leaves little room for doubt that a serious retrogression is sedulously developing among these people, and in order that the gravity of the situation might become patent to the hon. members of this committee I shall read from Stories of Early British Columbia by Doctor W. Wymond Walkem, published in 1914 in Vancouver. The late Doctor Walkem was the father of the present mayor of the city of Ladysmith, British Columbia, and the particular incident written about occurred in the fall of 1876. I read:—

For six weeks or more the "would-be" shaman wanders sadly through the mountains picking his sustenance from the berries, or edible tubers which everywhere abound. His nights were wholly consumed in the never-ending appeal to the temenwos, or to those spirits good or evil which may hear his distressing appeals for recognition. They are spiritualists, pure and simple, but their spiritualism differs from the modern "ism" of the present day, in that the spirit or "temenwos" whom they appeal to is in their belief an original spirit, and not the spirit of one who has died. Privation and lack of food no doubt reduce the Indian novitiate to a condition bordering on hysteria, and when in that condition he is liable to believe that he hears the answer to his plaintive wails for help and recognition. It is at this stage that he determines to return to the homes of his tribe. He is now dangerous—a species of demon, whose hunger must be appeased by flesh.

Slowly and stealthily he makes his way back to where his former companions are anxiously awaiting his return. When within a short distance of his place of birth, he rushes in with frightful yells, and woe betide the unfortunate native whom he first encouters on his way. He leaps upon him like a wild beast, and probably bites a piece out of his victim's arm. No resistance is offered, as it is considered a great privilege to be thus bitten by the future shaman. The man is famished and he devours the piece of flesh like a hungry dog. If, instead of meeting with one of his own kind, he sees a dog, he will, if possible, seize it with both hands and rend the animal in pieces.

Once inside the village or settlement, four or more sturdy members of the tribe pounce on him and confine him for the last and trying ordeal which I saw in the case of Johnny Chiceete, or "grey-haired" Johnny, as he was known to the whites. I will describe this shortly.

Then I turn to it:—

About three-quarters of an hour had elapsed when the drummers in the centre of the ground space began to beat a regular rhythmic strcke upon the gigantic drums which they had before them. Four shamans were walking up and down in this space, one of whom reminded me of a huge baboon I had seen at the zoological gardens in Regent's Park. While singing they were shaking rattles, as well as their ankles, most assiduously, which were adorned with shells and small rattles. In a few moments some of the women and men stepped out upon the floor, and began to move about in the usual dancing step. Their tunes are always the same, and the movements of the dancers also. These dances were kept up for some time, one middle-aged man showed his gastric capacity by swallowing a square gin bottle of dog fish oil without drawing a breath. He subsided in a helpless condition upon the earthen floor, from which he was promptly packed off to one of the platform seats.

At 8 o'clock everything was perfectly quiet, so quiet indeed, that you could have heard a pin drop in the dusty floor. Then a noise, with much howling was suddenly heard proceeding from the roof. In a few moments a human body was pushed through the square hole in the roof of the rancherie. As the body dangled inside of the skylight, as I will call it, I was able to see that the figure was pendant by four hooks and chains, from the pulley I have already mentioned as being at the ends of the four poles, lying across the skylight. It was the body of Johnny Chiceete which was dangling in the upper air. He was hanging suspended by four hooks, one through the muscles of each upper arm, and one through the muscles of each thigh. He was completely naked with the exception of a loin covering made from the inner bark of the cedar.

His attendants on the roof lowered him slowly to the ground, then back to the roof and down again. This was repeated three times. While going up and down he shouted out some words which I took to be a specie of ritual, for at every pause in his speech he was answered by the shamans on the ground below. They kept walking up and down in line for about twenty feet and back, silent while Johnny Chiceete was speaking, and picking up the words just as Johnny ceased. No sign on Johnny's face told of the horrible torture he must have been enduring. He could not have been more quiet if he had been lowered and raised in a capacious basket.

At the termination of the third drop, four big powerful members of his tribe rushed out and grasped him by the arms, while the hooks were kept quite taut to prevent his breaking away. Straps were slipped round his arms to give his captors a good firm hold and command of his body. The hooks were then removed, and Johnny sprang to his feet, and attempted to break away.

Many of the audience, fearful he should escape from his captors, began to seek safer positions. Now came the most curious part of the ceremony. Ten Indians came down the circular pathway, naked to the waist. Johnny saw them, and began to gnash his teeth in anticipation of a feast, for he was fearfully hungry, having arrived from the mountains a short hour before his appearance on the roof. As Johnny strained like a dog on the leash to get at the first semi-naked Siwash, he seemed more like a wild beast than a human being.

Gradually he dragged his keepers to his first victim, the shamans following in the rear with pieces or strips of cotton and Indian balm.

[Mr. J. S. Taylor.]

Arriving at the first man, he seized his arm, and bit a large piece out of it, and then passed on towards the next. The shamans to our surprise called our special attention to the wound in the first man's arm, to show there was no fake about it, I suppose. Then they applied some balm or ointment, and wrapped up the whole in cotton.

After binding up the wound on the first man's arm, a shaman slipped a ten-dollar gold piece into the victim's hand, according, as I was afterwards told by Mr. Horne, to an arrangement between the victim and Johnny Chiceete's friends. After his first performance with his teeth, Mrs. Horne and Mrs. Grant retired from the building. It was too horrible for their sensitive nerves. Mr. Horne, Mr. Grant and I stayed on to see the ceremony through. Johnny completed his round with the hired victims, and just as he finished with the last, he saw a small dog near the platform, which he seized with both hands and began to eat alive. He was pushed, with the dog in his hands, towards the entrance and was taken by his friends to a cabin specially prepared for him, where his hook wounds received special attention. All of those who supplied Johnny with arms to bite were rewarded in the same way as the first one was, who by the way was an Indian known to the whites as Siwash George. I only heard the names of three others. They were Three Fingered Jimmy, Saweetlum and Potato Johnny.

To face this matter, officially it must be regretted that there are no policemen at Alert Bay. I do not refer to the provincial police. Fine men they are, but they cannot deal in a proper manner with this which is a purely federal and departmental matter. The government should most certainly have a policeman and police engineer with a suitable fast boat to cope with the situation as it now exists. This boat and these officers should be based on Alert Bay.

But this action will not in itself be sufficient. I consider that the chiefs who persist in potlatching and intriguing in the more uncivilized customs and traditions of their people should be denied recognition in every sense as chiefs by this government. They should be deposed officially by the government from their chieftainship. Further, some element of discrimination should be developed by the government which would distinguish the practiser of the potlatch from the Indian, Christian or other, who has definitely renounced it.

We are perpetuating a serious evil and senselessly throwing away much money now being expended if we do nothing more than teach the Indian to despise our guidance. In effect, some of these people are in real danger of becoming more certainly savages than they now may be. These matters all want close investigation and a thorough airing. It is evidently not for nothing that the Indians at Kingcome inlet have taken to exchanging IOU's in their potlatches. In addition to what I have said I am prevented by time—not inclination—from reading letters of unequivocal value from men of long residence among these tribes, and I would certainly have liked to mention the opinions of students of Indian tradition and lore like Professor Hill Tout and many others. This I will say, however, that whatever has to be done—and it is important to record it and accept it thus—must be done firmly, considerately, intelligently, so that the Indians themselves may preserve the sublimed values of their customs, while casting away the practices to which they have been slaves.

I have claimed that contact with civilization tends to bring this about naturally if the contact is made real and forceful. There was a time in Europe when we stuck the skulls of our enemies on spears or poles in front of our tents or lodges. To-day we raise stone gate-posts and carve round balls on top to remind us of those early days. At one time before we understood the constructional technique of foundations we, the white people, offered living sacrifices, to seal the cracks in our city walls, our great buildings, our cathedrals. The good book tells us that Jericho's walls were rebuilt in the sacrifice of the first-born of the builder and they were completed in the sacrifice of the builder himself.

The CHAIRMAN: I must inform the hon. member that he has exhausted the time at his disposal.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I would crave the indulgence of the committee for another few moments.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I am sure we would like to hear the remainder of this instructive statement on potlatching. Now that I have made my little contribution, perhaps the hon. member could continue.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I thank the right hon. gentleman. Hamburg's city walls contained the bones of many sacrificed as votive appeasement of the wrath of the gods. These elementary conceptions gave way in the face of civilization and Christianity until in the cracks in churches lighted candles symbolized the offering of a life and were walled up in the necessary repair.

Everywhere this sublimation goes on and knowledge breeds its kind, but we do wrong to ourselves and the Indian if we complacently regard his efforts towards civilization as struggles for which we are in no wise responsible. I do most earnestly urge the minister to believe that the complaints of many citizens who are deeply interested in these promising and lovable people are real and prompted by the most worthy ideals.
