A number of years ago an attempt was made by the party now in power to take the appointment of these officers out of politics and make them permanent appointees. They held office during good conduct, as I understand it. When the party that is now in opposition came to power I believe they did away with that act, possibly for the reason that is now alleged in connection with this one; at any rate it was essential under the new system then introduced. But I think it is common knowledge that they did not take full advantage of the opportunity they possessed of appointing all partisan officials, and I think it would be a retrograde step if the party now in power adopted any other system. Would the minister be prepared to give an undertaking that they would not be all straight partisan appointees?

Mr. BOTHWELL: If the hon. member will look at paragraph (e), it might explain the situation to some extent. So far as this section of the bill is concerned, may I point out that it is taken almost entirely from the act of 1934, part of which the hon. member will see on the opposite page, which stated:

> The offices of all returning officers heretofore appointed shall be deemed to be vacant and the governor in council may appoint to such offices either the same persons as now hold them, any of such persons or any other persons.

In so far as this particular section is concerned, may I point out that it follows rather closely the legislation passed in both 1930 and 1934.

Mr. NEILL: But I was pointing out that the late government did not take full advantage of their opportunities to make partisan appointments. I was hoping the minister would be in a position to express his opinion, conviction or determination that the same policy would be followed.

Mr. POWER: My conviction is expressed in the legislation of 1930, at which time I was chairman of the elections committee, and brought down to the house a bill which was accepted. In it provision was made for the non-partisan appointment of returning officers. That example was not followed.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Election clerk.

Mr. MacNICOL: I would like to say a few words at this point, and shall commence by referring to what the minister said a few minutes ago. He pointed out that he was chairman of the elections committee of 1930 which brought down a bill acceptable to the house. I understood him to say it was his proposal that the enumerators be of two different political parties.

In this connection I suggest to the minister, and I hope he will agree with me, that the same principle should be followed in the selection of poll clerks. For a long time I have been of the opinion that the time has come when in the polling subdivisions there should be officials appointed by more than one political party. I find that principle is now almost universal. So far as I can ascertain, Canada is almost alone, of English speaking countries, in insisting that the deputy returning officers and poll clerks attending polls be of the one political party. I know of no other such country which follows that plan, and I had hoped the time had come when under the guidance of a minister eminently qualified in connection with election matters we might have his approval of the suggestion whereby in Canada the deputy returning officers and poll clerks would be of two political parties.

I cannot speak with respect to all the states in the union, or even with respect to the majority of them; but certainly I know that all the principal states of the American union now follow the plan of having two political parties represented in the conduct of the poll. The reason advanced is that with two political parties represented at the poll there could be no collusion in connection with ballot stuffing, ballot switching or impersonation. It would be difficult to attempt anything like that. But where both the deputy returning officer and the clerk are of the one political party many injustices have been done in Ontario, and perhaps elsewhere; it is not necessary to mention the scores of instances. This will occur again until the two officers within the poll are of different political parties.

They found that in the United States, and overcame many of the impersonations, ballot stuffing and ballot switching by having the deputy returning officer and the clerk of different political parties. The Election Act of Missouri uses these words:

> Chosen by the county court—
> Not by the government—
> —from lists supplied by the political party having the largest number of votes at the next preceding general election, and by the party having the next largest number of votes.

It is indicated that the officers who are to conduct the polls shall be elected in that manner, namely from two political parties.

I shall not take up the time of the committee in a detailed discussion of the point, because I appreciate the fact that the minister wishes to make progress with his bill. I must point out, however, that the state of New Jersey has a similar law. Similar laws are found in Wisconsin, Oregon, Ohio, Massachusetts and Montana. In each of those states, and perhaps in many others the election acts of which I have not had time to read, the situation I have described obtains. The deputy returning officers and clerks in those states must be of two political parties, and are from the two parties which had the first and second largest numbers of votes in the next preceding election.

I brought this matter before the elections committee. At this time may I avail myself of the opportunity to compliment the minister and members of the house generally upon the appointment to the elections committee of an efficient, kindly and courteous chairman. He has every qualification to be chairman, and, when I suggested this change, was most courteous. I must point out further that in the beginning I believe the majority of the elections committee were in favour of bringing the Canadian methods up to the high standard in this regard which prevails throughout the world in English speaking countries outside Canada. I might point out that in Australia these officials are permanent and are subject to dismissal at all times for irregularities. In Great Britain they are not appointed by the government at all; rather they are appointed by the mayors or municipal authorities throughout the old country. Naturally the appointees are of different political parties.

But Canada has not attained the high standard I had hoped it might. I was hoping at this time, in view of the minister's wide knowledge of election law, and in view of his having been chairman in 1930, something along this line might be done. I remember that when the elections measure was being discussed in the house in 1934 there was no use in my saying anything on the government side of the house, because the minister piloting the bill through the house would simply look across at the hon. member for Quebec South and use words—probably not in these exact terms, but having the same meaning—"if the hon. member for Quebec South is satisfied, carried." Matters would be referred to him. I could not get anything through, because my knowledge of the elections act did not cut any figure.

So I had hoped that with that eminent authority piloting the elections act, in this government, this year we might expect to find real improvement in that act. Before going farther I wish to point out that I believe we are now getting close to a real elections act—at least in ninety-nine per cent of the cases. Any criticism I may have would be about the one per cent remaining.

My submission with respect to clerks, which I moved in committee—and upon which I shall not divide the committee of the whole—was in these words:

At least five days before he proposes to appoint the persons who are to act as poll clerks as aforesaid, the returning officer shall give notice accordingly to the candidate who, representing at the next preceding election in the electoral district a different and opposed political interest to the candidate mentioned in the next preceding subsection, received the highest number of votes, whether or not such candidate was elected. Such candidate may, by himself or by representative, nominate a fit and proper person for appointment as poll clerk for every polling station in the electoral district and, except as hereinafter provided, the returning officer shall appoint such persons to be poll clerks for the polling stations for which they have been nominated.

Even at this late date I think the minister should consider this matter. Perhaps this section could be allowed to stand in the meantime, and we could return to it later on.

Mr. POWER: I have no objection to it standing.

Mr. McCUAIG: The hon. member (Mr. MacNicol) is speaking to the wrong section. What he refers to is dealt with in section 26, subsection 4.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to see this considered because its adoption would put our elections act on a par with other election acts. I think in the main it is one of the best anywhere, but in my opinion this would make it nearly one hundred per cent perfect.

Mr. POWER: The objection raised by the hon. gentleman would appear to be a good one were it not for the fact that this section refers not to poll clerks but to election clerks who are assistants to the returning officers. Perhaps my hon. friend would indicate his objection when we reach the section referring to poll clerks.

Mr. MacNICOL: That will give me a double opportunity to express my objection.

Section agreed to.

Sections 10 to 13 inclusive agreed to.

On section 14—Qualifications.

Mr. MacNEIL: Might I have an explanation of paragraph (j)?

Mr. BOTHWELL: This paragraph is taken from the 1934 act, but its wording is made more definite. It deals specifically with a particular class of people, those who are dealt with under a certain order in council. This paragraph was discussed at great length in the committee and its wording was agreed upon. It has to do with the Doukhobors who were disqualified by the 1934 act.

Mr. MacNEIL: What is their position at the present time?

Mr. BOTHWELL: They are disqualified if they are disqualified by the province.

Mr. HEAPS: I should like to make a few remarks in connection with paragraph (k). As I read this paragraph, it would disbar any person living in an institution maintained by any government or municipality; any person living in an old folks home would be disbarred from voting in certain provinces. I object to our elections act being chopped up in such a way as to make the application of its provisions different in one province from what it is in another. It would be an anomaly if a person living in an old folks home in Ottawa were disbarred from voting in Ottawa, but permitted to vote in Hull. Many of the people in these homes are quite capable of exercising their rights as Canadian citizens, and I do not think they should be disbarred from voting simply because they happen to be inmates of such an institution.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The Dominion Franchise Act, 1934, contains the following provision:

Provided that the following persons are disqualified from voting at an election and incapable of being registered as electors and shall not be so registered, that is to say—

(x) every person who is an inmate of an institution which is maintained by any government or municipality for the housing and maintenance of the poor;

In this new bill we have limited the disqualification to those provinces where such persons are disqualified. Evidence was given before the committee that institutions have been set up in certain provinces by the provincial authorities, and it was almost the unanimous opinion of the committee that people in certain of those institutions were not interested in electoral matters and were not in a position to form an opinion as to how a vote should be cast. It was thought that if the province prohibited them from voting because of their being in a particular type of institution, then we should also restrain them under the federal act.

Mr. BAKER: Would it not be more correct to exclude them in the same way as the doukhobors are excluded?

Mr. HEAPS: Many of these people take considerable interest in public affairs. Any one who has visited an old folks home knows that older people who have possession of their faculties usually take considerable interest in public affairs. During their spare time they discuss these matters at great length and with a great deal of understanding. There may be instances where, because of their mental condition, they would not be able to vote, but I believe those cases would be covered by other sections of the bill. We are penalizing these people because they happen to be living in an institution of this kind. I know of many instances where an old person has preferred to live in such an institution. If he were living with his near relatives, he would be entitled to vote, but simply because he happens to go to an institution he is being denied that right. I think that is a most unfair discrimination against the older section of our population who have given the best years of their lives to building up this country. If a provincial government wants to take action of that kind, then we have no jurisdiction nor have we any cause to complain in this chamber, but I do not think this federal parliament should follow the lead of the provincial governments. I believe this is a retrograde step.

Mr. BOTHWELL: If I might interrupt my hon. friend at that point, this clause has been worded in this particular way because in certain provinces there are certain institutions, the inmates of which the provincial authorities feel should not be given this right. We worded the clause in this way, rather than make the prohibition apply in all the provinces as was done by the old act.

Mr. HEAPS: Simply that a provincial government does a certain thing is no reason why we should follow the same course. The women in the province of Quebec are not permitted to vote in provincial elections, but that is no reason why we should say that they should be disbarred from voting in dominion elections. That is no excuse at all. In a federal law we should stick entirely to the federal jurisdiction and not follow what may happen to be done in a particular province. That is my complaint. These people may be entitled in every way to vote; they may have full knowledge of everything that is going on in the political field in this dominion. We spend thousands and thousands of dollars trying to get votes out on election day. We discussed the question of absentee votes, and in the last election we spent an enormous sum of money to get absentee votes recorded in different parts of this dominion; yet here are men and women quite capable of casting an intelligent vote, and we are depriving them of it simply because the provincial government says they are not entitled to vote. We are simply following the lead of the provincial government, and that is my complaint. I hope the minister will see to it that these old people in the latter years of their life are not deprived of something which I know in many instances they prize very highly indeed.

Mr. FAIR: Two wrongs can never make a right, and the fact that this paragraph was in the old act is no reason why it should be continued in this new measure, which the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol) claims to be one hundred per cent perfect. But I say, Mr. Chairman, that with a provision such as this no electoral act can be one hundred per cent perfect. Many of the inmates of these old people's homes are there because of unscrupulous methods employed in many instances by other people who are outside and who are still privileged to vote, and I believe it is our duty to see that these old people in the homes are given the right to vote just as much as some unscrupulous people outside of whom they have been the victims. If you disfranchise these people, why not disfranchise those on relief in the cities, whose food and rent and clothing are paid for by the respective governments? This is just the thin end of the wedge, in my opinion, to disfranchise those who, through no fault of their own, are compelled to go on relief to-day, and no country which boasts of democracy—and this highest privilege of democracy can be exercised only on election day, once in every few years—should stand for any such paragraph being kept in the act. I trust that the committee will amend the legislation so that every legitimate Canadian shall have the right to vote.

Mr. MacINNIS: I wish to support everything that has been said on this question by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps). I do not agree with the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Fair), that this is the thin end of the wedge.

INDUSTRIAL LOAN AND FINANCE CORPORATION

The house in committee on Bill No. 7, respecting Industrial Loan and Finance Corporation—Mr. Vien—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Rate of charge on loans not exceeding $500.

Mr. TUCKER: Mr. Chairman, first of all I submit that these bills dealing with small loan companies should not be proceeded with until the general policy of the government has been finally decided. There is upon the order paper the following resolution, standing in the name of the Minister of Finance:

That it is expedient to introduce an act to regulate the cost of small loans, also with respect to the incorporation and powers of small loan companies, and to provide for the annual licensing of money-lenders, for the administration of the said act, and the annual assessment of each licencee for the purpose of meeting the expense incurred by the government in such administration.

As will be seen, this foreshadows a definite outlining of the policy of the government, in the words of the resolution, "with respect to the incorporation and powers of small loan companies." I submit that there is no object in passing a special act giving this company certain added powers when on the order paper there is a general bill which deals with the whole question.

The next point I submit is this: In connection with questions of interest and so on I doubt that special privileges should be given by special acts of parliament. Under the special act, already law, which this bill proposes to amend, the Industrial Loan and Finance Corporation has the following powers:

(i) lend money secured by assignment of choses-in-action, chattel mortgages or such other evidence of indebtedness as the company may require, and may charge interest thereon at the rate of not more than seven per centum per annum, and may on all loans deduct the interest in advance and provide for repayments in weekly, monthly or other uniform repayments: Provided that the borrower shall have the right to repay the loan at any time before the due date, and, on such repayment being made, to receive a refund of such portion of the interest paid in advance as has not been earned, except a sum equal to the interest for three months,

(ii) charge, in addition to interest as aforesaid, for all expenses which have been necessarily and in good faith incurred by the company in making a loan authorized by the next preceding sub-paragraph (i), including all expenses for inquiry and investigation into the character and circumstances of the borrower, his endorsers, co-makers or sureties, for taxes, correspondence and professional advice, and for all necessary documents and papers, two per centum upon the principal sum loaned,

(iii) notwithstanding anything in the next two preceding sub-paragraphs (i) and (ii) the company shall, when a loan authorized by the said sub-paragraph (i) has been made on the security of a chattel mortgage, or of subrogation of taxes, be entitled to charge an additional sum equal to the legal and other actual expenses disbursed by the company in connection with such loan, but not exceeding the sum of ten dollars, but, no charge for expenses of any kind shall be made or collected unless the loan has been actually made, or unless such a loan has been renewed after one year from the making thereof or after one year from the last renewal thereof;

The explanatory notes to this amending bill state:

The main objects of this bill are:

To change the operation of the company from a discount to an interest plan and to vary and clarify its charges.

I submit that this explanatory note is and must be misleading. The note states that it is desired to change the operation of the company from a discount to an interest plan. In the subsections I have just read it is stated quite clearly that at present this company is entitled to charge 7 per cent per annum as interest. The only thing that would justify anyone in claiming that to be a discount plan is that it is provided that interest may be deducted in advance. But the bill goes on to indicate definitely that the intention should be to permit a charge of only 7 per cent per annum; for if the debt is paid ahead of time the act provides that only 7 per cent per annum shall be allowed plus interest for three months. This indicates that when parliament passed this special act it intended that this company should be allowed to charge only 7 per cent per annum, and as interest. Then it goes on to provide that they may charge two per cent for expenses of inquiry and investigation into the character and circumstances of the borrower, but those must be expenses which have been necessarily and in good faith incurred by the company.

We find that this company have been doing this: They have been charging 7 per cent interest in advance; and because of that fact, in effect they have been getting 14 per cent per annum. Then, by charging two per cent in advance for investigation and inquiry, whether or not they have actually incurred any expense in that connection in regard to a particular loan, they really get 4 per cent per annum under that heading. They claim they have a right to do this, to charge 14 per cent, though the act says that the rate shall be 7 per cent per annum, and they also claim they have a right to charge 4 per cent whether or not they make any investigations at all. Under those headings they are able to run their charges up to eighteen per cent per annum. We know that this company largely operates in the province of Quebec, where it does not take chattel mortgages and where it cannot make charges under that heading; that is, under subsection 3 above referred to. So to-day in my opinion this company violates the act of parliament and charges 18 per cent per annum when it has no right to do so. But that is certainly the limit of what the company can charge at present.

Now the company comes to parliament, having formerly obtained the charter for which it asked and which, in my opinion, it has been violating, and wants the right to charge two per cent per month, an effective interest rate of 26½ per cent per annum. Obviously the effect of this is to raise the rates which it is permitted to charge to-day, but there is more to it than that. This company has been charging 18 per cent, and I take it that it has become rather nervous as to its position, because there have been decisions which indicate that it has absolutely no right to make these charges. For instance, there is the case of Kelly v. the Industrial Loan and Finance Corporation, which finds that it has been transgressing the law in connection with these charges. I would refer hon. members to page 90 of the report of the superintendent of insurance, for the year ending December 31, 1936, in regard to small loan companies, where a reference to this case will be found. It is also cited in 1937, 1 Dominion Law Reports, page 57. The case was tried before Judge Stackhouse of the Montreal circuit court, and this is what the head note of the case says:

A loan company operating under special statute (1930 (Can.), c. 68), and limited to a rate of interest not exceeding seven per cent plus charges for "expenses necessarily and in good faith incurred" in making the loan, cannot charge any greater rate of interest or for expenses not so incurred. On a loan of $150 repayable in ten monthly instalments, held illegal to deduct interest for the whole loan in advance and to charge for investigation expenses not incurred and for insurance not issued in accordance with the application, in the total of $16.50, entitling the borrower to recover back the excess charges.

That definitely holds that this very company, by charging interest in advance and regarding it as a discount, and by charging for disbursements regardless of whether or not they have been made, has been violating this act. Not content with that, it now comes before this parliament asking the right, under the heading "cost of loans," to charge two per cent per month, which is an effective rate of 26½ per cent per annum.

One of the points I should like to emphasize now, Mr. Chairman, is this: I do not think at this session of parliament we should sanction such a rate of interest. As far as I am concerned, coming from western Canada where we have been struggling with what we regard as high interest rates of 8 and 9 per cent on mortgages, if we in this parliament sanction a rate of 26½ per cent per annum we take away our whole case in demanding that interest rates be reduced to the people out west. How can we say in one breath that it is all right for this company to charge 26½ per cent per annum interest on loans up to $500, and in the next breath say to the banks, for example, that they should not charge over 7 per cent and to the mortgage companies that their rates should not be as high as 8 or 9 per cent? As a matter of fact, as is known to members of the house, the Saskatchewan government recently managed to get the loan companies to agree to reduce rates of interest down to six per cent. And a good many of us feel that the farming population of western Canada cannot afford to pay interest of even six per cent per annum.

Now then, if parliament authorizes one group of people to charge an effective rate of 26½ per cent per annum, what chance have we to make an appeal to public opinion which will back us up in getting interest charges cut lower than 6 per cent per annum? If we give those people the right to charge an effective rate of 26½ per cent per annum, what is the next thing we are up against? The argument will be raised: Why in the world should those people be permitted to charge that rate, and the banks be limited to 7 per cent per annum and the mortgage companies to 6 per cent? Immediately we are going to be met with a demand all along the line for an increase in rates of interest.

I think at this stage of Canada's development it would be a most retrograde step if parliament were to give sanction to an effective interest rate of 26½ per cent per annum. It might be said that this is not what we are authorizing, because the proposed amendment suggests that the "cost" of a loan shall not exceed two per cent per month. Well, the "cost" of a loan is nowhere defined in the proposed amendment, and that is one of the reasons why it is not expedient to pass the bill at the present time, before the general bill, which does define "cost" of loan, goes through.

What would be the position of affairs if parliament should not see fit to pass the general bill in which the "cost" of a loan is defined, and passed this bill, which refers to cost of loan, but nowhere defines the term. In other words, we would be passing something which has no meaning. But in order to make my argument plain, I suppose I should refer to the meaning of "cost" of loan, as it is defined in the general bill. It is set out at page 427 of the report of the banking and commerce committee:

2. In this act unless the context otherwise requires,

(a) "Cost" of a loan means the whole of the cost of the loan to the borrower including interest or discount and expenses and charges for commission, brokerage, chattel mortgage and recording fees, inquiries, defaults, renewals, fines, penalties, or other similar costs, whether paid to or charged by the lender or paid to or charged by any other persons, and whether fixed and determined by the loan contract itself or in whole or in part by any other collateral contract or document by which the charges if any, imposed under the loan, contract or the terms of the repayment of the loan are effectively varied.

That, I take it, is what "cost" of loan means in this bill. I draw particular attention to the fact that cost of loan there includes interest and every other charge. If any company can charge two per cent as cost of loan and is brought into court under the Money-Lenders Act or under any other act, it can say that the whole of that cost was interest. What is the effect of that? The effect of it is this: As the charter now stands, any province can forbid those charges set out in subsections 2 and 3. That is, this parliament has power to legislate in regard to interest; but although we give a company power to charge for expenses of investigating a loan, and to charge for expenses of drawing documents—although we give this company power to do that, any province under its jurisdiction over property and civil rights in the province can step in and forbid those charges on the part of any company operating within any province.

What are we doing here? At the present time no company can come in and charge more than the amount set out in the Money-Lenders Act, namely 12 per cent per annum. We have said further to this company, "We only give you power to charge two per cent for making investigations and to charge up to $10 for drawing the documents, provided you pay the money out; but any province can forbid any charge set out in subsections 2 and 3." In other words, a province could limit the company to 7 per cent per annum. But by passing this amendment we take out of the hands of the province the power to prevent a company from charging more than 7 per cent per annum and give it the right, regardless of provincial law, to charge 26½ per cent per annum.

In other words, for example we may say to the province of Quebec, "Although you have control over property and civil rights, and power now to prevent this company from charging more than 7 per cent per annum, once this measure is passed this company whether the province of Quebec likes it or not or whether the people of Quebec like it or not, can come in and snap its fingers in the faces of the government of Quebec, and charge an effective rate of 26½ per cent interest." Under present conditions I submit this parliament should not lay itself open to attack by doing that.

In Saskatchewan we passed the Credit Unions Act a year ago. There is a department of government which is charged with the duty of promoting the development of cooperative institutions including credit unions in Saskatchewan, and an officer is paid for that purpose. What would happen if this bill were passed? It would mean that this company can go into Saskatchewan and charge an effective rate of 26½ per cent interest. There is nothing our legislature can do about it, because we are giving them the power to charge the rates of interest I have indicated.

If we pass this bill, they can go in there and spend a large sum of money on advertising, and prevent the growth of cooperative lending. We had different witnesses appear on the question of cooperative lending before the banking and commerce committee. For example, we were told of the great development in the province of Quebec in regard to the caisse populaire, and how they are actually extending their activities and by co-operative enterprise are providing money to the people at 7 per cent per annum. Mr. Vaillancourt gave us to understand that any person worthy of credit can get credit in the province of Quebec by joining a credit union or caisse populaire and, if he is credit worthy, he can get credit at that low rate of interest, 6 or 7 per cent per annum. Of course that is not low, but it is much lower than 26½ per cent per annum.

At this stage of our development should we as a parliament say to a company that whether a province likes it or not we shall give them the right to go into the province, undermine the full development of cooperative credit institutions and charge 26½ per cent per annum? I do not think we should do that.

It might be urged that there is a great deal of abuse in regard to small loans, and for a moment or two I should like to deal with that phase of the matter. The suggestion is that money-lenders to-day are charging more than 26½ per cent per annum, and that therefore, by permitting this company to operate at that rate, we are doing a good thing for the people.

I suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that people who are paying, say 100 per cent per annum or 150 per cent per annum are people who are not credit worthy. If we set up this company we shall not be helping these people at all, because these companies are very careful to whom they lend money, and would not lend to doubtful people who to-day borrow from loan sharks. These small loan companies lend money only to people who actually pay it back again, with few exceptions. I should like to give the committee some figures on this very point. I read the following from the evidence:

> The record of the dominion licensed small loan companies up to date would indicate that that estimate is correct. Over a period of four years from 1934 to 1937 inclusive the total amount of loans made by the three companies was $28,919,630 and the total amount written off loans as losses, $97,878, of which $56,005 was later recovered, leaving a net realized loss of $41,873 or ·14 per cent of the amount of loans made.

In other words, these three small loan companies have been so careful as to whom they would lend money that over a period of four years they actually lent out almost $29,000,000 with a loss of slightly over one-tenth of one per cent per annum.

Mr. MacLENNAN: What were their profits?

Mr. TUCKER: I shall come to that in a moment, but their losses were slightly over one-tenth of one per cent per annum. Does anyone seriously suggest that if these companies were so careful as to whom they would lend money as to keep their losses down so low, we are going to stop the loan shark evil by setting up such companies? Obviously these companies are lending money only to credit-worthy people. Even though you set up these companies you will still have people who are not good risks going to the loan sharks to borrow money. I was asked how much these companies made. I did not intend to give these figures at this stage, but I might as well. Mr. Finlayson had this to say in his evidence:

> The experience of the dominion companies shows that for the four years 1934 to 1937 inclusive the companies earned after interest 11·1 per cent on their mean net assets. The rate for the largest company was 16·66 per cent. Treating the "supervising" fee as equivalent to a return on capital and assuming a reduction of fifty per cent in advertising costs an addition of six per cent is made to the return of 11·1 above mentioned.

That would give them a profit of 17·1 per cent on their capital. I might be asked what I would suggest to eliminate the loan shark evil. I think this matter could be properly considered at this time. We are being asked to approve this bill as an alternative to a general policy of controlling the loan shark evil. This is an alleged attempt to minimize that evil.

I should like to suggest what I think is the proper way to deal with this problem. I am sorry the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is not in his seat. I hope he will soon be able to be back. First of all let me say that usury is one of the oldest crimes known to civilization. We should make exorbitant charges a crime. Those private individuals who take advantage of the need of people to obtain credit would not be the ones to register under the Money-Lenders Act. They make individual deals here and individual deals there. How in the world are you going to stop that sort of thing unless you make it a crime? The man who thinks he is pressed for credit goes and gets it from one of these individuals and pays a rate of probably 200 per cent per annum. These individuals take advantage of the needs of people, and once a transaction is completed the latter are worse off than they were before. I suggest that you write into the criminal code a provision that anyone who charges more than a certain set rate—it has been suggested that two per cent per month would be proper; personally I think that is too high—shall be deemed to have committed a criminal offence. It seems to me that this is the way to deal most effectively with these loan sharks.

Shortly after the attorney general of Ontario came into office he found the loan sharks were giving considerable trouble in the city of Toronto. He laid several charges under the Money-Lenders Act, but what happened? The judge found that he could not definitely distinguish between what was charged as interest and what was charged to cover investigation fees and so on. So he could not convict. Here is what His Honour Judge O'Connell, who presided at the county court judges' criminal court of the county of York had to say:

> These harsh and inequitable transactions might be effectively dealt with, if not actually stopped, by legislation making it a criminal offence, with appropriate penalties, to charge, impose or collect in respect to a loan for less than $500, interest, and for services of any kind, nature or description whatsoever in connection therewith, a sum of money amounting in the aggregate, in respect to both interest and charges, to more than two and one-half per centum per month on the monthly balance owing by the borrower. This, of course, is merely a suggestion prompted by the evidence coming before me during the present trial.

There we have a judge having to find that he could not convict because of the loose manner in which our laws have been drawn. His honour suggested that some provision should be made in the criminal code to deal with those people who take advantage of the needs of their neighbours. That is the first thing I would suggest. A definite limit should be placed upon the cost of a loan, and it should be made a criminal offence to charge more than that limit.

There is a further useful step that can be taken. Giving evidence before the banking and commerce committee, the attorney general of Ontario had this to say:

> I understand that this proposal has been made on the ground that prima facie these matters of service charges are matters of property and civil rights and are within the jurisdiction of the province. It seems to me, as your advisers have expressed the opinion, that the dominion could undertake successfully to deal with them under the theory of ancillary powers, or under the right of the dominion to constitute and legislate concerning a crime; or under your jurisdiction over trade and commerce. Now, that is offered as an opinion to overcome the prima facie difficulty of these service charges being matters of property and civil rights. Well, with very much reluctance may I say that with every deference, my advisers and I are unable to accede to the view that that could be accomplished; so that, desirable as it may be that the whole situation should be dealt with by federal legislation, we feel that the practical and also the legal difficulties take it out of your jurisdiction; and we go just one step further, we say that it would be detrimental to the whole scheme of the thing if you were to attempt to do so and fail in so doing.

Now, we would ask you to do this; in view of what I have said and in order to arrive at a practical effective solution of this problem, that you improve your Money Lenders Act in the first place—and I am not going to endeavour to mention all the items that we feel should be dealt with—in the first place, we feel that your definition of money lenders could be very much improved.

Then, in the question of interest, we most earnestly suggest this, that in your Money Lenders Act you would require that whatever rate of interest is involved in the transaction it should be clearly stated and defined in the transaction.

Then we feel that there should be a right of search, and we would be disposed to favour some curtailment in the blatant advertising that is going on in the city of Toronto at the present time.

Now, if the dominion government will do that, we feel that we can meet the situation absolutely and amply by taking care of all legislation concerning all of the other items that come into the cost of the loan.

If the federal jurisdiction were to legislate and cover the whole field of the cost of a loan, which would involve interest and everything else, what might be proper in one province as indicating or as defining the cost of the loan might not apply properly in another province.

There we have the suggestion from the province of Ontario that we should set a limit upon the rates of interest to be charged, and then the province of Ontario will deal with the other charges made under its powers in connection with property and civil rights. There would then be no possibility of the legislation being ruled ultra vires. We shall have firstly restricted ourselves to criminal legislation, as we should, and then to legislation on interest instead of doing what is proposed to be done here, namely, invade the rights of the provinces in connection with property and civil rights by endeavouring to legislate under our ancillary powers in order to deal with interest. Why should we undertake to invade the rights of the provinces as they are at present in order to give these people the right to charge 26½ per cent interest? Have we so well covered the field of dominion jurisdiction in connection with necessary national legislation that we should start invading the provincial field in order to give these people such a right?

Mr. MacLENNAN: Would my hon. friend explain what he means by invasion of the provincial field?

Mr. TUCKER: Let me explain what I mean by that. Property and civil rights are primarily within the jurisdiction of the province; but if the federal parliament can only deal effectively with legislation in its field by passing ancillary legislation in the field of property and civil rights, it can do so even though it does invade that field. If you do so invade the field of provincial jurisdiction, the provincial law in the matter falls to the ground as against the dominion law.

We have legislation to-day in Nova Scotia, Manitoba, Quebec and some of the other provinces dealing with the question of these charges, and the moment we enter the field under the heading of interest or any questions ancillary to interest we invade a field which the provinces have already covered. This would mean that their law would be of no effect. If we did that in order to cut down the high interest rates, I would not mind so much, but here we are proposing as a parliament to enter that field in order to enable these small loan people to raise their interest rates to the exorbitant rate of 26½ per cent per annum, and I submit we should not do that.

There is another matter I would draw to the attention of the committee. If we reserve this field entirely to ourselves, it means that we do so against the wishes of the province of Ontario. The representative of the government of Quebec also took a similar stand, that the province wanted to reserve that field to themselves. The Minister of Justice will know that this question is dealt with in the civil code of Quebec, and that if we enter that field we interfere with that provision of their civil code. The province of Quebec objected to our doing that; nevertheless we are here asked to do it. I submit that it is not wise for us to do so; that it is wise at this present stage of our development to restrict ourselves to controlling the top limit of cost of loan and also interest rates and leave the province to say whether these small loan companies shall be able to charge anything at all by way of service charges and the like, always, of course, below the limit of cost of loan fixed in the criminal code.

Furthermore, the provinces have the means of administering the law, and if we enter that field against their wishes, are they going to show the same desire to enforce the law? In other words, if we put something in the criminal code, they can, by administering the criminal law, absolutely wipe out the loan shark people. They have their attorney general's department, their police courts, and their crown prosecutors to prosecute these people in the courts. But if we enter the field and undertake to look after the whole thing, are we going to set up a parallel system of administration of justice to make sure that these small loan people do not break our small loan legislation and loan sharks do not operate? That is something I would ask the Minister of Justice to consider.

I have suggested already that I think co-operative lending is one of the solutions of our present difficulties. I think it is the solution of many of our difficulties to-day and it should be encouraged in every way. We have to-day a very valuable institution, the Canadian Association for Adult Education, started, I believe, under the aegis of the extension department of St. Francis Xavier university, and that association would be pleased to extend its activities in the field of educating the people in regard to the benefits of cooperative lending institutions. In the United States they have a federal credit union law, and the federal government actively promotes these institutions. Their growth in the United States has been very fast and the people are encouraged to save and provide for their future. By so doing they are also able to provide for the credit needs of their friends, who get credit cheaply, and the depositors get a good return on their money. I further suggest that this government should appoint some person actively to promote the spread of credit unions throughout Canada. I go further and suggest that the government should legislate to set up a federal credit union law. If it does not see fit to do that, I submit it should make a grant of at least $10,000 to enable the Canadian Association for Adult Education to preach this doctrine of cooperative credit throughout Canada. I am glad that the Minister of Justice applauds that. It would be something in the way of really constructive legislation—much better than this business of giving special privileges to a few companies, with their exorbitant demands.

There is another angle with which I want to deal before I conclude, and that is the question of the extent to which the chartered banks of Canada should fill the needs proposed to be filled by these companies. We know that the Canadian Bank of Commerce has entered the small loan field and that it is lending money at a lower rate of interest than is charged by the small loan companies. Mr. Stewart gave evidence before our committee indicating that their effective rate of interest was 10·5 per cent. I quote this from the evidence of Mr. Stewart, of the Canadian Bank of Commerce:

> Well, Mr. Chairman, the Canadian Bank of Commerce entered the personal loan field in Toronto in June of 1936. Before the end of July of that year personal loan departments were opened at Halifax, Montreal, Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver. It is true, as Mr. Dobson says—as all banks have I should imagine —that up to that time we made small loans; but it seemed to us that there was a wider field. There was a considerable amount of criticism against the banks because of the fact that credit facilities were not available to wage earners; and to some extent with a view to dissipating any such criticism we entered the personal loan field. There was also probably a selfish motive too in that it built up a substantial amount of good will for the bank. The system, as I say, is in vogue throughout Canada. The loan departments are at Halifax, Montreal, Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver, but each and every branch bank is equipped to handle such small loans although the department is the last word in the confirmation or the refusal of the loan. The branches, however, work up the application, send it into the central department and there it is accepted or declined. In so far as volume is concerned, since the department was started we have made 60,423 loans, for a total amount of $8,800,000. The average amount of loan made is $146.

Then he said that "off-setting the savings balances on which interest is allowed the effective rate is 10·5 per cent."

He goes on to show what these small loans are made for:

	Per cent
Medical, dental and hospital bills	15·73
Consolidation of debts	28·0
Outside loan liquidation	6½
Taxes, real estate, mortgages and interest, insurance premiums	8·6
Travel and education	3·4
House improvement expenses	11·7
Clothing	2·3
Motor cars	7·03
Miscellaneous	16·0

He goes on to say:

> I think we can make a little money from now on provided we keep to the present figures.

On the question of whether the other banks could be encouraged to enter this field, I suggested in the committee that if they were encouraged to enter the field they would meet the need for credit now being met by these companies. In this connection Mr. Dobson, president of the Canadian Bankers' Association said:

Now, if your committee should recommend and the government should decide to ask us to cooperate in the small loans field and provide an increased rate for monthly payment loans, I believe it is quite possible and probable that some other banks might then decide to take up that extended loan field. I do not mean to say they are going to take the business away from the small loan companies and go right through with that type of business. I do not believe for a moment that the small loan companies are not going to stay in business. I believe they are required there, but the banks might extend their field further, that is all.

The CHAIRMAN: I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. VIEN: As sponsor of Bill No. 7, at present under study, a good purpose might be served if I summarily gave the committee the genesis of these bills.

The Industrial Loan and Finance, the Discount and Loan and the Central Finance corporations are small loan companies incorporated under the laws of the dominion. Their charters are on our statute books. The hon. member who has just resumed his seat (Mr. Tucker) addressed himself to the subject under study as if we were introducing here a new principle; as if we were raising the rate of interest which, if this bill passes, these small loan companies could charge their borrowers. Nothing is further from the truth. In the first place we are not granting these small loan companies or any money-lender the power to charge an interest of two per cent per month. There is nothing to that effect either in this bill or in the general legislation recommended by the standing committee on banking and commerce.

Last year, contradictory decisions were rendered with respect to certain lawsuits, originating in Quebec and Ontario, regarding loans made by small loan companies. My learned and hon. friend quoted a judgment in the Kelly case, in the circuit court, Montreal. I am sorry he did not proceed a little further and quote judgments of superior tribunals. I have the greatest possible respect for the circuit court of the district of Montreal, but that court is limited in its jurisdiction to matters not exceeding $100. It is a tribunal of inferior civil jurisdiction. There is no appeal from its decisions. This shows that, generally speaking, in the province of Quebec, we do not consider matters coming before that court to be of more than trifling importance, not important enough, at least, to warrant the right of appeal. In a subsequent case, in the Jackson case, which my hon. friend has quoted, and in which the Industrial Loan was interested, in the superior court, Hon. Mr. Justice Casgrain rendered a decision very different from that of the circuit court, in the Kelly case.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Who was the judge sitting in the circuit court?

Mr. VIEN: His Honour Judge Stackhouse, for whom I have great respect. But a judge whose judgment is not subject to appeal may, sometimes, take into account other considerations than the law.

Mr. THORSON: Does the hon. member suggest that Judge Stackhouse did that in this case?

Mr. VIEN: I am not suggesting anything. I am only saying it so happens, sometimes. I think my learned friend knows it better than anyone else. Therefore, a reference to Judge Stackhouse's judgment, without reference to the reverse judgment rendered by a higher tribunal, does not convey complete information to the committee.

A certain propaganda, carried out in committee and outside thereof, and the tone of my hon. friend's speech of to-night, tend to create the impression that the sponsors of these bills and the standing committee in recommending general legislation are attempting to raise the rate of interest which small loan companies may charge to their borrowers. The contrary is true. For a number of years the superintendent of insurance has had complaints about the exorbitant rates of interest and other charges which are being collected from borrowers by certain money-lenders who have been properly styled "loan sharks." In the committee Mr. Finlayson has spread on the record a few examples of exorbitant charges: Three, four, five, six per cent per month are not uncommon. Instances of charges of 600, 700 and 800 per cent per annum were revealed. Indeed, there was a case of 11,000 per cent per annum. These were not isolated cases.

This condition, which to-day obtains in Canada, is not unprecedented elsewhere. In the United States, some years ago, a similar situation was revealed. Russell Sage died and left a large fortune to his wife. She was snowed under by applications for loans. She began to investigate some of these cases. She discovered that thousands of people were being mulcted of large sums of money by loan sharks. For a purely philantropic purpose and a desire to help the small borrower, Mrs. Sage created what is now known as the Russell Sage Foundation. A thorough study was made in every state of the union; experts were sent to Europe to investigate conditions there, and the effect of the remedial legislation which had been passed in various European countries. In the United States, this question comes within the jurisdiction of the various states. Legislation had to be introduced in state legislatures. We have a statement of the rates of interest which now prevail in the United States. They were arrived at as a result of exhaustive investigation. After long years of study and effort, legislation was passed, and, now, the rates in the United States vary from one, two and three per cent per month, in graduated rates, based on the amount borrowed, or, in other states, on a flat basis ranging from 2½ per cent to 3½ per cent per month, in most cases.

In Great Britain, the same condition had obtained. The same study was made; remedial legislation was enacted. What is the situation in Great Britain? In Great Britain there is no maximum rate of interest fixed. The question resolves itself into a question of procedure: On whom shall the burden of proof rest? The rate must be reasonable. If it does not exceed 4 per cent per month, the complaining borrower must prove that the rate is unreasonable. If the rate exceeds 4 per cent per month, upon a complaint being filed, the money-lender must prove that the rate is not exorbitant. In Great Britain, therefore, the law assumes a rate of 4 per cent per month to be fair and reasonable, subject to the courts reducing it or increasing it as the circumstances may warrant.

In the United States, where a flat rate has been fixed, it varies from 2 to 3½ per cent per month, with very few exceptions higher or lower.

In Canada, the superintendent of insurance thought it advisable to compel these companies to come to parliament to have their charter powers clarified. These companies did not come here of their own motion. They were urged by the superintendent of insurance.

Mr. TUCKER: Is it not a fact that the superintendent of insurance told these companies that if they wished to continue making the charges they were making they should get an amendment to their charter authorizing them to do so?

Mr. VIEN: My hon. friend should not interrupt. He is wrong in his facts.

Mr. TUCKER: And I say that you are wrong.

Mr. VIEN: Please; I have only forty minutes at my disposal. I say that my hon. friend is wrong in his facts. One of these companies, as I mentioned in opening my remarks, had had an adverse judgment of the circuit court at Montreal. Since, then, however, a favourable judgment of the superior court has been rendered and it is to the effect that they had not charged exorbitant rates.

Mr. TUCKER: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. VIEN: No; I cannot afford the time of my hon. friend's interruptions.

Mr. TUCKER: I just wish to ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. VIEN: Please do not. My hon. friend cannot challenge my facts. He has had an opportunity to speak. I did not interrupt him, although I felt that he was wrong, inaccurate. I say that in view of the conflicting decisions of the courts, the superintendent urged these companies to come to parliament. He wanted to have the charter powers of these companies clarified. These small loan companies lending money in amounts below $500, could not carry these judgments to the Supreme Court of Canada. You cannot come to that court unless a sum of $2,000 or more is involved. The superintendent was not satisfied with the decision of the circuit court; he was not satisfied with the decision of the superior court.

Mr. TUCKER: I should like to ask the hon. gentleman—

Mr. VIEN: Will my hon. friend please allow me to finish?

Miss MACPHAIL: Take it easy.

Mr. VIEN: I am asking him to take it easy and to hold his soul in patience.

Mr. TUCKER: On a point of order, my hon. friend has suggested that the superintendent of insurance said certain things. I am asking him where his authority is for that statement and where the superintendent of insurance said those things.

Mr. VIEN: I am not here to be cross-examined. If my hon. friend will read the record, he will see the statement of the superintendent to the effect that these companies were requested to come to this parliament to have their charter powers clarified, because there had been conflicting judicial decisions, and because it was impossible to take the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada, the amounts involved being too small.

Mr. GOLDING: Who requested them to come to parliament?

Mr. VIEN: The superintendent of insurance.

Mr. TUCKER: If they wished to make these charges.

Mr. VIEN: If they wanted to continue to exercise their charter powers, they had to come to parliament to have them clarified. Their licence, instead of being renewed for a period of one year, was renewed periodically, a few months at a time, as a compulsory measure. These private bills have consequently been introduced. It is not requested that the power to charge interest be increased. At the request of the superintendent, by these bills the basis of operation is changed. At present, when a loan is made, the amount of interest is deducted from the amount of the loan. That is what is called the discount basis. The department desires that basis to be changed into a straight interest basis, the interest being charged on the outstanding and reducing balance only, and that is what this bill purports to accomplish. Last year, in the standing committee on banking and commerce, we gave a great deal of thought to this whole matter, and after several weeks of study we brought in this legislation.

Mr. MARTIN: Twenty-eight meetings this year.

Mr. VIEN: I see that it is nine o'clock.

Progress reported.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

MEASURE RESPECTING FRANCHISE OF ELECTORS, ELECTION OF MEMBERS OF HOUSE OF COMMONS AND PRINTING AND PUBLICATION OF ELECTION DOCUMENTS

The house resumed consideration in committee of Bill No. 91, respecting the franchise of electors and the election of members of the House of Commons—Mr. Power—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: Section 14 was under consideration at six o'clock.

Mr. MacINNIS: When I was interrupted before recess I was about to say a few words in connection with paragraph (k) of subsection 2. This paragraph provides that if the electoral act of any province disqualifies for voting purposes a person who is receiving aid from the government, the same provision shall apply under this bill. When the hon. member for Battle River was speaking to this point he expressed the view that this was the thin end of the wedge, and that later on it might be applied to unemployed persons. I do not believe that is so; I do not think the committee had that in mind at all. As a matter of fact, this is a survival of the days before we had universal suffrage, when suffrage was based on property qualifications, and it was designed to prevent paupers from having the franchise. However, I am opposed to the principle. To-day we have universal suffrage, which is not refused to such people as those who receive old age pensions, judges who have retired and are in receipt of pensions, and so on. Such people are allowed to vote, even though they are living on the bounty of the state. I do not see why the provision in paragraph (k) should apply to old or destitute people just because they happen to live in certain institutions. I remember that some years ago, when I had something to do with municipal affairs in Vancouver, old people in receipt of old age pensions would assign such pensions to the city and would be taken into the old folks home as a result. If this law applies, a person who has done that will be prevented from voting, while on the other hand a person in receipt of an old age pension and not living in an institution would have a vote. I think this is a provision which should be removed from the measure, because I do not think it serves any useful purpose to-day. Probably we have disregarded the principle and idea which first brought it into being. So I would ask the minister to give consideration to the desirability of deleting this paragraph altogether.

Mr. POWER: I have no objection to permitting paragraph (k) to stand.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the other subsections of section 14 carry?

Mr. NEILL: No. I thought the minister was going to allow the whole section to stand.

Mr. POWER: If there is any objection to it, I am willing to do so.

Mr. NEILL: I wanted to make some remarks in regard to subsection 7, and perhaps I might make them now so that the minister can consider the whole section at once. I am afraid I am presumptuous in finding any fault with this bill. I have some little knowledge of the time and trouble that have been spent on this bill by the committee and its most efficient chairman, and under ordinary conditions I would swallow the bill as it stands. But there are, perhaps necessarily, in a bill of such wide scope, one or two small matters of considerable importance in particular districts which may have escaped the attention of the committee, because I understand there was no representative from British Columbia on that committee.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, yes.

Mr. NEILL: Then, perhaps he was an interior man who was not familiar with conditions on the coast, or perhaps he was overruled. At any rate the position I want to suggest is this: Any measure of this kind surely ought to be based upon two fundamental points. I do not know which should be put first, but the one is to prevent corruption as much as possible and the other is that it should give a vote to everyone entitled to it. I believe those principles should be carried out to the fullest extent, regardless of whether the voter be rich or poor, educated or illiterate.

The subsection to which I object reads as follows:

> Save as hereinafter provided every person, man or woman, shall be qualified to vote and be entitled to be registered as an elector on the list of electors for the polling division in which he or she ordinarily resides at the time of the preparation and revision of the list of electors—

It is the word "ordinarily" to which I object, because it makes a fundamental change in the act. According to the explanatory note, the old act was the same with the exception of the word "ordinarily," and it is the insertion of that word which makes all the difference.

Mr. STIRLING: To what subsection is my hon. friend referring?

Mr. NEILL: The first few lines of subsection 1. I think this would come home particularly to any one from the district I represent and also the hon. members representing the constituencies of Nanaimo, Vancouver North, Cariboo and to a certain extent Skeena, because they all have people who will be disfranchised because of the insertion of that one word. I do not suppose the number will be very great; it may total a couple of thousand in British Columbia; but surely the logger, the miner, the fisherman or the seaman is entitled to his vote once we start out with the idea that we have more or less universal suffrage.

Perhaps I had better explain how this works. A man lives in one part of a constituency; take Vancouver North, for example. His home, where his wife lives, is in Vancouver North; but in the summer season, when logging operations are going on, he goes to the northern portion of that constituency, which covers a large area, and gets a job in a logging camp, where he spends perhaps six months of the year. Previously, when the election came along, he registered in the ordinary way at the place where he was working, but under the interpretation that must be placed upon the word "ordinarily" he can be registered only at Vancouver North. You may say, "Well, he can go back there and vote." It is all very well to say that, but in point of fact he cannot, and we know he cannot. To do so, he would have to throw up his job; for what concern would put up with a man being away for that reason? He must be away for one or two weeks, which means that he will lose his job and have to pay $25 or $30 to go back home in order to vote. That makes it impossible, so we are depriving that man of his vote. When we say "ordinarily resides," that is interpreted in another section of the bill as the place where he has his wife. Someone said that was not so, because there was a clause dealing with men separated from their wives; but we are not dealing with that class of people at all; we are dealing with men who have their wives in one part of the district, but who are forced by circumstances to work in another part.

In previous acts, and again in this bill, the principle is recognized that consideration should be given people of this kind, because special privileges are extended to three classes, ecclesiastics, school teachers and students. It is expressly provided that although they are not resident at the place where they are ordinarily resident, they can register where they then are. That is class legislation. If a man of the gospel, who is getting a permanent salary presumably a little better than that of the average workingman, and who is better able to go to the expense of returning to his regular home, is permitted this privilege, why should it not be extended to the people I have mentioned? The minister could probably return during the week without depriving his church of his services, and the same would apply to the teacher and the student. If it is right that we should not deprive the teacher, the parson or the student of his vote, why should the same thing not apply to the logger, the miner and the fisherman? I can see no reason why it should not. As I say, there is no reason. This act goes back quite a number of years. Originally, perhaps, the matter was not of so much importance, because there were times when a move of population was what might be described as more definite and permanent in its trend. If they did move to a certain place, it was a permanent move for reasons of work, and there was a tendency to stay in that place. Nowadays the trend is variable. Men are laid off on an hour's notice because an engine breaks down. Nowadays men are flown to their work and back again. There is more need to provide for new conditions.

I have not yet heard any suggestion as to any impropriety in connection with the matter, or of any abuse in any way at all. It is closely watched, and there are plenty of safeguards. There is no chance of the intrusion of a large body of men in there, in order to swing a vote, because the condition says that they must be resident for a certain period. There is no danger either in theory or in practice, because that has been the law for many years in British Columbia, and it has never been abused. It has never even been possible to make it the means of abuse. I would like the minister to look over the situation and consider the matter. If he has determined to go on, I would ask him why the word "ordinarily" has been inserted, and who asked for it.

Mr. REID: Would the hon. member answer a question? Would it not be worked the other way? The hon. member was talking about a logger. We will suppose that a logger had registered in the interior but happened to be home; that is, at his ordinary home. How would he vote?

Mr. NEILL: He would still be able to vote at home, if he were there. This is in a case where he find himself in a distant place, and unable to go home. The average logger is not in a position to take a week off.

Mr. STIRLING: He can be sworn, can he not?

Mr. BOTHWELL: Possibly I could explain something of the discussion which took place in committee in connection with this particular section. In the 1934 act we endeavoured to take care of these voters by absentee voting provisions.

Mr. NEILL: Yes.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The committee found that the expense of absentee voting did not warrant our including it in this bill. For instance, in the election of 1935 there were 5,334 votes polled under the absentee voting provision. We found that 1,533 of them were rejected. The cost of absentee voting was approximately $250,000, or $65 plus, per vote. And it was by reason of the expense which was incurred in connection with absentee voting the committee decided that for the sake of a vote of that size we would not be warranted in inserting a clause which would deal with absentee voting.

Now, coming to the words "ordinarily resides" in the first subsection of section 14, may I point out that that term is defined in section 16 of the bill. The rules are stated in connection with the residence of electors. In the 1930 act we used the same words, namely, "ordinarily resides," and we defined them in much the same way as they are defined here. So that really, Mr. Chairman, the only difference between this bill and past acts in connection with residence of electors is that in this measure we have done away with the absentee vote.

Mr. NEILL: Dealing with the absentee vote for a moment—and I do not know why we should, because it does not in the least resemble the matter I brought up; there is no resemblance whatever—however, if the hon. member wishes to go into it, I will do so. It has no relation to this matter at all. The absentee vote was introduced in order to deal with a changed condition caused by the act of 1934 which provided for what was called a fixed list.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I would direct the attention of the hon. member also to the explanatory note on the page opposite page 12 of the bill. It would indicate that in 1934 we used exactly the same words, namely, "ordinarily resident."

Mr. NEILL: No.

Mr. BOTHWELL: It says "has been ordinarily resident in Canada."

Mr. NEILL: I will deal with that in a moment. I am surprised the hon. member says that. We are talking about the absentee vote, and I say it was introduced to meet a condition caused by the act of 1934, which made a fixed list. Therefore it was felt that a large number of people would be disfranchised.

The hon. member has said that it caused great expense, and that a great many votes were disqualified. The reason for the disqualifications was that deputy returning officers were not sufficiently informed of their duties; that was the reason for the disqualification of a large number of them. Apparently they had been instructed that when a man came along and wanted to vote in a district in which he was not then resident, they were to get a blank ballot, and that the deputy returning officer's duty was to write on the blank ballot a facsimile of the ballot of that particular district.

These deputy returning officers are not lawyers. They are not men of great business ability, and they take a reasonable, by-and-large view of it and put down Smith, Jones and Brown. And if a man voted for Smith, Jones or Brown, his vote was thrown out because it had not said that John Smith was an auctioneer or that Bill Brown was something else. I know of one case which came to my attention where the deputy returning officer had evidently said to the would-be voter, "Whom do you want to vote for, old man?" And the man said "Brown." So the officer just wrote down "Brown," and no other name was put on the ballot. Hundreds were thrown out in my district because the ballots were not properly drawn up, either because of a misconception or because of ignorance on the part of the deputy returning officer.

As to the cost of it let me say this: The hon. member has noted the cost as being so much per head. Did he ever figure out the per head cost of advance polls? If he would, perhaps he would find that the cost per head was more than that of the absentee vote. The machinery which is set up is expensive, and in a small place if you get four or five votes in an advance poll you are lucky. I suggest the hon. member had better look into those facts.

But the whole subject is not pertinent, because no one has asked him to introduce the absentee vote. I have asked him only to go back to the procedure that was current before the act of 1934. I have asked only that we go back to it and stick to that phase of it. The hon. member has said—and I hope he was not imposing upon my simple layman's ignorance, although it looks like it—that we should look at the explanations, which is to me a painful subject anyway, opposite page 12 of the bill, and we would find the words "ordinarily resident". That is simply a play on words. It is there, but it does not apply to what I am talking about. It reads to indicate that a person has to show that he was ordinarily resident in Canada for at least twelve months—ordinarily resident in the electoral district at the date of the poll.

Mr. BOTHWELL: That is the same thing as we have here.

Mr. NEILL: But when he came to take an affidavit all he had to swear to was that he was a "resident" of a polling division. Surely the 1936 act takes precedence over that of 1934. And here I find that section 46A in chapter 35 of the 1936 statutes reads as follows:

46A. (1) Subject as herein provided, any person who pursuant to the provisions of section four of the Dominion By-Elections Franchise Act, 1936, is qualified to vote in the electoral district in which a by-election is pending, and is, on polling day, resident—

Resident—

—in a rural polling division—

And so on. Then, at page 219 of the volume we find the form, in these words:

You swear that you are a British subject ordinarily resident in Canada—

And so on, and so on. Then it says: "that you now reside in this polling division." That is all they had to do. They had to swear that they "now reside" in the polling division, and that is all I am asking. Let us carry out the act as we have been doing for many years. It was not objected to, and the source of no corruption or impropriety. This action will certainly cut off hundreds of voters in the districts I have named. I do not know what effect it will have upon voters in the northern areas of Ontario, but hon. members from that part of the country will be more familiar with conditions than I. In the districts in British Columbia to which I have referred I know there will be hundreds of men, many of whom will vote against me—that is their privilege—who will be deprived of their vote. I think the general basic principle of this measure should be to give the greatest opportunity to people to vote, providing the proper safeguards are taken against corruption and impersonation.

Mr. MacNEIL: I desire to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). In reading subsection 1 of section 14 in conjunction with section 16, I cannot find any provision being made for the class of workers described by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. These workers engaged in the logging and fishing industries must of necessity move from district to district according to the requirements of their industries. In many instances, while these men are absent from home, their families are compelled to move from one electoral district to another. Therefore, it is extremely difficult for them to define residence. I should like to have the minister or the chairman of the committee on elections explain how they propose, under the terms of this bill, to extend the franchise to these people.

Mr. POWER: The section can stand.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The committee came to the conclusion that no matter what words were used there would be a certain number of electors who would be disqualified or disfranchised in any event. It was not possible to cover every person in Canada who was entitled to vote. The minister is agreeable to having this section stand, and perhaps section 16 could stand also, in order that these sections might be considered before the next meeting of the committee.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Paragraph (j) reads in part:

—because the doctrines of his religion make him averse to bearing arms, and who is by the law of that province disqualified from voting.

To what provinces would that apply?

Mr. BOTHWELL: To British Columbia only.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): There are quite a number of people who are adherents to the Society of Friends, commonly known as Quakers.

Mr. BOTHWELL: This section would not apply to them at all. We have included in this section the particular order in council which refers only to Doukhobors.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In the province of British Columbia?

Mr. MacNEIL: I should like that to be understood absolutely.

Mr. POWER: I am quite clear on it because I gave it a lot of thought. This refers only to Doukhobors in British Columbia.

Mr. MacNEIL: It does not refer to those who were exempted under the Militia Act because of religious belief?

Mr. POWER: It does refer to those who came in under certain conditions in 1898 and whose religious beliefs prohibited them from bearing arms.

Section stands.

Section 15 agreed to.

Section 16 stands.

On section 17—Preparation of lists of electors.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not think we should be asked to agree to a long section at one time. I think the subsections should be named one by one.

Subsections 1, 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 17, subsection 4—Receipt and disposal of copies of preliminary list received from enumerators.

Mr. HEAPS: As I understand it, these lists are to be printed in the various constituencies?

Mr. BOTHWELL: It is the intention to do that as far as possible.

Mr. HEAPS: Are you doing away with the printing at Ottawa?

Mr. BOTHWELL: There is nothing in the bill to prevent the printing of lists in Ottawa where this is more convenient, and where the lists can be prepared in time, but the intention is to have them printed locally as far as possible.

Mr. HEAPS: Has the hon. member or the minister any information as to the relative cost of printing in Ottawa and in the individual constituency?

Mr. POWER: That information was presented to the committee, but I have not it with me at the moment.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would the minister give a simple outline of the procedure to be followed in the preparation of these lists in urban and rural districts? It is difficult for those of us who were not members of the committee and who saw the bill for the first time only a few days ago to understand the method of procedure.

Mr. POWER: It goes back to the 1930 elections act, which I understand met with general approval. I have not gone into all the details; but in urban areas with populations of more than 3,500, two enumerators representing two adverse political parties go around together from house to house to take an enumeration of people qualified to vote.

Mr. MacNEIL: When?

Mr. POWER: Within plenty of time prior to the election to give the electoral officers an opportunity to prepare printed lists. When that enumeration is completed, there is a revision before the revising officer and then a final list is prepared. In order to avoid difficulty in connection with impersonation, in cities over 25,000 of population lists are furnished to every elector so that he will know who are his neighbours and which of them are entitled to vote. In cities under 25,000, lists are furnished to every householder. Rule 7 provides:

Each pair of enumerators, after taking their oaths as such, shall, on Monday, the 49th day before polling day, proceed jointly to ascertain the name, address and occupation of every person qualified to vote.

As I said before, when that has been done there is a revision and then the final list is prepared. There is only one enumerator in the rural constituencies. He has an office at a central place within the polling division, and during office hours those who claim to be entitled to vote call upon him and he places their names upon the list. There is a revision shortly before the election, but even on the election day a person who considers himself qualified to vote may come to the poll and he will be entitled to vote if he is vouched for by a qualified elector. We have returned to the old system of open voting which existed in 1930 and prior to that year.

Mr. REID: That is just in the rural districts?

Mr. POWER: That is covered by schedules A and B of section 17.

Mr. NEILL: What would be the contemplated period under ordinary conditions between the issue of the writ and the election?

Mr. BOTHWELL: At least fifty-two days.

Mr. GRAYDON: I have one question with regard to the distinction between rural and urban districts. Take the case of a large country municipality with an electoral population of more than 3,500.

Mr. POWER: That is urban.

Mr. GRAYDON: It is not a question then of having any concentrated population but of a municipality having a population of more than 3,500?

Mr. BOTHWELL: It has to be a concentrated population except, we will say, in such districts as surround Montreal where you have small urban communities that may not have 3,500 of a population. The chief electoral officer is authorized in a case of that kind to declare that that particular area is an urban polling district, and it is treated accordingly. Closed lists will be prepared for these places just the same as for the city of Montreal.

Mr. GRAYDON: What procedure has to be taken in order to have the chief electoral officer make the declaration that it is an urban area?

Mr. BOTHWELL: I cannot find the section at the moment; but within five days after the writ of the election, or at any time prior to that, representations can be made to the chief electoral officer to have him declare the district an urban instead of a rural area.

Mr. NEILL: What is the definition of population? Is it determined by the last federal census, by the municipal census, or what?

Mr. POWER: The chief electoral officer gets his own information as to population.

Mr. NEILL: And his word is final?

Mr. POWER: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: By whom is the enumerator in rural constituencies appointed?

Mr. BOTHWELL: The enumerators are appointed by the returning officer.

Mr. HEAPS: I want to revert to the question of the printing of the lists. I should like to know what the comparative costs are of having the lists printed in the locality, as is intended by this bill, and by the printing bureau at Ottawa. Prior to the last enumeration the printing bureau had some equipment installed, in order to take care of the printing of the lists. I do not know whether it is useful for any other purpose; but I know that a large expenditure was incurred in purchasing this equipment, and if it is intended now that this equipment shall not be utilized for the printing of the lists, it will mean that a very large expenditure has been made that we are getting nothing out of, unless it can be used for some other purpose. It was claimed in the committee that the lists could be printed at the printing bureau at Ottawa much cheaper than in the various localities throughout Canada. Probably the minister or the chairman of the committee has figures to show what the relative costs are.

I should also like to know whether there is going to be any stipulation at any time by the chief electoral officer as to the amounts that will be charged for the printing of the lists, because my understanding is that the costs are roughly twice as high locally as when the work is done by the printing bureau. I know that at the last election there was a good deal of complaint over the printing of the lists at Ottawa, because in some cases they were not satisfactory and they were late in being delivered. That was no doubt caused by the fact that it was an innovation. If it is intended now to change the system completely and have the lists printed locally, I should like to know the difference in cost between having them done locally and in Ottawa.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Evidence was given in the special committee as to the relative costs, and as to the time that would be required to have the lists printed in Ottawa. One of the deciding factors with the committee was that it was impossible for us to get the lists printed in Ottawa within the time limit provided for in this bill. The evidence that came to us from the printing bureau was that it would take them something like three months to print the lists. The time that has been provided in the bill is for an election to be conducted from start to finish within fifty-two days. While it is not definitely fixed yet what the cost will be for having the printing done locally, it is estimated that the printing will be done at about seven cents per name. The cost of having the work done at the printing bureau, even with them taking additional time, was something around six cents. So it costs more to have the printing done locally by almost one cent per name.

It is really a fraction of a cent more, but the work can be done very much more quickly locally.

Mr. HEAPS: Does the hon. member know what was charged for the printing of the lists for the last by-election in the city of Montreal?

Mr. BOTHWELL: I understand it was eight cents per name.

Mr. HEAPS: I understand that it was considerably higher than seven cents.

Subsection 5 agreed to.

On section 17, subsection 6—Copies of preliminary printed lists for candidates.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I notice that the lists must be printed twenty-six days before polling day, but there is nothing in this subsection to say how many days before polling day the lists shall be given to the candidates. Should there not be such a provision?

Mr. BOTHWELL: That is provided for in the bill. I have not the section in mind at the moment.

Mr. REID: Subsection 6 provides that the returning officer shall provide the candidate with twenty copies.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): But it does not say how many days before polling day.

Mr. POWER: But it says "immediately after the preliminary lists of electors have been printed." I do not know whether it is the twenty-second or twenty-third day, but it will be in plenty of time.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The lists are being distributed in all the urban divisions. I do not think there will be any complaint along the line of not having a sufficient number of the lists.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What I was concerned about was that the candidate should receive the lists in time.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It could not be sooner than immediately after they are printed.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): "Immediately" may be a long time.

On section 21—Polling day, nomination day and nomination of candidates.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will the chairman of the committee on elections kindly explain the change in regard to nominations?

Mr. POWER: There is no change.

Mr. MacNEIL: The explanatory note says "S.S. 5. Changed at the suggestion of the chief electoral officer."

Mr. POWER: I think it has to do with obtaining the consent of the candidates. There is no material change; the section has been reworded. At present this section appears as section 18 of the act.

Sections 22 and 23 agreed to.

On section 24—Return by acclamation.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: I think there is a grammatical error on page 43, second line, "nominated with the time," it should read "nominated 'within' the time."

Mr. POWER: Yes. I do not think we need move an amendment for that.

Section 25 agreed to.

On section 26—Deputy returning officers and poll clerks.

Mr. MacNICOL: I want to elaborate—

Mr. POWER: Would the hon. member care to have it stand?

Mr. MacNICOL: I might not be in the house when it comes up again. The matter is of such transcendent importance, and the minister has such transcendent knowledge of elections acts, may I refer to it now? I refer to subsection 4 only, which now reads:

> Each deputy returning officer shall, forthwith after his appointment, appoint by writing under his hand, in form no. 30, a poll clerk, who, before acting as such shall take the oath printed on the said form no. 30. Such forms of appointment and oath shall be printed in the poll book.

Rule 3, on page 21, which we passed unanimously a few minutes ago, relating to the appointment of enumerators, is, I believe, a very fine and practical rule. I should like to see subsection 4 of section 26 changed to read similarly in intent to rule 3 of section 17, which reads:

> At least five days before he proposes to select the persons who are to act as enumerators as aforesaid, the returning officer shall give notice accordingly to the candidate who, at the then last preceding election in the electoral district, received the highest number of votes, and also to the candidate representing at that election a different and opposed political interest, who received the next highest number of votes. Such candidates may each, by himself or by a representative, nominate a fit and proper person for appointment as enumerator in every urban polling division comprised in the electoral district, and, except as hereinafter provided, the returning officer shall appoint such persons to be enumerators of the polling divisions for which they have been nominated.

I should like to see that principle incorporated in subsection 4, of section 26. I cannot see any reasonable argument against it. If it is sound for section 17, it ought to be sound for section 26. In my opinion it would be even more sound in section 26 than in section 17, because in section 17 the poll itself is referred to. I should like to see the principle of having two watch-dogs instead of only one in the poll. When the deputy returning officer and the clerk are appointed by the same party, you have only one watch-dog; but if the deputy returning officer and the poll clerk are appointed by two different parties, you have two. It would certainly eliminate ballot stuffing, and impersonation and so on.

I have no desire to continue any further. I have no intention of trying to force the adoption of what I suggest; I could not do so if I would; for the government majority is too large. But I hoped that hon. members on the government side would see the light and be willing to raise this bill to the high standard to which I referred. This is now done in practically all English-speaking countries: Great Britain, Australia, New Zealand and throughout the United States. I believe we are the only English-speaking country that does not now protect the ballot box by officers of two opposite political parties.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): I should like to agree with the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). It would be a very fine thing to raise the standard of elections and make everything as fair as possible, but after the gerrymander of 1934—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): That cannot be remedied here; it is a contentious matter, and it is too late now as far as my constituency is concerned; but in improving the elections act, why should we allow any party to gerrymander the constituencies, and then they cannot be changed for the next ten years? Certainly an attempt was made to steal the seat which I hold, and they nearly got away with it. What is the use of talking about a fair act when there is so much of that?

Mr. MacNICOL: We are trying to make it fair now.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): Yes; if we ever want to have a fair act, we had better have the Liberal party undertake the work.

Mr. REID: Some further consideration should be given to this question. I have in mind the constituency I represented in the last election. The second highest candidate was a representative of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation. He left that party, joined the communistic party and then left the district. If an adherent of the communistic party has anything to do with choosing the enumerators, when he does not even live in the district, I can foresee all sorts of complications. I do not believe even the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation would elect him to choose enumerators for the constituency of New Westminster.

Mr. MacNICOL: Under the amendment I suggest, the returning officer does not surrender all his powers. If he is not satisfied with those named by anyone else, he can still make appointments under the circumstances mentioned by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. POWER: I know that this matter was fully discussed before the committee, and I suppose my best answer to the hon. member (Mr. MacNicol) would be to refer them to the committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: I had the committee with me at the beginning.

Mr. POWER: It would not help very much if my hon. friend had the committee with him at the beginning and argued them out of their sympathy. On the principle of the proposal, might I suggest to the hon. gentleman that there is a vast difference between the duties of the enumerators and the duties of the deputy returning officers. The enumerators go together. They decide who shall be on the list; if there is a dispute, there is a third party, and the enumerators are not in the polling booths on election day. On the other hand, the deputy returning officer is to some extent in a judicial capacity.

Mr. MacNICOL: So he is in England and in the United States.

Mr. POWER: Well, in England, as my hon. friend knows, the returning officers are appointed by law, being sheriffs, prothonotaries, city clerks and so on, public officials. As to the deputy returning officers, I have no knowledge, but I should be very much surprised if you could find anywhere in the English law any reference to any political party, because that is contrary to the principle of their law.

Mr. MacNICOL: They are appointed by the municipal authorities.

Mr. POWER: But there is no question of appointing a person from an opposite political party, as my hon. friend wants us to do. The deputy returning officer is in a judicial capacity. He is in control of the polling booth on election day, and my hon. friend's suggestion is that there be two in control of the polls. There is trouble enough now with one in addition to four or five scrutineers, without having two judges and no referee. The enumerators can submit a list to the returning officer who may come to a decision. Suppose, however, there is a dispute as to who has a right to vote, or who has not, or as to the conduct and discipline in the poll, it would not be possible in most rural constituencies and in a large number of urban constituencies to get the returning officer there himself to decide who was right as between the poll clerk and the deputy returning officer. It would appear to me to bring about a conflict in the polling booth rather than to promote peace, good order and discipline. If the poll clerk has not the same power and authority as the deputy returning officer, then he becomes a mere spy on the deputy returning officer and there is no value to the position at all. I should like to meet my hon. friend because he has taken a deep and sincere interest in this measure; I know that in anything he says his motives are the highest, and he firmly believes that the bill would be improved by some such amendment as he suggests. But with all credit for his sincerity, I cannot believe that the general economy of the elections act would be improved by any such set-up as he proposes.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: The hon. member for Davenport tells us that when he first brought forward the suggestion he thought he had the unanimous support of the committee.

Mr. MacNICOL: Right.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Well, I do not think the members have changed their minds at all; but out of deference to and affection for the hon. gentleman it may be that we showed too much sympathy at first for his views, which led him to believe that he had the unanimous support of the committee. I am sure, however, that we have not changed our minds. One of the reasons for the view we take of this matter, at any rate so far as I am concerned, is this. We are all agreed that partisanship should be kept out of the conduct of elections, and if the name of any political party, either the Conservative party or the Liberal party, were mentioned, I think it would be running counter to the idea we have in mind. Another point I have in mind is this. I know that in my own county there are men who have been acting as deputy returning officers for twenty-five or thirty years irrespective of the party in power. They can be said to be neutral, because nobody can tell what side they are on.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They must be Conservatives.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: No; we have had them as deputy returning officers for years; they are agreeable to both parties, and we do not know what their politics are. By adopting the suggestion of my hon. friend we would be ruling these men out, because they would then be either Liberal or Conservative. As things are now, they are neutral. I say, therefore, that these men, who for many years have been satisfactory to both parties, would be ruled out. I do not think that partisanship should be allowed to enter into the matter at all.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister was right when he said that in Great Britain they did not recognize political parties in elections and that in their acts you would not find any reference to a political party as such. Here, however, we seem to be getting away from that principle which is so definitely fixed in British election law. We have got away from it in our recognition of an official leader of the opposition and by allowing the official leader of the opposition and the leader of the party in power to speak as long as they care to, while other members are limited to a certain length of time.

Mr. POWER: That is an abuse.

Mr. HEAPS: I do not know whether it is an abuse, but that is the practice which is recognized now. We have gone a step further in the elections act, because we recognize parties, if not by name, then by the appointment of enumerators, and once you begin to recognize that principle it is not going very far to recognize the principle contained in the proposal put forward by the hon. member for Davenport. These officials are almost all partisan appointees. There may be instances in which they are not, but generally speaking they are partisan appointees. In the last elections act, when the returning officers were appointed for the various constituencies we managed to a certain extent to get away from a complete partisan slate across the country, and we had in Canada after the last elections act returning officers representing at that time approximately the numerical strength of parties in this house.

There were so many Conservatives appointed, so many Liberals, and, I understand, so many of the group to which I happen to belong, though I had nothing to do personally with the appointment of any of the returning officers. The returning officers will no doubt appoint their own deputies from the party that is in power, and for my part I can see no harm, but rather good, resulting from the suggestion put forward by the hon. member. I remember in one election the deputy returning officer in conjunction with his poll clerk actually stole the election. They put in between them a sufficient number of fake ballots into the ballot boxes to convert what otherwise would have been a minority for their candidate into an absolute majority. At that time, had there been representatives of the two opposing parties in control, an occurrence of that kind would have been entirely obviated. I cannot see what difficulty there would be in having the deputy returning officer appointed from one political party and having the candidate with the next largest number of votes appoint the clerk in charge. From my experience I think it would work towards the holding of cleaner elections, and I am sorry the minister has definitely taken an opposite view to that of the hon. member for Davenport.

Mr. POWER: The committee took that view.

Mr. HEAPS: But I am sorry the minister has taken it.

Mr. POWER: I was influenced by the committee; I have taken it since.

Mr. HEAPS: I never thought the minister could be influenced so easily. I am afraid his mind was pretty well made up, though of course he may have been influenced by the majority recommendation of the committee. Perhaps, on more mature reflection, he might have changed his mind, because I want to say that when I first heard the suggestion of the hon. member for Davenport I was also opposed to it, but on more mature thought I came to the conclusion that it would be a good thing. Personally I would far sooner have nothing to do with the appointment of deputy returning officers, enumerators or anyone else. It is a nuisance as far as any candidate is concerned; it is more trouble than it is worth. I should like to take all these appointments entirely away from the candidates or parties, if ways and means could be devised of doing so. But since we appoint the enumerators as representing the two parties, I think we would be taking a logical step if we had the poll clerk appointed by the party other than the one which appointed the deputy returning officer.

On section 28—Ballots and their form.

Mr. BAKER: This section refers to form 32, which is set out at the back of the bill. Did the committee consider whether it would be advisable to show on that form whether Brown or O'Neil or Hamon was a Conservative, a Liberal, a Cooperative Commonwealth Federation candidate, or whatever it might be? I am satisfied that a great many people who go to the polls are not particularly concerned with the names of the candidates, but they do know the party for which they desire to vote.

Mr. POWER: No. 3 would be the Tory there; you would not have to designate him.

Mr. BAKER: With the intelligent people there would be no trouble at all, but I am thinking about the others.

Mr. BOTHWELL: The matter was discussed, and the decision was arrived at that we should not make a change in the ballot by setting out the particular political belief of any candidate.

Section agreed to.

Sections 29 and 30 agreed to.

On section 31—Polling stations.

Mr. REID: I desire to move an amendment to subsection 5, putting it back as it was before. It will then read:

> The poll shall be opened at the hour of eight o'clock in the forenoon and kept open until six o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, and each deputy returning officer shall, during that time, in the polling station assigned to him, receive in the manner hereinafter prescribed the votes of the electors duly qualified to vote at such polling station.

In my opinion the present provision, if it goes into effect, will disfranchise hundreds of workers. I have attended many polling booths during many elections, and I think the committee will agree with me that generally very few people turn up to vote at seven o'clock in the morning, while on the other hand many electors go to the polls from five o'clock on.

Mr. MacNEIL: I most heartily support the amendment of the hon. member. I live in a suburban district, most of the residents of which work in the city, to which they must cross by ferry. The two hours allowed during the day does not give them sufficient time to return from work to vote, and their only opportunity is just before the polls close, as they did under the old act. With this change it is literally true, as stated by the hon. member, that thousands of people will be disfranchised. As an alternative I would suggest that there be a statutory half-holiday on election day. In that way the point the committee desired to cover could be satisfactorily dealt with.

Mr. POWER: How would that cure the situation which has been objected to? What difference would a statutory half-holiday make in regard to the point brought up by certain British Columbia members, namely, that before the polls are closed there, results come in from other sections of the country?

Mr. MacNEIL: If there were a statutory half-holiday, the polls could be closed at five o'clock and the workers would have an opportunity to vote between one o'clock and five o'clock. As matters now stand, however, in regard to employment, they dare not take any time off, even though employers may not exercise intimidation. In my case they certainly do not have sufficient time for a long street-car journey, a half-hour ferry trip and another journey by bus in order to vote before five o'clock.

Mr. POWER: The answer to the suggestion for a statutory half-holiday came out during the discussion of previous election acts. I do not believe it is within the power of the federal government to enforce a statutory half-holiday. I do not think we can do that in any province, because that is a matter entirely under provincial jurisdiction. That matter was discussed at great length in 1930 and again in 1934.

Mr. KINLEY: Subsection 5 states:

> In the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, the poll shall be opened at nine o'clock in the forenoon, and kept open until seven o'clock in the afternoon.

I do not like that. I think we should be able to hold an election during the daytime. In the rural districts there are no lighting facilities in the schoolhouses and many other places where the polls are held; lights must be brought in, creating fire hazards, and that is not good. The electors have a habit of collecting around the polls, feeling that the day's work is over; excitement begins to mount, and it is just as well to have the ballots counted and the decision announced as soon as possible after six o'clock. I do not like this provision; as far as Nova Scotia is concerned, the old act was very good. I believe we should open the polls at eight o'clock and close them at six o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. MacLENNAN: As I understand the hon. member for New Westminster, his amendment would simply restore the old provision, and I must say that this would suit us in Nova Scotia far better indeed. Sometimes, depending upon the time of year when the election is held, it is dark and, indeed, long after dark by seven o'clock in the evening.

There is another point to which I should like to direct attention. In the rural districts, after the voters deposit their ballots they usually migrate to the towns, particularly the mining towns. By six o'clock there is quite a number around, and I have always noticed that whatever noise or disagreement there may be, it usually occurs between five and six o'clock. Before five o'clock everything would be going quietly; but between five and six o'clock the people from the country came in, gangs began to collect around the polls and josh one another, if you understand what I mean by the word "josh." These people would be getting a little out of hand. If that situation is to be continued for another hour, I am sure it would not be satisfactory. I must ask the committee to leave the maritime provinces alone in this regard. We are not asking for the change. Not one man from the maritimes is asking for it, and in view of that fact I would ask the committee to restore the law to its former state.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. STEWART: No; it is not carried.

Mr. BROOKS: I take this opportunity to express agreement with my colleagues from the maritime provinces. I was not a member of the committee, but I believe that this change would be prejudicial to the electorate of the maritimes. We are seventy-five per cent rural; thus most of our electors come from country districts. Nine o'clock in the morning is approaching the middle of the day for the farming communities, and the people in rural districts like to get to the polls to do their voting as early as possible. To ask us to close the polls at seven o'clock simply means that we are closing them at six o'clock, because six o'clock is the supper hour in rural communities. Wives and their husbands have gone home to get supper and to do the chores. I believe many votes would be lost in the maritimes if this section were permitted to remain as it is. I would join with the other hon. members from the maritimes who are objecting to it. Surely the committee in its fairness will not permit the section to be passed.

Mr. STEWART: The section as reported in the bill was the subject of considerable discussion in committee. The object of drafting the section as it stands is one with which I am sure every hon. member of the committee will agree, if it is capable of accomplishment. All hon. members desire that elections should be free; that there should not be injected in the last hours of a campaign an influence which may have an effect in one part of Canada different from that in another.

There are four hours difference in time between the maritime provinces and British Columbia. It was pointed out in committee that at least on two occasions the results of elections in the maritime provinces had been telegraphed to British Columbia and scattered broadcast. The news was made known through the medium of special issues of newspapers placed on the street two or three hours before the close of the polls in British Columbia. It was said that on one occasion the effect was to the disadvantage of one political party, on account of the report that the maritimes were all going in a certain direction. On another occasion the result was the opposite and was in favour of the other party.

It may be, unfortunately, that some constituencies or provinces think it would be to their advantage to be supporting the party which would be in power and would control the country for the next four years. Reports might not always be accurate; there is no guarantee that they are. Statements as to results may be misreported, or abused. I wonder if there is any member of the committee who does not desire to make that condition impossible? It was just for that purpose, and with the idea of preventing any possible abuse which might arise through an announcement of that kind being made, that these hours were changed.

Mr. MacLENNAN: Would one hour help?

Mr. STIRLING: It is two hours.

Mr. STEWART: We have changed to different hours for different sections of the dominion. The result is to give in the maritimes one hour longer for polling than otherwise would be the case. In many parts of the dominion that is thought to be an advantage; it would give an extra hour for polling in the maritimes. They would have an hour longer than voters in other parts of Canada would have.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: The same number of hours.

Mr. POWER: It would be the same number of hours.

Mr. STEWART: Yes, but extending an hour later.

Mr. MacLENNAN: But we do not want it.

Mr. STEWART: Possibly the hon. member does not; but, after all, I think in the interests of what is best for the whole of Canada the maritime provinces would be prepared to make some concessions.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: Apparently British Columbia does not want it.

Mr. STEWART: They may not want it. Some may not want it; but I know that some of the British Columbia members have complained of the abuses which have taken place in years gone by, and have supported this change. The effect is a compromise all around, staggering the hours so that it becomes impossible for the maritimes to telegraph to British Columbia either an accurate or an inaccurate statement as to the result of polling in eastern Canada. It becomes impossible to have the information published and distributed two or three hours before the close of the polls in British Columbia, a condition which might probably affect the result of polling in the western province.

I wonder if there is any member of the committee who objects to the object the committee had in mind when it drafted this section? Is it desirable, in the interests of British Columbia, or any other part of the dominion, that what I have indicated should happen? I must point out that it has happened, and it has been for the purpose of making a repetition impossible that the section was drafted. It was agreed to almost unanimously by the committee, after long discussion, compromise and general agreement, that the object the committee had in mind was a worthy one, and that this was the best way to accomplish it.

Mr. PURDY: As one of the members of the elections committee perhaps I might be permitted to say a word. I attended diligently the meetings of the committee; in fact, I believe I missed only two sittings in two years. Every time the question of shoving Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island into a dark vote was suggested, I voiced my opposition as strenuously as I could. Unfortunately I was unavoidably absent when the matter was brought up on the last occasion, and when the compromise as indicated by the hon. member for Leeds was arrived at. Had I been there, I would have objected to the best of my ability, because I think we in the maritimes are at least entitled to the sun.

Mr. GREEN: This is particularly a British Columbia problem because the time changes at our boundary, which means we are from one to four hours later than the other provinces. We are even one hour later than Alberta. I would ask that hon. members of the committee give this matter careful consideration because it is a serious problem. The effect is to make the elections at the present time quite unfair. The last election was a hard-fought one for a Conservative anywhere in Canada; but shortly after three o'clock, when we had still three hours to go, returns started coming in from the maritimes. I know what effect that had upon myself. I felt that after we had put up such a battle, it was exasperating that our electors were not being given an opportunity to cast their ballots without knowing the results in the east. By six o'clock we had dozens of the Quebec and Ontario results. The radio has changed the whole position because the returns come right into the homes. Previously they had to be sent in over the telegraph wires and then papers had to be printed. It hurt me this time, but next time it may hurt the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) when the returns from the maritimes are known. I do not think the proposed method of remedying the situation is the proper one. It will mean disfranchising a number of people. But would it not be possible to provide that the ballot boxes in the maritime provinces shall be held for two hours, and those in Ontario and Quebec for one hour? That would help in solving this problem.

Mr. POWER: Who is going to hold the maritimes?

Mr. GREEN: Surely they have enough self-control in eastern Canada to work that out.

Mr. MacINNIS: I rise to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid). I was not a member of the committee that considered this bill, but I am not unmindful of the reasons that prompted it in trying to remedy the situation complained of by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) and the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart). If it is intended to remedy this situation by the change now suggested, the result will be the disfranchisement of a great many people in British Columbia. Any one who has any understanding at all of the conditions under which the manual labourers work must realize that it would be quite impossible for them to get away from their work and reach the polling booths before five o'clock. It will mean the disfranchisement of thousands of people all over the province. It will take many of these people two or three hours to reach the polling booths in order to exercise their franchise. I have no objection to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver South, provided, as the minister said, you can keep the maritimes down. Being a maritimer myself, I know that they take their politics more seriously than their religion, and it may be rather difficult to hold them down. I do not think the solution of this problem is the one provided in the bill, and I am whole-heartedly in support of the amendment moved by the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I believe the fear that has been expressed by hon. members is overstated. In 1930 the government of the day lost a number of seats in the maritimes, but they gained a number of seats in British Columbia.

Mr. GREEN: False news was published in British Columbia.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): News of that kind could still be published. In 1935 the situation was different. The government that had been in power between 1930 and 1935 lost seats in the maritimes, and yet they did better in British Columbia than elsewhere, as is evidenced by hon. members opposite who came here for the first time. Seven o'clock in the morning is pretty early in a province like Saskatchewan, which is largely rural, for people to be getting out to vote, and five o'clock is too early an hour to close the polls. There is always a rush at the last hour, and the closing hour of six o'clock has worked very well in former elections.

Mr. MacNEIL: I should like to present a practical problem to the minister. If the polls are closed at five o'clock in British Columbia, the result will be the disfranchisement of many voters in the districts in the vicinity of Vancouver. Across Burrard inlet there are a number of important municipalities, such as North Vancouver. A large part of the population in these municipalities work in the city of Vancouver. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) knows very well that many people in Vancouver go to points like White Cliff and Fisherman's Cove from May to September. The bus leaves there at seven o'clock in the morning, and these people must catch either the North Vancouver or the West Vancouver ferry; they must make street-car connections, and many of them have a street-car journey of three-quarters of an hour, allowing time for necessary connections. Even with two hours off, they cannot possibly get to the polling booth in time. They can just barely make it by six o'clock. It has been usual to expect a very heavy vote just before six o'clock, because it is understood that many people can just make it by that time, even though they leave their work at four o'clock. I suggest to the minister that as this parliament has power to stipulate that employers shall grant two hours to their employees, it has power to stipulate that they shall grant four hours.

Mr. POWER: The trouble is to discover how to enforce it in the law courts.

Mr. MacNEIL: This legislation will definitely disfranchise many of the residents in these important districts. I have no alternative than to support the amendment moved by the hon. member for New Westminster.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I support the amendment moved by the hon. member for New Westminster. I agree with what has been said by hon. members on the other side. It is quite true that many workers in Vancouver and North Vancouver have found it impossible to reach the polling booths by six o'clock. There is no doubt that many voters will be disfranchised.

Mr. POWER: Perhaps this section could be allowed to stand, and then we could have a further discussion of the matter.

Mr. GREEN: Would it be possible to make it an offence under the act to publish the returns by radio or by telegraph before the vote is completed in British Columbia?

Mr. POWER: I understand that was studied carefully by the committee. Apart from the fact that it would involve some interference with the liberty of the press, it would be most difficult to enforce.

Mr. STEWART: As I have said, this matter was the subject of careful study by the committee. Not one hour or two, but many hours were spent upon it, and every contention that has been advanced here to-night was given careful consideration by the committee. There is a provision in the bill that every labouring man shall be given two hours off from work, without deduction of pay, to vote, and with our modern rapid transportation—and I understand that in the city of Vancouver many polls are centred in one building—surely that gives ample time to every man to vote. I should like to know what poll you could not reach in two hours.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Plenty of them.

Mr. STEWART: In a city?

Mr. MacNEIL: How about the suburban districts?

Mr. STEWART: It is the cities where the working men are congregated that have been complaining. I submit that two hours off from work is ample time to enable a man to go to the polls and vote and that no one would be deprived of his vote. Is there any abuse in having the results in one part of Canada published in another part of Canada with a view to influencing the election results there? The fundamental principle of elections is the secrecy of the ballot.

Mr. KINLEY: Individually.

Mr. STEWART: Individually and collectively. If it is fair to have it secret individually, it is more fair to have it secret collectively. It has been suggested that you might prohibit the giving of results by enacting a law against the publication of the returns prior to a certain hour. That suggestion was carefully considered by the committee, but all you would have to do would be to have the returns sent to the United States and announced from Seattle. What are you going to do about announcements from Seattle? What jurisdiction have you over there? There is nothing political in this. It may affect one party in one election, and another party in another election.

Mr. KINLEY: It is no advantage.

Mr. STEWART: If there is an abuse, let us stop it.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Why penalize the electors elsewhere just because there is a fear of somebody being influenced?

Mr. STEWART: There is no desire to penalize anybody. In the maritimes they are given one hour later, which in many instances is considered an advantage. In Ontario the polls close, under the provincial act, at seven o'clock. The hours of polling in the different provinces for provincial elections vary considerably. In some provinces the polls close at five; in others, at six; in others, at seven. There was an earnest desire in the committee to overcome the abuse that has been experienced by both political parties, and as I have said, a compromise was reached on the part of British Columbia and on the part of the maritimes. I think we ought not to lose sight of the general principle. Is it desirable that the election results in Nova Scotia should be telegraphed to British Columbia to the possible disadvantage of any political party in British Columbia? If that is not desirable, what is the remedy? Here we have the remedy that commended itself to the committee after all the other suggestions had been weighed, and the committee was practically unanimous—I think there were only three opposed to it—in arriving at this conclusion after a careful and exhaustive consideration of the whole question.

It may be a matter primarily for British Columbia, but at the same time it undoubtedly affects the whole dominion. We are all interested in it whether we are inconvenienced or not; and if the maritime provinces feel that possibly they are giving up something, and if British Columbia is called upon to give up something we ought to be prepared to do that in the interests of Canada if the object to be accomplished is a worthy one. I put it to every member of this committee, and I do not care what the political effect is in this election or the next election, Is it desirable that any person or organization in one province for purely partisanship purposes should be able to send out to British Columbia either accurate or inaccurate information about the election results, for the purpose of influencing the vote in that or some other province. If the committee thinks it is desirable to leave the matter wide open and to permit the repetition of what has occurred on two occasions, once to the advantage of one party and once to the advantage of another, then possibly there should be no change. But after a careful study the committee came to the conclusion almost unanimously that it was desirable to prevent that situation, and in order to accomplish it the committee agreed upon this compromise. If there is any other way of doing it, let us hear it. Let us not dismiss this as a matter of trivial concern or of merely local convenience. It is of interest to the whole of Canada. What we want is clean elections. We want elections that are not influenced improperly by messages sent from one part of Canada to another.

Mr. POWER: I doubt if there is any possibility of our coming to an agreement on this clause to-night, so I would ask that it stand.

Section stands.

Sections 32 to 45 inclusive agreed to.

On section 46—Vote by elector whose name is not entered in the official list of electors for a rural polling division.

Mr. NEILL: This section ought to be allowed to stand for consideration with section 14, because the same thing applies, the words "ordinarily resident." The explanatory note on the right hand page says, "no change," which is not correct; there is a change.

Section stands.

[Mr. Stewart.]

On section 47—Time to employees for voting.

Mr. MacNEIL: Would the minister agree to allow this section to stand?

Section stands.

Section 48 agreed to.

On section 49—Strangers not to enter polling districts armed.

Mr. NEILL: In regard to flags, the old section covered just during the polling. If people want to run around and celebrate after an election, I do not see why they should not have all the banners they want. This only means that some unhappy man will be punished for not knowing the law.

Mr. POWER: The objection I think is well taken. Let subsection 4 stand for correction.

Section stands.

On section 50—Counting and reporting the votes.

Mr. MacNEIL: Should this section not stand so that we might give consideration to the idea advanced by the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) about holding the boxes for two hours at certain points?

Mr. POWER: Frankly, without being in the least facetious, I do not think it would be possible to hold the ballot boxes in a polling booth anywhere in eastern Canada for two hours after the polls had closed. It would be asking too much of people's patience and placing too much reliance on the impartiality of the people of the maritimes—and even of Quebec—to ask them not to get the results of the polls the minute they can be announced.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am in sympathy with those who suggested the amendment. I think the minister might consider the suggestion. I take it that the people of Great Britain are just as impatient as Canadians, and there they hold the ballot boxes from the counties until the next day. They all come to a central point the morning after the election.

Mr. POWER: I think it would be very difficult not to give the results of the polling, say on the island of Cape Breton, within fifteen minutes after the ballots are counted. However, I am content to let the section stand.

Mr. GREEN: It might be a good way to help the people of eastern Canada to realize the extent of this nation, if the boxes were held.

Section stands.

Sections 51 to 55 inclusive agreed to.

On section 56—Election returns.

Mr. MacNICOL: The minister might let section 56 stand for the same reason as some others were left.

Mr. POWER: No; this is a return made by the returning officer six days after the election.

Section agreed to.

Sections 59 to 111 inclusive agreed to.

Schedules 1, 2 and 3 agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SITTINGS OF COMMITTEES WHILE HOUSE IN SESSION

Mr. G. W. McPHEE (Yorkton) moved:

That the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills be given leave to sit while the house is sitting.

Motion agreed to on division.

Mr. C. E. BOTHWELL (Swift Current) moved:

That the special committee on electoral matters be granted leave to sit while the house is sitting.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, there is a motion on the order paper that this house sit to-morrow morning at eleven o'clock. It seems to me almost incredible that anyone would suggest that a committee should sit while the house is in session, with respect to a matter of such grave importance as the measure to which reference has been made. In fact when we reach that motion I shall have something to say about it. I cannot see how we can do two or three things at the same time.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. BENNETT: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

LOAN COMPANIES ACT

REDUCTION OF MAXIMUM INTEREST RATE FROM 2½ TO 2 PER CENT PER MONTH

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue—for the Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 173, to amend the Loan Companies Act.

He said: This is a short bill to amend section 111 of the Loan Companies Act. All it does is to reduce the maximum rate of interest which may be charged by companies deriving their corporate powers from the parliament of Canada from 2½ per centum to 2 per centum per month.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it proposed to proceed with the measure at this session?

Mr. ILSLEY: If there is time to proceed with the small loans interest act it may not be necessary to proceed with this bill, as to some extent it covers the same ground.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

statute relating to naturalization in force in 1904, all naturalizations were effected directly by the court and not by the issue of a certificate from a government department. Therefore there is no copy of the certificate available in the Department of State.

Motion dropped.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

MORNING SITTINGS—LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on and after Tuesday, June 28, 1938, until the end of the session, the house shall meet at 11 o'clock in the morning of each sitting day and that in addition to the usual intermission at 6.00 o'clock p.m. there shall also be an intermission every day from one to three o'clock.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, it has not been customary for the house to sit three times a day when the committees have not completed their work. The general rule has been that the work of the committees shall have been completed or practically completed before such a motion is adopted, for reasons which I think are fairly obvious. For instance, if the special commitee on electoral matters is to consider the measure that is now before it, hon. members who are associated with me on that committee cannot be there and in the house at the same time. They would like to be in the house, in view of the legislation that is now before us. Under the circumstances I think the government should determine what legislation it will not proceed with, or that we should not sit three times a day unless there is a likelihood of our being able to conclude our sittings this week.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I believe the committees generally have about concluded their work. It is quite true that one committee will have to sit again, but I imagine that hon. members of that committee might be prepared to accommodate each other and sit from ten to eleven o'clock in the morning if necessary. However, for some time past, all committees have been sitting more or less while the house has been in session. This may impose a slight additional burden, but I am inclined to think that it is one which will be accepted willingly by hon. members if there is a prospect of the house proroguing on Thursday of this week. From what I have been told by the whips I understand there is every reason to believe that we may be able to get through the remaining legislation without undue haste if we begin sittings in the morning. I think in any event it would be best to begin the sittings in the morning and if we find we cannot get through before July, continue them for whatever time thereafter may be desired by hon. members. I believe it accords with the general wish to have the house begin its morning sittings tomorrow.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the Prime Minister be good enough to tell us now what legislative program he will proceed with?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have already stated that the house has before it on the order paper notice of all the legislation that the government intends to introduce or to have it consider. The intention is to proceed with the bills and resolutions on the order paper. There are one or two resolutions which might prove to be contentious, and if such be the case the government would be prepared to consider whether or not they should proceed with them and introduce the bills to be based on them this session. It will not take very long to ascertain whether the measures are likely to prove contentious.

Mr. BENNETT: Two of them, at least, will be very contentious.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I understand there is the possibility of one being contentious, and in that event it is altogether probable the measures will be held over for a subsequent session with the object of concluding the business of this session, if possible, by Thursday of this week.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, with further reference to this important matter, I know we are all anxious to conclude our labours as soon as we can, consistently with the proper discharge of the duties that devolve upon us. I would point out that the civil service committee is still sitting, and it is approaching the stage where a report is being drafted; I believe that will be under consideration this afternoon. The committee to which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) referred, the committee on electoral matters, has still one or two important items to deal with. I know we will all do the best we can, but it is going to crowd things a bit if we have to sit here in the morning, and if committees are sitting both in the morning and in the afternoon.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): Mr. Speaker, I attended the last meeting of the committee on electoral matters, and I gathered from what was said by members from all quarters of the house that there was a desire perhaps to study a little further the bill to which reference has been made. As a matter of fact I was quite convinced in my own mind that very few members of the committee desired to make a complete and thorough study of that bill this year, but I think there was a desire to examine it a little further in so far as its principle is concerned. When I left the committee—I left before it had adjourned—my understanding was that there would be at least one more meeting of the committee before the session closed in order to dispose of the principle underlying the bill. I do not think the government has any desire to press this particular bill this session unless the committee itself is so disposed.

Motion agreed to.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

MEASURE TO ASSIST THE CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES—PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO LOW RENTAL HOUSES AND MUNICIPAL TAXES

The house resumed from Friday, June 17, consideration in committee of Bill No. 145, to assist the construction of houses—Mr. Rogers (for Mr. Dunning)—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): With the consent of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I should like to revert to section 4, which was allowed to stand. I have an amendment to paragraph (b) of subsection 2 of section 4, which I will ask my colleague the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) to move.

On section 4—Advances.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move that paragraph (b) of subsection 2 be amended by deleting the word "seventy" in line 23 on page 3 of the bill, and substituting therefor the word "fifty".

Mr. ROGERS: It will be remembered that when this clause was under discussion previously, the suggestion was made that the reduction from seventy to fifty should apply to all loans. The matter was given very careful consideration by officers of the department. The conclusion reached was that it would be inadvisable to make the reduction applicable to all loans, but that the reduction might suitably and indeed usefully be made with respect to loans not exceeding $2,500.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS: With the consent of the committee, Mr. Chairman, because I take it that it will require unanimous consent, I should like to reopen section 14 of the bill in order to make an amendment which has become necessary in view of certain preliminary discussions with a group in the city of Quebec interested in low rental housing projects.

On section 14—To whom loans may be made.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move to amend paragraph (a) of section 14 by inserting after the word "municipality" in line 3 of page 8 of the bill, the words "or other appropriate authority," and after the word "kinds" in the same line the words "including school taxes and," and by deleting the words "by the municipality" in the fourth line of page 8 of the bill.

Mr. ROGERS: It was intended originally that school taxes should be included. It was found subsequently that in the province of Quebec, certainly in some of the municipalities in that province, school taxes were levied not directly by the municipality but by a school board, and in some cases by authority of the provincial legislature. For these reasons it seemed advisable to make the amendment which has just been proposed.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS: With the consent of the committee I should like to reopen section 15, paragraph (b). I would ask the Minister of National Defence to move the appropriate amendment.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver) moved:

That section 15, paragraph (b) be amended by inserting after the word "unit" in line 37 on page 9 of the bill the words "excluding charges for water and heating."

Mr. ROGERS: This amendment is also for the purpose of clarification, in order to make it quite clear that water and heating charges are not included in the rental.

Mr. McNIVEN: From a perusal of press reports I notice that some municipalities are considering plans and ways and means of building houses which will cost from three to four thousand dollars, and are figuring on rentals varying from $25 to $35 a month. I am sure the minister does not contemplate either a cost of that extent or rentals of that variety, and a statement from the minister would do a great deal to clarify the situation in the country. These reports have given rise to criticism of the act and the intention of the government, it being stated that persons with incomes of $125 to $150 a month do not merit being subsidized either by reduction in taxation or by cheap money. So far as I am concerned, and I believe the house is in agreement, this measure is intended to benefit people whose monthly income varies from say sixty to ninety dollars or not more than a hundred dollars a month, and who have families to keep. The intention of the government is to assist such people in providing homes in which their families can be brought up as good Canadian citizens, not to subsidize persons whose incomes, as indicated in these press dispatches, are from $125 to 150 a month. If that view becomes prevalent, property owners in these centres will be opposed to the act and to any by-law which it may be necessary to submit to the burgesses for approval.

Mr. ROGERS: It is clearly the intention to make these low rental housing projects available to members of what are described as low income groups. I am advised that certainly it is not the intention that the loan shall be made available for a house—that is, a family unit—which would cost in excess of $3,000.

Mr. PELLETIER: Would the minister explain what he means by "low income group" or "low income"? Just what limit does the minister place upon it?

Mr. ROGERS: What would constitute a low income group might vary from one district to another. You cannot lay down an arbitrary definition. But the bill itself makes it clear that houses built under this legislation will not be available to those who are able to pay something more than the economic rental. That is stated in the bill itself:

No family housing unit shall be leased to any family whose total family income is equal to or more than five times the economic rental of such family housing unit.

The determination of what is the "economic rental" is set out in the bill.

Mr. PELLETIER: According to the amendment just introduced, the rental charge for each housing unit is not to include water and heating. I think the minister has made that point quite clear. But I understand that some of these will be apartment houses, and they will be centrally heated. What limit will be placed upon the cost of heating? It might be quite possible, for example, to charge an excessive cost for heating purposes when that cost is not included in the rental. I think if the amendment is accepted, some limitation should be placed upon the heating charges.

Mr. ROGERS: A point of that kind would have to be dealt with by regulation, that is, in the terms of the agreement made between the governor in council and the municipality concerned.

Mr. PELLETIER: I quite realize that, and I hope that when such agreements are made, these things will be kept in mind so that no excessive charges will be made for heating.

Mr. ROGERS: I can assure my hon. friend that these considerations will be kept very much in mind.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. PLAXTON: With respect to paragraph (f), what was intended in respect to the proportion of loss that the lending institution would bear, as opposed to the government?

Mr. ROGERS: There is no lending institution referred to in paragraph (f). It is not before the committee.

Mr. PLAXTON: I am sorry. I was on another page.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 16, subsection 1, paragraph (i)—Orders and regulations:

Mr. PELLETIER: Exactly what does this mean:

(i) determine what specific items shall be included in cost of construction;

What is meant by the word "items"?

Mr. ROGERS: "Cost of construction" is defined in paragraph (a) on page six. This however is intended to deal with questions which might arise as to items which are not covered by that definition. It is intended rather as a safeguard of that section.

Mr. PELLETIER: It is not intended to lay down a definite rule as to what type of material shall be used, or what particular kind of goods shall be used, or things of that nature?

Mr. ROGERS: No, except as to standards.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraphs (ii) to (v) inclusive agreed to.

[Mr. Pelletier.]

On paragraph (vi).

Mr. PELLETIER: With regard to the form of guarantee given by the provincial government, have any negotiations been undertaken or has there been any correspondence with provincial governments as to the ultimate working of the act, and if so, what answer has been received from the provinces?

Mr. ROGERS: The answer to the specific question asked by the hon. member is in the negative. As provided in the legislation itself, the municipality or the limited dividend corporation, as the case may be, will make application for the loan. So far as the limited dividend corporation is concerned there is no necessity for provincial guarantee, but in the case of the municipality such a guarantee would be required. Clearly, however, until the bill is passed there can be no opportunity for municipal authorities to apply for provincial guarantees.

Mr. PELLETIER: Then there have been no communications from provincial governments concerning this measure. The bill has been under contemplation for some time, and I understood from certain dispatches I read that objection was being taken by certain provincial governments in view of the fact that they had to guarantee loans to the municipalities. Can the minister clear that up?

Mr. ROGERS: The guarantee does not apply in the case of the limited dividend corporation, but only where a low rental project is set up by a housing authority established by the municipality. I am informed that there have been no formal communications from the provincial governments with respect to the matter.

Paragraph agreed to.

On paragraph (vii).

Mr. McNIVEN: Under this paragraph will it be possible to prescribe regulations that will preclude the income groups to which I have referred from taking advantage of these provisions—that is, the groups who have an income of from $125 to $150 a month? I do not want to labour the point, but it should be emphasized again and again that these groups are not entitled to the benefit of this act, nor should they by any stretch of the imagination think that they have the right to be subsidized by cheap money or reduced taxation. The benefits of the act should go to people of low incomes such as teamsters and those engaged in seasonal occupations and others of that kind, good citizens who have difficulty in securing accommodation for their families.

Mr. ROGERS: The hon. member has correctly stated the purpose of the bill. As a matter of fact his suggestion is effected in section 15, paragraph (a), which provides that no family housing unit shall be leased to any family whose total family income is equal to or more than five times the economic rental of such family housing unit. I agree that the clause now before the committee might very well afford an additional opportunity for the governor in council to prevent any abuse of the kind to which my hon. friend has referred.

Mr. MASSEY: There is a point here which should be made clear. I asked the Minister of Finance a question with regard to it the other day when we were discussing paragraph (b) of section 15, and the answer was not satisfactory. If a man and his family move into one of these flats, the man's total income being $900 and the rent $200, it may happen that a son of fourteen a few years later gets a job giving him a few dollars a week, and the total annual income may then be over $1,000. Does that family have to move? The son may be in residence in the flat but a short time and then move away. Are you going to cause the family the inconvenience of having to get out because their income exceeds the limit by a few dollars?

Mr. ROGERS: The regulations should cover the contingency the hon. member mentions. The regulations would normally set out the term of the lease and within that term it could very well be provided that no lessee should be obliged to vacate even if the family income should exceed that laid down as a qualification for the rental of family housing units. Apart from that, however, one must allow a certain degree of discretion in the drawing up of agreements with the municipalities concerned. Certainly it would be well to keep in kind the purpose of the legislation, namely, that these housing units should be made available to those who are in low income groups. The desire undoubtedly would be that if it were necessary for a family to move from a family unit under a low rental housing project this should be done with the minimum of inconvenience, and that could be effectively safeguarded in the regulations.

Mr. MASSEY: That is true, but an act such as this can by misuse be made more inelastic than it is designed to be. Here is a family waiting to move into one of these flats, occupied by such a family as that to which I referred a moment ago. As soon as the boy gets a job these other people can appeal to the municipal authorities to have the family removed at the end of the year. But at the end of the year the boy may be out of work for two or three months and then is back again, so that it causes a certain amount of dissatisfaction. Would it not be better to amend the subsection we are discussing so as to make it read:

. . . prescribe the manner in which total family annual income shall be determined or estimated.

The same idea would apply to paragraph (b) of section 15. As it stands, if for a short time the income exceeds five times the economic rent, then the difficulty arises to which I have drawn attention.

Mr. ROGERS: Unquestionably the intention is that income shall be interpreted in the sense referred to by my hon. friend, but it does appear to be desirable to leave this subsection in its present form in order to preserve some flexibility in determining what shall enter into family income and how it shall be estimated for the purposes of the act.

Mr. MASSEY: I do not doubt for a moment the intent of this subsection and also of the other subsection to which I have referred, and it does tend to flexibility. On the other hand, it does lend itself to rigidity also, and it seems to me there is possibility of some difficulty which might be overcome by the use of the word "annual."

Mr. ROGERS: If the word "annual" is inserted here it will have to be inserted in a previous section which has already carried.

Mr. MASSEY: It occurs in paragraph (b) of section 15.

Mr. ROGERS: It really makes it less flexible. I believe it would be preferable to leave it as it is.

Paragraph agreed to.

Paragraph (viii) agreed to.

On section 16, subsection 2—force and effect.

Mr. STEWART: This subsection provides that:

All orders and regulations made hereunder shall have the same force and effect as if they had been included in this part and all such orders and regulations as are of general application, or abstracts thereof, shall be published in the Canada Gazette.

I wish to offer a slight amendment which I think would be of advantage, namely, that after the words "all such orders and regulations as are of general application" the words

"shall be published in full, and abstracts of other regulations" be inserted. The words "or abstracts thereof" would be struck out.

Mr. ROGERS: That amendment is quite acceptable.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move:

That all the words after the word "application" in line 33 be struck out and the following words inserted: "shall be published in full, and all other orders and regulations or abstracts thereof shall be published in the Canada Gazette."

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 17 agreed to.

On section 18—Loans in proportion to population.

Mr. STEWART: What is the reason for making the termination of the act subject to the decision of the governor in council, rather than parliament?

Mr. ROGERS: It appeared to be desirable that some discretion should be left to the governor in council between sessions of parliament. It is possible that there might be a stimulus to housing construction which it would be desirable to arrest at a period between sessions of parliament. It will be noted that a definite termination of the legislation is provided in the bill itself—March 31, 1940—so that the discretion would be exercisable only within that period.

Mr. BAKER: That would mean that the governor in council could stop the operation of the act before that time?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. BAKER: Personally I think that is first rate. You might have a good deal of trouble in getting it going and might be glad to put a full stop to it.

Mr. BARBER: The proportion of the $30,000,000 to be allotted to a given area is arrived at on the basis of the rates of the population of the municipality to the total urban population. What relation has that to the whole population?

Mr. ROGERS: About 55 per cent. It was thought desirable to take that as the standard as the construction contemplated in this section would be urban.

Mr. BARBER: But still this applies to loans to rural municipalities.

Mr. ROGERS: It is very doubtful whether a rural municipality would take advantage of this part of the bill. This is designed to bring about the construction of low rental housing projects, and it would be most unlikely that rural municipalities would invoke this section.

Mr. MASSEY: It seems to me, as was mentioned when discussing the resolution, that, although one can readily see the reason for it, the basis of population is not an adequate or fair basis. There are urban centres in Canada where generally speaking no assistance to housing is required, as against the very great need in other municipalities.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What other basis would my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. MASSEY: I think there should be provision which would permit of an extreme condition being met, without being bound by the terminology of the section. The minister knows that there are municipalities, in which the need is very great, which would be restricted in carrying out the plan by the limitation in subsection 1. Other municipalities have no great need and $100,000 might meet their requirements. There should be some method of escape from that.

Mr. ROGERS: It is not easy to determine a method of escape which would not involve further difficulties. There will be opportunity between now and the next session of parliament to determine whether or not any municipalities are prejudiced as a result of the present wording of the clause, and if so the house can deal with it. I doubt if such will be found to be the case. There appears to be no better means of determining the allocation of the amount available than the population standard. My hon. friend will admit that we have given full weight to the demands of the larger urban centres by making the standard not the total population of Canada but the urban population. That of course works in favour of the larger municipalities.

Section agreed to.

Section 19 agreed to.

On section 20—Report as to contracts and loans to be laid before parliament.

Mr. BAKER: In regard to subsection 2, it is quite evident that a certain characteristic of human nature is being overlooked. There is a certain element who will take advantage of the act and who, although they are not eligible, will form a greater percentage of the applicants than will those who are in need of this kind of legislation. For instance, there will be the foreigner who is out to get everything he can get for nothing, the man who has plenty of money coming in or plenty on hand. The weakness I see is that there is not sufficient safeguard against the man who has no right to take advantage of the bill, and against men who in their make-up have a distinct element of meanness and do not deserve to reap the benefits of this kind of legislation.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: We now come to part III of the bill, headed "Assistance to municipalities in respect of low cost housing."

Section 21, paragraphs (a), (b) and (c), agreed to.

On section 21, paragraph (d)—Municipal taxes.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move:

That paragraph (d) of section 21 be amended by inserting after the word "municipality" in line thirty-six, page 12, the words "or other appropriate authority."

This is in consonance with the other sections.

Mr. STEWART: And makes the section consistent with the amendments already made.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph (d) as amended agreed to.

Paragraph (e) agreed to.

Section 21 as amended agreed to.

On section 22—Payment of municipal taxes.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I believe it is the taxation which is creating difficulty so far as housing is concerned. The decrease in the value of construction contracts in Canada has been particularly noticeable in certain years. I have before me construction figures in millions of dollars from the year 1927. They are as follows:

1927	$418,000,000
1929	576,000,000
1930	457,000,000
1931	313,000,000
1932	132,000,000
1933	97,000,000
1934	125,000,000
1935	160,000,000

Hon. members will notice that there was a sharp drop in 1932, and an increase from 1934. In fact there has been a gradual increase since 1933, when the value of contracts reached its lowest point. Unemployment costs are going up and from year to year are adding to the taxation. Many municipalities are behind in the replacement of their equipment, and now we are asking the people of Canada to enter into further private and public debt to the extent of possibly another hundred million dollars. We are giving them the assurance that the government will pay one hundred per cent of the taxes in the first year, fifty per cent in the second year and twenty-five per cent in the third year, but what assurance have we that these people are going to be able to pay their taxes in the fourth year? I believe we would be dealing more equitably with the matter and would be taking action which would be more apt to reduce taxation for all concerned if we were to relieve the municipalities of unemployment costs and the heavy burden of unemployment relief. I am not opposed to giving assistance in the manner indicated in the bill, but I must point out that at the end of four years the people are going to face increased taxation, without any assurance that they will be able to find the money with which to pay it. I would ask the minister to consider some means of reducing taxation in the municipalities other than that of simply paying taxes on a few houses.

Mr. ROGERS: The answer to the hon. member's observations is that the measure does two things: in the first place, it provides for an immediate relief of taxation on new construction of the kind contemplated in this part of the bill. In the second place, it is designed to afford a further stimulus to the construction industry. In other words, it is to provide more employment. The more employment we have the less unemployment and relief we will have to contend with in the municipalities. The intention and hope is that the legislation will attack the problem at two points, namely, immediate relief from taxation for those who build under this part of the bill, and new employment in the construction trades and in general labour, thereby in due course reducing the incidence of unemployment relief in the municipalities.

Mr. LANDERYOU: It would appear that, as Arthur Kitson says, this is like a prison gate which opens only inward. It is just a trap for some people. We encourage them to go ahead and to build so that we may relieve unemployment. But we relieve unemployment only temporarily. Then, back comes the unemployment. At the end of three or four years the taxpayer finds himself with the prison gates closed and no way of escape. He owes money that he will not be able to pay, and the result will be that the government will have the property thrown back on them.

Section agreed to.

On section 23—Conditions for payment.

Mr. ESLING: I know of some municipalities in which there are tax rates of sixty mills, because of which, for the purpose of escaping high taxation, people go outside the corporation limits and build their homes there. Who would be the lending authority in a case of that kind? Who would get the assistance from the federal government? Outside the corporate limits of municipalities we find land owned by the provinces, on which taxes are very low. I can tell of about two hundred families who have done the very thing I have described—that is, they have built or are building their homes outside municipal limits.

Mr. ROGERS: Under this section it would not matter where a house was built, whether it was in a city, town or rural municipality, provided the municipality carried out its part of the understanding set out in section 23. If the hon. member is referring to loans he must have in mind another section of the bill with which the committee has already dealt. No loans are contemplated under part III of the bill.

Mr. ESLING: To whom should such people look if they desire assistance in building low priced homes? We will speak of people who may be employed in industrial plants and who, because of high taxation, do not wish to build within the limits of a city; consequently they go outside the limits where the land is owned by the provincial government. On the other hand they can purchase the land from the provincial government, and it would still remain free from municipal taxation. To whom should such people turn for assistance if they want to take advantage of this measure?

Mr. ROGERS: The problem which my hon. friend has in mind is dealt with by part I of the bill. A person in the circumstances described by my hon. friend would apply to a lending institution for a loan. It is quite true that it has been found from experience that in certain districts these applications for loans under the old Dominion Housing Act were not as successful as in other districts, but amendments have been agreed to by the committee which are designed to correct that situation. Certain guarantees are added and the adoption of the principle of the home improvement plan will in certain districts meet the situation which previously had not been served effectively by the Dominion Housing Act.

Mr. NEILL: The minister was going to look into phases of the low rental scheme to which I referred the last time the bill was before us. It does not seem clear that a loan can be obtained except in municipalities, as the bill states that an option shall be given to the municipality. If there is no municipal authority, that cannot be done.

Mr. BAKER: The point raised by my hon. friend has to do with the unfairness in assessments. I know of hundreds of cases in the city of Toronto along the boundaries where there are substantial variations in the assessment on the same type of houses. On one side of the boundary line a house will be paying taxes of $500, while, within two hundred feet, practically the same house on a lot of the same size will be paying only $200. One lot is vacant and the other occupied because of such inequalities in assessment.

Mr. ROGERS: My understanding of part I of the bill, which deals with low rental projects, is that rural municipalities would be excluded very largely from its operation. Perhaps I should say it would exclude them in effect rather than by the actual terms of the legislation. Low rental housing projects will be carried out in overcrowded areas. One of the purposes of giving this encouragement to low rental housing projects is to make it possible for municipalities to relieve overcrowding and proceed with plans for slum clearance. The problem to be met with by this part of the legislation was the problem of building not in rural municipalities, but rather in crowded urban areas.

Mr. NEILL: The minister does not appreciate the fact that there are places in need of low rental facilities which are not municipalities. There are many settlements greatly in need of this type of accommodation. I was really anxious to have a definite statement. If the minister says that that cannot be done under this legislation, then we know where we are at. One of the conditions is the giving of an option to a municipality, and I do not see why that could not be changed to provide that the option should be given to the municipality or, in the case of unorganized territories, to the provincial government. He must take either one stand or the other. If the minister says it is possible for unorganized territories to obtain loans under this low rental housing legislation, then it behooves him to provide facilities. At the present time the measure is not workable when an option must be given to a municipality where in fact there is no municipality.

Mr. ROGERS: According to section 12, "municipality" means a city, town or incorporated village.

Mr. NEILL: That would not take in many settlements of perhaps five hundred people.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move:

That paragraph (a) of section 23 of the bill be amended by inserting therein after the word "lot" in line 32 on page 13 of the bill, the following words: "or, if the municipality has no power to sell such lots at such price, at not more than the lowest price at which the municipality may sell such lots."

Mr. STEWART: I assume this amendment will make it legal for a municipality to sell a lot, against which it may have a claim for taxes, at a price below the amount of the taxes?

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct.

Mr. CLEAVER: The point raised by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) would arise only at the time of the tax sale. Once a municipality has exercised its right and actually buys in a property for taxes, then under the assessment act it becomes the owner of that land and has a legal right to sell it at any price. The price is not restricted to the amount of arrears of taxes owing originally against the land. It would appear to me that this amendment would tend to vitiate much of the section as originally drafted. This is not an entirely new experiment; it has been done very successfully by the town of Burlington. This town had on hand a number of tax sale lots which were bringing in no revenue and were depressing the value of other lots privately owned. The municipality decided to sell them at a nominal price to anyone who would contract to build a house within a year. As a result of that mild form of bonusing, last year Burlington had the greatest building boom in its history. If it is the intention of this amendment to stipulate that municipalities must charge the total amount of the tax arrears originally owing against the land, then the benefits of the section will be more or less vitiated.

Mr. STEWART: I do not think the effect of this amendment would be to prevent a municipality from selling land for any amount it thought advisable, provided that title had been acquired. The hon. member is quite right in his statement of the law of Ontario, and I can speak only for that province. After title has been acquired by the municipality they can sell at any price they wish.

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps I ought to state that there was an additional reason for this amendment. In the city of Vancouver particularly, a number of lots are being held against the sinking fund. It appeared to be doubly desirable that we should not exclude Vancouver from the benefits of this legislation simply because there was a legal impediment against their carrying out the provisions of this section as originally drafted.

Mr. CLEAVER: I have reread the amendment carefully, and I withdraw my objections.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move:

That paragraph (b) of section 24 of the bill be amended by inserting therein after the word "lot" in line 12 on page 14 of the bill, the following words:

"or, if the municipality has no power to sell such lots at such price, at not more than the lowest price at which the municipality may sell such lots."

Sections 25 to 27 inclusive agreed to.

On section 28—Report to be laid before parliament.

Mr. ROGERS: There is an amendment, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move to amend this section by striking out the word "loans" in line 17 and substituting therefor the word "payments."

Mr. STEWART: It would appear to me that the section should retain the provision with respect to a report on loans. What is the objection to adding the words "and payments"?

Mr. ROGERS: There are no loans under this part.

Mr. STEWART: Then the use of the word "loans" was improper?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, a typographical error.

Mr. PELLETIER: I think every member of the house and all who are interested are desirous of seeing this legislation work to the best advantage. Hon. members will receive a vast number of inquiries from their constituents, and I was wondering if the minister had considered supplying that information in convenient pamphlet form to members of the house and others interested. It would be the only way in which we could disseminate authoritative information on the legislation and inform people how they could take advantage of it. It might cost a little, but assuredly it would help the legislation forward.

Mr. ROGERS: Preliminary arrangements have already been made to have a pamphlet prepared along the lines my hon. friend has indicated. It was done previously with respect to the Dominion Housing Act and the home improvement legislation, and certainly it is very desirable to have it done with respect to this measure.

Mr. PELLETIER: And it will be sent to all the members?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: The Minister of Finance said that that would be done.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. McIVOR: I should like to ask a question for information. Suppose a carpenter or bricklayer, after working eight hours a day at his regular occupation, puts in time in the evening working on his own house. Can he get wages for that extra time?

Mr. ROGERS: Does my hon. friend mean a carpenter building a house for himself under the provisions of this legislation? If so, one of the amendments accepted by the committee this afternoon would meet that situation. Undoubtedly if a carpenter is putting his own labour into the house, full account would be taken of it.

Mr. McIVOR: Thank you.

Bill reported.

BANK OF CANADA

ACQUISITION BY THE GOVERNMENT OF SHARES NOW IN HANDS OF THE PUBLIC

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue, for Mr. Dunning) moved the second reading of Bill No. 160, to amend the Bank of Canada Act.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I might perhaps at this stage state very briefly on behalf of the group with which I am associated that we are very glad indeed to see this legislation brought before the house, and we will do everything we can to facilitate its passage. The Montreal Gazette of May 30 last was good enough to state in its columns that "this is a victory for the C.C.F., which has been urging complete nationalization." It went on to say that it was a triumph of no practical importance.

This measure can be of great practical importance. It depends on how the new Bank of Canada functions and to what extent it is made an instrument of public policy. I should like to think that just as in Sweden, New Zealand and other countries where the central bank is under national ownership and control, the Bank of Canada will play an important part in preventing booms on the upswing and deflationary depressions on the downswing. I believe that a central bank publicly owned and properly operated can do much in these directions.

As we look back over the years it will be found that the group with which I am associated has consistently advocated this reform. As early as May, 1922, for example, Mr. William Irvine, who was then a Labour member of this house, moved for the appointment of a committee to investigate the basis, function and control of financial credit. I read those debates at the time and have read them since, and as the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) suggests, the proposal at that time was met with ridicule.

In 1924 Mr. Robert Gardiner said:

> I think the time is coming when we in Canada will demand that instead of banks being allowed to issue their own notes, they shall have a central bank operated by the government that will be responsible for the issuing of money.

In June, 1925, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) spoke on the nationalization of banking.

In April, 1926, Mr. Gardiner moved:

> That in the opinion of this house the time has come for the establishment of a national system of banking.

In February, 1928, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre moved again for the establishment of a national system of banking.

In 1931 Mr. George Coote moved:

> That a nationally owned central bank be established.

In 1932 Mr. Robert Gardiner moved, as a subamendment to the budget for the nationalization of banking and currency.

In 1934 Mr. Lucas brought the matter forward, and later in the same year Mr. H. E. Spencer moved a budget amendment for the control of credit.

In 1935 Mr. Irvine moved—this was the last resolution on the subject that the U.F.A.—Labour group moved:

> That all banking, including the central bank, be nationalized at once.

Coming down to 1936 we of this Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group fathered a similar resolution.

Mr. REID: So did ours.

Mr. COLDWELL: I mention these facts because sometimes we and those associated with us are accused of advocating reforms and policies that are impossible of enactment or achievement, and yet over a period of years we often find that those policies which were met with ridicule at the beginning are found to be in the public interest as time goes on and find their place ultimately on the statute books of Canada.

To my mind this reform, for reform it is, and useful as it is, is not going to be found to be quite sufficient. We who have been advocating that the chartered banks of Canada should be brought under greater public control believe that this will ultimately take place. I realize of course that public opinion has to be moulded in order that such reforms may come about, and we shall not cease the educational work we are doing in relation to these matters until the commercial banks are brought under public control and public ownership as well; for, after all, the responsibility for directing most of the country's short term credit rests with the chartered or commercial banks. Their credit policy, as has been stated before, accentuates booms and depressions by easing credit during periods of prosperity and tightening it during periods of depression or deflation. Not only that, but I believe that their position at the present time tends towards the creation of monopolies of which banking is one. The fact that we have now a central bank which is going to be publicly owned and controlled is the bringing of one type of monopoly under public supervision, public control and, to some extent, public ownership. The chartered banks themselves through their interlocking directorates are very largely a part of the monopolistic set up of industry, and that is a matter which, if we are to make this central bank function, we shall have to consider very carefully in the days to come.

As I have so often said, I do not believe that the mere control of banking is the panacea which is going to cure all our economic and social ills. It is only one phase of a many sided problem. But I welcome this reform because it does bring nearer the time when we should be able to bring under control those economic forces which ultimately must minister to the common good. As I said in the debate on the budget, I believe that this reform should be paralleled as quickly as possible by the setting up of a national investment board. A national securities board was recommended following the price spreads inquiry, and a comprehensive national securities board would do much to direct investments into safe and proper channels.

Just a few minutes ago we were discussing a bill to promote low-cost housing. That has been necessary largely because private enterprise has not entered into the field of low-cost housing, because of the risks and because the profits were not large enough. We have to find money for enterprises of that description. I believe that, with a nationally owned bank and a national securities board or investment board directing, first, the savings of the people, and, ultimately, the financial returns from all our own national industries and economic undertakings, we could do much to bring about improvements in housing and in the general conditions of the people.

This is near the close of the session. I do not wish to make a long speech. All I rose to do was to say that we are in approval of this legislation, which we have long advocated, and we hope that as the days go by the operations of this bank will be in the interests of Canada. It can be, as the Montreal Gazette said, of no consequence, or it can be of paramount importance to the people. That is very largely in the hands of the government and of this parliament. We wish to see the central bank operated, as central banks have been operated in New Zealand and Sweden, in accordance with the needs of the nation, for both the producers and the consumers. Thus we hope that the national bank will perform a great service to this dominion in the days to come.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): It was not my intention to speak at this time; but as the hon. member who has just resumed his seat has taken credit to the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party, to which he belongs, for the fact of the central bank becoming a government owned national central bank, I for one am going to dispute that statement. I was not in the house when the Old Age Pensions Act was passed, but I know that his party made great political capital out of the assertion that members of that party were the means, so it was stated, of bringing about old age pensions.

Mr. COLDWELL: I think that is true.

Mr. REID: I dispute the statement of the hon. member that the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party brought about government ownership of the central bank. A larger number of members of the Liberal party than all who comprise the hon. member's party have long advocated this reform. The hon. member's statement is not correct; it is just a political speech.

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I wish to make only a few remarks about this measure. Many spokesmen of the party represented by the group to our right, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation, have been carrying on for the past two or three years a campaign of misrepresentation regarding the attitude of our group on this question. For instance, they have repeatedly stated that we voted against the nationalization of the Bank of Canada. Of course that is an absolute misstatement of fact. This is the first time a motion has been brought into parliament for this purpose. A motion was formerly brought in to give parliament greater powers of control, and we as a group voted solidly for that motion. On the other hand these speakers have stated that when a motion was introduced by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) to nationalize the Bank of Canada and the private banks of the country, we as a group voted against that motion. That statement is also an absolute misstatement of fact.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) is not stating the fact. We have stated and do state that they officially spoke against the introduction of that motion. That, I think, is substantiated in Hansard.

Mr. QUELCH: I was referring to speakers of the party. I do not necessarily say it was said by members of this house. I said that these speakers have stressed the fact time and again throughout the country that we as a group voted against a motion which was introduced by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar for the purpose of nationalizing the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks. There is no truth in that statement. We did not vote against that motion. A recorded vote was never taken. Moreover, had a recorded vote been taken, a very large majority of the members of this group would have voted in favour of that motion. We have stressed over and over again that we do not regard nationalization as a question of major importance. What we regard as the most important point is the effective control of policy. We believe that the present policy of the banking system should be changed, because under the existing policy the amount of money in circulation does not necessarily have any relationship to the requirements of the people. We desire a change to be brought about so that money shall be put into circulation to make the present physical demand of the people an effective demand against the production of the country.

What is the main purpose of this motion? Public ownership of the Bank of Canada just to save interest on one hundred thousand class A shares? That is desirable, but it does not really mean very much. On the other hand, was the resolution introduced chiefly to help out with the Saskatchewan election? It is strange that it was introduced about that time; it is strange that there was no notice of it in the speech from the throne. It is interesting to note the attitude on this question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in 1936. As recorded in Hansard at page 3808, he stated as follows:

> . . . and I repeat it now: I think the question of ownership is debatable, for reasons which appear in what I have said repeatedly in this house. I do not think the question of effective control is debatable. I think if you have effective public control it matters relatively little where the ownership rests, but if you have not effective public control then ownership in full may be desirable should it prove to be the only way to acquire it.

I would agree with that. The Prime Minister did not think ownership was absolutely essential. Why a change now? Is he convinced that we have not effective control? And if the Prime Minister is convinced that we have not, does he think for one minute that this measure will provide it? He said:

> . . . ownership in full may be desirable should it prove to be the only way to acquire it.

And yet the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), speaking on February 28, 1938, as recorded in Hansard at page 891, stated:

> . . . this parliament through instruments which it has created and which are now in operation does control currency and credit in Canada day by day, week by week and month by month.

That statement is definite. Then why this amendment? The Prime Minister said that ownership would be necessary only if control could not be acquired otherwise. It is interesting to note that shortly after that date the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), speaking in Edmonton in the Edmonton East by-election, said on March 16:

> "There are cries on all sides to change the banking system," said Mr. Gardiner. "Changes are being made, and I say the time cannot come too soon for me when the government has control over credit and currency in this country. I mean control entirely in the hands of the government of Canada. If no other party interferes with present legislation passed by the Liberal government, such control will be in effect in 1945."

The Minister of Finance, speaking on February 28, said that we had control; the Minister of Agriculture, speaking in Edmonton on March 16, said that we would not have it until 1945. There appears to be a great deal of confusion in the minds of members of the cabinet as to exactly what control means and whether or not this government has control.

An hon. MEMBER: They are learning.

Mr. QUELCH: They may be learning, but I say that this government has absolutely no control over the issue of currency and credit, and this amendment will not give it.

An hon. MEMBER: Vote against it.

Mr. QUELCH: We are not going to vote against it; we will support it as a very small step in the right direction. I shall refer to that later on. It is interesting to note that while the Minister of Finance on February 28 said that we had control, nevertheless in his speech on March 8 he shows quite clearly that we have no effective control over the issue of currency and credit. Let me quote his words:

> Mr. Dunning: . . . We come back, then, to the question whether the present volume of currency and credit in circulation in Canada is adequate for the needs of business and whether a further increase would be beneficial. It must first be understood that an increase in Bank of Canada note issue does not mean more notes in the hands or pockets of the public. Whatever medium be used for issuing the new currency or credit, such as the proposed one of financing the construction of public works, the central bank's notes would be immediately deposited with the chartered banks. An increase of, say $350,000,000 in chartered bank holdings of Bank of Canada notes would increase their cash reserves from the present figure of about $250,000,000 to $600,000,000, and their cash ratio from about ten per cent to roughly twenty-one per cent.
> The sponsor of the suggestion contends that no inflation is intended or would result by thus increasing bank cash, so long as the gold cover of the Bank of Canada did not fall below the twenty-five per cent minimum. This factor, however, is not a test of inflation. If the banks use their increased cash in the normal way, as a basis for the extension of roughly ten times as much in loans to the public, or for the acquisition of ten times as much in investments, bank deposits would expand by approximately an equal amount until the cash ratio was brought down again to approximately ten per cent. This would mean an increase in bank deposits from the present level of about $2,387,000,000 to something like $6,000,000,000, or more than 2·6 times the level of December 31, 1929. Am I merely old fashioned or orthodox when I say that this would mean a colossal measure of inflation?

Let us suppose that the increase in the amount of money adequately to meet the needs of business is $350,000,000. Then, as the minister points out, there will be the danger that the chartered banks may expand this to $3,500,000,000, thereby causing inflation. They may not do so, but on the other hand they may. How, then, can the minister possibly claim that we have effective control? As I pointed out on March 14, the kind of control that we have at the present time is similar to the sort of control that we might have over a high-powered car with a defective steering gear. It would be absolutely impossible to hold it on a given course because the reaction to any turn of the wheel might be exaggerated.

This amendment does not increase control, and therefore I urge that the Bank Act be amended so as to compel the chartered banks to maintain 100 per cent cash reserve against checking deposits. This reserve might be made available by the government through the national bank purchasing from the chartered banks a sufficient quantity of government securities to provide that backing. Then the chartered banks henceforth would be compelled to maintain permanently a cash reserve of 100 per cent against their demand deposits. The result would be a great reduction in the national debt followed by a reduction in taxation. The Minister of Finance speaking some time ago said, I believe, that 43 per cent of all taxation went towards the payment of interest. The result would be 100 per cent control over the issue of currency and credit. The amount of money required in circulation would be decided by the Bank of Canada and so regulated. Money required for public works would be issued by the Bank of Canada without danger of inflationary action on the part of the chartered banks.

This proposal has been endorsed by prominent men who have made an exhaustive study of the question of money such as Professor Irving Fisher, Professor Soddy, and Robert Hemphil, former credit manager of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta, and many eminent bankers throughout the United States. On the other hand it has been said that the banks could not operate on this basis because it would mean a great curtailment of their profits. But, as has been pointed out on former occasions in this house, the profits of the banks at the present time are excessive, and their expenditures on many lines are extravagant. When we consider the tremendous privileges the chartered banks enjoy, I would say that they are not rendering to the people the service they have a right to demand. I have in mind the closing of many branches throughout western Canada in the past nine or ten years, and more recently one might describe their action as being tantamount to blackmail; for they have been using their power to compel or persuade the people to demand from the government that certain legislation shall be annulled under the threat that if such action is not taken they will close certain branches in Alberta. The hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) the other day gave a good talk on this matter, pointing out that the banks were trying to exercise a form of dictatorship. I do not think such a condition is desirable in a so-called democratic country. So I would say that if the chartered banks refuse to cooperate on that basis, the whole banking system should be nationalized.

There are many other things one might discuss, but as we are trying to finish the session by the end of the month I shall merely say that in our opinion the main monetary policy of this government should be to put in the hands of the people sufficient money to make the present physical demand of the people into an effective demand against the production of the country, and as that production increases, to see that the ability of the people to procure that production shall be increased in like degree. While we in this corner intend to support the motion as a step in the right direction, we point out that it is absolutely valueless for the purpose of giving the government effective control over the issue of currency and credit.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I propose to deal with the matter of credit from the point of view of present and future possibilities of the Bank of Canada. In the material world all keeping of life's accounts is by double entry bookkeeping. Wherever there is a credit a debit appears; on the other hand, where there is a debit a credit will be found per contra. It is only in the spiritual world that pure creation is said to take place, and while I may be disposed to adjust and modify that statement to my own experience and intellectual and spiritual development, I believe I can use the first declaration as my textual basis for dealing with the whole question of credit.

Our friends the social credit members have established to their own satisfaction the belief that banks create credit. They go further, and bring to their support many students of finance and economics who hold the same view, and who—even the eminent of them—go so far as to declare that the bankers loan ten of credit for one of cash holdings. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) quoted from a report of the London chamber of commerce of July, 1932, to this effect, vide Hansard of March 8, 1938, page 1121. This statement shows its error on the face of it. The report says:

> At the present time the banks are working to a ratio of 10 per cent cash of their total deposits—i.e., they are lending ten credit pounds for every one pound cash holding.

If they are working to a ratio of 10 per cent cash to their total deposits, then they must have only 90 per cent of the initial deposit of cash to lend. If each deposit is supported on 10 per cent till money, theoretically only nine credit pounds can be lent for every pound of cash. Have I made this clear? It appears to me incontrovertible; I continually marvel that this credit illusion gains so much credence, and I marvel in spite of Lord Macmillan; in spite of the hon. Minister of Finance; in spite of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), and still more in spite of the hon. social credit members.

Further, I advance the statement that the theory even in its adjusted form of nine to one is merely a theory, and brings no support to the actual practice of this development of banking. It must be quite apparent that credits are absolutely dependent on deposits. It must also be quite apparent that credit when "created" so-called is represented in the form of loans, and that in the practical outcome the total of loans must be restrained to run with and not in advance of the total of deposit funds. It must also be quite apparent even to any hon. member who has not attempted to understand banking practice, that when loans are granted the rate of dissipation of the loan money is faster than the rate of dissipation of all deposit accounts developed as a result of savings or as a result of the maintenance of commercial reserves by business houses and institutions. Obviously, then, 10 per cent as till money may not be enough for a purely loan structure, and rapid dissipation will compel a more liquid condition of the very loans themselves.

Believing that I have properly presented the situation existing, I make this emphatic declaration, that as long as it is found necessary to retain 10 per cent of any deposit as till money it will be found practically impossible to create credit on a more generous basis than even $5 for every $1 of cash held, allowing for all commercial involutions developing as a result therefrom. It must not be forgotten that bankers' credit is not created out of nothing. As I said at the opening of my speech, the material world knows nothing of pure creation. Bankers' credit is, by the use of a natural law, merely an extension along the third and fourth dimension of relationships already established in the first and second. The banker debits himself with cash deposited and credits the customer on current or other deposit account. These, for purposes of illustration, I call the first and second dimensions. With an empiric understanding of the normal actions of cash, when once the banker has it in his possession he builds a profitable business of loaning, receives the security of a promissory note, guarantee or hypothecation along the third dimension, and credits his new deposit account with the proceeds, or in effect extends his business along the fourth dimension. If the first and second are non-existent, the third and fourth cannot be created.

All this is equally true of the operations of the central bank, a most excellent countervailing influence in the business of the country. Of course in all this I believe I am indisputably correct, and believing this I knock the first prop from under the arguments which have supported the theories of social credit members in this chamber. However, one swallow does not prove the summer, and one prop less is not sufficient to bring about the downfall of all the arguments of my social credit friends. Nevertheless let it be kept in mind that bankers' credit has very definite limits, as to both extent and time.

What is recommended by my hon. friends? Roughly this, that irrecoverable amounts should be paid over to all citizens to enable them to purchase those things which they have assisted to produce and of which they have been deprived. Reference of this formula to the hon. member for Lethbridge brought out just one change; therefore I shall not hesitate to make the necessary alteration so that I may not fail properly to interpret their aims. Roughly, therefore, they say that non-repayable amounts should be paid over to all citizens to enable them to purchase those things which they have assisted to produce and of which they are to-day being deprived. If this formula be correct, then my social credit friends are entirely wrong in using bankers' credit as an argument to support their contention, as the hon. member for Lethbridge declared in his speech on March 8, 1938, as reported at page 1121 of Hansard, when he said:

> Where does money come from? The contention of the whole social credit movement is that the banker creates that money as he lends it to you.

I hope I have definitely made clear that bankers' credit is not created out of nothing, and that unless the law of chance is permitted to operate on the cash placed in the bank by a savings depositor, no money dare be created, and no loans dare be granted. Surely I do not have to labour that point.

If my declaration is accepted, I shall pass on to another implication in the formula enunciated by me and accepted by the hon. member for Lethbridge. It is this, that unless profits can be developed out of industry, dividends social or otherwise cannot be declared. I state this to be the unequivocal truth, not only for the capitalist economy, but for the more modern neo-capitalist economy, for the socialist economy, and for any economy at all that aims to deal with our national housekeeping. This will provide contentious material for the Marxian socialist, equally as it does for the social crediter.

Let me beg a very simple illustration. Assume that all our capital was used for the purchase of seed wheat, and that all our labour was devoted to the preparation and cultivation of the ground, and seeding in and harrowing down of all our seed wheat. Assume next that a catastrophic condition destroyed our farm land and ruined our crop so that not only did we fail to get the expected natural increase, but we did not recover even the equivalent of our original sowing. What, then, is our position? Neither capitalism nor socialism nor social credit nor any other economy will save us unless we are able to consume the profits of the preceding fat years, unless we have the stored up profits of accounting to fall back upon. Of course it is a childishly simply illustration; but it establishes my point, that unless more comes out of a productive system than goes in to it, we fall behind. And if that falling behind continues, we ultimately lose our identity in the struggle. There will be no dividends to divide or no social credit to create.

Of course my hon. friends will say that I have chosen an absurd illustration; that their theory applies to the world as a going concern, and that the case I have advanced can have no support in experience. All right then; I shall gladly grant for the sake of argument that in giving the non-repayable dividends to the citizens our social credit friends are introducing their system to an already functioning economy. Nevertheless, unless there is a strict accounting, unless there is a quid pro quo, unless there are to be tangible profits arising out of the functioning of the economy, chaos will ultimately if not immediately result.

But there is something else I desire to draw to my hon. friends' attention. The introduction of social credit to our present functioning economy altogether unprepared for it would promptly develop serious results. The explanation involves a big story, which I do not intend to give, but I can open it out and leave the details to the imaginations of hon. members. There is a system, albeit a bastard one, of social credit, already at work within our economy. It constitutes the whole structure of the wages of money. For example, a light and power company is producing electricity and can sell it at a price much less than is now being paid. But a large section of the citizens of the country are already, in consideration of money introduced, receiving all or nearly all of the social credit which it is possible for that particular light and power company to contribute; and, therefore, the destruction of its capital structure must be insisted upon, or it must be left out of the social credit plan for the country. This is most serious; for practically all businesses and all industries are wedded to this admittedly bastard form of social credit, and the dividends already being distributed to the citizens of the country leave no profits on which the social credit of my hon. friends may be based.

It is no lessening of the force of this argument to observe that the idea that the social credits of which I have spoken are raggedly and quite unfairly distributed to the citizens, and the instances are not few which demonstrate that the actual worker is robbed of his wages to support this peculiar social credit structure.

Upon the unquestioned force of this argument I declare that the social credit of the hon. members cannot possibly be imposed upon the present economy, not only because there is no place for it that is not already filled, but because of its very nature, if it is to be conceived of as a purely concocted panacea of the economic ills which flesh is heir to. Every citizen who can produce, every citizen who would produce if opportunity afforded and every citizen who is accepted by the citizenry as a non-producer, whether by grace or by reason of personal incompetence or incapacity—and these categories are intended to include the whole of the citizenry—are fully entitled to the benefit of a pure social credit. It can only be developed, however, in those fields of our economic activity where the profits of production are developed for the benefit of the whole citizenry. This represents pro tanto the advantages of a socialist economy, and I therefore assert that only in some form of socialism in our economy can we look for social credit to function properly.

I am prepared at this stage of my review of the situation to declare that the irresistible forces of our civilization are driving us rapidly into a form of national economy which will grant first one and then another of our productive and distributive functions for the unrestricted benefit of the citizens as a whole. Only in such cases can social credit ever be adequately established, and by the same token only in such cases can socialism ever become available to advance the condition of our people.

And this will be true just as certainly if, unhappily, civil revolution be invoked to bring it about; for revolution in itself can and will accomplish nothing. It is what is built on the ruins of a revolution which will determine the future of the unlucky people who have to pass through it. And, too, often in such case the reconstruction of society proceeds haltingly because of the irrevocable and irrecoverable loss of those elements of government which, by virtue of their essential worth, constituted the cementing properties of the government now overthrown, while of necessity new cementing elements will take a long time to accrete, and thus properly to perform their function.

It may still be advanced that I have not yet fully covered the phase of the problem developed by the social credit formula which proposes to introduce to our economy non-repayable sums at the free disposal of every citizen. I am urging that in effect all I have said covers this matter. But let me observe that the whole financial system of the country in its multifarious ramifications always adjusts itself and seeks its own level, and does so by the age-old governing rule of debit and credit. It is tied definitely at the one end to the consumer, and at the other end to the producer. The social credit formula now introduces a medium of exchange which is tied only at the producer end and which leaves the consumer end floating free. It is through or by this free floating end that the non-repayable dividend created out of nothing by the social credit government will flow into the otherwise balanced, though admittedly badly adjusted, economy. This will create a condition never before practised, and it must be studied with great care.

For our study we can think of the $25 per month proposed to be given as social credit to every citizen of Alberta. Of course we must admit and agree that, when given, that sum must, either at the outset or later, be related definitely and scientifically to the spread between the cost of production and the ability to purchase within that province. In effect each Alberta citizen is made, by the free flowing ink of the pen of a ready writer, richer by $300 per annum. Let us sense the repercussions. First, of course the spread between the cost of production and the price of purchase will vary considerably with every product. Second, of course the citizens will be neither constant nor consistent in their unrestricted choice of the products purchased. Therefore, I unhesitatingly declare that it will be practically impossible to equate these inconstant elements. No arbitrary monthly payment of money to citizen purchasers will in itself justify or equate a scientifically ascertained just price for the above cogent reasons. However, my social credit friends may believe the plan to be really practical; I do not.

I describe given money and non-repayable dividends as being inferior to earned money and, therefore, liable to the vagaries of inferior money in a financial system, in spite of the fact that in use it will be undiscoverable from the ordinary money of the economy. I assert that there is grave danger to an existing financial structure in padding it with an inferior currency. All hon. members will sense the concern with which the manufacturer will view the new situation presented by a supposedly easy market for his products when he remembers how he pared down his cost of production and profit margins in order to satisfy the market before the new credit was introduced. All hon. members will sense the chagrin of workers who accepted lower wages to help their employers meet the competitive market when they discover the products on which they worked entering an easy market. The inevitable result in both cases will be a definite readjustment of prices until an equitable condition obtains for worker and manufacturer alike. This equitable condition will not be reached without a very much increased distribution of so-called dividends.

There is another highly important problem. Hon. members know that the $25 per month will represent pin-money to one citizen, while to another it will represent almost an adequate living allowance. And so we beat the devil around the stump, and we turn to the arguments first cited for this problem. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard is so earnest in his efforts to awaken the people and the government to the advantages of both to be discovered in the newer financial economy that I dislike finding myself in disagreement with him. However, I am unable to travel with him in his statements as recorded on page 4197, column 1, paragraph 2, of Hansard, for the following reasons. If an individual banking institution finds to-day that it requires 10 per cent of its total deposits as till money for the safe and reasonable conduct of its business, no legislation of the government can change the bank's empiric findings. The Bank of Canada, however, by virtue of section 27 of the Bank of Canada Act, 1934, and also subsection 4 of section 59 of the Bank Act, 1934, has assumed the guardianship and sufficiency of till moneys and demands that 5 per cent of all deposit liabilities shall be in either a Bank of Canada deposit account or in Bank of Canada notes, which means that the said 5 per cent must be in such liquid condition as the Bank of Canada might be legally accountable, answerable and responsible for. A reference to the liquid reserves with which the chartered banks can conduct their business would reveal the fallacy that they build up $100 of loan deposits from $5 of Bank of Canada notes.

Further, a close study of section 26 of the Bank of Canada Act, 1934, will reveal the dangers attending any banking practice which would avail of all the legal limits assigned to it. There is an interesting point in the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, as reported in Hansard at page 4068, column 1, paragraph 2. This reads:

> . . . but I do commend to the Prime Minister and his government serious and fair consideration of my statement to-night that the major weapons of control, by which we were told the government through the Bank of Canada would regulate the volume of currency and credit in the interests of the economic life of the nation, are not effective; because I am satisfied that the majority of the members of the government will not permit that statement to go unchallenged, if my conclusions, from the facts I have analysed to-night, are justified and correct.

On this I make vigorously this important observation. The legally established functions of the Bank of Canada do appear to have strengthened the financial structure of the country to resist the destructive force of an impending recession. But the other side of the picture is not equally clear. The ability of the central bank to place large funds at the disposal of the banks does not necessarily bring about a stimulus to flagging business or flagging industry. Economists of every kind will have to learn that in our present economy of practical plenty the stimulus will have to be applied to the individual citizen. Stimulate the individual who wants something which his country has made it possible for him to obtain, and we shall hear no more of the frustrations of poverty; we shall hear no more of unemployment; we shall begin to make of our country the glorious dwelling place it is capable of becoming.

Pierpont Morgan, the banker, told the commission which inquired into the conditions surrounding the collapse of 1929 that he would not hesitate to loan $5,000 to any man whom he believed honest and capable, without consideration of security. In essence this is done frequently by bankers. I submit that this leads us logically in the direction of economic security for our people, and points the way by which it can be developed. While absence of sufficient money will bring about a recession of business, a pentitude of it in the hands of bankers or the central bank will not act per contra. If every citizen in Canada were rich but miserly, our business would be relatively small; nevertheless, if every citizen in Canada were poor, but could be persuaded that his social security was being established and guaranteed by the government, his economic wants could be gradually built up until he reached a more just and reasonable distribution of the productive and distributive capacity of our wonderful country.

What, then, is my aim and to what end should we mould the legal functions of the Bank of Canada? The essentials of life in this or any country are food, shelter and clothing.

There is in Canada an average wage. This average wage represents the general standard of achievement of our citizens. Of this average wage, food, shelter and clothing each demand a definite percentage which varies only fractionally within well-defined limits. These are the pegs upon which we can hang the social security of our people.

For this reason I say that it is now possible to extend the operations of our banking system through the functions of the Bank of Canada, widened for that purpose, so as to provide a series of automatically recurring credits to every citizen of our country, which credits shall become loans as they are availed of and only for the amount availed of. Every such loan will be repayable to the country in one form or another, and, what is most important, such credits and loans will be related to and used only for one branch of our economic necessities at a time until it has justified its existence and completely proven its practicability.

In this manner, by an internal currency, can we quickly bring to everyone according to his need, and demand from everyone his share. Employment will increase at once. Initiative will in no sense be destroyed, and, as I have said, an economic standard can be automatically raised in scientific adjustment to the material development of the country.

Such credits introduced gradually and scientifically will differ altogether from the Aberhart and Douglas conceptions, and will be freed basically from the faults already elaborated.

It will revolutionize the present system, not by overthrowing it but by bringing to it a commercial understanding which recognizes its essential values and the complexities of its structure, and it will be definitely co-ordinated to it.

It will be tied at both ends—tied to the producer and tied to the consumer alike—and will carry the unquestioned and inescapable responsibility of a repayable loan.

It will be accepted freely by all honest citizens, and the dishonest ones will very quickly learn their lesson when deprived of its blessings. All this lies within the possible use to which we can bring our Bank of Canada, and I say this after much thought and after study of the trend of financial and industrial thought and practice everywhere. When the opportunity occurs in which I may extend my observations along this line, it will be with a developed plan, the outcome of much careful study and preparation.

No one can boast happily of his country unless he has himself enabled it to be and to become the provider of adequate and continuous sustenance to every citizen, male or female, adult or of tender years—unless he has assisted to bring to his people a secure existence in the midst of its plenty.

Finally, creation is an unhappy word to use to explain the physical functions of banking or credit or any other expression of our economy. Unless we produce and distribute at a profit by human effort, we must produce and distribute at a loss, and that way lie inefficiency, chaos and despair, notwithstanding all the claims of orthodox socialists for the elimination of the price system. It will eliminate itself when the right time and the right social conditions come together, and we have it in our power to make the Bank of Canada speed that happy day.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a very great pity that the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor) chose this time, when we are all anxious to close this session, to precipitate a discussion on the principles of social credit after he has sat here for five months during almost every day of which he might have debated the matter.

I am going to present my case straightforwardly to the house and to those who read Hansard. We do not wish to protract this session, and consequently are not at this time going to go into a discussion of the details of social credit, but if the hon. member will bring his ideas up next session we shall deal with them until there will not be powder left of them.

I am just going to read three or four quotations which need to go into Hansard because they are vital, and then I shall turn for a very brief period to a discussion of the Bank of Canada.

The other day the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) gave a quotation which I am going to read into Hansard again because of its bearing on what the hon. member for Nanaimo has said. It is this:

> The first important thing to bear in mind is this, that money can be created.

The chief reason why the social crediters have used the banks as an illustration of the creation of money is simply to show that this can be done.

I am going to read now the quotation from John Maynard Keynes as given the other day on page 4194 of Hansard by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. If the hon. member for Nanaimo wishes to question Mr. Keynes on this matter, he is at liberty to do so. Mr. Keynes said:

> The creation of legal tender has been and is a government's ultimate reserve; and no state is likely to decree its own bankruptcy or its own downfall so long as this instrument remains at hand unused.
> Thus we accept Mr. McKenna's contention that an expansion of credit is the key to the situation. But we conclude that if whilst an increased volume of bank credits is probably a sine qua non of increased employment, a program of home investment which will absorb this increase is a sine qua non of the same expansion of credit.

All I wish to say this afternoon in the contribution I desire to make to this debate is included in that statement. All one has to do is to enlarge upon it. Again, as reported at page 4195 of Hansard the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard gave this quotation from the Right Hon. Mr. McKenna's report to his bank:

> The quantity of our money is no longer governed by the fortuitous supply of gold and the degree to which hoarding is practised by central banks and others. The quantity of money is subject now to pure management with first regards to the needs of commerce and industry.

That again expresses the whole contention of the monetary reformers and the whole contention of the social credit movement, because it is a movement of monetary reformers.

Again, as reported on the same page of Hansard, the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard quoted from the London Economist of May 21, 1938:

> There are distinct signs that the policy of cheap plentiful credit—

The hon. member for Nanaimo will notice that the word "credit" is used there.

> —is being continued and intensified so as to combat the recession, and also so as to facilitate the financing of rearmament.

May I break in there to point out that if credit is sufficiently sound money to finance rearmament, it will finance dividends at any time.

Mr. BENNETT: That means that the Bank of England discount rate is kept low so that the joint stock banks have ample credit facilities—cheap credit.

Mr. McGEER: It does not mean that at all.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The quotation from the London Economist continued:

> Such a deduction is not at variance with the occasional reaffirmations of monetary policy which from time to time have emerged from official quarters.

I am going to read again from an address by the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna on January 29, 1936, in the following words:

> We learned that a shortage of money may be just as vicious in its effects as an excess. It is becoming more and more widely recognized that greater productivity calls for an increased supply of money, for otherwise prices will fall, business will stagnate, and the growing productive capacity will be unused. For money to be thoroughly sound, there must be enough of it to finance an ordinary growing volume of trade, yet not so much as to give rise to an inflationary movement of prices.

The whole social credit idea is involved in that statement. Let me draw attention particularly to these words:

> It is becoming more and more widely recognized that greater productivity calls for an increased supply of money.

Too frequently men lose sight of the fact that we are in an age of abundance in which we are producing more goods than we are now able to sell, and in which we are capable of producing many more goods than we are now producing. Consequently, it is abundantly manifest that our productivity has increased. The social credit contention is that at the present time there is no adequate device, no adequate government control, by means of which that increase of money is made which is necessary as a result of the increased productivity; and even if the amount of money is increased, there exists at the present time no means whereby that money can be put into circulation in such a way as to enable the people who need the goods to buy the goods; consequently, to enable the people who have the goods for sale, to sell the goods. When the hon. member for Nanaimo or any other man in Canada thinks he can argue that away, he is welcome to try it next session.

It is extremely necessary that I should not take very much time, and I am going to leave that, letting anyone who wishes to read it, do so. I am going to give another extract, from an article in the London Times of January 30, 1936, by the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, at page 23:

> Additional currency, however, can now be furnished by the authorities, if they choose to exercise their powers, without reference to the central bank's holdings of gold. Thus the nineteenth century, which brought into general use a means of payment hitherto scarcely known outside London, . . .

He is manifestly referring there to credit.

> . . . brought also the machinery whereby it could be subjected to intelligent control.

The chief contention, apparently, which the hon. member for Nanaimo was making was that social crediters were running along unsound lines in contending that governments can create money and that the amount of money they can create depends upon the country's productivity. That quotation strongly supports our case. After you have created money, it is simply a matter of deciding how you are going to use it.

May I now turn to a consideration of the bill? The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) has expressed our opinion as a group. We are going to support this measure, but our views in large measure agree with those recently expressed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). Unless this Bank of Canada is correctly used, it is not going to do us the good that we hope it will do. Those people who have persuaded themselves that the mere ownership of the bank by the dominion government is going to solve their ills, are labouring under a delusion. Consequently it becomes extremely necessary to point this out at this stage. This bill is a step in the right direction, so we are going to support it.

May I hasten to say that we have no means of determining what the government are going to do with this bank. I assume they are going to use it wisely. I have no doubt about that; so I am not applying any criticism; I am merely pointing out the reason why I intend to support this measure.

There are two functions formerly performed by private persons which, on account of the rapid oncoming of the age of plenty, they are no longer disposed to undertake. The government, therefore, if disaster is to be avoided, must be prepared to supplement both of these functions. The first is that of capital being invested in new concerns, factories and the like. Since 1929 capital has literally gone on strike; it appears no longer available or free to invest in new enterprises to produce goods. The banks would seem increasingly indisposed to lend money for those purposes. The other day, while we were quietly discussing this matter, I asked a man this question, "If you were a banker, would you lend money to go into sheep?" "Why," he said, "I should say not." I said, "Why would you not?" He stopped and thought about it for quite a little while. I intended he should. "Now," I said to him, "I am going to turn right around and ask you this question: "If you were a shrewd, intelligent farmer, would you borrow money with which to go into sheep?" He thought a very few minutes and finally said, "I do not think I would." "Now," I said, "will you tell me why, in both cases? And when you get done telling me why, you will be ready to consider the proposals which I have." I will state briefly what we arrived at after about fifteen minutes. "Well," he said, "if I were a banker I would not lend money because I would be afraid I would not be able to get it back." I said, "Why?" "Because," he said, "the farmer would not be able to sell his goods." "Very well," I said, "your trouble is selling your goods. And that is the reason why the farmer will not take the money. Then your difficulty is concentrated on the question of consumption."

We can talk all we like about "confidence." President Roosevelt, I am told, spent a good deal of time the other night talking about it. People say it is because a certain government is not in; it is because of this, that and the other, that confidence is lacking. As long as they continue to have that idea, they will labour under a delusion, because the reason for the lack of confidence is that men fear they cannot sell. Capital, I say, has gone on a sort of sit-down strike since 1929. May I cite some figures which I found the other day in a most interesting bank letter? In the United States the figures of new corporate financing of late years are as follows:

Year	Amount
1928	$5,500,000,000
1929	8,000,000,000
1933	180,000,000
1935	400,000,000
1936	1,200,000,000

Many people tried in 1937 to persuade themselves that we were back to the 1929 level. All we need to do is just glance at the two figures. In 1929 United States business men invested $8,000,000,000 in new corporate financing. In 1937 they invested $1,500,000,000.

What we ask is this: What is the matter? Well, it is abundantly clear, is it not, that capital has gone on strike? The question for us to determine, therefore, is why and how we can overcome the difficulty. That very small figure in 1937 is the more striking when we remember that during all the years of the depression there has been insufficient expenditure of capital in new corporate financing. The result has been that there must have developed a distinct deficiency in capital production, a distinct lack of factories; notwithstanding that stimulus, however, there is no tendency whatever to pick that up by anything like an adequate expenditure. There is no tendency to make up the loss. How is that loss to be made up? That is the problem which faces the United States, and it faces Canada and, indeed, all the civilized nations of the world.

We do not need to argue about if's and but's, about the A plus B theorem or anything of that sort. There are the facts and they must be faced. What did the United States do to make up the loss? There are many people who are finding fault with Mr. Roosevelt's extravagant spending program, but these people never for a moment undertake to show how he could solve the problem without that spending. They do not realize that unless he can get that money without borrowing, then his nation is doomed, but they cannot see how he can get along without spending money. Social credit puts its finger on that problem. It says: There is your problem; you simply must have money, and if you cannot get it without borrowing or without taxation, then you might as well close up and get ready for your funeral, because it is coming and no amount of sneering or levity will dispose of the situation.

When, therefore, people say that we are not keeping our eyes on reality they are simply deceiving themselves; that is all. In 1932 in the United States the government went into debt about $3,000,000,000 distributing the money in every direction, in relief, and for every kind of project which would enable them to put the money out so that people could buy goods that industry wanted to produce and sell. Every year from that time forward until 1936 they spent a similar amount. In 1936 they spent $4,400,000,000, with the soldiers' bonus, and the money was expended in their WPA and CCC projects and in a great many other ways, all designed to put money right into the hands of the needy people in order that goods might be sold to the greatest advantage. Anyone can see in that program a dividend, though a very crude sort of dividend. It is not scientific at all, but it is there. In 1937 they cut down this $4,400,000,000 to about $1,500,000,000, apparently because in the United States uninformed people behind Roosevelt began to clamour so vociferously for retrenchment, the balancing of the budget and all that sort of thing that the pressure exerted upon him was more than he could resist. The result was that he cut down the amount he was spending, and, behold, a recession. It may be said that the recession did not come because of that, but that would be something very difficult to prove. You notice that confidence is picking up and prices are rising as soon as a great amount of money goes out; and those who read the press in the last two or three days have read of Roosevelt's intention to rush recovery with $3,000,000,000. It means only one thing. They have discovered that one way out of the depression is by government spending of money.

If that $3,000,000,000 is being created in the United States by the banking systems, and if it could just as well be created by the government, then why not? That is a vital question which faces us as practical Canadian statesmen. Let me read what the Royal Bank of Canada says after a fine review. This is from the Royal Bank of Canada's letter of October, 1937:

> Unless private expenditures of a capital nature can be stimulated it would seem that the government will be compelled to increase its spending, or as an alternative, to permit a decline in national income.

The same applies to Great Britain. Most of us were interested in a certain powerful movement that took place over in Great Britain this year. I understand that a resolution was passed calling upon the government to declare what they were going to do in case the rearmament program ceased. The same question can be asked in Canada. What has the British government done? It has spent vast sums on rearmament, vast sums on rehousing, vast sums in divers social services and so on and so on, with the result that there is apparent recovery and prosperity, and those who are only superficial enough imagine that good times are coming back. But it is quite obvious that this is not so—obvious to those who read the words of people who are best informed.

I have said enough about the sit-down strike of investors. Now I will turn to the walk-out of consumers. They have quit buying; they have been compelled to, and the result is stagnation. The government must finance consumption. These measures which the United States has been adopting, the measures which Great Britain has been adopting, are all designed to finance both production and consumption. In my opinion the Bank of Canada must definitely and positively aim at two things. In the first place it must be prepared, by machinery which it will set up by and by, to finance production. The hon. member for Nanaimo began to talk a great deal of wisdom toward the end of his speech when he spoke about spending money to produce. That proposal is sound. May I say with regard to this good man that he is one of the best students I have ever met, and one of the most earnest men. I do not hold it against him that he does not see eye to eye with me on social credit; the day will come when he will; for the simple reason that the ideas, whether you call them social credit or not, are sound inasmuch as they go to the basis of the difficulty which confronts us.

Since it is necessary that we finance both consumption and production, we can readily appreciate what the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) felt the other day in a very fine outburst towards one of the greatest and most important utilities in our country, the utility of banking. We can understand why he implied—he did not exactly say it—that you should not allow a particular bank to go out of a certain little community. "Well," the banker pleads, "we are losing money." "Never mind whether you are losing money or not, you cannot destroy me and the community," he replies. Read his fine words, and remember the honour and respect which are universally accorded to that man, and the long practical experience he has had. He is not one who can be called an impossible idealist or a dreamer. He rises in his place in this house demanding exactly what the people of Alberta demand, namely, that the function of banking shall be subjected to an adequate measure of government control to prevent disaster from coming to the people. How well the hon. member expressed it. Perhaps, without violating the rules of the house, I might read one or two of his expressions. On page 4177 of Hansard for June 23 he is reported as saying:

> Why should a man have his whole life work interfered with by a ruthless bank outsider who knows nothing and apparently cares less about the rural areas of the country? Is it any wonder I am furious and indignant? And then there is no redress.

Those might be the words of the province of Alberta; that is exactly the way we feel, and Saskatchewan, Ontario and every other province will feel that very thing after a while.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

All that is necessary is to realize that banking is a public utility. Now consider his words as reported at page 4178:

> If the banks will not correct this situation, what am I going to do?

Alberta is as it were speaking.

> I am going to suggest to the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and all the government, that they take into careful consideration the desirability of having a board of bank commissioners, so that when a bronco banker like this one breaks out, a snub twitch or a lariat can be put on him. Do you think Canadians should have to submit to such tyranny? I do not. I would be ashamed to think that Canada had degenerated to that extent.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are exactly the views of Alberta. Yet some hon. members talk about Alberta being in open rebellion against Ottawa, and all that sort of thing; and say that the acts which Alberta passed in order to enable her to struggle against that very situation and bring it under some sort of control have to be disallowed immediately, with no redress from Ottawa whatsoever. The province is left to fight its way, just as this poor man and that little community where he lives. As soon as we as Canadians come to realize that Alberta, and men like the hon. member for Melville, are fighting for a real right, people will stop all this nonsensical talk.

I turn again to the policy of the Bank of Canada. My group have said time and again in this house that it is the policy of the bank which counts. Ownership is good, but you must have a right policy. You must recognize first that it is a public utility. After recognizing that, you will begin to be prepared to finance consumption; for example by pensions to the aged, to the blind, to the sick and incapacitated, to widows, mothers, orphans; greater and greater. Why? Simply because that is a means of financing consumption. You put the money into the hands of the people who wish to spend it, and who therefore will. The result is to develop markets to a fair degree. We shall follow that up with state medicine, state dentistry, and money for things which will tend to remove from the people the terrible burden they are now bearing. We are doing the most stupid things imaginable. One need only look at people who are raising families of five or six children. Do we want those families? Surely we do. But we place on them the burden of the sales tax, the burden of medicine, dentistry—one could go on and enumerate the great number of abuses as a result of which we put the burden on the very people who ought not to be bearing it—and we say that all is well. It is strange that people all over the earth except Anglo-Saxons are able to see these injustices. But we shall see them by and by. Then we shall use this new state-created money in the reduction of prices; we shall subsidize consumers. It sounds silly, but is it? It is the common sense thing to do. Then we shall not be far away from dividends for all. It will all be paid for by the creation of new money. Let me revert to a quotation from Right Hon. Reginald McKenna in January, 1936:

Additional currency, however, can now be furnished by the authorities, if they choose to exercise their powers. . . .

It is additional currency, not old currency; it is not taxed from anyone; it is not borrowed from anyone.

My time has expired. I have already talked much longer than I had intended. I shall close with a little quotation which I think the longer hon. members consider, the more meaning they will find it has. It is from page 99 of Stuart Chase's book, Government in Business, quoting Arthur H. Adams, in the Key Ratio to Balance, published in the American Federationist of November, 1934:

The unbalance we have reached this time is so big that natural or automatic restoration of balance, or recovery, cannot occur. The buying power of all consumer goods workers in the United States—

And the same is true of Canada, of course.

—needs to be raised about 35 per cent on the average, and with no increase in their producing power, before an intelligent man should even hope for business to become self-sustaining at normal levels.

That, too, is the situation which Canada faces. The Bank of Canada must be used for the working out of the policy, first, of financing production, and second, of financing consumption.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

BANK OF CANADA

ACQUISITION BY THE GOVERNMENT OF SHARES NOW IN HANDS OF THE PUBLIC

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Mr. Ilsley (for Mr. Dunning) for the second reading of Bill No. 160, to amend the Bank of Canada Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Short title.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps I had better say what I have to say at this time, because the title involves the whole question I wish to discuss. When the resolution was before the house I made such observations as I thought necessary with respect to the general principle of the measure. I endeavoured to point out that it is rather a commentary on our institutions that in 1936 we should have adopted what was regarded by the minister at that time as being the best possible method of effectuating public control over the Bank of Canada. When I heard him say the other evening that he still thought that this was so, but that the measure now before the committee was being put forward for the purpose of eliminating and removing criticism of the bank, I realized that while the reason is in itself sound, it is difficult to appreciate it in its entirety. I am afraid that the pressure of a near-by election had about as much to do with the matter as the public discussion as to the methods of the measure itself.

But there are two or three matters which I think might be considered to be of some importance. When I was in Australia I looked into the question of the Commonwealth Bank, and the conditions under which it was operated. It came into being without capital at all, borrowed a few pounds, relatively, from the government, and started into business. In 1937 a royal commission which was appointed in 1935-36 made a report, and with respect to the Commonwealth Bank they made the following recommendations which I think are of some importance:

1. The governor should be chairman of the board by virtue of his office and should possess qualifications and receive a salary commensurate with the importance of the office. The appointment of the governor should not be made on the basis of seniority nor is it even essential that he should already be in the service of the bank.

2. The six directors other than the governor and the secretary to the treasury should be appointed for a term of six years instead of seven as at present, one should retire each year, and be eligible for reappointment, but provision should be made that no director shall continue to hold office after reaching the age of 70.

3. The limitation on the field of choice of directors in section II (2) (b) of the act should be removed. The members of the board should be selected for capacity and diversity of experience and contact, and not as representatives of special interests.

4. The "Commonwealth Bank Act 1911-32," section 12B, which provides that there "shall be" a board of advice in London, should be made permissive. This board is not at present constituted, and there seems to be no necessity for such a board in present circumstances.

Our new board will be thirteen in number. There are eleven to be appointed; the governor makes the twelfth, and the minister or his representative we will say, makes the thirteenth.

Mr. ILSLEY: The deputy governor makes the thirteenth.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, the deputy governor. I wish to point out that in Australia the secretary of the treasury is one of the board, along with the governor and six directors. I think there is much to be said in favour of a permanent official of the Department of Finance of this country being on the board. It is true that when we originally passed the act we made provision for the Deputy Minister of Finance being the contact man between the board and the government; but now that the government has acquired complete ownership of the bank, it seems to me that possibly it might be desirable to maintain that contact between the institution itself and the government, because it is owned by the government. It might, therefore, be desirable to appoint the Deputy Minister of Finance as one of the directors.

I think thirteen directors are too large a number in a country such as this. When they arrived at the number to which they reduced it in Australia it was after many representations had been made, and the recommendation which I am now reading from the Australian Year Book for 1937 was, I believe, unanimous.

Then, there is the savings bank, which came into being later than the Commonwealth Bank. I must say that on investigation I thought the savings bank played a very large part in the financial life of Australia. Whether or not it would be possible to have a savings bank department that would discharge as varied and important functions in Canada, I am not prepared to say. But it is a subject worthy, I believe, of careful thought and consideration.

As regards the issue of notes, the Commonwealth Bank has made enormous profits. The Commonwealth Bank of Australia has turned into the exchequer not less than £25,000,000, and it came into being in 1912. At the present time one-half of certain earnings are allocated to a sinking fund on the national debt, and there stands to the credit of that fund at the present time I believe somewhere between £4,000,000 and £5,000,000. Then, their rural credits system has been developed through that bank, and the profits that come from their operations in certain fields of endeavour are allocated to that rural credits system; with the result that you have the bank discharging the responsibilities of a central bank, with branches in all the states, as we have here. Added to that you have the savings bank department, and the rural credits.

The truth is that the profits derived from the note issue department are so large that the bank has been extremely profitable. For instance, it is practically the only bank of issue in the commonwealth. While other banks have the right to issue notes, they do not do so, and they buy their notes from the Commonwealth Bank. For example, at the end of 1936 the Commonwealth note issue amounted, in round figures, to the sum of £47,437,788. The Australian pound is roughly the equivalent of $4 in our money. The profits, as indicated, are indeed very large. For the year ended June 30, 1936, the general department of the bank made a profit of between four and five hundred thousand pounds; the savings bank made a profit of £334,726, and the rural credits department, a profit of over £45,159, making a total of nearly £800,000.

In accordance with the provisions of section 30 of the Bank Act and section 9 (2) of the National Debt Sinking Fund Act, half of the net profits of the bank have been placed to the credit of the bank's reserve fund and half to the credit of the national debt sinking fund. Up to 30th June, 1936, the latter fund had benefited to the extent of £4,093,252.

And 1937 was also highly profitable. I mention these figures because they are staggering to look at, but when one analyses the methods that have been used for the purpose of making money, they are not difficult to understand. For instance, we will say the Bank of New South Wales desire £100,000 for circulation. They go to the note issue department of the Commonwealth Bank and requisition for £100,000 in notes. The bank has the right to issue that £100,000 of paper money upon depositing in the note issue department £100,000 of securities or bonds. The bank take £100,000 of securities or cash which they have accumulated and hand them over to the Commonwealth Bank, which in turn gives the £100,000 of paper money. The profit is the difference between the practical cost of creating £100,000 and £100,000. It is a large profit. It is on the note issue side that the profit has been largely made.

The rural credits system that has developed there by taking part of the profits from the savings bank and utilizing them for that purpose has been amazing. I was so interested that I spent considerable time with the officials of the bank to see exactly how it was functioning. After all, they say in Australia that a Canadian, King O'Malley, was responsible for forcing the Commonwealth Bank through to a successful issue. Mr. Fisher was Prime Minister at that time and had associated with him Mr. Hughes, who was later Prime Minister. The two first accounts in the bank were opened by Mr. Fisher and Mr. Hughes, with very small sums of money indeed. As a matter of fact, one account was for only one pound.

What they have done in Australia could not be done in this country at once. They have their chartered banks there. The Bank of New South Wales is not quite as old, I think, as the Bank of Montreal. There is the Bank of Australia, and commercial and various other banks that have branches throughout the commonwealth. There is one thing that is very clear, namely, that the bank has served a tremendously useful purpose to the several communities in which it functions as well as to the commonwealth as a whole.

I was much interested in hearing what was said during the progress of the discussion the other evening as to what we have been able to do with our central bank. I confess I have been disappointed in what it has been able to accomplish, for two reasons. First, I think the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) made it perfectly clear that conditions in this country have been such that there has been no necessity to control the discount rate. It has never functioned as a bank of rediscount. I should not say never, because it did once, but that was for only such a small amount as to be not worth mentioning. Why? Because there are such stupendous sums of money in the banks that are not in demand for commercial business owing to the depressed condition of business generally. I use that term in a broad sense, and it has no reference to any particular time. That is number one—it has not functioned as a bank of rediscount.

Second, it has not, shall I say, found it necessary to engage in any substantial open market operations. In other words, conditions that have obtained in this country have made it somewhat difficult, if not impossible, for the bank to function in that manner, either as a buyer or a seller of securities. This was pointed out the other evening. All that is left is an institution which we have utilized successfully in the transaction of the nation's business. But from the standpoint of the preamble of the bill with respect to the control of credit, no one looking at the bank's structure would say for a moment that our Bank of Canada has to any extent been able to function with respect to credit. Conditions have made it impossible for it to do so.

The chartered banks have lost their right to issue paper money, but that right is disappearing slowly. It will be many years before it disappears finally. That being so, it follows that they still have the benefits which accrue from being banks of issue. As the chartered banks, or the joint stock banks as they are called in England, have not found it essential to utilize the Bank of Canada for their purpose, it follows that the point to which reference was made the other evening, as to the chartered banks discharging in the main the functions of the central bank and the Bank of Canada not having materially affected credit conditions, is something that I think cannot soundly be denied. That is the general situation with respect to it.

If business improves; if conditions in this country ever again reach the point where banks are not compelled to invest their money in the country's securities—a practice which, of course, is unsound—this will change. As everyone knows, the whole function of the chartered bank is to maintain an equilibrium between time loans and time deposits, and demand loans and demand deposits. If a bank uses its resources for the purpose of advancing money to the sheep industry, it might well be unable to meet the demands of its depositors, which of course is a thing to be avoided. So far as the question of the reserve maintained by the chartered banks is concerned, it is maintained in the notes of the Bank of Canada and with deposits that are made by the banks, in that bank.

There was a long argument in the standing committee as to what should be the figure. The original figure was higher than five, but it was finally agreed that it should be not less than 5 per cent. It has always exceeded 5 per cent in practice, and as a matter of fact one might say broadly—this is subject to variation— that 10 per cent is a fair statement of the figure. I daresay at times it has been 8 per cent and at other times, 12, but broadly and generally I think it has been maintained at about 10 per cent.

Mr. ILSLEY: It has not been below 8·6 per cent in the last ten years.

Mr. BENNETT: I said about 8, and the minister now tells me it has not been below 8·6 per cent in the last ten years. The only question that confronts us is: How can we make this bank more useful to the Canadian people and more responsive to their needs and necessities? There was a statement, which I think originated with the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, as to public credit. If I remember rightly, this was adopted practically as a slogan by the government during the election of 1935. This had to do with the utilization of the bank to the greatest possible extent in service to the people. But when it is suggested that the bank can make credit, there have to be conditions that permit of credit being made. The difficulty is that these conditions have not arisen in this country. Until they arise there is only one thing can be done—and the Minister of Finance made it perfectly clear that he at least was not prepared to do that—and that is by statutory enactment to provide what the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) said would be done after the last election, namely, to issue paper money in relation to the gold reserve that is in the bank, which would permit hundreds of millions of dollars being issued. A portion of that money, he said, would be used to liquidate the national debt, and a portion used for other purposes. That has not been done although, remember, it was done in this country once. In 1915 we passed a statute legalizing the acts that had been done by the government of 1914. We issued $26,000,000 of Dominion of Canada bills, $10,000,000 of which had nothing behind them, $10,000,000 had behind them Canadian Northern securities which were worthless, and $6,000,000 had Grand Trunk Pacific securities behind them which were also worthless, and that $26,000,000 you will find referred to in chapter 4 of the statutes of 1915, where you will find these words; I shall not take time to read it all:

> Whereas for the purposes set forth in orders in council of date the fifth day of September, 1914 (P.C. 2326), the twenty-sixth day of September, 1914 (P.C. 2451), the twenty-fourth day of October, 1914 (P.C. 2671), and the twentieth day of November, 1914 (P.C. 2922), and pursuant to said orders, advances to the amount of six million dollars ($6,000,000) in the form of an issue of dominion notes were made to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, against a pledge by the company of its guaranteed securities issued in pursuance of the provisions of the Grand Trunk Pacific Guarantee Act, 1914, by placing the sums so advanced to the credit of the Minister of Finance for payment out under the provisions of the deed of trust securing the issue of these securities;
> And whereas pursuant to an order in council of date the second day of November, 1914 (P.C. 2750), dominion notes to the amount of ten million dollars ($10,000,000) were issued, in order that certain obligations of Canada might be met as they matured;
> And whereas with respect to the greater part of these issues of dominion notes security in the form required by section 5 of the Dominion Notes Act 1914 was not held—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The total increase was $46,000,000. There was an increase from $30,000,000 to $50,000,000 in 1914.

Mr. BENNETT: That was covered by the expansion of dominion note issues. But this was covered by the issue of notes by the dominion to liquidate three obligations: one to the Canadian Northern, one to the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the other to the nation generally; one being for $10,000,000, one being for $6,000,000, and the other being for $10,000,000. The other $20,000,000 stands on a somewhat different basis because the gold coverage was used for the purposes of protecting that issue. It was in order to avoid any discussion of that, that I referred to this particular statute. The hon. gentleman will realize that the gold coverage was behind the $20,000,000. The first recital deals with the $10,000,000 to the Canadian Northern, and that is validated by the legislation.

It is within the knowledge of all the members of this committee that if a bank found itself in need of cash it deposited with the Minister of Finance certain securities which it held, and the Minister of Finance handed out to that bank Dominion of Canada notes. For this accommodation the bank paid certain interest rates, sometimes 3¼ per cent, sometimes 4 per cent and sometimes 2½ per cent. That issue of dominion notes was not protected by metallic coverage. That had nothing to do with it. It was only a temporary advance, and it will be observed that it was supported only by the securities which were deposited with the Minister of Finance for the purpose of enabling the advance to be made.

Mr. VIEN: Would it be a rediscount operation?

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member has anticipated what I was going to say. That we did not continue. It will be remembered that Sir Thomas White, in his dissenting opinion from the conclusions of the royal commission, said that that was quite ample for our purposes, but the bulk of professional as well as lay opinion was that that was not an easy or a safe way to carry on our operations. I use the word "safe," not from the standpoint of financial stability but as indicating a safe, sound way in which to carry on.

Mr. PELLETIER: To complete the picture which the right hon. gentleman is giving, will he tell us how the issue of $26,000,000 was finally withdrawn from circulation?

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact, it was not withdrawn from circulation. It was covered by the statute passed during the régime of the late government when we dealt with the note act and the legal tender act and the coverage act after the conference of 1933, when 25 per cent of metallic coverage was regarded as safe coverage, and to that I shall refer presently. The notes were part of our authorized and legal note issue, and they became part of the note issue which was taken over by the Bank of Canada and for which it assumed responsibility.

I have given that illustration merely as indicative of what might be done when necessity compels, as it did in 1914. As I read the observations of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and of my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence, I certainly concluded that he contemplated the utilization of the national credit in much that way. The Prime Minister had assured me that I was wrong in my conclusion as to that, and I have not joined issue with him on that because, after all, what one man understands from what another man says is not always the test of what one may regard as what was intended by the man who spoke the words.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does my hon. friend mean the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance?

Mr. BENNETT: The Prime Minister during the campaign of 1935, and it will be recalled that in 1936 when I was dealing with the Bank of Canada the Prime Minister said that at no place would it be found he had said they would be responsible for the operations of the bank, but he said it should be a publicly controlled institution. If he will turn up Hansard he will see what I mean.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I said publicly controlled but not publicly owned.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite. It was that distinction which the Prime Minister pointed out in this house in answer to the observation I was making, and it was read this afternoon, that he was not concerned how control was effected as long as the bank was controlled by the government.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Effective control is more important than ownership.

Mr. BENNETT: That was what was said anyway.

Now let us go a step further. We have substituted for the provisions to which I have referred a provision with respect to rediscount, and so I get back to what I pointed out at the very start, that when there is no occasion for rediscount, when business conditions are such that there is no opportunity for the banks to use the enormous deposits they have, there is no opportunity for the Bank of Canada to function as a rediscount bank any more than there would have been for the finance department to function in emitting credit to the banks. That is the first difficulty we must face, and until we can restore the confidence of the people of this country in business we cannot expect this bank to function as a bank of rediscount. It is there; it is on the statute books; we have provided for it; but all you have to do is to look at the statements of the banks to-morrow and you will find that the banks have enormous holdings of our securities.

I want to say this, and I am sure that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), if he were here, would agree with me. Of course we are getting money on treasury bills cheap. I remember when we started doing this. We were told we could not do it; that nobody would want to buy our treasury bills. We started in a very modest way; but as there was no demand for money, as the banks were unable to place in profitable loans the money of their depositors, the demand for short-term treasury bills increased and the rate decreased. It is a bad sign when treasury bills are cheap. The cheaper they are, the less business there is in the country. I remember once watching the upturn of business in London, where they sell treasury bills on an enormous scale, far beyond anything we can appreciate or understand. There was an upturn of business, whereupon the treasury had to pay more money to sell treasury bills. But as money accumulates and is unable to be utilized by those in whose custody it is placed, treasury bills become cheaper and the rate is lower. That is the story. There cannot be any question about it. All one has to do is make himself familiar with the day to day transactions in respect to these matters.

I am hopeful, as I think every man is, that with increasing confidence on the part of the Canadian people in the business of developing their country there will come a greater demand for credit. But that demand will reflect itself in what? In deposits being converted, not into government loans, but into loans to business, to individuals, to factories, to various things of that sort,—and not for capital, either. That is what I think the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) must always keep in mind: the banks do not provide capital. Why? Because they do not know when they will be called upon to honour the cheques of their depositors. The maintenance of that equilibrium between time loans and time deposits, and demand loans and demand deposits, is the basis of all sound banking, and departure from it, by putting bank deposits into capital securities or into long-term loans, means inevitable disaster, as has been proved in this country on more than one occasion. That is the position which we occupy. Despite all that may be said to the contrary, it just gets down to this. We can by appropriate legislation repeat what was done in 1915. We have, rightly or wrongly, a public opinion as reflected by a universal rule of less metallic coverage behind sound money than existed prior to 1915. There is no legal metallic coverage by statute in Great Britain, but England has more gold behind her currency to-day than she has had for a very long time, possibly more than she ever had. The Bank of England has more gold to-day than ever before; and when you see the bank's return, remember that it values gold at $20.67 an ounce and not at $35. The stabilization fund has absorbed, for the moment at any rate, the difference between $20.67 and $35 per ounce. I cannot speak as to the position this week, but about eight weeks ago there was more gold in the Bank of England behind its currency issue than there had ever been in its history. There is no longer the issue of "Bradburys." That paper money which was established when the war broke out and was called "Bradburys" has been wiped out. All the notes that are issued south of the Tweed are issued by the Bank of England, and as I have said, these are covered at the moment by a larger deposit of gold than at any other time in the bank's history, although England is off the gold standard.

Our currency to-day is just as sound as it was at the moment of its greatest soundness. Canadian paper money is covered by metal to the same extent or to a greater extent than it has been at any time in our history.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Much more.

Mr. BENNETT: Much more than at some times in our history. There was a time when we had very much more gold than we have now. I was looking at the figures the other night.

That being so, the only question, I repeat, is how we can utilize to the greatest possible extent the credit that springs from the resources over which this country now has control. I do not see any provision in the bill which contemplates any change of policy. I see nothing that contemplates any change in the conduct of the bank. Instead of the $5,000,000 of shares being scattered all over this country, they are going to be lodged in the treasury. Instead of directors who have to hold shares, and who have some sense of financial responsibility, they now are appointees of the government. I would point out how desirable it is to endeavour to realize, as the commission in Australia stated in its report, that the directors should be representative of all forms of business and that so far as possible the political factor should not be one to be considered. I am not going to repeat the details of the experience which I had in connection with the organization of the Bank of Canada, but I do not think it could have been successfully organized if it had been subject to the continuance of the tremendous pressure that is described by the one word "patronage"—not the best word, perhaps, to define it. For instance, some people thought that the Bank of Canada should be an institution which at once would provide them with loans of anywhere from $1,000 to $1,000,000. I see that two of my friends opposite nod their heads; they come from rural constituencies, and they were asked on some occasions why they were not able to get money for their electors. I have received many letters of that type.

The Bank of Canada is not at all that sort of institution. It has no accounts of that kind; it reflects its activities and the power of its position only by indirect methods on the banking system of the country. Again I say I can only hope that we may be able to devise some method whereby this great untouched reservoir of credit can be utilized for the public weal. That is the problem before us, just how that can be brought about—on the one hand, to preserve the solvency and reputation of the country; on the other, to utilize to the most the accumulated good will and reputation of the country, which after all is credit. I am not here to solve the problem—it is not my responsibility—but I desire only to point out that great results have followed in some parts of our empire from the efforts which have been made in that direction.

One word more, with respect to the acquisition of the bank. I pointed out in 1936 that if the country desired to take the bank, they should expropriate it and acquire the shares. They have taken the shares now at 120, or a little short of that, and those who sell their shares will have made 4½ per cent dividend and 20 per cent profit on their venture, which is not bad in these days.

In New Zealand, if my memory serves me aright, they did not provide so large a profit to those whose shares they took. It was just shortly after the state took over, that I visited New Zealand, and I inquired of the governor of the bank precisely how matters were being worked out. Will the hon. members keep in mind one thing that differentiates us from all these countries and prevents us from making a comparison of the type that I have sometimes made here to-night with the type that others make. Australia has her debt domiciled in two places only, London and Australia. They did have a small loan in New York, but that is not important at the moment; it was an experiment. New Zealand's debts are domiciled in London and New Zealand, and all sales of produce of New Zealand find payment in sterling lodged in their banks there for the purpose of servicing their debt, paying interest on their debt there. Then, when the exchange is made, the pound, New Zealand and Australia, is practically on a $4 basis with us. One can get some idea, therefore, how it stands with respect to sterling.

It is a purely technical matter how they maintain the exchange rate. The governors of the banks told me how simple it was to maintain it. The suggestion has been made—I remember the Minister of National Defence having made it—that we should have depreciated our dollar. Well, heaven only knows it was depreciated enough by causes over which we had no control without our wanting to depreciate it more; and the gentleman who made representations to the royal commission at Winnipeg, who was not a Canadian, was confronted with the situation that we had a third creditor which these other countries have not. We have the great country to the south of us as our creditor, a country where we owe enormous sums of money, federally, provincially, municipally and by corporations. When England went off the gold standard we still had, in terms of our contract, before the United States took the action they did, to pay our debts there in gold; and having to do so was what brought about the greatest strain that this country has ever had to undergo. Fortunately, with the good will of some of the United States banks and a combination of fortuitous circumstances, we were able to meet every obligation in terms of our contract, and that is the reason that ultimately we were able to restore our credit in face of the difficulties we had to meet.

We must never forget, however, that the action taken by the United States was really the determining factor in changing the picture as a whole. That third factor—not England, not Canada, but those debts in the United States that were payable in gold—was the factor which created such a serious situation in our economy. That difficulty no longer confronts us in the way it did. Why? Because of the action taken by the United States with respect to gold, with respect to paper, with respect to all these matters; and their action has had the effect, of course, of releasing us from a tremendous burden which frankly at one time it looked as though it might be almost impossible for us to bear. That differentiates our position from that of Australia or New Zealand. They have no such situation as we have.

There is another factor that was mentioned the other day. We have a great favourable commodity balance with Great Britain; we have an adverse balance with the United States; and the utilization of that balance in London to discharge the adverse balance in New York is, of course, the basis of international trade; only you have to multiply it by several countries in addition to those; here an adverse balance, and there a favourable balance; the utilization of this favourable balance with respect to that adverse balance, and so on. Largely, however, it was a matter between London and New York. That is a factor which can never be forgotten.

Mr. ILSLEY: There has been a favourable balance with the United States at least until very recently, if we count gold.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; but I have been leaving gold out of the question. Gold, becoming a commodity pure and simple as it now is, has made the situation very much better and simpler for us in every way. To-day gold is a commodity like tobacco or pulpwood or anything of that kind. That is all it is at the moment. There is in the library a book that gives a wonderful history of the reason why gold has kept the place it has through all the centuries. It is not that it is money alone but that it has always represented something which in the eyes of all generations has had a peculiar value. It is that it has been very much admired for its beauty and also, because of its rarity, that it has had a value which no other metal has had.

How this problem can be approached without impairing our credit on the one hand and our reputation on the other is a question which I am sure must be engaging the attention of the government in view of the declarations of policy which they so earnestly made before the last election. I am sure that the Macmillan report, which was substituted for the psalms of David by my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence, has become quite worn by much perusal, but a solution of the difficulties has not been found.

I am only going to suggest, as we reach the sections, that thirteen directors are too large a number. There is one other point which I might touch upon. Are we not entitled to have back our bonds now? When the Dominion of Canada handed over to the Bank of Canada various assets we gave them our bonds to guarantee them from responsibility with respect to the assumption of liability for our note issue. Do we contemplate by the language of this bill the transfer of those bonds back to the country? I have looked at it earnestly on more than one occasion, and I am not sure whether it is open to that construction.

These, Mr. Chairman, are the principal matters to which I desire to direct attention.

Mr. McGEER: The leader of the opposition has pointed out, as did the Minister of Finance the other evening, that one of the problems which face the government in the exercise of its control over the currency and credit of the nation is to get into circulation an effective amount of the huge amount of credit and currency that is to-day available. The tremendous amount of credit now available was referred to in a rather indirect way by the Minister of Finance the other evening. I was questioning his statement that the control of the circulation of currency and credit could be exercised through the discount rate and he replied:

> I intended to say then just what I am saying now, that the conditions which create that tremendous volume of available credit in all three of these great countries have for the time being rendered any rediscount rate an ineffective weapon. . . .

He was referring to Great Britain, the United States and Canada.

It must be apparent that "that tremendous amount of credit" comes from some direct source, and as a matter of fact, the conditions to which the Minister of Finance referred and which were mentioned indirectly to-night are conditions such as arise when a country abandons gold and goes upon a managed paper standard. Under such conditions the volume of credit is directly under the control of whatever authority is issuing the currency on a managed paper standard. That control has been assumed to be in this government through the Bank of Canada.

Before I go on to deal with that feature, may I point out the extent to which, under the policy of the Conservative party when the Bank of Canada Act was passed and the Bank Act was amended to establish a paper standard, the limits of credit creation were fixed by parliament. In the Bank of Canada reports for May of this year it is disclosed that the total resources are $211,300,000. Of this total $182,300,000 consists of gold, leaving $29,000,000 in foreign currency, mostly United States dollars and pounds sterling. Of the bank's gold holdings only $97,250,000 are in use as currency reserves leaving $84,850,000 of gold reserves idle and unemployed. That is saying nothing of Canada's annual gold production, from which a substantial increase in that unemployment of gold can be developed. From my own calculations I find that during the last three years, over and above our debt repatriation, payments for goods and all other things, we have exported gold as a commodity to the value of $116,000,000. This means that if there is anything in the Bank of Canada Act with regard to this provision of 25 per cent gold coverage and 5 per cent reserve in the chartered banks, we have actually sabotaged the credit of Canada to the tune of several billion dollars by exporting gold as a commodity, which I think is a serious mistake; for although reserves of gold are being accumulated in England to-day, they are being accumulated not for currency purposes, but for international emergencies, because gold can play a real part in the defensive equipment for the nation.

I estimate that under our Bank of Canada Act we have available to-day a total credit currency of $10,495,000,000. This is made up in this way. Under the Bank of Canada Act the bank may issue four times its gold reserves in Bank of Canada bills, that is, $182,300,000 multiplied by four, or $729,200,000. Against this the bank has issued and has on demand call a total of only $389,800,000. This amount subtracted from the total issue authorized by law of $729,200,000 leaves $339,400,000 of Bank of Canada money unissued and unemployed, or sufficient for twenty times that amount in bank deposits, or a total of $6,788,000,000 in bank deposits as provided in subsection 4 of section 59 of the Bank Act. These figures I know are stupendous, but they are within the limits that parliament has fixed for the creation of bank credit currency. Here, then, is the source of some of "that tremendous volume of credit," that the Minister of Finance said made the rediscount rate inapplicable.

Mr. ILSLEY: The utmost limits.

Mr. McGEER: No, not the utmost. All I am using here is the gold reserves available now held by the Bank of Canada. There are a great many other reserves available for the same purpose at this time. So that when I use these figures do not let the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) make the mistake of saying that I am using maximum figures; that would be another one of the mistakes which he is making about this issue.

Mr. ILSLEY: Is the hon. member not suggesting now that the ratio of gold held by the banks to their deposit liabilities should be 25 per cent and no more?

Mr. McGEER: No; I am not suggesting that at all. I am suggesting nothing; I am stating a fact. I am explaining to the committee the amount of credit currency that parliament made available on existing gold reserves as the national working capital of this dominion when it amended the Bank Act in 1934 and established the Bank of Canada. I am stating a fact that can be confirmed by the Bank of Canada reports.

But that is only one item in the plentiful supply of money that was intended to be created by the adoption by Canada of the British Empire currency policy, which as the leader of the opposition knows was defined at the world economic conference in July, 1933. We have, according to the Bank of Canada report, the following distribution of the issued bills:

Bank of Canada bills issued or on demand	$389,800,000
Owned outright by the chartered banks	247,500,000
Held in the tills of the chartered banks	53,400,000
Held on deposit with the Bank of Canada by the chartered banks	194,100,000
Total owned by the chartered banks	247,500,000
Amount required under the Bank Act 5 per cent cash reserve to support the reported $2,884,000,000 of alleged bank deposits	144,200,000
Bank of Canada bills held by the chartered banks in excess of reserve requirements	103,300,000

Mr. ILSLEY: On a 5 per cent basis?

Mr. McGEER: Parliament fixed the 5 per cent basis, and it is parliament that ought to rule the reserve limits of this country, not the dictation of the banks.

Mr. ILSLEY: Parliament never fixed it as a practical working minimum, but fixed it merely as a legal minimum. The hon. gentleman knows that no commercial banking system in the world goes down to a 5 per cent reserve ratio. They go to about 10 per cent. They do so in England and in this country.

Mr. McGEER: Does the hon. gentleman wish to make any more speeches? He is letting himself fall into a nice little bankers' trap. Until this 5 per cent reserve came into the Bank Act, there never was any rule or regulation in Canada as to what the banks should hold by way of cash reserve.

Mr. ILSLEY: Certainly not.

Mr. BENNETT: There was as to legal tender.

Mr. McGEER: If the hon. minister will keep quiet and listen to me for a little while, he will probably know more when I get through than he knew before I started. I think he has a delusion which is common among a great many people. When the Macmillan committee report was first issued, what happened was they said that as a matter of banking practice in England, to meet till money requirements, out-of-pocket expenses international exchange requirements and the settlement of inter-bank balances, the banks usually held Bank of England notes to approximately 10 per cent. But they also pointed out that this 10 per cent was largely a window-dressing proposition; that those reserves were built up on bank report days and were never an actual reality. This 10 per cent fiction of the Macmillan committee report has been seized upon by Canadian bankers as bank propaganda.

Mr. ILSLEY: Has the hon. gentleman—

Mr. McGEER: Just a moment, let me finish. In a debate of this kind interruptions are not in place.

Mr. ILSLEY: Neither is discourtesy.

Mr. McGEER: I do not think the hon. member can lay that charge against me. All I would say to him is that probably one of the most discourteous things that can happen is for a minister on the front bench to intervene as against a back-bencher, when he is dealing with a somewhat difficult and technical matter. I do not think I need to—

The CHAIRMAN: I would ask the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard to address his observations to the chair.

Mr. McGEER: In Canada we have this great difference in the banks holdings of currency, as against England. Our banks are allowed to issue their own bank-note currency, which to-day they do to the tune of a hundred million dollars. In other words our banks have, for till money and out-of-pocket transactions of the people, a hundred million dollars of bank-note bills issued by the chartered banks, which the English banks have no privilege of issuing at all.

As a matter of fact, five per cent of Bank of Canada bills is far more than our chartered banks need to carry in their reserve accounts, and that is clearly evidenced by the value of the bank bills they have on deposit with the Bank of Canada, and the value of the Bank of Canada bills which they carry in their actual tills. As a matter of fact, if hon. members will notice, the only amount of Bank of Canada bills that the banks have in their possession for the purpose of meeting public needs, international exchange and inter-bank transactions, is $53,000,000. The other amount of $194,000,000 they have on deposit with the Bank of Canada. In addition to those combined totals, the Bank of Canada has issued to the people $102,000,000, which amount is to-day circulating in the possession of the people. So that if you will take down the figures you will find that the reserve requirement of 5 per cent is far more than the chartered banks are actually using to-day.

But the point I wish to draw to the attention of the committee is that there is to-day in the possession of the banks $103,000,000 of Bank of Canada bills, against which they can issue $2,060,000,000 of new bank deposits. There is, however, no control in the Bank of Canada or in the government over that $103,000,000 of Bank of Canada bills, which the chartered banks of the dominion own outright. They can use that money if they wish as reserves for new bank deposits, but there is no way by which the government through the Bank of Canada can assert any authority to force them to do so. That Bank of Canada legal tender cash is now being hoarded up by our chartered banks.

It is idle, and though on deposit with the Bank of Canada for the purpose of increasing the nation's currency and credit powers is absolutely under the control of the chartered banks. Let me say again that this does not exhaust the supply of available working capital in Canada, because of the $2,884,000,000 of reported deposits only $687,000,000 are on current account; $398,000,000 are on deposit abroad and $1,631,000,000 are in savings accounts. These savings deposits at the present time are drawing on the average not more than one and a half per cent. This means that under this system the banks get the savings of the people as working capital from depositors at one and a half per cent. But that huge amount of money is locked up, as the right hon. the leader of the opposition has pointed out, because nobody has any faith in the future of the country, and nobody is prepared to invest their savings even in government bonds at the present time. Everyone who has a savings bank account knows that this $1,631,000,000 is available for the purchase of government bonds by each owner of the amount to his or her credit in the savings bank account, so that to arrive at the total of Canadian money available for Canadian defence or development, we must add the $1,631,000,000 in the savings accounts to the other amounts I have already mentioned.

Here then is a recapitulation of "the tremendous amount of credit" to use the language of the Minister of Finance, or "the great amount of credit available," to use the language of the right hon. the leader of the opposition, that is now available. The amount available of gold reserves not in use and Bank of Canada bills not issued is $6,798,000,000. The amount which chartered banks may issue on the reserve of Bank of Canada bills not in use, but on deposit with the Bank of Canada, is $2,060,000,000. The amount of savings accounts amounts to $1,631,000,000, or a total of $10,529,000,000.

Under the Bennett monetary policy of 1934 this huge reserve of new currency and credit created by our change in monetary policy was handed over as a public concession to the privately owned Bank of Canada and the privately owned chartered banks. That policy was repudiated in 1935 when the King monetary policy, which declared for "the control of currency issued in terms of public need" and, "to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people," was endorsed from coast to coast.

The issue is no longer inflation; for we in Canada adopted inflation in 1934. The real issue is: Shall our inflated currency and credit be controlled to serve Canada, or shall it remain a concession to Canadian bankers? Surely the answer to that issue must be that Canada's plentiful supply of money should be used for Canadian development, and it must be used to advance and sustain the peace, order, progress, prosperity and security of the Canadian people who are the actual owners of the nation's currency and credit resources.

Any government can grant a concession. Governments have a like power to make concessions so granted valuable by buying back with the taxpayers' money what the concessions yield. It is in the misuse of this authority that democratic governments give way to the oligarchy of privilege, and lose that most important of all things to democratic governments, namely the right to control the great resources of the state in the service of the people. Thus, in the misuse of this authority, democratic governments lose their power, become mere sycophants of monopoly, and wrongly exercise their authority to aid the privileged few in the improper exploitation of the wealth of the state, and of the rights of individuals unable to protect themselves.

One of the worst examples of this kind of mistake by democracy is to be found in the Canadian bank policy of 1934, which I hope the present bill aims to cure for under that policy a privately owned bank, the Bank of Canada, was given the exclusive right to issue the full legal tender currency of the Dominion of Canada, which carried with it the right to expand gold into Canadian full legal tender paper money on a basis of one to four. It also gave to the chartered banks the power to use the Bank of Canada not as a national bank but as a mere filling station. Acting in that capacity it has issued free to the chartered banks more Bank of Canada bills than the chartered banks require for their legal reserve purposes. That is, the Bank of Canada was made not an institution of the state, but a mere servant of the chartered banks. Now, when the chartered banks may use Bank of Canada bills by expanding $1 Bank of Canada bills into $20 of bank credit money, and exchange that type of money for interest bearing government bonds, it seems to me that we have gone the limit in adopting the course of keeping the government, the state and the people poor, and in making one isolated group in the community rich, by giving it possession of all the money wealth of the nation.

It is an extraordinary thing, but true, that under the policy now in effect the chartered banks can exchange mere bookkeeping entries for government bills bearing interest, and government bonds. But it was in this great concession that some of us saw one of the great mistakes the Dominion of Canada was making under the Conservative government of 1934.

I came to Ottawa and laid such views before the banking and commerce committee, urging that the Bank of Canada be nationally owned and be made an arm of government to control the issue and circulation of the currency and credit wealth of the nation. It is because we are now coming to the adoption of the very things that were advocated then, and that I advocated in the election of 1935, that I think this parliament under Liberalism is starting on the way to establish a real Canadian democracy and to free the people of the Dominion of Canada from the oligarchy of money power which has dominated it for every year of its existence.

By way of illustrating the evils of this concession which was granted in 1934, and which we in this house I hope are now moving to correct, may I point out that any one of our chartered banks possessed of $5 of Bank of Canada bills can now buy, under the authority of our laws, $100 of national treasury certificates or government interest bearing bonds by merely entering in its books a deposit credit in favour of the government. In this way parliament, back in the days of 1934 under the Conservative administration, authorized our chartered banks to issue alleged bank deposits as an effective substitute for Canadian money. The great prerogative of the state, the right to create legal tender and the medium of exchange of the government and the people was then handed over to a private monopoly. Is it any wonder that under such a system the banks have continued to pay their dividends?

Now that our chartered banks are allowed to buy government securities with bookkeeping entries, it should not be surprising to learn on an examination of their books that they own $1,155,000,000 worth of interest bearing securities issued by our dominion and provincial governments, nor should it be surprising to learn that from 1934, when this concession was granted, until to-day, they have increased their holdings of provincial and dominion government securities by $471,000,000. Every dollar's worth of those securities has been purchased with a bookkeeping entry of alleged bank deposits, which analysis will show, instead of its being a deposit, is merely a practice where the banks are trading short in money and long in credit. That is all it amounts to. That is a service which should be appropriated to the use of the state through its own banking system. But even if the bankers perform that service for the government, they are entitled to a proper service charge, but they are not entitled to charge interest as though they were lending the government their own or their depositors' money.

The vital importance of correcting such a situation should be recognized as imperative once it is realized that if the government securities amounting to $1,155,000,000 now held by the chartered banks carry interest rates on the average of three per cent, the taxpayers are paying the chartered banks $33,450,000 a year for merely converting government securities into bank deposits by bookkeeping entries. This bonus of taxpayers' wealth is out of all proportion to the service rendered to the state by the chartered banks. The banks do use debt-free money, and they do use interest-free money through the exercise of parliament's power to create an effective medium of exchange. Could there be a more perfect scheme to make bankers rich and keep the government poor?

This government, by continuing the Conservative policy of 1934, sanctions the vesting in privately owned banks of parliament's power to create and control the issuance of the nation's credit, and to convert it into bankers' bank deposit currency, which is tantamount to the transfer of the government's power to mint money to a private monopoly. The direct result is that both government and people are under the control of men who employ the nation's credit as the stock in trade of the business of making money by manipulating the nation's debt-free money and the nation's interest-free credit. Thus, by our own laws, this parliament has placed mass usury in control of the nation. Under the circumstances we cannot expect balanced budgets, but we should expect unemployment and destitution, stagnation in national development, debt repudiation, confiscatory taxation, municipal and provincial bankruptcy, class and sectional dissension and waning faith in our country's future, because the present Prime Minister has correctly informed this house and the people of the land that "usury once in control will wreck a nation." This is not usury in the ordinary sense; it is mass usury gone mad. It is one reason why this vast country, with its wealth and its future, with its industry and its capacity, stagnates and wallows in a world that is going ahead all about us. I believe we can go forward if we will but manage our national currency and credit in the service of the state.

May I just take one or two minutes to confirm the conclusions I have arrived at from what was undoubtedly a very carefully prepared speech of the hon. Minister of Finance delivered on March 8. On page 2 of the copy of that address which has been circulated, he acknowledged that bank deposits created by bookkeeping entries in the books of our chartered banks are being substituted for money by saying:

> As every one knows the story of the last century . . . is a story of the general rise of bank deposits to perform the monetary work of the business world.

"And," he should have added, "the monetary work of the government world," because our governments now use cheques transferring bank deposits in the place of money, as does everyone else. He then referred to the power of the chartered banks to expand Bank of Canada bills into alleged bank deposits. At page 3 he said:

> Speaking of the banks as a whole, the proportion or percentage of cash which the banks keep is in practice about ten per cent, and by law it must be at least five per cent. . . . Suppose, for example, that the Bank of Canada buys $10,000,000 worth of securities. Then, no matter from whom it buys those securities, the reserves of the chartered banks as a whole will rise by the amount of $10,000,000.

[Mr. McGeer.]

Then, after explaining that this was an example of open market operation and presenting some details to prove that proposition, he went on to say:

> Thus it is that the security purchases by the Bank of Canada tend to expand bank deposits in the country by approximately ten times the amount of the transaction.

Or, in a word, whenever the Bank of Canada issues $10,000,000 of Bank of Canada bills to buy gold or government securities, the law gives to the chartered banks the power to issue $200,000,000 of chartered bank buying power in bank deposit money in the form of alleged bank deposits. However, the banks, as the Minister of Finance points out, have allegedly overruled the law of parliament and instead of expanding bank credit on a 5 per cent cash reserve basis, they profess to have increased the reserves held to 10 per cent, which, of course, if a true statement, would reduce the amount of bank deposits authorized by parliament on a reserve of $10,000,000 of Bank of Canada bills to the $100,000,000 the minister mentioned. Then the minister went on to explain just how the chartered banks could use that $100,000,000 of bank deposit money to purchase government bills and interest bearing bonds. At this point he said:

> You may ask just how the chartered banks will expand their assets and deposits as a result of open market operations by the Bank of Canada. If the chartered banks can find good borrowers they will tend to increase their ordinary commercial loans, and by so doing increase their deposit liabilities by a similar amount. Otherwise they may buy investment securities which will usually earn them a considerably lower rate, or they may expand partly in one way and partly in the other. Either move will increase the aggregate of deposits of the banking system as a whole.

Now investment securities are government bonds. Therefore, when the Bank of Canada issues $10,000,000 of Bank of Canada bills under our banking laws, the chartered banks are empowered to create $200,000,000 in bank deposits which may be exchanged for treasury bills or any other form of interest-bearing government bonds. So, on the authority of the Minister of Finance, we find that parliament has authorized the chartered banks to create their own buying power with a bookkeeping system which they use to buy government bonds. The bankers thus use the tremendous volume of credit, created by our managed currency system, for which they do not pay interest. It offers a splendid illustration of what we call orthodox finance. It is one of the most dangerous concessions that has ever been issued by a democratic government to private capital.

I know that a long time is going to elapse between the time we establish national ownership of the Bank of Canada and the time when we shall have the fruits of a really national currency policy. But we are on the way. Just as men must know that they cannot run their homes without money and could not run them if those unfriendly to them controlled their money resources, we in government must come to recognize that government cannot afford to be out of control of the nation's currency and credit. I grant that there will come much heavier responsibilites upon government in the administration of a managed currency system where there is no longer the security of the restricted nineteenth century gold standard system. There will be public demands and temptations to overcome, but the standard of intelligence of government to-day is a little different from what it was in John Law's time, or two hundred years or more ago. The problems of managed currency and credit that face us to-day belong to the twentieth century, and it is because they are of the twentieth century that twentieth century democratic government must rise superior to the challenge that these problems present. We cannot go on in the midst of opportunity, worshipping at the shrine of things that are obsolete and ignoring the opportunities for progress that exist. We must find the practical and effective way to finance progress.

I would say that with the establishment of the national ownership of the Bank of Canada we should be able to meet the problem put up to this committee by the leader of the opposition to-night, namely, that of finding a way with this huge reserve of managed currency at our disposal, to put into circulation the funds necessary to give security and peace and order and progress and the production and the use of wealth to Canada and the Canadian people. How can that be done?

With this enormous credit wealth under the control of government, we can reestablish the social services of this dominion, modelling ours along the line of the British plan. I would say that we could greatly improve and extend our old age pension system into a much more generous and christian practice than it is to-day. Possibly we can adopt the sixty year limit, as the leader of the opposition advocated during the election of 1935. We can give definite aid in unemployment insurance and health service programs, and take from the overburdened provinces and municipalities the cost of unemployment relief. We can give contributions in aid of financing needy mothers and children, and contributions in aid of education, which needs to be brought up to twentieth century standards. We can give contributions to the provinces and municipalities for the maintenance of law and order. We can aid in the protection of those who suffer from physical disability, which lessens their capacity for gainful employment. We can do all these things if we will only recognize that we are no longer poor. We can give grants in aid, as Great Britain is doing, for municipal reconstruction and expansion. If these things can be done in Great Britain and other European countries, why cannot we with all our wealth do them? We can improve our urban and rural housing. We can aid in the promotion of better health in the dominion. We can create health centres, gymnasia, amphitheatres equipped with effective health, recreation, and educational facilities.

We can develop our tourist trade. The leader of the opposition has said that we have to meet our national obligations in the United States. No more effective way could be found than in the development of our tourist trade. A great national highway system could be developed, including the building of truly modern highways from all the gateway points on the international boundary line, leading northward to Canadian cities and to our tourist attractions. The beautification of our cities and countryside would give employment and new life to the dominion, and we should give special attention to the commemoration of many places of historical interest, and our unemployed should be at work developing tourist accommodation around Canada's many places of scenic beauty and natural wonder.

National defence is a thing we cannot ignore. We should develop the production at home as far as is practical of every conceivable form of equipment and accoutrement required in the services.

Probably the time has come when we should have a vigorous campaign to reestablish loyalty on the part of Canadian youth to our Canadian country and democratic government, under our constitutional sovereign.

The passage of this bill will mark one of the great milestones in the economic life of Canadian civilization. It is not a step that is going to be retraced. If it is followed with a national currency policy that will put into effect the declarations and promises which the Liberal party made in 1935, we shall have a new Canada, a Canada of a happy and united people, a Canada that will be worthy of everything that the fathers of confederation dreamed we would accomplish in the future.

We lack one thing and one thing only—the means of financing Canadian progress, and with the establishment of national ownership of the Bank of Canada that now comes to us. It will make us not only a happy and united people but something more. It will give us the right to stand forth as a nation on the North American continent, worthy of the traditions of the two great races from which we came, playing our part in partnership with other nations to do something not only for the development of ourselves but for the good of the world that is sadly in need of the kind of leadership which we of the British empire should offer.

I venture to say that if we will look forward to cooperating in the great celebration that is going to take place in the United States next year, when our neighbours celebrate the 150th anniversary of their nation's birth, we can make a contribution to world peace that will be worth while. If, for instance, we were able to induce an international exchange of courtesies that would come to pass with a visit of His Imperial Majesty the King of England and his gracious queen to the north American continent next year, a visit that would include both Canada and the United States, we would be doing something that would send a message of good will throughout all the world! When we realize what is taking place under the tripartite agreement and the very many obligations of France and England to-day, we should, as we pass this bill, dedicate ourselves to something more than a consideration of merely Canadian affairs. Let me say that in our world the progress of human enlightenment, bringing in its wake a more generous measure—

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but he has exhausted his time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

The CHAIRMAN: By unanimous consent.

Mr. McGEER: I just want to say a few words in conclusion. I have studied finance in theory for something over seventeen years. I have had the privilege of sitting in provincial houses and in the executive offices of council chambers, and in all these places I have never known the time in the public life of this dominion when the problem of financing was not the greatest difficulty of government. Every man who has ever been charged with the responsibility of public affairs has found himself face to face with this difficulty. Things that should have been done, things that should have been improved, could not be done or could not be improved because the public authority did not have the money. I think one of the greatest handicaps of democracy has been the apparent refusal of public men to study the problems of practical public finance. They have been treated as something akin to the weather, something over which we had no control, something we did not have the capacity to understand. I sat in the gallery and heard two ministers of finance, being introduced to their chairs, proclaiming the fact that they did not know anything about money; that they never hoped to know anything about money, and that for that reason they expected to be good ministers of finance. Of course that attitude is silly, because our financial institution does not come from on high; it is man-made in every particular of its machination, and every law that has been passed by any parliament or other lawmaking authority at the behest of the financial world has always proven pernicious to posterity and disastrous in the end. For that reason I say that with the nationalization of the Bank of Canada we are moving to a new day for humanity. But I want to confess that in our world the progress of human enlightenment, bringing in its wake more generous measures of human service and wider understanding of social justice, spirals upwards with disheartening slowness.

Old habits of thought, old customs and old-established institutions die hard, if they die at all. Loyalty to the things we know and fear of the new help even bad institutions to persist long after their disturbing and baneful influence is acknowledged by common agreement. Such institutions, particularly those born of self-interest, never die at all, and it seems that they pass away only when we mix the blood of life and the sweat of toil together in the tragedy of death-dealing revolution and war. Yet it is a world in which we cannot lose faith; for its history and tradition, its present and its future, lend it a baffling dignity that inspires us with the nobility of service even in the moments of our greatest trials and defeats.

Ineffectiveness, the handmaiden of impatience, will at times lead us into paths of intolerance and indulgence—those treacherous twin demon offspring of despairing futility. But if we will always remember that while men come and go like bubbles on a stream, a worthy idea once sown in the social consciousness of a people will in time bear good fruit and live on forever, and the will to do well in public service is not likely to perish. If our faith in the destiny of our country is good and true, we are certain to find encouraging consolation even in those irritating delays and disappointing reverses which we ought to know are the steadying and essential punctuation marks of timely and orderly progress. I look upon the nationalization of the Bank of Canada as something of real encouragement.

Yes, I have taken time to-night to put a few moments on some things I wanted to say. I for one believe that Canada can be rebuilt. It is my hope and wish that it will be rebuilt under the kind of leadership which the Liberal government of the day, through its capacity, gained from long years of experience in Canadian affairs, has to offer. The reconstruction of Canada is bound to come. In my humble opinion it will be better if it comes under experienced Liberalism than in any other form. That this Liberal government is now taking upon itself the great responsibility of administering the nation's currency and credit as a public utility in the service of the nation and its people is an indication that the Liberalism of Canada is keeping pace with the progress of the twentieth century. I for one have only one desire, and that is to lend to this government and to the Liberal party whatever service I may have to offer to help to make this government a truly democratic government, serving Canada with all the power and means that the government of Canada has within its power to advance every section of our nation and to help every class of our Canadian people.

Mr. ILSLEY: Possibly it will be the part of wisdom to permit the committee to address its attention to the sections one by one; but some of the remarks which were made, first by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and next by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer), call for, I think, a few observations from myself. In attempting to deal with them I shall have to ask the indulgence of the committee, because I am merely acting in the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), who, I am sure, had he been here, would have wanted to say a few things about the record and functions of the Bank of Canada. The only reason I wish to say anything about it is that I would regret to have the impression go abroad that the Bank of Canada has failed to discharge its functions and to carry out the purposes for which it was incorporated.

The purposes of the Bank of Canada are set out in the preamble of the bill:

> . . . to regulate credit and currency in the best interests of the economic life of the nation, to control and protect the external value of the national monetary unit and to mitigate by its influence fluctuations in the general level of production, trade, prices and employment, so far as may be possible within the scope of monetary action, and generally to promote the economic and financial welfare of the dominion.

The leader of the opposition expressed his disappointment that one of the means by which those objectives might be expected to be attained, that is the use of the rediscount rate, had not been used by the Bank of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: No, that there was no opportunity to use it. It was not the bank's fault.

Mr. ILSLEY: Exactly.

Mr. BENNETT: It was because of conditions.

Mr. ILSLEY: The right hon. gentleman went on to say that the open market operations had not been on the scale expected.

Mr. BENNETT: For the same reason.

Mr. ILSLEY: And as a result of neither one of these methods being utilized, at least to the extent expected, I gathered that he felt some disappointment, perhaps not with the bank, but with the way in which the situation had developed.

Mr. BENNETT: The conditions made it impossible for it thus to function.

Mr. ILSLEY: With regard to the rediscount rate, it is true that the rediscounting of securities of the banks has not been resorted to, at least to any substantial extent. The reason is that the banks have had no occasion to come to the central bank with their securities for sale or for discount or rediscount. But this does not mean that that method of controlling credit and currency is obsolete—

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no.

Mr. ILSLEY: —or that it is permanently out of use. The time may come when the fixing of a rediscount rate either at the low level or on the high level, or the raising or lowering of the rediscount rate, may powerfully operate upon the volume of credit and currency in circulation in Canada. For instance, if there were a boom, the present deposits in the Bank of Canada of commercial banks and the bank notes held by the commercial banks might be regarded by them as entirely inadequate as a base for the amount of their deposits; if that were the case they undoubtedly would wish to rediscount their securities with the Bank of Canada, and the Bank of Canada then would be using that method of control. The same might be true in different circumstances, if the boom were succeeded by a depression.

Now with regard to open market operations—

Mr. McGEER: If the minister is through with that, will he let me ask a question?

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, yes.

Mr. McGEER: We might overlook the exchange of courtesies. What I want to point out is that the minister has indicated there is no need for the banks to get new cash currency. Could he explain why the banks have Bank of Canada cash now amounting to $243,000,000 as against $203,000,000 in 1934, or why there has been an increase of $40,000,000 during four years?

Mr. ILSLEY: I was coming to that. The other method of control is by open market operations; and, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard has pointed out, the amount of deposits of the commercial banks in the Bank of Canada in bank notes has increased between the end of March, 1935, the first month in which the bank was in operation, and the end of April, 1938, by something over $43,000,000. That increase has come about largely by open market operations, that is to say, by the purchase of securities by the Bank of Canada.

I wish now to deal for a moment with the matter of the 5 per cent and 10 per cent. When the Bank of Canada was set up it was never contemplated that this institution should issue its notes and carry deposits to the full extent of four times the gold coverage. The section of the act that relates to the gold coverage is section 26, subsection 2, which reads:

> The reserve required by this section to be maintained shall consist of gold coin and bullion in the unrestricted ownership of the bank equal to an amount not less than twenty-five per centum of the notes and deposit liabilities aforesaid; and may in addition include—

Certain securities are named. It has been suggested, not only by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard but by others, that the bank should see to it that its gold reserve was not more than 25 per cent of its notes and deposit liabilities.

Mr. McGEER: I never said anything like that.

Mr. ILSLEY: The suggestion is that, or it is nothing. Does the hon. member want to deny it?

Mr. McGEER: Absolutely. I never made such a suggestion.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: Other hon. members have suggested it if the hon. gentleman has not. I am glad to hear that he did not make that suggestion, because it was not intended, when this institution was set up, that it should necessarily approach the 25 per cent. I am not sure, but there was some stipulation regarding the matter at the world economic conference of 1933.

Mr. BENNETT: A resolution was passed, and the suggestion was that it was hoped that it would not be used to that extent.

Mr. ILSLEY: The other reference was not to the 25 per cent but to the 5 per cent, which is also mentioned in the act in a later section. Section 27, subsection 1, reads:

> Every chartered bank shall on and after the day on which the bank is authorized to commence business maintain a reserve of not less than five per centum of its deposit liabilities within Canada and such reserve shall consist of a deposit with the bank and of notes of the bank held by such bank.

The hon. gentleman said that the commercial banks had an excess reserve of $103,000,000. That figure is erected upon the basis of the 5 per cent. If 10 per cent were taken as the proper and reasonable reserve ratio, then the banks have no such increased sum, no such unutilized amount at all. As a matter of fact, this legal minimum reserve has never been regarded in this or any other country as the practical reserve, the working reserve, and it is a great fallacy to confuse a practical working reserve ratio with a legal minimum ratio. If you look at the records of the English banks, you will find the reserve ratio from month to month running 10·1, 10·2, 10·1, and so on; and for this country in the last ten years the reserve ratio has been as indicated by the figures I shall now give. In 1926, although there was no legal minimum at all, no law governing the reserve ratio, the banks were of the opinion that it was necessary to maintain a reserve ratio of 10·1. The figures are:

1928	9·1
1929	9·2
1931	8·6
1937	10·1

In other words, the banks are maintaining only the reserve ratio that is necessary in the light of experience, namely, approximately 10 per cent.

Mr. CAHAN: Sufficient to keep them, from day to day, from going into bankruptcy.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, so that they may be able to meet sudden demands made upon them for cash. The expansion of the reserve between Bank of Canada notes in the hands of the banks and the deposits in the bank from $200,000,000 on March 31, 1935, to $243,000,000 on April 30, 1938, has been accompanied by a corresponding increase in deposits in the Canadian banks. I shall give the figures. The deposits in the banks on March 31, 1935, were $2,033,600,000, and on April 30, 1938, they had increased to $2,455,000,000, an increase of something over $400,000,000 I would point out that the proportion of cash reserves to deposits on March 31, 1935, was about 10 per cent and the proportion on April 30, 1938, was about 10 per cent. The cash reserve increased during that period by 21·2 per cent, and the deposits increased during the period by 20·2 per cent. That, I submit, is a healthy expansion of Canadian deposits during that period.

It is a matter of judgment how much deposits should be forced up by the operations of the central bank. But when we come to consider whether that expansion has been reasonable or unreasonable, we have the experience of the United Kingdom to compare with our own. We find that in the United Kingdom the cash reserve on March 31, 1935, amounted to £214,000,000, with total deposits at that time of £1,923,300,000. By April 30, 1938, the reserve had increased to £246,400,000, or an increase of 15·1 per cent, and the deposits had increased to £2,268,000,000, or an increase of 17·9 per cent. If, therefore, the United Kingdom be taken as the model, as the hon. gentleman certainly indicated the other night that he thought it should, we have expanded our cash reserves and deposits in Canada considerably more than in the United Kingdom for the corresponding period, that is to say, the period between the establishment of the Bank of Canada and the present time.

I put these figures and facts on the record because it is not well for the impression to go out that the Bank of Canada has done nothing. That is not the case, and it is not well for the impression to go out that the country is pursuing a deflationary policy. It is not so. The policy has been an easy money or reflationary policy. It has been the policy which the government certainly believed was indicated by the conditions of the time. Of course we have not gone so far as the hon. gentleman has suggested we should go. He painted a picture of huge expenditures in every department of our national life. I am sure that if the Minister of Finance were here he would say, and I certainly believe, that if we went to any such extent as that we should be embarking upon a most dangerous policy of inflation, such as has ruined many countries.

Mr. HEAPS: I understand that the government intends to buy back the outstanding shares from the public at $59.20. In other words, it will cost the government $920,000 more to buy back the shares than the public paid for them. If, in 1934, the government of the day had accepted the advice of those who sit in this section of the house, the country would have been spared that expense. Is $59.20 the price the government is going to pay for those shares? Personally I think they ought to be bought back at the price at which they were issued plus accrued interest. Can the minister give any information as to that?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is dealt with in a later section of the bill and perhaps can be discussed when we reach that section. But the price is fixed at $59.20. The hon. gentleman said that the shares were bought by the public at $50. It is true they were issued at $50, but of course a great many purchases were made by present shareholders at much more than $50. In fact $59.20 is the average of the prices paid for the shares since the beginning of the present year.

Mr. COLDWELL: But the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) is that had the bank been made a national institution at the beginning, that increase would not have to be paid by the government; that amount would have been saved to the Dominion of Canada. The Dominion of Canada is paying $9.20 a share for having issued these shares to the general public.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is true, of course, that if there had never been any shares issued, the question would not have arisen; they would not have been bought or sold.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I do not wish to interrupt the committee; but the government are anxious to devote a little time to-day to the elections bill, and if it is agreeable to hon. members I would ask that the committee rise and report progress.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I make just one statement first?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I have been amazed, as have most hon. members, at statements made this evening. The chartered banks owe:

Their shareholders for the sums they have put into the enterprise;

Their customers the amount of their deposits, payable either on demand or on notice.

To meet those liabilities the banks own buildings, cash, loans and government securities. In no case, by any legerdemain, can a bank ever have government or other securities in excess of its deposits. And if hon. members will take the trouble to look at the returns of the chartered banks, they will find that deposits are liabilities on their balance sheets and not assets.

Progress reported.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

MEASURE RESPECTING FRANCHISE OF ELECTORS, ELECTION OF MEMBERS OF HOUSE OF COMMONS AND PRINTING AND PUBLICATION OF ELECTION DOCUMENTS

The house resumed from Friday, June 24, consideration in committee of Bill No. 91, respecting the franchise of electors and the election of members of the House of Commons—Mr. Power—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 14—Qualifications.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): When this bill was last being considered by the committee, section 14 was allowed to stand at the request of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). Subsection 1 of that section refers to electors who ordinarily reside in the division. My hon. friend objected to the use of the word "ordinarily," and to meet his objection I am prepared to offer an amendment to subsection 1 of section 14, that the word "ordinarily" be deleted from line 45, page 11.

Mr. MacNICOL: Will the minister explain?

Mr. BOTHWELL: When the committee were considering this, the intention was that an elector would have to be in the electoral district on the date of the issue of the writ of election. Subsection 1 provides that he must be not only in the electoral district but also ordinarily resident in the polling subdivision. If we leave that word out the section would read:

> (d) was ordinarily resident in the electoral district at the date of the issue of the writ for the pending election; and at a by-election has continued to be ordinarily resident therein until polling day.

It is considered that it would be hardly fair to require that although a man resided for a number of years in an electoral district, he should be prohibited from voting if he had moved even temporarily into a different polling subdivision in the same electoral district.

Mr. STEWART: I do not follow the chairman of the committee at all. There is no word that has caused more difficulty in connection with the franchise than the word "residence," and what shall be deemed to be residence and constitutes residence under different conditions. I take it that the purpose in using this word "ordinarily" was to clarify the situation and make it clear that what was meant, and what I think should be meant, is a man's ordinary residence; not an extraordinary residence, not a temporary residence, not a residence that has been recently acquired or may have been acquired for some particular purpose, but where he is ordinarily resident in the ordinary course of things. It seems to me that goes right to the root of the whole matter. We have to consider 245 constituencies and what is of sound application to the great majority of those, rather than what might arise in one or two or half a dozen of them. It seems to me there is very sound reason for retaining the word "ordinarily." There was not a question about it in the committee at all.

Paragraph (d) reads:

> Was ordinarily resident in the electoral district at the date of the issue of the writ.

Surely that means ordinarily regularly resident.

Mr. BOTHWELL: That remains. We are striking out the word "ordinarily" only in the first subsection on page 11. We also retain paragraph (d) on page 12, and also all of section 16, which defined "ordinarily resident" and "ordinarily resided." We are referring only to the word "ordinarily" in line forty-five of page 11, the third to the last line.

Mr. CAHAN: Why muss up the matter then, as you are doing?

Mr. BOTHWELL: The only objection to having "ordinarily" in that particular place is that it compels the elector to be resident in the same polling subdivision in the same electoral district. He has to reside in the same electoral district.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly that is not the statute as it stands. We fought this all out at great length in committee. Section 14 states:

> Save as hereinafter provided every person, man or woman, shall be qualified to vote and be entitled to be registered as an elector on the list of electors for the polling division in which he or she ordinarily resides at the time of the preparation and revision of the list of electors therefor.

If an elector applies to have his or her name placed on the list, or if the enumerators place a name on the list, it should be placed on the list for the polling division, which I assume is the polling section, in which that person resides. There is no doubt about it.

An hon. MEMBER: Subsection 3 of section 16 goes pretty far.

Mr. CAHAN: That is all right. When we considered the matter the debate ran something like this, that an elector might at a general revision be placed on the list for a particular polling section or division, as it is called here; then the same lists would be the lists for a subsequent by-election. If there had been removal in the meantime of the elector from one polling section to another in the same electoral division, then under subsection 3 of section 16 that elector could vote in the polling section in which he was registered, although in the meantime he may have removed to another polling section in the division.

But certainly it seems to me there can be no objection to the fact that an elector is registered for the polling division in which he ordinarily resides. If you change it, it means this, that, although not ordinarily residing in the polling division, an elector may be placed upon a list in a polling division five or ten or fifty miles away from the place where he resides, in which there can be no supervision over his identity, and no neighbours who know as to whether or not he is properly on the list.

But if, when the general revision of the lists takes place before a general election, he is entered on the lists for the polling division in which he resides, and then subsequently, before the next by-election, moves into another polling division in the same electoral district, then subsection 3 of section 16 preserves his right to vote. It seems to me that if you make a change you are complicating matters very much.

Mr. NEILL: The trouble arises from the close definition placed on the words "ordinarily resident." Under section 16 it now practically requires that a man be registered in the place where his wife lives.

Mr. CAHAN: Not necessarily.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, necessarily. Section 16, subsection 3 states:

> A person can have only one place of ordinary residence. . . . Although, generally, a person's place of ordinary residence is where his family is. . . .

Then it goes on to refer to the case where he might be permanently separated from his family. The putting in of the word "ordinarily" will deprive a large number of people of their vote, and would open the door to make it easier for a certain amount of impersonation. We are asking to go back to the law which was in force in 1930, and for a number of years before that. No abuse had ever taken place under it, and no persons—

Mr. CAHAN: I differ from that. The statement shows that the hon. member is not acquainted with affairs in some of the other provinces.

Mr. NEILL: Then the hon. member admits that this regulation has been in force before?

Mr. STEWART: He admits it has been abused.

Mr. NEILL: And we only ask that we go back to the law as it was in force prior to the changes made in 1934. The hon. member says there would be no supervision about his being put on the list. Certainly there is supervision. If his name is placed on the list in a logging camp, there is a rural registrar there who knows every man in the camp. It may be a small community not exceeding a hundred people altogether, and certainly the registrar, who is generally the bookkeeper, is in a thorough position to know whether a person is entitled to be put on or not. The fact that he is there is evidence of that portion of it.

As I say, we are only asking to go back to the conditions which existed before. Much attention has been directed to the words "ordinarily resident" in the Dominion of Canada and in the electoral district. But I should like to emphasize the fact that there are three conditions imposed. One is that he must be ordinarily resident in Canada. We are not proposing to interfere with that at all. The second is that he must be ordinarily resident in the electoral district. We are not proposing to interfere with that at all either, although I would like to. We only ask that he be allowed to be registered in the polling division in which he is then living.

The other night I gave an illustration of North Vancouver, which is part rural and part urban. A man has his wife there. The term

"ordinarily resident" is interpreted, according to section 16, to mean the place where he has his wife and family. He is registered in North Vancouver, and in order to get a living—which is the right of every man, surely—he moves away to a logging camp in the northern part of the district, and goes to poll in the logging camp. If he comes there before the issue of the writ, he should be eligible to be registered in that polling division. The employer knows he is there, and there is no possibility of putting in names which should not be put in. He is well known and he is identified. Further on, when he comes to take the vote, under section 46, he has to be identified by a man then on the list.

I would ask the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George to point out where the use of the word "ordinarily" has led to abuse in the past—

Mr. CAHAN: There were great abuses which were remedied by the use of the word "ordinarily."

Mr. REID: What would the answer of the hon. member be to a situation like this: We will say there are three hundred fishermen from a district away up north when registration takes place. They would be registered perhaps three hundred miles away from that district, if the word "ordinarily" were taken out. But on voting day they would be in the New Westminster constituency. I am just afraid that under this proposal they would be disfranchised because they would not be anywhere near the place they were registered when the registration took place.

Mr. NEILL: I appreciate what my hon. friend has said, and I should like to join with him in having it apply, not only to the polling division but to the electoral division, in order to allow a man to go from one electoral district to another. However, I realize that this would be difficult to get through this house this year because it would meet with a lot of objection. So we have accepted the lesser possibility of having it apply only within the electoral district. If a constituent of the hon. member moves from New Westminster to some other part of his district, he will be allowed to vote if his amendment passes; but if he moves to another electoral district, he could not vote, with the way the measure reads now.

Mr. CAHAN: I think the hon. member is taking an entirely erroneous view of subsection 3 of section 16 which reads:

A person can have only one place of ordinary residence and it cannot be lost unless or until another is gained. Although, generally, a person's place of ordinary residence is where his family is, if he is living apart from his family, with the intent to remain so apart from it in another place, the place of ordinary residence of such person is such other place.

I suggest that if a voter's family is in Vancouver and he is employed in some other part of British Columbia—

Mr. NEILL: Of the electoral district.

Mr. CAHAN: Out of the electoral district.

Mr. NEILL: It must be the same electoral district; it can be only a different polling division.

Mr. CAHAN: I was dealing with subsection 3. If he is employed in some other place, then the real purpose and intent of subsection 3 of section 16, as we discussed it, is that he might be resident apart from his family and employed for the time being in another place. Then, whether he was in that electoral district or in another, he could register in the place where he was temporarily employed, even though that was apart from the family residence. But when you come to enumeration, unless you register the proposed voter in the polling division where he is resident at the time, grave complications will certainly ensue; for you will be faced with great difficulty in verifying the identity of that person if he is allowed to register anywhere in an electoral district, despite the fact that he is ordinarily resident in only one polling division of that electoral district.

Mr. POWER: The objection taken by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is one that would apply to all far-flung constituencies. For instance, it would apply in the constituency of His Honour, The Speaker, Charlevoix-Saguenay. A man from Murray Bay might move down the north shore to be employed during the late summer, the autumn and the winter in a lumber camp. The hon. member for Comox-Alberni wishes to make a distinction between that residence and ordinary residence, as defined in section 16. To his mind "ordinary residence" is perhaps too narrow and too strict a destinction. If we take section 14 and leave out the word "ordinary," we would be providing that he is to be registered in the polling subdivision where he resides, and not where he ordinarily resides. Under paragraph (d) of subsection 1 of section 14 he must have been ordinarily resident in the electoral district. So that the man from Murray Bay who is living at Comeau Bay at the time of the registration could register and vote at Comeau Bay provided he was ordinarily resident in the electoral district of Charlevoix-Saguenay.

Mr. CAHAN: That is perfectly proper.

Mr. POWER: That is all that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is asking for. Let us see if we meet him.

Mr. CAHAN: You are giving him more than that.

Mr. POWER: Let us see if we have tried to meet him. I understand the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George has no objection to a man being allowed to vote in another electoral subdivision provided he remains in the same constituency in which he ordinarily resides. We all agree that that difficulty should be dealt with.

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, except that he should be registered in the polling section in which he is residing at the time of enumeration.

Mr. POWER: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni contends that the words "ordinarily resident" are perhaps too narrow, because the man from Murray Bay who is in the lumber camp at Comeau Bay or working in the mill there would not be residing with his wife, would not be residing in his ordinary domicile.

Mr. CAHAN: That is true, but it is not necessary that he should be residing there, under the section as at present drafted.

Mr. POWER: The hon. member for Comox-Alberni was referring to subsection 3 which states that the place of ordinary residence of a man is where his family is. In the case of the Murray Bay man, his place of ordinary residence would be there.

Mr. CAHAN: The statute in section 16, subsection 1 makes provision for him.

Mr. POWER: If he is living apart from his family with the intent to remain so apart from it in another place, the place of ordinary residence of such person is such other place. He must be living apart with intent to remain apart, not with the intent to come home at Christmas and so on.

Mr. CAHAN: There is the difficulty. If you put it that he is living apart from his wife with the intent to remain apart until the election, all right, but then he should also not be registered in the polling section in which he ordinarily resides.

Mr. POWER: That is all we want to do.

Mr. CAHAN: That is common ground, but the suggestion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni seems to go far beyond that because he misreads another section.

Mr. POWER: In the 1930 act section 29 read exactly the same as section 14 in this bill, except that the word "ordinarily" was left out. Section 16 of this bill was section 29A of the act of 1930, and it reads exactly the same. The reason why I referred to the constituency of Charlevoix-Saguenay was on account of the fact that some discussion arose at that time. His Honour, the Speaker, brought this matter to the attention of the house, and the only thought we had then was to allow a man to vote in the same electoral district. Should he have been residing in the same electoral district at the time of registration, he could register at the place where he was actually in residence. The definition of "ordinarily resident" is too severe to cover the case of that man. There was never any question of allowing him to vote in another electoral district, nor will that be the effect of the proposed amendment.

Mr. STEWART: Looking at section 16, which has been read in connection with this, you will find that all it proposes to do is to define residence. It does not give any qualification whatever. It purports to explain the rules, principles and facts upon which you determine residence.

Mr. POWER: Ordinary residence.

Mr. STEWART: Exactly. It gives no qualifications whatever. Section 14 comes under the heading "qualifications and disqualifications of electors," and reads in part as follows:

> Save as hereinafter provided every person, man or woman, shall be qualified to vote and be entitled to be registered as an elector on the list of electors for the polling division—

That means any polling division in any electoral district. You cannot get away from that. He is entitled to be registered in any polling division—

Mr. POWER: But go on to paragraph (d).

Mr. STEWART: Subsection 1 continues:

> —in which he or she ordinarily resides.

What is contended here is that if you leave out the word "ordinarily," the person would be entitled to register in any polling division in which he or she resides, not within the constituency at all.

Mr. POWER: You have to read that with paragraph (d)—in the constituency in which he was ordinarily resident.

Mr. STEWART: No.

Mr. POWER: You have to read it with paragraph (d).

Mr. STEWART: I have read it with paragraph (d), and I cannot read it as the minister does. Paragraph (d) states:

(d) was ordinarily resident in the electoral district at the date of the issue of the writ for the pending election.

Mr. POWER: Read subsection 1, which provides that every person shall be qualified to vote and be entitled to be registered:

. . . as an elector on the list of electors for the polling division in which he or she ordinarily resides.

Leave out "ordinarily," and say "in which he or she resides." That is, where they have their actual place of residence at the time of the preparation of the list of electors. And then follows paragraph (d)—if he or she "was ordinarily resident in the electoral district." That is the way it would read. So he cannot be registered outside the electoral district in which he is ordinarily resident, and "ordinarily resident" is defined as being resident in the electoral district where his family lives, and so on.

Mr. STEWART: You get back to the fundamental principle that it is in the interests of a proper election that a person should vote in the district where he is known and resides.

Mr. POWER: Does the hon. member mean electoral district or polling division?

Mr. STEWART: Polling division also.

Mr. POWER: Then my hon. friend does not agree with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George. I thought the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George and I were in agreement, that he had no objection to a man voting in another polling division provided he bona fide was ordinarily resident in a certain electoral district. Am I right in that?

Mr. CAHAN: That is the statement which I am contending against. I am contending that he should be on the enumerators' list in the polling section in which he ordinarily resides.

Mr. POWER: Make a distinction between residing actually and residing ordinarily.

Mr. CAHAN: I know that residence and domicile have an almost infinite number of meanings, and the words "ordinarily resident" were used in both cases in order to be consistent all the way through.

Mr. POWER: Quite.

Mr. CAHAN: If my hon. friend will allow me to make my case, then I am done. Take my own constituency, a very large one. With a great deal of time and care and watchfulness I can verify the identity of those who are enumerated in a certain polling section of that constituency; but if you allow a man or a woman to be registered in other polling sections, even in the same electoral district, I cannot verify the identity of these electors, and the reason why I was so anxious to retain the word "ordinarily," is that it is one of the best safeguards against impersonation. If he ordinarily resides in the polling section, he is more likely to be known in that polling section.

Mr. POWER: The case would hardly arise in my hon. friend's constituency, I submit, because a man would hardly have his family on St. Catherine street and he himself be an actual resident of St. Antoine street; I am just assuming these streets are in my hon. friend's constituency. Or, let us say, a man would hardly be actually—not ordinarily—but actually and physically residing on Guy street and have his family on St. Catherine street. Would he? It would not occur, would it?

Mr. CAHAN: I will not deal with the federal electoral list, but I could show you in St. Lawrence-St. George several hundred cases of that sort of thing. A family may be resident in a certain street. The man is employed away and lives and sleeps a greater part of his time in another street, with the result that under the former description there were not only hundreds but possibly thousands of men—men especially—who were entered on the city lists in the polling divisions in which they worked and resided part of the week, and it was difficult to follow them. If there is difficulty with section 16, subsection 1, I am quite willing to agree with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, and will amend the twenty-first line on page 14, "if he is living apart from his family, with the intent to remain so apart from it in another place" by adding "pending the election," or similar words.

Mr. POWER: If you leave out, "if he is living apart from his family—"

Mr. CAHAN: "with the intent to remain so apart from it in another place."

Mr. POWER: I have no objection to allowing the section to stand.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I should like to explain the conflicting views in connection with this clause. In considering it the special committee had to take into consideration this fact, that some people were going to be disqualified in any event when the election came on. The hon. member for New Westminster has just given an illustration of a case that might arise in his constituency where, on the date of the issue of the writ, people were residing in another part of the constituency. If the amendment that is suggested went through, when it comes to election day, they are back home where they ordinarily reside and not where they were residing when the writ was issued.

Mr. HEAPS: Could they not be registered at the time of the enumeration?

Mr. REID: They would be registered three hundred miles away.

Mr. BOTHWELL: We had to fix some date for residence. This matter was discussed in committee at great length, and in spite of the amendment which is being proposed to meet conflicting views and to get a decision from this committee, I am quite prepared to vote for the clause and support the members who agreed on the clause in the special committee, because we considered it all there. The question, however, is open to argument, and I believe that some people are going to be refused the ballot when election day comes, either in the case described by the hon. member for New Westminster or in the case described by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni.

Mr. STEWART: One feature of this which I overlooked, and as to which I think we shall all agree, is the necessity of as far as possible avoiding duplications of names upon the list. Let us see what will happen. An enumerator comes to a house, and he asks the names of all the members of that family who are entitled to vote. He puts them down on his list, and under the provisions of this bill he is entitled to include any member of that family who is temporarily away and who intends to return.

Mr. POWER: That covers the fishermen.

Mr. STEWART: So he puts down the name of A.B. in his polling division, as he has a right to do and as the legislation contemplates because that is his ordinary residence. But A.B. is away in another polling division, and under this amendment he, being there, would have a right to say, "I want my name on that polling division, the polling division where I am." What is the result? You have him on where he ordinarily resides, and you have him where he temporarily resides. You have duplication and the possibility of impersonation. The measure is all framed on the basis of a man being qualified to vote where he ordinarily resides, and to adopt the amendment will result, I submit, in many instances of duplication. When you get duplication, you have the door open for personation and for double voting.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: It seems to me that if we drop the word "ordinarily" out of section 14, subsection 1 of the bill, everybody would come in under the exceptions as cited in section 16—clergymen, teachers and students. Where they are really resident in two places they have the option. I am sure that was not the object or purpose of the committee.

Mr. POWER: I moved the amendment only in order to try to meet the wishes of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni, who seemed to have made out a fairly good case. If, as appears, the committee is almost unanimously against it, I am quite willing to withdraw the amendment.

Mr. NEILL: The hon. member sitting behind me said that this might come in under the provisions of section 16. I would be quite agreeable if he would kindly insert "miner, logger, fisherman and seaman" along with "clergyman, teacher and student." That is what I am objecting to. It is class legislation. You let these three classes in under exactly similar conditions, or rather with fewer qualifications. To hon. members who are so afraid of a man from one electoral district voting in another let me say we are not asking for that, but under the provisions of section 16 a minister, a teacher or a pupil can vote not only in another polling division but in another electoral district. We are not asking for that. We shall be satisfied if you will allow these classes I have mentioned to vote only under circumstances where they are living in the same electoral district but have moved into another polling division. Some of the explanations are down at the bottom of the page and some are at the top of the next page. This is the way the old act would read if the word "ordinarily," was left out. We will just take it out and see if there is any objection as we go along: "Every person shall be qualified to vote in the polling division in which he resides at the time of the preparation of the list"—that is after the issue of the writ—"if"—these are the conditions—"(a) he is twenty-one years old, (b) a British subject, and (c) has been ordinarily"—we will leave that word there—"resident in Canada for the twelve months immediately preceding polling day," and "(d) was ordinarily resident in the electoral district at the date of the issue of the writ." Those are the conditions when, even with the word "ordinarily" removed, a man could register only in the polling division in which he was then living. That was the old act. It worked well before; why should it not act now? If you strike out these men, you are going to disfranchise—one of the hon. members for Vancouver contradicted me when I said twenty per cent would be disfranchised; he said, more than that. From my knowledge of conditions I suggest that if you are going to disfranchise those men you will kindly disfranchise the parson and the teacher and the student as well. We will treat them all alike if you are going to treat these men on a bad basis.

Mr. CAHAN: Will the hon. gentleman, in view of section 16, subsection 1, explain how you disfranchise them?

Mr. NEILL: Because when a man goes to register in a logging camp, let us say, the man there says to him, "I would be glad to put you on; you have been here since the day of the issue of the writ, but I have to follow the wording of the act, which says 'ordinarily resident,' and according to section 16 your home is the place to which you intend to return."

Mr. CAHAN: And how far would the logging camp be from the home?

Mr. MacNEIL: Three hundred miles.

Mr. NEILL: It might be two hundred miles. Section 16 says "ordinarily resident": the place of his habitation or home whereto, when away therefrom, he intends to return. He does intend to return. The man could be registered by the one who employs him or by a brother employee who knows he is on the paylist. I do not see how any corruption could occur, and the best proof is that it has not taken place, at least in British Columbia.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to ask the hon. member for Comox-Alberni how this example I am going to give would be taken care of if the word "ordinarily" is left out. I have in mind a family who lived in Uxbridge, Ontario. The head of the house worked during the election away up in northern Ontario, that is the northern part of the riding of Ontario, perhaps a hundred miles away from home.

Mr. NEILL: The same electoral district?

Mr. MacNICOL: The same electoral district. His wife, naturally, registered him at the home in Uxbridge, because he was away only for a few months working on roads in Muskoka, and he was also registered where he worked up in Muskoka. Therefore his name is on both lists. How could you prevent him from voting in both places? How would you prevent impersonation?

Mr. NEILL: The only place where he could vote would be the place where he was. He would not be put on at his home town.

Mr. POWER: Oh, yes, he would. His wife would put him on.

[Mr. Neill.]

Mr. STEWART: I do not want to take up the time of the committee, but I think the hon. member for Comox-Alberni has overlooked an essential difference between the case we are considering and that of a clergyman. The case we are considering under this section is based upon the fact that there is no change of residence, for the man is a resident of the electoral district all the time. But in the case of the clergyman, the school teacher and the others to whom he has referred there has been an actual change of residence. These men have gone out of one constituency into another and have thereby lost any right to vote. It is for that reason that there is a saving clause in connection with cases of that kind.

Mr. NEILL: In order to give them the vote?

Mr. STEWART: Yes, because they have lost it, because they have changed their residence.

Mr. NEILL: So has my man.

Mr. STEWART: No, he has not. That is just the difference. He is still a resident of the electoral district. The hon. member's whole argument is based on the contention that his man is still a resident of the electoral district. Therefore he has not lost his vote as the clergyman and the teacher and the others referred to have lost their votes, through having moved into another constituency. That is why there is a special provision to take care of them.

Mr. NEILL: Yes. The only difference is that the case made by the hon. member for Leeds is a great deal worse. He wants to give the vote to men of the classes he mentions when they have moved to another electoral district altogether. We only say that the man should be allowed to vote at another polling division when he is living in the same electoral district. According to the hon. member's argument, if you allow it in his case you must allow it with greater force in mine. The primary object should be to give every man a vote, and that is why the parson is allowed to be reregistered in an electoral district into which he has moved. We are not going as far as that, but we are satisfied to say that as long as a man remains in the same electoral district he should be given a chance to vote in the polling division in which he resides. The hon. member for Leeds says that he has not forfeited his right to vote in the place where he started from, but he is prevented, because a poor working man cannot afford to go back 100 or 150 miles to vote. It would cost him $25 and he would lose his job. The question is, Do we or do we not want to have him vote. Do we want the proletariat, a word so often abused, to have a chance to vote? I know a good many of these men would vote against me, and I do not intend to run again, anyhow. I am merely fighting for the general principle. We fought this matter out ten years ago; the provision was made, and no harm came of it. A couple of thousand people in British Columbia alone will be affected.

Mr. CAHAN: We wish every man to have a vote; but the committee has taken strong ground against permitting one man to have two votes, one man to be entered twice on the list, so that he can vote in one place himself, and offer facilities for somebody else to impersonate him where his name is on the other list. That is the evil we have to meet.

Mr. DUPUIS: What is in the mind of the law? Who is going to establish the ordinary residence of an elector? The elector himself, I submit. Even if he is temporarily absent from the real, ordinary residence of his family, and if he informs the officer that the other place where he lived is his ordinary residence, who will condemn him for having so declared and for voting there, even though, with the words "ordinarily resident," his family are allowed to have his name registered in his absence? I do not see much difference.

Mr. MacINNIS: I rise to support the amendment, and the arguments in favour of it put forward by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. In British Columbia we have recognized for the past twenty-five years that there were a great many people entitled to vote who could not vote on election day where they ordinarily reside. That is, in the polling division or even in the electoral district where they live. As a matter of fact, the amendment, although it helps some, will not make it possible for a great many in British Columbia to vote. We have miners, loggers, fishermen and sailors who go away from their homes for six, seven, eight or nine months, and they may be away on election day. We shall have to find some means whereby these people can vote, if elections are to have any meaning to them at all. What is the use of talking about democracy and democratic methods to a man who cannot vote on election day? That is what these men will say. They will tell you, "I have been in this province for so many years and have not yet been able to cast a vote." As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni pointed out, if we have made provision for teachers and preachers to vote, why not make provision for more useful people to vote, the people who do the world's work?

Mr. POWER: Look behind you.

Mr. MacINNIS: It is not necessary for me to look behind me; there are so many lawyers in front of me.

An hon. MEMBER: What is the hon. member's solution?

Mr. MacINNIS: In British Columbia we have worked out a solution which we have observed for years, and which no one would think of discarding. In the last federal act we were able to have it included in a partial way, but we were told that there was the question of expense. There was a cost of so many dollars per vote.

Mr. STEWART: Sixty-three dollars.

Mr. MacINNIS: Yes; I have known of votes that were cheaper and votes that were dearer than that. I am satisfied that it would not cost half that if the officials carrying on the election were properly instructed. I submit that this committee, if they are going to attach any value whatever to elections, will have to find ways by which people who are away from home on election day, and indeed for months before and months after that day, can exercise their franchise.

Mr. O'NEILL: I support the remarks of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni and the hon. member for Vancouver East. In the constituency which I represent in British Columbia, if there were an election right now, there would be from four to five hundred men who would not have a vote. That condition should not obtain, and I think it can be remedied. The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George is fearful that some fellow may vote twice. I think it is far more injurious to democracy for one man to be deprived of his vote than for some fellow to have voted twice. After all, there is a law that protects us, and if a man votes twice he can be sent to penitentiary. That is a consideration which will restrain most men.

Mr. POWER: It was with a view to obtaining peace and making a certain amount of progress that I moved the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni. Perhaps we could settle our difficulties if we had a division. Personally, I am willing to vote for the amendment, which I moved merely as a matter of compromise. If we have a vote, I think we shall get on a little faster.

Mr. NEILL: Does the minister not think that if we slept over it to-night, better thoughts might prevail to-morrow? Suppose we allow it to stand and go on to some of the other sections? When hon. members read in Hansard the report of these proceedings they will appreciate the situation and they may take a different view. The hon. member for Vancouver East very properly raised the point that it should apply also to the electoral district. If we are to have a scrap, let us have a substantial one, and that would meet the objection of the hon. member for New Westminster as well. That was our ambition to begin with. For the sake of peace we gave away a third of our birthright, and we are satisfied to accept this condition that it should apply only to the polling division within the electoral district. That was going a very long way out of our way; and as the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. O'Neill) says, Why should men be disfranchised? If we are going to make provision for people away from home as we have done in section 16, for the parson—I have every respect for the parson—and the teacher and the student, why should we not make provision for the sailor and the farmer and the logger and people of that kind, especially when we want it done only inside the electoral district, whereas these others are going to get the privilege of moving from one electoral district to another? There is no doubt that paragraphs (c) and (d) of section 14 are ancillary—I do not think that is the word—are a condition of the words used in subsection 1, which states:

Save as hereinafter provided every person, man or woman, shall be qualified to vote and be entitled to be registered as an elector on the list of electors for the polling division in which he or she ordinarily resides—

Or "resides," if justice prevailed.

—at the time of the preparation and revision of the list of electors therefor if—

Now "if" means there is a condition attached. There happen to be quite a number.

—he or she

(a) is of the full age of twenty-one years or will attain the full age of twenty-one years on or before polling day at the pending election; and—

This is another condition:

(b) is a British subject by birth or naturalization: and

Here is a further condition:

(c) has been ordinarily resident in Canada for the twelve months immediately preceding polling day at the pending election; and

That covers the provision about ordinary residence in Canada, and (d) deals with the electoral district:

(d) was ordinarily resident in the electoral district at the date of the issue of the writ for the pending election; and at a by-election has continued to be ordinarily resident therein until polling day.

[Mr. Neill.]

The word "ordinarily" is allowed there. That ties him down to the electoral district. The amendment comes in only as regards the polling division. The effect will be as it was in 1930; ordinarily resident in Canada, ordinarily resident in the electoral district and resident in the polling division. I might quote the affidavit, form 45 to illustrate. That has been in force ever since I have been in politics I think:

Oath of person whose name is not on the official list of electors for a rural polling division and who is qualified to vote.

(sec. 46)

(1) You swear (or affirm) that you are a British subject of the full age of twenty-one years; that you have been ordinarily resident in Canada for the last twelve months and that you were ordinarily resident in this electoral district on the ..... day of ..... 19.. (naming the date of the issue of the writ of election); (and, at a by-election, you have continued to be ordinarily resident in this electoral district until to-day).

He has to take that oath, so it is fully protected.

(2) That you now reside in this polling division.

That form has been like that since 1921; they only had to take the oath that they "now reside" in this polling division. Why we should change it at this date, I do not know.

(3) That you are not within any of the classes of persons who lack qualification or are disqualified by reason of appointment to judicial office, employment in this electoral district for pay or reward in reference to the pending election, race, crime, mental incapacity or disfranchisement for corrupt or illegal practices;

(4) That you have not received anything nor has anything been promised to you directly or indirectly, in order to induce you to vote or to refrain from voting at this election; and

(5) That you have not already voted at this election or been guilty of any corrupt or illegal practice in relation thereto. So help you God.

Then there is a note that when the elector is a clergyman, teacher, pupil or summer resident, there will, at his request, be substituted for the first paragraph of this oath the appropriate alternative. That shows that it was originally intended, and has been all down the years since 1921 at any rate, that they were to be given the opportunity of voting in the polling division in which they then reside. I call attention to the fact that the explanation offered on the page opposite page 60 reads as follows:

Section 46. No change. At present these provisions appear in s. 46A of the act.

That is, to put it mildly, a false statement, and possibly led some members of the committee to agree to the insertion of this word "ordinarily," because they looked and said, "Oh this is the same as it was before; there is no change." It is not the same as it was before, because the word "ordinarily" has been put in and it changes it substantially. I would not be surprised if that influenced the members in the committee, because on Friday when we were going through this bill and came to a section and read the explanation "no change," someone said, "Carried," and it went right through. But where it said there has been a change, someone wanted an explanation and the thing was threshed out. There is the no doubt inadvertent misstatement that there is no change. There has been a change. All we are asking is that the provision be left as it was before. It might be possible to put in an amendment to the effect—as it seems to be inimical to our good friends from Quebec rather than the west—that it apply only to British Columbia and possibly the northern part of Ontario, because there must be similar conditions there. I am sorry we have not heard from hon. members from that section. I was hoping to hear from the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor), because I think his district contains similar conditions.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I am supporting the hon. member.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. MacNEIL: It is eleven o'clock.

An hon. MEMBER: Half a minute.

Mr. NEILL: Well, I will raise this further point: We will not have any snap vote just when the clock is striking; it upsets one's judgment. It is now eleven o'clock.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, June 28, 1938

The house met at eleven o'clock.

On section 1—Control sample.

Mr. GARDINER: I have an amendment which I shall ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) to move.

That in paragraph (c) of section 1 the words "plant products division district office" be deleted and the following words substituted therefor:

"District office of the plant products division, production service of the Department of Agriculture."

Mr. STIRLING: What does that change actually mean?

Mr. GARDINER: It was thought wise by the Department of Justice that the words "Department of Agriculture" should be added in order to make it definite that this branch is in that department.

Mr. STIRLING: And the words "production service?"

Mr. GARDINER: That is just a change in the name from the old legislation, made necessary by the reorganization.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—Official sample.

Mr. GARDINER: There is the same amendment in connection with this section.

Mr. ROGERS: I move:

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND INDEBTEDNESS, AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue—for the Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to authorize the Canadian National Railway Company to issue securities not exceeding $17,574,233 in principal amount to provide the moneys necessary to meet expenditures made and indebtedness incurred by the companies or railways comprised in the National Railway system during the calendar year 1938; to authorize the governor in council to guarantee the principal, interest and sinking funds of such securities; and to authorize the making of temporary loans to the said company secured by such securities and not exceeding $17,574,233 in principal amount to enable the said company to meet such expenditures and indebtedness.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister explain just what is involved in this? It is only $17,000,000, and the loss is far greater than that already.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is to provide for capital expenditures amounting to $17,574,233, made up as follows:

(a) Retirement of maturing capital obligations, miscellaneous matured or unmatured notes and other obligations, secured or unsecured, and payment of sinking fund not exceeding $9,019,233; and

(b) Additions and betterments, including coordinations and acquisition of real or personal property not exceeding $8,555,000, estimated as follows:

General additions and betterments, $12,321,392.
Less equipment retirements, $7,921,392.

That leaves a balance of $4,400,000 as the sum that is required for general additions and betterments. The general additions and betterments for the year 1938 that will be paid for out of capital will be $4,400,000.

In addition, there are new equipment purchases, amounting to $3,455,000. This sum is only one-quarter of the new equipment purchases that will be made during the year 1938, but the railway company itself has power under legislation passed some years ago to purchase or issue notes for raising money for the payment of three-quarters of the sum required for new equipment purchases. This house has to vote the other quarter, which amounts to $3,455,000.

The remaining item is $700,000 for the acquisition of securities. Those are the securities of three companies, the shares of which are owned by the Canadian National Railway and other companies. The three companies are the Toronto Terminals Railway Company, the Northern Alberta Railway Company, the Chicago and Western Indiana Railroad Company.

The method used in supplying new equipment or in making capital expenditures on the properties of these companies is that securities are issued of which the Canadian National Railways purchases part. Their contribution, in other words, to the capital expenditures of these three railway systems for 1938 will be $700,000.

Mr. BENNETT: They are jointly owned.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are jointly owned. That makes a total of $8,555,000 for general additions and betterments, new equipment purchases and acquisition of these particular securities. That, added to the $9,019,233 that I mentioned first, which is for retirement of obligations maturing this calendar year, makes $17,574,233, the amount covered by this resolution.

Mr. BENNETT: Normally part of these retirements should be made out of operating income, but under present conditions that cannot be done. I think that is the fair way to put it.

Mr. ILSLEY: The whole general additions and betterments amount to $12,321,392, and part of those should be and are being met out of operating income. That is the amount provided for by what are called the equipment retirements, $7,921,392.

Mr. BENNETT: I was speaking of the first item, the nine millions which normally had been met, in part at least, by income.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, I do not know about that.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister will look at it I think he will see that it is so.

Mr. ILSLEY: Possibly that is the case. I have a list here of the obligations that mature. It is quite a long list. I think it is normal and usual to meet it in this way. I have given the manner in which the $17,574,233 is made up. The bill it is proposed to introduce is simply to enable the railway company to issue its securities for this amount, to authorize the government to guarantee the payment of these securities, and to authorize the government to make temporary loans pending issue of the securities.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 174, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain expenditures made and indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1938, and to authorize the guarantee by his majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

AMENDMENTS TO PROVIDE CERTAIN EXEMPTIONS AND ADDITIONAL REGULATIONS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of Bill No. 163, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Sale price.

Mr. BENNETT: I think this is a much more serious section.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it deserves some explanation. This was not covered by the resolutions.

Mr. BENNETT: I noticed that.

Mr. ILSLEY: It was not necessary to cover it by the resolutions.

Mr. BENNETT: It is merely an amendment to a statute.

Mr. ILSLEY: The practice is to make these few miscellaneous amendments in the same bill as contains the budget resolutions. There are therefore in this bill a few additions to the budget resolutions.

The reason for this amendment is that there is an increasing tendency on the part of manufacturers to divide the total price of their goods into the price proper and charges for advertising, financing, servicing, and for warranty, and naturally they are able to minimize their sales tax to a considerable extent unless there is some check on it. This simply says that the price:

> . . . shall include any charges for advertising, financing, servicing, warranty or any other charges of a similar nature contracted for at the time of sale whether these items be charged for separately or not.

That is the addition.

Mr. BENNETT: Paragraph (a) reads:

> "Sale price" for the purpose of calculating the amount of the consumption or sales tax shall mean the price before any amount payable in respect of the consumption or sales tax is added thereto and shall include . . .

According to that, sale price means the price before anything is added thereto payable in respect to consumption or sales tax, and it shall include advertising. What about duties?

Mr. ILSLEY: Customs duties are included. The sales tax is calculated on the duty paid value of imported goods, and there is nothing in the section or the amendment to interfere with that rule.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but we have provided that it does include certain things, and there is no provision in respect to anything else.

Mr. ILSLEY: But there is a clear enactment somewhere—

Mr. BENNETT: I know—at the very beginning of the Sales Tax Act. Section 2 of this bill provides that certain things shall be included, and it names them. Might that not be taken to exclude others? That is the only point I am making.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think there is an express enactment.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course there is, but this is an amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: The enactment is in section 86. It is very clear, and the effect of it could not be cut down by this legislation. The enactment is this:

. . . there shall be imposed, levied and collected a consumption or sales tax of eight per cent on the sale price of all goods . . . imported into Canada, payable by the importer or transferee who takes the goods out of bond for consumption, at the time when the goods are imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption;

Mr. BENNETT: This very section deals with that. That is exactly the point. It says:

. . . and shall also include the amount of other excise duties when the goods are sold in bond.

Mr. ILSLEY: The express provision I had in mind is in section 85, not section 86, as follows:

In this part, unless the context otherwise requires, the expression
(a) "sale price," for the purpose of calculating the amount of the consumption or sales tax, shall mean the price—

It is in the very section I am reading.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that is what I say,—the one that is being amended. Section 85 is being repealed and another substituted therefor.

Mr. ILSLEY: But at the very end of the subsection under consideration it says:

. . . in the case of imported goods the sale price shall be deemed to be the duty paid value thereof.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. What I had in mind was the three per cent excise duty, whether that is covered by it or not. I am told they do collect it, but I was looking for the authority for it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Sales tax is not collected on the three per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I was told that it was.

Mr. ILSLEY: The sales tax applies on the same price as that on which the three per cent applies. The amount collected on imported goods is eleven per cent. It is eight per cent on the duty paid value and it is three per cent on the duty paid value.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Licensed wholesaler or jobber.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the reason for this?

Mr. ILSLEY: The desire is not to extend but rather to limit the issuing of wholesale licences. The issue of licences to wholesalers is not an advantage to the crown, because it delays the payment of sales tax, sometimes for a long time. It is thought desirable for the future to limit the issue of wholesalers' licences to the wholesalers who make the greater part of their sales to licence holders, because in those cases they would have to apply for a refund anyway and you might as well give them a licence.

Section 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Additional penalties.

Mr. BENNETT: Subsection 3 declares a principle which the senate did not adopt in the Lord's Day Act bill as to the liability of the directors of a company in connection with violations of the act. Whether this may not go too far I am in some doubt. It looks to me as though possibly it goes further than it should—this idea of condonation, and making them liable for acts that are done if the knowledge is brought home to them. That, it seems to me, is extremely difficult. The Lord's Day Act came back here from the senate because of their belief that we went too far and that there was no reason why we should depart from the general principles of the law with respect to other statutes. This is an endeavour by the use of words to cover everything, as is very often the case. This subsection declares that "every officer, director or agent of the company who directs, authorizes, condones or participates in the commission of the offence, shall be liable to the like penalties as such company and as if he had committed the like offence personally." That goes pretty far. It may be difficult of enforcement. I merely point it out because of the attitude taken in connection with the Lord's Day Act.

Mr. ILSLEY: The reason for the enactment is that it was discovered that many concerns formerly partnerships have incorporated themselves for the sole purpose of evading payment of the sales tax and escaping personal punishment. There may be a difference between this and the other act.

Mr. BENNETT: Undoubtedly, but they took a view that would be applicable to this.

On section 6—Schedule II repealed.

Mr. BARBER: Would discussion of schedule I be in order under this section?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BARBER: There is a matter to which I should like to direct the attention of the committee at this time—I know that for the last two years the minister has been made acquainted with it—and it has to do with the excise tax known as the sugar tax. In Canada there is a primary industry, forming part of the great industry of agriculture, known as the fruit and vegetable industry. Of the products of this industry it is necessary to preserve a large quantity in cans in order that provision may be made for their consumption at other seasons of the year. The complaint is that this industry is subject to the sugar tax while imported fruits and vegetables in the same form are not so handicapped. The manufacturer of canned fruits and vegetables in Canada, also of jams, jellies and marmalades, pays a tax of one cent per pound on the sugar used as an ingredient in the finished product. The complete exemption from this tax accorded to imported canned fruits and vegetables and the freedom from the tax of substitute domestic products such as are listed here—honey, maple syrup, peanut butter, and so on, which are competitive with jams—places this industry, we believe, in an entirely different position from that of certain other industries in justifying the granting of relief from the tax. The tax collected from this industry in 1936 was $608,996, representing between 20 and 25 per cent of the value of the sugar used.

This tax is not applied by the government on the sugar content of imported processed fruits and vegetables, which means that the manufacturer abroad is placed at an advantage over the Canadian producer of identical lines to the extent of this sugar tax. The special war revenue excise tax, subsection 6 of section 80, provides that the sugar excise tax shall be imposed on the sugar content of imported goods, but as stated, this provision has not been invoked in respect to processed fruits and vegetables. It is the desire of the Canadian industry that they be placed on a parity in respect to exemption from the sugar excise tax with producers of like goods shipping their products into this country.

The production in Canada of processed fruits, with a sugar cost varying from 7½ to 25 per cent of the material and labour cost in the case of fruits preserved in syrup, and to over 50 per cent of the material cost in the case of jam in the year 1936—the latest period for which figures are available—was $10,132,383. Exports were $1,495,969, leaving $8,636,414 as the domestic consumption. All of the sales in Canada carried the excise tax.

During 1936 the importations of canned fruits, and so on, were $1,771,255. None of the foregoing imports paid the excise tax, and analysis of those imports shows that in 1936 they comprised 26,205,704 pounds of canned pineapple, chiefly from Singapore, and 5,119,740 pounds of peaches, pears, apricots, principally from Australia in 1936, and about 1,000,000 pounds of miscellaneous processed fruits from other sources.

While the Singapore pineapple is not directly competitive with an identical Canadian product, there can be no doubt that its cheapness—about 3 cents per pound as compared with 8 cents per pound for honey and 10 cents per pound for jam—owing to the conditions under which it is manufactured, and which cheapness is accentuated by freedom from excise tax on its sugar content, has greatly facilitated its sale in Canada, and that this has tended to displace to a considerable degree Canadian canned fruit. It might be mentioned incidentally that this imported canned pineapple enters free of duty.

In the case of jam, jellies and marmalade, in which by far the largest proportion of sugar is used in any of the branches of the industry, while they are not subject to the same extent as canned fruits to the competition of imports, they are in direct competition with other domestic products which are not subject to the excise tax and which have the still greater advantage of exemption from sales tax. Some of these commodities are peanut butter, table syrup, and honey.

I have here a table giving the production of peanut butter and honey for the five year period 1932-36, but it is not necessary for me to put it on Hansard. I may point out, however, that honey has a sugar content of approximately 75 per cent. As an illustration, the sugar tax represents, as an item of cost in the production of jam, from 7½ per cent to 12½ per cent, but when it is borne in mind that this item of cost also carries the sales tax, the above percentages would be increased. The effect of these taxes including the sales tax brings it up to 27 per cent of the total cost on jam, which is the poor man's product. The complaint is that the tax is applied to the goods sold on the domestic market and not applied to those imported.

Mr. ILSLEY: No change is being made in the schedule. Two considerations are pointed out by the hon. member: first, that certain competing products, such as honey, are free of sales tax—

Mr. BARBER: I did not deal particularly with the sales tax because I understand it does not come under this clause. I was dealing with the excise sugar tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, that was one of the reasons given by him and by the industry in making their representation, that their products are subject to sales tax while competing products are not.

Mr. BARBER: I was dealing with the excise sugar tax, which is not applied to imported fruits but does apply to the domestic.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the second consideration. The difficulty about exempting sugar used by manufacturers of canned goods is that it would undoubtedly lead to other exemptions. It would be impossible—or it has always been so felt—to remove the one cent sugar tax from manufacturers without also removing it for housewives and people generally who use sugar for canning and preserving. I am afraid there would immediately be a great outcry about discrimination if we lifted the tax from the manufacturer and not from the ordinary user, the housewife who is using sugar for canning and preserving. It is true that the imported product has an advantage, provided there is not a corresponding sugar tax in the country from which the product comes. It must not be assumed that the competitors of our canners in other countries are themselves free of tax in their own countries. In fact they are not; there is high taxation in nearly every country in the world to-day. At the worst I would point out that this discrimination, if such it is, merely cuts down somewhat the protection which the fruit canner in Canada enjoys. He does enjoy protection. There are duties I think on practically all canned goods coming into the country. If he were relieved of the sugar tax he would have a little more protection, that is all.

Mr. BARBER: It is not altogether a question of protection; it is a question of opportunity to sell our own products on the home market in competition with the imported article. It has been pointed out, in a brief which I believe has been presented to the minister, that the difficulty might be overcome by way of drawback. I realize that it would be impossible to exempt this particular industry from the one cent tax, but it could be done by drawback, thus giving the Canadian industry an opportunity to compete with the imported product. I know the difficulty this industry has run up against in connection with exports to Great Britain. If the exported fruit is processed with sugar, a sugar tax must be paid when it enters Great Britain, but if it is shipped in sulphur dioxide form there is no tax. The result is that all our products of this kind exported to Great Britain are shipped in the latter form. But fruit coming here in competition with our own Canadian product has a distinct advantage.

Section 7 agreed to.

Schedule I agreed to.

On schedule II.

Mr. BENNETT: There are no changes in the schedule, I understand, except those indicated in the legislation which we are passing to-day?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Schedule II agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an omission in the bill as printed. It is the usual clause with regard to the date of coming into force of the act, and so forth. It was in the resolution, if I remember rightly, but was left out in the printing of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: That is because the bill contains a consolidation of so many other items, I suppose. It is a reprint of existing legislation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I move that the following be added as section 8:

That this act shall be deemed to have come into force on the seventeenth day of June, 1938, and to have applied to all goods mentioned therein imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO RECKLESS DRIVING, SALTING MINES AND MINE SAMPLES, ETC.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 137, to amend the criminal code.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Feeble minded person.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is merely to change the word "and" to "or" in the definition of what is a feeble minded person.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Alien not to have firearms without permit.

Mr. BENNETT: As it stands now our own people require permits, do they not?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And this is merely to clarify the law to make it quite clear that it deals with aliens.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Selling or lending.

Mr. BENNETT: Did I understand the minister to say he was making it an offence also to erase or to remove the serial number from a pistol or revolver?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes. That is contained in another section.

Mr. BENNETT: It is important in the light of this section.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Altering serial number.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is the section that makes it an offence to erase a number.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Other permits.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This requires two new forms for the use of a firearm by a minor, in order to make it more restrictive, and so that the supervision may be more effective.

Section agreed to.

On section 6—Registration of revolvers and pistols.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I should like this section to stand. I am afraid that instead of making it more difficult this section will make it easier to evade the law. The drafting is not quite clear, and that is why I want it to stand.

Section stands.

On section 7—Having pistol or revolver while committing offence.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is to add rifles and shotguns to the other arms that may be concealed upon the person. This is requested by the police.

Mr. BENNETT: It would deal with a sawed-off shotgun.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. SLAGHT: Would it not be desirable to add billies and blackjacks and the vicious hand weapons of the thug?

Mr. BENNETT: They are dealt with in another section.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This applies only to firearms; there is another section dealing with those other weapons.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Search.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is just the reversal of a number; there is no change.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Selling pistol or air-gun to minor.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is to control firearms in the hands of minors under fourteen years of age. Previously it was twelve years. It will be an offence to sell or give any of these things to a boy unless he is fourteen years of age.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Full term to be served when retaken.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is only a clarification.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—Restriction on publication of reports of judicial proceedings.

Mr. BENNETT: This is a more difficult matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is a reproduction of the English law with regard to the publication of details and reports of judicial proceedings which may be calculated to injure public morals.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Common gaming house defined.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is an amendment to this section, by adding after the word "games" in line 37 the following:

but the provisions of this paragraph shall not apply to any house, room or place while occasionally being used by charitable or religious organizations for playing games therein for which a direct fee is charged to the players, if the proceeds are to be used for the benefit of any charitable or religious object.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly.

Mr. BENNETT: That conforms to the provisions of the act in another section.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 13—Race meetings, pari-mutuel machines.

Mr. BENNETT: Why is the Department of Agriculture made responsible in connection with a matter of this kind? Would it not be better to have the mounted police or some other such body in control?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This amendment was asked for by the Department of Agriculture. I am rather at a loss to understand why the machines should be stopped at a point one-eighth of a mile from the post.

Mr. SLAGHT: It might be better if it was one-eighth of a mile after the finish.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hon. members of the committee probably know more about racing than I. This amendment was asked for in order to make the section more effective.

Mr. STIRLING: Is there not a connection between this and the permission given for wheels of fortune and so on for use at agricultural fairs? Agricultural fairs are under the supervision of the Department of Agriculture and we permit them to use wheels of fortune.

Mr. POWER: The justification for permitting the use of pari-mutuel machines or any other type of betting at horse races is based upon the assumption that horse racing encourages the breeding of horses in Canada.

Section agreed to.

On section 14—Disorderly conduct.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This amendment is made at the request of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Section agreed to.

On section 15—Liability of driver of car for failure to stop after accident happened.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The penalty for failure to stop after an accident is increased. Formerly the fine was not exceeding $50; now it is not exceeding $500. Formerly the imprisonment was not exceeding thirty days; this has been raised to not exceeding six months. The failure to stop is to be considered as prima facie evidence of intent to do wrong and the burden of proof will be upon the offender. The mere fact that a man causes an accident and goes on without stopping will compel him to give evidence that he is not guilty of the offence.

Section agreed to.

On section 16—Reckless or dangerous driving.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There are two amendments to this section, which I shall ask my colleague to move.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move:

That section 16 of Bill No. 137 be amended by striking out the word "sixteen" on page 7, line 19, and substituting therefor the word "fifteen."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move:

That section 16 of Bill No. 137 be amended by striking out the words "one month" in line 47, page 7, and substituting the words "six months," and striking out the word "fifty" in the same line and substituting therefor the words "five hundred."

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This amendment will increase the penalty for driving when a licence has been suspended or against an order prohibiting driving. One province has this provision in its motor legislation, and this amendment is to make our criminal code agree with the law of that province. It will also have the effect of increasing the penalties for driving when there is no right to do so.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 17—Plants, etc., growing in garden.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This amendment increases the penalty for stealing any plant, root, fruit or vegetable production growing in any garden, orchard, and so on. There has been some criticism in the newspapers to the effect that this amendment is too severe, but it has been asked for by county councils and agricultural societies. It is intended for the protection of farmers.

Mr. BENNETT: As well as of public parks, pleasure grounds, and places of that kind.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Cultivated plants, etc., growing elsewhere.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is the same type of amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: Not quite, although it is the same in principle.

Section agreed to.

On section 19—Theft of automobiles.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is to make the wording of the section clearer. The theft of an automobile is being made a specific offence instead of saying, "everyone who is found guilty of stealing any automobile or motor car."

Mr. BENNETT: There is really no change in the law.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No.

Section agreed to.

On section 20—Fraudulent use of naturalization certificates.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This amendment makes it an offence for a person to lend his naturalization certificate to an alien to permit him to enter Canada illegally.

Mr. BENNETT: Would it not be well to provide for the cancellation of the certificate? I suppose you could avail yourself of the provisions of the Naturalization Act.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, both Immigration and the Secretary of State have powers.

Mr. BENNETT: Under the Naturalization Act there is power to appoint a commission to deal with it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 21 agreed to.

On section 22—Holder of lease of gold or silver mine defrauding owner.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): An amendment has been asked for by the government of Ontario, to add after the words "gold or silver mining" the words "platinum or other precious metals."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move, Mr. Chairman, that section 22 be amended as follows:

1. Page 9, lines 35 and 36: Strike out the words "relating to gold or silver mining" and substitute therefor "relating to the mining of gold, silver, platinum or other precious metals";
2. Page 9, line 39: After the word "silver" insert "platinum or other precious metals";
3. Page 9, line 42: Strike out the words "gold or silver" and substitute therefor "gold, silver, platinum or other precious metals";
4. Page 9, line 44: Strike out the words "gold or silver" and substitute therefor "gold, silver, platinum or other precious metals";
5. Page 9, line 47: Strike out the words "gold or silver" and substitute therefor "gold, silver, platinum or other precious metals";
6. Page 10, line 8: Strike out the words "gold or silver" and substitute therefor "gold, silver, platinum or other precious metals";
7. Page 10, line 10: Strike out the words "gold or silver" and substitute therefor "gold, silver, platinum or other precious metals";
8. Page 11, lines 11 and 12: Strike out the words "gold or silver" and substitute therefor "gold, silver, platinum or other precious metals."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: Is subsection 5 of section 22 clear enough? You place a limitation on proceedings unless or until an order has been passed by the governor in council declaring this section to be in force. Should it not include a provision that this section shall come into force only by proclamation? Otherwise the section will be in force as soon as the act is assented to, and then the provision would be inoperative.

Mr. SLAGHT: Should it not be made effective at once in both respects? The provision is aimed at the practice of high-grading, which is a serious interference with the development of the mining industry. It seems to me we could afford to make it operative at the first moment possible.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is no change from the old act so far as this subsection is concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: The closing section of the bill says:

> This act, with the exception of sections fifteen, sixteen and forty-five, shall come into force on the first day of August, 1938, and sections fifteen, sixteen and forty-five shall come into force on the passing of this act.

On the first day of August this section will come into force, but we have provided that proceedings shall not be taken until an order in council has been passed declaring this section to be in force. How do you reconcile the two?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is something in what my right hon. friend says, but the old act is already in force.

Mr. BENNETT: But as the member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) points out, it has not been found ample, and Ontario wants certain changes made. The way it reads has been copied from the wording of the old act as it first appeared on the statute book. It is quite clear that if this measure comes into force on the first day of August, and one undertook a proceeding under section 22, he would be met at once with the fact that no order in council has been passed proclaiming this section to be in force, although it was in force by reason of having been assented to when the bill received royal assent. I do not think the subsection is properly worded.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I will let subsection 5 stand and look into it.

Section stands.

On section 23—Salting mines.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is an amendment made at the suggestion of the attorney general of Quebec, making it an offence to salt a mine or a sample.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be very useful in one other province as well.

Section agreed to.

On section 24—Burden of proof.

Mr. BENNETT: This clause reads, "the breaking out of a dwelling-house by night after having entered such dwelling-house." It would be difficult to break out of a house unless it had first been entered.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There might be legal entry.

Mr. BENNETT: It does not say that. It says "breaking out after having entered." It would be difficult to break out without being in, would it not?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Unfortunately it is the language of the past which is still responsible.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister should not be so conservative.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I like tradition.

Mr. SLAGHT: The language is "after having entered." He might have been carried in or have been in there perfectly legally.

Mr. BENNETT: If he breaks out by night he is going to commit a crime. It says "after having entered such dwelling-house." How in the name of heaven could he break out if he had not entered?

Mr. SLAGHT: Suppose he had been carried in?

Mr. BENNETT: He would be in anyway.

Mr. SLAGHT: But he would not have entered.

Mr. BENNETT: He would still be in the house. I think we should not let it go in this way. The present wording does seem almost ridiculous.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We do not need the words "after having entered such dwelling-house."

Mr. BENNETT: The whole section is loosely drawn. Look at it:

The breaking and entering of a dwelling-house by night—

That is clear:

—or the breaking out of a dwelling-house by night after having entered such dwelling-house, either by day or by night.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He may have entered the house illegally during the day or during the night.

Mr. BENNETT: No, this is prima facie evidence of an intent to commit an indictable offence.

Mr. McGEER: The only qualification there might be of that is the one suggested by the hon. member for Parry Sound, namely that a man might not have entered the place voluntarily; he might have been carried in.

Mr. STIRLING: He is doing a very wise thing to break out, then.

Mr. BENNETT: And if he found himself in the wrong place he might want to break out.

Mr. McGEER: It may be clumsy, but it does cover the case mentioned by the hon. member for Parry Sound. Where a man is in a place not as a result of having entered it by his own action, it covers that as well. A man who entered a house perfectly legally, perhaps as a guest, may have decided to conceal himself in the house in the afternoon to break out during the night. The section covers such a case.

Mr. BENNETT: This is either by day or by night.

Mr. McGEER: He could enter legally either by day or by night and break out illegally either by day or by night. This section is not as loosely drawn as it appears to be.

Section agreed to.

Sections 25 and 26 agreed to.

On section 27—Using trade marks of others by trafficking in bottles.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is to add the words "milk and by-products of milk." Apparently doubt has been expressed as to whether the word "beverages" covers or includes milk.

Section agreed to.

Section 28 agreed to.

On section 29—Offence, penalty. Fraudulently burning any chattel over $25 in value.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): All the clauses from 29 to 33 inclusive are suggested or asked for by the fire marshals, both federal and provincial. It is to provide for uniform punishment and to see that the maximum terms are consistent with the punishments usually provided for the offences in question. There is no new crime; it is just that the penalties are made more uniform for the same kind of offence.

Section agreed to.

Sections 30 to 32 inclusive agreed to.

On section 33—Threats to burn.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Does not three years seem a heavy penalty for having threatened to commit a crime? It becomes an indictable offence. After all it is only a threat to commit a crime.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but it is a written threat.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is a mitigation. It was ten years before. It is now three years.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Oh, I see. One should not write letters.

Section agreed to.

Sections 34 and 35 agreed to.

On section 36—Defacing current coin.

Mr. McGEER: There is no gold coin any more. Could not that be struck out?

Section agreed to.

Sections 37 and 38 agreed to.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I shall ask that the bill be amended by adding thereto as clause 38A the following:

38A. Paragraph (a) of section 750 of the said act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

Provided that in the province of Nova Scotia the appeal shall be to a sittings of the court in the county where the cause or information or complaint arose, in the one case to the sittings next after, and in the other to the second sittings after the conviction or order.

This is asked for by the attorneys general.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly.

Mr. McGEER: What is the reason for making it mandatory? Why is the wording not "may" instead of "shall"?

Mr. SLAGHT: An accused might be in custody. The section as worded would prevent the hearing of the appeal until the second sittings. It seems to me the word should be changed to "may."

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is the explanation which is given. The object of the amendment is to overcome an ambiguity which has arisen owing to a decision of the courts by which it was held that the expression "more than fourteen days" meant at least fifteen days, thus leaving one day upon which an appeal could not be taken. We do not change the law at all so far as the use of the word "may" or "shall" is concerned; we say "fourteen or more days." It is only those words that are being changed.

Mr. SLAGHT: That is true, but as I interpret it, the use of the word "shall" requires that you must wait until the second sitting; whereas, if you substituted the word "may" an alert appellant might have his appeal brought on at an earlier sitting and in that way be released earlier from custody.

Mr. BENNETT: The word always has been "shall." It is purely practice, and the rule has not been changed in any sense.

If a conviction or order is made fourteen or more days before a sittings of the court to which an appeal is given, such appeal shall be made to that sittings.

It is intended that there shall be no delay and that it shall go to the next sittings. "Shall" is the word that has always been used.

Mr. SLAGHT: That is true, but it is in the second clause.

Mr. McGEER: For instance, if a man is convicted fourteen days before the sittings of a county court, which in the large centres sits monthly, he has a right to get his appeal on in fourteen days. But if he happens to be convicted thirteen days before that sitting he must wait thirteen days and one month.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. McGEER: That is not altogether against the prisoner. But very often in prosecutions—

Mr. BENNETT: It has been the law of this country.

Mr. McGEER: —the appeal is a trial de novo, and it means that the authorities must hold and keep these witnesses available for an extra month. There can be no harm in changing the word from "shall" to "may." If the crown is embarrassed by the trial of an appeal being heard too quickly, that of course is a matter which can be determined by the appeal court, and if it is necessary to get further time, in the interests either of the prosecution or of the defence, the court has that discretionary power. But here the wording used, which for some reason or other has long been in our statutes, is such that it actually delays the determination of criminal offences not merely one month but even for longer periods. I cannot see that anything is to be gained by continuing the word "shall" or that anything can be lost in the interest of justice by changing it to "may."

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I would hesitate to recommend a change that has not been suggested at all.

Mr. McGEER: I will not press it.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 39—Summary trial in certain cases.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This merely adds the words "admitted to bail or" in line 29.

Section agreed to.

On section 40—Absolute jurisdiction in certain cases.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This gives stipendiary magistrates in Ontario the same jurisdiction as in other provinces.

On section 41—Cities of not less than 25,000 people.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is consequential upon section 40.

On section 42—Otherwise magistrate may proceed as upon a preliminary investigation.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This adds the word "summarily."

On section 43—Bail if trial by judge.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is to make the section conform with the amendment that has been made to 698.

Section agreed to.

On section 44—Bail if trial by jury.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is the same thing.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. McGeer.]

On section 45—Manslaughter or reckless driving.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is rather an important change. It is provided that upon a charge of manslaughter arising out of the operation of a motor vehicle, if they are satisfied that the accused is guilty of an offence under subsection 6 of section 285, the jury may find him guilty of that offence and such conviction shall be a bar to further prosecution for any offence arising out of the same facts. This is in consequence of certain judgments in cases of this kind. I have an amendment which has been asked for by the deputy attorney general of Ontario, that section 45 be amended by inserting in line 13, after the word "accused," the words "is not guilty of manslaughter but."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly.

On section 46—Certain automatic machines to be deemed means or contrivance for playing game of chance.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have an amendment, that the section be amended by inserting after the word "merchandise" in line 8 the words "or services"—"for vending merchandise or services," for instance, devices that indicate one's weight. They give some service.

Mr. BENNETT: Postage stamps.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I do not know whether you would call that a service or not.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly.

On section 47—Evidence of property in timber, et cetera.

Mr. BENNETT: This is limited in application to one province.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, British Columbia.

Mr. BENNETT: Why could they not provide adequate penalties within their own province for a breach of their own statute? Does it not really come within the decision of the reciprocal insurance case and constitute an invasion of provincial rights by endeavouring to make a criminal offence out of what is purely a matter of property and civil rights in the province?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is already in the statute.

Mr. BENNETT: The law has been changed since the statute was passed.

Section agreed to.

On section 48—Right of appeal against sentence.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is to permit application for leave to appeal against a sentence not only to the judge but to the court itself.

On section 49—Accused to remain in custody or on bail where attorney general appeals.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This will meet a situation that has arisen recently that shows the necessity for it.

Section agreed to.

Sections 50 and 51 agreed to.

On section 52—When whipping to take place.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What is the reason for this amendment?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The explanatory note gives essentially the purpose of the change:

The object of this amendment is to insure that the whipping to which the prisoner is sentenced shall be inflicted. In the past some sentences have contained specific times at which the whipping is to take place and it has been found that through illness, the shortening of the term by good behaviour and other causes, it has been impracticable to carry out the sentence in this respect with the result that the prisoner has escaped this part of his punishment. The present subsection reads as follows:

"(3) Whenever practicable, every whipping shall take place not less than ten days before the expiration of any term in imprisonment to which the offender is sentenced for the offence."

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): This would apply only to a whipping prescribed in the sentence and not to whipping inflicted in the course of service of sentence in the penitentiary.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is doubtful whether the words "notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the sentence" should be in the statute. The effect of it is to set at naught the sentence of a trial judge or of a court, which is perhaps undesirable. Might it not be all right merely to say, "as may be determined by the officer in charge of the prison"? The adding of those words, "notwithstanding" so and so, invites attention to the fact that we have vested an official with discretion to set at naught the judgment of a court.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have no objection to striking out those words. I move that the words "notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the sentence" be struck out.

Mr. BENNETT: The proviso covers it anyway.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 53 to 55 inclusive agreed to.

On section 56—Coming into force.

Mr. BENNETT: The word "granted" is used elsewhere with respect to permit; might it not be well to make the wording uniform and say on pages 21 and 22, "permission is hereby granted"?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): All right. The two words are used in other forms. Then there is an amendment to strike out the word "August" in section 56 and substitute therefor the word "September."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move:

That clause 56 of bill 137 be amended by striking out the word "August" in the third line and substituting therefor the word "September."

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I should like to revert to page 3 and to inquire of the minister whether any consideration was given in committee to section 124, which does not appear in the draft proposals. If not I should like to bring to the attention of the committee the kind of advertising that is done on many of our news-stands in the way of display of cheap magazines, selling for five, ten and fifteen cents, depicting shooting scenes. Section 124 has to do with gun pointing, I believe. I hold in my hand covers taken from forty or fifty magazines of this type, printed in Canada, showing scenes in colours of one person pointing a gun at another or shooting another. Many people with whom I have discussed the matter are very strongly of the opinion that this seriously tends to educate growing boys to think that there is nothing wrong about pointing a gun at a person, and as a result we see boys playing at bandit and hold-ups; we see them behind trees pointing toy guns and air guns at one another and even at passers-by.

I would not propose interfering with the contents of these magazines, but I think it is entirely wrong and detrimental to the morals of the boys that they should be permitted as they do to observe and study on magazine counters scenes such as these that are constantly placed before them. These covers could very well carry other pictures in colours to make the magazines attractive, such as pictures of men finely developed physically, beautiful women, floral or pastoral scenes, or scenes showing the resources of our country or our industries. But we should not be constantly placing before our boys scenes tending to educate them to think that there is nothing wrong in one person pointing a gun at another.

Accordingly I should like the minister to accept an amendment to this section to meet this situation. It would be in this form:

Everyone is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding one hundred dollars or to imprisonment for any term not exceeding thirty days, with or without hard labour, who prints, makes or publishes any book or magazine on the cover of which appears any picture or drawing depicting the pointing by one person of an offensive weapon at another person or persons or the shooting by one person of another person or persons with such weapon, if such picture or drawing is intended to or does illustrate or represent a hold-up, robbery, murder or other criminal act or intention.

I have omitted in this proposed amendment one provision that I had earlier under consideration, namely to make it an offence to sell or expose to public view for sale or to distribute or circulate such books or magazines. But it was pointed out that such a provision would make the legislation very difficult of enforcement; consequently I have eliminated it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I appreciate the motive and purpose of my hon. friend's amendment, but I have been considering it, and I cannot feel that I could accept it. If the picture of a man pointing a gun was inside the cover it would be permitted, and I find it difficult to see that it should be made a crime to put such a picture on the outside of the cover when it is not illegal to put it inside. And then, since it can be put inside, it would not take the boys or other persons who like that sort of thing very long to learn that they could find these pictures by simply opening the book. The law now makes it a crime to point any firearm or air-gun at any person; that is punished by a severe penalty, but I really cannot see my way clear to accept an amendment making it a crime merely to put such a picture on the cover of a book.

The CHAIRMAN: I should like to point out to the hon. member for Wellington South that in my opinion his amendment is out of order under standing order 48. I quote paragraph 399 of Beauchesne, at page 127:

After a decision has been given on an amendment to any part of a question, an earlier part cannot be amended. In like manner when an amendment of any part of a question has been proposed from the chair an earlier part cannot be amended unless the amendment so proposed be withdrawn.

Therefore I would rule the amendment out of order.

Progress reported.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

The house having reverted to the order for presenting reports by standing and select committees:

BANK OF CANADA

ACQUISITION BY THE GOVERNMENT OF SHARES NOW IN HANDS OF THE PUBLIC

The house resumed from Monday, June 27, consideration in committee of Bill No. 160, to amend the Bank of Canada Act—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Sections 1 and 2 agreed to.

On section 3—Board of directors.

Mr. McGEER: There are one or two matters that arose during the debate last evening to which I should like to refer. The important part of this section is not the mere nationalization of the bank but the policy that will be carried out when the bank is brought under the complete control of the government. I should like to know from the minister in charge just what changes in policy, if any, are contemplated. In what way will the establishment of complete ownership change the policy of controlling the issue of currency and credit so that the domestic and general needs of the country may be more efficiently served? If there is to be no change in policy, then the real purpose of ownership will not be achieved. After all, this is a fairly expensive experiment that we are carrying on, and I should like to hear from the minister on that point.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue, for Mr. Dunning): The purposes for which the bank is set up are set out in the preamble to the act. The policy of the bank will be to carry out the objects set out in the preamble. I do not know that it is possible to be any more definite than that. The bank is now under the control of the government and the action of its board of directors will, of course, reflect the policy of the government from time to time. The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) must realize that it is not usual to announce a policy for any substantial period in advance. In fact, quite often in response to questions asked in this house it has been stated that the policy of the government will be made known as circumstances develop. I believe that answer is appropriate here, subject, of course, to the overruling consideration that the purposes of the bank, as set out in the preamble, must at all times be kept in mind.

Mr. McGEER: Our present law permits our banks to create bank deposits for the purpose of increasing currency and credit in circulation on a five per cent reserve basis. Last evening the minister seemed to condone the attitude of the bank that in banking practice that should be raised to ten per cent. If the banks can raise the reserve limit from five to ten per cent, there will be nothing to prevent their raising it to fifty per cent, if they so desire. There is a distinction between English and Canadian banks which was not sufficiently taken into account in the discussion last evening. Apparently we have all the machinery necessary for creating an abundance of credit currency which would be available to the national government for public development, but unfortunately while we have gone unorthodox in the creation of credit, we remain orthodox in the use of credit. In a word, we have created a twentieth century monetary system, but as far as policy is concerned we still remain on a nineteenth century theory basis.

There was another distinction that apparently was not clear to the minister, judging from his remarks last evening. Of the total cash available in Canada to meet public need, till money, out of pocket transactions, international exchange obligations and interbank balances, there is owned outright by the banks $247,000,000 of Bank of Canada bills of issue. We have $102,000,000 of Bank of Canada bills of issue and circulating to the banks in the hands of the public. In addition to that, according to the Bank of Canada report we have $100,000,000 of banking currency which functions for all the purposes of till money and for out of pocket transactions, making a total of $449,000,000. Now to service our bank deposits, $2,800,000,000, even on the 10 per cent reserve basis that the banks of England require, we would still have a surplus of cash circulating in Canada of $161,000,000, or sufficient for an increase of banking deposits in Canada, even on the 10 per cent reserve basis, of $1,600,000,000.

What I am pointing out now is this, that although we have, even on the bank's basis, $1,600,000,000 of unused bank deposits available, supposedly under the control of the country and the government, and we are now going to increase that control by paying a substantial profit to get those shares which were handed out as a concession in 1934 back into public ownership, the question still remains how are we going to get the currency and credit which is available into circulation for the benefit of the people of Canada? And that was the thing that this bank was created to establish.

I should like to make one reference to a statement that was made by the leader of the opposition. He saw fit to point out that bank deposits had to be represented by something, and that they could not increase beyond bank holdings of securities. But since 1934, when this concession was handed over to the private banks, bank deposits have increased by $479,000,000, while the holding of government interest-bearing bonds by the chartered banks has increased by $471,000,000. The point I should like to draw to the attention of the minister and of the government is that in so far as the use of that increase of credit is concerned during the period of four years that the Bank of Canada has been in operation, that increase of credit has apparently been available only for the purchase of government bonds by the chartered banks.

Mr. CAHAN: Was it not available for all purposes, but that was one purpose which was possible under existing economic conditions?

Mr. McGEER: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George states that it was available for all purposes, and that is very true. But the reason why government control comes into being is that we believed that the banks were exercising a discretion as to whom they would advance money, and control was necessary to make the circulation effective to serve the needs of the country and the needs of progress.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not care to interrupt, but would my hon. friend allow a question?

Mr. McGEER: Certainly.

Mr. CAHAN: Is it not absolutely necessary that directors of the banks should have a discretion as to the persons or companies to whom they grant loans, in view of the fact that it is the directors alone who are responsible to the shareholders for the security of those loans? Can you possibly avoid conceding discretion, unless the government of Canada is going to guarantee repayment to the banks of all loans made, that is, in case you are going to restrict the discretion of the directors in making such loans?

Mr. McGEER: I quite concede that, and that is one reason why I believe that merchant banking should be left exclusively to the merchant bankers, subject only to the control of the Bank of Canada, which would avoid those disastrous inflations which come with commodity and security booms. But that is a very different thing from the thing I am talking about. What I am dealing with is the question of how government in Canada can have freer access, at less cost, to the national currency and credit of the country, which the banks to-day are using to purchase bonds by the manipulation or by the actual use of a bookkeeping system. There is a very great difference between private finance and public finance, and the sooner we come to recognize that one of the great duties of the Bank of Canada is to establish a control of public finance that will completely segregate public finance from private finance, and that the two shall be established as entirely different services in the state, the better.

Mr. CAHAN: I have listened frequently to the hon. member. Can he suggest how the aim which he has expressed can be accomplished more readily than under the present proposed system under which the government shall have complete control over the Bank of Canada and all its transactions?

Mr. McGEER: I am going to suggest that now. What I am going to commend to the government—and I do not expect anything to be done this session—is that in addition to having the machinery which the Bank of Canada now has, an investigation be launched to ascertain whether or not it would be advisable for the Bank of Canada to become the actual bank of the Dominion of Canada, serving it with a deposit and cheque system in exactly the same way that the chartered banks are serving it to-day; and whether, in turn, as is the case in Australia, there should be a bank established in each of the provinces as a branch of the Bank of Canada which would serve provincial and municipal governments in the same way.

Mr. CAHAN: If the Bank of Canada is reorganized on the basis mentioned by the hon. gentleman, does not his proposal mean that those who have political influence will have the advantage of obtaining loans from the Bank of Canada and that those who have not political influence will not have the same facilities?

Mr. McGEER: No, not at all, because what I said was that the Bank of Canada's activities should be confined exclusively to public credit, making no private loans whatever, and serving only the national and provincial and municipal governments.

Mr. CAHAN: I understood the hon. gentleman to say that the Bank of Canada was to make loans which were not restricted to municipal and provincial governments.

Mr. McGEER: No.

Mr. CAHAN: I understood him so.

Mr. McGEER: I thought I made that clear when I suggested that merchant banking and private banking should be completely segregated from public banking and public finance, and that the two should be established as entirely distinct functions in the state.

Mr. CAHAN: I thought public banking was to be confined exclusively to banking for public bodies such as the government of Canada, provincial and municipal governments, and commissions established by them.

Mr. McGEER: Yes, what would be called purely public finance.

Mr. CAHAN: I should like to know just what my hon. friend means.

Mr. McGEER: There is no question about that in my mind. A public body such as a workmen's compensation board, a body administering an unemployment insurance fund, or a host of other activities which involve the carrying of large deposits and large reserve funds, would carry them in the public banking institution.

The other point to which I wished to refer was this. The statement was made last night that a ten per cent reserve of cash was necessary to prevent the banks from going into bankruptcy from day to day. Nothing could be more out of line with the history of banking in Canada than any such statement as that.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. gentleman will allow me, that statement was not made. The statement which was made was that, the bank directors being responsible for loans and for making only such loans as were likely to be repaid because of the financial stability or security of the persons to whom they were made, a provision of even ten per cent was not sufficient for all times and all circumstances. No bank can agree that the mere holding of ten per cent security, as the hon. gentleman states, will be sufficient to protect the bank in times of grave economic and financial stress and strain. The directors must be sure that they have the funds wherewith to meet all demands when made, and for that purpose at certain times it may be necessary to keep, instead of five or ten per cent, twenty-five or thirty or even forty per cent available. It was found in time of crisis in the United States that even forty per cent was not always sufficient to protect the shareholders and depositors of banks.

Mr. McGEER: Quite true. But the point I was dealing with was the point that came up last night, and it is to be found at page 4298 of Hansard, where the Minister of National Revenue said:

> In other words, the banks are maintaining only the reserve ratio that is necessary in the light of experience, namely, approximately ten per cent.

The hon. member (Mr. Cahan) then said:

> Sufficient to keep them from day to day from going into bankruptcy?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes.

Mr. McGEER: That is the point I was dealing with. If the hon. gentleman will remember, when he sat in this house there was a double shuffle of $35,000,000 that went out to the banks in and around 1933. That went out for a definite purpose, to meet the stress and strain which the depression had put upon the banks of Canada, and to put them in a position to meet their obligations among each other as much as anything else. There is the emergency reserve upon which the banks rely in times of emergency. It is a call upon the government to use the nation's money to protect institutions which have got into trouble because they have traded short in money and long in credit. Because that type of thing is done in the name of sound money, it goes on as one of the most iniquitous things that any government has ever condoned. Now we go ahead and say that we are going to reduce the right of the banks of Canada to print money freely. In 1934 this house solemnly amended the Bank Act, to reduce what? The right of the banks of Canada to use a printing press to create money, so that it would come down ten per cent per annum until it was reduced to a twenty-five per cent quota of their paid-up capital.

Mr. CAHAN: Does the hon. member object to that provision?

Mr. McGEER: I am just going to show you the kind of racket that that was when it was put over.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. member had been present and had understood the circumstances under which that was done, he would know that it was to meet a special emergency arising out of the bankruptcy of some three or four thousand banks in the United States.

Mr. McGEER: That is, the $35,000,000?

Mr. CAHAN: Yes, and to meet the stress and strain with which we in Canada were faced at the time. To use the expression "racket," and other terms which the hon. gentleman has used, merely implies that he is entirely ignorant of or has not understood the special emergency which was met on that occasion. We protected the commerce and industry of Canada to a large extent, and with better results than commerce and industry were protected in the United States or in Australia or in any other dominion of the commonwealth.

Mr. McGEER: It was a handy use of $35,000,000 of Canada's money to protect the Canadian banks which had been responsible for the development of the conditions in Canada that brought this nation into bankruptcy.

Mr. CAHAN: Well, it is—

Mr. McGEER: I have accepted the hon. gentleman's interruption, and I am going to take a chance to reply, if he will permit me. What I want to point out is this. I have said before that this banking change in 1934 constituted, with all the inequities, the greatest concession that was ever handed out by a Canadian parliament since confederation. My hon. friend asks me whether I object to the banks losing their right to print money freely. No, I do not.

Mr. CAHAN: No, I did not ask the hon. gentleman that. His hearing is defective.

Mr. McGEER: I do not object to that, but there is something about that which I do object to. When I look at the records I find that while parliament has reduced by ten per cent the right of the banks to print money, the Bank of Canada has handed out more money freely to the chartered banks than the ten per cent reduction which parliament has ordered.

Mr. CAHAN: But they bought it and paid for it.

Mr. McGEER: Bought and paid for nothing! My hon. friend speaks about my ignorance. May I suggest that he may not be as well informed about this thing as he thinks he is.

Mr. CAHAN: I was merely suggesting, not that the hon. gentleman is personally ignorant, if he will allow me—

Mr. McGEER: No. I want to close this one point.

Mr. CAHAN: —but that he was ignorant concerning this one transaction and the conditions under which it was carried out.

Mr. McGEER: I will leave it at that. But this is what happened. Under the reduction of the right to print currency the cash holdings of the banks have fallen by $26,000,000, but the increase in free issue of Bank of Canada bills has been $37,000,000.

Mr. CAHAN: That is what it is created for.

Mr. McGEER: To give the banks money for nothing? The hon. gentleman had better ask the leader of the opposition.

Mr. CAHAN: They were willing to pay for Bank of Canada bills, which are legal tender. The banks and others can now buy legal tender from the Bank of Canada.

Mr. McGEER: Yes, but that is not what happened at all. What has happened is this. The Bank of Canada has issued money to the banks for certain securities, but in the meantime it has purchased and acquired millions of dollars' worth of public securities for which it has put money out for nothing. As the Minister of Finance pointed out, no matter from whom the bank buys securities, when it issues legal tender cash that cash is bound to come to the banks. When the Bank of Canada maintains a policy of issuing legal tender cash in exchange for securities, the result is that the banks are supplied with money at less cost than they formerly were put to when they were called upon to print money.

Mr. BENNETT: It is put in the banks by the depositors.

[Mr. Cahan.]

Mr. McGEER: Quite true, but the minute a depositor puts Bank of Canada bills in a bank on deposit, those Bank of Canada bills become the property of the bank.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly.

Mr. BENNETT: Subject to cheque.

Mr. McGEER: Subject to cheque?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I draw a cheque in the Bank of Montreal and they hand me out Bank of Montreal notes.

Mr. McGEER: And what do you do with them? Put them back in the bank.

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly do not.

Mr. McGEER: That is what you do. Or you put them in some other bank. Under that system you have no control whatever over the credit policy of chartered banks. It does not matter what your rediscount rate is, it does not matter what your open market operations are. The only people who can say whether or not credit shall increase are the chartered banks. I believe that the machinery developed in Australia is more effective even than that developed in England. In the old country the government is largely dependent upon the cooperation of the banks as a whole, but in Australia, if I read the reports correctly, practically all the cash issued by the central bank is issued on loan to all the other banks.

Mr. BENNETT: No; they buy it like a commodity.

Mr. McGEER: They buy it under certain definite conditions.

Mr. BENNETT: No condition in the world. They requisition the commonwealth bank for notes and buy them and take them.

Mr. McGEER: And they agree to pay it back.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Mr. McGEER: They must buy it at a discount.

Mr. BENNETT: If they want £100,000 of bills—suppose the Bank of New South Wales does for example—they go and buy £100,000 from the note issue department of the commonwealth bank and the commonwealth bank can issue £100,000 if there is £100,000 of bonds put up in the note issue department for it.

Mr. McGEER: Yes; but these bonds are paying interest to the central bank.

Mr. BENNETT: But they belong to the commonwealth bank.

Mr. McGEER: Yes. They are paying them back under interest obligation. The difference in our system is that the Bank of Canada issues the money free and our chartered banks have not a single dollar of Bank of Canada money on loan or a single dollar that they have purchased in that way. They have practically their entire holdings through open market operations.

Mr. CAHAN: If the hon. member would sit beside a bank manager for a few days he would learn differently from that. One thing that the bank manager has to do is to see that he has sufficient Bank of Canada legal tender to meet the exigencies of all the demands of depositors, increasing as they do from day to day and in times of crisis increasing from week to week, to an extent which the hon. gentleman does not appreciate; and unless they have the legal tender to meet these demands the banks have to close their doors. If a bank fails on one single occasion it is bankrupt under our law.

Mr. McGEER: What I am pointing out is that in the Bank of Canada report in May, for instance, we find the cash issues given and there is no liability at all against them. The chartered bank cash—that is, owned by the chartered banks in their tills—amounts to 53·4 millions, and deposits in the Bank of Canada amount to 194·1 millions or a total of 247·5 millions. Issued and circulating in the hands of the public is an amount of 102 millions. In the Bank of Canada report there is a statement of the cash.

Mr. CAHAN: Certainly; but must not the bank under this system keep on deposit with the Bank of Canada a sum sufficient to provide itself with legal tender, to an amount sufficient to meet all the demands of its customers and its depositors?

Mr. McGEER: Not at all, because under the Bank of Canada Act any chartered bank needing cash can borrow it from the Bank of Canada on its note and on the securities which it has in its possession. There is no restriction upon the right of a chartered bank under the Bank of Canada Act in borrowing from the bank.

Mr. CAHAN: If it borrows on the security of Dominion of Canada bonds, for instance, the bonds are no longer in the possession of the bank; they are in the possession of the Bank of Canada.

Mr. McGEER: To-day the banks in Canada have 1,155 millions of securities which they own, in the possession of the chartered banks. That is security for the lending of Bank of Canada cash to a bank that needs it.

Mr. CAHAN: Only when the chartered bank delivers up to and deposits with the Bank of Canada the bonds or other securities on which the advance is made by the Bank of Canada.

Mr. McGEER: Why then, with 1,155 millions of securities which are good for the borrowing of Bank of Canada bills in time of emergency is it necessary to carry 194 millions of Bank of Canada bills on deposit with the Bank of Canada? The point is this. Here we have a statement that to meet bank needs it requires 53 millions of Bank of Canada bills to take care of day to day transactions. That is all that the banks are using to support 2,800 millions of deposits. They have, in addition to that amount which they carry in their tills, on deposit, 194 millions.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. McGEER: And, in addition to that, dominion and provincial securities which are good for borrowings from the Bank of Canada in times of emergency amounting to 1,155 millions. Of course, they will have to give these up to the bank. But what I am pointing out is that this record shows quite clearly the need for this change, because it shows that the government and the Bank of Canada have no control whatever over the power of the banks to increase the volume of circulating credit currency in the service of the nation. I am pointing out that the mere acquisition of this 49 per cent of the stock of the Bank of Canada is not going to improve that situation.

I will not argue the question further, but I wish to quote from an address delivered last night in Halifax, which was broadcast all over Canada and which I do not think either this government or any one else in this house should ignore. I quote:

> The Liberal party cannot lead the people. For reaction leads it.

I suppose this is going to be the policy of the Conservative party to be enunciated at the coming convention.

Mr. CAHAN: I pray God it may not be.

Mr. McGEER: This is not what I am saying, but what Mr. Herridge stated in Halifax last night. He said:

> The Liberal party cannot lead the people. For reaction leads it.
> This party was born in the economy of scarcity. There it still abides. The present fact of potential plenty has no place in its philosophy. Though in the beginning, mark you, the Liberal party nailed to its masthead, the doctrine of political and economic freedom. And scarcity, of course, is the denial of all freedom.

Reaction dominates the Liberal party. The Liberal hierarchy, the party's high command, its unawakened followers, are for the old order and against the new.

The Liberal machine is the hired man of the money power. For a time, all that the money power asked of Liberalism was to be left alone. The Liberal party left it alone. But to-day, in government, to do nothing is to do wrong. The fixation of Liberalism has been a firm base for reaction's operations against the people.

The money power is against free trade. The Liberal party is against freedom of trade: except in speeches.

Before the last election, the Liberal leader promised to do battle with the money power. There has been no battle.

The startling thing about this speech is that it is addressed to a Conservative convention in Halifax pleading that the Conservatives line up against the money power and throw the leader of the Liberal government out of office because he has not done battle with that power.

Mr. BENNETT: As promised.

Mr. McGEER: Members on the other side have said that I have strange ideas and have advanced strange doctrines, but I never dreamed that as a Liberal I should ever live to read this great effusion as the expression of Conservatism on the Atlantic shores of Canada. But time goes on. The Conservative party has had its place in the Dominion of Canada and goes down with other institutions that have fallen into the limbo of the things that merely decorate the memories of the past and stand obsolete in the way of progress. But let me say that as the Conservative party goes out there is a danger of the Liberal party becoming and remaining the Conservative party of the past.

Miss MACPHAIL: Becoming! It is.

Mr. McGEER: We have a hope, a great hope, that this reactionary spirit of which even the Conservatives now complain, and which bristles in the banking policy of 1934 will go, not only on this side of the house but on that. This problem of establishing a new order which can finance progress is above party politics. If partyism fails to meet the challenge, which I believe this party is honestly making the effort to meet to-day, as badly as the party opposite failed during the years following the change of monetary policy in 1934, then a new national organization will take hold of the issue. The thing that won the election in Saskatchewan more than anything else was the promise of the Prime Minister to nationalize the Bank of Canada, meaning that he was going to give this dominion a national monetary policy. We believe and hope that during the coming winter, before the next session of parliament, this monetary problem will be grappled with in Canada as it has been in other nations, and that along with a publicly owned institution to make our national monetary policy a public utility service we shall have a developed policy under which the administration will make that public utility service real and effective.

Mr. HANSELL: This discussion arose from the question asked of the acting minister concerning the control of the bank, and as to whether this section actually gave the government control of the Bank of Canada. We listened to the discussion with interest, and perhaps some valuable points were made. In the speeches made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) on this measure, particularly at the resolution stage, he declared, more than once, that the purpose of this bill was not to control the policy of the Bank of Canada. I have analysed those speeches carefully, and the minister clearly pointed out that the reason for the bill was to silence political controversy over the constitution of the Bank of Canada. I find that the minister used the terms "political controversy" and "political discussion" fifteen times in the two speeches that he made. In the course of the minister's speech the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) asked a question as to the political controversy that has taken place in the past few years being the reason for bringing down the bill. I quote from page 4055 of Hansard for June 20 last:

Mr. Woodsworth: I have been listening to what the minister has said, and I am in hearty sympathy with the purpose of the resolution, but I find it difficult to understand what has occurred in the last twelve months that has led this government to make this almost complete change in a policy which was adopted no doubt after careful deliberation. Can the minister give us further information on that point?

Mr. Dunning: I do not think I can go further than I have gone. It was quite evident to the government during the last two years that the constitution of the bank was becoming and would likely continue to be a matter of political controversy.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) made a remark which was received with some enthusiasm, that the election in Saskatchewan was won largely because the Prime Minister had promised completely to nationalize the Bank of Canada. That may be so. I am not so much concerned about that, but I am concerned about the fact that the bill does seem to be a political move. Personally I feel confident that this bill does not and is not necessarily designed to give to the government control of policy. If we could be assured that the policy of the bank was going to be changed so that the issue of currency and credit could be made in the interests of domestic commercial and industrial need, we would have more reason for voting for the bill. We are in favour in the bill, because we believe it is a step in the right direction, but if that step is only to put the entire directorate under the government we doubt very much whether it is such a very important step in the right direction.

As to the bill being a political bill, I am not saying this with any malice towards the government, because as the last speaker (Mr. McGeer) has said, the Liberals have a great hope. This group here would rejoice if the great hope that the hon. member had in mind were realized. The Liberal government will always find this group sympathetic to any forward move on behalf of democracy towards controlling the issuance of money in terms of public need. But to go back: it seems to me the bill is somewhat of a political bill. I have it in mind—the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) mentioned it the other day—that two years ago the Prime Minister said very distinctly, when the bill for the purchase of fifty-one per cent of the stock of the Bank of Canada was before the house, that that bill was designed to fulfil the promise that he had made prior to the election. Then —I am recalling this as I have a point to make—the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in Edmonton was reported as saying that the complete control of currency and credit would be in the hands of the government by 1945. When that report came out in the press I asked the Prime Minister on the floor of the house whether we could expect any legislation to be brought down that would in any way readjust the banking system of this country. I thought that a legitimate question to ask after what the Minister of Agriculture had said in Edmonton. I think I can say in all kindness that the Prime Minister's answer to my question was vague. He told us that the legislative program would not be complete until the close of the session. I wonder whether the Prime Minister had in mind then that the government would be bringing down this bill.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes.

Mr. HANSELL: I am very glad to have the Prime Minister give that definite answer, but it is singular that the public announcement was not made until two or three days before the Saskatchewan election. Then I should like to refer to the speech of the Minister of Finance on the resolution, quoting from page 4055 of Hansard:

> If the central bank of a country is to serve the high purpose for which it is created, it must be manned by men who not only are expert in monetary, economic and financial matters, but also have a sufficient independence of judgment to be able at all times to talk on equal terms to the government of the day with respect to the matters which come under the jurisdiction of the bank in the ordinary course of business.

There may be some value in the government listening not only to those who may be appointed to the directorate but also to members of parliament who come here representing sections of this great democracy that are demanding results along the lines of economic reform. To be honest with the Minister of Finance in connection with the quotation I just read I should say that the minister did go on, at page 4059, to say:

> The general broad policy of the bank of course must be in harmony with the desires of a majority of this parliament.

I am glad that statement was made, because I do feel that the policy of the Bank of Canada should be determined by the desires of the members of this house, who after all represent this great democracy.

Mr. PELLETIER: The remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) a moment ago began with a question addressed to the Minister of National Revenue, who is in charge of this bill. The hon. member wanted to know what the government's policy was going to be, and the minister replied that it was not usual to declare government policy in advance. I believe, however, that we should have a definite statement as to what is meant by government policy. It will be remembered by all hon. members of this house and by the people of this country that the Liberal party intended to take hold of the Bank of Canada and issue currency and credit in terms of public need. We are not asking for a statement of policy, but it does seem to me that we have a right to ask, and that we should insist upon knowing, what is meant by public need. What is meant by issuing credit and currency in terms of public need? If a satisfactory explanation is given in that regard it is not necessary to know what the policy will be.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that "public need" is used as distinguished from "private gain," but public need does not mean private need as my hon. friend and those who sit around him have frequently interpreted it. It means exactly what it says, in terms of public need as distinct from private gain; it is not synonymous, and could not possibly be, with individual private need.

Mr. PELLETIER: Perhaps the Prime Minister could make it clear by giving us an illustration. I am quite willing to admit that there is and must be a difference between public need and private gain, but just what is the meaning of public need and just how far does it go in the administration of affairs in this country? I do not want to know the difference between public need and private gain; I want to know the meaning of public need.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have tried to enlighten my hon. friend, but if from what I have said he cannot gather what it means I am afraid that no additional words of mine would help him further.

Mr. PELLETIER: Perhaps the Prime Minister would give us an illustration to show what he means.

An hon. MEMBER: There are schools for that purpose.

Mr. PELLETIER: I do not believe that is a proper reply. We were told that currency and credit would be issued in terms of public need. The functions of the bank are alleged to be under the control of the government; but up to the present time, with the conditions that prevail in this country, I have failed to see any such thing as public need being considered. I want to know what is meant by public need, and I believe the people of the country are entitled to have a proper definition of that term.

Mr. CAHAN: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. PELLETIER: I believe the Minister of National Revenue should answer my question.

Mr. ILSLEY: I can only repeat what I said previously, that the policy of the bank is to carry out the objects which are set out in the preamble of the bill. When I said the policy of the government would not be announced until the proper time I had reference to specific steps that might be taken from time to time; I had no reference to the general policy as set out in the preamble. To make it perhaps a little more definite I might repeat what the Minister of Finance said in his speech in this house on March 8 of this year:

> There is little difficulty in defining the general objectives of the central bank and of the government which controls it. These objectives are the maximum possible sustained level of productivity and the minimum possible level of unemployment.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Mr. PELLETIER: I was quite careful not to ask the Minister to define the policy. He did state in the beginning of his remarks that it was not usual for the government to indicate what might be the policy of any arm of government, and it is because of that very reason that I ask for a definition of what public need means; because if we are told what the government means by issuing credit and currency in terms of public need we do not desire to know, nor would it be necessary, what is to be the policy of the government. If we are given a definition of public need by the government it will be clear to all hon. members as to what the policy eventually will be. But I think those words "in terms of public need" demand explanation, and certainly they should be defined.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am within the judgment of the committee as to whether or not I have answered that question: "The maximum possible sustained level of productivity and the minimum possible level of unemployment."

Mr. HANSELL: The term "public need" is not the only expression that has been used by the Prime Minister. He also used the words "domestic need," and if those words mean anything—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Where did I use that term?

Mr. HANSELL: The reference is on page 95 of Hansard for this year:

> A central bank is necessary to determine the supply of currency in relation to the domestic, social and industrial requirements of the Canadian people.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Yes. The domestic requirements of the Canadian people are something quite other than and distinguished from domestic need.

Mr. HANSELL: I would not ask the question, but I do believe that the domestic need of the people is that men and women who have homes and families should be able to obtain the money necessary in order that they may live.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The domestic requirements of Canada are the need of the Canadian people as distinguished from those of other parts of the world.

Mr. QUELCH: Surely the Prime Minister would not suggest that to-day the domestic and social requirements of the Canadian people are being adequately met. Would he suggest that the needs of the unemployed in Vancouver have been adequately met?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have never said they were. The purpose of the bank is to work towards that end. I do not believe it is possible for any need to be adequately met at this or at any time; as one need is met after another, there will always be increase in demand and desire. We shall at least strive toward more adequately meeting the situation.

Mr. PELLETIER: Will the Prime Minister say that the Bank of Canada is going to issue credit and currency in order to create employment? My understanding of public need is that if there are people unemployed in Canada who can be provided with employment, that employment should be created by any means possible. This Bank of Canada is now owned one hundred per cent by the government. Is it to issue large sums of currency in order to create employment? Is it to begin vast works of this kind? Is it to issue credit and currency to pay pensions to the blind? What is to be the purpose of the issue of credit and currency in terms of public need? Is it to supply money to end unemployment? If these requirements are not met, then it is not issuing currency and credit in terms of public need. If the government could give us an answer as to what they intend to do in this connection, there will be no further need to ask these questions.

Mr. BENNETT: I asked a question in connection with the number of directors.

Mr. ILSLEY: The leader of the opposition asked a question as to why eleven had been fixed as the number of directors.

Mr. BENNETT: There are thirteen in all.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is to be a board of thirteen members, eleven of whom are directors, one the governor and one the deputy governor. Then there is an additional member of the board, the deputy minister of finance, or his nominee, who has no voting power. I suppose technically it would be a board of fourteen, thirteen of whom had voting power.

Mr. BENNETT: I would read it the other way. The section reads:

> The bank shall be under the management of a board of directors composed of a governor, a deputy governor and eleven directors appointed in accordance with the provisions of this act.

I wished to know the reason for fixing upon eleven as the number of directors.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall come to that in a minute. Subsection 2 of section 5 of the act reads:

> In addition to the members of the board as constituted by subsection one of this section, the deputy minister of finance or, in case of his absence or incapacity at any time, such other officer of the Department of Finance as the minister may nominate for the time being, shall be, by virtue of his office or of such nomination, as the case may be, a member of the board, but shall not have the right to vote.

I think that section bears out what I said a moment ago.

Mr. BENNETT: While that subsection provides that the deputy minister shall be a member of the board, this amendment sets out the composition of the board. There is no provision for the deputy minister in this amendment. The two subsections are contradictory. This new subsection states definitely that the board shall be composed of, one, a governor; two, a deputy governor and, three, eleven directors. That act passed in 1934 provided that the deputy minister should be a member of the board and this amendment overlooks that provision, unless he is to be included in the eleven.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are amending subsection 1 of section 5, but we are not changing subsection 2 which provides that the deputy minister shall be a member. He will be a member in addition to those provided for by subsection 1 of section 5.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister is an astute lawyer and he should read this amendment. It reads:

> The bank shall be under the management of a board of directors composed of a governor, a deputy governor and eleven directors appointed in accordance with the provisions of this act.

Those are the governing and dominating words. They state that the board shall consist of thirteen members. Then follows the subsection which states that the deputy minister is to be a member of the board, but he cannot be a member when we set out who is to compose the board and he is not included, unless he is to be one of the eleven directors.

Mr. ILSLEY: That has always been the construction of this section. It is just as it was before, except that now the board is composed of a governor, a deputy governor and eleven members. Subsection 2 has been left alone. The right hon. gentleman asked why the number eleven was chosen. It was desired to make some provision for territorial representation. While it may not be always true that there will be on the board one director from each of the nine provinces, the fact remains that there are nine provinces. Then it was thought desirable to have two directors who would not be considered as coming from any particular section of Canada. They would be likely resident near Ottawa and it would be possible for them to attend the meetings of the executive committee. At the present time there are eleven directors who are being continued until the expiration of their respective terms of office.

Mr. BENNETT: It is intended to keep them until the expiration of their terms of office?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: The act contemplates March 1 as being the date on which appointments would be made. I had thought that the government intended to have the new board begin its functions as at March 1, 1939, but I gather from what the minister says that that is not the intention.

Mr. ILSLEY: They do not technically go out of office until the end of their term. They would go out at the end of the February nearest the end of their term of office.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the fact that the management of the bank is being entrusted to a board I thought that probably the government would have provided that the board should cease to hold office on the last day of February, 1939, and that the government would appoint the new board as of March 1, 1939. That is the language of section 9. I had thought that if you were going to take control, it would be better to do it in that way, that is, have the vacancies occur as of the last day of February next year and then fill them as of the first day of March next year. Apparently the government thinks the other way is best.

Mr. CAHAN: The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard suggested that the chartered banks held unnecessarily $103,300,000 of Bank of Canada bills. He referred also to the computation, which he had given to the house last evening, that the chartered banks have in Bank of Canada bills a total of $247,500,000. He alleges that only five per cent of cash reserves was required to support the bank deposits at a certain date and he gave us the bank deposits at that date as $2,884,400,000. He computes five per cent of that sum to be $144,200,000, and then makes the fanciful assumption that no more than five per cent will be required for the safety of the bank. Therefore, he alleges that the banks hold in Bank of Canada bills $103,300,000 in excess of reserve requirements. If by reserve requirements the hon. gentleman meant the five per cent which is provided for by the statute, then he is correct. But he cannot possibly assume that that $103,000,000, as shown on a certain date as the statutory reserve of five per cent, will be sufficient to meet all exigencies of all the banks in time of crisis. The hon. member does not appreciate the fact that the economic security of Canada, its commercial and industrial security, depend upon the chartered banks having sufficient reserves available to meet all possible exigencies. No one can suggest that five per cent is sufficient. That is the lower limit. But these banks, in order to create public confidence in their stability, maintain a larger reserve than that, and they are bound to do so, if they wish to maintain the confidence not only of their own shareholders and depositors but of the banking and commercial communities with which they deal throughout the world.

The hon. member made one other statement. He suggested that the Hon. Mr. Herridge in his speech at Halifax was authoritatively pronouncing a policy for the Conservative party of Canada. Evidently he did not read the speech.

Mr. McGEER: Oh yes, he did.

Mr. CAHAN: Apparently he read only the headlines, because in the speech Mr. Herridge said:

> Now it is not intended to replace the Liberal government by a Conservative government. Reaction knows that neither Liberalism nor Conservatism, flying the swastika of the money power, can win again.

It is clearly apparent from that speech that he has in view the establishment of a new national party organization, and it is quite clear from the address of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard that Mr. Herridge has already obtained one disciple for his new organization. Astute a man as Mr. Herridge is, having secured the unbounded confidence of the member for Vancouver-Burrard, it is now only necessary for him to secure the confidence of the social credit party, with which he seems to be more clearly allied than with any other party in Canada at the present time; and the social credit party, with Mr. Herridge as leader and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard as first lieutenant, have already begun the fight which they intend to carry on at the next federal election. As a matter of fact, I should be only too happy personally if such a fight were inaugurated in Canada. I lived through and took a keen interest in the old silver money fight during a certain presidential election in the United States, and the answer of the conservative elements in the United States to that propaganda, the conservative elements in both national parties of that day, was such a complete overthrow of the propagandists for free coinage of silver that the propaganda has never been repeated since. Although Mr. Bryan lived for some years thereafter he never again advocated his free silver coinage policy.

Mr. McGEER: But Roosevelt put it into effect.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think he has quite put it into effect yet.

Mr. McGEER: Oh yes he has, absolutely.

Mr. CAHAN: I do not think so, certainly not in the terms in which it was first announced; and he has not put it into effect in such a way as to satisfy the propaganda which is being carried on by the hon. member and a few others associated with him. If we are to have an electoral test of that kind in Canada, let us have it and have a complete showdown. What I blame this government for is this, that although they had complete control of the Bank of Canada under the statute then existing, as complete control as they will have when this bill passes, yet, in deference to propaganda carried on in Saskatchewan and in some other quarters, they have introduced this bill in order to satisfy a political demand—a demand made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard.

Mr. McGEER: In 1933.

Mr. CAHAN: A demand made subsequently by the social credit party, a demand made by all persons who wish to substitute the printing press and paper tokens for all purposes of mercantile exchange.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Mr. Chairman, I object very strongly to that. The social credit party has never advocated the printing press.

Mr. CAHAN: It is a different name but it means the same thing.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That is not so at all.

Mr. CAHAN: I am willing to debate that matter at any other time, but just now I am attending to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The hon. gentleman will get the surprise of his life when he does.

Mr. CAHAN: What I do say is this, that in this bill, with the terms of which I am in accord, except that it is introduced to satisfy a certain political demand, the government are making concessions which will simply encourage those who are demanding this alleged reform to claim still further concessions. The next claim which will be made—it is clear from the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and those of other hon. members—will be the use of the printing press to supply Bank of Canada bills in payment for public services and to supply public needs, and to service and pay off the public debt of Canada. That is the trend of the discussion, and that agitation is encouraged by the concessions which the government are making in introducing this measure. I sincerely hope, however, that the courage of the government will be restored and that they will be stalwart and strong enough to withstand this agitation. I am thoroughly convinced that even if Mr. Herridge and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard and the social credit members and others unite with perhaps a few other Liberal members in this house, who are not quite as outspoken as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard, and the issue is fairly joined, the people of this country are so sane and so well informed as to the facts that they will resist the demand and defeat it by an overwhelming majority. If that combat is to come, I hope it will come before the years of my long life are altogether closed.

Mr. McGEER: I want to refer to just one point. The hon. gentleman has represented me as saying that I think the banks are wrong in holding $103,000,000, and he says I do not appreciate that that $103,000,000, over and above their actual reserve requirements according to law, is necessary to maintain the stability and security of the banks up to the point where they can command the confidence not only of the people of Canada but of other nations; that I do appreciate that something in excess of legal reserves is a practical necessity; that I do not understand that that margin of security over legal reserves is essential to the general well being of the dominion. Let me point out to him that he is telling only half the story. He has overlooked the fact that, in addition to the $199,000,000 of Bank of Canada bills that the chartered banks have on deposit, they have also the security of the $80,000,000 odd of gold reserves held by the Bank of Canada, as well as the $90,000,000 odd of gold reserves that they are using to support the Bank of Canada bills in issue at the present time. In addition to that $199,000,000 of Bank of Canada bills on deposit with the Bank of Canada by the chartered banks, there is $339,000,000 of available Bank of Canada bills which can be issued to support the bank, and the gold reserves not in use by the Bank of Canada at the present time.

Mr. CAHAN: Quite so.

Mr. McGEER: To say, as he has said this afternoon, that I do not appreciate the need of that $103,000,000 of excess reserves would be to accuse me of not knowing that the Bank of Canada and not the chartered banks, and the gold reserves of the Bank of Canada and the government's administration of our gold reserve and the issue of our legal tender currency, are the security for our national position in international affairs. That I do appreciate. But that I do not think he understood in the argument he presented to the house this afternoon.

I want to go a little bit further. Let the hon. gentleman be not too sure that the fight of which he spoke will not come. But let him not discount the intelligence of the Canadian people, because they have been bamboozled too long by the kind of arguments which the hon. gentleman has presented to-day, and which tell only a small portion of the truth. There are, thank God, in Canada to-day men who are prepared to go forward, letting the people know the kind of thing that they have suffered under the administration of orthodox finance and under the monopoly which the private money system has wielded. The hon. gentleman sneered at the campaign of William Jennings Bryan and gloated over the fact that the republican party went back in 1896 and continued in power for a great many years—that the sound money men won. But if he will go back and quote from some of the men who saw the trend of affairs, he will have seen sound money and orthodox finance bring the great United States to her knees in bankruptcy and disaster and destitution in the appalling year 1933, when that type of republicanism and that old toryism for which he stands to-day disappeared from the United States, and disappeared forever. It has gone like other things that have failed to survive, because it brought disaster where it promised the blessings of progress. A new day is dawning, and the day will come when every man in Canada will know and understand the practical and understandable theories of the economic bloodstream of our social order, the medium of exchange which men must have in order to live even on the lowest standards of living, a circulation which must be ample and free if they are to enjoy the abundance which science has brought within the reach of humanity.

Do not be alarmed at the future. Other men have been more alarmed than is the hon. member—

Mr. CAHAN: I am not alarmed.

Mr. McGEER: —when they found progress sweeping on. But, I venture to say, even before the hon. gentleman passes on—which I hope will be many, many years hence—he will be standing shoulder to shoulder with us, fighting the battle of humanity, seeing a better day for toryism and for the people of Canada.

Mr. CAHAN: I will reply in only a few words. I have lived through similar agitations in two other countries. I have seen the misery, the wretchedness, the poverty and the suicides, as well as death in other forms, which have been brought about through the adoption of unsound monetary policies. I am not scared by the eloquent suggestions of the hon. gentleman, because I have faith in Canada, faith in the sanity of our people, and I am persuaded that the progress we have made in the past under sound monetary policies is but a promise of the greater prosperity which awaits this country in the future.

Mr. PELLETIER: The signs of the times point indeed to what may happen in this country in the future. We have had evidence, and it grows day by day, that there is a definite movement towards the formation of a union party in Canada. On one side may be aligned the forces of reaction, on the other the forces of progressive thought. Undoubtedly that day is coming, but because up to the present the situation has not been made clear it may serve a good purpose to clarify it on this occasion.

To-day there is no combined or effective opposition to the Liberal party. There are in Canada various schools of progressive thought, but none sufficiently large of itself to offer effective opposition to the present government. But I feel sure that, with the alignment of all progressive thought in Canada in order to accomplish greater abundance in this life for the common people, there will develop a definite forward movement against the forces of reaction. I merely wish to point this out because of the remarks of the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George, and to assure him, even though we have not his experience and have not arrived at his age in life, it is a principle of democracy that the will of democracy must eventually prevail. If the people of Canada desire progress, the only way in which they can achieve it is through the language of political action. I have no doubt that the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George well understands what we mean by "the language of political action." When Saskatchewan was "threatened," as they said, by social credit forces, that was the language of political action. The Minister of Finance has definitely stated that he brought in this act for political reasons. Of course they were political reasons. Nevertheless that is how democracy works. It works through the medium of political expression, and we intend to continue to give such expression so that the forces of progress in this country may ever go forward. It does not make any difference to us whether progress comes through the Liberal party or through somebody else. If political action makes for progress, democracy is on the way to winning a battle which it must continue to fight.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. PELLETIER: It is not carried. It will not be carried—for a while, I mean, Mr. Chairman. It seems to me that at this point there is something we should make quite clear. Misunderstandings have arisen between two progressive parties concerning this particular legislation. It was advanced in certain parts of Saskatchewan that the social credit members had opposed progressive legislation of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation party. To-day I refer to that, not by way of criticism but because I believe it is too bad that the forces of progress should be split by such technical details as these. It is too bad that misunderstandings arise from time to time. For that reason the stand we took on that occasion should be made, I believe, quite clear. I well recall the remarks I made in that connection, which are recorded in Hansard of February 26, 1936.

Mr. ILSLEY: On a point of order, I do not wish to limit discussion, but I submit that what the hon. gentleman is about to say will obviously be out of order.

Mr. PELLETIER: I agree that it is out of order; nevertheless—

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order raised by the minister is well taken. This discussion for the last hour and a half or two hours has been out of order, because we are now on a definite clause, the section having to do with the directors of the bank. I will read it in order to refresh the memory of hon. members, because the discussion has strayed very far from it:

> The bank shall be under the management of a board of directors composed of a governor, a deputy governor, and eleven directors appointed in accordance with the provisions of this act. There may also be an assistant deputy governor who shall not as such be a member of the board.

From now on I will confine the discussion, as far as I can as chairman, to the clause at the moment before the committee, and I would ask the hon. gentleman, who has not yet concluded, to observe the ruling.

Mr. PELLETIER: No member of this committee knows better than I do the wisdom that you display, Mr. Chairman, in guiding the deliberations of the committee, and I accept your ruling. I would remark, however, that latitude has been allowed other members on this question. If they should have refrained from discussing the question it might have been good policy to prevent such discussion because it is not right to deprive us of the same latitude. Nevertheless I respect your decision and will confine myself to the clause under discussion.

The board of directors will reflect the policy which may be adopted by the majority of the members of the House of Commons, in other words by the government of the day, and it is therefore important when we are considering their appointment that we should know what the policy will be. I have asked the question time and again and have come to the conclusion that it is impossible for the government to determine what they mean by the issuing of credit and currency in terms of public need. They have refused to tell us whether they will use the Bank of Canada to create money in order to take care of unemployment. They have refused to give us some idea of what is meant by the issuance of credit and currency in terms of public need, and it is for that reason, and because we have waited so long for this legislation, that we are pressing this question now. We had faith in the beginning and we kept quiet concerning the Bank of Canada, but now the appointment of the directors is under consideration I submit the time is opportune for the government to give us a clear-cut definition of the issuance of credit and currency in terms of public need. The government evidently do not intend to answer the question; possibly they themselves do not know what they mean. I will, therefore, drop that question and ask another. Who prints the bills of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: There are two bank note companies in Ottawa who print these notes. Public tenders are called for and contracts awarded.

Mr. PELLETIER: Are tenders asked for only from these two companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: These are the only two in Canada.

Mr. PELLETIER: Then there is some sort of monopoly. Why is it necessary for the Bank of Canada to have these bills printed by a private institution?

Mr. ILSLEY: The government is not itself in the engraving business and has no facilities for printing notes.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The Liberal party has said that usury once in control will wreck any nation.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I do not think that is out of order. Usury once in control will wreck any nation. The Minister of Finance says that he is not going to issue money and credit debt-free but will continue to borrow. Can he explain how the Liberal financial policy will lower taxation and debt in Canada?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member heard my ruling a few moments ago and I would ask him to confine his remarks to section 3, which has to do with the board of directors.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The directors are more or less experts and they should have some say in matters of policy. It should be the duty of the government in power at least to give them counsel and advice or to lay down a policy that will relieve Canada of the tremendous financial burden from which we are suffering. I should like the minister to mention any plan he has in mind which will reduce taxation having regard to the very considerable increase in this direction during the past year. I would give him even fifty years.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall clause 3 carry?

Mr. LANDERYOU: I should like to have a statement on that question of debt and taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: The subject of debt and taxation has been discussed many times in this house, and certainly it is not my place as the sponsor of this bill to make a statement on that subject under this section of the bill.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) spoke very disparagingly of the efforts of monetary reformers in Canada, and so far as social credit is concerned we have advocated an increase in purchasing power.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Will the hon. member be good enough to resume his seat. He knows very well that he is out of order and I would ask him to confine his remarks to the clause under discussion. Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms lays it down that speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I was referring to the remarks made by the hon. member on this very section.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Pelletier) brought to the attention of the minister this question of the issue of money and credit in terms of public need, and the statement was made that the idea was to maintain maximum production and maximum employment. Is it the intention of the government, then—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must ask the hon. member to resume his seat. Is he prepared to conform to the ruling of the chair? If so, he may be permitted to proceed, confining his remarks to the clause under discussion.

Mr. HEAPS: It is very difficult, Mr. Chairman, to limit any speaker in that manner. In connection with this very section the question of the policy of the bank is necessarily under discussion. I do not want to prolong the debate, but in fairness to the hon. member I would point out that we are dealing with the appointment of directors. It is under these directors that the policy—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEAPS: Will hon. members kindly be quiet when I am raising a point of order?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member must state his point of order as briefly as possible.

Mr. HEAPS: You cannot tell how brief I have to be; I will determine that. I am stating that under this clause dealing with the appointment of directors any hon. member has a right to speak on the question of the policy that these directors are likely to adopt. The question whether they issue more currency or less, which I do not for the moment, want to discuss, is strictly within this clause and the succeeding one, and in spite of the fact that hon. members are anxious to get through with this business as quickly as possible, when a member wants to discuss something which is strictly within the clause I do not think he should be told that he is not within his rights in so doing.

Mr. BENNETT: The difficulty arises from the fact that we have all been enjoying very wide latitude in the discussion under the section dealing with the title. Once that was adopted, I think the rule is clear that in committee we must be confined to the clause or section under consideration. The time when the hon. member could have spoken was on section 1, but once that passed he is, in my judgment, bound by the rules to make his observations relevant to the question at issue; that is, the substitution of a new section providing for the appointment by the government of eleven directors, for the section providing for the method heretofore employed.

The CHAIRMAN: In addition to the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), I would read citation 753 under standing order No. 75:

> The second reading of a bill is that stage when it is proper to enter into a discussion and propose a motion relative to the principle of the measure.

Mr. PELLETIER: We have been asking questions, which I agree are rather lengthy; they demand some explanation—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I have already given my ruling, and the hon. member is out of order when he discusses the matter.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I have no intention of challenging the ruling of the chair. The only reference I wish to make to what has been said by other hon. members is to the statement made by the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan), that we are simply out to turn the printing presses loose and flood the country with Bank of Canada bills. In answer to that I say that there is no intention on the part of the social credit group to turn the printing presses loose. All we suggest to the minister is that when there is idle labour and unused material in the country, the government should take steps to have our monetary system reflect our collective ability to produce goods and services, using that idle labour and unused material. Go just that far; issue money to make possible the development of Canada by the use of the idle labour and unused material. Is it the intention of the government so to use the Bank of Canada that the idle labour and unused material can be brought into production?

Mr. PELLETIER: The section provides that there may also be an assistant deputy governor who shall not as such be a member of the board. Why is this necessary?

Mr. ILSLEY: This has been a provision of the act from the beginning. The only members of the board other than the directors are the governor and the deputy governor, and also the Deputy Minister of Finance, who has no vote.

Mr. BENNETT: He is the contact man between the government and the bank.

Mr. PELLETIER: How was the number of directors arrived at? Why are there eleven rather than seven or fifteen?

Mr. ILSLEY: I answered that question rather fully just a few minutes ago in reply to a question by the leader of the opposition. Unless the hon. member insists, I should be sorry to repeat what I said.

Mr. PELLETIER: I have no intention of holding up the committee; I realize we are trying to make progress as fast as possible, and I shall observe the remarks of the minister in answer to the leader of the opposition.

On section 5—Directors.

Mr. BENNETT: I quite understand that the minister, who is very ably taking the place of the Minister of Finance, would hardly be prepared to make any alteration in the section, but I must point out that to leave this section as it now stands will, I think, be found extremely embarrassing to the government. I believe they will have to amend it next session. The minister will recall that in the section passed in 1936 we provided for the retirement of directors in 1940, 1941, and as late as 1942. It is obvious that as the section now before the committee reads these members of the present board will retire only on the last day of February in their respective years. I should say that the government would find it highly desirable to provide for their retirement at once, or at least at the end of February of next year, and then re-appoint them, if desired, because provision is made here for re-appointment; otherwise I think the government is going to be embarrassed. I say that frankly. We have continued these directors in office until the February preceding the expiration of their term of office. It will be recalled that in the 1936 section—without going into it at length—we provided for two to retire at the annual meeting in 1940, two in 1941, two in 1942 and so on. Now we repeal the section, and there is no longer any authority for their appointment; that has vanished. There are no annual meetings in the sense heretofore provided; therefore there can be no appointments at the annual meetings. But in the section now under consideration we also say that:

> The minister with the approval of the governor in council shall as of the first day of March in each year appoint for terms of three years each a sufficient number of directors to provide that there shall be eleven directors: provided, however, that every director holding office at the date of the coming into force of this subsection shall continue as a director up to and including the last day of February in the year of the expiration of the term of office for which he was elected or appointed.

This, of course, means that whatever policy the government may desire to embark upon, there is no power to remove the directors unless you come back to parliament. The policy of the government is reflected by the board, and the government should be in a position to put in its board of directors at least by next February. This can be brought about in the manner I have indicated. I am not going to do more than direct attention to the matter, because I realize the position of the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a majority of government appointed directors on the board at the present time, and as far as I know there has been no criticism of the shareholder appointed directors, who are in the minority. Both are satisfactory.

Mr. BENNETT: But those appointed by the government are appointed with definite limitations, and they will continue in office for a considerable length of time. Whether or not they would reflect the policy of the government with a government owned institution as distinguished from a government controlled institution is a matter which obviously the government is not going to discuss. I am content as long as I have directed attention to the fact that I think the government will want to come back later and change the section.

On section 6—Selection of directors.

Mr. BENNETT: In Australia the age limit is seventy years instead of seventy-five with respect to bank directors, and it will be observed that in this legislation the territorial question is not dealt with; this provides only for occupational diversification. In the report made by the royal commission in Australia, after investigation they indicated that had been one of the difficulties, and recommended that there should be both capacity and diversity of occupation, as we have here. At the present moment, under the preceding section the board that came into being reflected in part at least the standpoint of geographical and other considerations that had nothing to do with the essential question of capacity.

Sections 7 and 8 agreed to.

On section 9—Exchange of shares.

Mr. BENNETT: In connection with the fixing of the price I mentioned to the minister the other evening that the record indicated that no such price as $59.20 had been paid for board lots in Toronto. I have not the Montreal figures before me; but I suppose that is only a question of computation, and I take it that the officials have satisfied themselves that $59.20 is the average price on the two exchanges during the months in question.

Mr. ILSLEY: The $59.20 represents the average of every single sale made on the Toronto and Montreal exchanges for the period in question. The exact amount is $59.17.

Mr. BENNETT: That covers the months of January, February, March, April and May?

Mr. ILSLEY: Beginning with January 1 and extending to the day the Prime Minister made the announcement that these shares would be taken over.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister mentioned yesterday the method by which this computation was made. Personally I think $59.20 is a little too much to pay for these shares which less than four years ago cost the public approximately $50 per share. To me it seems absurd, to use a very mild term, that we should issue shares at $50 and four years later buy them back at a premium of $9.20.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not the same public.

Mr. HEAPS: But they are the same shares. I am not worrying about the public; I am worrying about the shares, and I am thinking of the treasury. This little transaction is costing the treasury of this country $920,000, and from a logical, sound, common sense basis I cannot see why we should issue $50 shares in 1934 and then buy them back at $59.20 in 1938. They were a gilt-edged security paying 4½ per cent all the way through, and they went up in price only because it was practically certain that the interest would be paid during the term of the shares. I think if we bought them back at $50 per share plus accrued interest, that would be a proper price. We are not paying the value of the shares; we are paying the speculative price quoted.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. HEAPS: Yes. In my opinion that price represents the speculative value placed upon them. If we had securities yielding five per cent, these shares would not have gone up so much; on the other hand, if government securities yielded only 2½ per cent, these shares would have gone much higher. I do not think the government ought to buy back its own securities at such a high premium as this.

Mr. ILSLEY: I would just ask the hon. member to put this question to himself. If he had taken some of his money or some of his children's money or some of his wife's money and bought some of these shares at $59.17 or $59.20 a few months ago, would he have been prepared to rise in his place and say he had been justly and fairly treated if the government came along and took those shares from him at $50 per share? That is the problem which confronted us; that is the question we had to ask ourselves.

Mr. HEAPS: That is a fair question. It so happens that I have a few of these shares, which cost me more than $59.20 per share. What is the method the government intends to adopt to finance the repurchase of these shares.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is dealt with in subsection 3 of this section, which reads:

> The minister shall as of the date of the coming into force of this subsection reimburse the bank the amount by which payments made by the bank to the holders of class "A" shares, excluding any amount paid by way of dividend, exceed the par value of such shares and such reimbursement shall be effected by surrendering to the bank for cancellation two thousand of the class "B" shares held by the minister having the aggregate par value of one hundred thousand dollars and by paying to the bank out of any unappropriated moneys in the consolidated revenue fund the sum of eight hundred and twenty thousand dollars.

Mr. HEAPS: I am wondering if the Minister of Finance is going on the market to borrow money to finance the purchase of these shares.

Mr. ILSLEY: That amount is payable out of the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. HEAPS: As far as I can see from the condition of the consolidated revenue fund, it amounts to the same thing. Probably the government will go into the open market and borrow the money in order to purchase these shares. What is the difference between the government having more bonds outstanding to the public and having these shares outstanding? Personally I do not see that there is very much difference.

Mr. ILSLEY: The rate of interest is considerably lower.

Section agreed to.

Sections 10 and 11 agreed to.

On section 12—Bank may buy and sell dominion and provincial securities.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the bonds which we put up with the bank be returned to the treasury now that the bank is publicly owned?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; I do not think there is any intention of having that done.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it should be.

Mr. ILSLEY: Well, the bonds the government delivered to the bank were for value received. The Bank of Canada assumed the liability of the government on $150,000,000 of outstanding dominion notes, and therefore the bonds belong to the bank. I do not see anything in that transaction to effect a release of the government from its obligation to deliver those bonds to the bank.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I shall merely state the case and leave it at that. 1. The Dominion of Canada delivered to the Bank of Canada bonds amounting to $150,000,000 carrying three per cent interest.

Mr. ILSLEY: The right hon. gentleman may be right. I was thinking of the bonds in respect of the dominion notes alone.

Mr. BENNETT: I am coming to that. 2. The Bank of Canada assumed responsibility for the payment of dominion notes. 3. The bank has now become the property of the people of Canada. 4. I therefore contend that the Bank of Canada should hand back to the people of Canada the bonds thus delivered to it because it no longer has any responsibility, that responsibility having been taken over by the people of Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: The bank has a separate corporate entity and must be treated as any other corporate entity. It cannot make a great deal of difference in the final result because the amount paid for interest to the bank is paid to a bank owned by the government. Nevertheless, the bank has a separate corporate existence. It is not a department of government; it is a corporation, a body politic. As I said before, I do not see anything in the circumstances to effect the release of the government's liability.

Section agreed to.

On section 13—Reserves to be maintained by chartered banks.

Mr. BENNETT: Some of our Canadian banks are carrying on operations outside Canada. If they were to become insolvent because of acts committed outside Canada, it would affect Canadians. Therefore, the reserves maintained by the banks in Canada should be for their complete responsibilities, both in and out of the country. That is the position I take with respect to that.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that in respect to the liabilities to pay in other currencies, other reserves are required.

Mr. BENNETT: The countries in which they carry on business require that reserves be maintained. It will be recalled that we passed a statute which permitted some of our banks to issue paper money in the terms of the currencies of the communities in the West Indies in which they were carrying on their business. However, their head offices are in Canada; they are subject to our laws, and there should be no risk of the structure in Canada being impaired by anything that might take place out of the country. I have always contended it is not sufficient that the reserves should be only for the amounts payable in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a provision in the Bank Act which provides that Canadian banks which are liable to pay in foreign currencies must maintain separate reserves satisfactory to the Minister of Finance of this country, apart altogether from the laws of the countries in which they do business.

Mr. BENNETT: That provision was in another statute for some time, and then I believe it was included in the Bank Act, although I speak subject to correction. I quite agree as to that, but what we are endeavouring to do is to deal with deposit liabilities payable in Canada itself. The structure here may be affected by untoward circumstances outside the geographical boundaries of this country and over which we could exercise no control except in the manner I have indicated. I simply direct this to the attention of the minister, and I do not intend wasting any time arguing.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

On section 14—Rest fund.

Mr. BENNETT: We are paying three per cent to this bank every year as interest on our bonds, and what we get back is that proportion of the money to which we are entitled. Why should we pay interest on bonds that were put up originally for a purpose which is now discharged by the country as a whole? Section 41, which deals with that phase of the matter, reads:

> No statute relating to the insolvency or winding up of any corporation shall apply to the bank and in no case shall the affairs of the bank be wound up unless parliament so provides;

In other words, there is the recognition that this is an arm of government. It is no longer subject to the normal laws governing corporations that do business of this kind. We pay an interest rate of three per cent, which amounts to $4,500,000. We might just as well cut that payment right off.

Mr. ILSLEY: It all comes back to us.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it does not. If it did, I would not be making this argument. It is to that very point that I am directing attention. Surely I could not put it any more clearly than I have in the proposition I put before the committee. We pay $4,500,000 because they are three per cent securities. This bank had a revenue of $4,500,000 because of its having assumed originally responsibility for dominion notes. But that responsibility is now a national one, borne by the people of this country. We have made it perfectly clear that we are not going to have any difficulties of that kind in connection with shareholders or anyone else. Who is responsible? The Dominion of Canada is now responsible. There is no getting away from that; that is the whole argument upon which this bill proceeds. Why should the Dominion of Canada, when its responsibility has been fixed and settled, hand over $4,500,000 per annum, which, when it comes back to us, is diminished, mark you, to the extent of one-half? Look at what we get back. This is what is provided:

> —and after deducting an amount equal to four and one-half per centum of the paid-up capital which may be utilized for the payment of cumulative dividends at a rate of four and one-half per centum per annum, payable half-yearly, the ascertained surplus available from the operations of the bank during each financial year shall be applied by the board as follows:

Then follow particulars as to the rest fund and so on. Paragraph (c) reads:

> If the rest fund is not less than twice the paid-up capital, the whole of such surplus shall be paid to the receiver general and placed to the credit of the consolidated revenue fund.

This is at great variance to what happened in Australia. I must say I find it difficult to accommodate my mind to thinking that the taxpayers of Canada have to pay $4,500,000 annually when the bank now belongs to them and is no longer mixed up with any question of profit or gain, to use the language that has been used in this chamber on more than one occasion. Nor has this bank any concern about the question of dividends. This is a public institution belonging to the people of Canada; it is an arm of government.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO RECKLESS DRIVING, SALTING MINES AND MINE SAMPLES, ETC.

The house again in committee on Bill No. 137, to amend the criminal code—Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East)—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 6—Registration of revolvers and pistols.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I have an amendment which I shall ask my colleague to move to this section.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Mr. Chairman, I move that clause 6 be struck out and the following be substituted therefor:

6. Section one hundred and twenty-one A of the said act as enacted by section three of chapter forty-seven of the statutes of 1934, is amended by adding thereto as subsection three the following:

(3) In addition to the registration provided for in subsection two of this section there shall be, similarly, a general registration of all revolvers and pistols during the period between the first day of March and the first day of July in 1939, and during the same period every five years thereafter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Under the law as it is at present every pistol and revolver has to be registered with the police; but it happens, of course, that these weapons often change hands, and so, to keep track of them, provision is being made for a general registration of all these arms every five years.

Mr. BENNETT: The only thought I had this morning was whether a period of five years is not a rather long one in which to have no re-registration for the very reason the minister has just mentioned, namely, the rapidity with which these weapons change hands.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is the period suggested by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. BENNETT: They would have a better idea than I would.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 22—Holder of lease of gold or silver mine defrauding owner.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Subsection 5 stood this morning because of an objection by the right hon. leader of the opposition. Since then I have looked up the Interpretation Act, section 20 of which reads:

Whenever any act or enactment is repealed, and other provisions are substituted by way of amendment, revision or consolidation,

(a) all regulations, orders, ordinances, rules and by-laws made under the repealed act or enactment shall continue good and valid, in so far as they are not inconsistent with the substituted act or enactment, until they are annulled and others made in their stead.

So the order in council would still be in force.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, that would be unquestionably so. We had the same question up in the Bank of Canada bill to-day.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think this will be sufficient.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister thinks it is sufficient, I am content. I only thought it might be made a little clearer.

Section agreed to.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Before you report the bill, Mr. Chairman, I have had objections raised to the wording of clause 14 dealing with disorderly conduct. It seems that this provision was requested by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, who claim there has been some difficulty with regard to screaming. The new provision appears to be too broad. It reads:

(f) causes a disturbance in or near any street, road, highway or public place, by screaming, swearing or singing, or by being drunk, or by impeding or incommoding peaceable passengers, or in any other way.

The last phrase is very broad indeed and might prevent peaceful picketing, which has been commonly regarded as quite legal.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have had some representations made to me with regard to this very matter, and in reply I have given the assurance and the Department of Justice has also given the opinion that this provision will in no way affect picketing, which is legal. This is merely to cover some illegal way of creating disorder. Picketing is not disorder.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; but does not the last phrase, "or in any other way," leave it wide open?

Mr. BENNETT: Only unlawful ways. Those words would not permit a lawful matter to be made unlawful. There is no question about that.

Mr. HEAPS: The whole question resolves itself into what the officer on duty regards as unlawful.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Oh, no; it is the law, and surely if the matter is ever raised, anybody can quote the opinion of the Minister of Justice in charge of this bill and the opinion of the leader of the opposition. What better answer can we give?

Mr. BENNETT: Unfortunately the courts have decided that you cannot read from Hansard in support of your argument; but I have no doubt that the Minister of Justice will give a written opinion to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) and I should be glad to associate my name with that of my right hon. friend.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That will be fine. I have written a letter already.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

PENITENTIARIES

INCORPORATION OF COMMISSION FOR ADMINISTRATION, CONTROL AND MANAGEMENT—AMENDMENT OF EXISTING ACTS

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to incorporate a commission with power under the Minister of Justice to administer, control and manage the penitentiaries; to provide for salaries of the commissioners and assistant commissioners and to amend and consolidate the Penitentiaries Act and amending acts and repeal the same.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I will expedite business by agreeing to your honour leaving the chair without prejudice to the position which I propose to take with respect to this resolution. Perhaps it can be more readily discussed in committee. I must say, however, that I have a very strong opinion against our proceeding with this matter at this time for reasons that I shall presently give.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Mr. BENNETT: I am hopeful that the Minister of Justice will not ask us to deal with this matter at this late date in the session.

Here is a measure of first-rate importance. I use the word "first-rate" in the sense in which it was employed by an old parliamentary draftsman, as denoting a measure which profoundly affects the whole country and no one particular section of it.

A royal commission has made a report. That report was not laid on the table of this house until the fourteenth day of June. The evidence upon which the report was made should also be laid on the table, and I suppose that in due course it will be, but it is not yet available.

The report is a highly contentious document. I am receiving letters from many people complaining of the absolute unfairness, and more, the absolute untruthfulness of statements made in that report. In a public newspaper, for instance, Messrs. Morris of Kingston have published a letter in connection with the handling of coal. The coal was unloaded at a dock. They estimated they had unloaded 250 tons, but it was subject to being measured and weighed. It was weighed and it was found that there were only 217 tons. They sent up the balance of the coal, got receipts for it, and were paid for it; yet they were pilloried in that report. I might cite page after page.

I wonder whether the committee is aware of the fact that this is the first time in our history that as a parliament we are invited to remove a man from office upon the report of a commission which gave him practically no opportunity to be heard. I wonder whether hon. members realize just how the evidence was taken, whose evidence it was, and the conditions under which it was given.

I wish to tell the committee something as to the appointment of General Ormond. He was not appointed by the previous government. The civil service commission was asked to appoint someone to be superintendent of penitentiaries. Advertisements were published throughout this country. Among those who applied for the position was General Ormond, who at that time was district officer commanding at Calgary. He is a pronounced Liberal, as are the members of his family.

When the applications were completed, the then Minister of Justice—I recall the fact vividly—was spoken to by the civil service commission, and informed that they had a number of applications. Thereupon the following were appointed to consider them: the late General MacBrien; Mr. O. M. Biggar, K.C.; Mr. Edwards, K.C., Deputy Minister of Justice; representing the Department of Justice; Colonel Kemmis, representing the civil service commission; Mr. Dufresne, director of public safety, Montreal; and Doctor Porteous, head of the medical side of the institution for mental diseases, Verdun. Those gentlemen considered all the applications received by the commission, and upon the strength of the recommendation made by them the commission appointed General Ormond to that office. That is the story of his appointment.

He has been pilloried in the report. I have great confidence in the fairness of mind of the minister in a matter of this kind. I commenced what I have said by remarking that this is non-political. Having established that it is non-political, I then have great confidence in the fair-mindedness of the Minister of Justice. Is it quite right that one who had a distinguished record in the great war, who occupied a position of high importance in the permanent militia of this country and was well spoken of, who in the ordinary course would have gone from the Calgary command to one more important, should now be confronted with such action as is proposed upon the report of a commission which investigated and took evidence in many quarters from convicts and, after all this was done, brought him up, put him under oath and grilled him by examination and cross-examination? Did you ever hear of the governor of an English prison being treated in that way? Is that, Mr. Chairman, your conception of British fair play and justice?

Strange as it may sound, I barely know the gentleman. If I have seen him ten times, that would be the maximum. He came to Calgary when I was away as leader of the opposition; but I am familiar with the circumstances of his appointment, and I verified my recollection as to the board which recommended his appointment to the civil service commission. Should we not do something a little more decent than is now contemplated to a man of this type? Should we, in the closing days of the session, without the evidence having been laid on the table or our having an opportunity to study it, with the house meeting three times a day, with committees in session, with hon. members unable to examine this very important report, undertake to make ourselves parties to the condemnation of this man? Frankly, having endeavoured to think of the matter as fairly as one can think of anything, I cannot bring myself to believe that we are as unfair as that.

There is one other point. This is dealing with the administration of an extremely important branch of the social life of Canada. Penal institutions have existed for many centuries. The manner of their administration has many times been the subject of investigation and criticism. As a consequence, great improvements were wrought by Howard and those associated with him. Our penal institutions are being maintained for two purposes: one, the punishment of the offender; two, to endeavour so to improve his character that he might be a not unuseful member of society when he left prison. There has never been a time that I can remember in my reading when those who were the victims of their own wrong-doing and had been subjected to the results, by sentences of punishment and imprisonment, have not complained of those whom the law placed in authority to enforce the decrees of society. That is the reason why these people have complained of General Ormond. That is the explanation of this tittle-tattle. There is nothing new about it. It is as old as time itself, and I cannot think that we should set at naught the conditions under which this man came into our service without at least obeying the law itself.

I put this to the minister. Ormond is a civil servant, and he is subject to the provisions of the Civil Service Act. If he is incapable, he must have the allegations of his incapacity charged against him, and he must be given the fullest opportunity to make his defence. Did he have that opportunity? And since when, in this country, has it been possible for three men, without responsibility to this parliament, to arrogate to themselves the right to dismiss this man—for that is what it amounts to—without his having those safeguards with which the law surrounds him made effective in his behalf? I put that as number one. I find it very difficult to accommodate my mind to any other thought. How would we like to be placed in that position? Here is a man appointed under the circumstances that I have mentioned, who sought office in the public service, and who was filling a fine position. His credentials are passed upon by a dispassionate, impartial, non-political tribunal. The civil service board makes the appointment, and then I contend he becomes subject to the Civil Service Act, and can be removed from office only in consequence of his having contravened the provisions of that statute. Has he done so?

Who says so? And we, as a parliament, we the members of this house are the people that are concerned. We said to Ormond when he went into that service under the Civil Service Act, "There is what governs you, Mr. Ormond; if you are guilty of political partisanship, you know what happens. If you contravene any of the sections of the act, out you go; but you do not go until you are heard."

I often recall in that regard what was done in the West Indies where a judge sitting on the bench made it impossible for his creditors to recover against him. He was finally dismissed from office, and properly so; but when the case went before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, they said, "The conduct of this man is indefensible, but you cannot remove a man who has the queen's commission unless he has had an opportunity to make his defence, even though you know he cannot make a successful defence." That, in my judgment, is the strongest reason why we should not proceed this session.

I go a step further. It will be recalled that the proposed bill provides for the appointment of commissioners to control and manage our penitentiaries. We have never embarked upon such an experiment in Canada. Since pre-confederation days this matter was the responsibility of government, and government accepted the full responsibility. Three men are now to deal with the matter. The experience of history, whatever it may be worth—and I always think it is worth a great deal—is that when you divide responsibility of that kind, which is administrative, among three men on a commission, you lessen efficiency and bring about the very condition which you endeavour to prevent and for which administrative control exists. I ask any member of this committee to think back, consider this matter and say whether he has not found that precisely what I say is true. It is one man's direction that always makes for efficient administration in an administrative body. You appoint three, and you have inevitably a condition that is repugnant to your very notion of effectiveness. Every one knows that. When you are dealing with the civil service commission, of course, you want diversity; when you are dealing with the board of railway commissioners, that is not wholly administrative; but here is an administrative arm of government under the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice is going to be the responsible minister who reports to this house, and under him, instead of there being as heretofore one man who looks after matters, controls and directs, there will be three. They meet together and discuss; two think one thing and one thinks another, and you have all the resultant inefficiency that comes from three administrative heads with respect to a matter for which the Minister of Justice is carrying the responsibility.

Then follows that other recommendation which is involved in this, the question of the parole system, which it is proposed shall be administered by these three commissioners. In the first place the Minister of Justice will agree with me that there is at the threshold of the discussion the question of the prerogative. The prerogative is that of the sovereign, and until recent years the instructions that issued to His Excellency the Governor General carried with them the right on his part to exercise the high prerogative of mercy. Originally he did it without reference to his advisers; he had himself to administer that prerogative. Now the instructions of the governor general provide that the prerogative of mercy is exercised on the advice of the government. The Minister of Justice reports to council, and council adopts his recommendation, or otherwise, as the case may be. That is to be swept out. The prerogative of mercy is no longer the prerogative right of the sovereign; it is to be handled by a parole board.

I am not for a moment saying that there may not be merit in that contention, but I am saying that I have not had any opportunity to study it. I have not had the opportunity, which it is so essential that one should have, of studying the matter in order to be able to discuss it intelligently. What is more, I want to see the evidence.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I can assure my right hon. friend that nothing in this bill will change anything in the parole system.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the minister assures me that this recommendation is not to be put into effect?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There are a good many of these recommendations that will have to be weighed and considered.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the one that should be most carefully weighed is the one we are now considering. That disposes of the parole question; for the minister has said that it is not proposed in this measure to adopt the recommendation which gives to the commission the powers of a parole board. We can therefore leave that.

There are a number of other subsidiary questions; but I implore the minister, more than I ever have with respect to any matter I can remember considering in this house, not to permit us to put ourselves on record, in the closing days of the session—we expect to close in the next three or four days at least—as changing the whole system of the administration of the penitentiaries of this country.

Dismissals are involved. It was a great mistake that one member of the commission should have accepted appointment; for he was the one who appeared as counsel when Inspector Dawson was charged before Judge Daly. He has now slated Dawson and held him up as the embodiment of, shall I say inefficiency. Now he signs that report.

I entreat the minister to think of a man who values highly his reputation, a man who has not communicated with me either directly or indirectly, a man whom I scarcely know, who is opposed to me politically, whose family all his life has been actively associated with the Liberal party, a man who faced death in many forms in the slime and dirt of France and Flanders, who came back and sought honourable employment under the crown, and who was given a position, and believed, as I did, that the Civil Service Act enacted by the parliament of Canada contained the terms and conditions of his employment. Now a body not responsible to us has treated him in a manner, I make bold to say, wholly unwarranted by any evidence that could be properly adduced before a judicial tribunal. I know, from the investigations and inquiries which I set on foot and, from reading some of that evidence, that it would not stand for a moment before a judicial body. It is the evidence of men who have been placed away from society as menaces to society, men who, to use the language of my old preceptor in law, had to be removed from society because they were like mad dogs running wild. These men, not one or two but a long line of them, tell their stories about Ormond, who at last is brought in and made subject to cross-examination by these three commissioners. On the strength of that I am asked to give my assent to a bill which removes him from office and replaces him with a commission. Does any such commission exist in England, Australia, or New Zealand? It may in some American states, but never in British countries as far as I have been able to discover in the limited time I have had at my disposal. The time for consideration is not sufficient; therefore I speak entirely subject to correction.

I have been endeavouring to look into this whole question. I visited prisons in Australia; I visited Borstal institutes in New Zealand, and I have made some study of prison conditions in Great Britain. I visited a penitentiary in Canada, which is more than some can say. I went through the institution at Kingston; I saw the cells. When I read of men daring to sign a report six years after the events in question, and expect me to accept it, placing odium and discredit and disgrace upon men who value their reputations as highly as they, and compare that report with that of men who based their findings upon their knowledge of conditions as they existed at the moment, not six years after, to me it almost seems that we are not in a British country at all. I read the other day a magazine article in connection with what had taken place in Russia and how men are induced to plead guilty there. The story was told at some length by one who had been a prosecutor in Russia. Then I thought of this report, of the long row of convicts marching in, giving evidence against Ormond—

Miss MACPHAIL: Are they in this direction? My right hon. friend always looks this way for the convicts.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry if the hon. member's conscience bothers her. There they are, a long line of them coming into a room. How long had they been at Kingston? What took place there? Have hon. members heard? Has the minister heard? Has he investigated? Does he realize what took place? Who were there? There is the long line; they march in just as they did in Russia; they tell their story and march out. Where was Ormond? He was doing his job here in his office. And that is Canada! That is British justice! That is the sort of thing I am asked in the closing days of a session to agree to.

I entreat the minister to let this matter stand until another session, in order that we may make ourselves familiar with this report, understand it in detail. I was going to ask him if he would lay on the table the evidence upon which this commission acted—I know he will—to enable us to see to what extent the findings are warranted. Some of them the minister says he does not propose to act upon. Of course he does not; why should he? Would any reputable minister act upon some of them? All I can do is entreat that in the exercise of his great power at this moment he will see to it that an opportunity is given to every hon. member of the House of Commons and the Senate of Canada to consider not only the report in detail but the implications of it, the evidence upon which it is founded, and to determine for himself and herself whether or not there is justification for such a radical change in the whole administration of our penal institutions as this bill involves.

I said I visited the penitentiary at Kingston. I have seen others, but I visited the Kingston penitentiary without notice. I saw the kind of food they were serving. I went right in; the warden was not even there; I went through the institution, saw the cells, saw these so-called places of punishment, saw the paddles that they used in connection with punishment, and I say that without question, the penitentiaries of this country, which were administered for nearly nine years, from 1921 to 1930, by the present Minister of Justice—I forget whether he was Minister of Justice all that time—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): From 1923 to 1930.

Mr. BENNETT: —and administered by another from 1930 to 1935, and then by the present minister from 1935 to 1938, are administered as well, if not better than, any other penitentiaries in the British Empire. They do not in any sense warrant what has been said against them in that report.

Finally I say this. How many members of this committee, on both sides of the house, have had an opportunity to study the report of the commission? I know some who have read until late at night; but they have had committees in the morning, the house in the afternoon and again until eleven o'clock in the evening, correspondence on Saturdays and so on. How many have read that report? How many have given it that consideration upon which they could find a fellow citizen guilty; for that is what it amounts to? We are asked to record a verdict of guilty against these men, and not only to record it but to make it effective. That is why I venture to ask the right hon. Minister of Justice, in the exercise of his great power and authority in the position which he occupies, to remember that within the next few months a commission could not effect any great changes; that the penal system of this country, which has been administered as well as that of any other country in the world during the last several years, is not going to suffer by being administered in the same way for the next few months, and that between now and the time parliament meets again the fullest opportunity will be afforded to enable us to consider not only the radical changes involved but everything concerning the effective, efficient and useful administration—and I use the word "useful" as affecting the nation as a whole—of the penal system of Canada.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Miss MACPHAIL: I have often said to many people that I think the right hon. leader of the opposition is the best informed man in the House of Commons on the greatest variety of subjects—I even went so far as to say on all subjects—but now I am afraid I must make one exception, and that is in regard to the penitentiaries of Canada. I am sure anyone who has made anything like a detailed study of the penitentiaries in different countries would not say that Canada has had as fine an administrative system as any other country in the world. That is going a very long way from the truth.

I do not want to make a lengthy speech at this time, but I do want to say that the one commissioner to whom the right hon. gentleman referred as having appeared before the Daly inquiry presumably would be Mr. McRuer, who was counsel at that inquiry. May I say that Mr. McRuer's services at that time were made available as a result of his interest in the subject. He never received a cent from anyone for what he did then. The penitentiary files that Mr. McRuer and I went over together at that time—and the right hon. leader of the opposition might be interested to know that they contain a detailed account about myself; for with his pointing to the convicts in this direction—

Mr. BENNETT: No; I was pointing to the door.

Miss MACPHAIL: If they have not my finger-prints and photograph, at least they have a detailed story about me in the penitentiary files of this country, together with all the editorials against me but none in favour of me. It was the things which Mr. McRuer and I saw in those files, and the things we heard before that Daly commission, that convinced him that there was something very wrong with our whole system; that it was filled with intrigue and vindictiveness, and that something ought to be done about it. Since he is not here to speak for himself, as he could so well, I want to make this statement. Mr. McRuer, as the right hon. leader of the opposition knows, is a great counsel. He need not have accepted appointment as a member of the commission to which he was later appointed, and certainly he did not undertake that work with any thought of gain for himself. He took it because he was convinced, through the Daly inquiry, of the need for a thorough and wholesale house-cleaning.

I do not want to talk about General Ormond; but anyone who read the rules and regulations, and the interpretations of those rules and regulations, issued by General Ormond himself, would know, without having been in a penitentiary at all, if he was a sensible human being—as I am sure all members of parliament are—before this commission was ever appointed that this man was not a person who should be in charge of the penitentiaries of Canada. Many a time he boasted to minor officials that there were four or five interpretations of one rule or regulation. That alone would condemn him in the mind of any right thinking person. The prisoner was always wrong; he could not possibly be right, because if he appeared likely to succeed under one interpretation they could give another interpretation of the same rule, under which the prisoner would be condemned.

It is true that the commission has taken two years to do its work, which is a long time. It was slow in getting started. Calamity befell one or two people appointed to it at first. It did take a long time to get started, and it did take a long time to make this study, but I do not think anyone who has read even a part of the report could fail to agree that it made a careful study. The commission did investigate the Borstal system in England. General Ormond came back and told us he had inaugurated a Borstal system in Canada. Anyone even moderately well informed on penitentiaries knew then that he had not done any such thing. It is a pity that any one person has to be condemned when he is not here to defend himself, but I am not particularly concerned about any one person in this affair. What is going to happen if we do as the right hon. leader of the opposition wishes, and take no action? We shall not only leave in office a superintendent who has been condemned, but also leave senior officers here and there who have been condemned as well. We shall then have a penal system under which the prisoners will have no confidence in their superiors or in the system itself. If we go home without doing anything, I think I know enough about penitentiaries to say that we may have a great deal of disquiet and a repetition of the riots and near riots which have occurred so often during the regime of General Ormond. We cannot leave the report as it is. Something must be done in one way or another.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

CENTRAL FINANCE CORPORATION

The house in committee on Bill No. 8, respecting Central Finance Corporation and to change its name to Household Finance Corporation of Canada—Mr. Macdonald (Brantford City)—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

On section 1—Change of name.

Mr. THORSON: Mr. Chairman, the subject of this bill, and its bedfellow, Bill No. 7, was remitted to the committee on banking and commerce for study. This matter was studied during this session by that committee, as it was studied last session. After hearing witnesses and giving consideration to the reference to it, the committee presented a report to the house. That report was far from being unanimous; indeed there was sharp controversy in the committee with regard to the principles involved in the report. While the votes will show that the report of the committee was carried with only a small quorum present, there are some interesting facts to be disclosed from a study of the votes taken in the committee. I think it will be found that if all those who were opposed to the principles of the report had been in committee at the same time, the vote might have been reversed. There was a sharp division of opinion with regard to the whole subject.

The report of the committee on banking and commerce respecting small loan companies carried with it a draft bill which is described as "An Act respecting Interest on Small Loans." This bill consists of a preamble, a number of definitions and two parts. Part II is said to apply to small loan companies incorporated by special acts of the parliament of Canada. In other words, this part is applicable only to those incorporations that are dominion in character. Part I is applicable to all money-lenders, as defined in the bill. Some important provisions are contained in section 2, which has to do with definitions, and also in section 3. I should like to direct attention to the definition of "cost," which is as follows:

fixed and determined by the loan contract itself or in whole or in part by any other collateral contract or document by which the charges if any, imposed under the loan, contract or the terms of the repayment of the loan are effectively varied.

Therefore, "cost" is said to include two things which, in my opinion, ought to be differentiated. "Cost" is said to include, first, interest or discount and, second, the expenses and charges for commissions, brokerage, chattel mortgage and recording fees and the like. Roughly speaking, we can break up the definition of "cost" into two divisions, that portion which is purely interest and that portion which is not interest. For the purposes of this discussion we can describe that portion which is not interest as charges.

I am opposed to the principle of this bill for a number of reasons. Section 13 of the draft bill provides:

The Money-Lenders Act, chapter 135 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, is repealed.

My reasons for opposing the principles involved in the draft bill and in the bill now before the committee are these. The draft bill and the bill before the committee fix an interest rate of two per cent per month. It may be said that my statement in that respect is not correct, in that it is the cost of the loan that is fixed at two per cent per month. But I would point this out to hon. members of the committee. It would be open to money-lenders under this legislation to fix a rate of two per cent per month and call it all interest, and in that way this draft bill and the bill now before the committee authorize an interest rate of two per cent per month, which works out at the rate of approximately 26½ per cent per annum. Now let us see the situation in which this parliament would be placed if we passed this bill or the draft bill recommended by the committee. At the present time we have,—I think I am correct in stating,—three general statutes that deal with the subject of interest. We have the Interest Act, which does not specify any rate of interest. It provides in its essence that in a written document the rate of interest shall be stated, and that if the rate of interest is not stated then the maximum which may be collected in interest shall be the legal rate of 5 per cent per annum. The second statute that we have dealing with interest and the interest rate is the Bank Act, in which a maximum of 7 per cent per annum is provided for. Then we have a third statute, the Money-Lenders Act, which provides for a maximum rate of interest of 12 per cent per annum for an extremely limited class of transactions.

[Mr. Thorson.]

The general bill and the private bill that is now before the committee propose that this maximum rate of 12 per cent per annum shall be increased to a maximum rate of two per cent per month, or an annual maximum rate of 26½ per cent. Now, Mr. Chairman, when we are seeking in every possible manner to bring down the rate of interest—when we are seeking that by refunding our national debt as widely as we can at a lower rate of interest; when we are making provision for loans to municipalities under certain circumstances at a very low rate of interest; when we are making provision for assisting in the construction of houses at a very low rate of interest—there are many of us who feel that it would be psychologically wrong on the part of this parliament to raise the maximum rate that we have now of 12 per cent per annum to 26½ per cent per annum.

It may well be argued that it is desirable to exercise certain controls over these money-lending companies, and, of course, it is desirable that we should exercise some control over them. With that object in view I suggested an amendment when the motion to adopt the preamble of the report was made. My amendment was as follows:

That that portion of the "cost" of a loan, as defined in section (2) paragraph (a) of the draft bill, which is interest, be fixed at a rate not exceeding 12 per centum per annum and that the right of any provincial legislature to reduce the remainder of the cost be preserved.

I proposed that amendment to the motion to adopt the preamble of the report for the following reasons. I thought it desirable that we should not exceed the maximum rate of interest that is now provided by the Money-Lenders Act. I thought it desirable also that we should seek to impose a limit on the total cost of a loan, but that we should leave the provinces free to deal with that portion of the cost of the loan which is not interest, in such a way as to reduce that portion of the cost. In other words, the suggestion which I made to the committee, and which a number of other members made, was this. We likened the proposed bill to a dwelling consisting of two storeys. The first storey was the interest storey of the dwelling. The second storey would be the charges storey of the dwelling. In other words, we proposed to erect a ceiling beyond which the loan companies would not be permitted to go in charging for the cost of the loan; but it was my view that we should not as a dominion parliament occupy the whole of the second storey, but that provincial jurisdiction to bring down the ceiling should be maintained

That landed us in a very long and somewhat involved argument as to the jurisdiction of this parliament to deal with the whole matter.

We had the opinion of a representative of the Department of Justice, Mr. Varcoe; we had also before us throughout the whole of our deliberations Mr. Finlayson, superintendent of insurance. While I am on the subject, I am sure I state the views of every member of the committee on banking and commerce when I say that we were greatly indebted to these two officers for the assistance they gave to us. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, I think we are exceedingly fortunate in this country in having the type of public servant that we have. I do not think we sufficiently recognize their value and their devotion to their various departments and their duties. Mr. Varcoe, representing the Department of Justice, took the position that it was quite within the jurisdiction of the dominion parliament to pass the draft bill which we were then considering. He pointed out that the dominion had exclusive jurisdiction to deal with the subject of interest, and that our jurisdiction in respect of that matter could not be challenged. He also expressed the view that we had jurisdiction to pass this measure on the ground that the dominion had exclusive jurisdiction over the subject of criminal law; that the prohibition or suppression of usury was within the ambit of criminal law, and that our jurisdiction in respect of the matter from the point of view of enacting sound, valid criminal law was unquestionable. He also suggested that we had jurisdiction to deal with this subject on the ground that under section 91 of the British North America Act the dominion parliament has jurisdiction over trade and commerce. There was some controversy as to whether this was a sound ground on which to defend the dominion jurisdiction with respect to the matter.

So far there was not much dispute in the committee on the field of jurisdiction. But when we began to consider the definition section which I read at the opening of my remarks, namely the definition of cost, as it appears in the draft bill, there was great controversy. Representatives of a number of the provinces took the view that the dominion had no jurisdiction to deal with that portion of the cost of a loan which is not interest; that the dominion should confine itself to dealing with interest, and that the provinces should deal with that other portion of the cost of a loan which is not interest. On this subject Mr. Varcoe took the view, and a great many of us agreed with him, that the dominion did have jurisdiction to deal with the subject of costs and charges where they are ancillary or necessarily incidental to the subject of interest, in considering what the total cost of a loan should be. I agreed that we did have jurisdiction, and I pointed out that in a number of cases the dominion parliament has jurisdiction to invade what would otherwise be the provincial field of jurisdiction, when that invasion is in respect of matters that are ancillary or necessarily incidental to some subject which clearly comes within dominion jurisdiction. The purpose of my amendment, however, was that we should not exercise this jurisdiction to invade the provincial field; that we should be careful about invasions of the provincial field of jurisdiction. The attorney general of Ontario took exception to our intended invasion. Representatives from the province of Quebec took a similar objection; and the proposed measure was offensive to a number of other provinces. It was with that in mind that I proposed the amendment which I have just set forth.

We had a twofold objection to the measure. In the first place many of us felt that this parliament should not stamp its approval of an interest rate of 26½ per cent per annum on this bill. We felt that this was wrong, that it was contrary to the whole trend of legislation. Then we felt that we ought not to invade in an arbitrary manner the provincial field of jurisdiction. We therefore devised the amendment which I read a few moments ago, that we should not go any further in respect of our jurisdiction over interest, purely as such, than we have gone already in the Money-Lenders Act, and that consequently we should fix that portion of the cost of a loan which is purely interest at a maximum of 12 per cent per annum. We also felt that it was desirable to limit the total cost of the loan, which we did in this bill by fixing the total cost at two per cent per month. But we felt that we ought not to invade the provincial field of jurisdiction exclusively in such a way as to bar the provinces from legislating on the subject of charges. If the amendment which I suggested had carried, we would have accomplished these two purposes. We would have fixed a limit to the total cost of the loan to the borrower, but we would not have given the stamp of approval to an interest rate of 26½ per cent.

Objection was taken to the amendment on the ground that it was not within the jurisdiction of this parliament, but I must confess that I could not understand the grounds of this objection. Unquestionably this parliament has jurisdiction to deal with the subject of interest. There is no dispute on that question. If we have jurisdiction to deal with other subjects connected with the cost of a loan, such as recording fees, investigation charges and the like, then our jurisdiction to deal with such matters is only on the ground that these matters are ancillary or incidental to the subject of interest. If we have that jurisdiction, then I can see no reason why we should not exercise our jurisdiction with regard to the subject matter of interest and leave the maximum interest rate exactly where it is now in the Money-Lenders Act. Under our jurisdiction over charges as being ancillary or necessarily incidental to interest we could fix a limit to the total cost of a loan. But in exercising our jurisdiction in that respect we need not do so to the exclusion of the provinces. We could leave the provinces perfectly free to deal in any way with the subject of charges on those loans, other than interest, so that the total of the charges could be brought down below the maximum rate of two per cent per month. That would have brought about the object which I think everyone is desirous of accomplishing, without giving our seal of approval to a maximum interest rate of 26½ per cent per annum.

My point is this, that if we have jurisdiction to deal with the subject of charges at all, as being part of the cost of a loan, we have jurisdiction to deal with the subject matter of charges; and we can deal with the subject matter of charges in any way we like. We do not have to deal with the subject matter of charges along with interest, but we may deal with interest separately and with charges separately.

The provinces of Ontario and Quebec raised objection to our proposed action. Why should we arbitrarily assert a jurisdiction in respect of these matters when these two great provinces object to our exercising that jurisdiction? Furthermore, in the province of Manitoba we have an act providing for the regulation under certain circumstances of money-lending transactions. If the proposed general bill were passed or if this private bill were passed, then it would not be competent for our courts in Manitoba for example to enforce the provincial act, because the dominion would have exercised its jurisdiction to invade what would otherwise be the provincial field of jurisdiction, and its legislation in the matter would override the provincial legislation. That was the controversy which took place in the committee on the question of jurisdiction.

As I pointed out a moment ago, the proposed draft bill is in two parts. Part I might be declared ultra vires by the courts on the ground that the dominion does not possess the jurisdiction which a number of us thought it did. It is possible that the representative of the Department of Justice and the other lawyers who argued in support of the dominion jurisdiction are wrong and that the court would declare that part I of the proposed general bill was ultra vires. For that reason part II would have to be considered. Part II, it is true, applies only to dominion companies. Whatever doubt there may be as to the validity of part I and the jurisdiction of parliament to pass part I, there can be no doubt whatsoever as to the jurisdiction of this parliament to pass part II, because this parliament has complete power to incorporate companies with objects that are not provincial. The power of incorporation is dealt with in the British North America Act in section 92. There the provincial power of incorporation is described, and my recollection of that provincial power is to this effect, that the province may incorporate companies for purposes that are provincial. It therefore follows, as a natural consequence, that the power to incorporate companies for purposes which are not provincial must, of necessity, reside with the dominion parliament. Therefore it is quite within our jurisdiction to impose any restrictions we like upon dominion companies. We can vest them with any power we see fit to give them, and can subject them to any limitations that we consider desirable; and if any criticism could be made of the amendment which I proposed in committee in respect of part I of the bill, no similar criticism can be made with respect to part II.

I moved also with regard to part II of the bill that this part, dealing exclusively, it is true, with dominion companies, should be subject to the same principle that I enunciated with regard to the bill generally, namely, that that portion of the cost of the loan which is interest should be fixed at the maximum limit of 12 per cent per annum, the maximum now fixed by the Money-Lenders' Act, and that in respect of that portion of the cost of a loan which is not interest should be dealt with in such a manner as to impose a limit upon the total cost of a loan, but that we should leave the provinces free to reduce that portion of the cost.

I suggest that the principle enunciated in the amendment that I proposed would serve all the purposes which are desired. The amendment, if adopted, would provide for that regulation which the majority of the members of the committee thought was desirable. It would not sanction an interest rate higher than 12 per cent per annum, the maximum interest rate now permitted by the Money-Lenders' Act. In the third place it would not bar the province from the right of reducing that portion of the cost of the loan which is other than interest. What right have we to say to any province; "Since we have invaded your field of jurisdiction you may not now deal with any portion of the cost of the loan? It is true that before we passed this measure you had jurisdiction to deal with that portion which is other than interest, but we have now, by invading your field of jurisdiction, taken away from you the right to deal with charges."

Mr. DUFFUS: What does the 12 per cent cover?

Mr. THORSON: The Money-Lenders Act at present fixes a maximum rate of 12 per cent per annum for those engaged in the business of money-lending.

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must tell him his time has expired.

Mr. MALLETTE: I move that this committee now rise and report progress.

Mr. VIEN: No. I am sorry to say—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The motion is not debatable.

Mr. VIEN: I think my hon. friend will correct his motion, simply to report progress, but not that the committee rise.

Mr. MALLETTE: I have no objection to that change.

Progress reported.

LORD'S DAY ACT AMENDMENT

CONSIDERATION OF SENATE AMENDMENTS

On the order:

Consideration of a message from the senate insisting upon its amendment to Bill No. 13, to amend the Lord's Day Act.—Mr. Brunelle.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): The bill relating to the Lord's Day Act, which passed this house a short time ago, was not recognizable upon its return from its journey to the senate; in fact there is nothing left of its original form or appearance except the number. It still bears number 13. I am not superstitious, but I am afraid my bill has been in bad company. I always thought an amendment meant the adding to or taking away from an original proposition of some sort. The senate has not amended my bill; it has simply substituted its own bill. To qualify properly the amendment of the senate, I wish to use the words of Senator Murdock:

> —I regard the amendment as merely a wooden gun with which to do some hunting. I think it is absolutely useless for the purpose of accomplishing what all honourable members of the committee desire, that is, to prevent unnecessary work on Sunday, which has prevailed in certain parts of the country.

I do not wish to be a party to such legislation. I refuse the amendment of the senate. It will serve no useful purpose. After all, if corporations, through their directors, violate the law, they should be punished; if they do not, I wonder why the senate is worrying so much about the possibility of gaol sentences.

Before resuming my seat I think it is my duty to thank this house for the support it gave my bill amending the Lord's Day Act.

PENITENTIARIES

INCORPORATION OF COMMISSION FOR ADMINISTRATION CONTROL AND MANAGEMENT—AMENDMENT OF EXISTING ACTS

The house resumed consideration in committee of the following resolution—Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East)—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to incorporate a commission with power under the Minister of Justice to administer, control and manage the penitentiaries; to provide for salaries of the commissioners and assistant commissioners and to amend and consolidate the Penitentiaries Act and amending acts and repeal the same.

Miss MACPHAIL: When the committee rose at six o'clock, Mr. Chairman, I was pointing out the necessity for the bill which the Minister of Justice proposes to introduce, providing for the appointment at a very early date of a governing commission for the penitentiaries, to consist, I believe, of three members. I was saying that it would be inviting trouble if we did not take action on the report of the royal commission. Even our fellow human beings in the penitentiaries know something of what is going on, and I think they would take such a step to mean that the report was not to be taken seriously. I am sure the government does intend to take it seriously, so I am most anxious that the minister should be allowed to proceed at once to introduce the bill.

The speaker who preceded me spoke of the need of having only one person rather than a commission in charge of prisons. The royal commission to investigate the penal system of Canada dealt with that very point at page 342 of their report, where they said:

In our present system the problem of penal administration is too large in scope and too serious in results to be left in the hands of one man. It is noteworthy, as a matter of record, that Canada is practically the only country where the penal system is not administered by some kind of commission or board.

So, when we appoint a commission of three to take care of our penitentiaries, we are following what has been done in other countries rather than breaking new ground. The important thing, of course, is the personnel of the commission. I feel quite sure that the Minister of Justice, who was instrumental in having the royal commission appointed, will take very great care in choosing the personnel of the governing commission. They should have a vision of what can be done.

[Mr. Mallette.]

I want to say here that I do not think all the prisoners in our penal institutions can be made good citizens. I was delighted to see it stated in the report, which we shall have an opportunity to read more leisurely later on, that the commissioners realize that there are in our prisons incorrigible and intractable men whom it will never be safe to let out into society. They suggest that such men should never be allowed to mingle with their fellows. However, there are in our penitentiaries large numbers of prisoners who can be made responsible and respectable citizens. The commissioners to be appointed should be men of vision. They should be men who have a respect for human nature, even though it has gone astray. They should be men of character, and they should possess the training and culture necessary for such a job. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) is in the enviable position of being able to place in the hands of this commission the best text-book on penal matters, the report of the royal commission, that we have ever had in Canada. The report does not suggest that all the changes should be made hurriedly. In one place it states that the commissioners believe it will take at least five years to make all the suggested changes in the personnel of the penitentiaries which they consider are essential; and as a start, I do not think we can stress too much the importance of the personnel of the commission to be appointed.

Canadian penitentiaries are in great need of reform. In the report figures are quoted which must be familiar to all members of the house. It is stated that in the last eleven years there have been twenty disturbances in Canadian penal institutions, sixteen of these disturbances having taken place during the regime of the present superintendent, General Ormond. The report contains some interesting information in connection with recidivism. In 1935 there were per 100,000 of population, sixty recidivists having three or more convictions, and twenty-nine having two convictions. That rate is much higher than it has been in former years.

In the first pages of their report the commissioners point out that there are three great principles to be considered in penology. First, there is the prevention of crime through proper youth training and the providing of opportunities for youth. Second, there is the treatment of prisoners so that they will be fit to return to society. If it is found that they are not fit to be returned to society, then they should be kept in a special prison by themselves. Third, there is the rehabili-tion of the released prisoner. I do not want to take up too much time at this late period in the session, and there is no necessity to go into the many recommendations made by the commission. Some of these are extremely important. They believe in the Borstal system for the young offender. They believe in the classification of prisoners. They believe in the training of the officers who are to handle prisoners. They suggest that a training school should be set up and only officers who pass through that school should be put in charge of prisoners.

The royal commission was headed by Mr. Justice Joseph Archambault, the other members being Mr. R. W. Craig, K.C., at one time attorney general of Manitoba, and Mr. J. C. McRuer, K.C., of Toronto. That commission did a splendid work. I think Mr. Justice Joseph Archambault should be congratulated by every Canadian citizen upon the excellent work he did. He carried on his duties under a disadvantage. He suffered two serious injuries just before he commenced his work, and although his health was not too good during the time of the sittings of the commission, he performed his work in a most splendid way. I do not think anyone could appear before that commission without realizing the earnestness of Mr. Justice Joseph Archambault and the other two commissioners, They were not out gunning for anybody; they were out to find out all they could about the penitentiaries of Canada. Everyone had a chance to appear before them. The commission visited 113 institutions in nine countries and spent 108 days in seven Canadian penitentiaries taking the evidence of 1,084 inmates and 200 officers. Letters, briefs and manuscripts were received from 1,200 citizens, and in addition private and public hearings were held throughout Canada. Anyone who wanted to say anything about the penitentiaries of Canada had ample opportunity to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: Whether they knew anything about them or not.

Miss MACPHAIL: The right hon. leader of the opposition prides himself upon having seen a great deal when he went through the penitentiary at Kingston. He mentioned the food, but let me tell him that the grapevine system in our penitentiaries is so excellent that he would not be in Kingston two minutes before the kitchen would know it. I daresay the food they had that day was much better than anything they had had since the previous Christmas.

Mr. BARBER: The inmates are probably better looked after than are the boys who are roaming our streets to-day.

Miss MACPHAIL: I think that is true. I believe the inmates of our prisons are better looked after than those who have no employment or who are on relief. That is a splendid way to create crime. Some of these people have had to resort to crime in order to get food and shelter. I do not intend to say any more except to stress my appreciation of the action of the government and the attitude of the Minister of Justice. The minister does not take any criticism of the penal system to be a personal affront. He takes it for what it is, a criticism of the system, and sets out to remedy an institution which he believes is outmoded, which stresses the punitive rather than the reformative side. The government are to be congratulated upon the appointment of such a splendid commission and in having this report ready at least by the end of the session. They are about to introduce a bill to provide for a prison board of three. I do not expect that all the recommendations made in this report will be put into effect immediately—it may be that some of them will never be put into effect—but I think it provides a blueprint which the commission of three to be appointed can follow in building up a system which, I am sure, will be much better than the one we have.

Mr. MITCHELL: Mr. Chairman, I do not claim to know very much about penitentiaries because I have never been a prisoner and have never made a special study of penology. However, as a member of this house and as a citizen of Canada I recognize the difficulty of the task that confronts the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the government. I realize the extent of the work accomplished by this commission. They had to decide either to whitewash one of our institutions or else be as thorough as it was possible to be and let the chips fall where they may. I think the commission should be congratulated upon their thoroughness. The fact that they spent 108 days in Canadian penal institutions is an indication of the manner in which they went at their task. The editorials in one newspaper published in this city have been quite critical of the report, and other newspapers, although not very many, have adopted the same attitude, so I was not surprised to hear the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) say what he did this afternoon.

When I heard the leader of the opposition speak this afternoon of the prisons, the cells and the food, the paddles and so on, it made me think of the emphasis that we place on that man-made institution which we call the law. It is an inanimate creature; but we emphasize it and miss the most important essential, the human values involved. I understand that the commission not only saw the prisons, the food and the cells, but that they spent time with the prisoners and saw discipline being administered to them. They recognized the human values that are involved in penology in this country as in any other.

We are too prone to emphasize the fact that these men are outcasts from society. That may be very true; but I happen to have in this country a very dear friend—and this is why I wanted to speak to-night very briefly —who through a mistake he made earlier in his life received a sentence of three years in one of our penitentiaries. He is now a respectable citizen and holds an excellent position, and from him I have learned a good deal of the truth of the material that is contained in the report of the Archambault commission. I wish to commend the idea of appointing a commission of three men to replace the present superintendency of the penitentiaries by one man. The responsibility is too great for any one man. Even a three-man commission may not be adequate to solve the root problems of human relationships that are there, but its appointment is a step in the direction which must be taken of removing the whole responsibility from one man. Suppose we conducted our penitentiaries from this angle: Is every lawbreaker in this country in gaol, or are the inmates criminals just because they happened to be caught? I sometimes think of reasons for gratitude that circumstances have been just a little different in my case from what they have been with some men that I know. It is very easy for any of us here to think of criminals as outcasts, that they have offended against society and so on, but we are not excused from giving them every care. I think the minister and the government and the commission are to be commended, and I congratulate the government upon the steps they are taking to implement the recommendations of the commission so far as they are able to implement them at this time.

Mr. BARBER: Mr. Chairman, I have one protest to lodge, not in regard to the report of the commission itself, but in regard to implementing the report in legislation at this stage of the session. It has been impossible for members of the house, attending its daily sittings and committee work, to give to the report, which was received only a few days ago, the consideration it deserves, and I think the minister would be well advised to accept the suggestion which the leader of the opposition made this afternoon and postpone this legislation until next session. During the recess we would have an opportunity of studying the report, and then when we come back here we would be in a position to deal with the matter as it should be dealt with.

I notice that the press throughout the country takes a similar view. The Kingston Whig-Standard, for example, says, in part:

We have no idea what the government at Ottawa is going to do with the Archambault report. We hope they give it very serious consideration before they start putting its suggestions into effect. Many of the recommendations are doubtless of value, but many others should be carefully investigated before they are adopted. We hope that the evidence of 1,840 convicts will not weigh too heavily with Right Hon. Mackenzie King. And again we doubt very much whether honest and conscientious prison officials should be dismissed without being given a chance to reply to charges made against them.

And from the Brantford Expositor:

There is one phase of the royal commission's report on penitentiaries that Canadians will follow with considerable interest, and that is the recommendation for more lenient discipline on the part of the authorities. There is no desire to see the inmates of these institutions treated harshly or vindictively, but if it is to be a case as to whether officials or the prisoners are going to run the penitentiaries there should be only one answer.

The class of men who fill the penitentiaries to a very great extent are sent there for grievous crimes against society, and many of them are hardened criminals who have been convicted many times. It is not to be supposed that these men are to be treated like guests at some palatial hotel. They should be given every opportunity to increase their education if they so desire and to become proficient in some of the technical crafts. They are entitled to kindly and humane treatment, together with facilities for recreation, but their term of imprisonment would be worthless if it did not impress upon them the absolute necessity of obedience to properly constituted authority. They go there as enemies of society and they should be taught that the rule of individual force cannot supplant the laws of the state . . .

In view of all that has happened the Hon. Ernest Lapointe, Minister of Justice, who is responsible for the administration of the penitentiaries throughout the dominion, will do well not to be too strongly influenced by the element that is at all times so clamorously urging the "coddling" of prisoners.

I do not intend to discuss the legislation, but I wish to urge upon the minister once more its importance. There is no doubt that he realizes it, and that those of us who represent people in all the different sections of Canada should at least have an opportunity to study the report further before being called upon to deal with it in legislation. What difference would postponing the legislation for a few months make? We have carried on with the present administration of the penitentiaries under the present Minister of Justice for three years and have heard no complaint, and therefore I think there would be no great hardship in continuing with the present administration for a few months longer until legislation can be brought down in proper shape at the next session of parliament.

Mr. GAUTHIER (Translation): I merely wish to ask a question of the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). Is it the government's intention to appoint a physician to the commission the institution of which is recommended in the royal commission's report? In my opinion, one of the members of this commission should be a physician specially versed in criminology.

I think the Minister will agree with me that penitentiary administration is not simply a question of economy and discipline, but that the mental condition of the inmates must also be considered. The appointment to this commission of a physician who would make a special study of the general health and mentality of the prisoners seems to me indispensable. Many crimes can be attributed to mental derangement. A physician versed in criminology could render useful service in penitentiary administration, not only as regards the physical health of the inmates but also their moral rehabilitation, so that at the expiration of their sentence they may return to normal life and contribute to the development of the country.

Mr. LACOMBE (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak at any great length. In view of the fact, however, that St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary is situated in my constituency, I deem it my duty to offer a few observations.

On April 15th, 1936, Lieut. Col. Piuze, a former warden of St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary, forwarded to the Superintendent of Penitentiaries at Ottawa a report on penitentiary administration, on the training of youthful prisoners and on the International Prison Congress. This report contains highly interesting suggestions and recommendations. May I refer hon. members to the ex-warden's findings on pages 22 and 23 and to his recommendations on pages 65, 66, 67, 68 and 69, which I shall quote, in order that they may appear in Hansard. On pages 22 and 23 of his report, Lieut. Col. Piuze states the following findings:

(Text) In the four countries I visited, I would have been anxious to take advantage of numerous offers I received to make a study of other institutions specially destined to the confinement and reformation of young delinquents. It would have afforded me the opportunity to substantially increase the knowledge I have gained and would have permitted me to submit a much more thorough report. Unfortunately the limited time at my disposal prevented me from so doing.

In my humble opinion the Borstal system with certain modifications is the most adaptable for this country. However, it would not be possible for the time being at least to introduce it outright in view of the territorial conditions and also in consideration of the lack of adequate accommodation.

For the present I think that the best solution would be to hasten the construction of Laval buildings at St. Vincent de Paul, Quebec, and of Collins Bay, at Kingston, Ontario, where young delinquents could be accommodated. Laval buildings could take care of the youths of the province of Quebec and of the maritimes; Collins Bay could accommodate those of Ontario and of the western provinces.

To obtain satisfactory results, it is of the utmost importance that the lads be entirely separated from older prisoners, and that there be no contact whatsoever with the latter. Until such a time as the two institutions already mentioned are ready for occupation, a certain segregation could be made in our penitentiaries, but only as a temporary measure. Even then, there will always be the "atmosphere" and possibility of contact with others.

It is my opinion that the only thing that could be done, until an appropriate accommodation is available, would be to assemble those young delinquents in separate cell blocks, giving them physical training, outdoor work, school work, and lectures. Later on when new quarters are ready, a more appropriate program of training could be devised.

I am not in favour of dormitories for young convicts, as they exist in the majority of Borstal institutions. Individual cubicles are much more recommendable.

I would not, either, recommend too many recreations, and a well balanced discipline should be maintained. I do not feel inclined to recommend, either, that young convicts be granted more privileges than are afforded honest average youths outside.

As previously stated, the principle of the English Borstal system is very good, but I could not recommend all that is being done in England. Besides, local conditions are not the same, and the class of young delinquents here is also quite different from the type of lads in England, where they have to deal with English boys only, whereas in Canada, we have to take care of a much more cosmopolitan population.

Also it would not be possible, for some time at least, to classify these lads the way it is done in England, and this, owing to our wide territories and the relatively small distribution by provinces. Most of the English system could be introduced in this country when proper accommodation is available, and this system could be arranged so as to meet with our requirements.

(Signed) P. A. Piuze, Warden.

(Translation) As to his recommendations, Mr. Chairman, they are to be found on pages 65, 66, 67, 68 and 69. They are as follows:

Conclusions

(Text) The study tour of the different penal institutions visited has been most instructive and interesting to me, and I am most grateful to the authorities for having afforded me the opportunity of acquiring such an experience.

Observations

The few observations I intend to make, as a result of this study tour, will mostly apply to penitentiaries or convict prisons, this subject being more familiar to me.

The problems that penal administrators in Europe are confronted with are substantially different from ours. They are benefiting by a much longer and wider experience; territorial conditions are quite different.

Miss MACPHAIL: From what document is the hon. member quoting?

Mr. LACOMBE: From the report of the former warden of St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary.

They are dealing with their own countrymen; and finally, the class of criminals is not at all the same.

In the old country, and specially in England, prisoners, generally speaking, are well classified, and there are separate institutions for each class of offenders. For instance, there are distinct institutions for the young and first offenders; for recidivists and hardened criminals. Also, in view of the proximity of the various institutions, transfers, when necessary, can easily be effected without incurring much expense.

Comparisons

Shops. In our Canadian penitentiaries, favourable comparison can be made with European institutions, with regard to industries and teaching of trades. Our different workshops are much more modernly equipped, and a convict who is willing to learn a trade has full opportunity to do it.

Library. Our school and library departments are well organized, and full facilities are given to convicts to gain an elementary instruction, if illiterates, and to improve their degree of instruction, if the latter has been restricted to the elements of reading and writing.

Discipline. Although working under more difficult conditions, our discipline is good and well observed.

Construction. New construction is done by convict labour, while in European countries, such construction is mostly done by public works departments.

Humanization. As far as humanization is concerned, we compare favourably with other countries.

Diet. The feeding of convicts in our penal institutions is much superior; as a matter of fact, we are perhaps doing too much in that respect. We lack uniformity in our different penitentiaries; in each country in Europe, a diet is established and applied to all institutions, without exception.

Privileges. In certain countries, privileges are very limited, and in this regard, it is considered that the English system is the most adequate. Prisoners are graded, and privileges may be enjoyed when stages have been reached. In other words, to receive privileges, prisoners must earn them by their good conduct, industry and dispositions. Having in view the procedure adopted and followed in European countries, it would appear that, in this country, privileges are allowed too soon after admission, and may not, therefore, be appreciated at their just value. It would seem more appropriate if authorized privileges were given when convicts have reached certain stages, and it is recommended that, during the probation at least—that is to say, during the first six months of incarceration—no privileges whatsoever, with the exception of library books, should be granted to convicts.

Classification. With our present system, young and first offenders, recidivists and hardened criminals all receive the same treatment, upon admission in our penitentiaries. It is of the utmost importance that classification of convicts be commenced as soon as possible, when proper accommodation is made available.

Recidivists. With our present penal system, recidivists and hardened criminals seem to scoff at our penitentiaries. Penitentiary life to them is such that, as soon as liberated, they resume their criminal activities. If they can manage to foil justice, well and good; but if caught again, they return with a feeling of relief, if one considers that, in one institution at least, approximately one-half of the population is made up of this class of criminals.

Cells. Our cellular system, with barrier doors, is most unsatisfactory, in many respects. It renders supervision very difficult, and ill-disposed convicts are at liberty to exercise their pernicious influence over others during talking periods.

Conversations. Conversations carried on in cells, during authorized hours, are far from being edifying. Their main subjects are immoralities, besides convicts boasting of their criminal exploits and criticizing the rules and regulations and the authorities. Well-disposed convicts must necessarily stand such conversations, which are permitted when the prison is closed, and when only a limited number of officers are on duty. At such times, proper control and supervision are well nigh impossible, and naturally, full advantage of the situation is taken by ill-intentioned convicts. One cannot imagine all the harm these badly-disposed convicts exercise over others who, in too many cases, leave the institution, on liberation, worse off morally than at the time they came in. In European institutions, conversations between convicts are tolerated during working periods only, it being the view that such conversations should not be more and need not be less than the conversations which take place amongst work people in properly managed workshops, that is to say, such remarks as the work required may cause, but there is no idle talking on general subjects.

Recommendations.

Classification. As far as St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary is concerned, classification of various classes of convicts could be started, as soon as the construction of Laval buildings is sufficiently advanced to allow occupancy. In this connection it is strongly recommended that the necessary buildings be constructed as soon as possible, subject to be completed. The question of adequate and additional accommodation for the exceptionally large population of this institution has been a long-felt need, and presently St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary is overcrowded, particularly the work shops, where twice as many convicts are put to work as should normally be employed in those departments.

The following scheme which might also be applicable to other institutions in this country is recommended:—

That St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary be used exclusively for recidivists and hardened criminals. The following shops could be reserved for this class of convicts; stonecutting, stonecrushing, machine and blacksmithing and other works in connection with the administration of the institution;

That Laval buildings be made two distinct prisons, divided by a central wall;

That one part of these buildings be reserved for first offenders who would be taught the following trades: tailoring, shoemaking, bookbinding, laundering, farming, electricity and motor mechanics;

That the other half of the buildings be used for young convicts between sixteen and twenty-one years of age, who would be physically trained, provided with outdoor work (gardening and construction) and education, (school attendance and lectures).

This classification, under one direction, would be something similar to what the writer has witnessed in Les Prisons de Fresnes, in France, and which, in his opinion, would meet the situation very well. Each of these establishments would be subjected to a distinct regime; in each, young and first offenders, recidivists and hardened criminals, would be graded according to their crime, sentence, antecedents, capacity and merits, and would be entitled to appropriate privileges.

This system would assure constructive reformation work, and would protect the young and first offenders from contact with, and the bad influence of, recidivists and hardened criminals.

Special treatment for recidivists and hardened criminals would no doubt result in a sensible reduction in our penitentiaries of this class of convicts. At present, their percentage is out of all normal proportions, when compared with similar types, in European countries.

Cells. In the old country, all penal institutions have the "closed door" cell system, with cells on each side and a wide corridor in the centre, lighted by means of skylights in roofs.

It is strongly recommended that all cell blocks at Laval buildings, and other similar new construction, be made on the "closed door" principle. It would not be possible, for the present at least, and in view of the expense it would incur, to remodel our existing cell blocks as suggested above; but to remedy the situation, it is recommended that all wings be closed by means of concrete walls, instead of barriers, and that the floors of each range be extended to the wall, thus segregating each wing, and even each range. This could be done at comparatively low cost.

Silence rule. It is recommended that silence rules be restored in cell blocks, and this, in the best interests of administration, discipline and security.

Punishment cells. Our system of prisons of isolation, (punishment cells) could be very much improved upon, and we could advantageously adopt the same system as used, for instance, in English prisons, which is far superior to ours, and in the writer's opinion, the only adequate one.

Agitators and badly disposed convicts. It is a well known fact that certain convicts, with very bad character and dispositions, and known as trouble makers, are the leaders in riots and disturbances, and also that, in the majority of cases, are responsible, directly or indirectly, for damages caused to government property.

It is suggested that such class of convicts, from all penitentiaries, be congregated in a separate institution, where they would be subjected to special discipline and treatment; if eliminated from other institutions, they would not have the opportunity to exercise their pernicious influence over other convicts.

Superior officers. Wardens and deputy wardens are entitled to twenty-one days annual leave, and in that respect, do not receive any more consideration than a prison guard, notwithstanding their numerous and heavy responsibilities and standing. It is pointed out that, in England for instance, governors and deputy governors are entitled to six weeks annual leave, while the other members of the staffs receive three weeks of such leave.

It has been noticed, in the various institutions visited, that a difference exists in uniforms for officers of higher grades, distinguishing superior officers from other ranks. A similar distinction, in the Canadian institutions, is recommended for consideration.

Officers' quarters. In countries visited, all permanent officers are given free quarters. If this privilege could be afforded our penitentiary officers, the service would certainly benefit by it, in that sense that all the members of the personnel would reside at proximity of the institution, thus assuring better security, and furthermore, this would be an additional inducement for officers to hold on to their positions, and no doubt would result in better service and more devotion to duty. With such additional consideration, officers would certainly better appreciate their positions.

Training schools. It is recommended that a training school be established for penitentiary officers, as it exists in European countries.

The service generally would certainly benefit greatly by such an innovation, and candidates, when called for duty, would have received both theoretical and practical training.

Such a school could be established in one of our penitentiaries, and its functioning would entail very little expense.

The above suggestions and recommendations are respectfully submitted, having in view the betterment of the service, and the reforms suggested are considered to be in the best interest of the administration and management of penal institutions, and the treatment of convicts as a whole.

That is signed by E. A. Piuze, the then warden.

(Translation) In conclusion, I wish to quote the 12th recommendation on page 355 of the report of the Royal Commission on the Penal System of Canada, thus:

> The pay of officers should be brought up to a reasonable standard, having regard to the type of service performed.

I also wish to take this opportunity to ask, not only that penitentiary guards and officers be paid a reasonable salary, but that they be paid fortnightly, as are other civil employees of Canada, instead of monthly.

The Minister of Justice will perhaps tell me that such a measure would require an army of accountants. Then, I would say to the minister: Open the doors wide particularly in my district, to the graduates of the School of Higher Commercial Studies. If seven or eight additional accountants are employed, that would be just another way to relieve unemployment. We have really sad cases in St. Vincent de Paul where fathers of twelve, or thirteen children must wait for their salary till the end of the month in order to pay their grocery and other bills. I ask the minister to grant this very humane request. On the other hand, in the public interest and in the interest of our penal institutions, I think that military discipline on Sundays should be abolished in all our penitentiaries.

Mr. Chairman, the royal commission has severely criticized the former warden of St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary for having instituted military discipline in the penitentiary in my constituency. That is the reason why I ask the Minister of Justice to abolish, not only in that penitentiary, but in all other such institutions of Canada, Sunday discipline which is absolutely unnecessary, may I add, because there is ample time, on week days, to give the inmates all the physical exercise they require.

Before I resume my seat, I want to say that the recommendations and findings of Lieut. Col. P. A. Piuze are generally in accord with those of the royal commission on the penal system of Canada, except as to the establishment of the Borstal system in this country. In fact, according to Lieut. Col. P. A. Piuze, that system cannot be fully applied in Canada. In view of his plausible arguments, I think his opinion should prevail.

As a matter of fact, Lieut. Col. Piuze has been warden of St. Vincent de Paul penitentiary for six years, and I wish to tell this house that he has adequately filled that position and that he possesses unequalled experience. Recognized authorities of this country have told me personally that he could not be easily replaced. I do not wish, Mr. Chairman, to make a case for Lieut Col. Piuze tonight. However, I am free to state to this house that Lieut. Col. Piuze, in his report, has submitted to the Canadian government recommendations and suggestions of a highly practical nature, which would be very easy to apply, and I have no comparison to make with the report of the royal commission on penitentiaries.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: At this very late date in the session, Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to discuss the question of penal reform or to go in any detail into the report upon which this resolution is founded, but I should like to endorse the general position taken by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) with regard to this question and to express my appreciation of the fact that although it is so late in the session the government apparently has considered it possible to bring forward legislation of this kind. The hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber) quoted an editorial opposed to action along this line. I hold in my hand a whole sheaf of editorials from the leading newspapers of this country, all of them favourable to action along the line proposed.

I should like to protest against the position taken by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), first of all in regard to his attitude toward the prisoners. He asserted that they were the victims of their own wrong-doing. That is only partly true. I think it may be said that the larger number were the victims of the neglect of society. I do not want to go into that question at any length, but I think it is conceded that a very large number of our criminals would have gone straight if they had had half a chance. I remember when I was only a youth reading Jean Valjean, that immortal work of Victor Hugo, which no doubt many other hon. members also read. You will remember the way in which that great French writer interested us in the criminal, and I have never gotten away from his presentation of a man who, according to the category of the right hon. leader of the opposition, I suppose would be classed as a mad dog running wild. I object to that way of viewing the criminal. There may be some criminals who are mad dogs running wild, who have to be dealt with more or less, as we might deal with a dangerous animal, but the majority are not of that class.

Then I think of some who, in spite of the bad treatment we have given them, have reformed. I think of one man in my own city of Winnipeg whose family I know very well. He robbed a post office when he was a boy, was imprisoned and later released. To-day he occupies one of the most important positions in that city, and I suppose only a few old-timers remember that he once served a penitentiary sentence. I feel indignant when I think of him being classed as a mad dog running wild.

I do not think the leader of the opposition was quite fair to the commission when he spoke of them as listening to the tittle-tattle of convicts. If they were to get information, why should they not listen to the men who were incarcerated in the penitentiaries, even though they were branded as convicts? I should think it probable they could get a great deal more information from listening to those who were enduring the abuses than by listening to the officials who may be seeking to paint as rosy a picture as possible. However, I shall not go into this phase of the question to-night.

I want to protest against any further delay in dealing with this matter. Some of the older members of the house will recall that four years ago, on June 30, we considered this question of penitentiaries. This matter had been put off and off until what was hoped would be the last day of the session. The hon. member for Grey-Bruce made a strong appeal to the then Minister of Justice, Mr. Guthrie, to take action. The minister replied that it was too late in the session; that the Governor General was then on his way to prorogue parliament, it being then within a few minutes of twelve o'clock on Saturday night. We could not sit on Sunday, and Monday was a holiday. I do not know whether I should boast of it, but on that occasion I said that the estimate under discussion would not pass. I succeeded in holding up the house, and hon. members had to remain here on Sunday and Monday and sit again on Tuesday, when we considered this matter of penitentiary reform. I should like to quote one paragraph of what I said at that time:

> I would point out that the prisoners are the most defenceless class in the community. They have been deprived of the ordinary rights of citizenship. They have no means of making their grievances known to this house. They have been deprived of the rights of normal ordinary human beings.
> But on the other hand I am coming to believe that we must discount to a considerable extent the official statements, the official denials, because it seems to have been the policy more or less to whitewash under-officials.
> Furthermore, we urge that the time has come when there should be general consideration of the whole question of prison administration and the treatment of criminals.

I then urged the setting up of a commission. That was on June 30, 1934. That commission was set up, and I regret as much as anyone that its report has been presented so late in the session. However, we are glad finally to get this report. It is four years since these evils were definitely brought to the attention of the house. It will be remembered that at that time riots had occurred in Kingston penitentiary, and there had been shooting into the cell of one of the prisoners. It was an outrageous situation. We have the report of this commission, and now the leader of the opposition tells us that we ought to postpone action until we have had time to study the report. I am sorry the right hon. gentleman is not in the chamber, but I am sure that he must have given a considerable amount of study to penitentiary reform. Even the man on the street knows that reforms such as proposed are long overdue.

I submit that parliament should not prorogue without passing the remedial legislation to be based upon this resolution. Without disparaging the Conservative convention which is to take place next week, may I say I am not so sure but that this matter which is so vital to the thousands of people in our penitentiaries is not of as great importance. In any case it ought to be dealt with at this session.

I shall not go into the question raised by the leader of the opposition as to whether this is the best manner of dealing with General Ormond. The authorities can deal with him as they please, but what we do need is legislation. The gentlemen who composed this commission spent a long time in the most painstaking investigation. They travelled across Canada, in the United States and abroad in order to study the situation from all angles. I think they were in a better position to make recommendations than even hon. members who may have casually read this report and who might possibly be inclined to consider it in some of its political aspects. I urge the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to let nothing stand in the way of bringing about these reforms without any further delay.

Mr. STIRLING: Mr. Chairman, I find myself just as displeased with the action of the government as my hon. friend is pleased. They have brought down this report very late in the session and have expected us to deal with it. It is almost two and a half years ago that the government appointed this royal commission to examine into this matter and report. Three months ago the report came into the hands of the minister, and fourteen days ago it was laid on the table of the house. Hon. members have had thirteen days in which to endeavour to inform themselves of the contents of the 400 pages comprising this report. After sitting here for five months I believe that the mind of the ordinary member is somewhat weary. He sits on committees; he sits in the house; he deals with his correspondence and carries on the other work of a member. I, for one, have not had time more than to glance cursorily through this most important report. I do not think it is reasonable to expect us to deal with this matter at this late stage of the session.

I cannot go into the principle of the bill, because the only vision we have had of it is what is contained in the resolution. It does not seem to me to be fair to a civil servant of Canada to accept the recommendation of a commission in this regard, as apparently the government has done. The commission state that they were dissatisfied with their examination of the superintendent, and they recommend his dismissal. This afternoon my right hon. leader (Mr. Bennett) pointed out how the superintendent was appointed. Many people may have thought that the superintendent was appointed on the recommendation of the previous administration and, that, therefore, there may have been some partisan politics mixed up with the appointment. However, I believe that belief will be dispelled when attention is drawn to the important positions held by the six members of the committee appointed by the civil service commission to choose the superintendent.

We have not had time to give due consideration to a report on so important a matter. To dismiss a civil servant in this cursory way is not good for the civil service, and consequently is not good for Canada. It matters not to me whether he be a civil servant in the higher or lower ranks of the civil service; the fact of the matter is that the investigation carried on by the commission has not been of such a nature as to warrant the recommendation made. It is noticeable, for instance, in the pages which deal briefly with the recommendations, that in this country, of course, every penal institution was visited, and at those institutions nine convicts were heard for every one official. The commission paid a visit to the United States and there examined the penal institutions and listened to the views expressed by the officials. The commission also visited the United Kingdom where they did likewise. But we are not aware that on their travels abroad the commissioners listened to any views of the convicts in those institutions. It appears to me from the cursory study that I have been able to make of this report that the commission has given an overweight of interest to the evidence of convicts in the Canadian penal institutions, and perhaps not sufficient weight to some of the other evidence.

I am not acquainted with the superintendent of penitentiaries. So far as I am aware, the only time I ever saw him was when he sat before the Minister of Justice in the late administration when he was dealing with the estimates of that department, but I know his record. I know that he was a district officer commanding in the west. I know that if he had not moved over to this civil service job, other rungs of the ladder in the service would have been open to him, but it is hardly likely that those rungs will still be open to the superintendent if he leaves the civil service with such a smirch on his name. I earnestly appeal to the minister that at this late stage of the session it might be well to wait just that number of months longer which would enable us to give further consideration to this weighty report.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Mr. Chairman, I do not minimize, the committee may be sure, the great importance of this resolution and the legislation which will follow it. As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) said, this question is one which has been before the country for many years. Rightly or wrongly there has been a feeling that all was not perhaps as well as it should be in the penal institutions of Canada, and I well remember well-meaning citizens imploring us to carry on an investigation. I was on the other side of the house at the time when that great social worker, my own fellow citizen and townsman, Archdeacon Scott, the padre, came to see me and besought me to plead with the then government for an investigation into the penitentiaries. A large body of public opinion was certainly aroused at the time, and when the campaign of 1935 took place the present leader of the government made a promise that there would be an investigation by royal commission into the administration of the penitentiaries.

We came into office in October, 1935, and the royal commission was appointed in February, 1936. The resolution before us is the result of the report of that commission. Whatever may be our opinion as to its findings and recommendations, I think everyone will agree that its report is a considerable and well-prepared work and that the commissioners have devoted their energies and abilities to doing the work as completely and even as perfectly as it could be done. This does not mean, of course, that we are to agree with everything they may suggest or recommend. I personally agree with a great many of the things they recommend. With some of them I do not agree, and as to many others I have doubts whether they should be carried into practice. But as far as one of the recommendations is concerned, and it is their main recommendation, the one which is embodied in

Most of the other suggestions and recommendations—and there is a multitude of them —will have to wait. Most of them can be carried out by regulations after the commission, the prison board, to be appointed will have satisfied themselves that they should be carried out; but the most important of them will have to be the subject of legislation, and parliament of course will have ample time to study the report and consider the advisability of making those changes. The commissioners in their report suggest that it is a work of five years to put into effect all the recommendations which they make, but this bill, I repeat, is merely for the purpose of creating a prison board.

I fully sympathize with the view expressed by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), by my hon. friend the member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber), and by my hon. friend the member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), that the members of the house have not had sufficient time to read and consider this voluminous report; and if this legislation would have the effect of carrying out all the recommendations of the commission, I would certainly feel that their contention was even stronger than it is. But so far as merely creating a prison board is concerned, changing the present system in that respect, I do not see that it is so essential or necessary to have read all the arguments in favour of the numerous changes which are suggested. There may be some who think, as my right hon. friend does, that we should wait, but I am quite sure that there are a good many more who would strongly criticize the government for not doing anything this session after this report has been tabled.

I do not agree with the basis on which my right hon. friend lays his strongest objection. He says that we are asking the committee to render a verdict against General Ormond. We are doing nothing of the kind. It is not the person of the superintendent; it is the system against which a verdict is rendered. If there is a verdict it is a verdict against a system; it is a question not of changing a man and putting another man in his place, but of changing the system. My hon. friends who spoke of the dismissal of General Ormond did not state the position correctly. There is no question of dismissing the superintendent by the creation of a commission.

Mr. STIRLING: That is the recommendation.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): True, his office would disappear. As this happens quite frequently in the civil service, he would be eligible for retirement allowance if he is entitled to any. The question of dismissing General Ormond has not been considered at all. Surely, if the policy of having a prison board in charge of the administration of the penitentiaries of Canada is the right policy, no single man should be an obstacle to putting that policy into effect. I repeat, the fact of giving effect to the recommendation of creating a prison board does not mean that anything is done against the superintendent who is in charge at the present time.

Of course I would be following the line of least resistance if I were to accept the view that it would be better to wait a few months. This will be a very difficult task. The appointment of the three men who will serve on this prison board will be a task of great magnitude. Some seem to believe that we should find supermen for that work. Unfortunately they do not exist any more in Canada and the other countries of the world. We have to find the best men possible. I am free to admit that at the present time I do not know what men will be appointed on that board. I have already received many requests, and I am afraid I shall disappoint some of the writers when I say that the choice which will be made will not be made from among those who have written. I may add that these will not be political appointments. If there is a work which will be most responsible and difficult, it will be this. It is a work which does not bring much satisfaction. There is no occupation more open to criticism than that of those in charge of penitentiaries, working all the time earnestly, satisfying nobody and being subject to criticism which is not always fair. I think I am right in saying this. But I am going to do my best, with the help of my colleagues, to find three men who will most adequately recommend themselves to our appreciation. I have a great deal of sympathy with the suggestion of the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) that one of them should be a medical man. I believe that is recommended by the members of the royal commission. But as hon. members will see when the bill is introduced, it will come into force only on proclamation. Of course we have to consolidate the Penitentiaries Act by striking out in many places the words "minister" and "superintendent" and replacing them by "board" or "commissioners." But the bill in itself will mainly consist of this great change of creating a board to administer the penitentiaries.

My right hon. friend has spoken of the parole system and of the change which is suggested by the commission. I must say, without enlarging upon it, that I am inclined to agree with him that the carrying out of the recommendation in that regard will be a difficult step to take. This, however, will be considered later, and parliament will have its say if this change is suggested in a practical way.

I do not think I have anything to add to this. When the bill is discussed after it has been introduced, I shall be prepared to give any further information.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the resolution carry?

Mr. BENNETT: No, Mr. Chairman. The very moderate and fair statement of the minister commends itself, I think, to every member of the committee. But it does not meet what I conceive to be the real difficulty.

On the fourteenth day of June this report was filed. To-day is the twenty-eighth. The report is dated in April. Between April and June time was spent in printing it and, I take it, in translating it. We first saw it when it was tabled on June 14. That is only two weeks ago. I say frankly to the minister that although he deals with only one phase of the question, that affects the whole principle of prison administration in this country. If, for instance, one refers to matters in this report and points out that they are absolutely unwarranted in fact one draws the conclusion. I think properly, that little importance attaches to the whole. Take, for example, the attack against the firm of Morris, who sold coal. I mentioned that this afternoon, and I observed that in a letter written by John Morris to the newspaper he pointed out that the facts are exactly the opposite to those which are stated. With respect to Sowards it is quite clear that the same situation develops.

Take the Buck incident. I say to the minister that the reason why one approaches this matter with such a desire to read this report is that all you have to do is to consider the incident with respect to Buck. Who empowered these three men to sit as a court of appeal on Craig and the other commissioner who reported on the Buck incident at the time it happened? And what do these three men find? The minister knows what they found. They said that the reports which were made by the commissioners who investigated the matter at the request of the Minister of Justice arrived at conclusions that were wholly unwarranted. They refer to the fact that certain of these people were not experts in penology. But which one of the three royal commissioners was? Was Craig? Was McRuer? Was Judge Archambault? These are not experts; yet they project themselves into this picture as experts; and now the government asks us to consent to changing the whole system of the administration of prisons in this country, although we have had this report before us for no more than two weeks. And the difficulty is that when the change is made it is not easy to undo it. The minister says he proposes that the bill will come into force on proclamation. I desire to point out to him that if this change is made, it will be possible to alter it only by act of parliament. Once we have committed ourselves to this scheme or plan, we shall have made it impossible to alter it except by statute.

Despite what the minister has said, the appointments will be political. I was pleased, indeed, to hear him say that he did not propose that they should be partisan political appointments, but the fact remains that they will be political appointments. It is contemplated that they should be. How did Ormond come into the picture? He came in through the civil service commission and through that board the names of which I gave this afternoon, who made the investigation they did and reported in his favour. The majority of the men who made that report were certainly not supporters of the administration by whom the appointment was made, and they took a great deal of time to consider the matter. Finally they recommended Ormond. They recommended his appointment because they believed that he was the best of the many applicants who offered. Men like Mr. Biggar, or Doctor Porteous, or Mr. Edwards, or Mr. Dufresne, or Colonel Kemmis, or the late Major-General MacBrien spent a great deal of time over the matter.

Now the government must make the appointments, and they are already confronted with a situation which I regard as intolerable. I agree with the minister in that respect. After to-day's debate he will be receiving letters from every part of this country, from men who think they have a claim, and there is not a member of this house supporting the administration who will not receive a communication in these terms, "Speak a good word to the Minister of Justice about my appointment." I went through such an experience in connection with the Bank of Canada, and the minister will now have the same experience. Before that, the civil service commission acted, and they regarded their duty as so serious that they appointed this committee, with the government, to choose General Ormond. I recalled this afternoon vividly how hard they had worked at it. They took a long time going over the applications, and it relieved us of much responsibility. The Minister of Justice of that day was able to say, "I had nothing to do with it." I was able to say, "I have nothing to do with it." The Minister of Justice will now be literally beseiged with applications for the position, and members supporting the administration will be in the same position. The appointments will therefore be political. I repeat, I am happy to hear the minister say that they will not be partisan political appointments, but they will be political appointments.

How does that compare with the civil service appointment? How does that compare with the recommendation made by the late Major-General MacBrien and those other gentlemen to whom I have referred? What about the pressure that will be brought to bear as compared with the situation where men make a recommendation after investigating thoroughly the records of the persons concerned? Perhaps the minister has overlooked the exact words of the report with respect to General Ormond:

> Your commissioners are of the opinion that it is necessary to the good management of the penitentiary service that the superintendent should immediately be retired, and they recommend accordingly.

They had no power to do that; that was not the term of General Ormond's employment. He was not told that charges had been formulated against him, and he had no opportunity to be heard. Reading the report, one can see pretty well that it was not written by Judge Archambault, because there is nothing judicial about it. They take a sentence here and a question there, and the answer given by General Ormond. He was eight days before them although he had not a chance to meet these people who gave evidence against him. He was eight days being grilled by these three men, all three lawyers, he himself having been a soldier; and they pick out an answer he gave and then make a recommendation. And the recommendation is that he should be immediately retired. That is not fair. The minister says, "We are not going to retire him", but the minute you substitute this board for the superintendent, that minute he goes out of office. It is not fair that a royal commission should so recommend when a man is employed as General Ormond was. What happened? Without formulating charges against him, without saying what the charges against him were, in order that he might specifically meet them, he is dragged into a room and kept for eight days, not being present when these people were making the case against him. And who were the men that made cases against him? Outcasts of society. One of my hon. friends says, "Oh, well, these poor fellows would not have been so bad if they had had a chance." But I was glad to hear the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) say to-night that there are incorrigibles in penitentiaries. That is an improvement on what used to be said.

Miss MACPHAIL: They are not all in penitentiaries.

Mr. BENNETT: No. This afternoon my hon. friend suggested that the penitentiary authorities had their eyes on her, and I told her I thought there was no warrant for such a statement. I still think so. Take the Buck case. I wonder if the Minister of Justice thinks that is the sort of thing which should be hashed up to us, nearly five years after the event; and these three men have the hardihood to send to parliament a report in which they make this statement:

> The shots were deliberately aimed at Buck's cell.

That is not Buck, but Buck's cell.

> The shots were fired either with the deliberate intention of injuring Buck, or wilfully, reckless as to whether they did or not.

That statement is made five years afterwards. They continue:

> When the superintendent—

This is our poor friend who came into the service in this way:

> —had become acquainted with these circumstances he ought to have instigated an immediate and thorough investigation to determine the names of the men who had fired the shots, and this investigation should have been pursued with as much diligence as the investigation of any other crime.

The militia was outside, having been called in, and it was not apparent whether the shots had been fired by the prison warders or by the militia. He should have seen to it which man fired that shot! That is what these men report. I ask any hon. member what he thinks of that.

> (5) When Mr. Buckley's complaint was received, in August, 1933, the inspectors were instructed to conduct an investigation because there was no record of any appropriate investigation having taken place.
> (6) The investigation by Inspectors Craig and Dawson was not carried out with the efficiency the circumstances warranted.

And the commissioners made their report. They said that there he was, in D tier, the top, I went and saw it myself and saw the marks of the shots. They said that these men fired at such an angle as to endeavour to strike the ceiling, but, this being the top tier, some shots struck the top of the ceiling, did not go as high as the ceiling of the building but round about this cell. Anyone who knows anything would know that would probably be the result; and that was the finding. Listen to this:

(7) In view of the evidence before them, Inspectors Craig and Dawson did not prepare an honest report for the minister,—

This is our royal commission, five years afterwards.

—but rather sought to place the responsibility where it did not justly lie, on Buck, and this with a view to justifying the shooting, which they knew at the time to be unjustified.

I leave it to the Minister of Justice whether he thinks that is a decent thing for any commission to say, in the light of the fact that Buck himself, when pressed for an answer, said that his speeches to the crowd would be calculated to instigate them to further effort. That is what he said; he was perfectly frank about it. Now we are told by this commission—and the reason is obvious—it all gets back to this poor unfortunate Dawson.

Let us go a step further:

(8) The memorandum prepared by the superintendent for the Minister of Justice was prepared in an unwarranted effort to justify what had taken place, and the superintendent wrongfully omitted therein to report to the minister all the facts that were within his knowledge, or to give the minister an honest opinion in regard thereto.

I ask the right hon. Minister of Justice to-night as a fair man if he thinks that you can act on the recommendation of a commission which, five years after the event, makes a report like that with respect to these three men, Craig, Dawson and Ormond, under the circumstances mentioned. They charge them with being dishonest and deliberately making a dishonest report, and there are the marks of the shots. They are still there. They indicate the acute angle of fire. The reasons given at the hearing were clear and plain; and what is more, these men said that the effect of it was to do just what they wanted done, to quiet that riot. And listen to this: They say these men had no right to refer to what had taken place with respect to other cells where they had fired shots. But the answer was that the use of firearms had quieted the riot in the prison at cells E and F and that they used the same tactics with respect to the top tier D.

The issue is simple. Five years after the event, men who risked their lives, who were doing their duty as sworn officers of the law, are to be held up to ignominy; one of them, with a great record of offering his life in the mud and muck of France and Flanders, is to be told that he is a dishonest man, without having an opportunity to defend himself except being called as I have stated, and questioned by three astute lawyers for eight days. Did he see the witnesses? Was he given an opportunity to see them? Did he hear them? He did not. The event took place in August, 1933, and now, in the summer of 1938, after five years, we have this announcement that Ormond made a dishonest report; that Craig and Dawson made a dishonest report.

Look at the report of Dawson. Dawson is the man that McRuer tried to crucify before Judge Daly and failed; now he has his chance and behind his back he puts it down in that record. That is the story, and on that we are asked to change the prison system of Canada. And it is so much the more intensified by the statement of the hon. member for Grey-Bruce this afternoon that he did not receive any pay. It was a vindictive act—

Miss MACPHAIL: It was a generous act.

Mr. BENNETT: —and we know what it was done for. Now he seizes the opportunity, paid by the people of this country, to make that report against the unfortunate Dawson whose only fault is that he did his duty.

Craig and Dawson signed a report on the Buck incident, and I must say it is a terrible thing to think that five years after we have this report being torn to pieces by these three men. Where were the witnesses? They were not concerned about them. Where were the militiamen? They were not concerned about them. Where were the guards? They were not concerned about them. It was condemnation. Listen to what Craig and Dawson did. These are the words:

1. Close examination of the interior of cell 16-4-D, which is located on the fourth and top tier of D block, was made by the undersigned and it was found that there had been a bullet imbedded in the wall about six feet in height from the floor and two feet down from the ceiling, and approximately midway between the side walls, this mark (No. 1) was in the form of a round hole as deep as the forefinger. No. 2 bullet mark was in approximately the centre of the ceiling, a few inches to one side—this bullet had evidently ricochetted and had imbedded itself in the back wall, a little to one side of centre. No. 3, apparently, was the discharge of shotgun as ten marks as if made with shot, splattered on the back wall, were found around but mostly above No. 1 and No. 2 marks. No. 4 bullet mark was found on the iron bar of the window directly in front of cell 16-4-D. These four bullet and shot marks were the only marks that could be found that would indicate firing on that part of the prison known as D block.

Convict No. 2524, Timothy Buck, was confined in cell 16-4-D on October 20, 1932.

Mr. NEILL: How many storeys?

Mr. BENNETT: There were four tiers.

3. The marks above mentioned prove conclusively that shots were fired into D block, three of them landing in Buck's cell, and one directly in front of the bar of the window.

I am reading from the report of the two inspectors made at the time.

4. The evidence indicates that all these shots were fired between the hours of 5 p.m. and 8 p.m. Buck states that the firing started at 8 o'clock, other convicts state at an earlier time, but it is considered that the earlier hour is mentioned in an endeavour to show that it was light enough for them to recognize who did the shooting;

5. None of the evidence taken gives information as to who actually did the shooting. One convict mentioned three officers' names but one of them was home sick on that day and the other two denied that they shot into D block, although at the time they state they were in that vicinity.

Has it come to this, that because men decline to act upon the evidence of convicts and to believe them when they had directed attention to three officers as having fired the shots, one of whom was at home sick and the other two denied that they did it, five years afterwards three men on the strength of that say, "Dishonest Craig, dishonest Dawson and dishonest Ormond"?

This is very important in the light of what has occurred to-night:

6. At about five o'clock that evening, it was ascertained that convicts in F block were digging through the partitions of their cells in an endeavour to congregate in the chapel and to effect an escape.

7. The cells of F block were examined by the undersigned and it was found that holes had been dug in several cells, large enough for a man to crawl through.

8. To prevent further digging and an escape, numerous shots were fired into the air and into the ceiling of F block; great noise and damage was going on in E block and a number of shots were fired similar to those into F block. These shots had the desired effect.

9. Buck admits, and other evidence shows, that he made numerous speeches to the convicts that afternoon and evening. The nature of the speeches early in the afternoon may have been to quiet them but it is evident, towards evening especially when the firing commenced into the other blocks, that he succeeded in working the convicts up by having them shout in unison to the troops to coerce them and also in chorus voicing their demands.

10. This shouting by Buck was undoubtedly done at the gate of his cell in a gesticulatory manner and would be seen by the officers and militia patrolling and on duty in the yard. His actions and shouts would indicate clearly that he was leading and inciting the convicts.

11. It is considered that the opinion was then formed by those on duty in the yard that action had to be taken to suppress Buck and the tumult he was the instigator of.

12. The same action as taken with E and F blocks, was then evidently taken in regard to D block, by firing four or five shots high up in D block. These shots were fired at a moderately sharp angle from the yard but instead of hitting the ceiling as in the other blocks, entered cell 16 on the fourth or top tier of D block. The evidence shows these shots had the desired effect.

It has not been challenged, mark you, that these shots were fired at this sharp angle into the ceiling; but owing to the fact that they were fired from the yard outside they fell short of the ceiling, as indicated by the report I have already read. But they had the desired effect. Now see the fairness of this report at the time:

13. Whether aim was taken at Buck's cell, the evidence does not show, but it is apparent that from the high location of the marks those who fired the shots endeavoured to scare the convicts only, which evidently they did and the agitation was suppressed.

That is not denied. That is not questioned. These men risked their lives to suppress this commotion and quiet this agitation; yet, as a result of these efforts, five years later a commission calls them dishonest, and on the report of this commission we are asked to change the prison system of Canada.

Let us go a step further:

14. It is the opinion of the undersigned that the shots fired into D block were not aimed deliberately at Buck or any other convict and that D block was treated similar to the other two blocks into which firing occurred.

Yet these three commissioners state: "The idea of Craig and Dawson mentioning these other blocks! What relevancy had they"? And Craig and Dawson point out why they did so. They point out that these men were getting out; that they were tearing down the walls; that they had already planned an escape into the chapel, and thence to freedom. I continue:

16. It is pointed out that in the opinion of the undersigned, firing was the only reasonable means possible to suppress what was taking place at this stage. It was impossible at this time to take Buck out of his cell without precipitating a worse riot and possibly the loss of lives.

17. It is the opinion of the undersigned that the firing into D block on the evening of October 20, 1932, was done by a member or members of the staff of the penitentiary or of the permanent militia, both of which were on duty in the vicinity from which the shots evidently came at that time.

18. The undersigned are further of the opinion that the man or men when firing the shots into D block considered that they were fully justified in taking that action in the circumstances that then existed.

Respectfully submitted,
W. H. Craig,
Inspector.
J. D. Dawson,
Inspector.

Remember, this occurred six years ago next October. These men were on the spot. They were taking the responsibility. Their lives were being offered as a sacrifice, not the lives of these three commissioners. Yet the latter go to Kingston and hearken to stories, and they make a report that Dawson and Craig are dishonest men. Listen to these words:

The findings in the above report are subject to the following comments:

The references, in paragraphs 6, 7 and 8, to the nature of the disturbance in F and E blocks are irrelevant to the matter under consideration. Buck was in no way connected with any disturbances that may have taken place in these other cell blocks.

Just imagine; here were men with this terrible, this awful responsibility, with these hundreds of men in this penal institution, with this evidence that they had been burrowing their way into the open! They brought about quietness only by discharging firearms; then they suddenly saw the same situation in D tier, and they refer to that as a warrant for using the same means to bring about quiet there. Yet our beautiful commission says that is wholly irrelevant, and asks what that has to do with the matter.

Then I come to the next comment:

The finding in paragraph 9, that, "toward evening, especially when the firing into the other blocks commenced, he succeeded in working the convicts up, by having them shout in unison to the troops to coerce them, and also in chorus voicing their demands," is absurd.

Yet Buck has admitted it. That is your commission which is going to change the penal system of Canada. There you had these men confronted with that situation, as guardians of the peace, risking their lives, with the militia called out; and we are told that because they did what they did, as reported in this document by them at that time, it was all absurd, and that these men who risked their lives to preserve safety in that penitentiary were dishonest men. The report continues:

The troops were located outside the walls of the cell block. The prisoners were all locked in their cells. It is difficult to conceive how any shouting by Buck could have had the effect of "coercing" the armed troops in the yard. Careful perusal of the evidence does not justify such a conclusion.

The inferences drawn in paragraph 10 are unsupported by the evidence. The inspectors undertake to surmise what Buck would have done and what the officers might have seen, and on this basis they make the statement: "His actions and shouts would indicate clearly that he was leading and inciting the convicts." There is no evidence of such actions or shouts, and Inspector Dawson, when examined before the commission, expressed quite a different view from the above. He stated:

"I asked him (Buck) if his action might be interpreted as inciting rather than trying to quieten them, and he said 'Yes.' That more or less satisfied me on that point. This may be poor language."

The evidence Buck gave was as follows:

"Q. Is it possible that anyone in the distance would have thought that you were inciting rather than remonstrating?

A. Yes, it is possible owing to the noise and general excitement."

That is Buck's statement; yet in the face of that we have a report made six years later by three men who did not examine a single witness who was present at the time or who had anything to do with it, and in their report they make this finding against these men, charging them with dishonesty. Two of these men have worn the king's uniform and risked their lives in France and Flanders, but they are charged with being dishonest men. And that is the report upon which we are asked to change the penal system of Canada.

There is a rule of law, "False in one, false in all." Translated into ordinary English it just means that we should have an opportunity to study the evidence which should accompany the report. I propose, so far as it is possible to do so, to try to vindicate the position I take that we have a right to study this report. We are being asked to change our penal system on the report of men who ventured to make a report such as this regarding three men whom they charge with dishonesty one of whom they grilled for eight long days after having examined scores of convicts who gave evidence against him without his being given an opportunity either to see or hear them. I cannot do it.

Progress reported.

CIVIL SERVICE

THIRD AND FINAL REPORT OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE APPOINTED TO INQUIRE INTO THE OPERATION OF THE CIVIL SERVICE ACT

Mr. JEAN-FRANÇOIS POULIOT (Témiscouata): Mr. Speaker, the special committee appointed to inquire into the operation of the Civil Service Act begs to present the following as its third and final report.

Pursuant to order of reference dated February 22, your committee has held forty-eight sittings, has examined the three civil service commissioners, the secretary of the civil service commission, the chief, the acting chief and investigators Boutin and Jackson of the organization branch, and the chief examiner of the civil service commission; heard representations from Sir Francis Floud, K.C.B., K.C.M.G., United Kingdom high commissioner in Canada, the professional institute of the civil service, the civil service federation of Canada, the amalgamated civil servants of Canada, the dominion railway mail clerks federation, the amputations association of the great war and the Canadian Legion of the British Empire Service League. Briefs were received from army and navy veterans in Canada, officers, mates and petty officers of government ships, the Canadian postmasters' association, the customs and excise officers' association, and the New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island nautical association.

Your committee had charts prepared showing the organization of the staffs of the civil service commission and all departments of the government whose staff are under the civil service commission, but was unable, in the time at its disposal, to make an extensive inquiry into the various departments.

Having carefully considered the evidence adduced, your committee recommends:

1. Your committee deems it expedient and in the interest of the public, the civil service and the civil service commission that a standing committee on civil service matters be appointed at the commencement of each session of parliament, and therefore recommends to parliament that standing order 63 be amended by adding after clause (k) of said order, the following clause (1): "on civil service matters to consist of fifteen members, nine of whom shall constitute a quorum."

2. The committee further recommends that no official or employee in the civil service shall make any direct or indirect recommendation or reference by letter or otherwise on behalf of any relative by blood or marriage, or take any part whether directly or indirectly in any competition, temporary or permanent assignment, promotion, classification or reclassification in which any such relative is an applicant.

3. Your committee recommends that it shall be the duty of the civil service commission to make their own rulings on the operation of the act and apply the same uniformly, provided, however, that any department affected by such ruling may join the civil service commission in any submission to the Department of Justice for an opinion.

4. Your committee reaffirms the eighteenth recommendation of the civil service committee of 1932, which is as follows:

"18. Your committee is of opinion that there is a great deal of overlapping in the performance of duties by the heads of different branches of the civil service commission, owing to matters receiving the attention of the secretary of the commission which are in no way related to secretarial duties."

"Your committee, therefore, recommends that the secretary of the civil service commission be called upon to perform only those duties which are peculiarly those of a secretary and that the civil service commission consider ways and means of eliminating duplication of correspondence and departmental memoranda which now pass through the secretary to the commissioners."

And your committee recommends that all forms presently in use for such purposes shall be altered accordingly.

5. As the multiplicity of classifications and the discrepancy in salary ranges tend to create jealousy in the service and have resulted in injustices and dissatisfaction, your committee suggests that the service should be divided into five or six broad classes, with a maximum of not more than nine grades in one class, and such division to be set up as soon as possible.

6. From the evidence it appears there is at present a considerable discrepancy in salary ranges as between departments and as between the various branches of the same department and as between the Senate and House of Commons, which militates against efficiency and cooperation, your committee recommends that the organization branch be charged with special responsibility with regard to salary levels in order to simplify ranges and also to thoroughly investigate salaries paid in comparable classes within and without the service.

7. Your committee recommends that

(1) Annual surveys of departments, units or branches shall be made in rotation by the various investigators, whether requested by the department or not, and such reviews shall be made so as to remedy overlapping, overstaffing or understaffing and any unfair discrepancies which may exist.

(2) If there is to be specialization, it shall be within classes rather than by attempting to cover a whole department from top to bottom, as at present.

(3) Investigators shall mention in each report the time spent with each employee and the date and circumstances of the interviews.

(4) Investigators shall not sit on examining boards as members thereof.

8. In order to give the civil service commissioners a complete picture which will ensure fairness and department responsibility, and which will standardize the service and speed up the handling of cases, your committee recommends that the investigator's report and organization branch chief's comments be forwarded to department concerned and returned to the civil service commission with any comments such department wishes to make.

9. Your committee recommends that no married women shall be employed even temporarily under her maiden name and regulation No. 36 of the civil service commission shall be strictly applied.

10. Your committee recommends that subsection one of section 38 of the Civil Service Act be amended by adding at the end thereof the following proviso:

"Provided that, except on approval by the governor general in council, such authorization shall not extend to the employment of a person who is not a natural born or naturalized British subject and also has been a resident of Canada for at least five years."

11. Your committee recommends the commission may, at the request of the department concerned, but subject to the approval of the treasury board, appoint without competition any person who has already held a permanent position in the civil service and who has resigned, to the same or a similar position within the department if the department and the commission are satisfied that such person is deserving of such appointment, is not over fifty-five years of age, is of good character and in good physical condition.

12. Your committee recommends that standard advertisements to cover the classes and grades suggested in its fifth recommendation should be prepared and adhered to and that the practice which has often been followed in the past of writing advertisements to fit the qualifications of a single individual should be discontinued. Your committee recommends further that any reason for varying such standard advertisements should be submited in writing by the deputy-head suggesting such variation and be reported thereon by the organization branch and that no such varied advertisement shall be issued or published unless previously approved by the civil service commission.

13. Your committee recommends that examination papers should not be translated for examination purposes but should be read by the examiners in the language in which they have been written, whether English or French.

14. Your committee is of the opinion that whenever advisable transfers to other branches of departments, as well as from one department to another, should be encouraged so as to prevent favoritism and for the purpose of helping employees to acquire a general knowledge of the work of the department or departments of the government. Your committee considers that the effect of this recommendation will be to open new horizons to the younger employees by offering opportunities for advancement and promotion at the same time preventing the static condition of the service and remedying certain injustices.

15. To facilitate the adjustments of complaints of a civil servant, where such complaints cannot otherwise be adjusted, your committee recommends that such complaints be adjudicated by a board of appeal consisting of a nominee of a civil service organization named by the appellant, a nominee of the deputy head of the department affected, and a nominee of the chairman of the civil service commission, the latter of whom shall be chairman of the board.

16. Your committee recommends that ratings on efficiency and fitness, on which selections for promotion are largely based, be made by a board of three departmental officers instead of by individual departmental officers, as at present, and that a system of periodical ratings recording the efficiency of employees be established, for use in connection with promotions, salary increases and retirements. That the employee shall be advised of the result of all his ratings and shall have right to appeal such rating to the board mentioned in the preceding recommendation.

17. Your committee recommends that promotions shall not be confirmed until after the expiration of fourteen days so as to permit the making of an appeal to the board mentioned in your committee's fifteenth recommendation, and in the event of such appeal being made that such promotion shall not be confirmed until the appeal has been disposed of.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

18. Your committee recommends that the practice of placing employees in vacant positions in an acting capacity instead of holding promotion competitions for them be discouraged.

19. Your committee recommends that the commission investigate the feasibility of more extensive and adequate advertising of competitions by press and radio.

20. Your committee regrets that the recommendation of the civil service committee of 1932 "that all papers, documents, et cetera, placed on the files of the commission, be consecutively numbered in each file, so that removals or deletions therefrom will be apparent" has been ignored, and recommends that it shall be strictly observed and that also each document on file shall be duly initialed and dated.

21. Your committee recommends that section twenty-one of the Civil Service Act, dealing with vacancies in the departments, be amended by providing (in subsection two thereof) for the case of temporary appointments when there is no eligible list that: "the commission shall forthwith hold an examination and, if necessary, to prevent any serious interference with the public business, but not otherwise, may fill the position at once, subject to the approval of the head of the department, by making a temporary appointment as prescribed herein," the only change in the subsection being the insertion therein of the words italicized above.

22. Your committee is of the opinion that the preference granted by section twenty-eight and twenty-nine of the act to persons who have served overseas in the military or naval forces of His Majesty's allies shall apply only when such persons are natural born or naturalized British subjects, and also had been resident in Canada before the great war.

23. Your committee recommends that no male employee shall be retained in the civil service beyond the age of sixty-five years and no female employee beyond the age of sixty years, and that such retirement be made compulsory without any extension.

Your committee is of the opinion that this would materially increase the efficiency of the civil service, would facilitate promotion and create a brighter outlook for the future of the younger people in the service or desirous of entering therein.

24. Your committee is of the opinion that a departmental division of eighty per cent permanent and twenty per cent temporary results in discrimination in certain branches where the work is entirely permanent and where twenty per cent have to wait years for any hope of permanency, and also that further evil of this system is that a branch may pad up work to bring in extra temporaries, so as to absorb into the permanent quota those who otherwise would not be permanent.

25. Your committee recommends that long term temporaries on the staff of the House of Commons who have been giving satisfactory service for a number of years should be made permanent employees under the civil service commission.

And that the evidence taken by the committee be indexed and one thousand copies in English and five hundred copies in French be printed in bluebook form.

A copy of the minutes of proceedings and evidence taken is tabled herewith; also three exhibits filed on May 25.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Jean-François Pouliot,
Chairman.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE TO INQUIRE INTO TERMS AND OPERATION OF SUPERANNUATION ACT—THIRD REPORT CONCURRED IN

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort) moved that the third and final report of the special committee appointed to inquire into terms and operations of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, presented to the house on June 28, be concurred in.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): I want to say only a few words on this report. I know how invidious it is for a member who has taken no part in the work of a committee to criticize the results of their faithful labour, and I do not want to put myself in that false position. But I must express, on behalf of those whom I more immediately represent in connection with the matter, my disappointment that the report is not more definite than it is. If I remember rightly, this is the third committee on this subject in the last five or six years. They have all made the same indefinite kind of report, and each of them has ended in just nothing being done. I believe one committee recommended that the departmental officials should look into it. Time is going on; most of these people are getting old, and they are looking forward hopefully, or almost hopelessly now, to some arrangement being made so that they can come under the superannuation act. The people I more immediately refer to are the masters and mates and petty officers of the government boats. There is no reason in the world why they should not, and many reasons why they should, be allowed to come under superannuation. They put in petitions year after year. I myself have been privy to at least three of them. Now the best we get is to have the committee recommend that a similar committee be set up to continue the inquiry next session. I make no reflection on the work of the committee. They seem to have carried on an extraordinary number of interviews, they have examined a large number of witnesses, and so on; but it is unfortunate that perhaps they were rather late in getting organized. I quite admit that it is now too late for the government to do anything this session, but I would suggest that either the chairman of the committee or the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) might hold out some hope of the committee being set up early next session in order to present in ample time a concrete recommendation which the government could put into effect. If the months are allowed to pass and another committee is appointed it will have to begin de novo and go over the same evidence again, and a year from now we shall be in the same position. We shall again find that the report of the committee will come down too late for the government to take action. I earnestly urge upon the government that they make a note of this so as to have the committee set up early next session in order that we may have some definite recommendation which might be acted upon.

Motion agreed to.

MILL FEEDS

INQUIRY AS TO REDUCTION OF RATES FROM MILLING POINTS TO PACIFIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. K. ESLING (Kootenay West): Concerning the agreement between the railway companies and the government for reduced rates on mill feed from milling points to coast points may I ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) whether such reduced rates apply to carload lots for the benefit of farmers and poultrymen along the Columbia river in West Kootenay district? Further, does the government accept the declaration of the railways that if intermediate points insist upon reduced rates the railways will cancel the rates to the coast?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): The only part taken by the government in the matter referred to by my hon. friend was to pass on to parliament an offer from the railways to meet the wishes of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid), who brought the situation before the house. The railways offered to include mill feeds in the feed grain rates covered by the agreement of 1933, and I passed that offer on to parliament. The railway offer provided that the same rates that apply in the movement of mill feeds under an arrangement made in 1933 will apply as the maximum rate on mill feeds moving from points outside British Columbia into British Columbia.

UNEMPLOYMENT

CONCENTRATION OF SINGLE UNEMPLOYED MEN IN VICINITY OF VICTORIA, B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): May I ask the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) whether action has been taken by his department in regard to the further critical situation that is developing through the congregation of single unemployed in the vicinity of Victoria?

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): I have no doubt my hon. friend has seen the statement that appeared in the press yesterday that, with regard to the non-resident transients formerly in the forestry conservation camps, provision has been made for emergency relief pending their transportation to their own provinces, as originally proposed. I have nothing further to add to that statement but no doubt the matter will be again discussed when the estimates of the Department of Labour are before the house.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROVISION TO MEET CERTAIN EXPENDITURES AND INDEBTEDNESS, AND GUARANTEE OF SECURITIES

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue—for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 174, to authorize the provision of moneys to meet certain expenditures made and indebtedness incurred by the Canadian National Railways system during the calendar year 1938, and to authorize the guarantee by his majesty of certain securities to be issued by the Canadian National Railway Company.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section one agreed to.

On section 2—Power to issue securities for refunding and capital expenditures.

Mr. BENNETT: There is nothing here to indicate that it is capital expenditures. The minister yesterday made it clear that we were coming within that provision of our general rule by providing capital for the road. This is not providing for deficits or for deficiency of revenues to meet ordinary, everyday maintenance charges, but for capital charges. Should that not appear in section 2, so as to have it read:

> . . . approved to provide the amounts necessary to meet in whole or in part capital expenditures made or indebtedness incurred on capital account during the calendar year 1938 . . .

That would be in accordance with the principles that govern Canadian National financing.

Mr. HOWE: Paragraphs (a) and (b) make it clear that those are capital expenditures.

Mr. BENNETT: Subparagraph (a) does, but (b) does not. In the details as given yesterday the word "capital" was used in one case, and inferred in another. The down payment on certain equipment might be regarded as a capital expenditure. It has been the custom—I cannot say whether it has continued—to charge the instalments due each year on purchase price to operating revenues. They may buy a locomotive for $100,000, pay $25,000 cash, and the other $75,000 is represented by securities which mature over a period of years. The general rule has been—it may be changed now—to retire them out of earnings. I think that is what the interstate commerce commission approved and what we adopted. It would appear reasonable that the expenditures involved in the use of the locomotive for the business should be charged against operating revenues.

Mr. HOWE: While that is the principle of amortization behind the Philadelphia plan, nevertheless the twenty-five per cent payment is a capital expenditure. It seems to me unnecessary to put in the word "capital"; the fact is it is capital. But there can be no objection to doing so.

Mr. BENNETT: We laid down this rule with respect to capital and other expenditures on the road, that the country assumes responsibility for the capital expenditures. It is well to keep that line of demarcation clearly before us. If we provide $50,000,000 for deficits, that is one thing; if we provide $15,000,000 for capital, that is another, and we should make that clear in the statutes so that those who desire to study the general situation may have no difficulty in ascertaining what is capital and what is not. I am not concerned about it other than for that reason.

Mr. ILSLEY: I hardly think it necessary, because the section refers to the "following accounts," and the accounts are set out in considerable detail. There can be no question about the purpose to which the money is to be applied.

Section agreed to.

Sections 3 and 4 agreed to.

On section 5—Power to aid other companies.

Mr. BENNETT: What does clause 5 mean?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is a clause which has appeared in previous bills. "The said companies and railways" is the phrase, I presume, that prompts the right hon. gentleman's inquiry. The companies and railways are referred to in clause 2.

Mr. BENNETT: They are not named; that is the point.

Mr. ILSLEY: But they are defined as "the companies or railways comprised in the National Railway system as defined in the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1937." It is necessary that clause 5 be included, otherwise the company's expenditures would be limited to its own properties, excluding the properties of these other railways which are a part of the Canadian National system.

Mr. BENNETT: But is there no limitation as to amount? That has been one of the things that has wrecked such enterprises, the guarantee given by a parent company for the obligations of subsidiaries.

Mr. ILSLEY: The limits are contained in clause 2. The power to aid and assist is limited by the other provisions of the act.

The only purpose of the provision is that the parent company, the railway proper, shall not be limited to expenditures on its own lines.

Mr. BENNETT: I follow that. The fact is that someone has copied section 5 into this from another act, and it does not link up with the other sections that limit the expenditures. As it is now it would enable anything to be done.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is confined to the authorized expenditures.

Mr. BENNETT: But not authorized by this act. That is the point.

Mr. ILSLEY: I should say it is by this act. It is by some act.

Mr. HOWE: The purpose of the clause is to get away from a technicality, that the parent company might not be able to use money appropriated for its own use in respect of companies which are separate corporate entities. It has been in every act from the beginning.

Mr. BENNETT: I realize that, but it should be linked up with the other provisions of this act. As it stands it might be said to authorize anything. It is not tied up to expenditures authorized by the act.

Mr. ILSLEY: The intention is to tie it up with these expenditures. They cannot make a single expenditure under that clause which is not authorized by act of parliament. It covers expenditures authorized by act of parliament on any part of the system, including the properties of these subsidiary companies.

Mr. BENNETT: But clause (b) does not cover that at all.

PENITENTIARIES

INCORPORATION OF COMMISSION FOR ADMINISTRATION, CONTROL AND MANAGEMENT—AMENDMENT OF EXISTING ACTS

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 28, consideration in committee of the following proposed resolution—Mr. Lapointe—Mr. Sanderson in the chair:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to incorporate a commission with power under the Minister of Justice to administer, control and manage the penitentiaries; to provide for salaries of the commissioners and assistant commissioners and to amend and consolidate the Penitentiaries Act and amending acts and repeal the same.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. BENNETT: Last evening I was dealing with the report of this commission on the Buck case. Before I conclude what I have to say in that regard I think I should refer to the judgment of the Supreme Court of Ontario, reported in volume 3, Dominion Law Reports, page 98. I do that for one purpose only, namely to point out how serious this matter was in the judgment of Chief Justice Mulock. He points out with very great care that this man had openly advocated the very thing which he was charged with doing in that penitentiary. And now to re-try this case in the sense that it has been re-tried in this report does violence to one's understanding and appreciation, I think, of the whole theory under which commissions operate and act. For instance, Chief Justice Mulock refers to the evidence given by Buck himself, and at page 102 he says:

According to the evidence of the accused Timothy Buck, large numbers of communists in Canada, in the fall of 1920, secured copies of those theses and statutes and in 1921 several groups of communists held a conference in Canada and formed an association called the communist party of Canada. Buck testified that the communist party of Canada was a section of the communist international, and that from the year 1924 onward the above named theses and statutes became binding upon the communist party of Canada.

Those words in themselves were very serious, and they were the considered words of the chief justice of Ontario, Sir William Mulock.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I ask the date of that?

Mr. BENNETT: This was in 1932, just before Buck was actually sent to prison, on the case that was presented to the court of appeal in the province of Ontario.

Mr. GRAY: What has that to do with the report of the commission?

Mr. BENNETT: I am now dealing with the penitentiaries report and the Buck case. The language used at page 103 is this:

—the communist party to join systematically, lawful and unlawful work, lawful and unlawful organizations . . . It is especially necessary to carry on unlawful work in the army and navy, police . . . and persistent and systematic propaganda and agitation if necessary in the army where communist groups should be formed in every military organization.

That was part of it. Then he proceeds:

Such mass demonstrations are prepared and carried out by the organized masses of the proletariat under the direction of the united, disciplined, centralized communist party. Civil war is war. In this war the proletariat must have its efficient political officers, its good political general staff to conduct operations during all the stages of that fight.

Then follow references to other points of the same character, and I direct attention to this matter particularly:

In every country where, in consequence of martial law or of other exceptional laws the communists are unable to carry on their work legally, a combination of legal and illegal work is absolutely necessary . . . But refusal to carry on or to participate in such work should be considered equal to treason to the revolutionary cause and incompatible with affiliation to the Third International.

I need not trouble to read further references, but the decision of that court resulted in this man being sent to Kingston penitentiary. Then riots occurred on two occasions, to which reference is made in this report; and during the quelling of one of those riots, with the aid of the militia, the shots to which I referred last night were fired. A report was made by two inspectors and by the superintendent, and six years later this commission makes a report which did not involve the calling of eye witnesses, as did the other case, but which enabled those who were the proponents of the faith of Buck to make the allegations that have been made from time to time in recent months.

I now proceed to what I regard as the most important point in connection with the report of this commission. I should like to ask the minister just where the authority was given to this commission to investigate the day to day operations of these penitentiaries. That is a matter for the minister, through his superintendent. I look at the order in council, for which the minister made the recommendation, and that order in council says that the commission is to inquire into and report upon——the penal system of Canada, including, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing, the following matters:

1. The treatment of convicted persons in the penitentiaries, covering the investigation and examination of the classification of the institutions;

As to that we have some evidence and something in the report, but that does not involve the question of the trial of the officials who, under the Civil Service Act, are responsible to their chief and to the department over which the right hon. gentleman presides.

The classification of offenders;
The construction of penal institutions;
The organization of penal departments;
The appointment of staffs;
The treatment to be accorded to the different classes of offenders, including corporal and other punishment;
The protection of society;
Reformative and rehabilitative treatment;
Employment of prisoners;
Prison labour;
Remuneration;
The study of international standard minimum rules, and other subjects cognate to the above.

2. The administration, management, discipline and police of penitentiaries.

Surely that does not cover dealing with the individual men in the penitentiaries. That is a matter for the minister, and, as I said yesterday, we have substituted for the minister and his control the work of this commission.

3. Cooperation between governmental and social agencies in the prevention of crime, including juvenile delinquency, and the furnishing of aid to prisoners upon release from imprisonment.

4. The conditional release of prisoners, including parole or release on probation, conditional release under the Ticket of Leave Act, and remission generally.

Then the order in council was amended for the purpose of appointing Mr. McRuer in place of Mr. Anderson. I want to point out just one more fact in that connection. Under these provisions you have the public destruction of the value of many tried and experienced officials. I am sure the minister never intended that this should be done. The minister never intended that these men should go into these institutions and pick out John Smith, Peter Jones and so on, and say, "We do not like the way these people do their work," because the doing of that by this public commission has destroyed the usefulness of these men, who are public servants, responsible to the minister and to the government of the day. This commission having made this report has made it extremely difficult for these men to continue to function.

I will give another case; I gave some last evening and if I so desired I could go through this report and take them one after the other, to show that there was no power contemplated on the part of this commission to deal with these matters in this way. Least of all I think did the minister expect it to be done. No one who participated in the discussion that occurred in this house ever thought we were to do that.

Now I take another case, at page 296, in connection with the chaplain and religious services at Kingston. The chaplain there was Reverend Mr. Kidd, who, unfortunately, happened to be the brother of the local member for that constituency. Why should he be brought into this and singled out to be treated in this way? Why should any of the chaplains be treated in this way? But the commission say:

Several complaints were made that the Protestant chaplain lacked the proper personality and approach to the men and that he was unable to gain their confidence. While your commissioners believe that he is earnest in his work, we do not find the same evidence of results as we found in some other penitentiaries. It is very important that chaplains should possess the ability to secure the confidence of the inmates if they are to be able to influence them.

The reports of the people who know Mr. Kidd, who was a padre overseas, are absolutely at variance with that statement. What is the position of the Minister of Justice in this matter? Here he has in front of him individuals dealt with by name. He himself has these recommendations or statements made about them, and yet he cannot remove them from office, unless it be under the section which says that it is in the interests of efficiency of the institution that they should be removed. And the commission go all through these penitentiaries, one after the other, and take the wardens, the deputy wardens, the guards, the inspectors and the chaplains, and deal with them one after the other. I ask the minister if that was the purpose of this investigation. That was not my understanding of it, or of any application that was made. It was to deal with the large and broad problem of prison administration—in detail, as the minister has pointed out—the question whether or not the proper form of administration prevailed and whether or not the chaplain's services are desirable. In the Saskatchewan penitentiary, where there is a full time Protestant chaplain, they say he does not visit the cells. Not visiting the cells, he has the prisoners paraded before him. They may have questions to ask and complaints to make. That was a recent appointment of a full time official. The same is said with respect to the Roman Catholic chaplain, namely that he does not go to the cells to see them.

I must ask the Minister of Justice if that is the sort of thing he thought this commission was going to deal with. That is a matter of internal administration, a matter for the minister's own guidance, not something which should be made public in this sense, thus destroying the entire usefulness of it. Man after man is picked out and dealt with in this report, one after the other. We may take the case of Dawson, to whom I referred last night. He is a returned man, who served with the Canadian expeditionary force. He was an accountant, and they say they do not think he is a particularly good man to be an inspector. That is the sort of thing that goes on through this whole document.

I ask again, can we adequately deal with this matter without having the opportunity to study the evidence? And listen to the kind of evidence that was taken, according to the report itself, not what I say about it.

[Mr. Bennett.]

I quote:

> At the outset, your commissioners decided to give all the inmates and officers of the various penitentiaries the fullest opportunity to make any representations they wished, pertaining either to their own welfare or to conditions existing in the different institutions, and, in order to ensure this by removing any fear as to the consequences which might result from freedom in expressing their views, the commission decided not to engage outside counsel, that the sittings should be held in camera, and that, while inmates were giving evidence, no penitentiary officer would be permitted to attend.

That is the sort of thing that we find. I visited the penitentiary at Kingston with the then Minister of Justice, without notice, and I asked various prisoners why they were there, what their previous condition had been, where they had come from. I can remember only one who said to me, "I am here because I ought to be here." Most of them said it was a frame-up or that someone had done something to get them there. I must say to the Minister of Justice that in ninety cases out of a hundred—well, perhaps not ninety, but at least eighty—the accused give evidence. If they are convicted, in addition to the other offences with which they are charged, they are perjurers, because a judge or a jury has not believed their statements made under oath; and they are now brought in here, free from any surroundings which may control or limit their activities, and permitted to tell their tale. And on that we have these men—these hard working men—treated in this way. Is it fair? Is it right or just?

Surely it was not intended that that ever should be the duty of this commission. Obviously the commission has entirely gone outside of its order of reference. What is more, and one of the regrettable things, long before this report came in it was known that they were going to get Ormond, that they were going to get Dawson, and others named in the report—an absolute negation of the purpose for which the commission was constituted. It was to report upon the penal system, and to deal with matters the minister now deals with. Think how much more difficult it has been made for the minister. Charged as he is with an enormous responsibility in connection with the penal institutions of this country, he is now handicapped by reports made public with respect to men on the evidence of inmates given in the manner indicated, all of whom have been convicted by the courts of the country, and the majority of whom are also perjurers—found as such either by the juries or by the courts. Is that right, or just, or fair?

Who were these men? Some of the men I saw had been convicted of murder, and their sentences had been commuted to life imprisonment. Others had committed offences against the person, such as assault and attempted murder and rape. In this list you have forgers, men who violated the criminal law with respect to embezzlement, theft, and matters of the kind. And these men come in here by invitation and make their statements in camera, without the presence of anyone connected with the administration. You take the names of the officials mentioned in the report and you say, "We do not think so and so is doing his job as fully as he might." That is a matter for the minister and the superintendent to decide. That is a matter of discipline. See what we have done: we have made it that much more difficult for the Minister of Justice to discharge his heavy duties and obligations.

I pointed out the other day that the first time I remembered Kingston being mentioned in the house was in connection with the penitentiary. At that time they were dealing with problems, and demanded a commission. They got the commission, to which reference is made in the report. That commission made its report with respect to certain matters. Then there was another commission on which Mr. Biggar, K.C., sat, and that commission made its report. Mr. Biggar was one of the committee who recommended that General Ormond should be appointed. Now we have the present report. Kingston has always been looming large with respect to discussions of penitentiary conditions. I ask the minister this: Were these men experts on the kind of buildings that should be built? And yet I find the commission complaining bitterly about the change of construction in the women's building at Kingston. They say the architectural plans have been changed. They say further that Collin's Bay cost too much money and is too elaborately got up. Now, the Minister of Justice was the gentleman who was responsible for the setting up of Collin's Bay. They make this reflection upon that work. It was carried on by the next government, and is being completed by the present government. The women's building was designed by the best men available, and then alterations were made in it. I refer to the building at Kingston. That is set out at length.

That building, too, was commenced not by the late government or the present government. And there you have running through it this web of interference with respect to all these matters, setting up the judgment of three men, without any evidence as to their knowledge or ability to deal with it, as to the construction of a building and matters of that kind. Is it fair or just that we should hand over this whole penal system to a commission, without having had at least some opportunity, not upon this evidence thus secured but upon what the minister and others know to be the facts, to consider the matter?

As to the complaint against men who have had military training, the minister is not to blame for that. The civil service commission appointed them, not the minister, and preference was given to returned men under the statute. The minister did not do that. Now they are complaining that the statutes of Canada are improperly enacted. This commission has said that these military men should not be there, that they are arrogant and that they bring militarism into the conduct of the penitentiaries. In the report that was read this morning with reference to the civil service, the only limitation placed upon appointments was that they should not be of people who were born outside of Canada. But so far as I know both these men against whom complaints are being made were born in Canada, and they gave service.

I do submit to the minister that we should not be asked to change the whole penal system of this country without any evidence that warrants it. In England, at Dartmoor and elsewhere, my observation is that the governors in most of these institutions are military men, and have been for years. In our country, until the great war came, there was, generally speaking, no military class from whom these men could be selected. The civil service commission has made all the appointments to the penitentiaries—I do not mean temporary clerks but appointments of importance—therefore the minister is not responsible.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My right hon. friend is forgetting that six months after the appointment of General Ormond the government of which he was the leader changed the Penitentiaries Act so that all appointments in the future were to be made by the governor in council—superintendent, wardens, inspectors and all the officers—and since then the civil service commission have had nothing to do with the appointment of either the superintendent or the wardens.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In April, 1933.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite, but I am thinking of the appointments that were under consideration by this commission.

Mr. GRAY: Go back a little.

Mr. BENNETT: I have already indicated, Mr. Chairman, that I answer no questions from that source. I make that perfectly clear, so he can keep on asking them as long as he pleases.

I am well aware of the change the minister mentions, and he knows why it was done.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I do not know. But if the system was so good that the superintendent in 1932 was appointed by this board after every consideration had been weighed; if it is almost a crime to say anything about a man who was appointed in that manner, why was the method of appointment changed six months afterwards?

Mr. BENNETT: He was appointed by the board to which I referred. I think the right hon. gentleman has followed me. The inquiry commission laid no specific charges against the superintendent, who had been appointed by the civil service commission; and he has not to this day had an opportunity to be heard, although they make this finding against him. He was examined, grilled for eight days by the commission, after, as has been pointed out, the inmates came in one after the other, and made statements not under oath so far as I have been able to ascertain—I have not seen the evidence. But do you suppose that they were going to make any statements other than those they did make once you hung up the notice: Come on in and make your complaints against this institution?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The same thing happened when General Ormond made an examination. He examined 650 inmates. You will find that in the debates of 1933.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so. He was examining just for the very point I have been endeavouring to make. He did not make a public report.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Not a public report of this kind with respect to individuals. I know what he was doing; the minister knows what he was doing. He was trying to help the minister to be better able to discharge his important duties by ascertaining wherein as a matter of internal discipline the situation could be improved. That is what I conceive his duty to be under the minister's direction, and he was endeavouring to improve the conditions. But to name these men because they do not visit the cells of prisoners, as this commission does, is a different matter; and they say they do not regard that as being a sound system.

Then the commission drag in the question of coal. The men make an adequate explanation in the newspapers about the coal, but the commission find that because somebody else investigated the matter the investigation was not adequate. Who made them a court of appeal? Who gave them the right to do this? The people concerned never had the opportunity to come there and be heard. They found as a fault, mark you, that previous investigators did not call the contractors. All this leads to just one conclusion which I desire to make and which I again present to the minister, namely that we have had no adequate opportunity to study this report. The report of the textile commission has been placed before us this session, but no legislation. We have had the grain report, but no legislation. We have had other reports, but no legislation. Fourteen days ago yesterday this report was brought down, and upon this report, without having had an opportunity to consider it, we are to change the whole penal system. I appeal to the court of ultimate resort, the minister himself. Will he say that the superintendent has not served him, and this country through him, as faithfully as any superintendent he has ever had under him?

Mr. GRAY: No.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Justice is very unfortunate in choosing his proxy.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Choosing what?

Mr. BENNETT: The question was answered by a member sitting behind the minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I will answer for myself.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought the minister would. I do not wish to do more than present what in my judgment as a member of this house I conceive to be one of the greatest difficulties we have had to meet in this regard, namely, the lack of opportunity to determine whether or not there is any evidence upon which action might be taken. Before the report came down the government had apparently made up its mind to take action. The government probably knew what the commission was doing, because the report was dated in April, but I had no knowledge until the report came down. I have looked at the recommendations, but I have had no time to read the report except casually, as I pointed out yesterday, and members of the house tell me that they have had no time to do more than read the introduction. None of us have seen the evidence, which we thought would be laid on the table of this house that we might consult it. No one suggests, least of all I, that we should go to the expense of printing it, but in the case of the commission dealing with the railways, the report was placed in the library and the appropriate place for this report would be to lay it on the table of the house that we might study it. The report of this commission, dealing with matters of great national concern, is apparently to result in an entire change in the penal system of this country. The minister says that the appointment of the three commissioners will not be partisan, that he will do his best to prevent that, but they must necessarily be political appointments, and that commission is to be the governing body of the penitentiaries of this country.

I say further that the minister has sustained my position; the act is to be brought into force by proclamation, thereby indicating that there is much to be done before these recommendations can be made effective. I suggest again, without of course any likelihood of its even being considered, in view of the position taken by the minister, that the interests of this nation would be best served by giving an opportunity for the people also to think about the recommendations made by that commission. It is usual to afford an opportunity for consideration of a report of this kind, and certainly there has been no opportunity for the public generally to investigate and consider the recommendations and to arrive at conclusions. I am not going to do more than make that statement again to the minister, knowing that, having taken the position he has, he cannot vary his view. But rarely have I known of any attempt being made to deal in this way with a matter of such great public importance—within fourteen days of the bringing down of the recommendation, to change a whole system which has been in existence since pre-confederation days, and then support this attitude, when we ask for further time, by saying that it will not go into force except by proclamation. No opportunity will be afforded between now and then for any changes to be made, because the statute itself will be conclusive upon every phase of penitentiary administration. I would think that many changes would have to be made in the Penitentiaries Act, that many changes would also have to be made in the whole set-up of our penal system, and that these operations would take considerable time.

Mr. COLDWELL: We have listened to a very long discussion of some phases of this report. As I listened last evening to the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) dealing with the Kingston riots, it did not strike me that he was painting an accurate picture, as I understood that picture from the report, and therefore, at the risk of taking a little time when the committee does not wish time to be taken, I desire to deal particularly with that phase of it. Since last evening I have made a very careful study of the relevant pages in the report. I think this, that in the recommendation regarding the superintendent the commission was justified upon the evidence relating to the Price incident alone.

You will recollect from the report that during the penitentiary riot Price was shot in the right shoulder. The guards were called and told that a prisoner had been seriously wounded, indeed that he was dying. This, of course, proved to be exaggerated. The wounded man remained unattended in his cell for twenty-two hours, from October 20 to October 21, the bullet not being removed until October 23. Subsequently the wounded man was in hospital until December 1. There is no evidence given anywhere, either by the superintendent or by anyone else, to show that he endeavoured to place the responsibility for the firing of this shot or for the neglect to which this particular man was subjected, nor is there any reason given for the delay in giving Price medical treatment, in securing an X-ray photograph, or in the removal of the bullet until some days later. In his report to the Minister of Justice, on the contrary, the superintendent treated the incident as one of little account. I find on page 80 this report to the Minister of Justice:

> One convict in the prison of isolation was struck in the shoulder by a bullet which ricochetted from the barrier. It was ascertained that he was not seriously injured.

That was the report made to the Minister of Justice by the superintendent. As I said a few moments ago, I believe it shows that he treated the incident lightly.

We have the commission's finding on the following page. After reviewing the evidence, this is what the commission said:

> The commission find that the treatment accorded to this prisoner (Price) after he was wounded was brutal and inhuman. In addition to being allowed to remain in his cell for twenty-two hours without medical attention, he was given no surgical treatment until the third day after the shooting. In our opinion, the circumstances called for the most searching and careful investigation in order to fix responsibility both for the shooting and the subsequent neglect, as well as for strict disciplinary action when the responsibility had been fixed. The superintendent failed to do this, and, instead, issued a report to the minister, which eventually was made public, indicating that the wounding was of a trifling and accidental nature.

The leader of the opposition dealt at considerable length with the Buck case. I have looked into the evidence which was submitted to the commission, and find that the picture presented to us last evening was not an accurate representation of what occurred. Let us remember that the Buck case has not only been investigated by the commission; it was the subject of a trial before Judge Deroche, who delivered judgment on July 6, 1933. Last night the leader of the opposition quoted from the report which was made, almost a year after the riot, by inspectors Craig and Dawson, who were parties interested in more or less shielding themselves in connection with what occurred on that particular occasion. In that report, the leader of the opposition contended, inspectors Dawson and Craig had stated that Buck admitted incitement to riot. Now, that can not only be disputed, but it is not a statement of fact, as was found by a duly constituted court and by Judge Deroche.

Mr. BENNETT: I read from the report here.

Mr. COLDWELL: The record from which the right hon. gentleman read was simply a report made by inspectors Craig and Dawson themselves.

Mr. BENNETT: I read the questions and answers.

Mr. COLDWELL: And the questions and answers. I propose to read the judgment of Judge Deroche, before whom Buck came to trial for his participation in the Kingston riot. I take it that the leader of the opposition will agree with me that when a judge in a court tries a man and delivers judgment, that judgment, except upon appeal to a superior court, is unassailable, and at least is much better evidence than the kind of evidence which would be given by two inspectors who were interested in whitewashing themselves and the institution in connection with the incidents that occurred. I turn to page 81 of the report and I read:

Buck was tried for his participation in the disturbance of October 17 before His Honour Judge Deroche, who delivered judgment on the 6th of July, 1933, in part as follows:

"Then I think I had better say this before I start my judgment proper. You presented to me—

He is addressing Buck.

—a most unusual request in your argument this morning. Your request in so many words said 'I hope your honour can find me not guilty, but if you feel you must find me guilty, then there is something I prize even more than the question of guilt, and that is that my name may be cleared of having done or said some things which I deny, and which would stamp me in my own opinion as a blackguard.' I am very glad to say to you that I can clear you of these things. I do not believe you shut off the motor in your shop; I do not believe you spoke in the mail bag department stating you would kill the screws unless you got what you wanted. I do not think you made a speech in the dome, or influenced any men to fight in the stone shed on that day; that was a personal fight between two men, I am satisfied, a personal grudge. I do not believe you ordered the men from the stone shed to go in the mail bag department. There is no evidence that you were an instigator of the assembly which developed into this riot. I think this covers all the things that were worrying you, and therefore, I have been able to do what you ask me to do. Having said this, may I proceed with my formal judgment.

The evidence in this case has not changed my opinion, but rather confirmed it, as to the history of the events of the afternoon of the seventeenth of October, as expressed by me in the Kirkland trial. My opinion in this regard is, I think, well known, so I need not repeat it here. I think these things constituted a riot; more than three men were engaged in it; there was a common purpose in the minds of the men; the tranquillity of the neighbourhood was disturbed for various reasons; the assembly, although peacefully intended in its inception, soon became tumultuous; there was a promiscuous, noisy commotion which was aggravated by some men carrying hammers, iron bars, and sticks; machines were broken, and locks were burned off doors. The warden himself was prevented from leaving, even when he desired to do so. Officers and guards were ordered to the mail bag department, and ordered to the front when shots were fired, and they felt they had to obey and did obey. Different witnesses have testified to being alarmed, to being in real fear, and these events constituted a riot.

I think I should say here, however, that the riot was not nearly so serious a matter as it was thought to have been at the time it occurred. From newspaper reports at that time, and general conversation amongst the public, it was deemed to have been an exceedingly serious matter, but I think the evidence as developed in these cases thus far has shown something different. Certainly it has convinced me that the riot was not intended to be a riot at the outset. I believe you, Buck, and the other witnesses, that the intention was a peaceful assembly, unlawful perhaps, at least breaking prison rules to do it, and the men knew they were breaking prison rules; nevertheless, I am satisfied that in the minds of the leaders anyway there was no desire that there should be a riot."

His Honour then went on to find that there was, nevertheless, a breach of the law, that Buck had participated in it, and that therefore he was guilty as charged. In dwelling with the subject of the sentence, His Honour stated as follows:

"While I do not intend to sentence you, Buck, to-day, I think at this juncture I might give some reasons which will move me in sentencing you when that day comes. While I am satisfied that you formed part of this riot I am also satisfied that you had an honest desire that no one should be injured and no property damaged; that is damage itself for the sake of damaging property. I am satisfied it was your desire to have the assembly of men make a demonstration merely for the purpose of emphasizing your demands for redress of grievances, and that is all to your credit. From the evidence produced in the Kirkland case I know of many of those grievances, and I know that since the riot they have been largely remedied, which makes your demands look reasonable; and that helps me somewhat in reaching a conclusion as to what sentence I shall impose.

While you did not personally injure any property I feel bound to hold you responsible in law, and, as I have said therefore, you are found guilty of an offence punishable with seven years, but I do not intend to give you seven years. The officer in charge of your shop says that you are the best machinist they have ever had in that shop; that your work and conduct have been commendable, and this is also very much to your credit. Then you exercised some restraint over the men, you and two or three others at certain points in this riot, and that is very much to their credit and yours."

And in another place His Honour stated:

"First, the riot itself was not of a very serious type. I would like the public to get that, because I am satisfied the public had the wrong idea of this riot at the time it occurred. The intention of the men at the outset was only to break a prison rule for the sake of assembling to make a protest, but it developed into a real riot, although not of an intensely serious nature. There have been many riots in many prisons of a much more serious nature than this one. As riots go, I would say this was a very mild riot, but it was a riot, and I had to find you guilty of participating in it.

Then, secondly, I do not believe you instigated the riot, and that, I think, is one of the things you wanted me to find. I believe that you had an honest desire that no harm should come to either person or property. But, as I said before, being a part of the unlawful assembly which developed into a riot, you are responsible for the consequences of the riot, and I must sentence you to some term of imprisonment."

That is the judgment of Judge Deroche, delivered after a competent trial in a competent court; and in my opinion it far outweighs any evidence that may have been submitted to the superintendent by inspectors Craig and Dawson, who themselves were interested in rather minimizing or whitewashing the affair.

Mr. BENNETT: The judgment is that he was guilty.

Mr. COLDWELL: The judgment is that he was guilty—of what?—of technically participating in a riot but not of instigating it. Furthermore the judge points out what constitutes a riot. Where three or more persons are assembled together and a tumult follows, that is a riot. Again, the judge says that as riots go this was a very mild one. The leader of the opposition this morning introduced remarks made by Judge Mulock in the Communist trial of 1932. Probably what the judge said as to the instructions given the communist party in 1920 was a statement of fact. I am not sufficiently well informed to know whether that is so or not. But let me point out that what may have been said by any group of men under the stress of the conditions that prevailed in the country in 1920 may not have been their considered opinion twelve years later.

Mr. BENNETT: But he said it was, in 1932, at the trial.

Mr. COLDWELL: I hold no brief for the communist theory, to which I have always been opposed, but from my personal observation, as I said once before in this house, much of that communist propaganda that was spread from 1920 to 1927 in the city in which I live was disseminated and encouraged by a sergeant of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who masqueraded there as the secretary of the communist party and who was during that time first a corporal, then a sergeant in the force. If we had communism in Regina the secretary of the communist party in Regina was none other than Sergeant Leopold of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, whom we knew in Regina at that time as Comrade Jack Esselwein of the communist party.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Surely communism has nothing to do with what is before the committee.

Mr. COLDWELL: But it was introduced as part of the discussion this morning, and I thought since the point had been raised I should endeavour to meet it by pointing that out.

Then there was a subsequent investigation, and Buck submitted a written statement which appears in the evidence, making the same contentions that were proven in the court presided over by Judge Deroche. Of this Inspector Dawson said, as reported on page 84 of the report:

I believe Buck in practically every respect, what he said.

In the light of that, how can it be said that this riot was started and conducted in the manner which has been described to this committee? The point I am making is that General Ormond took no steps to investigate the shooting at the cell occupied by Tim Buck until almost a year after the event occurred. We find at page 88 of the report the letter that the Minister of Justice had written to General Ormond asking him for a report—

Mr. BENNETT: In consequence of a complaint.

Mr. COLDWELL: On receipt of that letter the superintendent wrote to Inspector Craig as follows:

August 16, 1933.

Inspector W. H. Craig,
% the Warden,
The Penitentiary, Kingston, Ont.

Re 2424, Buck—Kingston Penitentiary

1. The above named convict is reported to have made a statement, while giving evidence, that during the disturbance following the riot in Kingston penitentiary in October, 1932, some guard or guards on the staff of the penitentiary deliberately shot at him while he was in his cell.

2. Please proceed to investigate this matter at once.

I would draw the attention of the committee particularly to the next statement:

3. This convict made a similar statement to me in October or November, 1932, but there was no substantial evidence to bear out his statement.

May I remark that inspectors Dawson and Craig went to the cell ten months later and found the evidence upon which they based their report.

It is possible that he may produce witnesses, either convict or guard, that will prove or disprove his allegation.

4. Inspector Dawson should sit on the investigation with you. If a stenographer can be made available the evidence should be taken down verbatim. If not, a synopsis of the evidence should be taken down by you in longhand.

5. Please treat this matter as urgent.

That letter was written months after the incident had occurred, and the superintendent admits that the complaint had been made to him months before.

Mr. BENNETT: On August 5, 1933. Look at page 87.

Mr. COLDWELL: The riot occurred in October, 1932. Then we find that when the superintendent was subsequently giving evidence before this commission he was asked:

Q. Do you think the guard is justified in firing a shotgun into a cell where there is a convict and where the convict is not trying to escape and is not breaking anything? Do you think a guard is justified in doing that?

A. I think it is a most damnable and wrong and improper thing.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Mr. BENNETT: So anybody would say, now.

Mr. COLDWELL: But General Ormond apparently did not consider it of sufficient significance or importance even to investigate it several years previously.

Mr. BENNETT: But he did investigate it. There is no evidence that a guard ever fired into a cell.

Mr. COLDWELL: The general in his letter says:

This convict made a similar statement to me in October or November, 1932, but there was no substantial evidence to bear out his statement.

Mr. BENNETT: That is right at the time, 1932.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yet the bullets were embedded in the wall and ceiling of the cell.

On page 95 of the report we find that the superintendent, after the receipt of this report from inspectors Craig and Dawson, prepared a memorandum to the Minister of Justice in which he said:

I concur in the report, but make somewhat different deductions from the evidence of convict Buck and others from those contained in paragraphs 14 and 15 of the report.

(a) I am of the opinion that Buck was the principal spokesman and agitator in D block.

Yet the evidence before the court, the judgment of Judge Deroche, and the fact that General Ormond himself had stated subsequently that he was prepared to accept the statement of Buck, entirely refute that statement.

(b) That the officers not only did not shoot at Buck, but deliberately aimed the shots to miss him, but to warn him that he must desist from his actions of making speeches and inciting the other convicts;

(c) I am of the opinion that the shots were carefully aimed and well directed;

(d) I am of the opinion that the first shot was fired from a rifle by a penitentiary guard when Buck was standing at the cell gate, and was fired over his head, as being the safest place to direct it, but close enough to show him that he could be hit should it be considered necessary to do so, and he did not desist from his offensive action;

(e) I am of the opinion that the second shot fired near Buck, when he was at the cell gate, was from a revolver, the shot being carefully aimed at, and hitting in the ceiling of the cell. This shot apparently showed Buck that he could be hit if it was the desire of the officers to do so. He desisted from his offensive action;

(f) I am of the opinion that the other shots fired into Buck's cell were so directed because of the continuance of shouting by the convicts in the adjacent cells.

(3) If considered desirable, the Toronto Regional Labour Council might be informed that no shot was deliberately fired at Buck, but that shots were fired in proximity to him that he must desist from his speech making and inciting of the other convicts.

(4) Buck was known as a ringleader from the part he played on October 17, for which he has since been tried and convicted.

(5) That attached report confirms the report of the superintendent, dated January 23, 1933, at page 26, which contains the statement—

No convict was singled out, or fired at, by any officer.

Respectfully submitted,

D. M. Ormond,
Superintendent.

Yet the trial having taken place, and the judge having given judgment as I have indicated from the record, General Ormond sent a report to the Minister of Justice in the late administration which in my opinion deliberately misled him. That in itself, I say, is sufficient reason for dealing with General Ormond in the manner the commission suggests. Then we come to the conclusions, and we find that the commission states:

After a careful examination of all the evidence, your commissioners have reached the following conclusions:

(1) At least three rifle bullets and ten pellets of buckshot were fired into Buck's cell by someone who knew that Buck was in the cell at the time.

(2) The shots were deliberately aimed at Buck's cell.

(3) The shots were fired, either with the deliberate intention of injuring Buck, or wilfully, reckless as to whether they did or not.

(4) When the superintendent had become acquainted with these circumstances he ought to have instigated an immediate and thorough investigation to determine the names of the men who had fired the shots, and this investigation should have been pursued with as much diligence as the investigation of any other crime.

(5) When Mr. Buckley's complaint was received, in August, 1933, the inspectors were instructed to conduct an investigation because there was no record of any appropriate investigation having taken place.

(6) The investigation by Inspectors Craig and Dawson was not carried out with the efficiency the circumstances warranted.

(7) In view of the evidence before them, Inspectors Craig and Dawson did not prepare an honest report for the minister, but rather sought to place the responsibility where it did not justly lie, on Buck, and this with a view to justifying the shooting, which they knew at the time to be unjustified.

(8) The memorandum prepared by the superintendent for the Minister of Justice was prepared in an unwarranted effort to justify what had taken place, and the superintendent wrongfully omitted therein to report to the minister all the facts that were within his knowledge, or to give the minister an honest opinion in regard thereto.

After dealing with this case I should like to say that this discussion has been made too much a question of General Ormond and the riot at Kingston. I am sorry I had to deal with it this morning, but having read the evidence carefully last night and having listened to the leader of the opposition, I felt that someone should place on record the facts that I have laid before the committee. That is why I have taken the time to do so this morning. But this discussion should not be confined to the Kingston riot or to General Ormond. In my opinion the recommendation of the commission regarding General Ormond was justified; but I would say that even if it were not justified, the placing of power in the hands of one individual to do the things a superintendent can do is placing too much power in the hands of any individual. Yesterday afternoon we passed an act nationalizing the Bank of Canada. No one suggested, nor would this house think it wise, that in the hands of the governor of the Bank of Canada, one individual, should be placed supreme power over the national bank or over our financial institutions. I quite agree that it should not be done, that one man should not have that power. But I say that human happiness and human welfare are equally as important as—I think more important than—money; and if it is too dangerous to place in the hands of one man power over our financial institutions, equally it is too dangerous to place in the hands of one man power over the lives and happiness of many individuals.

I think the government has done the wise and proper thing in bringing down legislation to place the control of our penal institutions in the hands of a qualified commission. I should like to see that commission composed of qualified men. From what the Minister of Justice said last night he intends to do his level best to see to it that we have a commission which will understand not only the punitive side of imprisonment but the reformative side as well; and I believe that this would be a great advance, because this report shows clearly that we are far behind the progressive countries in other parts of the world in regard to our prisons and the conduct of our penal institutions. The time surely has come when we should endeavour to make effective these recommendations. Year after year penitentiary matters have been discussed in parliament. Several years ago a report was made but no action was taken, and now we have a most comprehensive report regarding the type of buildings, the type of wardens and guards and so on. Just here may I say that I read with a good deal of interest the comments of the three gentlemen in this connection, and it must be remembered that this commission was composed of a judge and two eminent lawyers, both of whom have occupied judicial positions as magistrates in their own cities. These were men accustomed to sifting and weighing evidence, to making recommendations based upon facts, and they recommend that a competent commission should replace the superintendent. I am thoroughly in agreement with that recommendation. True, it is unfortunate that we did not receive this report earlier in the session, but the report is here and if the government fails to do anything about it what is going to happen? I venture to say that every prisoner in our penal institutions knows of the existence of this report, and every prisoner is watching to see what will happen. How can discipline be maintained in those institutions during the coming year if we do nothing about its recommendations at the present time? It seems to me that in the interests of the prisoners themselves, in the interests of discipline, in the interests of the government, in the interests of Canada and, as somebody suggests, in the interests of democracy, this report should be implemented to the extent that the government intends to implement it. I therefore wish to express my support of this resolution.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In a very few words I wish to emphasize again what I said yesterday in answer to the request that this matter should be postponed because the report was made at a late stage of the session, and the suggestion that it would be better that further consideration be given it by members of the house. I repeat that the bill which will be introduced merely provides for the creation of a prison board. No other change is made by the bill. This report will be considered further with the help of this prison board, when it is appointed. Any necessary changes in the law will be made then, and where such changes can be made by regulation, that will be done.

I shall go further. We, the government, on our own responsibility could propose this change of policy to parliament, without the help of any report at all, even discarding this report and these recommendations. The policy is one of which we approve, and I believe that under the present circumstances, with the conditions as they exist to-day, it is very important that this prison board should be created. This is being done, and it can be done without accepting all the findings, recommendations or suggestions of the men who sat on that royal commission. We may accept all of them or any of them, but I am in favour of creating a prison board, without being bound to reflect against any officer or any man. It is unfortunate that the discussion on the resolution has turned to personalities instead of being directed to the necessity of a change in the system. However, as the commission itself has been assailed I may say that we are responsible for the creation and personnel of the commission. Let me tell you, Mr. Chairman, that not one of them asked for the appointment. We tried to secure the services of the best men available, and we had difficulty in getting them—each one of them.

As the name of Mr. McRuer has been mentioned in particular, I may say that Mr. McRuer accepted, after being pressed to do so, at very considerable sacrifice to himself, as a public duty. After what has been said, I think I owe it to him to make that statement to the committee.

With regard to the report itself, I may say that all the comments of newspapers in Canada have been sent to me. There has been almost unanimity in commending the report. A few newspapers thought it was rather hard on one gentleman, but on the merits of the report itself the opinion seems to be almost unanimous. May I quote from a letter I received from the Canadian Penal Association, an organization which is doing a great service in Canada. Eminent citizens from most of the large Canadian cities serve in that association. In the brief which they have sent, in which is quoted portions of the report, they say:

> In approaching you, sir, in regard to this very important document issued by what is commonly known as the Archambault (royal) commission, the officers and directors of the Canadian Penal Association wish, in the first place, to acknowledge their debt to the present government for having implemented its promises to appoint such a commission of inquiry in order to satisfy the general public on this matter of the administration of our penal system. Further, we desire to place on record our deep appreciation not only of the great and long efforts of the commission to get at the essential facts in every phase of this study, but also of the personal courtesy shown to those of us who appeared before the commission and of the sympathetic hearing given us over a year and a half ago. We are of opinion that the volume issued will be worthy of the study of every criminologist and penologist and that the general attitude on this problem enunciated by the commissioners constitutes an epoch in Canadian criminological affairs. At the same time we are quite aware that there will be strong resistance from certain quarters when it comes to legislation, but we hope the government will insist upon giving effect to the proposals made.

As I stated, all we are doing is to create a prison board. This action is not directed against any official. I feel inclined to answer what my right hon. friend asked about the prison superintendent. So far as I am concerned, he has certainly served faithfully during my term of office, and has been industrious. But, as has been stated, there is the difficulty of one man having in charge this huge system, one which is broadening all the time. One of the complaints made in the report was that the superintendent did not visit the penitentiary during his term of office. With the immense amount of work which is his, as head of the penitentiaries, I know he simply could not do it. This is a job for more than one man. I repeat that it is the system we are introducing to-day, and to that point I wish to limit myself. I recognize that my right hon. friend had a duty to perform, and he was loyal to a gentleman.

Mr. BENNETT: Whom he hardly knows.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, and in whom he has confidence. I am glad he recognizes that, having responsibility for the matter, we have to proceed with the legislation, especially under the present conditions. It is a necessity, because I do not see how we can proceed under the present system after what has taken place. I would not feel that I could safely be responsible for the administration of the penitentiaries.

With regard to the appointment of the commissioners-to-be, I repeat what I said yesterday. My right hon. friend says they will be political appointments. Well, in the broad sense of the word that may be true, but no more so than are the present appointments. In 1933 the law was amended to provide that the superintendent and all officers should be appointed by the governor in council. If we do not do the right thing we will be responsible to parliament and to the people, and we will deserve what we get.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BENNETT: Before it carries I desire to say this. With respect to the statement of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) that he would not care to assume responsibility for the conduct and administration of the penitentiaries unless this legislation is passed, if he had said that at the very beginning of his observations I think I should have felt bound to accept it. No man in this house has a greater regard for the maintenance of law and order than myself. Sometimes I am charged with having too great a regard for it. But when one with the experience of the minister, whose administration has been under fire in this report in some instances, from 1923 to 1930, and from 1935 to the present time, says that he would not care to assume responsibility for the administration of the penitentiaries unless this legislation be passed, it becomes impossible for any member of the house who has regard for law and order to do otherwise than to permit the legislation to pass without further comment.

I do wish to add, with respect to Buck, that he was found guilty by a judge. He was found guilty of having been in the riot, and was sentenced accordingly. I refer to the charge against him only for the purpose of indicating that he advocated, and was convicted of advocating, the very thing which he did, namely the use of force if necessary against the maintenance of law and order.

I was more pleased than I can say to hear the observation of the right hon. gentleman, with respect to a man whom I did not know more than in a casual way, that he had served him faithfully, industriously and loyally. But I do think that with respect to royal commissions we should realize how serious it is to have what happened there take place again. At page 81 we have these words:

> The evidence of the superintendent before the commission occupied eight days.

And he was not present when any of these statements were made against him by inmates of the penitentiary of which he was the superintendent. I regard that as a very serious matter. I am satisfied in view of what the minister has said that he will do everything in his power to see that those whose reputations have been reflected upon by this report, in my judgment very improperly in many instances and without evidence, shall receive that measure of consideration which the infallible justice of the crown under which they serve should ensure to them, under the terms of their employment under the Civil Service Act.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Lapointe (Quebec East) thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 175, respecting penitentiaries.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER: When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. BENNETT: Has it been printed and distributed?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is printed and will be distributed. After distribution we might take the second reading this day.

Mr. BENNETT: This day.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at three o'clock.

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue—for the Minister of Finance) moved the second reading of Bill No. 164, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Sections 1 to 6 inclusive agreed to.

On section 7—Transactions reducing liability to taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think I should point out that the addition in this section is not covered by the resolutions, but I think it is a beneficial section.

Section agreed to.

Sections 8 to 11 inclusive agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. ILSLEY moved the third reading of the bill.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I think I should say before the bill is given its third reading that I have been considering the matter mentioned by the minister the other day. I realize that the difficulties to which he referred are very great. I also recognize the efforts that are being made to meet them for the purpose of securing something for our revenue from those who belong to the second class mentioned in section 7 of the bill, and that the minister and his officials are doing their utmost to find some solution.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

MEASURE RESPECTING FRANCHISE OF ELECTORS, ELECTION OF MEMBERS OF HOUSE OF COMMONS AND PRINTING AND PUBLICATION OF ELECTION DOCUMENTS

The house resumed from Monday, June 27, consideration in committee of Bill No. 91, respecting the franchise of electors and the election of members of the House of Commons—Mr. Power—Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

On section 14—Qualifications.

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health): When this bill was last before the committee there was some discussion of subsection 1 of this section. I understand from the chairman of the committee, who is not here at the moment, that the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) is now willing to withdraw his objection to the word "ordinarily" in this section, provided that certain amendments are made to section 46. I believe there is an amendment before the committee. I would therefore ask the permission of the committee to withdraw the amendment.

Amendment withdrawn.

Mr. NEILL: I should just like to confirm what the minister has said. The proposal now made will, I think meet the objections which several hon. members, including myself, made the other day, by leaving the word in section 14, which meets the objections made by several hon. members from the province of Quebec, and by taking it out of section 46. It has been pointed out that this will give us practically all we want. It will not be quite so convenient for a man to vote in a logging camp, because he will not be put on the list at all, but he will have the facilities of what is called "swearing himself in." The only difference is that he will be put to some trouble in taking the oath and in getting somebody to vouch for him, but it seems such a desirable compromise that I give credit to whoever it was thought of the suggestion. I should like to say for myself, and I think I can presume to speak on behalf of the members from British Columbia who joined with me in connection with this section, that we appreciate the attitude taken both by the minister and by the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Bothwell). It was nothing to them how this thing went, but they took no end of time and trouble in adjusting the matter. It is only a continuation of the knowledge we have that they have always shown courtesy and fairness in meeting any objection in connection with this bill, which has now been before the committee for two years.

Mr. MacNEIL: I associate myself with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). But do I understand the minister has no objection to the proposed amendment to section 46?

Mr. POWER: No, no objection.

Section agreed to.

On Section 16—Interpretation.

Mr. POWER: This was allowed to stand, for the same reason.

Section agreed to.

On section 31—Polling stations.

Mr. POWER: With respect to section 31, considerable discussion arose on Friday evening of last week. We have not found it possible to arrive at any compromise. Personally I am not particularly enamoured of the section which is now in the bill, although it was arrived at after a great deal of discussion in the committee, and is a compromise with those who felt that some arrangement should be arrived at which would prevent what occurs at the present time, namely the results of elections reaching British Columbia about three or four o'clock in the afternoon. A number of suggestions were made, and the one which is incorporated in this bill appears to be the only one which may by any stretch of the imagination be called practicable. In view of the fact that the committee has endeavoured to meet all views, I am personally prepared to support the section as it now is. I do not think it is a matter of partisan politics. As was explained by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) the other evening, it is really a question for the judgment of each individual member. The government does not insist on the amendment, but as the minister in charge of the bill I think that it should pass, in view of the good work done by the committee.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: There was an amendment moved to subsection 5 of section 31, reading as follows:

> The poll shall be opened at the hour of eight o'clock in the forenoon and kept open until six o'clock in the afternoon of the same day, and each deputy returning officer shall, during that time, in the polling station assigned to him, receive in the manner hereinafter prescribed the votes of the electors duly qualified to vote at such polling station.

Mr. NEILL: The amendment was to strike out the existing subsection 5.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Yes, that subsection 5 be deleted and what I have read substituted.

Mr. BENNETT: The complaint was as to the circulation not only of the results of the election in the east, but also, unfortunately, of wholly false information. I thought that the matter might be dealt with apart altogether from section 31 by providing in a later section that it shall be an offence to publish false information respecting the result of elections. Everyone knows that in one of the elections—we will not say which—an extra came out indicating results in Nova Scotia which were absolutely opposed to the facts. Surely we should be able to deal with that situation. The other aspect of it I refrain entirely from discussing, because the views expressed by hon. gentlemen on this side who were present in the committee I am content to accept.

Mr. POWER: It is true that there is a complaint of false news having been published, but that would not settle the question—

Mr. BENNETT: No; that would be preventive, perhaps.

Mr. POWER: Even though accurate news were published the complaint would still exist.

Mr. BENNETT: Agreed.

Mr. POWER: It was found impracticable to arrive at any amendment which would prevent news from being published. The hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) discussing the matter the other evening, very properly pointed out that there was no way of preventing news leaking out to the United States and being broadcast through American stations if anyone wanted to take the trouble to do it. There would perhaps be good grounds for endeavouring to suppress inaccurate information concerning the results of an election, and if, in the opinion of the house, something of that kind were necessary it might be provided for.

Mr. BENNETT: Under the penalty section.

Mr. POWER: Yes. But that also was considered by the committee.

Mr. KINLEY: It seems to me that the way to prevent inaccurate information is to publish true information, and that is what would result if the amendment passed. All the members from Nova Scotia are opposed to the section, and in favour of the amendment, and the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks) the only Conservative member in the house from the maritimes, is also in favour of the amendment. After all, Canada is an extensive country, and we cannot have elections without difficulties. It is a long distance from the maritimes to British Columbia and we contend that it should be possible for us to vote during the day. Between six and seven it is getting dark and voting is difficult in the rural sections. Moreover, that is a time of day when any excitement that has been brewing during the day might culminate. It is also a time when people are at supper, especially the working man. I do not think any real trouble results from the existing hours of voting and the members from Nova Scotia, I believe, are unanimously in favour of the amendment.

Mr. STEWART: In answer to the contention of the hon. member as to voting in the dark—

Mr. POWER: That is not confined to the other side of the house.

Mr. STEWART: —that has not often happened. I never thought that the people of Nova Scotia were afraid to go home in the dark. If they wish to vote before darkness overtakes them, there is nothing to prevent their doing so; they can go and vote before it is dark. The fact that the poll is open an hour later does not compel anyone to wait until the last minute or until the last hour to go and vote.

Mr. POWER: Counting the ballots in the dark might present some difficulties.

Mr. STEWART: That has been done, too. But they have light in Nova Scotia as well as in Quebec and Ontario. In the committee there was no division of opinion whatsoever that there was an abuse there and we considered every suggestion that was calculated to overcome and to prevent it, and one after another was dropped in favour of this one as being the most effective. All I can say is that if there is an abuse—and it was admitted that there was—and if it is desirable to correct it, I cannot see any reason why we should reverse the action of the committee. Why should not this method be adopted that seems fair to all concerned? The disadvantage will perhaps be to one party in one election, and to another in some other election. It has happened so. In the committee it was freely admitted. Newspapers had been delivered to every voter as he came up to vote. A special issue had been got out and delivered to the voters announcing the results in the maritime provinces. Unfortunately, some people are influenced by their desire to follow the winning side, and I think we all agreed that there should be an absence of that sort of thing. Voting is secret individually, and it should be secret collectively. I do urge that the action of the committee, which was a reasonable compromise arrived at after careful consideration, not on one, but on several occasions, be sustained.

Mr. HEAPS: It seems that the majority of the members from British Columbia do not want this section in, and the members from Nova Scotia do not seem inclined to support legislation of this kind. I do not see, therefore, why we should attempt to force upon these provinces something that they do not want. While we are trying to remedy an undesirable condition we are likely to deprive a large number of electors in British Columbia of their right to exercise the franchise, and I do not like to be a party to any such thing, particularly after we have taken the trouble to frame an act that attempts to give everyone the opportunity to vote. We have advance polls open for many days prior to the election in order to afford a few people, comparatively speaking, an opportunity to vote. These polls are open in the evenings as well as in the day and we keep them open several days in the week, and yet on the one day when we ask everyone who is registered as an elector to go and vote we are going to attempt to deprive the people of British Columbia of the right by making them go and vote before five o'clock in the afternoon. In Nova Scotia they will have an opportunity of voting until seven o'clock in the evening, and I do not see why British Columbia should be placed in any inferior position in relation to the maritimes. Personally I will support the amendment so that a great many people who would otherwise be deprived of the right to vote may have that opportunity through the extra hour.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I endorse the hon. gentleman's remarks. It is not so much a question of any party disadvantage or advantage. We have reason to believe that both parties have erred in the past, but there is certainly an abuse to be remedied, and I suggest that the way to remedy it is not to consider the advantage of any party at the expense of the voters who cannot vote by five o'clock in British Columbia. We are working a gross injustice on the working community as far as British Columbia is concerned, if we do not accept the amendment of the hon. member for New Westminster. We should consider some alternative remedy which would not deprive working people of their franchise.

Mr. DONNELLY: It is not only the people of British Columbia that are affected but also the people of the prairies, because we are suffering from the same condition at the present time. It is a very undesirable condition. In every village and every polling booth in every constituency in western Canada—or at any rate in Saskatchewan and in my constituency—from four until six o'clock people flock around the radio listening to the election returns from Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick. Whether the news is true or false, the returns are coming in, and people coming intending to vote are influenced. I do not know whether this is the best way to remedy it but this condition exists and is very undesirable, and anything that can be done to remedy it should be done.

Mr. STIRLING: This matter was carefully considered in the committee, not once or twice but three times. It does not appear to me that there will be suffering at either end of Canada. But it is an attempt to right a wrong which undoubtedly exists. I should very much like to see it tried. It is not such an unthinkable thing that an act should be amended when it is proved that it is not working satisfactorily. In the maritimes it does not seem to me to be an injustice that the polls should be kept open until seven o'clock. Voters do not have to wait until six-thirty to vote; they can vote when it suits them. In British Columbia, with the facilities given for voting, I cannot see that it is any deprivation of rights. This is a definite attempt to right a wrong, which has worked both ways in the past, and I think it should be tried.

Mr. MacNEIL: I protest against this determination to deal with the estimated effect of advance news in the west at the expense of thousands of voters in British Columbia. I am confident that all hon. members representing constituencies on the lower mainland of British Columbia could demonstrate that it is a physical impossibility for thousands of workers there to vote before five p.m. The point has been made that modern transportation facilities enable them to travel to the polls within the space of two hours. That completely overlooks the fact that the homes of many of these workers are separated from their place of employment by Burrard inlet. It is a question not only of street car connections, but also of ferry connections. It is a question not of speed of transportation but of making definite connections at certain hours. Large communities are almost entirely populated by workers employed in Vancouver city who find it impossible to vote before six o'clock. In fact any of us who have had experience in elections on the north side of Burrard inlet know that plans have to be organized to enable the electors to reach the polls just prior to six o'clock. That is when the heaviest vote is polled. To force this clause through would definitely disfranchise whole blocks of voters in certain sections of the lower mainland of British Columbia; of that there is no doubt. Surely it is the height of folly. No one knows what the effect of advance news may be. It may be desirable to take steps to correct that situation, but I urge the committee not to take a step which would involve the disfranchisement of thousands of voters in British Columbia.

Mr. BOTHWELL: It is perhaps fair to explain that the special committee devoted considerable time to this question. We considered all the suggestions that were made —that of holding over the count in the maritime provinces until after the vote was polled in the west; that of changing hours; that of imposing a penalty for publishing reports. The committee concluded that whether this section as it appears in the reprinted bill goes through or not, we would at least be bringing to the attention of the people of Canada the need of devising some means whereby people should not be influenced by the announcement of results in some parts of Canada before the polls are closed in other parts. The amendment proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster is that we revert to the old form. While as chairman of the committee I am staying with the report of the committee and voting for the clause as it stands, I can readily understand that with opposition from both east and west the report may not be accepted.

Mr. STEWART: Replying to the statement of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), and for the information of other members of the committee, I think it only fair to point out that two hours of the day without deduction of pay are free to people employed in factories and industries to enable them to go and vote. I suggest that whether it be in Vancouver or elsewhere, with an hour available for lunch and two hours off, any voter can go to the polls and record his vote. The committee considered the possible disfranchisement of voters, and not much weight was given to that in view of the time allowed for voters to go and vote.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Notwithstanding the two hour provision in the act I have personally known scores of voters to be disfranchised in Vancouver even at six o'clock.

Mr. BARBER: A large number of people wait until the last hour to vote. If the poll opened at seven o'clock in districts with which I am familiar, a large number would vote before eight o'clock, because they go some distance away to work and they leave about eight o'clock to be on the job at eight-thirty. Often these people do not care enough about voting to come back before six o'clock; they say: If we cannot vote before eight o'clock we are not going to vote. That happens to a large extent in British Columbia.

Mr. ROBICHAUD: As a member of the committee I was strongly opposed to the subsection and reserved my right to vote against it. I warned the other members of the committee that it would be strongly objected to by hon. members from the maritimes. As the chairman of the committee said, alternatives were considered by the committee. One I suggested myself, that the polls close at six o'clock everywhere, but that deputy returning officers in the polling divisions in the maritime provinces should not give out the results of the poll before eight o'clock. Some hon. members thought the people would be impatient to know the results, but they would get used to that. Another suggestion was to prohibit the transmission of results in the maritime provinces by radio, telegraph or telephone. Some people say there would be a leak. I think we could at any rate prevent results from being published in the newspapers. And if there should be a leak we would not be any worse off than we have been in the last fifty years. Why not try that? Why not put a provision in the act prohibiting the publication of election results in the east? If it does not work, we can come back to this synchronising of hours.

Mr. GREEN: I wish to concur in the remarks just made by the hon. member for Kent (Mr. Robichaud). I cannot understand why these two alternate schemes cannot be tried. I agree with the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) that it is unfair to close the polls in British Columbia as early as five o'clock, that it might disfranchise many voters; but even yet I do not understand why the results in the maritimes could not be held for two hours and why it could not be made an offence to send out news as to the results of an election until the polls have closed right across Canada. It does seem to me that would do a great deal to help the people in eastern Canada realize just how large this country is, and to remember that there is a great western part of Canada.

Mr. RINFRET: I come from a part of the country which is not influenced by reports either from the east or from the west, but it strikes me that if there is anything in the question now under consideration there is a difficulty either way. I quite appreciate the point made by some hon. members that by closing the polls too early you might deprive a number of working people of their opportunity to vote; but if there is anything in this contention at all it would mean that a large number of electors wait until four o'clock to go to the polls, in order to learn what has happened at the other side of the country. There is a danger that a large number of electors may be blocked out of the polls by presenting themselves in the late hours. If that is not so, then we are not discussing anything at all, because it would only deal with a few electors who would be waiting for those results. Unless there is a large number of electors waiting for the results from the east, the question really has no practical value. So far as I am concerned I would rather favour the report of the committee closing the polls at different hours, but I would see that section 48, which requires employers to give adequate time to their employees to go and vote, was properly enforced.

Mr. HARTIGAN: So far as the east is concerned we must take two things into consideration. The first is that in the extreme east, if we have an election in the spring or winter or fall it is practically dark at four o'clock. From four o'clock until seven o'clock it is going to be hard to keep our polls open. If a man is at a poll from eight o'clock in the morning until six o'clock at night that is long enough to ask him to stay in charge of the balloting; and in the last hour, from six to seven, there is going to be a chance for all kinds of corruption and all sorts of things to take place which may have a deleterious effect in many campaigns in that end of the country, because people are so accustomed to having the polls close at six o'clock. I am speaking from a practical point of view, and probably I am only saying what other hon. members are thinking. That is a fact. Then there is the question of expense. The candidate has to supply lunch at the noon hour, and now he will have to supply two meals.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HARTIGAN: That is all right; those are election expenses. You cannot expect a man to remain at a poll all day without something to eat, and somebody has to pay for it. I am sure the man himself is not going to do so. I am not so much concerned with that, however; I am only mentioning it as an additional cost that will have to be incurred. The geographical position is no reason why the east should be penalized and forced to hold back information which may or may not have an effect on the west or the central part of Canada. It works out the same for both parties; it does not make any difference whether it is the Liberal party, the Conservative party, the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation or anything else. It would be an intolerable situation in eastern Canada to have the polls kept open until seven o'clock.

Amendment (Mr. Reid) agreed to: yeas, 75; nays, 36.

Mr. STEWART: Would it not be well now to consider one of the alternatives that were suggested in the committee in order to bring about the very desirable result which the committee had in mind? We have disposed of the suggestion that was adopted by the committee. Now let us see if we cannot agree on something else, because we all admit that something should be done.

Mr. POWER: What does my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. STEWART: I suggest that we hold the returns; that is the next best thing. I believe such a section was drafted, and we might allow a section to stand where that might be put in.

Mr. POWER: I do not believe there has been any draft of an amendment to hold the returns.

Mr. STEWART: There was a draft before the committee; they had drafts of all three propositions. If the minister does not think that is a good suggestion—and apparently he does not—then let us draft a clause that will prevent the publication, which is the third best solution. That amendment was drafted also.

Mr. POWER: Yes, that was drafted, and I have it here. A section was drafted to deal with the first suggestion made by the hon. member for Leeds, to this effect:

In the provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick at the hour of eight o'clock in the afternoon; in the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba, at the hour of seven o'clock in the afternoon; and in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia—

That was the time at which the counting and reporting was to be done. That would really mean holding the return in the polling booth, I take it. I am sorry to disagree with my hon. friend, but I do not think that is a practical means of accomplishing that end. I do not believe it is at all possible. I would not want to make any invidious comparisons between one province and another with respect to their interest in elections, but I am quite sure that in my own province, if the polls closed at six o'clock, it would be almost impossible to ask the electors, waiting outside for the results, to remain there patiently until eight o'clock, when the deputy returning officer would announce them. I fear that with the well known public spirit of our friends from Nova Scotia and New Brunswick there would be no possibility of holding the results. Some way would be found of signalling outside. It must not be forgotten that in the polls there are two scrutineers from each party, a poll clerk, and a deputy returning officer, making a total of six persons. Does anyone seriously think those six men would sit around for two hours after they counted the vote and not endeavour to communicate the information to someone outside?

Mr. STEWART: The suggestion was that the ballot boxes should not be opened, so that they could not communicate the information.

Mr. POWER: That they would not count the ballots?

Mr. STEWART: Yes.

Mr. POWER: That would be still worse.

Mr. STEWART: Why?

Mr. POWER: Because idle hands will find evil to do. I would be very much afraid of that. Personally, with all the desire in the world to meet the wishes of hon. members, I do not think it can be done.

The other amendment submitted to the committee is in these words:—

No person, company or corporation shall in any province before the hour of closing of the polls in such province publish the result of the polling in any electoral district in Canada, whether such publication is by radio broadcast, or by newspaper, news-sheet, poster, billboard, hand bill or in any other manner. Any person contravening the provisions of this section (and in the case of a company or corporation any person responsible for the contravention thereof) is guilty of a corrupt practice and of an offence against this act.

In the first place, the hon. member for Leeds admitted the other evening that this could be circumvented by giving the news to someone in the United States, across the river from St. Stephen, New Brunswick. Immediately it could be flashed across to the Pacific coast, and could easily be broadcast from Seattle, if anyone wished to take the trouble to get the information to British Columbia. I do not think the broadcasting of news could be prevented.

In the second place, from the point of view of public policy there would be grave objections, in that we would be seriously interfering with a free press. After all it is a serious matter, and perhaps a greater amount of abuse than that now existing would be necessary to warrant the parliament of Canada preventing newspapers from publishing accurate news. That may be allowed in some sections of Canada, but it should not be confirmed; nor should it be sanctioned by the parliament of Canada.

Mr. STEWART: I am sorry to see that the minister, who some weeks ago was so ardent in the desire to have elections properly conducted and to have legislation introduced to that end, is now throwing up his hands in complete surrender and saying, "We cannot do anything to cure what we all admit is an abuse." That is the attitude of the minister in charge of the bill.

On Friday evening I did say it was possible to have a communication in the manner now outlined by the minister, and that to some extent such communication would nullify the accomplishment of the object we have in view. I do believe however that the suggestion made would prevent a recurrence of what happened in British Columbia in connection with the delivery of special editions of a newspaper. All I said was that we had not extraterritorial jurisdiction and could not prevent an announcement being made by radio from the city of Seattle and penetrating into British Columbia. However that is only one aspect of it. In my view the greatest abuse was in the issuing of special newspaper editions which were delivered to the voters as they came to the polls.

Mr. POWER: With false information.

Mr. STEWART: I do not know whether it was false or accurate; the point is that it was done with the object of influencing the vote in that province at the election. Whether the information or the news is false or accurate, if the object is illegal or improper, then it should not be done. I am sorry the minister seems to lie down before what he thinks is a difficulty, and does not propose to do anything about it.

Mr. POWER: I cannot do any more than the committee did. The committee had the solution.

Mr. STEWART: One of those suggestions the minister discounts, and believes to be of no value. I will move as an amendment to section 31—

Mr. POWER: I do not think it would come under section 31.

Mr. BOTHWELL: I suggest that the amendment might be made to subsection 1 of section 50. The amendment contains the words:

In the provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, at the hour of eight o'clock in the afternoon, in the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba, at the hour of seven o'clock in the afternoon, and in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia—

And these words would come before the word "immediately."

Mr. STEWART: That is not the amendment I have in mind.

Mr. POWER: The hon. member is referring to publication?

Mr. STEWART: It seems to me the amendment which has the best chance of carrying, and which I now propose, would not come under that section. I do not know where it might be placed.

Mr. POWER: We have a section dealing with offences.

Mr. STEWART: But I believe that has been passed.

Mr. POWER: Yes. However, we could pass the other sections, and when we come to consideration of offences the hon. member would have an opportunity to propose his amendment.

Mr. STEWART: Under what section should it be proposed?

Mr. POWER: If the hon. member wishes we may now deal with it informally. I suggest that although the sections dealing with offences have been passed we might consider the hon. member's suggestion as an additional offence, when we are considering the last section. I would offer the compromise that it would be possible to draft a section providing that the publication knowingly of inaccurate information with respect to the results of an election would be an offence. I should be willing to go that far, if it would be satisfactory.

Mr. STEWART: That does not amount to anything. How would it be possible in court to prove that a man knowingly published inaccurate information?

Mr. POWER: There must be intent and mens rea in every criminal case.

Mr. STEWART: The accused person would say he got the information from A or B, and that he believed it to be accurate. That would be a sufficient defence.

The CHAIRMAN: Is section 31 as amended agreed to?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The reasons given by the minister for refusing to accept the suggestion that the ballot boxes be kept locked for two hours after the close of polling booths are not substantial. He has said that Satan will find mischief for idle hands to do, but that suggestion does not meet the situation. There is nothing to prevent the scrutineers representing all candidates from remaining in the room with the ballot boxes, the boxes to remain locked. There could be no interference with them any more than there would be during the day. The minister might as well suggest that because at some hour in the day there were no voters on hand, someone would tamper with the ballot boxes. The boxes can be left in the booths and at the end of a two hour period the votes can be counted. I am informed that in the county communities of Great Britain the results of the polls are not announced until ten o'clock on the morning of the day after the ballots have been cast.

Mr. POWER: That is true.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In view of the fact that in the last election the present condition worked a decided hardship on people in western Canada, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Wood Mountain (Mr. Donnelly), I do suggest some change should be made. Right across the street from where people were voting in my constituency was a huge sign on which were the words, "Liberal landslide in the east." It might just as well be a Conservative or a C.C.F. in the next election. It is bound to have a psychological effect on the voter who is going to cast his ballot.

Mr. EULER: Not very complimentary to the voter.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I submit that there has been no reasonable objection advanced against an amendment to section 50.

Mr. POWER: I have no objection to my hon. friend moving the amendment I have sent to him when we come to section 50.

Section 31 as amended agreed to.

Mr. HEAPS: Mr. Chairman, have we passed section 14 in toto?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: What did we do with paragraph (k) of section 14?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That was carried.

Mr. HEAPS: Is there any objection to reopening that section?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No; it is carried.

Mr. HEAPS: Some hon. members say no, but as the minister knows we took objection to that paragraph last week, and with the consent of the committee I should like to revert to section 14, to move an amendment to paragraph (k). We objected very strenuously last week to this provision which deprives people in old folks' homes from casting their ballots on election day. There was a division of opinion in the committee whether the clause should be in or not. What the clause really does is to say that in provinces where people in these institutions are not allowed to exercise the provincial franchise they shall not be allowed to exercise the franchise in federal elections. I have very strong objections to any legislation which would take away from people the right to vote, for no other reason than that they are old and in poverty. As most hon. members are fully aware of the implications of this clause, I now move—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. Section 14 has been adopted by the committee, and before any motion to amend the section can be made the previous motion for its adoption will have to be rescinded.

Mr. HEAPS: I thought I had consent to reopen the section.

Mr. POWER: I have no objection.

Mr. HEAPS: The minister has no objection, but if the committee objects I shall have to move my amendment on the third reading, and it might as well be done now. If there are hon. members who support the principle of disfranchising these people because they are poverty stricken and happen to be in these institutions, they can so vote, but personally I am not in favour of any such thing. Consequently I am going to move that paragraph (k) of section 14—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. HEAPS: I hope some hon. members know how to behave themselves. They pay an occasional visit to the chamber and then try to cause a disturbance when they come.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member can move his amendment only by unanimous consent, and I understood consent was not given.

Mr. HEAPS: I thought I had consent to reopen the clause.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. HEAPS: I ask for your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. POWER: Let the hon. member go ahead and move his amendment.

Mr. HEAPS: I move that paragraph (k) of subsection 2 of section 14 be deleted.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Mr. Chairman, this provision was inserted at the request of the special committee itself. It was not in the original draft bill and the committee adopted it from some previous act. During the discussion in the special committee it was brought out that these homes are established for the purpose of taking care of people from all over a province and that the inmates are not necessarily residents of the constituency in which they are at the moment residing. For instance, you will probably find in any one of these institutions more people from other constituencies than from the one in which the home is established. Evidence was given as to the mentality of some of these people and the possibility of influence being brought to bear upon them, with the result that you might have a whole institution vote en bloc instead of exercising individual freedom of thought and action such as we expect from electors. The committee, having given the matter careful consideration, came to the conclusion that it was not fair either to the candidates in the constituency in which the home was established or to the people of Canada generally, to allow the franchise to be extended to inmates of these institutions.

Mr. FAIR: A number of members fought in the committee to have this provision excluded, and I believe the fight should continue until the clause is deleted. Speaking to this clause I told the special committee and also the committee of this house that if everybody got what he deserved, there would not be nearly as many people in these old folks' homes; many people who are now outside would be not in old folks' homes but in buildings guarded with iron bars. We should not for one moment consent to a clause of this kind going through. I take much pleasure in supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps).

The CHAIRMAN: It will be necessary, before the amendment can be moved, to have a motion that the previous motion for the adoption of clause 14 be rescinded.

Mr. POWER: Could we not, by consent of the committee, make a short-cut, Mr. Chairman, and allow my hon. friend to move his amendment so that we may dispose of it one way or the other?

The CHAIRMAN: By consent, the question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North.

Amendment (Mr. Heaps) negatived.

[Mr. Power.]

On section 46—Manner of voting, by qualified voter whose name is not on the list in a rural polling division.

Mr. POWER: In accordance with the agreement arrived at by all parties, I move that the word "ordinarily" in line 33, page 60, be deleted.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 47 agreed to.

On section 49—Loud speakers, ensigns, banners, etc., prohibited on polling day.

Mr. POWER: An amendment was suggested by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) who thought it was unfair and unjust to prevent people from celebrating by carrying banners around after the polls closed. In view of the fact that a great many of us expect to win the next election we do not want to be deprived of that right. I therefore move:

That the words "within any electoral district on the day of the election and on the day immediately preceding it" in the fiftieth and fifty-first lines of page 63 be deleted, and the following substituted therefor: "on the day immediately preceding the day of the election and before the closing of the polls on the day of the election."

I also have to move a similar amendment as regards lines 45 and 46 on page 63. This will permit of the carrying of banners, loud speakers, ensigns and sets of colours as much as we like on election night after the polls are closed.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 50—Counting the votes by the deputy returning officer.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I move:

That the following be inserted before the word "immediately" in the twenty-first line on page 69:

"In the provinces of Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, at the hour of eight o'clock in the afternoon, in the provinces of Quebec, Ontario and Manitoba, at the hour of seven o'clock in the afternoon, and in the provinces of Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia."

Mr. STEWART: To make that consistent would you not have to strike out "immediately after the close of the poll"?

Mr. POWER: No. It would read: "In the provinces of so and so, at eight o'clock; in other provinces, at seven o'clock; and in British Columbia, immediately after the close of the poll."

Amendment negatived.

Section agreed to.

Mr. POWER: If the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) will now move his amendment, we will ask the clerk, if it is carried, to insert it in the proper place in the bill. It will constitute one of the offences.

Mr. STEWART: Two suggested remedies for what we all admit is an abuse having failed of adoption, there is nothing left but to propose the third best, the only remaining one, I believe, which was considered by the committee. I move:

That the following be added as section 107A: No person, company or corporation shall, in any province before the hour of closing of the polls in such province, publish the result of the polling in any electoral district in Canada, whether such publication is by radio broadcast, or by newspaper, news-sheet, poster, billboard, handbill or in any other manner. Any person contravening the provisions of this section (and in the case of a company or corporation any person responsible for the contravention thereof) is guilty of a corrupt practice and of an offence against this act.

Mr. NEILL: Would the hon. member be willing to substitute the words "illegal practice" for "corrupt practice"? For the latter a very severe penalty is provided, and it might affect a candidate quite innocent of wrongdoing.

Mr. STEWART: I do not know whether there is any definition of "illegal practice".

Mr. NEILL: It is defined in section 77.

Mr. STEWART: In the interpretation section "corrupt practice" is defined.

Mr. NEILL: Yes. "Corrupt practice" is much more serious. In section 77 the same language is used in connection with attacks on a man's character.

Mr. POWER: That would be the relevant section.

Amendment (Mr. Stewart) agreed to: yeas, 54; nays, 37.

Mr. NEILL: Did the hon. member accept my suggestion that we should use the word "illegal"?

Mr. STEWART: I have no objection. So long as it is made illegal, that satisfies me; it puts the stamp of disapproval on it.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: It has been moved that the word "corrupt" be struck out and the word "illegal" substituted therefor. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the title carry?

Mr. HEAPS: With the permission of the committee I would ask that section 106 be reconsidered. It deals with the question of signed pledges by candidates and prohibits a candidate from signing any sort of document that might be placed before him by the electors during an election. I think this provision goes altogether too far, because it takes away from the electors certain rights that they now possess and ought to possess. During an election a legitimate question might be asked a candidate. For instance, he might be asked whether he was in favour of railway unification, but if such a question were put to him it might involve an offence both on the part of those who put the question and on the part of the candidate himself. According to my reading of the section the electors would be prevented from asking a candidate any question along those lines. Perhaps the minister himself will admit that the section is too wide. If a request were made of a candidate for a contribution to bazaars or things of that sort, provision might very well be made against it in the statute. But when it is proposed to prevent legitimate questions being put to candidates in order to elicit an opinion on definite questions of policy, then I say it is going too far and I ask that the section be reconsidered. It should not be as drastic as it is.

Mr. POWER: I presume my hon. friend has the consent of the committee. Has he moved an amendment?

Mr. HEAPS: No; I should like the minister to do that.

Mr. POWER: This section is one which I myself suggested and therefore I am more in sympathy with it than I have been with some of the clauses for which I have been voting this afternoon. It arises out of a practice, which is too common, of certain groups, largely minorities, endeavouring to further their cause by asking candidates to sign questionnaires, pledges and so on. In my opinion that is distinctly undemocratic in that it makes of the elected member not a representative of the whole dominion but a mere delegate of a class or group or section. I may be expressing a rather old-fashioned theory of democracy, and perhaps it is; but in looking over the history of the past, from which, after all, we derive most of our institutions and some of the things that are best in life, I find that in 1774, Edmund Burke, the Irish statesman, having been confronted with a similar situation in his election in the county of Bristol, had this to say—and I think I had better quote his remarks in their entirety, because he states far better probably than any member of this house can the views that many of us hold. Speaking of his colleague he says:

He tells you that "the topic of instructions has occasioned much altercation and uneasiness in this city"; and he expresses himself (if I understand him rightly) in favour of the coercive authority of such instructions.

Certainly, gentlemen, it ought to be the happiness and glory of a representative to live in the strictest union, the closest correspondence, and the most unreserved communication with his constituents. Their wishes ought to have great weight with him; their opinion high respect; their business unremitted attention. It is his duty to sacrifice his repose, his pleasure, his satisfaction, to theirs; and, above all, ever, and in all cases, to prefer their interests to his own. But his unbiased opinion, his mature judgment, his enlightened conscience, he ought not to sacrifice to you, to any man, or to any set of men living. These he does not derive from your pleasure; no, nor from the law and the constitution. They are a trust from providence, for the abuse of which he is deeply answerable. Your representative owes you, not his industry only, but his judgment; and he betrays, instead of serving, you if he sacrifices it to your opinion.

My worthy colleague says his will ought to be subservient to yours. If that be all the thing is innocent. If government were a matter of will upon any side, yours, without question, ought to be superior. But government and legislation are matters of reason and judgment, and not of inclination; and what sort of reason is that in which the determination precedes the discussion? in which one set of men deliberate and another decide? and where those who form the conclusion are perhaps three hundred miles distant from those who hear the arguments.

Mr. BARBER: Three thousand miles.

Mr. POWER:

To deliver an opinion is the right of all men; that of constituents is a weighty and respectable opinion, which a representative ought always to rejoice to hear, and which he ought always most seriously to consider. But authoritative instructions, mandates issued which the member is bound blindly and implicitly to obey, to vote and to argue for, though contrary to the clearest conviction of his judgment and conscience; these are things utterly unknown to the laws of this land, and which arise from a fundamental mistake of the whole order and tenor of our constitution.

Parliament is not a congress of ambassadors from different and hostile interests, which interests each must maintain, as an agent and advocate, against other agents and advocates; but parliament is a deliberative assembly of one nation with one interest—that of the whole: where, not local purposes, not local prejudices ought to guide, but the general good, resulting from the general reason of the whole. You choose a member, indeed; but when you have chosen him, he is not a member of Bristol, but he is a member of parliament. If the local constituent should have an interest or should form a hasty opinion, evidently opposite to the real good of the rest of the community, the member for that place ought to be as far, as any other, from any endeavour to give it effect. I beg pardon for saying so much on this subject. I have been unwillingly drawn into it, but I shall ever use a respectful frankness of communication with you. Your faithful friend, your devoted servant, I shall be to the end of my life; a flatterer you do not wish for.

That I think is a model of what members of parliament should write to their constituents. I read it not for the purpose of reading a lesson to hon. members, but in order to support the suggestion which I made to the committee and which is incorporated as section 106. It is based on the democratic theory and doctrine laid down by Edmund Burke, a good man in his day.

Mr. HEAPS: I did not think I should have to answer Edmund Burke here this afternoon. I though the minister was a little more up to date. Edmund Burke was an illustrious statesman in his day, a hundred and fifty years ago, but conditions to-day are different. When he was seeking the favours of his constituents in Bristol the franchise was very limited. A handful of electors would elect a member of parliament. Furthermore the franchise was such that they could do almost anything they wanted in an election. In these days with adult suffrage the situation is very different. To-day everyone of the age of twenty-one and over has the right to vote, so there are more people interested in public questions than there were a hundred and fifty years ago. I am surprised that a member of the government who prides himself on his liberalism, as does the minister, should go back a hundred and fifty years for his authorities. If he desired to come a little closer home I am sure he could give a great many reasons why a clause of this kind should not be in the act, depriving the electors, as it does, of the freedom which should be theirs.

Mr. POWER: It has been pointed out to me by one of my hon. friends that those remarks do not come very well from an hon. member whose faith is based on the ancient scriptures.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Order. I must point out that all this discussion on section 106 has been out of order. Section 106 was carried in the committee some three days ago. All sections of the bill and all schedules have been adopted by the committee. Shall I report the bill?

Mr. COLDWELL: No, Mr. Chairman. The other evening sections 59 to 106 of the bill were carried in a few minutes just before eleven o'clock.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Each section was called separately and declared carried.

Mr. COLDWELL: But they were rushed through very quickly and most of us did not have an opportunity to read the bill. With all the work that has had to be done during the past week or ten days we have not had a chance to follow all the bills. I would say—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: The hon. member may proceed if he has unanimous consent.

Mr. COLDWELL: Perhaps I can best state what I want to say by simply reading a telegram which I have received from Saskatoon, from the secretary of the trades council:—

> Saskatoon trades council views with alarm report of action of committee studying new election act in approving of principle whereby it will be an offence for a candidate to sign a questionnaire or pledge binding himself to any specific action and also making an offence for candidate to pledge himself to promote the expenditure of public money on behalf of any person, group of persons or organizations.

Mr. POWER: That unfortunately did not pass.

Mr. COLDWELL: The telegram continues:

> Labour in common with other democratic bodies insists on the right to demand from candidates of all denominations that they pledge themselves if elected to certain courses of definite action. On the suggested change railway workers would be deprived of the right to ascertain whether or not candidates were in favour of amalgamation. Labour could not ascertain if candidates were in favour of and would pledge themselves to support necessary social legislation. Under second clause no candidate could pledge himself to fight for a work and wages program or for adequate relief for unemployed or for the furtherance of state hospitalization or a hundred other pieces of legislation all of which must entail the spending of public money. We therefore request that you use every effort to see that these suggested changes are not put into effect.

I am not sure whether this clause is intended to be as wide in its effect as the interpretation put upon it by the Saskatoon trades council. If it is, I would say it is taking from the electors the right to ascertain the views of candidates seeking election. On the other hand if the clause is simply designed to make this parliament a more representative institution and less a body of delegates, there is not the objection to it that the Saskatoon trades council take. I would ask the minister—

Mr. POWER: Why not read the clause yourself?

Mr. COLDWELL: I have read the clause and I would say that it may be subjected to a much wider interpretation than many hon. members place upon it.

Mr. FACTOR: May I interrupt to point out the qualifying words in line 14?

> . . . if such document requires such candidate to follow any course of action that will prevent him from exercising freedom of action in parliament. . . .

In other words the section prohibits any candidate from selling himself on certain questions. That is what it amounts to.

Mr. COLDWELL: If that is the proper interpretation, the objection that the Saskatoon trades council take is not so well founded. But other interpretations can be placed upon it.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I strongly support the bill as this section stands. I have been a sufferer under the very circumstances. When I was elected I told those who were in the committee room that I now represented not only those who had voted for me but the whole of the voters in my constituency, and the whole of the voters in the Dominion of Canada. Immediately two of the committee members came forward and demanded from me a retraction of my statement. Those two are now members of the communist party, one of them being secretary of that party in Nanaimo. These are all matters of sincere concern to me; and if there are any who tell me that I have to think and act as they declare, then I am not going to stand as a member of parliament or any other similar body.

Mr. NEILL: Since so many hon. members are saying a few words perhaps I may be allowed to do the same thing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. NEILL: I claim the same privilege that has been granted the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, the hon. member for Winnipeg North and the hon. member for Nanaimo.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: It has not been the chairman who has granted permission; it has been the committee.

Mr. NEILL: I am rising to a point of order. The minister in charge of the bill has been kind enough to allow us to revert to various sections, and he can hardly refuse to do so now that he is so near the end. In any case, I am going to be brief.

At the risk of disagreeing with Edmund Burke I support the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North. There is one thing that strikes me as peculiar and ridiculous. When they were passing a regulation of this kind why on earth did not the committee make it an offence for people to ask for such an illegal signature? They put the blame on the wretched candidate. If he does not sign it he will be called a coward, and if he does sign it he is liable to be unseated.

Mr. POWER: That was my original proposal.

Mr. NEILL: The minister should have stuck to it and made it an offence for people to ask for these things. Apart from that, I do not see why it should be an offence. The only way to find out what man you want to vote for is to find out his opinions; and if some people have peculiar ideas of their own the way to find out is to ask. I would point out to my fellow members that there is no obligation on us to sign these things. We can either refuse or conveniently forget or do it after the election is over, whatever is most convenient. I understand that Edmund Burke says this would lead to a man voting against his conscience. Not at all; he should not sign the paper if he is not willing to live up to it.

I would point out another matter. This is not very complimentary to our integrity. We must not sign these papers, but we can go on the hustings and promise anything, and that is all right because it is not our bond. We can make any promises, however extravagant, apparently, and get away with it; but when we are asked to put our signature to it it is all wrong, and it becomes a criminal offence. I was very much surprised when I found the clause in the bill. It is quite impracticable to force a vote on it now, because we would not get anywhere; but I should like to add my protest against this thing. I have no objection to anybody in the world coming and asking me what is my opinion, and that is really all it amounts to. But I do object to making it an offence for me to sign a paper while it is not an offence for any of these societies, some of whom I admit are cranks, to ask me to do so.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

[Mr. Neill.]

PENITENTIARIES

INCORPORATION OF COMMISSION FOR ADMINISTRATION, CONTROL AND MANAGEMENT—AMENDMENT OF EXISTING ACTS

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 175, respecting penitentiaries.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—Definitions.

Mr. REID: I would suggest to the minister that he substitute the word "bricklayer" for "miller," because I cannot conceive of any milling going on in a penitentiary. There is some bricklaying that goes on in the penitentiaries, but no milling. Under paragraph (g) the following are designated:

"trade instructors" include bakers, blacksmiths, carpenters, masons, millers, shoemakers, stonecutters, tailors and persons employed—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My hon. friend will see that this almost repeats the language of the old act. So far as possible I have avoided any changes.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Minister to have control.

Mr. PELLETIER: This clause provides:

The minister shall have the control and management of all penitentiaries and all prisoners and other persons confined therein and inmates thereof and over all matters connected therewith.

How broad a control does that give the minister concerning prisoners who have been committed to the penitentiaries for serious offences, such as murder? Does it mean that he can remit the sentence?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Only the control provided for subsequently by the details of the bill. It means that everything concerning the penitentiaries is under the supervision of the minister. In other words, the minister is responsible if anything goes wrong and deserves commendation when everything is right, which is very seldom.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—The penitentiary commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is the substantial section of the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: We have not had an opportunity to read the bill, which has just been printed, so the chairman will have to proceed a little less rapidly. Paragraph (b) of section 2 reads:

"Commission" means the penitentiary commission incorporated under this act.

Do we contemplate making it a corporation?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the usual course, is it?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This follows the English practice.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a corporation in England, in the sense in which we use that word in this country.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They are a corporate body, with power to own land and so forth.

Mr. BENNETT: The reason is that they take the title to penitentiary sites and matters of that sort. I suppose here the title is in the crown. It struck me that we are going to have great difficulty if we make the commission, as section 4, subsection 5 provides, a body corporate. A board is one thing, but this is entirely different. The board of railway commissioners is not a corporation; neither are the other boards that function.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course the harbours board is a body corporate.

Mr. BENNETT: But that is a different matter; they spend money and incur obligations.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): So will this body.

Mr. BENNETT: They are not going to incur obligations. The harbours board have outstanding securities which have to be taken care of. We do not propose here to do other than have an administrative body. However, I shall not unnecessarily take up the time of the committee. This contemplates something entirely at variance with what I gathered was said this morning by the minister. It involves the creation of a corporation, instead of a board, and it has a corporate existence as distinguished from any board which has administrative powers. I gathered that the minister wished to create an administrative board.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I do not think this is essential for the purposes of the legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: Frankly I do not either.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have no objection to moving that subsection 5 be stricken out, and that the other subsection be numbered differently.

Mr. BENNETT: The "commission" then would mean the penitentiaries commission provided under this act, instead of "incorporated." I think the minister will find that it is in his own interests that this should be so.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The amendment would be that paragraph (b) of section 2 would be amended by changing the word "incorporated"—

Mr. BENNETT: Probably it would be better to say that "commission" means the penitentiary commission "established" under the act.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The amendment would be that in paragraph (b) of section 2 the word "established" be substituted for the word "incorporated"; that subsection 5 of section 4 be stricken out, and that subsections 6, 7, 8 and 9 be renumbered 5, 6, 7 and 8.

Mr. BENNETT: That is correct.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 5 agreed to.

On section 6—Commission may perform other duties.

Mr. BENNETT: This is very broad.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, I agree.

Mr. BENNETT: I should think, if we were drawing this section, we would want to say "within the scope of the purposes for which they were established," because it is not contemplated the minister would ask them to do something wholly outside the order of business, in view of the fact that they have to spend the whole of their time in the business of the commission. The minister will appreciate the point I make.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the section might stand so that we may give it further thought.

Section stands.

On section 7—Commission to make rules.

Mr. BENNETT: In paragraph (c) of section 7 there is provision to make rules and regulations for "such other purposes as may be necessary or expedient for carrying into effect the provisions of this act." That was what I had in mind in connection with the general limitations in section 6.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Assistant commissioners.

Mr. LAWSON: Are the assistant commissioners to perform the functions now performed by inspectors of penitentiaries?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: In future there will be no inspectors?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): They will be assistant commissioners, and will do the work now done by inspectors.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Staff of commission.

Mr. BENNETT: I take it we still retain the civil service feature?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is intended?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, except as provided in other sections.

Mr. BENNETT: Do not the words "except the superintendent and inspectors" have to come out? I find that the section contains the expression:

Provided that such officers (except the superintendent and inspectors)—

And so on. It seems to me those words no longer have application, because those officials become assistant commissioners. This is copied from the old act.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is to provide that they be not transferred; they are provided for subsequently.

Section agreed to.

On section 10—Appointment of wardens, etc.

Mr. BENNETT: This section provides for the appointment of wardens, and there is no provision that they shall be dealt with in the same way as the staff of the penitentiaries branch, unless it be that the proviso covers them. It does not cover wardens, does it?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I believe section 13 makes provision.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 9 contains the words "provided that such officers (except the superintendent and inspectors)"; a warden would be an officer, would he not? Therefore he is covered by that section, and continues to act until an apopintment is made.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Section agreed to.

[Mr. Bennett.]

On section 11—Appointment of guards, trade instructors and subordinate officers.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In this section the word "commission" is substituted for the word "superintendent".

Mr. BENNETT: The section contains the words:

The commission may appoint such guards, trade instructors and other subordinate officers, employees and servants as are necessary for the service of any of the penitentiaries.

I take it that it is intended to confer the power to appoint guards.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The superintendent now has that power.

Mr. BENNETT: In connection with guards there were certain qualifications as to stature and matters of that kind, about which at times there has been a great deal of difficulty. As I understand it, the proposed commission will assume the whole responsibility.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Section agreed to.

Section 12 agreed to.

On section 13—Civil Service Act and Civil Service Superannuation Act to apply.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not intended that the commissioners shall be permitted to come within the provisions of the superannuation act?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No; they are appointed only for a term of ten years.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will know that we have had a great deal of difficulty in connection with pensions. He may find it difficult under the circumstances to get the kind of people he would like to have. I was wondering whether or not any provision of that kind had been made. I must say I think the type of man I have in mind as the type the minister will want, he will find extremely difficult to get if the man has no sense of security after the termination of his position at the end of ten years. I mention that to the minister because I am greatly concerned about it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have given a great deal of thought to that too, and I admit we have to pay a higher salary when there is no pension attached to the position on its termination. But this may be a remedy.

Mr. BENNETT: After what the minister said this morning, I no longer have a desire to do other than assist him in every way possible.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I thank my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: If he says he has to have this measure, I desire to assist him as far as I can, but I am bound to say that I think he will have great difficulty in getting the type of person he wants. I would have raised the question why he leaves the salaries to the governor in council, but I realize why. In order to get the right type of man who will have no sense of security at the end of the ten year period, the minister will have to pay very much more than he thinks he should pay having regard to other salaries in the public service.

Section agreed to.

Section 14 agreed to.

On section 15—Annual report by commission.

Mr. BENNETT: I have found a little difficulty in having annual reports in September, when the house does not meet until January, and I was wondering if it would not be possible to have a report that would be for the calendar year. Then you could change the time within which the minister must bring it before parliament and make it thirty or forty days instead of twenty-one days after the opening of the session. The minister knows how desirable it is, having regard to statistics and matters of that kind, to have the calendar year rather than a year running from the first of September. I mention that only because I had occasion not long since to read something about the comparability of statistics and the difficulties that arise when dealing with years, one ending in May, another in March, and so on, instead of the calendar year.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Does my right hon. friend know of any other branch where the reports are made for the calendar year?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. We have been endeavouring to do that in two or three cases. We do it with the railways. That is one of the things upon which we were insistent.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The only objection I see is the one mentioned by my right hon. friend, the tabling of the report after the house opens.

Mr. BENNETT: September is a long time away from January, and as it is now, we shall have the report on the penitentiaries only up to September.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I see no insuperable objection to making it the calendar year.

Mr. BENNETT: To change it might interfere with some of the other clauses, and I have no desire to do that. The minister, I think, agrees that generally it is desirable to make it the calendar year if possible.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): We shall have to amend the measure later.

Section agreed to.

Section 16 agreed to.

On section 17—To report defects.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no change here. I would take this for granted under the general powers of the commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 18—Penitentiaries of Canada, Kingston.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This and the following sections down to section 24 are unchanged.

Section agreed to.

Sections 19 to 24 inclusive agreed to.

On section 25—Rail and tram roads.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The only change here is to substitute the words "the commission, with the approval of the minister," for " the minister."

Section agreed to.

On section 26—Commissioners and assistant commissioners to have free access.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The only change is that instead of saying, "the superintendent, or an inspector under his direction," we say, "the commission or any commissioner or, under the direction of the commission, an assistant commissioner."

Section agreed to.

Section 27 agreed to.

On section 28—Duties of assistant commissioners.

Mr. BENNETT: This is the same except to substitute "assistant commissioners" for "inspectors."

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: This is also open to a possible difficulty. It says that the assistant commissioners "shall perform such other duties as the commission may direct." Obviously the duties must be within the general ambit of their powers and their position as employees.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am of the opinion this would follow naturally, but I have no objection to adding the words.

Mr. BENNETT: We might as well point it out, I suppose.

Section agreed to.

On section 29—Ex-officio justice of peace.

Mr. BENNETT: Have we the power to pass this?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If we have not, we took it in the old act, and we do it in the Indian Act.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 30—Suspension.

Mr. REID: I wonder if the minister really intends that when the warden suspends an officer of an inferior rank, the suspension shall be pending the decision of the minister. It says:

> The commission may suspend any officer of the penitentiary and the warden may suspend any officer of an inferior rank, pending the decision of the minister in each case.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The decision of the minister governs in both cases.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there not some force in the point raised by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid)? Should not an inferior officer suspended by the warden be subject to the control of the commission?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He is.

Mr. BENNETT: No; it says, "pending the decision of the minister in each case." If we follow the logic of it, it would be the commission.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course this affects the salaries. It is the same as it was.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, except this, that we have established the commission in the stead of the superintendent and the minister with respect to the administrative side of the penitentiary, and if a warden suspends an inferior officer I would think the whole purpose of the legislation would be to have the commission deal with the situation which thus arises, because we have given their by-laws and regulations the force of law, and inmates and wardens and servants are bound to obey them.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): What would my hon. friend suggest?

Mr. BENNETT: "Pending the decision of the 'commission' in each case," instead of the "minister."

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course the officers are appointed by the governor in council. I do not think we could take them completely away from the control of the minister.

Sir EUGENE FISET: Why not say, "pending the report of the commission and the decision of the minister"?

Mr. BENNETT: That would be it. It would mean that the minister would still have the final authority, and the commission would make the report to the minister. That, I think, is what the minister had in mind.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: "Pending the report of the commission and the decision of the minister in each case."

Mr. STIRLING: Will that be clear, Mr. Chairman? There are two separate matters dealt with in this clause, and for both of them the decision of the minister is finally required.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. STIRLING: Will you not have to add the words "pending the decision of the minister" to the first clause, and then in the second, repeat them after the reference to the commission?

Mr. BENNETT: I would think it would be desirable.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In both cases, though, there has to be a report, the report of the commission to the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: There should be.

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. STIRLING: How does it read?

The DEPUTY CHAIRMAN: "Pending the report of the commission and the decision of the minister in each case."

Mr. STIRLING: Well, it is hardly sense. It refers to the first portion of the clause.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The phrase, "in each case," makes it clear that it refers to both parts of the clause.

Mr. BENNETT: The point is that there is temporary suspension in both cases. That is the point which has to be met.

Mr. STIRLING: I think it should read:—

The commission may suspend any officer of the penitentiary pending the decision of the minister, and the warden may suspend any officer of an inferior rank pending the report of the commission and the decision of the minister.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is no objection to that. It would be clear, except that it looks like a repetition. But it will be all right.

Mr. STIRLING: If the minister does not think it is necessary, that is all right.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That would meet the case perfectly.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 31—Wardens to have executive control.

Mr. BENNETT: I should think the words "or of the minister" should not appear. It does not seem desirable that the minister should be giving written instructions direct to the penitentiary, because there might be a conflict between himself and the commission. The communications should be through the commission, the minister having the power to direct the commission to transmit whatever instructions he might give. I think, in view of the provisions of section 3, those last words, "or of the minister," would be unnecessary.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Except that it was in the old law. I have no objection to striking it out.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move that the words "or of the minister" in line 9 be deleted.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BENNETT: In the old act the words are "most advantageous for the penitentiary." As I recall, there was some discussion about them. Why should it not be, "most advantageous in the public interest"? We have then covered the whole situation. It is difficult to see what this means, that it is advantageous for an intangible thing like a penitentiary, whereas if you say that it is most advantageous in the public interest you have, I think, covered the whole matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is no objection to that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Section 32 agreed to.

On section 33—Security.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): "The commission" is substituted for "the minister." That is all.

Section agreed to.

On section 34—Oaths.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is no change there either, except consequential.

Section agreed to.

Section 35 agreed to.

On section 36—Deduction of pay.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): "The commission" is there substituted for "the minister" with regard to deductions from salaries of officers.

Mr. BENNETT: As the minister with his experience will realize, that caused some trouble. You do not desire a conflict between the commission and the minister. Subsection 2 reads:

The salary of any officer suspended by the commission or by the warden, shall cease during the period of his suspension; but the minister may direct payment of the same.

Inasmuch as, in the preceding subsection, the responsibility for taking action rests with the commission, would it not be desirable to state "the commission may direct payment of the same," because they are the people who are charged with administrative responsibility. This puts the minister in an invidious position, because he is then going to be subject to pressure on the part of those concerned to grant the pay. On the other hand, the commission, being responsible for the punitive action taken, should also be in a position to remedy it if the circumstances warrant.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course, suspension under section 30 is pending the decision of the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): So that if the minister decides in the last resort—

Mr. BENNETT: It is quite all right; I follow the point. Perhaps it would be better from the minister's standpoint if it were the other way—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I know that.

Mr. BENNETT: —and I think he will find in the end that likely it will be.

Section agreed to.

Sections 37 and 38 agreed to.

On section 39—Perquisites allowable.

Mr. BENNETT: The commission's report deals with matters that are affected by this section.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes, but we do not want to deal with those.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is sufficiently wide.

Section agreed to.

On section 40—Warden a corporation.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister think section 40 is desirable? I should think it would be undesirable to make the warden a corporation sole in view of the fact that we are treating the commission now as a board. To make him a corporation sole gives an ecclesiastical touch that is hardly in keeping with his office.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If my right hon. friend does not object, we will leave it. I do not think an action has ever been instituted in any court against a warden as a corporation.

Mr. BENNETT: It is an antiquated provision. I believe it goes back to the very earliest days of penal institutions, though I cannot speak positively about that. It used to be customary in some of the old legislation, and that perhaps was the idea behind the new elections act. The idea is very old. I should think it would be archaic.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I was a little afraid of becoming a corporation myself.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the minister has not done badly in that direction since I have known him.

Section agreed to.

Sections 41 to 51 inclusive agreed to.

On section 52—Warrant for removal.

Mr. REID: Should not the words "of the commission" appear after the word "chairman"?

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Mr. BENNETT: The interpretation section covers that.

Section agreed to.

Sections 53 to 56 inclusive agreed to.

On section 57—Transfer to reformatory.

Mr. BENNETT: Logically that should be the commission instead of the chairman, because the minister heretofore has had the power and we have substituted "commission" for "minister." However, I can see the purpose of the draftsman.

Section agreed to.

On section 58—If insane when received at penitentiary.

Mr. BENNETT: Should not that be the commission instead of the chairman?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It has to be signed by somebody.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be signed by the chairman. It means only the substitution of three for the opinion of one. Generally it was intended that the commission would act in cases of this kind. Inasmuch as it is named for the purposes of this bill, I do not think there is any necessity of attempting to modify it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is more routine than anything else.

Section agreed to.

On section 59—Ward for insane.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The commission will do what the minister was supposed to do.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister rather dislikes the idea of provision being made for the insane. But inasmuch as it is a temporary measure, I suppose there is no reason why it should not pass.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes. This question of insane convicts will have to be considered and dealt with separately.

Mr. BENNETT: The question has to be taken up with the provinces also. There are great difficulties about that.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It gives a good deal of trouble.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will remember the case in which they left an unfortunate on the steps of a provincial institution in one case and on the steps of a federal institution in another, each contending that the other should care for him.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I do not know whether I should admit that I was the minister in charge at the time.

Mr. BENNETT: I was very careful not to suggest that, although I happened to know it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am grateful to my right hon. friend.

Section agreed to.

Section 60 agreed to.

On section 61—Removal to asylum for insane.

Mr. McCANN: I suggest that this ought to be on the certificate of two doctors rather than just the staff doctor at the penitentiary. In some provinces the certificate of two doctors is required; for instance, in Ontario one cannot be committed to an institution for the insane except on the certificate of two legally qualified medical practitioners. This leaves too much power in the hands of the staff doctor.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The suggestion of my hon. friend is worthy of careful consideration, but I would call it to his attention that this is one of the matters with which the commission to be appointed will have to deal, come to an agreement on, make regulations, and suggest changes in the legislation if necessary. I should not like to make any changes before these matters are considered.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister given any consideration and arrived at any conclusion with respect to bringing Mr. Paterson from England for the purpose of assisting in establishing the commission? I quite followed him that we are re-enacting these sections without amendments except purely formal ones in order that the commission when established may be able to formulate its views, and we shall then pass a statute which will take the place of this. It is understood that this is a temporary arrangement to enable the commission to be appointed under this bill to make its recommendations to the minister and thereby to parliament, and among others the matter that the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) has mentioned, the whole question of the treatment of the insane, will be dealt with.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): My right hon. friend is quite right in his assumption.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister considered the question of bringing this gentleman from England?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is no decision. What is my right hon. friend's view about the matter?

Mr. BENNETT: I have had grave doubts whether the principles that govern in connection with an institution like Wormwood Scrubbs or the one at Dartmoor can be made applicable to a country like this. But the commission which saw this gentleman seemed to think very highly of him, and have recommended to the minister the desirability of his being brought here, and I would be the last man to oppose my will to that of three such distinguished criminologists and penologists as those who made the report.

Section agreed to.

Sections 62 and 63 agreed to.

On section 64—If arrangements exist with Ontario.

Mr. BENNETT: We deal in this section with the word "commission" in place of the minister, and not the chairman or vice-chairman, although I notice the chairman or vice-chairman is to take certain action in regard to signing, so I suppose it is intended that the commission as a body shall deal with one phase and the chief executive officer shall deal with the other.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes; the one thing is more important than the other.

Section agreed to.

Sections 65 and 66 agreed to.

On section 67—Hard labour.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No change except "commission" instead of "minister".

Mr. BENNETT: As the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart) points out, you are apt to hear some repercussions regarding the provision for ten hours' labour. It is an old-time section.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am resigning myself to a good deal of difficulty.

Mr. BENNETT: I expect the words "if possible" enable the warden to make it six or seven or eight hours. This section was passed at a time when the usual hours of labour were ten hours. I remember when we were passing an eight hour law here a manufacturer in a small community said, greatly to my surprise, he had never worked less than nine hours. This provides for ten hours' continuous hard labour, but the words "if possible" may do something to modify it. It may make life difficult for the minister.

Section agreed to.

Sections 68 to 84 inclusive, agreed to.

On section 6—Commission may perform other duties.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of what the minister said, that it is temporary legislation, it may pass.

Section agreed to.

Bill as amended, reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Remission service, including remuneration to members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force (to be expended under order in council, and not to exceed $1,600) for assistance to this service, and an amount of $10,900 to reimburse the Royal Canadian Mounted Police force the amounts disbursed by them in ordinary pay and allowances to their men on loan to this service, $47,060.

Mr. BENNETT: What is this about?

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): This is for the expenses of the remission service branch.

Mr. STEWART: What is the reason for the increase of over $3,000?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I think the explanation is contained in the item itself. We are reimbursing the Royal Canadian Mounted Police for the salaries of men who are on loan to us. Formerly the mounted police paid these men and we paid nothing. Now they object to having these men paid out of their own appropriation and used by the Department of Justice.

Item agreed to.

Administration of Justice—miscellaneous expenditure, $13,400.

Mr. STEWART: There is no change in this item?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No change.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would direct the attention of the Minister of Justice to the fact that there is a large delegation endeavouring to see him. I know the reply has been given that the ministers are all busy to-day; but there is a good deal of anxiety throughout the country in relation to the padlock law, and I believe the final date in that connection is July 8. Petitions are constantly coming in and resolutions being forwarded, and throughout a very large portion of Canada this law is felt to be an infringement of the rights of our citizens.

Mr. POWER: Does the hon. gentleman realize that we in this house imposed a padlock law on the press just about an hour ago?

Mr. COLDWELL: I was not here when that was done. There is a good deal of anxiety about this matter, and I should like to press the point of view that we have pressed so frequently, that we feel such a law should not be allowed to remain on the statute books of any province. So far as the power of disallowance is concerned, I do not think the Minister of Justice should take the sole responsibility for that action. As I understand it, that power is vested in the governor general in council, and it seems to me the matter should be one for the government rather than for the Minister of Justice, if I may put it in that way. In any case, we are anxious to know what is going to be done about the matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In referring to the numerous petitions that are coming in, my hon. friend has the advantage of me in that he sees only one side of the matter. I see both sides, and I have received enough petitions to fill a couple of offices in my department. However, the suggestions of my hon. friend will be very carefully considered.

Mr. HEAPS: Before July 8?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In due time.

Item agreed to.

Expenses of litigated matters, $25,000.

Mr. STEWART: This is the same amount as last year?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Annual contribution to the Canadian Law Library, London, England, $500.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is the same as last year.

Item agreed to.

Supreme Court of Canada—administration, $66,970.

Mr. BENNETT: The salaries are statutory, I take it?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Item agreed to.

Exchequer Court of Canada—administration, $34,215.

Mr. STEWART: There is no increase?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No change.

Item agreed to.

Yukon territorial court — administration, $8,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I have to direct attention to the next item, which is statutory, covering judges' salaries and travelling allowances, amounting to $2,041,600. I want to ask a few questions. First, is there any age limit for the appointment of judges to superior courts? In my time there always was a limit, which was that the appointee should not be more than sixty years of age, the reason being that if he attained the age of seventy-five he would be entitled to superannuation, having served fifteen years.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That was not in the statute.

Mr. BENNETT: The original statute provided for fifteen years. There was no provision as to age, but in practice in the department no man over sixty was appointed to a high court position. I once urged that the most distinguished member of the bar of my own province should be appointed to the bench, but he had attained an age which the late Judge Doherty felt would mean that the established rule would be contravened, so he would not appoint him. So far as I know that rule has been honoured continuously. There have been one or two exceptions with respect to county court appointments, but not many even in that regard. To discuss the question of an appointment to the bench is sometimes regarded as something which should not take place in parliament, but I need hardly say that those who have read the life of the late Lord Darling, recently published, will quite realize that it is a proper thing to discuss. When he was appointed there was a great deal of newspaper controversy as to his fitness for the position.

Recently an appointment to the high court has been made of one well advanced towards seventy years of age, or at all events well over sixty-five, according to newspaper reports. I submit to the minister that this is not quite fair to the taxpayers of the country, having regard to the effort that is being made to have the positions vacated by those who have attained the age of seventy-five. Obviously it means that if the position is to be vacated at seventy-five, a man appointed at the age of sixty-seven or sixty-eight years would have been only seven years on the bench. I am asking the minister whether the rule is a real one, or whether the practice has not been regarded as established sufficiently to warrant its being departed from, because I have always regarded it as a matter of very great importance? At one time the late Judge Doherty made it quite apparent that my efforts to appoint a very distinguished member of our bar must fail because the person named was sixty-five years of age at that time. Certainly that person was easily in some regards the most distinguished practitioner at our bar, and I always felt it was a very great misfortune that we were unable to appoint him, for he lived for many years after. I see the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Thorson) wonders whom I mean, and I would say that I refer to the late James Muir. The difficulty was a very real one. I should like to know what the rule, if there is any, is with respect to the matter.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There is no fixed rule, although there has been a practice and more particularly with regard to county court judges, where the rule as to the seventy-five year age limit prevails.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course that is only recently.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It would not be in the public interest to appoint men well over sixty years who, upon reaching the age of seventy-five years, would have the right to retire on full salary, as obtains in connection with the county court judges.

A few years ago a gentleman was appointed to the bench of the county court of the county of York, I believe it was, who was well advanced in age; but in the file I found that when he was appointed the government requested that he sign a waiver of his right to pension. Of course friends of his have asked me not to take advantage of the waiver, but I have refused to intervene and he has no pension.

This year there was an appointment to the county court bench in British Columbia. Many persons were recommended, and the person I thought should receive the appointment was about sixty-five years of age. In that case, too, I declined to recommend the appointment unless the person in question signed the same sort of waiver. That was done. When that judge reaches the age of seventy-five years he will have to retire but will not be paid a pension.

In connection with the high court there is no law compelling retirement at seventy-five years, or even making it advantageous to the incumbent to retire by drawing his full pension. The practice has always been to appoint judges not far advanced in age, or more than sixty years. I believe it would be a mistake to appoint older men not only from the point of view of the age for retirement but from the point of view of doing the work.

It is only seldom that we appoint judges over sixty years of age. There was one appointment within the last year in Ontario, and possibly that is the one my right hon. friend has in mind.

Mr. BENNETT: According to the press, I believe, he was sixty-seven, was he not?

Mr. MARTIN: He was sixty-six.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But for some years he had been engaged in quasi-judicial work, and strong recommendations were made for his appointment. I knew him as a well qualified man. I may assure my right hon. friend, however, that his age was considered as an obstacle, and it was only after careful consideration that the appointment was made. The rule that barristers on their appointment to the bench should not be more than sixty years still prevails, and I shall adhere to it as far as possible.

Mr. BENNETT: I think no more satisfactory answer could be given than that now given by the minister. However, the appointment of a man of sixty-six years has aroused considerable discussion, especially when it was pointed out that the same gentleman was the defendant in a very difficult piece of litigation. That litigation is of so serious a character that it embarrassed his brother judges to have to deal with it.

Mr. FACTOR: The action was dismissed.

Mr. BENNETT: I know, but what has that to do with the matter? The litigation is the point I am dealing with, and the court of appeal may have to deal with it; I do not know. I think it is a bad practice to appoint to the bench one who is a party to pending litigation involving issues of grave importance.

Mr. MARTIN: Would the right hon. gentleman permit me to point out that the litigation was not against the particular person in question, but by virtue of his office as securities commissioner.

[Mr. E. Lapointe.]

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point I make, and that is the reason why I say he should not have been appointed until the litigation was out of the way; because if the allegations contained in the statement of claim of an action of that kind were established, one would certainly hesitate to make such an appointment.

I have in mind an English case involving a judge of the court of appeal. He experienced great difficulty in that court, because the court had to decide against him in a matter of very great importance. In that instance he was not interested in the litigation when he was appointed.

I believe it is bad practice to make an appointment when litigation is pending. I have received communications of some importance with respect to the matter about which I intend to speak to the minister. It is too late to remedy the matter, so far as the appointment is concerned, but it is not too late to remedy a recurrence of a difficulty of that kind. I believe the statement made by the minister is one which will be received with great satisfaction by everyone. I believe he said he will endeavour to prevent such action being taken again. I point out to him the difficulty of appointing to the bench one who is a plaintiff or defendant in litigation which will necessarily have to be considered by his brethren on the bench to which he has been appointed.

It is not always easy for a Minister of Justice to know all the facts, but I am merely directing attention to the matter so that in future he may be able to make inquiries. I believe I know how easy it is not to be fully advised of all the facts. I know of one appointment I certainly wish had not been made, and had I known certain facts which at the time I did not know, the appointment would not have been made. The minister does the best he can, relies upon the answers he gets to the inquiries he makes, and treats them in good faith. But he is not always in a position to say, subsequently, that he has been fully advised regarding the matter, and if he has not been fully advised, a situation of great difficulty is sometimes created.

There is one other question, and it is one about which the late government experienced a good deal of difficulty. County court judges are supposed to reside, as indeed are the supreme court judges, somewhere near the point of their activities; I think it is within so many miles of a given place. The Judges Act with respect to high court judges is silent with respect to that requirement, but with respect to county court or district court judges there is such a provision, if my memory serves me aright. A man is appointed to a position as county court judge in county X. He resides in city A. This involves the taxpayer in somewhere between $1,500 and $2,000 a year in the travelling of the judge from city A to discharge his duties in county X. Something should be done to meet such a situation.

It will be within the memory of this committee that in British Columbia an action was brought in connection with the travelling expenses of one of the judges of the high court, and it left an unpleasant memory. I have heard of, and in fact, I had to deal with a situation in which county court judges or district court judges made arrangements between one another so that chambers would be taken and they would thereby secure the travelling expenses incident to the discharge of their duties outside their own jurisdiction. That is a plain and palpable disregard of the law. That, too, a minister of justice finds it difficult to know anything about unless it is brought to his attention. Circulars are sent to judges. They have been sent by departmental officers in an endeavour to protect the exchequer, and a word of timely warning as to what the effect of this will be, and as to the power of the government to deal with it, would, I think, be desirable.

The only reason I bring these matters to the attention of the minister at this moment is that I regard them as being of great importance; because if one does a certain thing for a period, somebody else hears about it and starts in; then you have two, and then five, and then ten; ultimately you have made on the treasury a raid for which there is no authority whatever, and this places the minister, who is entirely ignorant of the situation, in a difficult position when he has to explain, for the report of the auditor general, what authority there is for the amounts expended. Judges are in an entirely different position from others in respect to their expenses. As soon as the auditor general gets his accounts in the shape in which he requires them he pays them without question; the judge signs his little slip, puts it in the bank and gets his pay, and that is the end of the matter. Obviously the only way a minister of justice can deal with it is by circulars and by letters addressed to the judicial bench generally, making clear what their position is under the law.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Travelling expenses have to be certified by the chief justice.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, that came about by reason of a very unfortunate case of which I have heard. But there is no similar provision with respect to county and district court judges, and it leaves it open to a difficulty that I shall mention privately to the minister in connection with a case where the travelling expenses of the judge had been placed at as high a figure as over $2,000 in a single year in Ontario. I was asked in a communication to bring this matter to the attention of the minister. I shall not mention any names here.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Is that a case of recent occurrence?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and my attention was directed to the page of the auditor general's report. I shall mention it privately to the minister, because I think it serves no useful purpose to mention names with respect to a matter of this sort.

There is one other matter in connection with this item that I shall perhaps be able to mention after eight o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

FREE CONFERENCE WITH SENATE IN VIEW OF INSISTENCE ON AMENDMENTS

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): I desire to report to the house the following:

The managers on the part of the House of Commons have the honour to report that they met in a free conference the managers on the part of the senate for the purpose of further considering Bill No. 25, intituled, "An Act to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, and the amendments thereto.

The managers on the part of the House of Commons report that the following has been agreed upon as a clause to be substituted for clause 9 of the bill as added thereto by the senate:

9. No proposal shall be received in either of the provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia later than the thirtieth day of June, 1939, nor in any other province except the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta later than the thirty-first day of December, 1938: Provided that this subsection shall not apply to farmers who are soldier settlers within the meaning of the Soldier Settlement Act.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, I move that this amendment replace the senate amendment concerning which the conference was held, as section No. 9.

Mr. STEWART: I am not quite clear from the minister's explanation as to just what is the effect of the amendment with respect to Ontario.

Mr. CRERAR: There is no change so far as Ontario is concerned. The act will lapse in Ontario at the end of this year. It does so in all the provinces except in the four western provinces.

Mr. DONNELLY: When does it lapse in those?

Mr. CRERAR: In Manitoba and British Columbia, on June 30, 1939; and for Saskatchewan and Alberta the date was not fixed.

Mr. REID: Would the minister be good enough to make it clear that it does not affect soldier settlers?

An hon. MEMBER: That is in the amendment.

Mr. STEWART: Does that affect the section of the act which enables the governor in council to terminate the operation of the act in any province?

Mr. CRERAR: No, I think not.

Mr. BENNETT: The senate substituted for our discretion a positive enactment.

Mr. CRERAR: I believe the discretion still remains.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes, before that time.

Mr. CRERAR: The operation of the act can be terminated earlier.

Mr. STEWART: But it will terminate in any event on December 31 of this year?

Mr. CRERAR: That is right.

Mr. STEWART: And may be terminated earlier by proclamation?

Mr. CRERAR: That is what I understand.

Mr. LEADER: I understand that so far as Manitoba is concerned, the operation of the act will terminate on June 30, 1939.

Mr. CRERAR: That is correct.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. LEADER: Has the minister received representations from the farmers of Manitoba asking that it do not terminate—well, they did not set a limit on the date; they wished it continued in Manitoba? I have had representations, and I assume the minister has had them also, from the United Farmers.

Mr. CRERAR: So far as my memory goes, no representations have been made to me. The amendment as it stands now gives a full year's time for any farmer other than a soldier settler in Manitoba who wishes to make application for a composition of his debts, and that should reasonably meet the case. Although personally I would have been disposed to extend the time until a later date, on the whole I think it is a reasonable compromise.

Mr. BENNETT: It seems to be quite clear that the governor in council may act whenever he considers it expedient, by proclamation:

On and after a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council, no new proposal shall be made or filed by any farmer or accepted by any official receiver in any province in respect of which the said proclamation is issued.

I think it should be put in a somewhat different form, because the section of the bill, as it is now reads:

9. The said act is further amended by adding to section 11 as subsection 3, the following—

What it is proposed to put is:

No proposal shall be received in either of the provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia later than the thirtieth day of June, 1939, nor in any other province except the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta later than the thirty-first day of December, 1938: Provided that this subsection shall not apply to farmers who are soldier settlers within the meaning of the Soldier Settlement Act.

I suppose that if we merely approve that, the effect of it will be to substitute for section 3 this proposal, and I think the motion should read accordingly.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not think there is any substitution. I think the two stand side by side.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has misconceived what I am saying. We are substituting a new section 9 for the present section 9, the one I have just read, but perhaps the motion should be put in proper form by the clerk, that the proposal of the managers be accepted and that section 9 as stated be made part of the bill as subsection 3. It is purely a technical form. So long as it is in shape, that is all that is necessary.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

AUDITOR GENERAL'S OFFICE

Salaries and expenses of office, $461,405.

Mr. BENNETT: Why the increase?

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Acting Minister of Finance): The salaries of the permanent officials are increased by $56,651. There is an increase of $1,500 for printing and stationery and an increase of $2,000 for travelling expenses. Then there are two decreases, the temporaries by $25,980, and printing of annual report, $500. The difference between the decreases and the increases is $33,671, being a net increase. I have the details of the increase in the permanents and of the decrease in the temporaries, which I can read to the committee if it is desired.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

Bankruptcy Act administration, $38,320.

Mr. LOCKHART: To what extent would the superintendent of bankruptcy in the federal department insist upon action being taken by the provincial government in case there was any want of action on their part? May I have a brief explanation regarding the jurisdiction of the federal superintendent of bankruptcy over the attorneys general of the provinces.

Mr. ILSLEY: The superintendent of bankruptcy has no power over the attorneys general of the provinces, if that is the question.

Mr. LOCKHART: If, in one of the western provinces, the attorney general did not take action in a matter in which it was thought that he should, what would be the procedure in the federal department?

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the hon. gentleman indicate the class of case he has in mind in which a provincial attorney general fails to take action.

Mr. LOCKHART: No, I cannot, but I was informed that in one of the western provinces the attorney general did not take action. In that event has the federal department any power to act independently?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am very sorry, but I cannot answer the question in the absence of details. It is necessary to know to what kind of case the hon. gentleman is referring.

Mr. LOCKHART: It is a question of bankruptcy.

Mr. ILSLEY: I can only repeat what I said before. Without further details it is impossible to answer the question.

Item agreed to.

Dominion Housing Act administration, $38,400.

Mr. STEWART: There is a fairly large increase in comparison with the total. Will the minister explain?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is an increase of $1,320 in salaries of permanent officials, and an increase of $5,394 in salaries of temporaries. There is a decrease of $3,451 in sundries. The difference between the increases and the decreases is $3,263, which is a net increase.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mint, including the Dominion of Canada assay office, $275,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What was the profit of the mint last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry, I have not that information.

Mr. BENNETT: Does this item include the cost of the material with which the mint worked—silver and copper? I should hardly think so.

Mr. ILSLEY: This amount does not include the cost of material.

Item agreed to.

Old age pensions, including pensions to the blind, administration, $35,310.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister is in a position to give a short statement as to what is being done in connection with federal administration. I have received a great number of communications complaining that pensions have been paid that should not have been paid, and wondering what the federal power is doing to check these payments. At the same time how much was paid for the blind last year, as distinguished from others?

Mr. ILSLEY: The auditors of the Department of Finance are now checking the payments made by the provincial authorities. They are going through the provincial offices where the payments are made and checking them. The estimate for pensions to the blind for the current year 1938-39 is $498,900.

Mr. BENNETT: What did we pay last year?

Mr. ILSLEY: It was just started towards the end of the last fiscal year. I have not the amount here.

Mr. DONNELLY: That is just for the blind people between forty and seventy; not over seventy?

Mr. BENNETT: No, because they are counted in with the other old age pensioners.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that the estimate is to cover all pensions to the blind, including those over seventy.

Mr. BENNETT: Blind people over seventy were covered in the old act. The act of last year covered only those between forty and seventy.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am not sure about that. I could get that information.

Item agreed to.

Superannuation and retirement acts administration, $25,960.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought this was administered as part of the general administration of the finances of the country. We have the use of the money; the fund goes into the consolidated revenue.

Mr. ILSLEY: Administration is not charged against the superannuation fund, but it has to be voted.

Mr. BENNETT: Out of the general fund?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Government's contribution to the superannuation fund, $2,230,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This is really covered by statute, although it is not a statutory payment. The basis upon which it is paid is fixed by statute.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. STEWART: What is the explanation of the substantial increase, $150,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: The contribution of the government depends upon the number of contributors.

Mr. BENNETT: Rather upon the amount paid, or number and amount.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. The government contributes dollar for dollar for their contributions, and there are now more contributors.

Mr. BENNETT: And the 5 per cent increase means more, because they get more salary as they go up the list.

Item agreed to.

Public debt charges—administration of public debt, $212,355.

Mr. BENNETT: Does this still include the payments made in London for the administration there, as well as at home?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: This is for the staff here. It includes salaries, printing and stationery, insurance on securities, express, advertising and postage.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; the details of the commission for payment of interest in England are shown on page 80 of the main estimates.

Item agreed to.

Servicing of public debt—Commission for payment of interest on public debt, purchase of sinking funds, services of fiscal agents, London bill stamps, registration fees, etc., $168,981.

Mr. BENNETT: This is increased $5,500 by one item apparently; that is, the increased volume of debt. It is higher because it is on a commission basis apparently.

Item agreed to.

Subsidies and special grants to provinces—

Special grants:
New Brunswick, $900,000.
Nova Scotia, $1,300,000.
Prince Edward Island, $275,000.
Manitoba, $750,000.
Saskatchewan, $1,500,000.
British Columbia, $750,000.

Mr. PELLETIER: What are these special grants for?

Mr. ILSLEY: The amounts provided for payments to the maritime provinces are those recommended by the White commission on maritime claims. On request of the premiers of the three maritime provinces a royal commission was set up under authority of order in council of September 14, 1934, to consider and deal with the recommendation of the Duncan commission that there be a revision of the financial arrangements between the dominion government and the maritime provinces. In their report of February 8, 1935, the royal commission recommended additional annual subsidies in substitution for the interim annual subsidies recommended by the Duncan commission. For Nova Scotia the interim subsidy was $875,000; the subsidy recommended by the White commission was $1,300,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Did that not include the two?

Mr. ILSLEY: It included the whole of the Duncan commission award. To New Brunswick the amount recommended by the White commission was $900,000; to Prince Edward Island, $275,000, and these are the amounts provided for in this vote.

The grant of $750,000 to British Columbia was first provided in the main estimates for 1935-36. The grants to Manitoba and Saskatchewan were first provided in the supplementary estimates for 1937-38, to enable those provinces to continue essential services pending improvement in crop conditions and pending report of the royal commission to investigate financial powers and responsibilities of the dominion and the provinces.

Mr. PELLETIER: Why was no grant made to Alberta?

Mr. ILSLEY: That matter has been dealt with several times in the house to my knowledge. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) dealt with that fully in his budget speech of, I think, a year ago. It was referred to again in the debate on the resolution moved by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) this year and fully explained at that time.

Mr. PELLETIER: As a matter of fact the action taken is based simply upon a recommendation by the Bank of Canada that there was no need of a grant for the province of Alberta.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous grants and contributions—Royal Canadian Academy of Arts, $2,025.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): What is that for?

Mr. ILSLEY: The object of this society is to promote interest in the fine arts. The members of the academy give their services gratuitously. Free classes are held in the large centres throughout the dominion. Grants are made to Toronto and other large exhibitions.

Item agreed to.

Royal Society of Canada, $4,500.

Mr. BARBER: Would the minister explain this?

Mr. ILSLEY: The purpose of this society, founded in 1882, is to promote the study of literary and scientific subjects.

Mr. BENNETT: They give most of the money away in scholarships, medals and prizes. The grant formerly was $5,000, and ten per cent has been taken off.

Item agreed to.

Grant towards expenses of the British empire games, $5,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Where were the games this year?

Mr. ILSLEY: They were held in Australia in February, 1938. In other years they have been held at different places in the empire. In 1930-31 they were held in Hamilton, Ontario.

Item agreed to.

To provide for acquisition of land and surveys in connection with the national parkway in the Gatineau valley adjacent to Ottawa, $100,000.

Mr. LEDUC (Translation): Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the electors of Wright county, which I have the honour to represent, I wish to congratulate and thank the government for having voted $100,000 towards expropriations and survey in view of the construction of a national boulevard in my constituency.

The construction of this boulevard has been sought for many years. I am happy to note that the government appreciates the many advantages of this important project and has seen fit to vote the money required for preliminary operations.

The proposed boulevard, which will start at the Champlain bridge on the Aylmer road, will be entirely in Quebec territory and will extend through picturesque farming country to the heights of the Gatineau mountains, the beauty and grandeur of which one can admire from these Parliament buildings by directing one's eyes beyond the Ottawa river in a north-westerly direction. I do not intend, Mr. Chairman, to describe in detail the natural beauties of that section of my constituency and the numerous advantages of the proposed boulevard. Suffice it to say that it will attract visitors who will come to enjoy the wonderful scenery of the Laurentian mountains and of the country surrounding the capital city. In addition, the construction of the boulevard will provide work for many years to come to the poor unemployed of the southern part of my constituency who seek employment instead of the relief they now receive. I wish therefore to thank the government, and I hope that next year the necessary money will be voted to put the undertaking under way.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister give the committee an explanation of this item?

Mr. ILSLEY: This is to provide for the cost of preliminary surveys and the acquisition of land in connection with the general scheme of development of the Gatineau valley adjacent to Ottawa as a national parkway.

This represents the first stage in that development. Two parties are now surveying the route from the Champlain bridge north through the hills. At the moment they are in the vicinity of Meach lake. When this work is completed, final decision will be made as to the route and other details of development.

Mr. BENNETT: The route to where?

Mr. ILSLEY: Through the scenic section that it is proposed to develop.

Mr. BARBER: Is this on both sides of the Ottawa river?

Mr. ILSLEY: This applies to the north side.

Mr. STEWART: I assume that this is the matter about which the Prime Minister expressed some interest one or two sessions ago, and which he brought up for discussion at that time. Is it the intention to acquire a large area of land for the purposes of a park? The Prime Minister spoke about the timber being cut on these hills, about the hills being denuded and presenting a very bare and barren appearance, and suggested that something should be done about the matter. I remember at the time it was suggested that the federal district commission might make a general preliminary survey. What is the plan, in a general way? The minister spoke about a parkway. Is it not the intention to acquire a large area of land for park purposes?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am sorry I cannot give the hon. member any exact information as to the acreage it is proposed to acquire, but it is proposed to acquire some land on the north side of the river, up the Gatineau valley.

Mr. STEWART: While we are on this item, I should like to deal with the following item, which is statutory, covering the "maintenance of parks, parkways and plant, Ottawa and vicinity, under control of the federal district commission." As I recall it, provision was made for a grant over a number of years, payable by instalments. When does that expire, and how many more instalments are to be paid?

Mr. BENNETT: This is a statutory grant of $200,000 a year. I would not be positive, but I think it expires in 1940.

Mr. ILSLEY: My information, which I think is correct, is that in 1930 the period was extended for ten years, during which $200,000 a year was to be voted and spent.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. BENNETT: That is my recollection of the matter, though as I say I may be wrong.

Item agreed to.

General—Comptroller of the treasury's office and to authorize the civil service commission to designate what rate shall be effective, from the date of transfer, in the class into which any person is classified on transfer to the Department of Finance under the authority of section 35 of the National Harbours Board Act, 1936, $1,920,385.

Mr. STEWART: There is a substantial increase here. I notice that in 1937-38 there was a staff of 870, whereas it is now 920. How is the increase made up?

Mr. ILSLEY: If permanent and temporary employees are included, the total increase amounts to only ten. As a matter of fact, there has been a decrease. Our total number of permanents and temporaries as of April 1, 1937, was 984 and as of March 31, 1938, was 974. There was an increase in permanents from 834 to 858, but a decrease in temporaries from 150 to 116.

Mr. STEWART: Upon referring to page 82 of the main estimates I find that in 1938-39 the total is 920, whereas in 1937-38 it was 870. There is no decrease in those figures.

Mr. BENNETT: Shortly put, every increase in expenditures involves an increase in the department of the comptroller, who is responsible for the whole expenditure.

Mr. ILSLEY: The increase is in permanents. If the hon. member would look under the figure 870 he would see that in the vote for temporary assistance there is a decrease from $133,020 to $92,460. The increase is due, at least to a great extent, to making temporaries permanent.

Item agreed to.

Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act administration, $506,120.

Mr. BENNETT: This will probably not all be spent.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the act is terminated, naturally it will not all be spent.

Mr. BENNETT: Who is the salvage officer mentioned in the item for the comptroller general's office? I notice he is now under the Department of Finance, whereas he used to appear separately in the estimates. If the minister has not the information immediately available, he may let me know later.

Item agreed to.

Expenses of the royal commission to investigate financial powers and responsibilities of the dominion and the provinces, $210,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What are the total sums expended to date, and what are the commitments?

Mr. ILSLEY: The total expenditures to June 26 amounted to $209,554.43. I have the details to January 15, 1938, and I believe they will give the committee an idea of the headings under which the money is spent. It will not, however, be complete and up to date, because, as I have indicated, it goes only to January 15, 1938. The figures are as follows:

Living allowances	$ 3,255 65
Salaries	33,164 58
Travelling expenses	8,492 61
Professional services	1,679 75
Rent	720 00
Printing and stationery	3,314 85
Miscellaneous expenses	1,584 07
Advances outstanding	6,372 46
Total	$58,583 97

Mr. STEWART: Did I understand the minister to say that to June there had been an expenditure of over $209,000?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: That must include a portion of the $210,000 here appropriated?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, since April 1.

Mr. STEWART: The $210,000 for this year and the $150,000 voted last year make a total of $360,000 appropriated for the commission to the present time, or at least for the fiscal year upon which we are now entering.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the inadequacy of it which has struck me.

Mr. STEWART: It seems to me that if we spent $209,000 last year and that the amount available to the end of March was $150,000 the $210,000 this year will probably be insufficient.

Mr. ILSLEY: The $209,000 was not all spent in the last fiscal year. It was partly spent in this fiscal year. What is the hon. member's difficulty?

Mr. STEWART: If we have spent $209,000 up to June, and $150,000 of that amount was for the last fiscal year, one would almost think we had overrun the estimate of $150,000 in the expenses of last year. I am wondering whether the $210,000 will be sufficient to take care of this year's expenditures.

Mr. BENNETT: How much of the $209,000 represents expenditures out of this year's vote?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed there will be about $150,000 for the remainder of this fiscal year.

Mr. STEWART: When will this commission likely finish its labours and give us its very interesting report?

Mr. ILSLEY: It has been hoped that it would be about November of this year.

Mr. STEWART: We are all sorry to learn of the serious illness of the chairman. Is it likely that he will be replaced, or will the commission carry on with its remaining members?

Mr. ILSLEY: The commission will, I believe, carry on without replacement of the chairman. It is at present intended that this will be the case.

Item agreed to.

Insurance — departmental administration, $174,490.

Mr. BENNETT: Is this repaid by the insurance companies, or is any part of it repaid? They pay, as the minister knows.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; that is all repaid.

Item agreed to.

Expenses of work in the interests of fire prevention, $20,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the nature of this work?

Mr. ILSLEY: This work is almost entirely of an advisory educational and consulting nature, maintaining records of fire losses, preparing data upon fire prevention legislation and fire prevention methods in Canada and foreign countries with a view to establishing reasonable standards of fire safety and the standardization of fire prevention measures throughout Canada. The vote provides for the salary of J. Grove Smith, $5,220, and for clerical assistance, also printing, stationery, travelling expenses, and so forth in connection with this work.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought Mr. Smith was an employee of the Ontario government.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Do we get any contributions from the companies in respect of this item, or is it all charged against our taxes?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no contribution.

Mr. STEWART: I notice an amount of $4,320 for temporary assistance this year but no corresponding item last year. I wonder why the temporary assistance would be required this year when it was not last year.

Mr. ILSLEY: The amount of $4,320 is to provide for the salaries of an assistant fire prevention commissioner, $3,600, and of a stenographer, grade 1, $720.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mint, including the Dominion of Canada assay office—further amount required, $4,088.

Mr. STEWART: What is the further amount required for?

Mr. ILSLEY: The $4,088 is made up as follows: Reclassifications granted to twenty-one employees, $2,100; special equipment of alloy steel to be used for drawing the copper precipitate, also insulating with asbestos the duct drawing hot gases from the fine silver surveys, $1,988, or a total of $4,088.

Item agreed to.

Miscellaneous grants and contributions—Federal district commission—to provide for improvements of parks and driveways under the control of the federal district commission—further amount required, $31,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What is this for?

Mr. ILSLEY: Plans, surveys and estimates for proposed alterations and improvements to the confederation square area in Ottawa. This is a revote of funds provided last year, under the special supplementary estimates, amounting to $25,000, which was not used; also for the purchase of part of the water lots adjoining the driveway on the Ottawa river in the vicinity of the Royal Canadian Mint. These water lots are required for works to strengthen the retaining wall and for the city of Ottawa for sewer outlets to the river, the cost of the sewer, $12,000, to be shared by the commission and the city, $6,000 each.

Mr. BENNETT: What was paid for the plans?

Mr. ILSLEY: None of this has been paid for.

Mr. BENNETT: What will it cost? I thought the minister mentioned plans. The item itself says, "to provide for improvement of parks and driveways."

Mr. ILSLEY: The $25,000 is to cover the cost of plans, surveys and estimates for proposed alterations and improvements to the confederation square area in Ottawa.

Mr. BENNETT: The item as it reads is to some extent misleading. How much of this amount will be payable for the plans? The whole $25.000?

[Mr. Stewart.]

Mr. ILSLEY: We do not know. I do not think the matter is settled. Certainly nothing has been paid. I shall be glad to inquire if we have a bill for it, but I do not think we have.

Mr. STEWART: Would it be out of this item that the plans of the celebrated French landscape artist will be paid for? I understand that his work was done and a report made some time ago.

Mr. ILSLEY: My information is that payment for the work done by Mr. Greber will be made by the Department of Public Works.

Item agreed to.

Special—National battlefields commission—continuation of park development, $100,000.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the fact that we have just voted $100,000, this seems to be a special item. It concerns the city of Quebec, I take it, but I do not know where the money would be spent there.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is to complete the entrance to the park there.

Mr. BENNETT: We vote $100,000 a year.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The vote is $75,000 a year for maintenance and general administration. In addition, we spent $100,000 last year and will spend $100,000 this year to complete the work around the park.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that about the entrance to Wolfe's cove?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The entrance near the St. Louis gate. This had not been done.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought we did not spend anything on it last year, that there was no item for it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Oh, yes. Last year we spent $100,000. It was spent through national defence.

Item agreed to.

Insurance — departmental administration, further amount required, $3,600.

Mr. BENNETT: This is paid by the insurance companies?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE

Yukon territorial court — administration, $8,000.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): We were discussing this item at six o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: When the house rose at six o'clock I was directing attention to the next item, which is statutory, covering judges' salaries and travelling allowances, amounting to $2,041,600. I was referring to what I consider the undesirability of the appointment to the bench of an official who is the defendant in a lawsuit. He was appointed to the bench on about the thirtieth day of the trial, in the midst of his cross-examination. His appointment has certainly subjected the appointing power to a great deal of criticism. The action was brought against him alleging lack of authority in the delivery up of 275,000 shares of capital stock in one company and a larger number in another. On discovery he admitted he had no authority under the provincial statute to do this. He was a party defendant. The action was tried by, I believe, Mr. Justice McTague, and it lasted longer than any trial in the history of Ontario, so counsel for one of the parties said in a public statement. It seems to me to be rather an improper exercise of the appointing power to name a barrister who was one of the defendants in an action, under the circumstance that he was standing in the witness box in the midst of his cross-examination when the appointment was announced.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am not supposed to have known that.

Mr. BENNETT: But I am bound to say, as one of my correspondents who is uninterested says, it is pretty difficult to think it was not known at least to those from that province whose business it was to advise the minister with respect to it. He might not know it. But it does embarrass a judge in the trial of an action to have a witness in the midst of a cross-examination promoted to be his brother on the bench. It is still more embarrassing to those who have to conduct trials of actions hereafter before that very same gentleman, to find themselves in the midst of the cross-examination confronted with a new justice of the high court, he having been, when he took the witness-box, a plain member of society, known by another title, and sued in his personal capacity.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He was defendant in his personal capacity?

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, he was defendant in this action.

Mr. ILSLEY: As securities commissioner.

Mr. BENNETT: He was sued, and it was alleged that he acted beyond his authority and was personally liable. He admitted on discovery that he had no authority under the statute to do what he did, and in the midst of his cross-examination he suddenly became a justice of the high court. It made it very embarrassing alike for judge and counsel to face that situation.

Mr. McLARTY: Might I ask my right hon. friend a question? I know he has as high regard as I have for the dignity of the judiciary of Canada, and I wondered if it would not be fair to state that it was in the official capacity in which the gentleman acted at that particular time that the question to which my right hon. friend now refers was asked.

Mr. BENNETT: No. My learned and hon. friend, in a most unusual manner, has not appreciated my point.

Mr. McLARTY: I tried to.

Mr. BENNETT: It is very unusual for him not to appreciate it. The reason is probably my lack of clarity and not his lack of understanding. What I desired to make clear was that the gentleman who was appointed to the bench was the defendant in an action, and it was alleged that he was occupying a position under a provincial statute—

Mr. McLARTY: May I suggest to my right hon. friend that the fact that he was defendant in the action was possible only by reason of the official position which he occupied at that time.

Mr. BENNETT: If my learned and hon. friend will possess his soul in patience, and not manifest some impatience, I shall answer him. This gentleman was a defendant, and it was alleged—properly or improperly I do not say—that he acted beyond the scope of his authority. On discovery he admitted that he had no authority to do what he did do with respect to 275,000 shares of one company and a larger number in another. The question at issue was whether or not he had made himself personally liable. In the judgment of the court different dates are given as to the duration of the trial. One of them says it lasted nine weeks; but as I understand the matter, nine weeks would include all days of the week, and the court did not sit every day of the week. The trial lasted about forty-one days, including the argument. At the end of about the thirtieth day, in the midst of his cross-examination, he suddenly became a justice of the high court, and counsel found himself cross-examining, not a securities commissioner, but a justice of the high court, which, of course, made the situation a little difficult alike for judge and counsel.

Mr. McLARTY: Might I suggest to my right hon. friend that judgment has since been given in connection with the particular action to which he refers, and that judgment is in favour of the one who was appointed.

Mr. BENNETT: The action was dismissed. That has nothing to do with the matter. It is as remote as the moon, and the hon. gentleman knows it, because an appeal can be taken. The difficulty is that in the midst of the cross-examination of the witness he is appointed to the bench, he himself is a party defendant, and is charged with doing something which rendered him, according to the statement of claim, personally liable. I was asked to bring this to the attention of the minister. I believe that if the Minister of Justice had known of these circumstances, he would not then have made the appointment. My long experience with him induces me to believe that he would not have made it; he would have delayed it until such time as the action was out of the road.

Item agreed to.

Penitentiaries branch—branch administration, $85,040.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is the usual vote.

Mr. BENNETT: This is one of the two items referred to this afternoon?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Criticism will have to be deferred to another occasion.

Item agreed to.

Operation and maintenance of penitentiaries, including administration, construction, purchase of land, supplies and equipment, and maintenance and discharge of inmates, $2,679,561.

Mr. BENNETT: Those two items are the items mentioned this afternoon on the penitentiaries bill.

Item agreed to.

Pensions and other benefits—William Tatton, $564.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is a pension which has been continued since 1902.

Item agreed to.

J. Langlois Bell, $600.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is in the same category.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Bennett.]

To provide for publication of Canadian constitutional decisions of the privy council, 1929-1937: Payments may be made notwithstanding anything contained in the Civil Service Act, $3,500.

Mr. BENNETT: Probably the minister will give some explanation of this item.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Really it is the officers of the department who have recommended this. It is a very useful work.

Mr. BENNETT: Cartwright's cases. There were four volumes of them, and then we used to publish them. Then we had Cameron, volumes one and two. The later cases have not been brought up to date.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No; they are not up to date.

Mr. BENNETT: I take it that this is intended to provide for what would be volume three of Cameron?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): That is right.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that is desirable.

Item agreed to.

To hereby provide for the payments of gratuities to the widows or to any dependent children, of judges who die while in office, $15,000.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister might make a short statement.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It has long been the practice, when a judge of the high court dies, to pay two months' salary to his widow.

Mr. BENNETT: This is the item that covers that.

Item agreed to.

Royal Canadian Mounted Police—general administration, $227,368.88.

Mr. STEWART: There is an increase of $14,000.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In the three items that follow there is a large decrease of $72,000.

Mr. BENNETT: At this point the minister might make a short statement indicating the position of the mounted police with respect to the several provinces of Canada. It has been pointed out to me that in Nova Scotia there has been great laxity in the enforcement of the law in connection with what has always been a source of trouble, namely, smuggling. The complaint is that in that province at the present time—I daresay the minister has seen it in the press—alcohol is doctored, bottled and sold as rum; that regular routes are established, and that this has been injurious to the well-being of the community at large, the practice having, moreover, become so prevalent that the present force is unable to cope with it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): As regards policing the provinces, we are doing only our own work in British Columbia. In Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba we are doing provincial work.

Mr. BENNETT: Under the agreements that have been in force for some time?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes. In Ontario and Quebec we have our own work under federal statutes, and under agreement we are doing work in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island. I am aware of the trouble that has taken place in Nova Scotia and the complaints that have been made regarding the enforcement of statutes, especially in connection with liquor smuggling. I am advised, however, that during the last few months there have been more seizures and convictions than at any previous time, and a reorganization is being effected. I do not know whether Mr. Mead has been appointed yet, but the intention is to send him to that province. He has been doing in Montreal effective work of the kind that is necessitated in Nova Scotia. He is going there some time this summer to take charge, and it is hoped that he will do the same excellent work that he has done in Montreal.

Mr. BENNETT: I think that covers the question which I asked. My information is that there are fifty-two cases, of which I think I could give evidence if required, in which liquor has been landed at ports in Nova Scotia, having been really smuggled in. The minister says that he has been aware of the complaints, just as I am, and probably from the same source. For my part I should think that what he proposes to do in an endeavour to remedy the situation should be given the needed opportunity to demonstrate its usefulness, and if it is not effective, then will be the time for further criticism.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Of course, the fact that we are sending the chief of the Montreal branch to that province is no reflection upon the officers there.

Mr. BENNETT: It is prima facie evidence of an intention to do the best one can.

Mr. MacNEIL: Some time ago the minister indicated that it was the intention to investigate the complaints of espionage activities in Canada under the cloak of fascist organization. I have seen photostat copies of letters placed in the hands of agents of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police showing that operatives are active within Canadian borders and to some extent linked up with espionage activities recently exposed in the United States. There has been considerable evidence to show that an attempt has been made to smuggle small arms into Canada, and all this has been done under the cloak of fascist organization. Can the minister make a short statement?

Mr. BENNETT: Before the minister answers, I should like to say a word. A large number of documents have been sent to me, and if they are accurate they indicate clearly that there have been great activities in this dominion extending from the central provinces west. The peculiar activities touch perhaps more closely the Department of National Defence. It is not that it is regarded as likely that any effort will be made, for instance, to deal with the man power of the country, but is rather to prevent the industrial activity of the country from being made productive in munitions of war in the event of our having to produce such munitions. It is clear, for instance, that the turn of a screw might put out of commission an extremely valuable machine and render it impossible for that machine to function. The removal of a very small piece of machinery might render the whole incapable of work for a considerable time. Whether I can attach credence to these documents in their entirety I do not know, but certainly there must be considerable activity emanating from Chicago and spreading over this country dealing with conditions in Ottawa and Montreal, showing a desire to obtain information having to do with conditions in this city, with our aircraft activities, with the work that has been done in our factories. It occurs to me that we should take steps to the extent of our ability to deal with that situation. I was much impressed, when the great war came, with the fact that we laughed at the idea of any such thing as espionage in this country, and we did not take it seriously. Yet within a short time a bridge was destroyed. We were able to trace the matter and ultimately take proceedings in connection with it. The destruction of that bridge indicated a close and accurate knowledge of general conditions in this country. The placing of an explosive at a particular point wrecked the bridge. My information is that a great deal of activity is being carried on; that cameras are very much in use.

In the case I mentioned the other evening respecting a particular individual, I gave such information as I had to one department which was looking into the matter for another purpose. It is clear that the gentleman had a map case, a camera and binoculars, which largely constituted his stock in trade. He worked on a farm in Ontario, and the farmer with whom he worked wrote to me. He then transferred his activities to Montreal. It is not necessary or desirable that I should at this time enter into a discussion of what he did there; that had to do with another branch of the activities of our friends.

If the evidence is to be relied on—I do not wish to say it is wholly reliable—certainly photostat copies of documents which came to me clearly indicate that we have in our midst in this country a condition which we should not tolerate. I trust the minister will see that the police take every step in their power to prevent this from continuing. We should cooperate as far as possible with the United States, because it is reasonably clear that the master minds that control activities there are also controlling them here. The communications to which I refer were directed to Chicago, and the difficulties that had to be overcome to obtain the information were great. It is desirable that we should not have any condition prevailing which would render ineffective any measures we might desire to take, or which would cripple our hands if we desired to use our army or air force for our own defence in time of peril. I was struck by reports as to what had been done in some of the great industrial organizations. No one thinks for a moment that there is an effort to cripple our man power in the large sense, but there appears to be an effort to cripple those productive machines on which in mechanized war the people must rely for their defence.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In answer, first to the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), I may say the communications he has received have also been received by me and by the department, and inquiries have been made. This allegation that people in Montreal who call themselves fascists were drilling and having arms arose, first, through statements in the press from boastings on the part of the so-called leaders, seekers after publicity more than anything else, that they had 25,000, 30,000 and, some were cheerful enough to say, 75,000 adherents. The number is much less than that. Well-intentioned people, even eminent gentlemen, by believing that sort of thing and giving expression to fear about it, are rather playing into the hands of those so-called fascist leaders who seek publicity. It is the same with the communists; they want publicity; if they do not get it they disappear. They live on it. We found that there was nothing as far as those allegations as to arms are concerned. Some of these people congregate in large numbers with all the paraphernalia, shirts—I do not know whether black or brown; it is foolish anyway—and make gestures and that sort of thing. They do, fifteen or twenty or twenty-five of them, what they call military exercises, just stand at attention and walk. There is nothing very dangerous about it, except that they make inflammatory speeches, denouncing many public men, particularly your humble servant. One of them said at a meeting that when they take office the first Jew that will be expelled from Canada will be Ernest Lapointe. But this does not prevent me from sleeping at night.

As far as reports that they were importing arms are concerned, these were sent to us by certain gentlemen, who were found by the agents of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police to be members of the communist party. We followed the hints and suggestions that were given to us from those men, but at the last moment the people were always disappearing, and the police officers who went to the places indicated discovered that there was nothing there. So the denunciations of those gentlemen will not be taken very seriously in the future unless they are supported by something more definite.

My remarks in that regard apply both to communists and fascists. They live on publicity, notoriety; they like it to be said that there are 50,000, 100,000 of them; that they are going to have candidates everywhere at the next general election—

Mr. BENNETT: That may account for the Kingston riots.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It may. But I implore my fellow citizens not to be alarmed by these reports which are given to the press and at meetings by people who want to be considered big men and important factors in the national life. If we judged by press reports, Montreal is a place where we are in serious danger from both sides, fascists and communists. Let me tell hon. members that we are not afraid of them there. The population is too sane to be carried away by those crazy appeals. On the other hand I may assure the committee that the police and the secret service of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police have the situation well in hand. If anything of a serious nature, or suggesting any danger, should happen, these people will find that Canada is not a place where such things can be carried on without interference by the police.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not touch my question.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): In reference to the subject matter of the remarks of my right hon. friend, while it would not be in the public interest to divulge what steps are being taken, or by which department, there again I can assure him that the situation is being looked after and is well in hand. I do not and we do not minimize the possible danger of the situation which my right hon. friend has depicted; we will collaborate and are collaborating not only with the United States but also with the British authorities in that respect.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am not attempting to exaggerate the importance of the fascist organization; but the situation took a different turn when a number of individuals were indicted during the grand jury sessions in the United States recently where, as I am informed, it was definitely shown that there was a relationship between those activities in the United States and similar activities in and around our important airports in Canada. I am asking the minister to exercise some restraint on organizations professing fascism, but which actually are commonly used as a cloak for espionage activities on the part of agents of foreign governments. May I ask if there has been some cooperation between the departments of Canada and the United States in this regard?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes.

Mr. MacNEIL: So that these individuals may not cross the border and embarrass us with their activities?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I quite understand what my hon. friend has in view. For a time this session I considered the introduction of legislation similar to that enacted in Great Britain a couple of years ago, prohibiting parading in uniform for political purposes. I did not recommend it to the government, however, because I thought really it was giving too much importance to these people. There is some danger of doing that, and it is just what they want. If necessary, however, I shall be pleased to submit legislation of that kind to parliament if this movement increases; but in spite of the boasts appearing in their own little newspapers, my information, based upon facts ascertained by our agents, is that, instead of the movement spreading, the leaders find it difficult to gather at their meetings the same number of people who were attracted there by curiosity at first. However, we are looking after the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: If it were not for the fact that I think every member of the committee should have a clear appreciation of the possible seriousness of the matter to which the hon. member for Vancouver North has referred, as well as the statement I have made, I should have been content merely to leave it to a private conversation with the minister. But I think every member of the committee should have some conception of what I regard as the seriousness of the situation.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The subject matter of the remarks of my right hon. friend is much more important.

Mr. BENNETT: I must say that in the main I do not disagree with the minister in the other matters to which he has referred; but with respect to the question of espionage and spies, in the Niagara area, shall I say, the evidence submitted to me indicated that an effort was being made to bring over three hundred revolvers, and the person named upon whom they were to rely to effect the transfer across the border enjoyed the reputation of a well known bootlegger and smuggler, whatever that may mean.

I mention that now in this committee not because I do not think the minister is seized with the seriousness of it, or because I do not know that at least one other department, if not more, is concerned about it, but because I think it desirable that every member of the committee should hear the statement the minister has made, and that the members of the committee, when they leave here, should have a clear appreciation of just what may be involved. I think the statement of the minister will do much to help all of us realize, as we in this country should realize, that there is a possibility of this becoming a serious matter, though in the main we have always treated these questions as being unworthy of very serious attention. From what has taken place in the United States it now appears that something of the same sort is going on in at least some parts of this country, and if once we make it known in this public way that this is not to be permitted to continue with impunity, I think that in itself will have a very salutary effect; for I am satisfied that if the police and other branches of government departments take the matter in hand, we can adequately deal with it.

Mr. WALSH: I want to assure the hon. member for Vancouver North that what the Minister of Justice has said in connection with the fascist movement in the district of Montreal and the province of Quebec is quite correct. The so-called leaders of that movement, particularly in the district of Montreal, are in no way leaders in the real sense of that term. They are men of very ordinary talent who love to wear a uniform of some distinctive character; and finding no other possible way of wearing such a uniform except through the medium of a movement such as this fascist movement, they don that uinform and pretend to be leaders. Now they are even quarrelling among themselves as to which is the actual leader and which the captain of this so-called movement, which has very little significance in the province of Quebec. It has been given wide publicity outside that province, much to the detriment of Quebec, but conditions have been very much exaggerated even in comparison with what they were at the maximum of their intensity.

A year or two ago I think we instituted something in the way of a cadet scheme or a training system for prospective members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. I know there is a training school at Regina; but this system was introduced in order to train young men as prospective members of the police, or at least to give them the training which would be necessary to permit them to become established in that force. I was wondering if that effort had been pursued to any great extent. I think it was an excellent move. Even if it is not possible to absorb these young men into the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, they have been excellently trained for other purposes, and may be trained to such an extent that they could find places in the service of a provincial or municipal government, or even with industrial plants. The training they would receive under a cadet system or the training system of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police would not only fit them for that force, but fit them admirably for a position elsewhere in life. I was wondering if that system, instituted at one time, was meeting with any favourable progress, or whether it had been discontinued.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I agree with what the hon. member has stated with regard to the excellence of the initiative taken to train some young men as prospective members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. Last year at a certain time there were 300, and I believe the average was about 175 or 180. I am not sure that this will be done this year, as the money at our disposal is being used for additional reinforcements in some parts of the country. However, the idea is not at all abandoned, and the hon. member may be sure that not only are his remarks taken in good part, but when occasion arises they will be acted upon.

[Mr. Walsh.]

Mr. BENNETT: What are the present numbers of the mounted police, all ranks?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): There are 2,500.

Item agreed to.

Land services—arising out of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, enforcement of federal statutes generally, and other incidental expenses, $5,036,172.87.

Mr. MITCHELL: In connection with allowances for married men in the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, is special allowance given a married man in a division who is living in a city, and not on detachment?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The matter is being seriously considered, but no decision has yet been reached.

Item agreed to.

Land services—arising out of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act, enforcement of federal statutes generally, and other incidental expenses—further amount required, $23,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Why was this additional amount required?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It covers repairs to a boat in the far north.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

Chief electoral officer—salaries and expenses of office, $16,960.

Mr. BENNETT: Was it in the office of the chief electoral officer in which an assistant, who has nothing to do, was placed, at a salary of $3,000?

Hon. FERNAND RINFRET (Secretary of State): May I point out that this vote and the one coming later in connection with the dominion franchise commissioner will be affected by the legislation adopted this afternoon. These offices have been operating since April 1, and after careful consideration we have decided to leave the estimates as they are. The bill provides that an additional three months will be required before the new measure can be enforced and the forms printed. Another section of the bill provides that some parts of it may be enforced only after proclamation. So it is expected that for at least two-thirds of the fiscal year the offices will be kept separately. Of course the major salaries are not voted, but are statutory. When the section carrying the new salary of the chief electoral officer is in force, the salary will automatically be increased from $6,000 to $8,000. In the same way, when the dominion franchise commissioner's office has been dispensed with, the salary and other statutory provisions will be eliminated.

So far as the salaries to be voted are concerned, we expect the chief electoral officer, for the few months he may be left alone, will be able to carry on with the money asked for in the present vote. If necessary, we may meet an emergency.

Mr. BENNETT: I asked whether the assistant to the chief electoral officer is still continuing in office. That is the officer who, during the term of the last government, was not appointed, and there was no necessity for him during the three years prior to 1930. But shortly after the last election in 1935 an appointment was made. What has he been doing since?

Mr. RINFRET: I must say that statement is correct; but at the time I took the stand—and I still take it—that this office being composed of a small staff, it was desirable that the chief electoral officer be represented in his office by an assistant, should the chief officer find it necessary to be busy outside the office. At the time Mr. Castonguay made strong demands for an assistant, and was able to convince me that one was necessary.

Mr. BENNETT: I think it was the other way about.

Mr. RINFRET: During this session Mr. Castonguay has been busy before the committee on electoral matters, and I know the fact that the office has not been closed because Mr. Castonguay was called outside has been appreciated.

Mr. BENNETT: I see; there is a staff to keep the door open.

Item agreed to.

Dominion franchise commissioner—salaries and expenses of office, $11,680.

Mr. STIRLING: What does the government propose to do with those civil servants who were occupied in the franchise office, from the commissioner himself and his assistants down?

Mr. RINFRET: I am sorry I cannot give a precise reply to that question; but as regards the smaller offices, I have no doubt it will be very easy to absorb these employees either with the chief officer if the work demands it, or in other departments of the government. As to the dominion franchise commissioner, I am very sorry I am not in a position to say what the government will be able to recommend, but I might point out that the disposition of that office is not with the government but with parliament through its committee.

Item agreed to.

Public archives—general administration, and to provide, notwithstanding the terms of the Civil Service Act or any other act or law, for payment of an honorarium of $1,000 to J. F. Kenney as a recognition of his services as acting dominion archivist—further amount required, $4,000.

Mr. MALLETTE (Translation): I have a question to ask the minister and a bit of advice to offer him, if he will kindly listen to me. The Public Archives Department publishes each year a most interesting report, but in addition it publishes from time to time special reports which should be better known to the public. I refer particularly to the work entitled Constitutional Documents whose authors are Messrs. Short and Doughty. These volumes have been published three times. The first English edition was brought out in 1907, with a French translation in 1911; the second English edition was published in 1914, with a French translation in 1915, and the third and last edition was printed in English in 1918 and in French in 1921. I have tried to obtain copies for every school in my constituency, but I was told that the quantity available did not permit of a public distribution. I managed, however, to get three copies of the series—one English and two French. I placed them in three of the principal schools of my constituency.

It is my opinion that this work should be reprinted with a view to being placed in the hands of all educators and of all citizens who take an interest in Canadian history. I do not expect the minister to promise this very evening to have these volumes reprinted immediately, but I ask him to give favourable consideration to my request in order that copies may be obtained next year.

Mr. RINFRET: I thank my hon. friend for his compliments which I shall convey to my departmental officers. As to his request, I have to point out to him that the books to which he refers are somewhat important and fairly expensive. However, I shall consult my officers and see what can be done to meet my hon. friend's request.

Mr. BENNETT: It is a very dangerous precedent to establish, and one which we have hesitated during all these years to establish, namely, that when an official during a vacancy discharges the duties of chief, he should be compensated when an appointment is made by giving him some further amount. We have steadily taken the opposite view; but now and then where very arduous work had to be looked after, involving great responsibility, such a provision has been made. I can, however, recall many cases in which it was refused on the advice of those who had to deal with matters of this kind, that it was a dangerous precedent to establish. I think, if the item had been worded differently, it probably would have more correctly and adequately expressed the facts.

Mr. RINFRET: I can only say that I was glad that my recommendation in this instance was accepted by the government.

Mr. BENNETT: It would be difficult to justify it on that ground.

Item agreed to.

Public printing and stationery—distribution of official documents, $44,100.

Mr. BARBER: Why the increase in this item?

Mr. RINFRET: In the new form of preparing the estimates, two clerks, who were usually shown under the general vote, have been transferred to this vote, so it is not really an increase. My hon. friend will find there is a decrease, not quite so large, in the departmental administration vote, but the difference is accounted for by the restoraation of the five per cent salary deduction.

Item agreed to.

Printing and binding official publications for sale and distribution to departments and the public, $40,000.

Mr. BARBER: What is the revenue from the sale of these publications ?

Mr. RINFRET: I regret that the king's printer is not here. Perhaps my hon. friend will allow the item to pass, and I can give him the information in the morning. This is the usual amount voted every year.

Mr. BARBER: In the details I see an item of $32,363 for "printing, etc., for sale," and I was wondering what the receipts were.

Mr. RINFRET: The revenue for the ten months prior to January 31, 1938, from the sale of publications to departments, was $4,720.18, and from the sale of publications to the public, $32,725.31. The sale of publications to the departments is rather a bookkeeping item than an asset, but the revenue from the public is $32,725, so the service practically pays for itself.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Public printing and stationery—Plant—repairs and renewals—further amount required, $20,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Did the plant become obsolete between the date of the main estimates and the supplementaries?

Mr. RINFRET: No. For two or three years we have voted only $10,000 a year for repairs to carry on the plant. In the old days the vote for repairs and renewals was from $25,000 to $30,000 and even more. Naturally we have reached a point where we find that we must renew certain of the machines of the printing bureau, and this vote is destined to meet that need.

Mr. BENNETT: I hope it reaches its "destiny."

Item agreed to.

Naturalization branch, $62,180.

Mr. RINFRET: The small increase in these different branches is mainly due to the restoration of the five per cent salary deduction and the statutory increases.

Mr. BARBER: What was the increase in the naturalizations?

Mr. BENNETT: How many were naturalized last year?

Mr. RINFRET: There are four new clerks in the branch. The amount for temporary assistance has been reduced by nearly $3,000.

Mr. BARBER: The question I asked was, What was the increase in the number of those naturalized in the past year? Perhaps the minister could give the numbers by nationalities.

Mr. RINFRET: There are different sections under which naturalization is granted. The main one, of course, which provides the normal procedure, is section 4. In 1936 there were 17,339 naturalizations; and in 1937, the last year for which we have figures, 15,831. Naturalizations under section 5 numbered eighty-nine in 1936, compared with seventy-two in 1937. Those are special cases. Sections 6, 7 and 8 apply to small numbers. As regards section 13, dealing with the naturalization of women, in 1936 there were 5,914 and in 1937, 7,590. This is one of the sections effected by an amendment of the act some years ago requiring the separate naturalization of women.

Item agreed to.

Companies branch, $48,360.

Mr. BENNETT: Have any steps been taken by the government looking towards the supervision of companies as indicated in some of the addresses which were made in 1935?

The minister will recollect that under orders in council certain powers were entrusted to administrative officers, and I desire to know whether any action has been taken looking towards a more effective supervision of companies and their capital structures.

Mr. RINFRET: I understand we have in the supplementary estimates an amount covering that, establishing a special bureau.

Item agreed to.

Bureau for translations, $281,130.

Mr. RINFRET: The large increase in the translations bureau item is due mostly to the fact that, carrying on the policy—I will admit—of the former government, and of the present one, we have transferred quite a number of translators from other departments to the bureau for translations—three from labour, two from mines and resources, six from national defence, three from trade and commerce and one from transport; in all, fifteen translators and clerks connected with translations, which accounts for most of the increase in that branch. The activity otherwise of the bureau has been very great on account of the number of reports which have issued from different commissions during the course of the year. I think this item will commend itself to the committee inasmuch as it is not really an increase as much as a transfer from other departments. I just wish to add that if you find occasionally in estimates of other departments the word "translator," it relates mostly to cases where the translation work is mixed with some other work. For instance, the patent records has an auditor who is still voted for under the caption of translator, but he is not really a translator. The same applies to one of my archivists in the archives branch. It is the policy of the present Secretary of State and the government to transfer under the bureau for translations all translators in the service, and when possible to give a different name to those who, not being translators, should not be designated as such.

Mr. BENNETT: It is another striking instance of hon. gentlemen opposite having found, in office, the utility of the legislation passed when they were in opposition and which they opposed. It is gratifying.

Mr. RINFRET: This is again an occasion upon which I am glad that I have been able to convince some of my colleagues.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite. I would think the minister's time is mostly taken up in convincing his colleagues of the justice of his recommendations.

Item agreed to.

Canada Temperance Act, $5,000.

Mr. BARBER: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. RINFRET: The Canada Temperance Act? I thought everybody knew that. This is an old act which is still on the statutes but is of application now only in three or four counties in the dominion. One is in Quebec—the city of Thetford Mines, I think it is—one in Ontario, Manitoulin, and a couple of counties in Manitoba. The amount is voted because in one of these counties the desire was expressed to have a referendum to do away with the operation of the act in that county. As I say, this is to provide for that, but there has been no expenditure in that direction for the last few years.

Mr. BENNETT: And no difficulty in convincing the minister's colleagues on that point!

Item agreed to.

Patent and Copyright office—branch administration, $34,285.

Mr. RINFRET: There is no change.

Item agreed to.

Patent division, $143,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister made any arrangement in connection with the patent office? He will recall that I mentioned to him some time ago—and doubtless he has convinced his colleagues of it by this time—that it was desirable to make some necessary changes there, or at least to provide for additional help to take care of the overcrowded office in which patents were pending, including patents for providing estimates for the public service.

Mr. RINFRET: I have given special care to that matter. If it were not for this late stage of the session, I have here a voluminous report from which, if I quoted from it, I would appear very wise. I have visited the patent office, and I may say, not for the sake of myself or the government so much as on behalf of the officers, who are loyal, that I found there was no vault in the patent office. They are cramped for space, and instead of there being a very large room in which all the patent records could be contained, some are downstairs, some are on the first floor, others even in the corridor, and therefore it takes a longer time to get at the different numbers required. For the same reason it has not been found possible to increase the number of clerks to the extent that we would have desired, although we had three new ones last year and are providing for two or three this year.

Mr. BENNETT: Nowhere to put them.

Mr. RINFRET: That is exactly the point. We have been in communication with the Minister of Public Works and are securing an additional place in the adjoining building, but that will be only a temporary remedy. When the Post Office Department moves into the new building I hope it will be possible to accommodate the patent office as adequately as it should be. We have been gaining ground, and without going into detail I may say that I am giving to that particular branch of the service my very best attention.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The minister might explain the increase of $10,000.

Mr. RINFRET: That is to meet the required number of additional clerks that I have indicated, but part of it is due to other items.

Item agreed to.

Companies branch—further amount required, $6,800.

Mr. RINFRET: This is to establish a new branch of securities information, to which I alluded a moment ago.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the proposed nature of that branch? This becomes important, and I should be greatly obliged if the minister would indicate the plans he contemplates.

Mr. RINFRET: This new division of the companies branch is to deal with the compilation and interchange of information relating to corporations, and issues of securities, also assistance and cooperation in connection with securities fraud legislation. At the meeting of the dominion-provincial committee on company law convened by the Secretary of State on Tuesday, November 3, 1936, it was unanimously recommended that such a bureau be established. The next year that desire was expressed again in the following terms:—

There should be established by the government of Canada a central bureau for the collection and distribution of information relating to promotions, records, persons and administrative activities in respect to securities. To this bureau each provincial body administering its securities act will report refusals, suspensions and cancellations for cause, with its reasons, and other relevant data. As the object is to secure interprovincial and provincial-federal cooperation for the prevention of fraud in this field, it is recommended that steps be taken to secure the exchange of views and information and to make other cooperative arrangements between the proposed bureau and the securities and exchange commission of the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: The point which I had hoped might be dealt with is not covered either by the memorandum the minister has read, or by this appropriation. The question I raised was as to the exercise of some effective supervision over the issue of securities by companies. This only locks the door after the horse is stolen; it only enables the department to maintain a bureau for the interchange of information. What we were seeking was a statement as to the attitude of the department towards effective supervision of the issue of the securities themselves by dominion companies. As the minister will recall, that matter has been the subject of much discussion, regarding the type and nature of securities that must be issued. It is clear that this item does not cover that, but deals rather with the establishment of a central clearing house of information in accordance with the recommendation made by the members constituting the body known, I believe, as the commission on uniform legislation and interprovincial laws, which meets at the same time as the Canadian Bar Association.

Item agreed to.

Bureau for translations—further amount required, $8,460.

Mr. STIRLING: There was a very large increase in temporary assistants in the main estimates, and now the minister is asking for $8,000 more. Will he explain that?

Mr. RINFRET: As I said when we were on the main item, there has been a vast amount of translation going on this year, and we have not been able to catch up with the work although the bureau has been working very hard. This is all intended for temporary assistance, printing and sundries, and is not meant to be added permanently to the bureau for translations. It is merely to conclude the work of the present session.

Item agreed to.

Adjustment of war claims, $12,000.

Mr. BARBER: The minister might explain this.

Mr. RINFRET: This is not, as might be surmised, for the payment of additional war claims. That office was closed years ago. The amount is asked for by the Department of Justice to meet possible legal fees in an appeal lodged before the supreme court in the famous case of Rex v. Logan. It may or may not be expended, but the department has asked us to provide the amount in case it is. The appeal being against us, naturally we have to respond to it.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Indian Affairs branch—Medical Indian hospitals and general care of Indians, $1,218,916.

Mr. PERLEY: There is an increase in the vote. I understand there is a request to build an addition to or to make improvements in the hospital at Fort Qu'Appelle or else at Le Bret. Can the minister make a statement?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): There is nothing in the vote for increased facilities at the hospital mentioned by the hon. member. The increase is due almost entirely to the increased amount appropriated for the treatment of tuberculosis among the Indians, looking to a program of eradication. That explains the increase in the vote, but it is not intended this year to increase facilities at the hospital in question.

Mr. PERLEY: Is it proposed to increase facilities at Le Bret in connection with the Indian school or to take care of suspects or carriers?

Mr. CRERAR: The matter is under consideration, but there is nothing provided for it this year. It may receive consideration next year if it is found possible.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad to see the increase for this purpose, but could the minister tell us briefly the nature of the increased services to the Indians for the eradication of tuberculosis?

Mr. CRERAR: That is done in cooperation with the provincial departments of health, and consists mainly of surveys in Indian schools, particularly in the older settled communities. Those surveys are made largely by the clinics of the provincial governments. That work was started a year ago on a very modest scale; the increased vote this year permits an extension. If there is more than sufficient money to care for the program in the schools, the work will be extended to some of the more necessitous cases on reserves adjacent to white communities.

Mr. BARBER: Is it under this vote that buildings are erected or provision made at the different schools to take care of cases which are under suspicion?

Mr. CRERAR: The vote covers Indian hospitals.

Mr. BARBER: The minister told us that this had to do with inspection of schools; that the provincial authorities send out their medical men and carry on these clinics at the Indian schools and settlements. Is provision made at each of these schools to take care of suspects?

Mr. CRERAR: I did not get the import of my hon. friend's question before. The matter presents some difficulty. An effort is being made where possible to segregate Indian children who are active tubercular cases where they can receive treatment and possibly some instruction at the same time. We hope to make some progress this year, perhaps by taking one school and centring the active tubercular cases in it for treatment. But it is not intended under this vote to build institutions for the care of tubercular cases.

Mr. BARBER: Is it not being done at the present time and for the past two years at Coqualeetza school at Sardis, and St. Mary's school at Mission City?

Mr. CRERAR: There are a few cases where preventoria have been built. These are for cases that may be potential spreaders of the disease among other children. These cases are isolated in the preventoria. That may be extended in a few instances this year.

Mr. BARBER: I understand that has been very successful at these points. As soon as a child in the school is under suspicion, it is removed to the preventorium, and in discussion with the medical men they speak very highly of the policy and recommend that it should be continued and extended.

Mr. CRERAR: There will be a few of those preventoria opened again this year for that purpose. I think there is one at Alert Bay, British Columbia, and one at Fort Alexander in Manitoba.

Mr. McCANN: The problem of tuberculosis among the Indians is one which, I am sure, is engaging the attention of the department. It has for a long time engaged the attention of the Canadian Tuberculosis Association and of organized medicine. I should like to place before the committee a memorandum setting out the viewpoint of organized medicine with reference to the problem of tuberculosis particularly among the Indians.

Last year in Canada there were 6,763 deaths from tuberculosis. Of that number 748 were among the Indian population. That is, 11 per cent of the deaths in this country from tuberculosis occurred among the Indian population. That figures out at twelve times as many per 100,000 of population among the Indians as among the white people. That means that the Indian death rate, which was ten times as many in 1936, has now risen to twelve times as many per 100,000 as among the white population. This is the memorandum:

The medical services of the Indian Affairs branch, however complete they may be and deserving of commendation in other ways are singularly lacking and inadequate in the matter of control of tuberculosis. A more aggressive policy is absolutely necessary to solve this problem. A comprehensive and progressive program is long overdue. These observations are based upon the following facts:

1. The Canadian people have failed in their duty to 112,000 Indians as long as they are denied facilities for the diagnosis and treatment of tuberculosis to the same degree as they are available for the white population.

2. The failure to control tuberculosis in the Indian population is hampering the program among the white population. Canadian provinces have assumed responsibility for tuberculosis control in their white population and they are complaining of the handicap due to the lack of an aggressive policy on the part of the dominion government for the Indian.

3. The provincial health departments feel that it is unfair and inexcusable that a menace is allowed to exist in a section of the population within their boundaries which is not subject to the same measures of control that the provinces have found necessary to establish for the remainder of their people.

4. Considerable sums of money are spent every year on education, relief and general medical services for Indians, but little is spent on tuberculosis, the Indians' chief cause of death, and by far the greatest cause of illness in the Indian population.

There are two reasons why a policy of tuberculosis control has not been initiated. We propose to discuss these and to suggest in a general way their remedies.

1. Sufficient money has never been voted by parliament to make a worth while program possible. It is urged that the usual appropriation be supplemented by a sum of $300,000, the minimum required for a general tuberculosis program, and that in addition $200,000 be voted for a two year construction program to provide accommodation in areas where no facilities are available.

2. Those under whose jurisdiction the Indians fall have told us that a reasonable long term policy with respect to Indian tuberculosis has not yet been enunciated. We would like to state that methods of control of tuberculosis in the white population are now clearly outlined and accepted and are being followed with outstanding success. The methods that should be followed in the Indian population can be no less clearly outlined. Their application may require some adaptation to Indian conditions, but the fundamental principles are the same.

In the campaign against tuberculosis in the white population it has become necessary to define clearly the relative importance of predisposing and exciting causes of tuberculosis. It is our belief, that in the past, undue importance has been attributed to racial susceptibility, climate, diet and other environmental factors. This has served to becloud the real issue, namely that tuberculosis is a communicable disease, in the same way that leprosy, typhoid fever or smallpox are communicable diseases.

Measures to improve the housing, diet and other environmental status of the Indian are worthy of commendation but these measures will fail unless the communicable nature of the disease is recognized, and measures taken to control the spread of infection. The tubercle bacillus, always was, is and always will be the cause of tuberculosis, and hence direct measures are necessary to localize or segregate the germ. These measures will have far more value than indirect methods which are unavailing in the presence of massive infection by tubercle bacilli. Tuberculosis comes from tuberculosis.

We believe that the main reason why the Indian is polluted with tuberculosis is because he is conceived, born, educated, lives and dies in an atmosphere of tuberculosis. This atmosphere of tuberculosis infection was grafted upon the Indian by his first contact with white settlers and has continued ever since.

When one realizes that the white population of this country has been the source of tuberculosis among the Indian population, it becomes clear and definite that the obligation is upon the government of this country to see to it that the Indians, who are their wards and for whom we have a contractual and moral obligation, are given the attention which they deserve for this disease in particular.

Whatever possibilities of escaping from this menace were possible when the Indian lived an open, nomadic life, were removed when he became firmly established on reserves. The faults of environment which have developed may have served to aggravate but are not the real cause of tuberculosis.

It is common knowledge that the Indian has never been given the means to protect himself from this menace in the same manner that has been afforded the more fortunate white population. A policy of tuberculosis control should recognize these facts as fundamental and the lines to be followed based on the most practicable and reasonable manner in which this lack can be overcome.

The policy of control should proceed from two premises:

1. That the recognition or diagnosis of the disease is necessary wherever it exists in the Indian population. It was imperative that these diagnostic facilities be developed for the white population. This service should be made available for the Indian population also. Provincial clinics are even now available and are being utilized in a limited way but could be made more useful by proper organization. This requires the addition of trained personnel on the staff of the Indian affairs branch to coordinate and organize these diagnostic facilities.

I just wonder if any progress has been made during the last year towards the setting up of any such branch in the department.

It requires the addition of one or more physicians trained in tuberculosis to organize this work among the Indians in Canada. It is suggested that it requires one for the east and one for the west.

Such a system would lead to the proper notification and recording of tuberculosis on the Indian reserves. This is the foundation for a tuberculosis control program for any community or group of people.

2. The next is that some action be taken in regard to cases of tuberculosis that are found to exist. This should be done by training, supervision, treatment or segregation.

We believe that in by far the greater number of recognized cases, some action could be taken that would gradually lessen the incidence of infection. This might be brought about in several ways and we offer the following suggestions that could be followed depending on the type of case that is found to exist:

1. In the school. The age of greatest incidence of tuberculosis in the Indian is in the 'teen age group in contrast to the white where it is greatest in the 20-30 group.

I would direct that particularly to the attention of the minister, that the greatest incidence of tuberculosis in Indians is in the school age group, whereas the greatest incidence in the population other than Indian is between the ages of twenty to thirty. That clearly brings to mind the necessity of tackling this problem in the schools.

For this reason coordinated diagnostic services of the provincial tuberculosis clinics and the trained diagnostic staff of the Indian affairs branch should regularly examine the school children at yearly intervals. Cases of tuberculosis would thus be recognized and dealt with in two ways:

(a) By removing open spreaders to a sanatorium or hospital.

(b) Minimal early cases who are potential spreaders could be economically cared for in separate schools or divisions of existing schools where their education could be continued. They do not require expensive care.

In this connection this policy is already in operation by the Indian affairs branch in a limited way. It is found to be feasible, and has already shown evidence of controlling and reducing tuberculosis in the school population. It is the one bright spot in an otherwise dark picture. But it cannot be successful without further measures to control infection on the reserves. In the past some of these children have been sent back to the reserves to receive further infection and in turn to infect the pre-school population.

2. On the reserves. Extension of the diagnostic services will bring to light the extent of the problem in the general reserve population. Cases that are so discovered should then be dealt with. Surveys are useless unless followed up. It seems reasonable that these will fall into several groups:

(a) Those that cannot be dealt with in any way but on the reserves. These will be the older members of the band in whom old customs and traditions are so strongly ingrained that they either cannot be persuaded or that it would be inhumane to suggest that they be removed from the reserve. Some determined effort must be made on the reserve by Indian agents, medical officers, or health nurses, to provide as much segregation as possible. We recognize the old objections that will be raised that it is impossible but it can and must be done as it has been done even in slum areas in the white population. This requires a particular type of nurse with aptitude and training. In this connection, public health officials and tuberculosis officers maintain that there is a field for public health nurses and that they can make a contribution to this problem at a relatively small cost. They maintain that the limited staff of nurses employed by the Indian affairs branch prior to 1932 were doing creditable and worthwhile work. It is our belief that this avenue of attack should be further explored.

(b) The actual segregation of those in which this line should be followed. The segregation of tuberculous patients is a weapon believed to be most powerful in controlling tuberculosis in any community be it white, black or Indian. It is our considered opinion that the Indian affairs branch should treat and maintain in tuberculosis institutions that have been established, or that are feasible to establish, a reasonable number of tuberculous Indians for the protection of the whole Indian population. Experience will determine the number that should be so treated, but for the present a minimum of two hundred should be segregated. This will first include cases from those parts of Canada where the Indian population is in close contact with white people, and hence will contribute to the solution of the problem in both the white and Indian communities.

This group will include young Indians who are at present health minded and are asking for such treatment, cases from large families where there are numbers of contacts, hopeful cases that can be cured, intelligent Indians whose education and sanitary habits will have some effect in raising the standards of the Indian generally. To deny that this is possible is a negation of the assumption that there is any use whatever in the policy of the Indian affairs branch of education of the Indian in any capacity.

The question of where this segregation should be given is an important one. It is natural and logical, just as it is in the white population, that this treatment and segregation be carried out as near as possible to the population it serves. This leads us to the question of reserve hospitals, or small so-called cottage sanitoria. If the Indians were in sufficiently large groups that these institutions might be practicable or economically possible this would undoubtedly be advisable. Its value has already been demonstrated by the Indian hospital at Fort Qu'Appelle, and other Indian hospitals easily accessible to reserves where already a certain number of tuberculous patients have been successfully segregated, and have been persuaded to remain for treatment with a minimum of difficulty. A satisfactory number of these cases have made a successful recovery. It is possible that in some instances this could be adopted where there are large aggregations of Indians, but it is also true that where there are large aggregations of Indians beds are available in provincial sanitoria, such as Ontario and Saskatchewan, and a policy of duplicating these beds might receive serious objection as to the advisability of spending public funds in their construction. For the many scattered small Indian reserves local cottage sanitoria would seem to be out of the question.

Some general observations which would appear to influence to some extent the policy of treatment and segregation might be made. One is that considerable differences exist between the Indians east of the great lakes and those to the west of the great lakes. Those east of the great lakes have been longer in contact with the white population, there is a greater admixture of white blood, they approach more nearly to the standards of white man, and what is more important their tuberculosis death rate is less than half of that which obtains in the western provinces.

Nothing could more clearly demonstrate the usefulness of the program which has been carried on east of the great lakes and the lack of program which has not been carried on west of the great lakes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. McCANN: There is plenty of time. This is a very important subject, and if this country is going to perform a moral and contractual obligation to the 112,000 Indians in the country, then it is well worth giving some time to the consideration of their health.

For them, segregation and treatment in the white men's sanatoria would seem to be preferable where this can be obtained. There is also the general observation that control policies will be more difficult to apply to the northern Indians, as they are so much in contact with the white people. For this reason, policies of control should be instituted first in those parts of the country where the Indian is in contact with others.

It is our firm conviction after years of thought and discussion that such a policy as we have outlined, if pursued over a period of years, would substantially reduce tuberculosis among the Indians. It would remove the growing criticism of the Indian affairs branch and of the Canadian government for what is generally considered a breach of trust in our obligation to a submerged and conquered race.

I should like briefly to summarize the financial requirements for such a program. The figures can be summarized under the following headings: Additional medical personnel, $15,000; extension of nursing service, $20,000; cost of continuation and expansion of school surveys and general diagnostic work, $75,000, and treatment of tuberculous Indians in sanatoria or hospitals, $190,000, making a total cost of $300,000.

These figures have been detailed with respect to the various provinces.

[Mr. McCann.]

I wish to emphasize the importance of this particular problem. If one wished to take a selfish view it would be this, that the white population is being continually re-infected from the Indian population, where they are in close contact with one another. The death rate among the Indians is twelve times as great as among the white population. Statistics for last year show that the number of deaths in Canada was 6,763, whereas among the Indians it was 748. In other words, approximately twelve times as many Indians per 100,000 of population died of tuberculosis as died among the whites. Two years ago there were only ten times as many, so that, instead of lessening, the problem is gaining headway.

The Canadian Tuberculosis Association and organized medicine from one end of the country to the other feel, as I said a year ago, that the splendid work which has been done through the years by the organization is being nullified through lack of work on the part of the Indian Affairs branch. I am not criticizing the minister or his officials particularly. I know they find it difficult to persuade the Minister of Finance and other members of the government as to the importance of the problem, and find further difficulty each year in obtaining an appropriation sufficient to combat the disease.

All I do at this time is to lend a word of encouragement to the government, and to express appreciation of the work which has already been inaugurated in the Indian Affairs branch in connection with this phase of the matter. I would wish the minister continued success, and would hope that from year to year he might attack the problem more vigorously and might be successful in obtaining a greater appropriation to carry on the work. I would hope that he might extend the personnel of his department to include trained and efficient experts in tuberculosis, so that he might render a first-class service to those under his care, and so that he might give that measure of protection to the white population living adjacent to the Indian reserves to which they are entitled and of which they are deserving.

Mr. CRERAR: As the hon. member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann) has said, the problem is an extremely important one, and I am grateful to him for the statement he has just made. In view of his experience I am sure any observations from him will be found useful in the department.

When I succeeded in inducing my colleagues to increase the medical vote for the Indians, I did so for the purpose of making an attack on tuberculosis among the Indians. The importance of the problem has not been overemphasized by the hon. member. As the committee will recall, a year ago there was a small appropriation for a preliminary survey in some of the Indian schools. That survey revealed an appalling state of affairs in many of the schools.

The vote this year is approximately $300,000. When we gave consideration to the question of how it could be most effectively spent, the department called into consultation the best tuberculosis authorities that we had in each of the provinces, and I wish to state publicly my appreciation of the services that they rendered. The line of attack which the department is now following carries with it the endorsation of these medical authorities who have had to do mainly with tuberculosis problems among the whites in each of the provinces. That program is directed, first, towards the schools where surveys are made, and active cases of tuberculosis, as well as potential spreaders, removed to sanatoria that may be adjacent to the schools. Every effort is made to segregate those who may be a source of infection. The program extends also to treatment in sanatoria of the more active cases from the reserves.

The allocation of the expenditure for this year falls roughly under three or four heads which pretty well coincide with the suggestions made by the hon. member for Renfrew South. It is proposed to add a tuberculosis trained man to the medical staff in the head office administration at Ottawa. The expenditure for medical men and public health nurses associated with the control of tuberculosis amounts to over $14,000; travelling expenses amount to between $10,000 and $11,000. Fees for diagnostic specialists and clinics employed in tuberculosis surveys, on the basis of ten thousand Indians to be examined, account for $30,000. There is a further provision for the examination of pupils who are found to have minimal tuberculosis in the Indian schools, a small allowance, amounting to $45,000 is made for their extra care and for food, over and above the tuition fees. For the maintenance of existing sanatoria and hospitals for Indians suffering from active tuberculosis there is the sum of approximately $190,000. I think it may be said that this is the first definite attack which has been made upon the problem among the Indian population.

As I said a moment ago, we have had the fullest cooperation from the provincial authorities, and certainly my conception of the method to be followed is to work in the closest cooperation possible with the health authorities in all the provinces who have more immediately under their charge the treatment of tuberculosis among the white population. I think we have made a fair start. It is quite true that more funds could be used if they were available, and it may be found possible to increase the vote next year based on the information we gather in regard to this problem during the present year. I would hope so, because there is no doubt that tuberculosis among the Indians has a definite relationship to the health of the white population. I hope, indeed I am sure, that we shall get satisfactory results from the expenditure we are making this year.

Item agreed to.

Medical—grants to hospitals, $5,320.

Mr. PERLEY: What hospitals receive part of this grant?

Mr. CRERAR: This amount is to pay the salaries of nurses engaged in Indian medical care in the northwest territories.

Item agreed to.

Welfare and training—welfare of Indians, $975,315.

Mr. BARBER: Would the minister explain this vote?

Mr. CRERAR: I have not the break-down of the item, but it has generally to do with welfare work among the Indians, the provision of relief all over Canada for the Indians, food and, in some instances, ammunition, nets for fishing, and the like.

Mr. BARBER: In the details given on page 126 of the main estimates I notice an item "repairs to buildings," for which the amount this year is $28,572, whereas last year it was $3,935; also another item "structures and parts (new construction)", for which the amount this year is $29,948, whereas last year it was $8,500. Where are these repairs and construction taking place?

Mr. CRERAR: Last year the corresponding items appeared in the special supplementary estimates. It is just the normal expansion of the work, but last year the item was carried in the special supplementaries, and this year the amount appears entirely in the main estimates.

Item agreed to.

Indian education, $584,508.

Mr. BENNETT: How is this money to be used?

Mr. CRERAR: It is mainly for day schools.

Mr. BENNETT: On what basis?

Mr. CRERAR: For the payment of teachers and supplies for the schools, and, in some instances, the building of new schools.

Mr. BENNETT: I thought that came under the other vote.

Mr. CRERAR: Hon. members will find the details at the bottom of page 126 of the main estimates: Salaries and wages, $304,456; supplies and materials, $79,500; travelling expenses, $13,000. Another large item is assistance to ex-pupils, $24,000; repairs to buildings, $49,688; structures and parts (new construction), $68,920.

Item agreed to.

Grants to residential schools, $1,335,975.

Mr. CRERAR: The grant varies in different schools. In some instances it is as low as $150 per school, and in others as high as $200. It depends somewhat on the location of the school. The higher grant is necessary in the northwest territories. Many of these residential schools are in the more remote northern parts of the western provinces, and some in the northwest territories, where the expenses are higher.

Mr. BENNETT: Can the minister give the committee a list of the schools there and the amounts allocated to each?

Item stands.

CANADIAN WAR MEMORIALS

APPRECIATION OF SERVICES OF CANADIAN BATTLEFIELDS MEMORIALS COMMISSION AND DESIGNER OF VIMY MEMORIAL

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, after the great war, parliament felt it desirable and fitting that the service and sacrifice of Canada's forces in the war should be commemorated by the erection of appropriate memorials on the fields of battle. With this end in view, the government established, by an order in council of September 2, 1920, the Canadian Battlefields Memorials Commission, consisting of the following members:

Major-General the Hon. S. C. Mewburn.
Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux.
Lt. General Sir R. E. W. Turner.
Lt. Col. R. W. Leonard.
Hon. J. G. Turriff

General Mewburn was designated chairman of the commission, and Colonel H. C. Osborne was appointed secretary. To this body, the task was entrusted of clearing war-torn ground, of planting trees and beds of flowers, of selecting the designs for the different memorials, and, generally, of supervising their construction. For more than a decade and a half the commission has carried on its labours with public-spirited enterprise. Under its auspices eight memorials, comprising the entire group as contemplated at the outset, have been brought to completion. Of these, three are located in Belgium—Passchendaele, St. Julien and "Hill 62," or, as it became known, "Sanctuary Wood." The other five are located in France, at Dury, Bourlon Wood, Courcelette, Le Quesnel, and at Vimy Ridge. In addition, plaques have been placed in the City Hall at Mons and St. Nazaire.

Only three members of the commission, General Mewburn, Hon. Senator Lemieux, and General Richard Turner, together with Colonel Osborne, the secretary, lived to see the completion of all the memorials. Since that time Senator Lemieux has also passed away.

To those who have been privileged to view the memorials, no word of explanation will be required with respect to the resolution now before the house. The members of the commission, serving entirely without remuneration, gave unstintingly of their time and energies to a task which called for the most careful and patient effort. It will be agreed, I believe, that their endeavours merit the recognition of parliament.

Of exceptional significance is the great memorial on Vimy Ridge, of which Mr. Walter S. Allward, of Toronto, is the designer and architect.

Hon. members who were in the house in 1923 will recall a resolution which was passed during the session of that year—a resolution which I had the honour of introducing—expressing the gratitude of the Canadian parliament to the French republic for the gift of 250 acres of land on Vimy Ridge. This gracious act on the part of France ensured that the monument, which Canada proposed to erect on that historic site, might stand on Canadian soil.

The efforts of the Canadian Legion, over a period of two years, in organizing the visit of eight thousand pilgrims to Vimy Ridge for the unveiling of the memorial on July 26, 1936, and the ceremonies incidental thereto, will still be present to the minds of hon. members, and will long be remembered by the Canadian people.

The Vimy memorial fulfils a twofold purpose. It commemorates the valour of our countrymen throughout the long years of the war, and the sacrifice of those who gave their lives in the conflict. It constitutes, in particular, a memorial of the heroic endeavours of the Canadian troops, and of their British and French brothers-in-arms, who fought upon the ridge at Vimy. On the monument are inscribed the names of Canadian soldiers who lie in unknown graves in France.

The monument at Vimy has been described as, perhaps, the most beautiful and striking of the memorials of the great war. Mr. Allward has given unsparingly of his artistic genius to interpret and commemorate the spirit and ideals of those who bore arms for Canada in the war. In the memorial he has achieved for the dominion, as for himself, a place of high distinction in the realm of sculpture. Not only has he given to the world a great work of art; he has caught, in an impressive manner, and preserved for our own and succeeding generations, the true significance of Canada's participation in the war. It is most appropriate, therefore, that an expression should be given by the parliament of Canada of its appreciation of Mr. Allward's services, an appreciation which will be shared by the people of Canada generally.

Accordingly, I desire to move, seconded by the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett):

That this house desires to record its thanks to the members of the Canadian Battlefields Memorials Commission, who served without remuneration over a period of years, and whose endeavours ensured the erection in France and Belgium of appropriate memorials of the valour and sacrifice of Canada's forces in the great war;

And, that this house desires particularly to express its appreciation of the services of Mr. Walter S. Allward, who, as the designer and architect of the memorial at Vimy, has given to the world, a work of art of outstanding beauty and character. Through the years to come the Vimy memorial will remain the symbol of Canada's efforts in the war, and its tribute to those who, on the field of battle, sought to preserve the free institutions of mankind.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I regard it, Mr. Speaker, as a great privilege to associate myself with the right hon the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the motion that you have just read. I do not propose to do more than state my entire agreement with the sentiments that have been so eloquently expressed by the Prime Minister, because at this time it would be out of place to make any extended observations.

The truth is that honouring the memory of the dead is a matter of very great importance. One of our own great Canadian statesmen, Joseph Howe, in stanzas which I think will live as long as his memory is preserved, has indicated why we should remember the glorious dead. To do so fittingly when our beloved dead rest in far distant lands was an extremely difficult task. When the Canadian Battlefields Memorials Commission was set up they cooperated closely with the British commission headed by General Sir Fabian Ware; and anyone who has visited the battlefields will agree, I think, that the work done has been magnificently conceived and certainly executed in a manner worthy of the highest praise.

Rich and poor, high and low, whatever may have been their place in civil life, find exactly the same memorial in these great cemeteries in France and Flanders. It is fitting that it should be so, because these crosses not only commemorate the valour of our immortal dead but tell the tale of sacrifice forever associated with the cross. I cannot do more than express deep regret that there remain but two, if my memory serves me rightly, of the original members of that commission which was appointed only a few years ago. It is a singular commentary on the brevity of human life.

The conception of this great memorial at Vimy Ridge was that of Mr. Allward of Toronto. The competition, I believe, was open to the world. The problem was how to interpret in stone the genius of a people and to commemorate at once the valour of brave men who gave their lives as a sacrifice for their country. I think it can be said of this memorial that it does interpret the genius of the Canadian people, and every Canadian who looks upon it will be filled with justifiable pride. Let us hope that in future years Canadians of those days will look upon that ridge and read the names of the men who perished and were buried in nameless graves, but marked for all time on the base of that great monument.

War is a hateful thing, and yet I sometimes feel that however hateful we may think it the fact remains that it has developed those great qualities in men of which we are so proud and of which we speak so often in praise and in recognition of their bravery, their courage, and their sacrifice. All these high qualities are exemplified in war, and the horrors of war. I repeat, I sometimes wonder why it is that in no field of history do we find such evidence of the great qualities of mankind as we find in the tales of their heroism, devotion and sacrifice in time of war, whether it be the Spartans at Thermopylae, or those who died on Vimy Ridge. Yet in our great memorial we have a magnificent work of art, some compensation for the disfiguring results of war.

So I regard it as a privilege to join with the Prime Minister in commending the efforts of the Canadian Battlefields Memorials Commission and in congratulating them upon the splendid service they have rendered to this country, and upon the fitting character and beauty of the memorials they have builded in various parts of France and Flanders, and that future generations may know that this Canadian parliament had a proper realization also of the splendid work done by Mr. Allward, sculptor and artist, in so fittingly interpreting the loyalty, courage and devotion of those who died on Vimy Ridge that we might live.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): There are before the minds of men to-day several things of priceless value. Perhaps the first of these is democracy. Following that are peace, prosperity and virtue. In order to achieve in the highest degree, and to preserve for the generations yet to come, these precious things, there are in my opinion two great necessities. The first of these is the unity and greatness of the British Empire. The second is the unity and greatness of Canada as part of that empire. The men whose memory we to-day are holding in reverence gave freely for democracy, peace, prosperity and virtue, for the unity and greatness of the British Empire, and for the unity and greatness of Canada. It has been truthfully said, "They served till death. Why not we"?

I have always been thrilled by the words which I understand have been placed on a great memorial to them. With those words I should like to close:

Their name liveth for evermore.

Motion agreed to.

COMMONS CHAMBER

QUESTION AS TO UNSATISFACTORY LIGHTING CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. N. J. M. LOCKHART (Lincoln): I should like to direct an inquiry to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Cardin). Possibly it has already been drawn to his attention, but I refer to the very unsatisfactory condition of the lighting across the back row of this chamber. Will he look into the matter and have it remedied before the next session of parliament?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works): The question was brought to my attention a few days ago by His Honour the Speaker, and I have asked the officers of my department to look into the matter and try to improve the lighting on that side of the house. I am under the impression that it has been better on this side since improvement has been made. The reason for preference was that the conditions on this side of the house were brought to my attention first.

Mr. LOCKHART: Possibly there is more need of light on that side!

FARMERS' CREDITORS

REQUEST OF UNITED FARMERS OF MANITOBA FOR EXTENSION OF TERM OF OPERATION OF ARRANGEMENT ACT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Last evening when the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was under discussion in the house the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) asked me if my attention had been drawn to the fact that the United Farmers of Manitoba had asked for an extension on the term of operation of the act, and had opposed the amendment offered in another place. I replied that as far as my memory went I had not received any such representation. I find on inquiry that a representation did come in on Tuesday from the secretary of the United Farmers of Manitoba to the effect that his organization was opposed to the termination of the act as proposed in the amendment. Owing to my absence until yesterday afternoon it was not drawn to my attention until yesterday evening after I had spoken in the chamber. I desire to make this explanation in fairness to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie.

CANADIAN TUNNELLING COMPANY

QUESTION AS TO SPECIAL PAY IN RESPECT OF OVERSEAS SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. MATTHEW MacLEAN (Cape Breton North-Victoria): I wish to address a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). In view of new and recent evidence submitted to the minister in reference to special pay to members of tunnelling company, is he now in a position to make a statement to the house in connection with this matter?

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): In view of additional evidence which has recently come to light the whole question is being reinvestigated by the department.

RADIO BROADCASTING

REPEAL AND REVISION OF RADIOTELEGRAPH ACT—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 52 respecting radio in Canada.

He said: The senate has made a number of amendments to Bill No. 52, none of which seriously change the purpose of the bill. There are several amendments to the definitions, and one or two new definitions. I think if anything these definitions have been improved by the changes.

Clause 5, which provided that the governor in council had power to exempt receiving stations in automobiles owned by bona fide tourists in Canada, has been changed by the senate, so that the act itself provides for exemption of such radios in automobiles of tourists, with the proviso that the minister may, when public welfare requires, suspend the operation of that clause.

Then the penalty clause has been divided into two parts, one part applying to private receiving stations, that is covering the operations of the ordinary listener, who has one or more radios installed in his home and uses them legitimately, but has not paid his licence fee. In that case the penalty is a maximum fine of $25 on summary conviction. The provision covering illegal use of receiving or transmitting sets has been made a separate clause, which provides a penalty of $50 on summary conviction and $500 on indictment.

I think that covers the changes, and I have no hesitation in moving concurrence in the amendment.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

MEASURE TO ASSIST IN THE CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 145, to assist the construction of houses.

He said: The amendments made by the Senate to this bill are of a grammatical nature and do not affect any of the essential principles of the legislation. I accordingly move concurrence.

Motion agreed to, amendments read the second time and concurred in.

JUDGES ACT AMENDMENT

PROVISION FOR ANNUITIES ON RETIREMENT AND REDUCTION OF SALARIES OF SUPERIOR COURT JUDGES RETAINING OFFICE AFTER AGE OF SEVENTY-FIVE

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I desire to withdraw this resolution. It was introduced for the purpose of remedying a situation, but having conferred with my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) who is an honorary life president of the Canadian Bar Association, apart from his other official capacities, I have come to the conclusion that it is better not to proceed with it. But I desire to say that I feel some responsibility in respect of the situation which exists, and I shall try to find some other way of remedying it.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I have a very strong opinion about this matter, and I congratulate the Minister of Justice upon having withdrawn the resolution. I hold the view, which I have expressed in this house frequently, that any member of the legal profession appointed to the bench is assumed to be an expert in law, that it is one of the implied conditions of his appointment that his fitness shall be a continuing fitness, and if for physical or other reasons he is no longer able to maintain his fitness as an expert he should retire. The Judges Act provides that he may retire and receive financial consideration as therein provided. During my term of office we introduced a measure, providing for the retirement of judges who had attained the age of seventy-five years or more, but it was defeated in the senate. Subsequently I was approached and told that if I so desired certain members of the bench would retire if we would enact legislation providing them with their full salaries. I declined to entertain the proposal, which was submitted to me by members of the profession, some of whom I think felt that they might be likely successors to the positions thus vacated. I took the view, which I still hold, that that was a very improper proposal. I took the view that for the judges of this country to suggest to the government of the day that if they were given their full pay they would retire and make way for someone else was something so scandalous as not to be entertained by any self-respecting government in Canada. I took that view then and I still hold it very strongly, and I congratulate the minister upon not having yielded to that sort of proposal. I was going to call it a threat, but it is worse than that. It is worse than a suggestion. It is—

Mr. POWER: Blackmail.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, that is a word one always hesitates to use, but it comes so close as nearly to express it. I therefore compliment the minister, as I say, for withdrawing this resolution; but I should remind him also that there appears to be ample provision in the statute as it now stands to deal with the situation. When it becomes known from the observations made by the minister that he does not propose, even for the purpose of creating an opportunity to appoint fifteen new judges, to yield to the suggestion made and ask the taxpayers to provide full compensation for judges retiring at seventy-five, probably they will take the hint and vacate positions which their very proposals indicate they themselves realize they are no longer able efficiently to fill and the duties of which they are no longer able effectively to discharge; I repeat that there is an implied condition in their contract of service that when that state of affairs is reached they will retire and vacate their office. If they do not do so, this parliament is powerful enough to see that they do.

Resolution withdrawn.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

Electricity and gas inspection service, including administration of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, $259,890.

Mr. BENNETT: You get all this money back, I take it?

Mr. EULER: Yes, that pays for itself.

Item agreed to.

Exhibitions and fairs, $438,720.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the reason for the increase?

Mr. EULER: It is because of the exhibition proposed to be held next year in New York.

Mr. BENNETT: Does that include Glasgow?

Mr. EULER: Yes, and Glasgow.

Item agreed to.

Precious Metals Marking Act, $12,900.

Mr. BENNETT: Do you get the money back for this service?

Mr. EULER: No.

Item agreed to.

Publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad other than in the United Kingdom and Europe, $56,920.

Mr. BENNETT: Here it seems to me we have great duplication. We have the estimates of the Department of Agriculture that deal with this matter; we have these estimates, and we have the commercial intelligence service, the vote for which has been just increased by $10,000. Could nothing be done to prevent this duplication? Could there not be a central bureau that would issue the publicity that is necessary in connection with these matters?

Mr. EULER: Mr. Chairman, I think the criticism of the leader of the opposition is justified. I may say that the government has under consideration the coordination of these services, and a committee has been appointed to deal with it.

Item agreed to.

Publicity and advertising in the United Kingdom and Europe, $356,580.

Mr. BENNETT: Does this expenditure come within the statement the minister just made? I ask that because the Department of Agriculture has given us the story as to what it was going to do in connection with advertising. We now have this enormous sum, and we have the money for advertising purposes which in days gone by was dealt with by the high commissioner. In the aggregate they amount to a substantial sum of money. I have always thought that we should be able to put in one document Canada's case for her products in the markets of the world. It would be issued by the government of Canada, and we should not bother so much about what department does it. If what the minister has said respecting the other items may be applied to this one, which amounts to some $356,000, obviously the matter should rest there until the government has had an opportunity to see what can be done to bring about what I regard as essential and what I believe the people of Canada regard as imperative in connection with the expenditure of money for advertising purposes. As the minister once said, what we are endeavouring to do is not advertising of departments but advertising of the products of Canada. We are trying to place the Canadian position, not that of any department, before those who would be the large customers of our country.

Mr. EULER: It is the hope of the various departments to coordinate all these services.

Mr. BENNETT: Including this item?

Mr. EULER: Yes. I can make no definite promise as to what will come out of this, but it is the hope of the government that the work can be coordinated.

Mr. PERLEY: I notice the item provides for an expenditure in connection with an advertising campaign put on by the wheat board. I have in my hand a folder which was distributed—

Mr. EULER: I do not wish to interrupt the hon. member unnecessarily, but I would point out that that has nothing to do with the item.

Mr. PERLEY: Then what item would it come under?

Mr. EULER: I am not sure that it comes under any item, because it is an expenditure which was undertaken by the wheat board itself. It does not enter into our vote at all.

Mr. PERLEY: It was a campaign of advertising which was put on; surely some department of government had something to do with it.

Mr. EULER: The wheat board has done it out of its own funds.

Mr. BENNETT: And without legal authority, I may say.

Item agreed to.

Weights and measures inspection service, $439,325.

Mr. BENNETT: We get the money back in this case.

Mr. EULER: Yes, we more than get it back; there is a surplus.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What prosecutions have there been during the year under this branch?

Mr. EULER: A total of 239.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What was the result of the prosecutions?

Mr. EULER: There were 144 prosecutions for short weight, 89 for the use of unjust scales, and 6 under other sections. There were 213 convictions, and 10 dismissals. Eight cases were withdrawn and there are 8 pending.

Item agreed to.

To provide for expenses of the royal grain inquiry commission including, authority for payment of honorarium to Doctor T. W. Grindley, secretary, $15,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What has been the total cost of the commission to date?

Mr. EULER: The vote of last year was not all expended, but it is estimated that the total amount will be in the neighbourhood of $100,000.

Mr. BENNETT: It looks as though it would be somewhat larger than that.

Mr. EULER: I think not.

Mr. PERLEY: The money we are now asked to vote is to cover the final payment in connection with the expenses of the commission. I regret to say that although the commission was set up two years and two months ago to make the inquiry, the report was not brought down until late this session. It was tabled on May 9, and since then we should have had an opportunity to discuss it. A discussion of this matter should not have been left until the last hours of a five months session. Certainly this was an important commission, and hon. members should have had an opportunity to discuss its findings.

The origin of the inquiry, the report of which covers some 259 pages, is set out at page 11 of the report. I quote:

The origin of the inquiry is to be found in a report of a special committee of the House of Commons concurred in by the house on June 17, 1936. This report, after dealing with the matters which had been specifically referred to the committee, concluded with the following recommendation:

"The committee further gave general consideration to the whole problem of the production and marketing of Canadian wheat and other facts pertaining to the wheat problem. Because of the gravity of this problem, and because your committee has neither the time nor the facilities to make a comprehensive survey of the situation, we recommend the appointment by the government of a royal commission to make a complete survey of the production, grading and distribution of Canadian grain, including the methods of marketing."

[Mr. Douglas.]

And then under paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) are set out the various methods of marketing. I claim that that is not the real origin of the commission. The final report of the special committee, which was tabled on June 11, 1936, a day or two before the close of the session, is a short one, and sets out the names of the witnesses who were heard. We find there were only three, namely Mr. Darby, Mr. Fowler and Mr. Murray. The order of reference of the special committee was to inquire into Mr. Murray's action on December 13, 1935, to see whether or not the charge that he had protected shorts was correct. The second paragraph of the report is in these words:

While there was a short interest in the Winnipeg wheat market in December of 1935, no evidence was produced that would warrant the conclusion that speculative short interests were protected by the board in that month. As the committee finds it impracticable to obtain conclusive evidence on this point, we recommend that this matter be referred for further investigation to the royal commission, the appointment of which is recommended in this report.

There was the origin of the commission—because the committee could not agree. When we heard the evidence of Messrs. Darby, Fowler and Murray, certain members of the committee asked that further witnesses be produced. We were refused. We asked that certain documents be produced, and were refused. It was then in a meeting in camera that the question of the general marketing of grain was considered. No witnesses were heard with respect to that matter, and the question of coarse grains came before the committee only through general discussion. It was decided that at some future time towards the end of the sittings of the committee there might be a discussion of that question, but that discussion was never had.

For these reasons I claim that the committee did not discuss or give any general consideration to the marketing of wheat or wheat products, other than in a meeting in camera. I must point out, however, that that meeting in camera was held after the committee had decided that we were to refer the matter to the royal commission. That is the first order of reference. I have the order of reference before me, but it is not necessary to read it to the committee. I have the statement here which was made by myself with respect to certain documents in the form of offers and acceptances that I had asked to have produced. Request was made also for the names of certain witnesses, but these were all refused when the committee was meeting in camera.

There have been seventeen grain inquiries during the last thirty odd years, the last four being the most important. On May 1, 1923, a royal commission was appointed headed by Mr. Justice Turgeon, two other gentlemen being associated with him. This commission took evidence in 1924 and reported in January, 1925. They took nearly two years to make their investigation. Then the Stamp commission was appointed by order in council dated April 10, 1931, and reported nineteen days later on April 29. I might say that Sir Josiah Stamp acted without remuneration and this inquiry was carried on at very little cost. I have his report before me.

Then the present Turgeon commission was appointed. It was decided on May 4 that it should be set up and the commission was appointed by order in council dated June 17, 1936. Evidence was taken in 1937 and the report was made more than two years after the commission was appointed. I claim that the cost of this commission was an unnecessary and useless expenditure. The review of the period prior to 1930 set out in this report is similar to the review contained in the report of the Turgeon commission which sat from 1923 to 1925, and the review of the Stamp commission. These summaries are all very similar, and all that was necessary to be done was to review the period since 1930, when the pools began to find themselves in more or less difficulty. In 1929 and 1930 the provincial governments were called upon to implement certain guarantees which they had made. They could not do this, and the federal government was brought into the picture. They took over the carry-over, and then finally in 1932 Mr. McFarland was called upon to carry on what were generally spoken of as stabilization operations. These operations resulted in an increase in the price of cash wheat from 42 cents, which was the lowest in many years, to 86 cents.

This present report gives credit to Mr. McFarland for the service that he rendered to the country and to western Canada in particular. The report states distinctly that these stabilization operations meant a great deal to the farmers of western Canada and that they received considerably more for their wheat than they would have received if the operations had not been carried out. That was something that we all knew in 1935 when a committee was appointed to consider the wheat board act. Mr. McIvor appeared before the committee and he was asked the results up to that time of the operations carried out by Mr. McFarland. He told the committee that the farmers of western Canada had been able to sell 1,700,000,000 bushels of wheat during the four year period at a price that he considered to be ten cents a bushel more than they would have received if these operations had not been carried on

This report sets out to the people of Canada the real service that Mr. McFarland rendered. I ask hon. members who were members of the house from 1930 to 1935 to recall the many occasions upon which the Hon. Mr. Ralston, who was seated in this immediate vicinity, attacked the government and Mr. McFarland. The government was charged with providing Mr. McFarland with funds to speculate and gamble in the wheat market. Let me remind hon. members that Mr. McFarland had to go on the market day after day to buy millions of bushels of wheat in order to maintain the price. He did this at a time when he knew the big interests were making raids on the market. On July 21, 1933, he was forced to buy 15,000,000 bushels of wheat. Compare what Mr. McFarland was up against with the action taken by Mr. Murray. On December, 13, 1935, 22,000,000 bushels of cash and option wheat were sold when it was known that prices were likely to increase. During July, 1937, Mr. Murray sold 62,000,000 bushels of wheat, not more than half of which went into export.

Following the change in government in 1935 there was a change in the personnel of the wheat board. Mr. McFarland and one of his associates were let out. Mr. McIvor was retained, and Mr. Murray was appointed chairman. From the very outset of their appointment this board started to pursue what is commonly spoken of as a fire-sale policy. Marketing conditions in other parts of the world at that time indicated that there would be an increase in price in the month of December, yet, as I said a moment ago, on December 13 that board, under the chairmanship of Mr. Murray, sold 22,000,000 bushels of wheat. Apparently that sale was made under an agreement that had been made on December 11 with a committee of the grain exchange.

Early in 1936 charges were made in the house in connection with that transaction. It was stated that a considerable part of that sale had been made for the purpose of protecting the short interests. It is stated on page 205 of this report that in 1935, when Mr. Murray took over from the McFarland board, there was a total of 177,682,000 bushels in short options. From the commencement of the appointment of the new board Mr. Murray carried on his fire-sale policy, which led to certain charges being made in this house. The main reason for those charges was an article that appeared in a Wall Street journal. I have in my hand a copy of that article, but I do not propose to read it all. It refers to the transaction of December 13, to this extraordinary action on the part of the wheat board. It says:

The Canadian grain board showed its co-operation with exporters, particularly the small ones that had made definite price contracts over night, by allowing them to take in their hedges at one-quarter cent over the market's close. Had this not been done, the small shippers would have been in a plight, for Winnipeg wheat futures opened up the permissible three cents limit on the following day. Thus exporters who had sold wheat overnight would have been hard pressed to cover their hedges.

Then comes this important paragraph:

As yet no Canadian government, irrespective of its political complexion, has recognized any obligation to succor the grain trading interests. The action of the Murray board, accordingly, constitutes an interesting precedent which is scheduled to be the subject of an important airing at the session to come.

I therefore claim that the leader of the opposition and myself were justified in making the charges that we did on the thirteenth of February, I think it was, and which resulted in a committee being set up. I have already referred to the order of reference to that committee. Mr. Murray was called before this committee and examined, and finally the committee, not being able to find conclusive evidence in either direction as to whether he had or had not taken certain measures, decided to refer the matter to a royal commission.

I want now to refer to some of the evidence given by Mr. Murray before the commission, and to show that from the very first, after he accepted the chairmanship of the board, he pursued a dictatorship policy not only in the selling of wheat, where he apparently did just as he pleased, but in other matters as well. I quote from page 9191 of the evidence, where Mr. Murray was being examined by Mr. MacPherson, counsel for the pool:

Q. As a matter of fact you never had occasion as chief commissioner to confer with the advisory committee at all?

That is the advisory committee to the board which the act provided for, and which was done away with when Mr. Murray accepted the position.

Mr. EULER: It was not obligatory.

Mr. PERLEY: The question was:

Q. As a matter of fact you never had occasion as chief commissioner to confer with the advisory committee at all?
A. No.

[Mr. Perley.]

Q. Was that your recommendation, or was that, again, a matter of governmental policy?
A. I stated that I would not accept the position of chief commissioner with any advisory board.
Q. So that your appointment was really contingent on the determination of this committee's life?
A. As far as I was concerned.
Q. And consequently you were appointed chief commissioner and the advisory committee as provided in the act ceased to exist?
A. Yes. The government had the choice, of course.
Q. Oh yes, I am not questioning that. That was during pleasure.
A. No, but I mean they had the choice of getting some one else for chief commissioner and keeping the advisory committee.

Then comes this last question:

Q. Yes. They had the choice of either taking you without the committee or getting somebody else with the committee?
A. Yes.
Q. I am submitting this, that you as a matter of principle refused to act as chief commissioner of the wheat board with the advisory committee as provided for in the act?
A. Yes.

I make this comment, Mr. Chairman, that had the advisory committee been there, Mr. Murray never would have sold the 22,000,000 bushels on the morning of the thirteenth when the market price of Argentine wheat had also gone up that same morning. That is proof that Mr. Murray dictated terms, and I believe that all the time he was operating he proved himself to be a dictator.

I could quote further from his evidence, if I desire to take the time, to show that he was also very inconsistent. I should not like to refer to him in the terms in which he referred to some hon. members of this house, but I could cite evidence to prove that he was in a similar position himself. In fact he stated on page 162 of the 1936 evidence, on April 28, "that the agreement that was made with the exchange was purely a verbal one." I myself had asked him whether there was any written statement or agreement, and he said no, it was purely a verbal one.

At page 259 of that evidence, on May 1, the leader of the opposition read into the evidence the agreement that had been made with the members of the exchange. In answer to the leader of the opposition Mr. Murray admitted that the agreement was made on the twelfth, and he stated that the suggestion came from the members of the Winnipeg grain committee. The concluding part of the paragraph reads:

The board agrees with the suggestion made by the exchange.

On page 196 of this report, in answer to questions put to him by Mr. Ralston, Mr. Murray admitted that he himself had made the approach and been the first to suggest that there should be a meeting with the members of the exchange, and further that he was the only member of the board who was present at that meeting when the agreement was made. Reference is made on page 196 to the meeting with the exchange and that Mr. Murray was the only member of the board to meet with the members of the grain exchange.

At page 198 of the report Mr. Murray refers to the fact that the board knew what was likely to take place in connection with the Argentine government. They had known, for several days before, of the action of the Argentine government, and they knew also on the morning of the thirteenth what action the Argentine government had taken, and they expected the increase—there is no question about that.

I should like to remind the committee at this point that what are known as the Big Three, that is Dreyfus and Company, Bunge and Company and the Continental were operating very extensively in the Argentine. Bunge and Dreyfus controlled practically all the wheat at that time before it was taken over at the price fixed by the Argentine government. Is it not fair to assume, then, that they would know what was likely to take place when the government of the Argentine was taking over the wheat and setting the price? It is only reasonable to suppose that they would know. They had acquainted their branch office in Winnipeg with the fact that word had come from the New York office, and no doubt their representatives in Winnipeg knew of it. I myself have seen a letter—I do not propose to give the name right now—written by the manager of a large United States firm, complaining that they were not being tipped off like some of the other large firms, and stating that they knew certain gentlemen had been dispatched from New York to Winnipeg to negotiate with their firm there and to acquaint many of the Winnipeg firms with what was likely to take place. All sorts of evidence could have been produced to show that they knew.

On page 197 of this report Mr. Murray was giving evidence and he admitted to Mr. Ralston that the agreement made with the exchange was new and quite unprecedented; that there was no precedent for it at all. Here is the evidence:

Q. Was an arrangement of this kind new as far as you know in the history of the grain trade?

A. Yes, it was new as far as the government was concerned.

Then he goes on to say:

In so far as it was an arrangement entered into with all people who were interested in the grain business.

There was no precedent for such an arrangement. In my opinion, if they had called certain witnesses, they could have proved that there was knowledge of what was going on. When the question was before the committee Mr. Murray was the only witness heard, and we asked for proof of sale so far as the grain firms were concerned, but no evidence was produced before the committee. I believe the minister will recall that he himself asked me whether all the evidence I had asked for as to proof of sale had been produced, and I said no. I said that the offers and acceptances, which were the main proof of sale, had not been presented to the committee. He must remember that.

Then we had the auditors' report—I have it here—which definitely states that in their search of the records they were unable to find proof of sale of 703,000 bushels. With respect to several hundred thousand bushels there was never any proof of sale, and it was delivered by the board to the grain people. The auditors' report is conclusive proof also that wheat was delivered without real proof of sale. What I am about to say is, I think, important. It is this. When Mr. Murray was being examined with regard to this transaction, as will be seen in the evidence, they only asked him two or three questions. First, they asked him whether he knew that there was a short interest in the market, and his reply was that he was not concerned whether there was or not. They asked him whether he knew, when he made the sales, that he was protecting the short interest, and his reply to Mr. Ralston, on page 190 and page 200 of the report, was that he did not know. Those were practically all the questions asked him—that is, pertinent questions.

Then Mr. McIvor was called. He was an accomplice in the crime, so to speak, and he was asked similar questions. He was asked, "Did you know there was a shortage?" And his answer was, "No." Then they asked him, "Did you know they were protecting the shorts?" And his answer was, "No." The other witness was Dean Shaw, that innocent chap from Saskatchewan. He was called in and asked the same questions. These three witnesses were all asked the same questions, and their answers were, "No." I contend that, though they did not have any more witnesses than the wheat committee had, we got just as far. We had Mr. Murray and we asked him these questions, and we had more proof of the fact that he knew that there was a short interest than Mr. Ralston apparently was able to bring out. I would remind the committee of the attitude of Hon. J. L. Ralston when he was accusing Mr. McFarland. When he was in opposition he tried to hang Mr. McFarland, so to speak. He tried to pin certain charges upon him. Here we have him, this hangman, in a different role. He has three prisoners before him and you can almost see the hangman's rope under his gown and the noose sticking out. But on this occasion, speaking to the prisoner, he says: "Did you think when you were clubbing this fellow that you were murdering him?" What would you expect the prisoner to say in reply? He asked Mr. Murray, charged with protecting shorts, "Did you think that you were protecting shorts when you sold the wheat?" What would anyone expect Mr. Murray to say? It was the biggest farce ever perpetrated on the people of Canada, and the people are asked to pay for it.

An hon. MEMBER: That is strong language.

Mr. PERLEY: Yes, but it is a fact. They should have called the members of the large grain companies whom we had asked to have before the committee, and there should have been a proper accounting of the books to trace the sales. If they had done that they would have got somewhere. But simply to call these three men and ask them the questions I have indicated was certainly a farce.

There were other questions that were referred to the commission but I do not think it is necessary to take up much time discussing them. There was the Saskatchewan oat deal. The problem was definite: who was responsible for the loss? This report sets aside for all time any difficulty in that connection inasmuch as it places responsibility for the loss of $163,000 upon the government of Saskatchewan during the time that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was premier. The evidence shows that they were speculating. They bought eight millions of options, two millions more than it was estimated that they would require, and they knew it; and they paid Gordon Brown $4,500 to manage this operation in which they took a loss of the sum I have stated, $163,000.

The question of a barley corner was referred to the commission, but I will not discuss that. The statement in the report is not correct that barley advanced only 10 cents in the month of December, because it advanced 29 cents. As regards the Saskatchewan oat deal, it might have been interesting to call the Minister of Agriculture, because he knew more about it than any other man, and his evidence might have thrown some light on the subject.

There is a certain recommendation with regard to the continuance of the board, and the recommendation is also made that small pools be set up. Well, we know what happened to the small pools, and we know what happened to the main pool. When there is competition with the strong interests, the recommendation of small pools is ridiculous because they could not operate at all.

I suggest that the inquiry should have been more thorough than it was. When the committee was set up we asked that a thorough investigation be made, and on March 30, 1937, dealing with the matter in the house, I myself asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce if he would see to it that the inquiry made should be full and complete. The right hon. leader of the opposition also made certain statements along that line, and we had a reply from the minister that he would endeavour to put the case before the commission and let us know what happened. I have certain correspondence here, too long to read in its entirety, but it is so important that I feel justified in reading some of it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was good enough to say to me on March 30 last year that he would endeavour to see that the inquiry was as thorough as possible and that the case was placed before the commissioner, which was done. I asked for this correspondence at the opening of this session, and it was tabled, so it is all on the record.

The first letter is from the deputy minister to Hon. W. F. A. Turgeon, Royal Grain Inquiry Commission, and dated April 5, 1937, as follows:

Dear Judge Turgeon:

Mr. Euler has asked me to forward to you the enclosed copy of Hansard for Tuesday, March 30, commencing on page 254 of which you will find the discussion that took place in the house with reference to an item "Expenses of the Royal Grain Inquiry Commission" in our supplementary estimates for 1936-37.

You will observe the remarks by Mr. Perley (Qu'Appelle) and by the Rt. Hon. Mr. Bennett in regard to the oats deal by the Saskatchewan government in 1935, a reference to the corner on barley and a direct inquiry by the Rt. Hon. Mr. Bennett as to whether the commission would investigate the grain and elevator companies that acquired stocks of grain at the lake ports and their profits. Mr. Euler stated that he would bring these comments to your attention.

Will you kindly let me know, for the information of the minister, whether or not these matters have been or are likely to be dealt with by the commission and if not, your views in that connection?

There is a lengthy reply addressed to the deputy minister, dated April 16. There are some important paragraphs. It acknowledges receipt of the letter of April 5 and enclosed copy of Hansard, and states that the delay in reply was due to the fact that the letter was sent to Vancouver and had to be returned to Edmonton. It states that the commission is authorized to inquire into and report on—

All transactions since the year 1930 pertaining to the handling of grain for relief and seeding purposes in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta under the dominion government guarantee, or otherwise.

And continues:

It is anticipated that evidence will be taken on this phase of the inquiry when the commission sits in Regina, probably early in May.

Secondly, there has been some reference in the evidence already taken to what Mr. Perley mentioned as a "corner on barley."

They say they are going to take evidence with respect to that when they get to Winnipeg. The reply continues:

Thirdly, I am not quite clear regarding the nature and scope of the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett's proposal that we should investigate the "grain and elevator companies that acquired stocks of grain at the lake ports and their profits as was done in the case of the textile companies and ascertain what happened in connection with the rest of the crop that was sold in connection with which there was a loss of $15,000,000, though there appears now to have been a profit of $8,000,000."

Then he says Mr. Bennett expressed the view that the commission should—

"investigate the various grain companies that acquired from the grain board, presided over by Mr. Murray, the wheat that was at the lake ports and should ascertain who owned that wheat, the visible supply in Canada at the present time."

And following Hon. Mr. Euler's question: "Any particular time?" Rt. Hon. Mr. Bennett replied:

"At this time, before the opening of navigation. The commission should ascertain who owns the wheat and should investigate the accounts, showing the profits with respect to these transactions."

Then a further paragraph:

The proposal quoted appears to involve following through the grain and futures disposed of by the board and ascertaining what amount of such grain now constitutes part of the present visible supply in Canada and by whom it is owned, and the financial result of the transactions so far as the purchasers from the board are concerned. It is not considered that such an inquiry is contemplated by P.C. 1577.

But quite apart from the order in council it would appear that such an inquiry would be altogether impracticable as it would involve an attempt to trace through and segregate the ultimate results of individual transactions respecting parcels of wheat or futures which, up to July 31, 1936, aggregated upwards of 100,000,000 bushels and covered, even up to that date, a period of about 200 trading days.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I regret to have to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him that he has exhausted his time.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like to finish this.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This will serve as an interruption, and the hon. gentleman may go ahead.

Mr. PERLEY: Thank you.

In addition to segregating the transactions in these parcels from purchases by the individuals concerned from other sources, there is the factor that in following through to ascertain the financial result to the purchaser the wheat covered by the $15,000,000 and $8,000,000 referred to would have to be distinguished in the purchaser's accounts from 1935-36 crop wheat purchased from the board, and it seems apparent that this could not be done. An attempt to follow through specific transactions in futures would seem to be even more futile.

Then it winds up:

For the reasons given above such an inquiry is not contemplated, any more than it is contemplated that the financial results to purchasers from the pools or the central selling agency would be gone into. Without, of course, prejudicing the matter, it would rather seem as if the transactions might be more logically appraised by conditions existing and reasonably to be forecast at the time of the transactions than by post hoc developments.

Now there is a statement by Judge Turgeon himself that he did not propose to make a thorough investigation.

I have numerous other letters here. That letter was acknowledged; the minister suggested to Judge Turgeon that he would like to refer the letters to Mr. Bennett and myself, and he got consent to do so. The letter directed to myself, dated April 22, 1937 reads as follows:

I am directed by the minister to forward you herewith for your information copies of correspondence between Mr. Justice Turgeon and myself, relating to questions asked in the House of Commons on March 30 last by the right hon. Mr. Bennett and yourself with respect to certain phases of the inquiry.

Attached is a copy of my letter of April 5 to Judge Turgeon, and copy of his reply, which is dated April 16. The right hon. Mr. Bennett has also been provided with copies of this correspondence.

That is from the deputy minister. I have the answer that the Right Hon. Mr. Bennett made to a similar letter addressed to himself dated April 26, in which he said:

I am wholly dissatisfied with the answer made by Judge Turgeon and you may so inform him. If he could deal with the balance sheets of the textile companies as he has he certainly could deal with the balance sheets of the elevator and other grain companies so as to show what, if any, profit was made by them through the acquisition of grain from the wheat board, assuming that the grain so acquired has since been disposed of. No one was suggesting that he should investigate the handling of the 100,000,000 bushels of grain, and I doubt if anyone knows that more clearly than he does himself. I merely suggested that he apply the same principles in dealing with the grain companies as he did in dealing with the textile companies. There was a large quantity of grain owned by grain companies east of Fort William over the winter season of 1937. When was it bought, from whom, and what profit was made on it? Those questions really cover what I had in mind when I was speaking in the house.

I have the correspondence that took place between Colonel Ralston and myself. I replied to that letter setting out what I intended when I asked that the inquiry be thorough. My letter was also referred to Colonel Ralston, and I have here a two-hundred word lettergram from Colonel Ralston. The final words are:

> If there are further matters which you think are within scope of commission and are not already being covered, would you kindly write giving definite particulars of what you have in mind.

In reply I sent a five page letter, which I am not going to take time to read, but which I can summarize in this way: I said I thought the inquiry should be thorough; that they should proceed along the lines that had been followed in connection with the textile commission, where Judge Turgeon was also commissioner. I cited what the implement committee had done in connection with sending auditors to the head offices of the implement companies in order to audit their books and bring the statements back to the committee. I also told Mr. Ralston that from my experience with him on two important committees of this house he was beginning to know the grain business pretty well; that he had the ability and that, if he so desired, he could assist the judge in making this a thorough inquiry. In reply I received a statement from the auditors. Colonel Ralston stated that Price Waterhouse and Company had audited certain books of the exchange. They made reference to certain paragraphs in letters from myself and the leader of the opposition, as well as the books of certain firms. But really there were no official audits made. They went and asked these companies to show them their books and accounts, and finally stated to the committee that they did not think a further audit was necessary, that it would require quite a period of time and that it would involve following through the different accounts. Then they made the statement, in regard to the sixty-two million bushel transaction that I have cited in July, in order to show how difficult it would be to trace those sales, that during the month of July there had been 640,000,000 bushels traded in. In other words, the whole crop had been bought and sold three times during that month.

So, Mr. Chairman, I think there is proof conclusive that they never intended to make this a thorough inquiry. Certainly they did not examine the members of the exchange as we desired. In one of my letters I suggested that they might examine the books of the "big three," to see what influence they had on the market, and also that their transactions might be traced.

Now I desire to take just a little time to deal with the recommendations and suggestions that have been made. As I stated a moment ago the commission recommended that small pools be set up to carry on and that the wheat board stand by. When they made the recommendation concerning the wheat board I say that was an admission of failure, as far as the Winnipeg Grain Exchange was concerned. Let me say here that Mr. Richardson, Mr. Sydney Smith, Mr. Milner, and others who gave evidence before the committee in 1935, suggested that somebody should stand by with a basket to take up the slack in case of an emergency, as Mr. McFarland had done. Now the commission recommends that the board stand by, for this season at least, in case of an emergency. Then the recommendation is made that there be some supervision of the grain exchange. Practically all the witnesses agreed on that. At page 9242 of the evidence Mr. Murray said there should be some machinery for supervision, similar to that recommended by the Stamp commission. Mr. Paul Mehl, senior agricultural economist, at page 11211 of the evidence, said at Chicago that exchange self-government did not meet the situation in the United States, and that there should be some control. Mr. Darby, secretary of the grain exchange, speaking for the exchange, said that supervision such as the Stamp commission recommended would be good. Mr. Taggart, a farmer from Gull Lake, Saskatchewan, said there should be some supervision of the exchange to prevent raids on the futures market. Mr. Mathieson, speaking of Chicago, said Chicago was no more difficult to trade in than Winnipeg, yet Chicago had supervision. Mr. McFarland, dealing with the type of supervision suggested by the previous witnesses, at page 7626 stated that he did not think it would be of any use whatever, that a supervisor of that kind would be like a guest in the clearing house.

With regard to the need for supervision, evidence was given of raids, by the "big three" in particular, on the Winnipeg exchange. The Stamp commission took evidence with respect to the amount of trading carried on during a given period, and also with respect to raids made from time to time on the market. In that evidence an interesting fact was brought out. They took the year 1929, which was considered an average crop year, when we had 304,000,000 bushels of wheat in western Canada. They found that during that year there had been 7,200,000,000 bushels of wheat traded in. The period taken was from May 1, 1929, to March 31, 1930. Taking that as including some three hundred trading days, there was an average of about 24,000,000 bushels traded in each day. The crop, as I have said, totalled 304,000,000 bushels. That year the pools handled 121,000,000 bushels which did not need to be hedged and did not go through the market. There were 50,000,000 bushels retained for seed, so the hedgeable grain from that crop amounted to only 133,000,000 bushels. The carry-over from the previous year was 91,000,000 bushels, of which a certain amount was controlled by the pools, leaving only 43,000,000 bushels available for hedging purposes. This gave a total of 176,000,000 bushels of wheat available for hedging during that period in 1929, but the grain exchange traded in 7,200,000,000 bushels. In other words they bought and sold the crop forty-one times.

I just want to ask any hon. member of this house in his right senses, particularly any farmer member, if he thinks it is necessary to have an organization that will buy and sell a crop forty-one times in order to market 176,000,000 bushels of cash grain. I do not think it is necessary, and I think they were wise when they suggested some supervision and control.

Now I want to refer to the question of speculation and the cost of hedging, in connection with which a number of witnesses were examined. Sir Robert Robson appeared before the Stamp commission and said that as a result of speculators losing money gambling in wheat in Chicago, he thought the people in England got their grain much cheaper. Mr. Sydney Smith referred to speculating on the Winnipeg market. He said, "I think the great majority was held by farmers. Farmers are speculators, merchants are speculators;" everybody was speculating. I do not think that should be permitted.

Then there were numerous other witnesses who gave evidence as to what speculation costs Canada. Mr. Poloway, of the Dauphin district made a statement to the effect that the farmers of his district in the year 1929-30 had lost $970,000. We have the informed and the uninformed public among the witnesses who were examined. Mr. Murray himself said that Canada was only looking in its own backyard. Mr. Darby answered the question as to who would be competent speculators. He stated they would be the members of the Winnipeg exchange, and stated that the uninformed public were the farmers, stenographers and clerks.

Mr. Dowler gave evidence that they had to have these speculators in the market in order to set an average or proper price representing the value of wheat. I say you cannot have a fair market or a fair price when you have a market of speculators who, as has been shown by the evidence—and I should like to quote it further—are not competent judges. How is it possible that a price registration which depends upon an unknown volume of unintelligent speculators can be said to record as accurate an estimate of present values as can be achieved, as was suggested by Mr. Dowler of the exchange?

I have much evidence before me as to what would happen if the Winnipeg market closed. Mr. David Muir of Glasgow stated that he would see no difficulty if the futures market closed. Mr. Stoik of Antwerp, a broker, when asked what difference it would make to his purchases of Canadian wheat, could not see that it would make any difference; that it would be just one less to deal with. Snodgrass of Glasgow said that if the Winnipeg market disappeared and the futures market were to close, he could get along quite well without it. Mr. Bracey, an English buyer for the Scottish Wholesale Cooperative at Liverpool, said this would be a good procedure, and that the advantage would be to the producer.

There were many others whose statements I could give if I had the time. I submit the price of our wheat on the Liverpool market must ultimately prove to be a better basic bargaining start than the futures market. I should have liked to have time to deal with some other aspects of the matter. I should like to tell what the farmers who came before the commission said, when they stated their case. However, I do not wish to take too much time along that line.

I have some evidence before me in the report with respect to the operations of the "big three." I have evidence from a British witness who said that the "big three" had driven the small man out of the Liverpool market. I submit therefore that a business which is so important to the national life of Canada as is the marketing of wheat; which has been the subject of seventeen royal grain inquiries in thirty-seven years; which is carried on under rules and regulations of an exchange subject to the control of nobody outside; which does not know the volume of hedging transactions as distinct from speculation carried on in its trading room; which does not know who operates on its market, or if there are any large manipulative traders; which refuses to divulge the volume of business conducted on its premises, and which is subject to outside investigation only by royal commission with respect to the conduct of its affairs—any such business must be a proper subject for strict and full governmental supervision.

I say the supervision recommended in the commission report does not go far enough. I regret at this session the minister is not even going to move concurrence in the report, or take action with respect to it to implement some of the suggestions made therein. I therefore make the following recommendations:

1. That a national grain board be put into force to operate under the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and that all coarse grains be brought under the operation of the act. I would even go so far as to suggest that the act be enlarged to take in all grain products.

2. That grain merchants and elevator companies operate as at present, doing a general grain business on the open market.

3. That there be supervision by a board of the operations of the exchange and the Winnipeg Grain Clearing house, in the following manner:

Said board to be a branch of the board of grain commissioners, and to be composed of three members—the chairman of the board of grain commissioners to be the chairman—and two other members, one of whom would be appointed by the producers and one by the grain dealers. This branch of the grain commissioners would have full control and operate the clearing house. They would license all members, grant a line of credit for trading purposes, set rates of commissions and clearing charges, and have control of the amount of future trades that could be cleared in proportion to the amount of actual cash grain handled by each individual trader.

In conclusion I submit that the grain act should be amended, and that the wheat board act should be put into full force and carried out at once. I protest against the failure of the Turgeon commission to bring out the facts with respect to trading through the Winnipeg clearing association, although we had asked that that be done.

[Mr. Perley.]

We are now being asked to vote a sum to meet the further costs of the commission which was set up more than two years ago and headed by Judge Turgeon, who receives a judge's allowance of $9,000 a year and $35 per day for living and travelling expenses. The commission retained Mr. Ralston at $200 a day and expenses, and paid an assistant $50 per day, and $10 per day for expenses. They had a very expensive staff. May I point out further that that is not the whole cost of the commission so far as the people of Canada are concerned. We know that the commission was followed by nineteen other counsel, four or five of whom were leading men such as Mr. Brockington, Mr. Pitblado and Mr. MacPherson. Certainly someone has to pay for that, and the payment will fall on the people of Canada.

After taking evidence in 1937 the commission filed a report on May 9 of this year. I say we should have had the report before us in time to deal with it properly at this session. The commission began their sittings in Ottawa, and then moved to Fort Wiliam, Winnipeg, Regina, Saskatoon, Edmonton, Calgary, Vancouver, then returning to the Atlantic seaboard. They went overseas and sat in London, Liverpool, Antwerp and other places. They sat and sat and sat and sat for almost two years. Who would not sit and and sit if he were getting $200 a day and expenses to tour Great Britain, the continent and all of Canada?

All this was at great expense to the pools. The pools had to send their representatives. What is the value of the report? What value can there be attached to a report on which no action is taken—a report I am inclined to believe that the wheat committee of this government reviewed and sent back a time or two.

Mr. EULER: What is that?

Mr. PERLEY: I believe the wheat committee reviewed the report before it was printed and before it was tabled, and reported it back to be revised.

Mr. EULER: Absolutely untrue.

Mr. PERLEY: I have anticipated the minister's statement. But reports we have received would lead us to believe that. I am led to believe that from the comments by members of the Winnipeg grain exchange the morning the report was tabled in the house, comments which lead us to believe that someone there knew something about it. However, that is something that possibly cannot be proved.

Mr. EULER: There are other things that cannot be proved also.

Mr. PERLEY: We are facing an emergency and we should have a statement from the minister before this vote passes as to what he proposes to do this fall. The pool representatives have been down here negotiating with the government. We have a crop in prospect but we are facing an emergency. We want the wheat board. We want a fixed minimum price of from 87 to 90 cents. We want participation certificates, and we want the personnel of the board changed so that it will have the confidence of the producers. We want an advisory committee set up. That was the one protection the farmer had, when he had four representatives on the committee. Why should fourteen or fifteen Liberal members of this house be going back to Saskatchewan with a promise in their vest pockets of a wheat board? Reports have been going around that these fourteen or fifteen members swallowed this promise and agreed to vote for the budget. They were given the promise that they were going to have a wheat board, and they are taking back that promise. We should have a statement made right here so that we will know what is to happen. The farmers have a right to know.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think I should take exception at once to what the hon. member has said about any promise having been made to western members with respect to a wheat board. Nothing of the kind was ever suggested.

Mr. BENNETT: The western members made the promise.

Mr. PERLEY: I was led to believe that there was quite an interesting caucus held. If the reports I received were right—they may not be—but the western members understood that they were going to have a wheat board and they promised that they would come into this house and vote for the budget if they got a wheat board.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Apart from the impropriety of referring to what takes place in a party caucus, may I say to my hon. friend—

Mr. BENNETT: Personal and private letters are no longer private.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The subject was never discussed in a Liberal caucus. That is the answer to what my hon. friend has said.

Mr. PERLEY: Some of the Liberal members may have gained the wrong impression, because they have said they are going to have a wheat board.

Mr. EULER: The announcement was made by myself that there would be a wheat board, and it was said that the price would be fixed later on. That statement was made weeks ago.

Mr. PERLEY: I should like the minister to substantiate that by stating that we are going to have a real board functioning under the act. I want him to tell us that we are to have a minimum price, that we are to have participation certificates. If we are not going to have a wheat board, I think the pools should know so that they will have an opportunity of organizing.

Mr. EULER: The pools will not operate if there is a wheat board. There is going to be a wheat board. They knew that, and my hon. friend knew that.

Mr. PERLEY: I regret very much that we have not had an opportunity to discuss the 1936-37 report of the wheat board, signed on January 6, 1938. The time has been much too short.

Mr. EULER: You will have another opportunity if you want it.

Mr. PERLEY: In conclusion let me say again that the money spent on this report is absolutely wasted. We knew most of what is contained in the report long before they ever began to take evidence.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know whether I agree with what has been said by the hon. member who just sat down (Mr. Perley) as I did not hear much of it. I heard a few words like "McFarland," "carry-over," "shorts and longs" and "overages," but I did not hear anything about "fire sale."

Mr. BENNETT: The evidence of that is here also.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: We must use every shining hour, yea minute if we are to get out of here this afternoon. I am going to talk until one o'clock as a sort of cocktail before lunch. I do not take them myself, but I know some other hon. members appreciate them. As I understand it, there are two items before the committee, Nos. 372 and 373. I want to say a word or two on item No. 375. There are four items here that are identical and intertwined, one with the other, and I think they should be considered as one. I have my dope arranged in that way and I do not want to disarrange it. The chairman has assured me that I can make any reference to grain I desire under vote 372.

The first item refers particularly to the royal grain commission, and I think I can say what I think of that commission in two words, yes two letters, I think it is "N.G," but must as I go along give my reasons for so thinking. We all remember the remarkable unanimity there was in committee of the whole when the Wheat Board Act of 1935 was under discussion, and when it received its third reading. I think it would have been a good thing if that unanimity had continued. This matter has been ushered into the realm of politics by the order in council objected to. Why is so much being said about this problem now? It is due to the fact that while the present government was joint father of the wheat board act, it has committed infanticide or at least has mutilated the foster child to such a degree that it might as well be dead. This act is simply an ornament on our statute books.

Mr. BENNETT: It is an ornamental statute.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I know some hon. members want a fairly good cocktail. This act received unanimous support at that time and I think every effort should be made to continue that feeling of unanimity. Certainly things should not have been changed to such an extent without the consent of this parliament. I should like to quote from a speech made by my right hon. leader at Calgary on September 30, 1935.

The CHAIRMAN: One o'clock.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The cocktail is not worth a rap—too small.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Progress reported.

TRANSPORT COMMISSION

AUTHORITY TO CONTROL TRANSPORT OF PASSENGERS AND GOODS BY RAILWAYS, SHIPS AND AIRCRAFT —CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 31, to establish a board of transport commissioners for Canada, with authority in respect of transport by railways, ships and aircraft.

He said: This bill has been returned with its tail-feathers rather clipped. It is not the bill which this chamber adopted; still, there is something left.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

In the interpretation clause several changes have been made. Two further definitions have been added. Waste paper loaded as full ship's cargo has been put in the list for exemption from regulation. To that there is no particular objection.

The changes are principally in part I, in relation to transport by water.

As a subsection of section 3 the following has been included:

(2) It shall be the duty of the board to perform the functions vested in the board by this act and by the Railway Act with the object of coordinating and harmonizing the operations of all carriers engaged in transport by railways, ships and aircraft, and the board shall give to this act and to the Railway Act such fair interpretation as will best attain the object aforesaid.

That is not material. However, section 5 has been changed by practically eliminating the convenience and necessity provision. It is provided that any boat that can indicate that at any time within the last ten years it has been engaged in carrying any item of package freight will be entitled to a certificate of convenience and necessity under the grandfather clause. Some forty boats are actually and exclusively engaged in package freight, and some 150 other boats are now eligible to engage in it, so that the certificate of convenience and necessity will not have any particular meaning with these amendments added.

Then an amendment has been added which exempts from the operation of the act shipping between the Pacific coast and the Atlantic coast. I think that that is unfortunate, because by putting this traffic outside the scope of the act, it does not enable those engaged in it to protest agreed charges which may affect the traffic of the ships in that service.

However, the bill has been reported with those changes. Aside from those I have mentioned there are, I believe, no material changes. As I have said, in my opinion it is not as good a bill as went to the senate, but after a good deal of consideration I have decided to ask the concurrence of the house in the senate amendments.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

TRADE AND COMMERCE

To provide for expenses of the royal grain inquiry commission, including authority for payment of honorarium to Dr. T. W. Grindley, secretary, $15,000.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When the committee rose for lunch I was about to read the report of a speech made at Swift Current by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). But I think I will defer that for a moment, and deal with what, I believe, should come before that, namely, the ill-fated order in council with the worse than ill-fated rider thereon—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear. Without authority of law.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: —which not only sterilizes the bill but caponizes it also. I pronounced "caponizing" with a long "a"; but no matter whether you use the long "a" or the short "a", it and "sterilizing" mean the same thing to the bill, because they render it innocuous.

It has been the most distressing experience of my whole life that a Liberal government should do this. Would to the Most High that it had been the Tories who had been responsible for it, or yon strange people in the corner. I could have put up with it, not easily, but at least without agony. What has come over the government? Wait till I read this fatal abuse of executive power. Well, it is too long to read it all.

Remember first that when this order in council was launched across the prairie it created such consternation and resentment that I have never seen the like of it. What was that about? Because an order in council had been passed which thwarted the will of this parliament—

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: —and nullified it, —passed by a Liberal government, no less.

An hon. MEMBER: No more!

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I have not the patience to read the blamed thing. We have on our files 174 bills passed this year, or which will soon have been passed, by this house. If the executive can pass this kind of order in council and get away with it, not one of the bills which passed this year is safe from the dexterity of similar orders in council passed here by an expert hand. Why have these 174 bills been passed? What do we gather here for? Might we not just as well have a Mussolini and be through with it? Why this assembly at all? I have been down in the West Indies for a time recovering from one of this kind of fights. Down there the governor, of course, is boss. But surely in Canada the days of governor bosses have gone and we have something like democracy.

I do not know where to start, reading for most convenience, but I will quote the following:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated August 27, 1936, from the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, stating that under clause A of section 8 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, 1935, provision is made that it shall be the duty of the Canadian wheat board, established under the said act, to fix the price to be paid to the producers of wheat delivered to the board as by the said act provided, subject to the approval of the governor general in council:

That the Canadian wheat board, established under the said act, has fixed a price of eighty-seven and one-half cents (87½ cents) per bushel for wheat graded as No. 1 Northern at Fort William, as a basis price for wheat for the 1936-37 crop year, effective from August 1, 1936, delivered to the board as provided by the said act, the price of other grades of wheat to be fixed by the board on the basis of the price for No. 1 Northern wheat delivered at Fort William as aforesaid;

Then for some strange reason it makes reference to the appointment of the royal grain commission. I do not think that it is necessary to read that; the committee will take it for granted. The appointment of a commission! The very thing that should have warned the government against meddling in this matter. And then the government take this important part—grain marketing—away from the commission and decide it themselves, when the problem is sub judice. I think, after all, I had better read it:

That the Honourable William Ferdinand Alphonse Turgeon of Regina, Sask., a judge of the court of appeal of Saskatchewan, was appointed a commissioner under part I of the Inquiries Act, being chapter 99 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, to inquire into and to report upon the subject of the production, buying, selling, holding, storing, transporting and exporting of Canadian grains and grain products, and other questions incident to such matters, and in particular, but without restricting the generality of the foregoing terms, to inquire into and to report upon:

The methods now or heretofore employed in marketing Canadian grains abroad, including government grain boards, cooperative or pool marketing, price stabilization measures and the open market or competitive method; and the effect of these various methods upon markets;

The measures which should be taken to retain and to extend the marketing throughout the world of Canadian wheat and other grains and their products.

The minister, therefore, recommends that the recommendations of the Canadian wheat board be not approved unconditionally but that approval be given only in the event of the closing market price for wheat dropping below ninety cents per bushel for wheat graded as No. 1 Northern at Fort William, in which event a price of 87½ cents per bushel as recommended by the board shall be approved, and this order in council be regarded as approving the same.

That is the rider that did the trick; that is the rider that defies parliament; and in my estimation it will be very bad for the authors thereof. The order in council last year was different; it left out the reference to the royal commission. Let me tell you the consternation with which this action was received throughout the prairies. I first heard about it on a Saturday night and I refused to believe it. I thought it was some fool report across the wires such as we sometimes get, some mistake; and it was not until Monday morning that I discovered when I went to deliver my wheat to the pool elevator for the board that I could not do it, after working hard with others to get this method of marketing satisfactorily established. I was not on the special committee, but outside I was helping to get the bill through in order that we might have a piece of legislation about which there would be no controversy. I am familiar enough with law to know that if you get all parties behind an act you are well away with the administration of it; but if the people are split in two, one-half bucking the other, then you will have difficulty in administering your law. The matter should have been left as it was until this parliament could make any change deemed necessary. It should not have been done by order in council or any such reprehensible method. It should, I repeat, have been done by this parliament and not otherwise. I have no language to describe the horror of the people, especially the Liberals. We were used to hearing these things about the Tories governing by order in council, and whatever the Tories do is always wrong anyhow—we are always safe, so it is averred, in that assumption. But regardless of politics, right across those stricken prairies, like a bolt from the blue went roars of indignation that can almost be heard to-day. I am trying to reverberate them a little. You do not need to be told about the popular indignation in the prairies, and I cannot adequately describe it.

Dozens and possibly hundreds of telegrams and letters were sent to the ministry. I myself sent three of them, and in those telegrams I left nothing unsaid. It would have cost the same to send a wishy-washy telegram or letter as to send a good one and the good one went. In addition to these messages all the municipal organizations, all the agricultural societies, within and throughout the prairies, the provincial government of Saskatchewan in session assembled, and the province of Manitoba —all these various bodies made representations against the emasculated wheat board. The province of Saskatchewan two years in succession passed resolutions on the question asking for a wheat board, and I believe that they had in mind not a sterilized but a real one. They did not designate. The province of Manitoba said that they wanted a real, live wheat board, one that would not hibernate twelve months in the year. Notwithstanding all this, in this democratic country, the government stood obdurate. We all like the idea that once a man has put his hand to the plough he should not turn back; but when you have put your hand to a plough with crooked handles the quicker one turns back the better and easier is the turning.

With such an order in council as that, look at the danger and likelihood there was in appointing a royal commission which would in all probability take its cue from that order. And that is what they did, and that is the kind of report we got. It was the will of the government expressed there in that order in council. Let me say a word about the appointment of the commissioner. A good many foolish people talk about the vast amount of money spent for the commissioner and his counsel, but if we had got value the price was not too high; if, on the other hand, we have not got value, then the money was wasted. I do not think it was fair to commissioner Turgeon to appoint him as sole commissioner. Ever since the first chairman of a royal grain commission was appointed, Judge Sinclair of Perth in the county of Lanark—my birthplace, by the way—ever since he was appointed to the first grain commission in 1898 or 1899, I forget which, there have never been fewer than three commissioners investigating these many sided grain problems until the last one of 1936. And even with the united efforts of all these we have never yet had a grain act that the grain mixers at the head of the lakes and elsewhere could not drive a coach and four through if they were any kind of teamsters at all. I do not think any living man alone can do justice to an inquiry of this nature with such extensive ramifications. I repeat. I do not think it was fair to Mr. Justice Turgeon. There was much to be inquired into about the technique of terminal elevators. I wonder if Justice Turgeon or any of his counsel were ever in a terminal elevator. They certainly got as far away as they could from the depredations that I am going to speak about presently; trying to investigate an elevator at the head of the lakes from Vancouver is a new stunt to me. That is all I will say about the commissioner, except to repeat that no man living can properly investigate a great question like the grain trade with the doors of inquiry wide open, as expressed in the order in council.

And what about the counsel? Who says aught against the ability of Colonel Ralston? Not I. But I have a little to say about the propriety of both the giving of it and of his taking it. It is not considered good form—I may be getting on legal ground with which I am not too familiar—but the very last act of Colonel Ralston as reported in the proceedings of the special committee of 1935 on the Canada Grain Board Act was to move an amendment to the bill as section 10, namely:

The operations of the board shall not extend beyond the 15th day of August 1936 except for the purpose of sale and realization of assets, collections, payments, and generally for the winding up of the affairs and business of the board, unless on or before the first day of July 1936 the operation of this act be extended by order of the governor in council for one year from the date first mentioned in this section, in which event such operations with the exception above mentioned shall terminate on August 15, 1937, unless further extended by parliament.

That was Colonel Ralston's view. Anyone who has expressed himself so freely and publicly surely should not have been appointed counsel on the commission. If Colonel Ralston or any hon. member here present had been summoned to act on a jury, and had said as much about the subject before the jury as Colonel Ralston did about this, the other side would have challenged his right to sit on the jury. There is not a lawyer in this chamber who does not know that. Of course the claim may be made that this royal commission is not the same as a court. But it had all the frills and all the authority of a court. This order in council was passed when the question was sub judice before that court, and the government grabbed off a maximum chunk of it and decided it themselves pending the report of the commission. We have never heard the like in the history of Canada. If I am to hear and see much more like that I am not caring when I pass out. The disgrace to our country! Colonel Ralston is one of the finest men that you can meet in a day's journey, but this is not the place for him. His price is not of so much concern, the $200 a day, but it is the getting the whole thing in the hands of the government: one commissioner, one master counsel, and presto! you can get any kind of report you like. That is what happened anyhow.

Now that is something like the kind of indignation that was aroused when this whole distressing incident was first noised abroad. The Prime Minister is, I feel sure, averse to all this—and I want to say incidentally that I do not lay one iota of this at the door of the Prime Minister. But he cannot avoid his responsibility. He has some mighty bad advisers or rather a bad adviser around him in regard to the grain business. This is generally known to be true, but opinions may differ as to who constitutes a good adviser. This is from a press despatch report of a speech delivered by the Prime Minister at Calgary on September 30, 1935:

Farmers were just as much entitled to fixed prices for their products as labour was to fixed minimum wages. Mr. King said he believed in fixing these levels for the purpose of maintaining standards of living. But everything that was done for labour should be done equally for the farmer.

The Liberal members of parliament were responsible for the fixed minimum price for wheat.

And that was so. There was no fixed minimum price in the original wheat board bill. I do not want to disparage what the right hon. leader of the opposition did. He was the father of the bill, very much approved by the godfather, the present Prime Minister, who amended it, and incidentally crucified it later by his government.

Mr. Bennett did not propose this when he brought in his wheat board bill. Mr. Bennett could have settled the wheat question earlier had he not wanted to make an election issue, but there was no issue as the bill received the support of all parties.

If that is the description of that bill—and it was a true description—I think I have to absolve my right hon. friend the then Prime Minister of Canada from wanting to make an issue of it. He wrestled with himself there that last day in 1935—oh, it was like dragging a cat by the tail to get him to do what he did, play the game; but he did play it. And he got a bill that committed this house, unanimously supported—even by Colonel Ralston—and if the government wanted harmony at this critical time surely it was not by murdering this bill in this horrible fashion that this desired end would be attained. I have pleaded with the government on this thing for the last two years, but they would not listen. Now I am forced to do what I am doing. I have been asked since the luncheon recess when I would be through. I do not know. "Well, don't you know that his excellency is going to sail on Monday?" I haven't anything to do with when his excellency sails. Let him sail. My duty is to my constituents and to the people of Canada; and without any disrespect whatever, and although I would love to meet the wishes of his excellency, it shall not be at the expense or neglect of the people of Canada or of my constituents.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that I do not think his excellency's name should be brought into this discussion. As regards influencing the proceedings of parliament, no desire was expressed by his excellency with respect to his sailing or not sailing, nor was a word said by myself to the hon. member or to anyone else in regard to his speaking.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, you wanted to get that into Hansard, did you?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, I wanted to have the record correct.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well I cannot hear what the hon. gentleman says. There was a colleague who lent me his ears the other day, but he and many others are not here to-day. Hon. members can guess why.

Now I have some simple notes here, but I never could follow notes. I am just going to follow the gleam. Here is the wheat board act. There were two little touches put to it by the senate afterwards, but they do not amount to a hill of beans, so we can take this as the act. I have it all marked and I know where to turn to anything; however it is getting so nearly worn out that it is not as easy as I thought. Here on the back of it are the notes I took at one meeting of mine in 1935. Here we have bill 98, passed in 1935, which in section 3 declares:

There shall be a board—

There was no "if" or "but" about it.

—to be known as The Canadian Wheat Board, which shall consist of three members appointed by the governor in council.

There are a good many important things in this bill, but these are the salient features:

7. The board shall undertake the marketing of wheat in interprovincial and export trade and for such purposes shall have all the powers of a corporation and without limitation upon such powers the following:

Surely anybody can understand that. You do not need to be an expert; you do not need to be the Minister of Justice. You hardly need to know anything at all to know what that means. Then it goes on:

(a) to receive and take delivery of wheat for marketing as offered by the producers thereof;

(b) to buy and sell wheat: Provided that no wheat shall be purchased by the board except from the producers thereof;

Is that not plain enough? If words mean anything at all, that board should have functioned continuously until parliament said no; not until somebody in the cabinet said no. I am sorry I was brought up such a stubborn Liberal, with the conceptions I have about democracy.

[Mr. Motherwell.]

Mr. THOMPSON: You were brought up in Lanark.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I see the hon. member for Lanark smiling. I am not providing this entertainment for my hon. friend; it is at a heavy cost to me. I remember my father talking about William Lyon Mackenzie, that great man who challenged everything that was wrong at that time, including, to use his historian's very words, "the abuse of executive power." What a come-down that his grandson should exercise himself in the direction of abuse, great abuse, of executive power. It is time this tendency to fascism was stopped. You do not need to go to Montreal for communists and that kind of truck. I suppose I should not have said "truck," but what I have said I have said. I tell you, when you get a government interfering in such an important matter as this, then you have a grave abuse of executive power and we must see that we get rid of that abuse. We must get rid of it, or how can we talk about unity? Is this not the way to get disunity? I suppose we should get a little practice against the Mussolini men, against fascists, before we have to go to a real war, but we do not want to start it here. If we do not we had better beware what we do.

I am not going to read the rest of this bill; it is so plain that "a wayfaring man, though he be a fool, need not err therein." Then, as though to make sure there would be no doubt about it, look at (g):

. . . generally to do all such other acts and things as may be necessary for the purpose of giving effect to the intent and meaning of this act.

Mark that. That was just for fear some of us were too stupid to understand that the intent and meaning must be the guiding principle of the government that administered this measure. Is there anyone within sound of my voice who thought this bill could be crucified after a few months by an order in council? During the discussions in committee or elsewhere did anyone suggest, "Oh, well, the government can slip over an order in council"? Will anybody who thought that was in anybody's mind please stand up now and let us see what he looks like? No one stands up; then none have I offended.

Now let us go further:

8. It shall be the duty of the board:

(a) to fix a price to be paid to the producers for wheat delivered to the board as by this act provided, subject to the approval of the governor in council;

(b) to sell and dispose of from time to time all wheat which the board may acquire, for such price as it may consider reasonable, with the object of promoting the sale and use of Canadian wheat in world markets;

Oh, I think you know it all, but down in (j) I find this:

. . . to offer continuously wheat for sale in the markets of the world through the established channels: Provided that the board may, if in its opinion any existing agencies are not operating satisfactorily, take such steps as it deems expedient to establish, utilize and employ its own or other marketing agencies or channels;

I am sure the right hon. leader of the opposition will correct me if I am wrong when I interpret that to mean that it was put in to see that no one else ever held wheat off the market in the same manner that it was thought to have been held off by the pool and the grain trade generally in the fall of 1929. Who will say that they did not all hold it off? And I never heard a soul say at that time they were wrong. They just guessed wrong; that was all. This provision, I take it, is put in to make sure that whoever is administering this act will always remain in the market with their wheat, both buying and selling. I do not hear the leader of the opposition challenge that interpretation. I know that is what this provision was put in for. As I say, I was outside the committee, but I was constantly advised as to what was going on, and I helped a little bit at long range.

There are three provisions for the exercise of executive power in this bill. Sections 9, 10 and 11 provide for a compulsory wheat board if any government in power wants to have one. That power is granted in the bill. They also have the right to approve of a price for wheat as recommended by the board, or to modify that price. But the modification of the price was always thought to mean up or down, not laterally, as was done. Then there is another executive power found in section 14:

The governor in council may approve of the provisions of this act being made applicable to oats, barley, rye or flax produced in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia, if the board recommends that such approval be given, whereupon the provisions of this act shall mutatis mutandis—

Whatever that means; I think it means "in the same manner." They might just as well have said so, but the lawyers always like to put in something classical.

—apply to such kind of grain as they apply to wheat.

That power in two instances out of three has not been exercised. Well, when this parliament defined three executive powers that could be exercised, am I not justified in coming to the conclusion that this was all they were supposed to exercise? If they were meant to kill the bill by stealth, parliament would have told them to steal up on it some dark night and put it out of business, but there is nothing like that here. I do not think there is anything like that in any act, but that is what has been done, while only one of these three provisions for the exercise of executive power has been taken advantage of, but with a bad twist in it.

There is the wheat board bill. I cannot imagine this order in council of the 90 cents a bushel racket being passed in total disregard of the plain language of that act, without its being referred to the Minister of Justice. I do not see him in his seat. I guess he is busy with the padlock law, and with those gentry away up near the foothills. But I do not see why he should confine his attention to them. Let him come here and give his reasons, which he must have given to his colleagues. I was in council long enough to know the procedure. If a minister of justice were passed up by the government you would soon be minus a minister of justice. No doubt the Minister of Justice passed upon this order in council. I do not know that he did; it may be that the rest of the cabinet turned around and did it without him. But they did not formerly do it in that way, in my day.

I will talk through you, Mr. Chairman, to my good old eastern Liberal friends. I was born in Ontario, and I could not help loving it, even if I tried not to. It is pretty hard to ride through it these June days and see the beauties of its landscape without loving it, even if one were not born here. I have the affiliations, the attractions of birth place, the traditions, the memories of neighbours, and the story of old Ontario dating back to the early eighties and far beyond engraved clearly on my heart. But, oh, it makes me feel sad when I realize the way some of my eastern friends look at this matter. "If we have a wheat board for the west, everyone will be wanting a wheat board—a board for onions, potatoes, cabbages, cheese and butter, etc. They will be clamouring from the Atlantic to the Pacific for boards, the same as the prairie farmers have."

That sounds logical and natural, superficially. That is the argument the Minister of Justice used on the second reading of the wheat board bill. I have too much truck on my desk to keep track of it. Read Hansard and see this, Messrs. Ministers, for yourselves! He spoke along those lines; I may not have the exact farm products mentioned, but that was the sense of it. That is the reason given why he wanted an emergent and very temporary board,—because everyone would be wanting one.

Now, let me answer that. During the war there were only two farm products which were held down in price by the authorities of that day. One of them was wheat and the other was cheese. Those prices were held down officially. The price of cheese was held down to twenty-five cents a pound when there was no question that it would have soared sky high beyond that. I would say to members from the east: Instead of shutting up your hearts against the wheat board, which is admittedly for the west, why not claim your right for a cheese or live stock board? As I have said, during the great war you made sacrifices when the price of cheese was held down. Why not do now as I am doing? Why not claim the right to a board either for your cheese as an animal product, or for the animals themselves? That could easily be adjusted. Instead of wounding us in the west who in all conscience, need this in our business, why not claim your right, for reasons I shall show in a minute, to some assistance in the live stock industry or the live stock products industry, whichever you like?

That is a matter for yourselves. May I remind the government, and all members assembled here, that when the attempt was made to take the Crowsnest Pass rates from the west I pleaded with some of my maritime friends who are not here to-day that instead of trying to take that rate from us, something which had been obtained honestly and deliberately from Sir Wilfrid Laurier, they should get a little Crowsnest rate for the maritime provinces themselves. That is the way to do it, as I see it. If we are to live happily together it will be done not by snatching what the other fellow has, but by claiming the privilege of something similar on the principle of compensating adjustments for some other part of Canada. We cannot raise a family in this or any country without practising some give and take in order to promote peace within that family. That is what we must do if we are to promote peace and harmony among the nine provinces of this confederated country.

Well, they got their little Crowsnest railway rate in the maritimes, via the Duncan report route, and I think they were pretty happy about it. That would be my solution. Now, what did we contribute in the west to the bread-basket of the allies during the war? I do not know the facts with respect to cheese, because I never followed them up, and of course the figures would not reach such immense proportions as ours. But I have in my hand an extract from the proceedings of the royal grain inquiry, and I must give it credit where it is due for having brought out this fact. The information I have was sent to me, upon application, by Mr. T. W. Grindley, when I asked him to give me something I could use respecting the prices of wheat under the board of grain supervisors. I have not used this information in any public meetings, because I have not been in the best of shape recently. When one spends nearly forty years of one's life fighting for just such things as I am fighting for to-day, it grinds the stamina down pretty much. I became sick in 1929 on account of it; but I do not want sympathy on that account from anybody. I merely recite the fact for those not in the know. However I cannot help—

The CHAIRMAN: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but—

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I want no mercy at all. But do you think it is all right for the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) to speak at such great length? I will stop right here.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We are in committee, and if the hon. member will permit me I should hope he would regard these few words as giving him the opportunity to continue.

Mr. BENNETT: And I join in that.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: That is nice. I was not going to ask for it, because I am just not in the asking-for-favours—

Mr. BENNETT: Mood.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Yes, mood. But you might as well let me have it off, anyway, because it is going to come off.

Mr. BENNETT: He knows he can do it, anyway.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: This is one time that the private members have a chance; I hope more of them will exercise it. I have before me an extract from page 762 of the evidence given on December 8, 1936. I find on looking over it the heading "Price limit," and following that heading this paragraph:

Above all, national selling held the price steady—

This was a reference to the board of grain commissioners.

—under conditions when, had there been no price control, the price would have been forced to an intolerable figure.

Yes, it would have been forced to an intolerable figure. Then Mr. Brockington, counsel for the elevator association, asked:

I take it that means that the price would have been forced upward to an intolerable figure?

Here is Mr. Ralston's statement:

I think that is what is meant there in the report of the board. In other words, national selling did effect a price limit. It held the price steady when, had there been no price control, the price would have been forced to an intolerable figure.

That is not what Colonel Ralston said in Regina hearings or elsewhere. I think I am justified in saying that I was so ill when giving evidence at Regina that I could not proofread my own statement, and it never was proofread. I would not recommend anyone to read what I said. As everyone knows, it is very difficult to take down a grain letter correctly, but it appeared to be particularly hard in this case. Colonel Ralston talked me out of the vast sum the western farmers contributed during the war, owing to held down prices, when I was giving evidence before him. There is the record. I have a copy in my office, and any hon. member can get a copy. He talked me out of it. But if I had had the following information then, I would have taken the fur off the colonel. I did enter into an altercation with him of which I was ashamed. That happened before the press and everyone else. I am not going to bottle up the information that I have until it ferments.

The average fixed price paid for wheat in 1916, 1917 and 1918 worked out at about $2.28 per bushel. Very little was purchased in 1916, but for convenience of estimation we will place the average price at $2.28. When you are dealing in hundreds of millions of bushels it does not make much difference. Here is another significant item. It states that about 350,000,000 bushels were sold in those years by the board of grain supervisors, for which the farmers got an approximate average of $2.28 per bushel. Put that figure down in your scribbling books. Many estimates have been made as to what the price would have gone to if there had been no board. It is stated here that it would have gone to an "intolerable" height. What is an intolerable height? It went as high as $4 at the Atlantic seaboard, which is about 12 cents per bushel more than at Fort William. Let anyone look up the press of that day and he will find that the farmers and others were prophesying that wheat would go to $5. However, the authorities got together and held the price down to an average of $2.28. I have here an estimate made by about as capable a man as anyone I know in that line of business, the late Dr. Magill. He was the secretary of the Winnipeg grain exchange, an authority whom I do not often quote. The following statement appears on page 197 of the proceedings of the committee on agriculture and colonization which met in 1922:

We had no information about the British buying, and I stated that if the United States and Great Britain were going to compete in our market for our hard red fife it would not surprise me to see our wheat anywhere from $3 to $5 per bushel.

It must be remembered that that statement was made under oath. I think that is as sound an authority as you can find. I have no doubt the price would have gone that high. A middle figure between $3 and $5 would be $4. By deducting $2.28 from $4 you arrive at the extra amount the farmers would have received had there been no board. That gives you $1.72 per bushel. Multiply that by 350,000,000 bushels sold, and you get a total of nearly $600,000,000. That is the amount the farmers of the west contributed to the breadbasket of the allies including Canada. I will not say they all knew what was going on, but I do say there was very little murmuring about making that contribution. The average price of $2.28 looked like a lot of money. I do not want to magnify this too much. There are the figures and there is my authority. When I put the top price at $4 I am down a little from what it actually might have been. There was great difficulty in obtaining wheat at that time from the Argentine and Russia which forced the allies to depend almost entirely upon North America for their supply. If there had been no control the price might have gone higher than any of these estimates, but it was held down.

Have you ever noticed how prompt governments are to act when they want to hold down farm prices? Without any prodding, without any urging, without any goad being used, they jump to keep prices down. That is what happened in connection with the wheat at that time, 1916, 1917 and 1918. When you want governments to hold up prices even a wee bit, when you want them to give you a wheat board, how reluctant they are to act! Reluctant is hardly the word to use; how determined they are not to do it! We hear a lot about the hardships of the farmers and the beneficence of governments in the matter of relief seed, etc. That will not do for me. I will not sell my independence even though I am fed, or even though my neighbours are fed. It may be all right to keep them alive like you would an ox so that you can get some work out of them, but that is not Christianity, it is not even decent. I appeal to this government, to my old companions and friends, not to continue snatching wheat boards from us by peculiar orders in council, but to go forward and do something Do not wait for weeks to pass before it is put into effect. This order in council referred to was passed on August 27, 1936, twenty-seven days after it should have been passed as provided by law and then was no good. This is the time—almost the first of July—to set the price for the coming harvest. It should be set at 87½ cents basis Fort William, with no cussed rider to it such as burdened the orders in council of two years ago and last year. Is it done? Will it be done? The answer was made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce that in addition to what the Turgeon commission reported favourably on, we would have a board and a minimum fixed price. There was nothing in the Turgeon commission report, except by implication, that there would be a fixed minimum price. You have to read closely between the lines to see even that, so closely that the Minister of Trade and Commerce relieved the anxiety of the western people by telling them that there would be a fixed minimum price. Do you think that I have not now the right to urge that price? When is the minister going to set the price? If he uses the board and the people out west the way that they have been used since the 27th of August, 1936, what kind of price are we going to get? Are we as representatives going to disband from this house and run the chance of similar treatment this fall? Once bitten, not twice shy, but many more times shy. Do you think we should trust the government to do the right thing, not on the 27th of August, but now, or say a week from now, when we and they get away? Do you think we should complacently trust them after what they did in 1936? If you think that, then "I have not found so great faith, no not in Israel." They should not ask us to go abroad and take it for granted that they are going to do something in the way of a price which will be in any wise acceptable to the people. Why strain our confidence in that way? Why not "come across"? Why do not the government adopt the recommendation of the wheat sub-committee? I do not think it is any breach of confidence—if anyone thinks it is I will not say what I intend to say—to mention that this was not in council. The subcommittee of the government—four gentlemen, all capable men—met one from Alberta and the Liberal members from Saskatchewan and Manitoba, and without one dissenting voice the subcommittee was asked for a board and for a price such as I have suggested, and we wanted it before this house prorogued. They—the sub-committee—were not very anxious about acquiescing in that request, but after they had reported to the cabinet they came back and seemed quite agreeable.

Mr. EULER: Came back where?

Mr. MOTHERWELL: But that is as far as it has gone. It would look as though the ones who are most responsible are the remaining members of the cabinet other than the four members of the subcommittee. I cannot get at the bottom of that. I do not think we are going to be flim-flammed by that kind of treatment. The subcommittee will get away with it on the ground that they made a recommendation to full council, and the rest of them will get away with it in any way they can. They will be down here, anyway, where little sentiment for wheat boards prevails, so it will not make much difference to them politically. If I am exaggerating or going farther than I should, let anyone who likes cast a stone.

I have been identified with the subject-matter of this legislation since its inception and even during its pre-natal stage,—when the late Doctor Douglas introduced the matter in a private bill in 1898, and for ten years before that. I do not like to obtrude the "I"—that "I" did this and the other. You can imagine what I was like in those days, forty years younger than I am now. You may be sure that I was somewhere around when this Manitoba grain act subject was first discussed. We made pretty good progress until 1912—I will not say until the Tories came in, though things just happened that way, but the Tories were not a bit worse than we have been since. Then that precious sample market business was ingeniously worked into the picture, and the farmers bit like so many pikes—hungry ones too. To their astonishment they found that wheat grade mixing was ingeniously worked in at the request of Doctor Magill to the Minister of Trade and Commerce of that day; that is 1917. Anyone who wishes can look at the records; I have not them here. That was done through a minister of trade and commerce—I hope he is listening to this—

Mr. BENNETT: He is in heaven.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I mean the present Minister of Trade and Commerce—who interviewed the Minister of Justice and got a decision that authority for a sample market presupposed mixing. What the grain trade cannot do when it comes to driving through the Grain Act is not worth talking about. But I must not dwell too long on that. I may mention what the farmers contributed—if you like, what they sacrificed—at that time to the cause of the allies. Will you not now let us check out a little bit on that credit—not the stuff that is talked about up in the country of high altitudes; this credit of ours is a real credit—

Mr. BLACKMORE: So is ours.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: —so that we may get through this crisis without being told daily that we are "bumming" on eastern Canada. I admit that eastern Canada is helping us generously. We have been helped by both church and state, and we acknowledge it freely, but we are not selling our birthright because of that, or our conceptions of what is proper in these matters.

How would it be, Mr. Chairman, if we should now take recess? There is too much ammunition here to keep track of; my desk is full of it; hon. members want to prorogue; his excellency wants to sail; what am I going to do? I am going to stand by with this ammunition as long as I can stand up and deliver. I am going to call it half time with the hope and expectation of delivering the remainder of it some time to-day.

Hon. W. D. EULER (Minister of Trade and Commerce): It is not my intention to follow into all the by-ways traversed by the two previous speakers.

In the opening remarks of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley) I was surprised to hear him intimate that the appointment of the Turgeon commission was not the result of the meeting of our parliamentary committee or of anything that was said in this house with regard to certain charges against Mr. Murray. His further criticism was that there has not been sufficient time for the discussion of the wheat board and its activities. As hon. members know, the report was laid on the table the very day after Mr. Justice Turgeon delivered the first report to me; it was laid on the table even before it was printed. The printed report was laid on the table within two weeks afterwards. Therefore, at least so far as the government is concerned, there was no delay in presenting the report to members of the house. That it is not possible perhaps to give it full consideration is not the fault of the government, and it is because of the importance of the recommendations that are made in the report that the government finally decided not to bring in this session any legislation that would implement some of the recommendations made by the commissioner. There may be, and there has been, some criticism with regard to that, but I would ask the committee to accept it as the reason. It had been the intention of the government to bring in legislation amending the grain act to provide for supervision of the Winnipeg grain exchange; but, as I said before, for the reason that, the house being in session, we were not able to give the question full consideration, we finally decided, rightly or wrongly, that the whole matter should be left over until next session. Then possibly there will be a complete revision of the grain act, and whatever may arise out of the report may be incorporated in that act.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle complained about the length of time taken by the commissioner in the investigation and the submission of the report. He made a comparison between Judge Turgeon and Sir Josiah Stamp. No proper comparison is possible, because, if I remember rightly, Sir Josiah Stamp reported on just one question, that dealing with futures on the Winnipeg grain exchange, and that required only a few weeks. The order of reference to Judge Turgeon was vastly wider than that. Not only did it necessitate inquiries in Winnipeg and in every grain centre in the west, but the commissioner had to proceed to Europe and Great Britain, and as a natural consequence the report was delayed. I might give as another reason, though it may not be accepted as a good one, the fact that Judge Turgeon was the commissioner in charge of the investigation into the textile industry. For those reasons the grain report was somewhat delayed.

The hon. member for Qu'Appelle dealt with three or four definite points. In the first place he criticized the delay in bringing in the report, and second—I am not using language that is too strong—his criticism was a defamation of three estimable gentlemen who have served the country well. One of these gentlemen is Colonel Ralston, who, the committee will admit, was one of the most valuable and reputable members of this house. Another was Mr. Murray, former chairman of the wheat board. The hon. member also criticized Mr. McIvor, the present chairman of the wheat board, a man who was associated with Mr. McFarland, and I believe my hon. friend had a great deal of confidence in Mr. McFarland whose name he mentioned to-day. He used these terms, which I took down, and he will correct me if I am wrong. I believe his reference to Mr. Murray was as a criminal, and he referred to Mr. McIvor as an accomplice in crime.

Mr. PERLEY: That is figurative language, and the hon. gentleman knows it.

Mr. EULER: I am glad to hear my hon. friend say that. In another instance he spoke of the hangman. I leave it to the judgment of the committee whether that is proper language to use, even in jest, of any reputable men who have served the country well. I was going to use strong terms in condemning the hon. member's language—

Mr. PERLEY: Why does the minister not address his remarks to the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell)? He spoke more disparagingly of Mr. Ralston.

Mr. EULER: I am not at the moment replying to the hon. member for Melville. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle made reference to men who are not in this house to defend themselves, and I say to him that if he puts himself in a position where they can defend themselves, they will take very good care of him. The other point of his speech was a criticism of the report itself, and finally he gave advice to the government as to the policy that should be pursued in connection with the wheat board for the coming crop year.

I am not going to go into all the ramifications of the charges made. The original charges against Mr. Murray as chairman of the wheat board were made in this chamber, as a result of which a parliamentary committee was appointed, of which the hon. member for Qu'Appelle and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) were members. I happened to be the chairman of that committee. These charges were investigated by that committee; the report which was made to this house was unanimous, and certainly there was in the report no condemnation of Mr. Murray or anyone else.

Mr. PERLEY: It did not exonerate him at all.

Mr. EULER: In the report the recommendation was made that a royal commission should be appointed to look into the matter of these charges, and of the whole question of wheat and the policy with regard to wheat. Judge Turgeon was appointed as royal commissioner; he made his investigations, and I need only say in regard to the charges made in that committee that the house can do nothing other than accept the report of the commissioner, with regard to the charges against Mr. Murray, that he had protected the shorts on a certain day; I believe it was in December, 1935. I will read one paragraph from the commissioner's report:

> In answer to the question arising out of paragraph 3 of the order in council, I find, on the whole of the evidence that the members of the board cannot be said to have protected speculative short interests in the Winnipeg wheat market in December, 1935. The board, in the exercise of its legitimate discretion, decided that it was advisable to sell. They sold without, of course, knowing what proportion of their sales would fall to speculators and what proportion to others: and I cannot see how a knowledge that short speculators were buying should have deterred them from selling, if they had such knowledge.
> This being my opinion, the second question as to the effect of any such protection does not call for an answer.

Mr. PERLEY: How many witnesses were called to prove that?

Mr. EULER: I was not present and I do not know how many witnesses were called, but there is the fact that the commissioner reports that no blame rests upon Mr. Murray.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not denied that they were protected by what took place; but the commissioner says that they did not intend to do it.

Mr. EULER: It is true the result might have been to the advantage of speculators, but it is an entirely different thing to say that the action of the chairman of the board was calculated to protect the shorts.

Mr. BENNETT: Every man is supposed to know the effects of his own acts.

Mr. EULER: Absolutely not. My right hon. friend might buy wheat to-day, thinking there would be an increase in price, and yet it might go down. The hon. member also described Mr. Murray as a dictator, and I refer to that particularly because, knowing Mr. Murray as I do, I consider it was a most unjust attack. It was intended also to be a reflection upon the government, that he dictated to the government.

Mr. BENNETT: So he did. He said he must hire his own people, and you remember what he said about taking office at all.

Mr. EULER: The action taken with respect to the advisory committee was due to the policy of the government and not to the desire of Mr. Murray.

Mr. PERLEY: What about Murray's evidence at page 191?

Mr. EULER: The hon. member made another statement, that there was a fire sale; that after McFarland retired from the board and Murray took charge, a fire sale was put on to the detriment of the wheat producers. I say distinctly that the policy which was adopted by the wheat board of offering wheat for sale at all times was not only what was called for very definitely in the wheat board act, put through this house by the then government, led by the present leader of the opposition, but was the considered policy of this government. We believed that this was the right policy to follow. I admit that there is room for difference of opinion on that. No doubt my hon. friends on the other side believe that the policy followed by Mr. McFarland in accumulating almost 300 million bushels of wheat and keeping the whole wheat situation in a state of uncertainty may have been the right one. But this government thought otherwise, and Mr. Murray in offering wheat for sale at all times followed definitely the policy and desire of this government, with the result that we got rid of the wheat surplus.

Mr. BENNETT: And lost $11,000,000 on his operations.

Mr. EULER: But at one time we would have lost about $75,000,000 if we had followed the policy of my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: But the answer is he did not, and he made $25,000,000 out of McFarland's wheat.

Mr. PERLEY: The agreement was made without the knowledge of the government and was cancelled without the knowledge of the government the moment Murray met with the committee of the grain exchange. That is the evidence.

Mr. EULER: I do not know whether such an agreement ever was made.

Mr. PERLEY: Last year I asked for the return, showing whether the government knew of that agreement, and the answer was: No. I asked a second question: Did they know when it was cancelled? And it was cancelled without the authority of the government and was made without their authority.

Mr. EULER: Quite right, and in the language of the street, "So what?" Certainly the government did not dictate to Mr. Murray in regard to any of his acts. But Mr. Murray, generally speaking, was carrying out the policy of this government in offering wheat for sale at all times.

Mr. BENNETT: Read these documents.

Mr. EULER: And that is also the law laid down in the wheat board act.

Mr. PERLEY: He has done a number of things the government did not know.

Mr. EULER: The hon. member for Qu'Appelle criticises the recommendations made by Judge Turgeon. That, of course, is his privilege. One recommendation was that there should be legislation to provide for the supervision of the grain exchange at Winnipeg. I was a little surprised when my hon. friend read a great many opinions, including that of Mr. McFarland by the way, and, I think, of Mr. Murray and a good many others, that the Winnipeg grain exchange should be supervised. But he followed that up with a statement, or certainly the implication, that the grain exchange ought to be abolished altogether. I do not see the consistency of the two statements. I do not know what my hon. friend wants. Does he want the grain exchange supervised or abolished?

Mr. PERLEY: I said the grain exchange in the open market could continue with a board but under proper supervision.

Mr. EULER: I am afraid I misunderstood my hon. friend.

Another suggestion made by the commissioner is that wheat should be sold through the pools, and that the government should encourage the organization of pools to handle the sale of wheat, and, he said in so many words that ultimately he believed the government should get out of the wheat business altogether. With that I entirely agree. He also said that for the coming year—it was more or less a negative recommendation—the wheat board might continue. That answers the question my hon. friend asked this morning, or what I am going to say will answer it and also answer the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell). As a result of that recommendation the government announced some weeks ago through myself that there would be a wheat board to handle the crop for the coming crop year and that a price would be set at an appropriate date.

Mr. PERLEY: And participating certificates issued?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the law requires.

Mr. EULER: I think it is utterly impossible under the wheat board act to set a price without participation; I think that naturally follows. What that price may be, I am not prepared to state, because the government had not considered that question. That will be done in due course.

There was another recommendation which at the moment I do not regard as of great importance, that there should be a wheat institute to promote the sale of wheat in Great Britain and on the continent of Europe. In regard to that the wheat board itself, in the last year and the year preceding, has been doing that work. My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition intimated that he thought they were spending that money illegally. I am not in a position at the moment to say anything as to that except that it never occurred to me that they had not a perfect right to do anything they could to promote the sale of wheat, which it was their job to sell. Now that the wheat board is going to continue for the coming crop year, there is no doubt at all, because I spoke to the chairman about it, that he will continue those efforts to promote the sale of wheat both in Great Britain and on the continent.

In conclusion, just a word in regard to the demands of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle. He demanded that we promise him, I suppose, or the house, certain things.

Mr. PERLEY: The farmers of western Canada.

Mr. EULER: That we promise that we would have a wheat board with a fixed price and with participation, knowing all the time that the government had already stated their intention to do that very thing. But I suppose that would read well in the headlines.

Mr. PERLEY: I have not any more confidence in the government than has the hon. member for Melville.

Mr. EULER: I would not expect my hon. friend to have much confidence in anything. And as someone over here says, it is the first time he has ever followed the hon. member for Melville. He will probably follow him only when he feels in sympathy with him.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not follow the hon. member for Melville, the hon. member for Melville followed him.

Mr. EULER: Well, probably the two hon. gentlemen will follow each other; perhaps they are good mates. He also demanded that we declare the full policy of the government with regard to wheat board matters. He demands a price of 87½ cents. Here he and his mate are not quite in agreement; the hon. member for Melville was satisfied with 85 cents. They will have to get together and decide what they want.

As to what the price is going to be, I am not making any promise, for the simple reason that the government has not yet decided what that price shall be. In due course the price will be announced.

I do not know that I can say anything more in regard to policy. It seems to me that nothing more should, at this time, be demanded of the government by the committee. The committee is assured; the farmers of western Canada are assured, that there is going to be a wheat board operating during the coming crop year. They are assured that there will be a fixed minimum price. They are assured that there will be participation, because there must be if the wheat board act is continued.

Mr. BENNETT: The act is not repealed or amended.

Mr. EULER: Quite so; that is why I say that. If we had intended to do away with participation, it would be necessary to amend the wheat board act, and we have no such intention.

Mr. BENNETT: No; you did it by order in council the last two years. That is the point.

Mr. EULER: In conclusion, the policy of the government for the coming year with regard to the wheat board act is as I have stated it, pending decision during the coming year as to a permanent policy.

Mr. COLDWELL: I wish to make a few brief comments. First, I would refer to the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell). I have often found myself in disagreement with him. Indeed, on more than one occasion ideas which I hold have been subjected to his ridicule. But I realize that it took a great deal of courage to do what he did this afternoon, after so many years in this house, with so many associations with his party, to rise in his place and criticise the government and inferentially the party of which he has been so long—I say it quite sincerely—a distinguished member. This afternoon the hon. member for Melville answered something that I think we found it rather difficult to answer; that is, the suggestion that the agitation in the fall of 1936 against the government's action in connection with the wheat board was the result of political opposition to the government and particularly of the activity of some of us connected with this group. I think the former Minister of Agriculture demonstrated clearly this afternoon that this dissatisfaction not only was felt by people politically opposed to the party represented by the government but was widespread in the ranks of all parties, and included government supporters in western Canada. I was glad to hear the announcement made this afternoon by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler).

Mr. EULER: That was nothing new.

Mr. COLDWELL: We were anxious to know definitely that there would be a wheat board; that it would operate continuously; that there would be a set minimum price, and that there would be participation certificates during the coming year. I think that announcement made so categorically this afternoon will be welcomed generally.

Mr. EULER: Does my hon. friend not know that I made the same announcement some three weeks ago? Perhaps my hon. friend was away in Saskatchewan at that time.

Mr. COLDWELL: I did not realize that it was made quite so specifically. In common with a number of gentlemen supporting the minister I was, as he says, away in Saskatchewan when he made that announcement in the house. But it having been made this afternoon in this manner, I think it is much more satisfactory than I realized from the previous announcement.

With regard to the minimum price, I am in agreement with the hon. member for Melville when he says that our producers are entitled to minimum prices for their products. As I have said so frequently in the house, if our producers must buy in a protected market then the prices they get ought to be protected also; and from the votes taken in the house on the budget and the sub-amendment a short time ago, I think we may take it for granted that the government intends to maintain at least a certain amount of tariff protection. With regard to the set price, the minister stated that two previous speakers who had mentioned fixed prices had differed in the price suggested, but at the risk of making confusion worse confounded I am going to differ also and suggest to the minister that the proper way to fix a price is to take the results of investigations which have been made into the costs of production over a period of years. If the government will do that, I think they will find that the university of Saskatchewan has made fairly exhaustive studies of average prices and has stated rightly or wrongly—I believe rightly—that the cost of producing and delivering a bushel of wheat at Fort William amounts on the average, to $1.03, which is the figure suggested by Professors Allan and Hope of that university. Therefore, I say our producers are entitled to that consideration.

There is not much left for me to say after the announcement of the minister and particularly after the speeches of the hon. member for Melville and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Perley), but we shall hope that when the permanent policy is brought down it will place in statutory form, that cannot and will not be upset by government orders in council, a fair and just price for the western producer.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have no desire to take up any of the time of the committee with reference to the general discussion which has taken place, but I do wish to deal immediately and precisely with the allegation that in passing the order in council that has been the subject of discussion this afternoon the government believed in any way whatever that it was nullifying in any particular any provision of the wheat board act. From what the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) has said, one would assume that the government had deliberately sought to undermine the effect of an act which had been passed by this parliament, that we had tried to do by order in council what the statute would not permit us to do.

Two questions came up for consideration at the time the matter was being discussed in council. The first was that of the legal power of the government to take action along the lines it did. In connection with that aspect of the matter legal advice was taken by the government from the Department of Justice, and from the advice given us I was perfectly satisfied at the time, as I believe all my colleagues were, that under the provisions of the act we had authority to pass the order in council we did.

The other question that came up for consideration was whether or not our action in naming the price to which wheat would have to fall before it would be purchased by the board would meet with the approval of the wheat board itself. The wheat board was consulted before the figure of 90 cents was finally agreed to by the governor in council, and they approved it. The order in council was not passed, as I have said, until after we had reason to believe that we had full legal authority for what we were doing and also until we believed we were acting in accordance with what the wheat board itself considered to be the wise and right thing to do. There may be debate as to whether or not our judgment in the matter was right or wrong. I submit, however, that the record of prices from the time the order in council was passed up to the present shows pretty conclusively that our judgment was sound in the course we took. With respect to the powers we had, I think I have only to read the sections of the act that are pertinent and leave it to hon. gentlemen who wish to take a fair and unbiased view of the situation to say whether or not we were in their opinion justified in the view we entertained as to our powers under the act. Section 7 of the Canadian Wheat Board Act, which refers to the powers of the board, is as follows:

7. The board shall undertake the marketing of wheat in interprovincial and export trade and for such purposes shall have all the powers of a corporation and without limitation upon such powers the following:

(a) to receive and take delivery of wheat for marketing as offered by the producers thereof;

(b) to buy and sell wheat: Provided that no wheat shall be purchased by the board except from the producers thereof;

May I pause here to say that I am reading the powers given to the board. There is nothing in the statute which says those powers must be exercised. They are not compulsory. They are powers which the board has, but the statute does not say that the board must buy and sell wheat, except under such conditions as are specified elsewhere. Then I come to the other important section:

(e) to pay to producers delivering wheat at the time of delivery or at any time thereafter as may be agreed upon such fixed price per bushel, according to grade or quality or place of delivery, as may be determined by the board with the approval of the governor in council—

The whole point is as to the meaning to be attached to the words "as may be determined by the board with the approval of the governor in council." There are two specific conditions that have to be met. First, the board has to determine the price; the board did determine the price at 87½ cents. Second, there is, in addition, the approval of the governor in council. The governor in council gave its approval of the price of 87½ cents, but it said that in its opinion that price should not be offered until wheat had dropped to 90 cents per bushel. The purpose of the act, as I gather it, is to protect the wheat growers against prices falling to a point which, as respects their sales, would be serious as far as the grain growers are concerned. The approval of the governor in council was given but with that one condition attached, namely, that the price of wheat should be at 90 cents before the board began to exercise its right and power to purchase wheat at 87½ cents. We believed as I have said, and were fortified in our belief by legal opinion, that we were entirely within our power to pass the order in council under the provision of the statute I have read. As to the condition inserted, I would point out that we inserted that condition believing the record would justify us in the step we were taking. I submit that the prices, which are a matter of record to-day, indicate that the judgment of the council in the matter was wise. I wish to make perfectly clear that at no time has this government sought directly or indirectly in any way, shape or form to override a statute by order in council. That is the last thing in the world any member of this administration would wish to do.

Mr. PERLEY: On what authority did he dismiss the advisory committee for which there is provision in the act?

Mr. EULER: It says only that there may be an advisory committee.

Mr. PERLEY: An advisory committee had been set up.

Mr. EULER: It was not obligatory.

Mr. BENNETT: It was set up, though.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I cannot answer the question, because I have not that information in my mind at the moment.

Mr. EULER: I am not a lawyer, but I would say it would naturally follow that if it is within the authority of the government to set up a board or not to set up a board, then there surely ought to be power to nullify action which had been taken.

Mr. PERLEY: It does not say "may."

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I rise to ask two questions, but before doing so may I express my admiration of the courage and fine independence of spirit indicated this afternoon by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell). Those of us from Saskatchewan who know about the fight he has put up for cooperative marketing to the advantage of the farmers of that province know how well he has shown his integrity this afternoon by carrying his views to their logical conclusion. As I heard him speak, I could not help thinking of what Tennyson made Ulysses say:

> You and I are old;
> Old age hath yet his honour and his toil.

My only regret is that the great party to which the hon. member belongs could not see fit to keep pace with him.

The statement has been made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) and was made in Saskatchewan repeatedly by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), that there would be a wheat board. Are we, from that, to understand definitely that the operation of the wheat board will not be contingent upon any price level? The Prime Minister pointed out a moment ago that constitutionally the government had the power to pass the order in council. I am not concerned with the constitutional aspect of the matter, but I am concerned with the fact that the effect of that order in council was to make the wheat board inoperative.

The minister says we are going to have a wheat board. We have a wheat board, but it is a wheat board which cannot take delivery of wheat until the price hits 90 cents. Are we to have that kind of wheat board, one which will operate only when the price hits a certain level? Will it be operative to-day and not operative to-morrow, operative this week and not operative next week? Is the minister prepared to assure us it will be a wheat board which will take delivery of wheat, irrespective of the price level? That is my first question.

My second question is this: Is the minister prepared to give us the assurance that a fixed minimum price will be announced within a reasonable period before wheat is being placed on the market by the producers? The farmers ought to know now what the fixed price is going to be. When I was in Saskatchewan a few weeks ago wheat was leaving the elevators as seed wheat, under a federal government guarantee, and farmers were signing notes for $1.45 a bushel. On the other hand wheat was going into the elevator at 72 cents a bushel. I was in a municipal office and saw a man signing a note for wheat which had been supplied to him by a mortgage company. That note was for wheat at the rate of $1.70 a bushel. That man will probably bring back three bushels for every bushel he received from the mortgage company. If prices continue at the average present level, he will bring back two bushels of wheat for every bushel received.

I say the farmers have a right to expect that long before they are drawing their wheat to the elevators they will know something about what the price will be. I would, therefore, ask the minister these questions: First, will the operations of the wheat board be contingent upon the price level on a particular day and, second, will farmers be given notice, within a reasonable period of time before wheat is being put on the market, as to what the fixed minimum price for wheat will be this fall?

Mr. EULER: I have already stated the government has not yet considered what the price should be. I would add that nothing in connection with the fixing of that price, or any modifying or restrictive price, has been considered.

With respect to the second question as to whether or not a decision will be made within a reasonable time as to the fixing of a price, the answer is in the affirmative. I might add that the decision with respect to the first question will also be made within a reasonable time.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In order that I might not misunderstand may I ask this: Do I understand the minister is not prepared to give the assurance that there will not be the same danger as before of an inoperative clause which will say that until the price hits a certain level the wheat board will not take delivery?

Mr. EULER: I cannot give any assurance, because the matter has not been discussed or decided upon by the government. That is my reason for saying I cannot give an assurance. It is a matter of policy, and I am not authorized to make statements with regard to policy. The matter has not been decided upon.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): In other words, when the minister says there will be a wheat board he means there will be a wheat board with qualifications.

Mr. EULER: No; I am not saying that at all. I am saying there will be a wheat board and a minimum price, and the other matter in connection with it, as to what the price shall be, is to be decided within a reasonable time. I think that is quite clear.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): I must differ with the minister; I do not think it is clear. It is clear there will be a wheat board and a fixed minimum price, but it is not clear that the wheat board will accept delivery of wheat.

Mr. EULER: No; that is not decided. My answer with regard to it is clear, that there will be a decision within a reasonable time.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister said there would be participation certificates?

Mr. BENNETT: It is in the statute; he cannot help saying it.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes; it is statutory. But that is only if the board takes delivery.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: The inference which has been taken is this, that the participation certificate means that the farmer will be able to deliver to that board every day of the year, and will participate to the extent of the average price. That is the interpretation which has been and is being placed in western Canada upon the participation certificate. Now we learn that while it is statutory, there is no guarantee that the board will operate in the manner it is expected to operate by the farmers of the west.

Mr. EULER: It is statutory that if the board purchases wheat and sells it for a price higher than that at which it purchases, there will be participation.

Mr. BENNETT: No; when it buys it will give a participation certificate.

Mr. EULER: Yes, a participation certificate which will ensure that if the wheat is sold at a price higher than is paid for it, the producer will get the balance. Perhaps it may be difficult to satisfy all hon. members, but I do say that the decision with regard to price and everything connected with it will be made within a reasonable time.

Mr. BENNETT: There are certain facts in connection with this matter which cannot be gainsaid. All the talk in the world will not change them. They are written in the statutes of Canada. Briefly, without unnecessarily taking up the time of the committee, they are as follows:

1. This parliament by unanimous action passed a wheat board act.

2. That act could become operative only if the government of the country approved a price at which wheat was to be bought by that board.

3. The board did recognize a price of 87½ cents, which was approved by the government of the day, and the board functioned in the year 1935-36. It functioned under Mr. McFarland until the present government took office, at which time he was removed and someone else was put in his place. According to the figures which we now have, during that year a loss of something over $11,000,000 was made.

4. The present government approved a price of 87½ cents a bushel on the condition that wheat reached a price of 90 cents a bushel. There is no authority for any such conditional approval being given. That is elementary, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who has studied law as a science and not to practise it, realizes that it is incompetent for and wholly beyond the jurisdiction of any body or government to fix a condition which nullifies the operative effect of a statute. No one will question that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It does not nullify the effect of the statute.

Mr. BENNETT: But it did. Not a single bushel of wheat was bought, or could be bought. That is what nullified the statute. Everybody knew that when they saw the order in council. The hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) put his finger on the point at once. He told us that the minute he read the order in council he knew it would not work. Why? Because it fixed the price to which wheat was to fall or to which it was to rise before the statute became operative. Not a single bushel of wheat was bought by the board.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If the price of wheat had fallen to 80 cents, would not the act have operated?

Mr. BENNETT: If it had fallen to 50 cents it would have operated, but the point is that you imposed a condition which prevented it from operating.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no gainsaying that. Everybody knew that. Ask the farmer; ask the boy who knows nothing about it. The hon. member for Melville said that he saw at once that the act was prevented from operating by the order in council. That operated pro tanto as a repeal of the act.

Mr. EULER: It would not necessarily operate in that way.

Mr. BENNETT: But it did.

Mr. EULER: Nobody could see that it would.

Mr. BENNETT: Anybody could foresee that it was intended to operate in that way.

Mr. EULER: It was to prevent farmers from receiving prices at a ruinous point.

Mr. BENNETT: To prevent them from falling?

Mr. EULER: Yes, below 90 cents.

Mr. BENNETT: No; the intention was to prevent the board from buying a bushel of wheat, and it succeeded. It was intended to permit the grain trade to monopolize the business, as they did. Not a single bushel of wheat was bought by the wheat board. That is the answer. It is no good to be righteously indignant about this. The fact is that not one bushel of wheat was bought. The grain trade monopolized the business that was intended to be divided between private and public concerns. Read the debates in this parliament. Read the story of the debate that brought this wheat board into being. The story was simple. It was that the farmers of western Canada should have an alternate market; they were to have the public market or the private market. They could go to the wheat board, on the one hand, or to the private interests, on the other. But they were denied the right to go to the public board; they were driven to the private grain trade. Every bushel of wheat sold by the farmers of western Canada since the expiration of the crop year in which the government came into office has passed through private hands.

Mr. EULER: They got a good price.

Mr. BENNETT: The fact that they got a good price is not the answer. The answer is that they were deprived of their alternate market. There is another answer, which is a complete one. It is the one made by the hon. member for Melville—the farmers did not share in the profit.

Mr. EULER: They got the going price.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; they got the going price, but the private interests made the profit that should have gone to the farmer under the participation certificates. That is the point exactly. That is the whole story. That is the point made to-day by the hon. member for Melville. He complains because this board has not functioned. It has not functioned because an order in council was passed that rendered it impossible for the board to function. It is admitted that this is so. There is no denial of it. The profit that went to the private interests is a profit that would have gone to the farmers of this country under the participation certificates. That is the whole story.

Mr. CRERAR: They did not do that the previous year.

Mr. BENNETT: No one says they did. I am talking about 1936-37 and 1937-38.

Mr. CRERAR: Does my right hon. friend say that there should have been a guarantee of a profit on the board's operations in 1936-37 when there might have been a loss as there was in 1935-36?

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the minister realizes that no one is talking about guarantees.

Mr. CRERAR: My right hon. friend is talking about profits that were denied to the farmers.

Mr. BENNETT: Nobody was talking about guarantees. I want to make that clear to the minister.

Mr. CRERAR: There is no point in such a statement.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: There was no profit in 1935-36.

Mr. BENNETT: No. The farmers got 87½ cents, and the country paid $11,000,000.

Mr. CRERAR: I understood my right hon. friend to say there would be a profit.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) has just said, that there was a profit. I say that profit did not go to the farmers of the country.

Mr. EULER: Does my right hon. friend think the theory of the act should be that there should be a profit guaranteed to the farmers by the Canadian government?

Mr. BENNETT: I have not suggested that. I am not talking about the theory of the act; I am talking about the operation of the act. I am pointing out to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) that there was a great profit last year, but it did not go to the farmers. They would have derived the benefits of that profit had there been participation certificates.

Mr. CRERAR: My right hon. friend has no warrant for making such a statement.

Mr. BENNETT: I say they would have participated in the profits.

Mr. EULER: They got the market price.

Mr. BENNETT: They got the market price at which the wheat was hauled in, in the fall, but that is not the price which the ultimate consumer paid. The best answer is that there is a spread of 25 cents. What price is the farmer paying at the elevator for the seed wheat the wheat board took over? Under what authority did they take it? The farmers of Saskatchewan are paying $1.45 a bushel. At what did they take it from the wheat board? They took it at $1.24. By what authority? For what was the profit of 20 cents a bushel? What authority had they to do that? That is the figure given to me by the minister. He is the one who said that the wheat board sold at $1.45.

Mr. GARDINER: The price that will be finally charged to the farmer has not yet been set.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The minister himself said that the price would be $1.45.

Mr. GARDINER: I have never made the statement that the price was set at $1.45. Read the record.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has said that the price has not been set, so that settles that. I was basing my argument on the statement that the price was $1.45. There is no getting away from the fact that this act was intended to be for the benefit of the farmers of western Canada. They complained of tariffs and this was to be the compensating adjustment. They were told that if there was a loss, the country would bear it. But the fact is that not a bushel of wheat has passed into the possession of the wheat board for two years. Why? Because the government passed an order in council that made it impossible.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Because the price of wheat was higher than the minimum.

Mr. BENNETT: Because the government passed an order in council that said it would not operate until wheat fell to 90 cents. I ask the government if they will give me a fiat to test that order in council in a court of law? I will take the case myself. Let me test the validity of that order in council. Let us have it referred to the Supreme Court of Canada. Let us find out whether the executive of this country has the right to pass an order in council that renders nugatory the provisions of a statute when there is no authority to do it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That is not what was done here.

Mr. BENNETT: That is exactly what was done. There cannot be any difference of opinion about that because not a single bushel of wheat passed into the elevators for the wheat board in 1936-37; not one bushel—which is the test. I know farmers who went to elevators and were willing to take the risk. They said, "We will take a chance," and they wanted to give their thousand bushels of wheat to the wheat board. They were not concerned about the price. That was not a matter of importance. They wanted a participation certificate, to share in that rise in price. Could they do it? That is the test. Farmer A goes to-day to Okotoks with 1,000 bushels of wheat, as he did last fall, and asks to put it in the elevator for the wheat board. He cannot do so. Why? Because the price of wheat is not as low as 90 cents. He was willing to take the chance. He wanted the alternate market; he wanted a participation certificate; he wanted the opportunity, believing as he did that wheat was going to rise in price, to share in that rise. Could he do so?

Mr. EULER: What chance would he possibly be taking under those circumstances?

Mr. BENNETT: He was willing to take a chance by selling to the wheat board. He was bound then to get the very highest price at which the wheat was sold.

Mr. EULER: He was bound to get the price at which it was ultimately sold. He was not taking a chance at all.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: He would take a chance on making some money. He would take a chance of participating in a rising market.

Mr. EULER: Exactly. The chances were all in his favour.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Mr. EULER: He could not lose out, because the government would lose if the price went below 87½ cents, and he must win if the price went above that. It was "Heads I win and tails you lose."

Mr. BENNETT: What is the difference between giving it to the farmer and giving it to the gambler?

Mr. EULER: That is not the point at all.

Mr. BENNETT: In one year seven billion bushels were handled in the Winnipeg grain exchange. Does the hon. gentleman mean to tell me that he can justify that? That one fact convinced me more than all other arguments together that we must have control. I ask every reasonable man in this house whether he does not agree, when he is confronted with the evidence that seven billion bushels of wheat were bought and sold on the market in Winnipeg in one year when the crop was hedged to the extent of less than two hundred million bushels, and when the total crop amounted to about three hundred and five million bushels. I ask, apart from partisan feeling and political differences, whether any member of this committee thinks that kind of thing can be justified.

Mr. THORSON: What did the Stamp commission say about it?

Mr. BENNETT: The Stamp commission said it should be supervised.

Mr. THORSON: No; on the matter of speculation?

Mr. BENNETT: I may say that I wrote the question, because I was anxious to have the opinion upon it of that economist, a disinterested man. The simple question was whether or not the sale of futures was advantageous or otherwise to the farmer, and the answer was that it was, but that there should be supervision.

Mr. EULER: Was there? Was supervision provided for?

Mr. BENNETT: I will tell the hon. gentleman. In the wheat board act we had a provision that would enable us to wipe that practice out altogether.

Mr. EULER: When was the Stamp report brought in?

Mr. BENNETT: In 1932 or 1933.

Mr. EULER: And the wheat board did not come into existence for three years after that. What action was taken to provide for supervision in the interval?

Mr. BENNETT: Not any.

Mr. EULER: Why?

Mr. BENNETT: Why? Because we were controlling the market. Against the efforts of those who are now the government, we were controlling the market. That is the reason. And that is the reason why the whole grain exchange was arrayed against the then government. I could, with respect to that, unfold a tale which would amuse the hon. gentleman. I know what I am talking about. I know what their efforts were. I know who conducted them. I know the contributions made to the end that the government should be destroyed. They were quite within their rights, because they thought they were fighting for their lives. That control was the reason it was not necessary to do more than make this adjustment. That was done, and 205 million bushels of wheat passed into the hands of Murray at the lowest price of the year.

Mr. EULER: There was hardly a permanent arrangement.

Mr. BENNETT: And there was put through this house a measure which provided for a loss which, under the order in council, was only to be estimated when the business was wound up. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) said there was no chance of its ever being other than a loss; yet I find that he has received $8,000,000, and according to the report I have under my hand, out of that same wheat a profit was made which wiped out the loss of $8,000,000 that Murray made.

Mr. EULER: Not quite. There is still a loss of over $2,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I asked the minister, and he told me he could not give it to me.

Mr. EULER: The right hon. gentleman must remember—

Mr. BENNETT: I asked the minister if he could give me the amount. What does he mean now by saying it involves this sum of money, when he told me he could not give it to me until the adjustments were made?

Mr. EULER: I gave the right hon. gentleman absolutely everything I had.

Mr. BENNETT: What does he mean now by saying there was a loss of $2,000,000?

Mr. EULER: I will give the right hon. gentleman the answer in a moment.

Mr. BENNETT: He told me he could not give me the figures. I have under my hand the last report, up to June 18, and it shows that they still have some grain on hand. It shows the $11,000,000 as being paid out of the profits made by McFarland. It shows that $8,000,000 came to this government—

Mr. EULER: And $6,600,000 went back.

Mr. BENNETT: Went back where?

Mr. EULER: For the equalization.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I hold in my hand a document containing a statement to June 18, 1938. It is the auditors' report. I turn to exhibit A, and here are the words of that document:

Funds on deposit with banks. . .	$ 4,642,430 90
Funds transferred to dominion government.	8,000,000 00
Due from No. 1 account re 1935 crop deficit.	11,858,104 18
Due from No. 3 account re 1936 crop deficit.	49,574 88
Due from seed and feed account.	152,573 88
Total.	$24,702,683 84
Less: Due on Saskatchewan government account.	50,570 00
Surplus on No. 2 account. . . .	$24,652,113 84

Mr. GARDINER: If I remember rightly, the $6,600,000 which was paid up on the 1936 crop was taken out of the consolidated fund. What the minister has just said is that if you wanted to get what would be the actual total regarding the whole wheat operation, that amount would still have to be taken into consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: I am only reading from the report of the Canadian wheat board. There is now on deposit with the banks $4,642,430.90. The dominion government have had $8,000,000 transferred to them, and they had a great deal more than that for quite a long time. But then it was transferred back. It was on deposit here, and given back, according to this report.

Mr. EULER: But this $6,600,000 never entered into the funds of the wheat board at all; it went out of the dominion treasury.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is recouped, and more than recouped to the dominion treasury.

Mr. EULER: Not if you take the 1935 operations.

Mr. BENNETT: We have nothing to do with the 1935 operations. The dominion government has already had $8,000,000. There is due from No. 1 account; that is, they have appropriated, $11,000,000 of McFarland's wheat money to pay the deficit of 1935, making a total of about $24,000,000. The $6,000,000 which was paid out of the dominion treasury, plus the $15,000,000, makes $21,000,000; the total is $24,000,000. That is the position. These auditors certify that this does not take into consideration the $6,000,000.

Mr. EULER: The wheat board auditors had nothing to do with the $6,600,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course they had not.

Mr. EULER: But the government had to pay it.

Mr. BENNETT: And what is more, they made a profit. They have taken the $8,000,000—

Mr. EULER: The right hon. gentleman has already put that in.

Mr. BENNETT: But I say they have taken the $8,000,000 against the $6,000,000; they have got back the $15,000,000, and they have used it to pay the deficit of 1935. In other words, the compensating adjustment which we used to talk about to the farmers of western Canada, which was to be provided for, because they were to have the opportunity of an alternate market, which is now denied them, resulted in this terrible "burden" that was talked so much about. The auditors' report shows that McFarland had a surplus of $24,692,000. It shows also that quite a substantial part of it has not yet been disposed of. The minister informs me that it is in process of disposition, but he cannot give the exact figures until that process is complete. So that the Saskatchewan government has paid the wheat board $9,200,000 for wheat it has bought on account, and there has been delivered wheat for $8,983,299.10. This is according to exhibit No. 2. There is the result—a surplus of $24,692,000. That surplus is available to pay the $6,000,000. It is available also to pay the $15,000,000 which this country improperly paid, in order to make political capital, as a business man once said, probably the most discreditable operation that ever took place in parliament, in face of a written document which stated that payment should not be made until the ultimate liability was established. In the face of that, they paid it. Well, you add $6,000,000 and $15,000,000 and you get $21,000,000.

Mr. EULER: Do not forget the $11,000,000 loss in 1935.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: I am not talking about that; I am talking about McFarland's operations. Here are the documents that show a surplus in these operations of $24,000,000, there being still adjustments to be made—a surplus which pays the $6,000,000 and the $15,000,000, leaving something towards the payment of the $11,000,000. I do not know how much that will be. When we get down to the 1935 operations, I have not time this evening to go over these documents; but they will be here, and if I am not here then, somebody else will be who will take these sales and analyse them. When you look at the sales for 1935 and 1936 you will understand why there was a loss. All you have to do is take the weekly reports. The law required them to offer wheat for sale, but if you analyze these reports you will know why the term "fire sale" is used. There is no trouble about that. Read the reports; I have read them all. I have seen the sales for June, 1935; I have seen the sales on single days, and I know exactly what is meant by the term. That is the reason why the discussion has taken place as to the benefits that accrued to certain interests. It is all very well for the commissioner to say that they did not intend to do it, but there are the documents and they speak for themselves. I ask any hon. gentleman to take the reports, which are given for every week in the year commencing in 1935, before this government came into office, and coming down to June 18, 1938, and to read those reports. If you will read them you will understand why there was a surplus of $24,000,000 on one account and why there was a loss of $11,000,000 on the other; for remember that during the crop period they were not selling McFarland wheat; they were bound not to, as a matter of fact; Mr. Murray made that clear before the committee.

If one did justice to this subject, one would deal with it methodically and carefully from beginning to end; but I realize that we are now at the end of the session and I do not propose to do more than state the propositions which I have put forward, which do not admit of denial. A farmer who desired to use the alternate market, having 1,000 bushels of wheat last fall, and to get the participation certificate, taking his chance, was denied that right by the passing of an order in council which renders nugatory the provisions of the wheat board act in that regard. I will ask any student of law whether or not any body given power to impose conditions can impose a condition that renders nugatory the operation of the statute under which they are given that power. That is the issue, shortly put. It is put in other words by a layman, the hon. member for Melville, but I put it in this way to members of the committee who belong to the legal profession, and who know that the foundation of all our liberty lies in the fact that it is not competent for any body, in the exercise of a power conferred upon it, to impose a condition which prevents the exercise of the power for which it was created. That is elementary, and it is for that reason that I have objected to the orders in council of 1935 and 1936. When the minister says to the committee that the wheat board is to be made operative; that there is to be a wheat board, I tell him that there is a wheat board now. The statute has not been amended or repealed since we passed it in July, 1935; it still stands, and it can be prevented from operating only by an act of this parliament.

The hon. member for Melville has pointed out that Colonel Ralston at that time, on behalf of the opposition, endeavoured to have an amendment passed by which the act would lapse automatically. We objected; we said no. We said that parliament should act; that the government has no longer to pass a wheat board act because there is one on the statute books.

Mr. EULER: That is quite conceded. I did not intend to give the impression that the government could refuse to allow the board to act without repealing or modifying the act.

Mr. BENNETT: We are at one there. There remains, then, but one thing to be done. The government should fix a price so as to express approval or disapproval of the recommendation made by the board, because the responsibility rests in the first place with the board. As I pointed out, away back in 1935 the board recommended a price far in excess of 87½ cents, to which we would not agree, and finally after discussion and negotiation we reached 87½ cents, which they recommended and the governor in council approved.

Mr. EULER: Very reluctantly.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman was not a member of that administration.

Mr. EULER: I have heard it.

Mr. BENNETT: He has not heard it from anybody within the government. The price of 87½ cents was approved because an effort was made to have a higher price, which the government did not regard as reasonable under the then existing conditions. The government now have to do only two things: one, to secure the recommendation of the board; two, to approve. They need not approve the recommendation if they do not regard it as satisfactory, but they cannot impose a condition which prevents the board from operating, and be within the law; for every farmer has a right to that alternate market which the order in council has denied him; and if he was willing to take his chance, waiting until the crop year ended, that he might have the value of his participation certificate determined, he should have been permitted so to do. The government prevented him from doing that. That is common ground, and it is for that reason I have suggested that the validity of the order in council should be referred to the supreme court. It cannot be litigated, but it should be referred to the supreme court, the simple question being: Can an order in council be passed that renders it impossible for a farmer to sell his wheat to the wheat board? That is the only question. This order in council prevents him from doing so. He was not bound to wait for 90 cents or 80 cents or 50 cents; if he wanted to, he could go and sell his wheat for 60 cents to the wheat board. Then he could get his participation certificate and wait until the end of the crop year. He might get 20 cents or 10 cents or nothing. But he judged, not the government; he determined, not the government; he was taking the chance of winning something on the increased price of wheat if there was one, and he took the chance of getting nothing if there was nothing.

Mr. EULER: He could not lose.

Mr. BENNETT: He might, if wheat dropped below 60 cents.

Mr. EULER: But he was to get 60 cents.

Mr. BENNETT: He could not get less than 60 cents, if that is what the hon. gentleman means. But he had a right to that alternate market, and that alternate market has been denied him. The essence of our whole effort in this house in July, 1935, was to provide the farmer of western Canada with an alternate market: private trade, public buyer—which? In the one case you take your money and say, "Good-bye, I am through"; in the other you take your money and your participation certificate, and you may get something or you may not.

Mr. EULER: Was it the intention of the government that the wheat board legislation should be of a permanent nature?

Mr. BENNETT: It was intended that if circumstances made it requisite, it was there. That is the reason why in committee I pointed out that a provision which would automatically lapse was unsound; that conditions in this world are so uncertain that we should have it there, and that if the time came when it was thought desirable to repeal it we could do so. But parliament would do it, not we.

Mr. EULER: But as long as it was there, it would have to be operated.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite, until parliament repealed it.

Mr. EULER: But the intention in the first instance, I take it, was not that it was of a permanent nature. My right hon. friend said it would be there in case it were needed. So it necessarily follows that years might come when it would not be needed; then what becomes of the alternative market of which my right hon. friend speaks?

Mr. BENNETT: As long as the statute remained on the statute books, it was to be operated. We declined to consider the proposal made in the committee or in this chamber to make possible its automatic lapsing, believing that parliament itself must consider all the circumstances before the statute should cease to be part of the machinery of this country for dealing with the wheat crop.

Mr. EULER: I was merely trying to establish what was in the mind of the then government. Was this alternative market, of which my right hon. friend speaks so highly, always to be preserved for the farmer?

Mr. BENNETT: That was for parliament to consider. In the light of the conditions that then prevailed, we believed the statute should be continued until parliament decided otherwise; that is the fair way to put it.

Mr. QUELCH: At the first session of this parliament we in this corner moved a resolution urging the government to guarantee the farmers of western Canada a minimum price for wheat based on the cost of production. At this time we should like again to take the opportunity of urging on the government that they fix a price based on the cost of production of wheat. A little while ago the minister stated there would be a wheat board, there would be a fixed price and there would be participation. A little later he qualified that, saying that we might or might not have a wheat board in operation this fall; that is, the wheat board may be buying wheat or it may not. We may have a fixed price based on the cost of production, or again it may not be based on the cost of production. We may have participation, or on the other hand we may not have participation.

Mr. EULER: If the board buys wheat, you will have participation.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. QUELCH: But you are not guaranteeing that you are going to buy wheat. In other words, the first statement really meant nothing. It means that there will be a fixed price, but there is no guarantee what the price will be, it may be only 20 cents a bushel. And there is no guarantee that the wheat board is going to operate. So we take this opportunity again to urge the government that the wheat board shall operate this fall, no matter what the price; that is, that the wheat board shall buy wheat irrespective of whether the market price falls below the fixed price; and, second, that the fixed price shall be definitely based on the cost of production.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): I urge upon the government that when setting the price of wheat they do not forget durum wheat, because Manitoba farmers, and I believe many farmers in Saskatchewan, are very much concerned about the price they are likely to get for durum wheat.

I do not like the way in which the government handled wheat during the last two years, but I am sure the western farmers will be very much pleased to have the announcement made by the minister to-day. I know it was made before, but I believe it was more specific to-day. We know now that we are going to have a board and a minimum price, and that there will be participation certificates. When the government are setting that price I urge that they be not afraid to make it fairly high. I believe the government are afraid that we shall get a 400 million bushel wheat crop this year. The best thing that could happen to Canada to-day would be to get a wheat crop of that size. It would solve the railway problem and the relief problem—there would be no need of relief—business would be good; the revenues of the country would be greatly increased, and Canada would have much less trouble in financing than she has to-day.

I am sure western Canada would make this offer to all Canada, that if the tariff be done away with she will ask for no relief and no protected price on wheat. Let industry stand on its own feet and the farmers of the country will stand on theirs. I know western Canada is willing and able to make that offer. I hope the government will not forget the durum wheat growers of Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: The old man has now got his second wind, and intends to use it. Pardon me if I take a minute or two to unlimber my ammunition wagon.

The things we have been speaking about this afternoon are as chicken-feed compared with what I should like to tell the committee if I can stick it out—and I am going to stick it out. I have my braces on; I left my belt off. But I have in its place, we hope, my shield and buckler.

Three years ago, more or less, I received from John Glossop, the superintendent of the old government terminal elevator at Port Arthur, a communication in which he made a large number of serious charges, and a number of helpful suggestions as well, with regard to the carrying on of that terminal elevator under the auspices of the McCabe Brothers, which had then been converted into a semi-public terminal. "Semi-public terminal" was always a misnomer; it is a mixing elevator, semi-mixing if you like, but altogether mixing now.

Glossop wrote me about February, 1935. There was no use in doing anything about those charges at that time, for the simple reason that you could not do anything with them successfully just before an election. It would always be cast up that it was an election dodge. Besides, I did not know then just what merit there was behind the charges, and not much about Mr. Glossop; although he had thirty years of experience in terminal elevators, and sixteen of those years were in the government owned terminal elevator. Therefore he was an employee of the government, and surely, holding that position for all those years, his statement should not be passed up carelessly. It came from him voluntarily; he had communicated first with Mr. Coote regarding the same matter. Mr. Coote could not see his way clear to take any action with the information, and before I had an opportunity to do so this grain commission was appointed. When they got into action I placed Mr. Glossop's charges in the hands of Mr. Ralston, counsel for the commission.

All I am going to tell hon. members now, or a great deal of it, has been placed before several members of the government, including the Prime Minister, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Finance, and one other minister outside that grain sub-committee, whom I regarded very highly, and to whom I talked as man to man, as one privy councillor to another. I gave the same manuscript, the same statements regarding the administration of the grain act under the present chairman of the board of grain commissioners, to this minister, whose name I feel in honour bound not to mention, because I wanted to make sure that this information was getting to all the cabinet and not merely those to whom I had sent this evidence. I hoped that between what I supplied them with and what they knew of me they would believe I was in earnest, and I hoped also they would take the initiative, without leaving it to me to investigate these matters and seeing to it that these practices were discontinued.

With regard to Mr. Ramsay, the chairman of the board, I gave the information to one of his colleagues when he was here about two weeks ago. I told Mr. Hamilton personally some of the things I am going to tell the committee now, so that the information would go to Mr. Ramsay and he would not be unprepared. I gave the same information to another hon. member who, I knew, would send it to the Minister of Mines and Resources. I gave everybody warning, so that I could not possibly be accused of taking advantage of my position here to make these statements in parliament. I did everything I could think of becoming a man so that everybody would be given fair warning.

Why should it be necessary for me to go into these matters? I have not time to go into them minutely, but I will go into them sufficiently to convince hon. members that it is time somebody took action in Canada if we are to preserve the quality of our wheat in the markets of the world. I know I am thought a hobbyist on this question, but I also know that the quality of our wheat is the one asset in the west that keeps us out of the poor-house. Tamper with the quality, and you strike at the very root of successful agriculture in the west. As I said a short time ago, ever since this act came into force, or at least ever since 1912, it has been violated at every opportunity; and if there were not an opportunity, one was made. Now it is my duty to show one more opportunity that has been and is being taken advantage of right up to this day.

I think I will tell my story without this confounded volume of evidence before me. It is so messed up, with four lawyers questioning Mr. Glossop, that it is hard to know just what he was saying. Like myself, he was pretty well bushed in the ears; he had a poor voice as well, and was not a very good witness. But out of the mouths of babes and sucklings—and even the Mr. Glossops—sometimes comes wisdom. I have here some eighteen charges that he made, giving the dates, the boats and the mixtures that went out of this McCabe elevator, where the mixing of the four top grades was prohibited. These questions came before this royal grain commission, with all these lawyers, and this is what was said by the commissioner himself, if you please:—

The board of grain commissioners is the proper tribunal to hear these charges. Whatever evidence is taken here or whatever other evidence need not be taken here should be forwarded to the board.

That is, the board of grain commissioners, whose conduct was under observation, and who would be sitting in judgment on themselves. Is that not a remarkable thing? Then Mr. Ralston said:

I was not going into these in detail, but I was going to have him speak generally of his knowledge of these transactions—

He is referring to Mr. Glossop now.

—reported here and then turn him over to my learned friends for any examination they may have.

That is, to Mr. Pitblado, Mr. Coyne and Mr. Haffner, the last gentleman representing McCabe Brothers. Then Mr. Glossop refers to the J. J. Donovan and two parcels of 10,000 bushels each.

That was one of the last parcels before you left?
A. Yes.
Q. What took place there?
A. An order for ten thousand bushels of No. 4 Northern was shipped in one hold. After the boat left the superintendent was told by the inspection department the grade was too low. Arrangements were made for the boat's return for an additional 10,000 bushels of 4 Northern. This second lot was made up of 3 Northern and Garnet tough 2 Northern, the average of the two lots making up the grade.

The particular offence charged here was allowing a boat, after it had received a grade, to come back and have that grade jacked up by the addition of other wheat. I think that was the outstanding offence here, because most people take it for granted that No. 1 cannot be mixed with No. 4, though in my opinion this is very doubtful. I merely refer to this to show the committee, as I will in another place also, that Mr. Ramsay, the administration of whose department was in question, according to his own evidence knew there was some reflection being made on him. But what a glorious prospect it is for a potential offender to be given an opportunity of reviewing and sitting in judgment upon his own conduct! I know of only one other case of that kind in history. We might well go on a jaunt and a jag if the officer in charge would hand us over to ourselves for condemnation or approbation, to adjudicate upon ourselves.

There is one notable example, however, of this being tried once before. There is no record of it, because the records all disappeared somehow, but it was the famous or, if you like the other word, the infamous Hyndman commission. Those who did not like that commission called it infamous; those who did like it omitted the prefix. That commission never reported. I searched the library in vain to find any vestige or trace of a report by the Hyndman commission. There is no doubt that it sat all through the west, right out to Alberta, through broad Saskatchewan and a little bit in Manitoba.

Then we find a man named Henderson occupying the same position in the United Grain Growers terminal elevator as Mr. Glossop occupied in the government elevator at Port Arthur for many years, until 1933, that of superintendent. The United Grain Growers were outraged at the thought that their business was being investigated. I have before me a resolution passed by the Canadian Council of Agriculture, and if necessary I can refer to another one drawn up by the vice-president of the United Grain Growers, whose name for the moment I have forgotten. In the document before me we find what they said about what they considered at that time to be an outrage.

But what was done last summer or last fall? In this instance, they handed over the charges to the one whose conduct was under observation and asked him to look into the matter—to look into his own conduct—and to report later to the commission. So that in the last instance we have the government passing the buck to the royal grain commission, and the commission passing the buck to Mr. Ramsay. Good Mr. Ramsay in due course passed the buck to Doctor Geddes, whose report will be recited in a few moments. This is what the resolution set out:

That to appoint as a member of the inquiry board—

And this was the Hyndman commission. Possibly I would do well to first give the names of the gentlemen who formed that commission. These were men of renown and of high standing in the community. Hon. members of the legal profession will know Mr. Justice Hyndman who, I understand, is now resident in Ottawa. Before I forget it may I say that a member of the library staff informed me he telephoned Mr. Justice Hyndman to ask where his report could be found, and said that it could not be found in the library. Mr. Justice Hyndman stated that he never did give a report. Well, now, that is funny—never did give a report. No evidence of Mr. Henderson which was taken before it!

Nothing daunted at my lack of success in tracing the history of this wonderful commission—and I do not say that in any offensive way—I found this information in the Canadian Annual Review of 1921. That is not necessarily an official document, not at all; but it is usually fairly authentic. If any hon. member or minister thinks he is unjustly dealt with in this matter, he will have an opportunity to say where the record is wrong. It is the only record I can find. If the real record is not to be found, I cannot be blamed for taking the next best. I want to get at the facts, and to find the precedent for the present chairman of the board of grain commissioners being handed an opportunity of trying himself and of reporting back to the commission. This is what is contained in paragraph 2 at page 469 of the Canadian Annual Review:

That to appoint as a member of the inquiry board one who for nine years (Mr. Staples) has sat as a member of the board of grain commissioners, and whose failure properly to administer the grain act would constitute the principal ground for appointing a board of inquiry, is a fundamental breach of the principles of any inquiry conducted in the spirit of British law, and, therefore, is highly undesirable in the public interest.

If we apply that language, which was expressed with respect to the United Grain Growers and officers thereof, to the present situation, it would seem that this is exactly what was done by the royal grain commission of 1936-37 with the chairman of the board of grain commissioners. That is almost incredible, is it not? Here are the names of the commissioners: Hon. J. D. Hyndman, of the Alberta bench; W. D. Staples, of Fort William—the gentleman who was a member of the board of grain commissioners—J. H. Haslam, of Regina, and Lincoln Goldie, of Guelph. That was a pretty well qualified body of men; quite as good as the average, I would say.

If you will notice, in those days they were not satisfied with only one royal commissioner. There were four on that commission. Despite that fact, there is no record of any report given or of any evidence taken.

The Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) was at that time president of the United Grain Growers. He may correct me if I am wrong, because I have only this book and the newspaper files in the library from which I can get information in the matter. When the evidence of Henderson was given in which an affidavit was provided by a gentleman whose name I do not recall, making statements with regard to false bottoms in sixteen or eighteen bins of the United Grain Growers, rather than let the matter proceed farther my hon. friend the Minister of Mines and Resources, together with thirty other elevator men, applied before Judge Galt of Winnipeg, or some other judge—that does not matter—for an injunction to restrain the Hyndman commission from going farther into the investigation of the United Grain Growers elevator. When any person puts himself in the position of stopping an inquiry rather than having the truth told, the information which might come out must have been rather terrible to contemplate. I could not come to any other conclusion. And that gentleman is one of the advisers of the present Prime Minister in connection with wheat matters. However, I shall let that stand for the moment.

It would appear that this kind of thing is infectious because it is being carried on now. Mark the stage of my story: The royal grain commissioners have passed the buck to Mr. Ramsay. Let us see what Mr. Ramsay has done with the buck. I shall not talk about the little frills in connection with what was done to the government terminal elevator at Port Arthur. But just by way of experiment and to clear the decks, reverting to mixing, may I point out that the letter from Mr. Glossop was the first information I received that the government elevator had been leased to a mixing elevator. That shocked me at the time. When you remember that there was no other public terminal left at Port Arthur at that time you can understand why I was shocked. This public terminal elevator was built by the Borden government at the request of the western farmers. What for? So that they might be sure that there was at least one elevator through which grain could be passed without fear of vulgar contamination. This elevator operated for many years and made a profit nearly all that time. Mr. Heatherington stated that the elevator had earned three times its cost up to that time. Under date of March 14, 1935, I asked the government the following questions:

1. Is the federal government terminal elevator at Port Arthur still being operated by the government?

2. If not, (a) to whom was it leased; (b) when was it leased; (c) what were the terms and duration of such lease.

Here are the answers:

1. No.

2. (a) McCabe Brothers Grain Company Limited.

Just incidentally let me say that this company is recognized as one of the worst wheat mixers at the head of the lakes. There are degrees of mixing, and when it becomes too great it is no wonder that our wheat goes overseas in bad and irregular condition. There is probably such a thing as decent mixing, but this is a hog mixer who goes the limit and teaches others to go the same pace. The fact is that the Department of Trade and Commerce leased a public terminal elevator at Port Arthur which had been asked for by the farmers of the west as part of their bill of rights. This is another illustration of how the Department of Trade and Commerce handles the grain of this country. Here are the rest of the questions:

3. Did the government cease operating this public terminal elevator and lease it to a private concern?

4. If so, for what reason?

The answer given to No. 3 is "answered by Nos. 1 and 2." You have to go back to Nos. 1 and 2 to get the answer, but I am not going to do that. The answer to No. 4 is:

Owing to private interests in the grain trade acquiring greater storage capacity of their own, as also smaller crops and greater quantities of grain going out through Vancouver and Port Churchill, the government elevator at Port Arthur had been operating at a loss for the two preceding years, and the board of grain commissioners recommended that it should be leased.

When an institution has been earning good profits for fifteen or twenty years and then suffers a loss for a couple of years, is that justification for leasing to someone else? This elevator was asked for by the farmers of the west, but that is what happened. It was simply a case of clearing the decks to prepare for what was to follow. It was from this source that we obtained the first information that the elevator had been leased. Nothing that we have seen had been said about it in the newspapers or anywhere else. Section 125 contained the mandatory prohibition against mixing. Every effort was made to show that there were some reservations in connection with that. Let me quote from the evidence given before the commission. The royal commission was dealing with smutty and other rejected grains, and Mr. Ramsay is examined by Mr. Coyne as follows:

Q. That was the act of 1925?

A. That was the act of 1925. When this act was redrafted and revised in 1929, through some reason, possibly through an oversight, section 103 was omitted.

Those who have anything to do with the legal or departmental revision of statutes understand how sections can be dropped inadvertently, but when that happens too frequently you prick up your ears to find out what is happening. The result of this omission was that, from 1930 on, the Canada Grain Act contained no statutory basis for these off grades. It left them out on a limb, as it were. Hon. members can look up the old section 103 if they want to. I wish these documents would rise up themselves to give witness against these things. My eyesight is not so good, and I have no doubt the document I want is right on top here but I cannot see it. Of course, one does not see as well under these trying conditions. Here is what happened. Testimony was given before the Brown commission in Saskatchewan and accepted by the federal government. Mr. Ramsay had that to go to, recommending no mixing of dry and tough wheat, as a guide when he found that section 103 had been lost. Lost? It was not lost.

The CHAIRMAN: Six o'clock.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I guess it was the same time at this time last night.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: When the committee rose at six o'clock I was endeavouring to show what the chairman of the board of grain commissioners was doing by way of sitting up and making the best defence he could. I referred to the losing of section 103 as one of his experiences. I think maybe he was disappointed. The section was this; I read it to show its importance:

103. All good grain that has an excessive moisture, being tough, damp or wet or otherwise unfit for warehousing, shall be entered on the inspecting officer's books as "No grade," with his notations as to quality and condition.

2. All grain that is in a heating condition or is badly bin-burnt, whatsoever grade it might otherwise be, shall be reported and entered upon the inspecting officer's books as "Condemned," with the inspector's notations as to quality and condition.

3. All grain that is unsound, musty, dirty, smutty or sprouted, or that contains a large admixture of other kinds of grain, seeds or wild oats, or from any other cause is unfit to be classed under any of the recognized grades, shall be classed as "Rejected," with the inspector's notations as to quality and condition.

4. All grain shall be weighed and the weight per bushel recorded in the inspecting officer's book.

5. No grain that has been subject to scouring or treatment by use of lime or sulphur shall be graded higher than No. 3.

This last is supposed to refer to what was, in the old days, smutty grain.

It can easily be said by pro-mixers that the omission of that section has no significance; that it neither legalizes nor prohibits. Anticipating that objection, might I refer to another lost "Charley Ross"—you know who Charley

Ross, of long ago is,—lost in the statutes of 1929. That emanated as a result of a terrible struggle in camera in the subcommittee, which about put me "on the hummer" before we got through. I remember that we wrestled over this particular section, knowing the predisposition of the trade and commerce department, largely through ignorance, or rather, through want of information, throughout the years, right from the days of Sir Richard Cartwright down to the present day. I know them all—giant intellects except as regards wheat. Here is the section we wrestled over; that is the reason I missed it. It is section 140 subsection 1A of the Canada Grain Act of 1929:

Private elevators when so licensed may carry on the business of mixing grain and grades of grain except grain of the grades mentioned and defined in section ninety-six of the act under the heading "Spring Wheat" and more particularly described therein as No. 1 Manitoba Hard, No. 1 Manitoba Northern, No. 2 Manitoba Northern and No. 3 Manitoba Northern."

These are definitely described grades in which mixing must not be done. Here is another clause, subsection 2 of section 18 of the old act and section 84 of this; it is a very important one to be lost:

No grain while being received into, while in store in, or while being shipped out of any public elevator, shall be mixed one grade with another or with anything else whatsoever.

There is nothing left out there; in order to make assurance doubly sure, that was put in, but it was inadvertently dropped from the consolidating act of 1930. If anybody can find it there, I shall be the first to thank him, because if it is in the 1930 act my case is stronger than ever.

I was endeavouring to show how my friend the chairman of the board was getting along examining himself. At page 12,244 of the evidence taken before the royal commission I read this:

Q. The reason for rejection would be given so that you would have a number of off grades, all attached as satellites to 1 Northern, and similarly for all the other straight grades?

This was asked by Mr. Coyne of Mr. Ramsay. He answered "yes".

Q. That was the act of 1925?
A. That was the act of 1925.

The witness Mr. Ramsay goes on:

When this act was redrafted and revised in 1929, through some reason, possibly through an oversight, section 103 was omitted.

I referred to that before.

Consequently the Canada Grain Act from 1930 provides no statutory basis for these off grades.

It is too long to quote it all. Later on the statement is made:

The omission is serious. . .

I should think it was. It makes all the difference between mixing and not mixing.

. . . particularly with respect to tough grain where the quantity is often quite important. Primary inspections for the western division from 1925-36 report 6,721 cars of tough grain. The other "off" grades included 642 cars of damp grain, 703 cars of smutty grain and 349 cars of rejected grain, rejected for being sprouted, heated, mixed with gravel.

Mr. Chairman, do you know where those are going now? A great many of them, if not all, are going into the straight grades, after that little section I read, which has been lost, which stated that nothing else, nothing which you can conceive of, shall be or can be put into the straight grades.

The failure to provide for the off grades was discovered when the act was put into effect in the autumn of 1930. Confronted with this difficulty, the board instructed the chief inspector to prepare classifications covering grain of this nature. At the meeting of the grain standards committee of that year, the subject was discussed, and the classifications prepared were approved as proper specifications to cover out of condition grain and mixtures.

This is what he is saying. He authorized this himself, without any statute to back it up. This is about as bad as the government itself was with respect to the order in council, the rider to which I referred that rode out the wheat board in 1936. Like priest, like people; like master, like men; this is an infectious sort of riding, apparently.

The other phase of the problem was how were cars marked as off grade grain to be handled when they reached the terminals.

He knew there was a question there, or he would not have said that. What should be done with it when it reached the terminals? Let us see.

The board decided in accordance with previous practice—

Yes, in accordance with practice in the old mixing days when it was as wide open as a barn door.

—to provide for the treatment of the grain where practical, with a view to placing it after treatment in the grade to which it would belong originally had it been in satisfactory condition.

There you are, manoeuvring first to get rid of the big government terminal at Port Arthur through which the grain could go without any mixing, and after clearing the decks for that, they come along with this ingenious device of mixing wheat for the purpose of drying it—mixing dry wheat with tough wheat, making the dry wheat absorb the surplus water in the tough wheat, thereby enabling them to get the mixture into the straight grades and sell at the same time thousands of tons of good water, in the form of either spray or water from the clouds. At any rate, it was water, and the more water you have in grain the lower the price you get for it, because one of the price determining factors in grain is its moisture content. That is something which has never been gone into properly. When I was on the other side in 1928 I met a man with many others sitting around the board room of the Liverpool corn exchange who assured me they were positive that Canadian wheat was sprayed somewhere in transit, perhaps at the head of the lakes. If these practices are abroad as above alleged, they should be run down and discovered and disclosed, and not covered up.

An hon. MEMBER: Carried.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I do not know what that remark was, but I do not care; it may have been good, or it may have been bad. I hope I am not hurting anyone, and I am awfully sorry that I cannot hear. The minister might come a little closer and we would both be better off; but ministers do not do that these days, though they used to. When we had a majority of only one we would move along the front line anywhere you wanted, but when there is a majority of 101 they are not so particular. But that is always the way. This is the best defence, remember, that could be put up by the chairman of the board of grain commissioners. If he has any other, he has not disclosed it. I continue:

Q. Section 125, subsection (1), reads:

"All western grain received into any licensed public terminal elevator shall be binned with grain of the same grade, and not otherwise."

A. This is merely pointing out that the act does carry exceptions to the mandatory section 125 in regard to the handling of the first four grades.

What do you know about that? That is Mr. Ramsay's answer, remember. In my opinion the section which he contends did that was inserted afterwards, just as the other ones were previously lost. That is the result of my investigation, and again I shall be glad to apologize if it does not prove to be the case, because I want someone in authority to get to the bottom of this thing and see that I am not flimflamming. The truth is too bad already without making it worse by exaggeration.

Q. This section 138 (6) may only say that you can bin this commercial grain which has been altered with one of the other statutory grades, and not the first four?

A. Mr. Coyne: Yes. It is really a question—

This is Mr. Coyne. Some nasty person has suggested that he has a woolsack appointment around the corner, but that is what mean people say:—

It is really a question whether section 125 governs section 138 (6) or whether section 138 (6) is an absolute exception.

The Commissioner: Yes, whether section 138 (6) is an exception to section 125. I would not care to pass on it hurriedly, but there is a legal question there.

Mr. Coyne: Yes.

Well, how could you expect the royal commission to revert to that weeks afterwards with thousands and millions of words before them. The commissioner recognized that there was a legal question there and Mr. Coyne said yes.

The Commissioner: Section 138 (6) seems to assume that certain things may be done. It says, "has been graded into any commercial grade but may nevertheless, by reason of its subsequent treatment or otherwise, be properly binned with grain of a statutory grade." That may mean having regard to the full force of section 125—

Then again:—

—which says no other grades shall go into the first four except those that are graded in among those numbers.

Mr. Coyne: Yes, My Lord.

That reminds one of a fox circling around a baited trap stepping gingerly for fear of getting caught. Do you mean to say that these learned men could not detect something here? Then the chairman of the board of grain commissioners goes on:

Q. Are you giving this as an illustration of the variation now in the act?

You see how they are worming in, getting in at the back-door when they were fired out of the front on this mixing joint business.

A. No, just dealing with the situation the board found itself in in dealing with this particular problem of tough and straight grade grain. Possibly we have covered the situation now. I would just like to make the observation though that probably I have accepted a condition which was intended in the drafting of the act.

He is a mind-reader.

I think we all had the idea that all these sections were ameliorating the mandatory demands of section 125.

Do you think we sweat blood for days and weeks and months in 1929 that someone could come along and "ameliorate the mandatory demands" of what we knew we had?

Whether or not the draftsman accomplished that I cannot say, but I have always accepted that as being the intention of the act.

Look at the strange interpretation the chairman of the board of grain commissioners put on the act. And the gentleman was before the agriculture committee of, I think, 1928,—as a witness against mixing. What converted him in that short time to a pro-mixer? I never was more proud of an officer of the pool than when I found the present chairman of the board come down and give evidence against mixing and help us to win. Then he turns around and double-crosses us, and goes over to the other side!

I should like to have the attention of the committee if I may. They are doing very well, Mr. Chairman; this is tiresome, when we all want to prorogue.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: May I say a word by way of digression? A very good friend of mine said before we started this evening: Why didn't you bring this on earlier in the session? Will anyone tell me one moment when I could have brought it on before? I have not the bringing of it on. Was I not rapping at the door of many ministers urging them to look into this? I do not want to be taunted now with killing time when we all want to go home. We all do; so do I. But I had not the bringing of it on. I went as far in the debate on the address as it was decent to do. The commission had not yet reported. I strained a point in giving the government a hint. Hon. members will remember that I said I wanted a self-supporting board, and also a non-hibernating one, and the commission had not reported. That was going as far as I dared go, recognizing the proprieties at all, before the commission reported. Then Mr. Coyne and Mr. Ramsay go on. Mr. Ramsay said:

We have never had a suitable opportunity to amend the act until last year.

I wonder what that means.

That was before we knew you, Mr. Commissioner, would look into this matter. The question is now in the hands of the government.

Let us analyse that. It is strange how we can read a thing and see nothing in it. I gave some of my old colleagues a hint of what was in it, but I do not think they saw it. There is such a thing as seeing and not perceiving, hearing and not understanding. I know something about the latter. Let us see what he says:

We have never had a suitable opportunity to amend the act until last year.

That was said in 1937. Parliament had met at least seven times, since 1929, in three of which sessions the grain act was before this house. Why did they not take one of those three times, or one of the seven times? Probably the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) will answer that after consulting his coachers. I will answer it for him in one possible way other than what I have mentioned. I have told this to some friends too. Possibly Mr. Ramsay tried to get amendments made, tried to have these deficiencies corrected, these lost Charley Rosses found, but his minister would not listen. Maybe I should not say that, but I am between the devil and the deep sea. I want to be fair to Mr. Ramsay; I almost want to make an excuse for him. If he went to the Minister of Trade and Commerce who was over him during that period from 1929 until now and recommended that the necessary remedial legislation be introduced and was refused—well let them have it out between them.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I must inform the hon. member that he has exceeded his time.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Well, then, I shall sit down.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear hear.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: Or rather I shall not sit down unless I am ordered to.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member can start again.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: All right, you will get it some other time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. MOTHERWELL: I would just as soon have it this way, the remainder unfortunately is worse, but it will keep.

Victoria, Vancouver, way ports and Skagway, service between, $10,000.

Victoria and west coast Vancouver Island, service between, $10,000.

Mr. REID: I protest against the actions of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in connection with this grant of $600,000 that we have been giving them every year for the service between Canada, China and Japan. In 1936 I introduced a resolution asking that they be called upon, before they received any more subsidy, to have their ships manned mostly by Canadians. This matter was referred to a committee of the house; the committee met; evidence was called from the Pacific coast, the Canadian Pacific Steamships were represented, likewise the seamen. That committee brought in a report recommending that the company be called upon as a start to take the Chinamen off the decks of their ships and replace them by Canadian seamen. I am going to take a moment to read the recommendation of the committee of 1936:

That, as up to the year 1913 the decks of the Empress boats were manned by white seamen, and inasmuch as the deck service is an important and responsible branch of the work of these boats, the Canadian Pacific Railway Company be requested to replace the orientals now so employed by Canadian seamen, and that this change be made at the company's earliest opportunity.

This report was presented to the house and adopted unanimously. No action however was taken by Canadian Pacific Steamships Limited, so in 1937 I again introduced this resolution. At that time the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) was in Australia, and his duties were being carried on for the time being by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). On suggestion of the latter minister I withdrew the resolution at that time rather than press it to a vote, because he stated that he would set up a committee on the Pacific coast to find out if the contention of the company was correct, that there were not enough white, Canadian seamen there to work the decks of the ships. So Mr. Kerr, inspector of subsidized steamship services, was sent there and, with Mr. F. E. Harrison, representing the Department of Labour, and Mr. J. A. McGowan, shipping master of Vancouver, formed the committee which held an inquiry, and I am going to take a moment or two to give their findings.

[Mr. Euler.]

At this late stage of the session I have not time to go into the matter as fully as I should like, but briefly they advertised and asked for experienced seamen who would be available for employment on these steamships. In response some 380 experienced seamen were registered, and here is the recommendation of the committee:

In addition to the above mentioned seamen, a very large number of young men presented themselves and expressed a desire to sail in Canadian Pacific trans-Pacific vessels if employment on deck could be found. The navy league, sea cadet corps, has about 200 youths between the ages of 12 and 18 in training at Vancouver and Victoria.

These would be available, and they are very anxious to obtain this employment. Here is the final part of the recommendation of the committee that went out to the Pacific coast and investigated the entire situation:—

The committee is of opinion that the deck departments of two Canadian Pacific ships could be manned by the seamen shown in the third classification above mentioned, which contains men with suitable experience in ocean-going vessels, and that the change-over in the remaining ships should be possible within a reasonable time by transferring a number of experienced men to those vessels and drawing on selected types in other classifications.

For the benefit of the committee I repeat that on these four ships there are some 1,783 Chinese from Hongkong, who are not British subjects, but who are Chinese in the strict interpretation of the word. The first recommendation requested that the deckhands of these ships be replaced and that white men be given preference, and this latter committee of 1937 found that 380 fully experienced seamen were available, and should replace the Chinamen. So I maintain that the Canadian Pacific should be compelled to comply with the recommendation adopted by this house in 1936, which recommendation was not carried out either last year or this year. I say by their attitude they have actually defied this House of Commons, by their contempt for a recommendation so made by this house.

There are seventy Chinese on each deck. It is well known that one white man can replace two or even three Chinese, so on each of these ships thirty-five white men could take over the work and comply with all the regulations of the shipping act, if given a chance. I am taking great exception to that fact that they have not been given this chance. I am taking exception to this subsidy being actually granted, and I am sorry that it has not been possible to air this matter in the house before this late hour. I had a resolution in this connection on the order paper this session, but only one resolution can be brought forward at a time, and so mine was not reached. I am going to appeal to the minister, and if the Canadian Pacific is not brought to time I am serving notice now that if I am here next year they will have quite a good deal more trouble in getting this subsidy through. I think it is a travesty of justice for the Canadian Pacific to set itself above the house and defy what I claim to be an order of parliament. In Vancouver we have men by the hundreds walking the streets who would gladly take positions on these ships if given a chance, and in view of all the inquiry that has been made I should like to hear what the Minister of Trade and Commerce has to say as to why this recommendation has not been carried out.

Mr. EULER: I should like to assure the hon. member for New Westminster that the department is not unmindful of the report of the committee with regard to the replacement of the Chinese on this service with white men. The matter has been very fully discussed; I have repeatedly brought it to the attention of the Canadian Pacific. I am not sure that I should go into all the details at the moment, but the arguments that were advanced, it seemed to me, made it inopportune to press too strongly for the withholding of the subsidy. Perhaps for the time being at least it might satisfy the committee and my hon. friend if I read a letter from the chairman of Canadian Pacific Steamships, Limited, in which he offers to make at least some concession at the moment. I am not making any commitment as to what might be done later. Sir Edward Beatty writes me as follows:

> For a number of years each of our ships has been carrying from eight to ten youths for training as pursers, stewards, etc. These youths serve first of all in the deck department as bridge messengers, and, as such, they learn discipline, ship's routine, and the interdependent relation of the various branches of the ship's staff.
> We propose to add an additional six to each ship (or twenty-four in all) in the deck department, to be classed as ordinary seamen as soon as qualified, and to receive regular instruction in seamanship, so as to qualify for the rating of A.B., when they have accumulated the necessary legal time at sea.
>
> As soon as we have six qualified A.B.'s, we would replace the Chinese quartermasters with these white boys, who should eventually be able to obtain a certificate as second mate, and, in due time, as mate and master.
>
> These boys would be drawn through the navy league, where they would have obtained useful preliminary training, and are good material for the R.C.N.V.R.
>
> Our plan has the entire approval of the naval branch of the Department of National Defence, who more than once have expressed a willingness, if the necessary funds were forthcoming, to assist in the training of these young men.
>
> There should be no undue delay in giving effect to this plan, as soon as the necessary living and sleeping quarters can be provided, and it can be in operation in a very short time.
>
> Yours very truly,
>
> E. W. Beatty,
> Chairman.

Mr. NEILL: What is the date of that letter?

Mr. EULER: May 6, 1938.

Mr. BENNETT: There is just one difficulty that has been overlooked by the hon. member for New Westminster when he suggests that this is defiance of parliament. A subsidy is an act of parliament; both houses agree, and the crown assents. A resolution of a committee of the House of Commons would not be sufficient to withhold a subsidy; and until such time as it is approved and becomes an act of parliament by being passed by the senate and approved by the crown, it would not rank with the appropriation bill so that we would be able to give effect to it. Surely the hon. member has overlooked that fact. I have had occasion to look into the matter.

Mr. REID: I appreciate the remarks of the right hon. leader of the opposition and realize that what he says is perhaps true. But here we have a committee of the house going into all the facts in 1936, hearing the Canadian Pacific on the one hand and the seamen on the other, and bringing in a report recommending that the Canadian Pacific take steps to man the decks at least, with white, Canadian seamen. They do not do so. In 1937 another committee is set up, and it finds that 380 experienced seamen are available; yet the Canadian Pacific say there are not sufficient men with which to man these steamships. I say that if this country means anything at all to Sir Edward Beatty, he should at least give a lead to Canadians, especially in these times of stress, when thousands of our citizens are walking the streets. There are hundreds of men in Vancouver who are willing and ready to go on these ships if they were given a chance.

Mr. SPENCE: Would they work, if they got a chance?

Mr. REID: Yes, they would. There are 380 experienced seamen registered, men who have been in ships for three or perhaps four years, and they have expressed a willingness to work. Then, there are 200 young naval cadets looking for work, and who are willing to board these ships, if they are given a chance. But no consideration was given them at all. The Canadian Pacific just says there are not enough men available. I say that is not true, and a position which should not be tolerated. If it were not for the lateness of the session, I would certainly press the matter to a vote. But I am serving warning on the Canadian Pacific that if I am here next session—and I hope I shall be—they will hear more about the matter. It is a disgrace to find a steamship company preferring Chinamen to white men on their ships. It is a disgrace to Canada and should not be tolerated. I certainly do not feel like sitting in my place without voicing a protest as loudly as possible.

Mr. MacNEIL: What company receives the subsidy for the service between Vancouver and northern British Columbia ports? What is the reason for the decrease, and does such decrease mean a lessened service?

Mr. BENNETT: I think it is put back in the supplementaries; most of them are.

Mr. EULER: But not all of them.

Mr. BENNETT: Nearly all of them.

Mr. EULER: The hon. member is referring to the service between Vancouver and the northern ports of British Columbia.

Mr. MacNEIL: Yes.

Mr. EULER: There is a decrease of $3,000. That is brought about merely because we thought they could get along on the smaller amount, and they were willing to do so. They give the same service. There is no diminution of service at all.

Mr. MacNEIL: Which company received the subsidy?

Mr. EULER: The Union Steamships Limited, Vancouver. They have four ships, and are on a one year contract.

Item agreed to.

Exhibitions and fairs—further amount required, $90,000.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the additional sum for?

Mr. EULER: For the New York exhibition.

Mr. BENNETT: But the other item was for that.

Mr. EULER: That was the original amount for buying the site, and putting up the building.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the total cost?

Mr. EULER: So far it is about $150,000, and it will possibly cost more.

Mr. BENNETT: What will be the total cost?

Mr. EULER: I do not know yet, exactly

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Reid.]

Publicity and advertising in Canada and abroad other than in the United Kingdom and Europe—further amount required, $20,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Is this vote governed by the general principle to which the minister referred this morning?

Mr. EULER: Yes. Most of that will be in this country, though.

Item agreed to.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions—

Atlantic ocean—

Canada and South Africa, service between—further amount required, $4,166.67.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the rule governing this service? What subsidy is given, for how many trips, and is it monthly or for a year?

Mr. EULER: The Canada-South Africa service is a one year contract for $100,000, and there is a reduction of $12,500.

Mr. BENNETT: How many trips every year?

Mr. EULER: There are twelve subsidized and eleven extra unsubsidized sailings.

Mr. BENNETT: Who receives the subsidy?

Mr. EULER: The Elder Dempster Line, with four vessels. At one time they received $146,000.

Item agreed to.

Pacific ocean—

Prince Rupert, B.C., and Queen Charlotte islands, service between—further amount required, $2,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Does this not put these subsidies back where they were? When the main estimates were carried these sums were taken off.

Mr. EULER: Not all of them.

Mr. BENNETT: Most of them.

Mr. EULER: In a few instances.

Mr. BENNETT: Look at them and you will see the ones. For instance, if the minister will look at the vote for the Charlottetown and Pictou service he will find that in the main estimates the amount was reduced from $30,000 to $25,000, and that it is now being increased to $30,000 by the additional $5,000 mentioned in vote No. 616.

Mr. EULER: We had taken off about $40,000, and this is what has been restored. It still leaves a substantial reduction. In some instances we expected we would be able to get the service for the amounts mentioned in the main estimates, but had difficulty in getting services for those amounts, and we have had to increase the votes in some instances.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Fisheries inspection, including fishery officers and guardians, fisheries patrol and fisheries protection services, $1,000,000.

Mr. REID: I have a few observations to make regarding statements made by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor) when the item was under discussion on a previous occasion. I believe he left the impression that in connection with the operation of traps the Fraser River Fishermen's Protective Association were in favour of the retention of traps. I want absolutely to refute that statement.

Immediately the statement was made in the house a telegram was received by me from the association protesting strenuously against the statement made by the hon. member for Nanaimo. On that occasion the hon. member quoted from a book entitled Net Profits, published this year under the auspices of the Fraser River Fishermen's Protective Association. He quoted one paragraph. Although it makes no definite statement, it does say this:

Based upon the experiences of past years, when groups employing different modes of fishing have vied for position to strengthen their particular interests in this fishery, the necessity of maintaining status quo in the industry becomes apparent.

The hon. member for Nanaimo left the impression on the house and perhaps the country also that by that statement appearing in the booklet Net Profits, the fishermen's protective association of the city of New Westminster were in favour of the retention of traps.

On the day following I received a telegram in which they emphatically denied that statement, saying it was not true. They are hoping traps will be eliminated before long, and I want the house and the country to know they are opposed and will continue their opposition until the traps are removed.

I shall take another minute to refute a further statement in regard to the number of men employed. Possibly I should say I make these observations for purposes of refuting the hon. member's statement, and I do so to draw the facts to his attention and to the attention of the minister. Last year these traps caught a total of 311,438 fish. There were forty men employed, making an average catch of 6,228 fish per man, whereas in the whole Fraser area in Puget Sound the average catch was 745 fish per man.

These figures are striking. Those who want the fish traps taken out of there are anxious to employ more labour, realizing that the traps not only deprive men of their livelihood, but also to a certain extent ruin the fish. The two companies in question have an investment of $100,000, but I must point out that that is not their own money. Of that they have only a total investment of $12,000 each. One year they made a profit of $24,800, which shows this is another case of vested interests being protected. I would suggest to the minister that instead of charging a licence fee of $500 a year, he might very well raise the amount. I venture to predict there are men in British Columbia who would be willing to pay $5,000 to be allowed to operate those traps. I am sorry I have not the time to go into the matter fully, but I wish to reassure the committee and the hon. member for Nanaimo that the fishermen of the Fraser river are absolutely opposed to traps, and want them entirely eliminated.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I have just one observation to make. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman if he is a member of the international sockeye commission.

Mr. REID: Yes.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Does he carry into the meetings of that commission his prejudice against the Sooke traps?

Mr. REID: I do not think I should answer a question like that by the hon. gentleman. It is not that I am afraid to answer it, but he has no right to ask me that question.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): If the hon. gentleman is taking his prejudices into the meetings of that commission, he has no right to be a member.

Mr. REID: I dispute that statement. I have every right to be on the commission, and represent the gill net fishermen on that commission.

Mr. NEILL: Since this matter was last before the committee, two things have happened which, I think, have a bearing on the situation. The first is a resolution passed by the Kyuquot Trollers Cooperative Association, one of the oldest and largest and most successful fishermen's cooperative associations in British Columbia. This is dated June 25, 1938, and reads:

The members of the Kyuquot Trollers Cooperative Association, Victoria, B.C., at their semi-annual meeting held at Kyuquot, deplore and protest against the continued issuance of trap licences in British Columbia, considering it an unfair privilege, that excludes other fishing gear from operation within such fixed location, and also as a destructive measure which does not distinguish between legal size nor out of season fish.

They pass this resolution every time they meet. It will be recalled that when this matter was last before the committee the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor) read a brief which had been prepared for him by one of the trap owners. At that time he stated that the resolution against traps had been railroaded through the meeting of the associated boards of trade of Vancouver island by myself at the meeting held a year ago. Under date of February 1, the hon. member wrote to the minister to call attention to the fact that this resolution was of small value; that it was wrongly presented and hastily passed. He stated that it met with strenuous opposition from the Victoria board of trade, a far superior board. Something has happened since then which throws some light on the matter. The associated boards of trade of Vancouver island have held another meeting. That is a very representative body, a parliament in itself. The members act without pay, and they have a fine idea of their duties and responsibilities as citizens. They met at Courtenay the other day, and this subject was brought up and discussed for three hours. The resolution was not railroaded through by me because I was not there. Mr. Todd, one of the moneyed principals in this matter was there, as well as Mr. Goodrich, another member. I understand there was also a lawyer along. After a debate of three hours a vote was taken, and only seven votes out of a total of thirty were in favour of traps. Everything possible was done to secure a verdict favourable to traps; but after a full discussion, that little parliament of Vancouver island, representing the best elements of the district, took an even stronger stand against traps than they had taken previously. It is true the Victoria board of trade was largely against this, but that board represents the moneyed interests. I am glad Vancouver island has shown its good sense by acting in this way.

Mr. MacNEIL: I share the views expressed by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Reid) and the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill), in regretting that the minister has seen fit to protect the privileged interests at Sooke and to disregard the welfare of the workers in a most important industry.

There is another matter to which I should like to direct attention. I have in my hand an urgent communication which was received this day from the fishermen in Parry Pass, Queen Charlotte islands, British Columbia, under date of June 21, 1938. I believe the best way to place this matter before the committee will be to read the important paragraphs of this communication. They are:

On the Langara island trolling grounds approximately 400 fishermen (white and Indian) manage to eke out a living for themselves and their families, possibly 2,000 persons, by catching the spring salmon which are attracted there by a comparatively small colony of herring schooling in that vicinity.

Should, for some reason, these herring on which the salmon feed, disappear, it is obvious that the salmon would also disappear in search of other feeding grounds, thus closing the source of livelihood of the 400 fishermen and their dependents.

Until recently the possibility of this happening has seemed remote, but now through a lack of foresight on the part of our fishery department, it has become a real danger.

Having received a permit from the department, a herring seine boat is now removing this salmon feed by hauls of from 50 to 100 tons at a time (approximately half a million herring to a haul). At this rate the small school will not last long. They are decreasing and as they go the salmon catch is also decreasing.

Appeals to the department seem to be in vain. Not an unusual thing when the person appealed against is the wealthy operator. The replies received from the department are not convincing to practical fishermen. For instance mention of no control outside the three mile limit when the herring are being caught within quarter of a mile of the shore, show that they are not even caring to investigate the matter, but are content to give an opinion from an armchair in the same office to which we send their salary cheques.

If these herring were being used for food purposes perhaps there would be less reason for grumbling but they are being reduced to fertilizer.

What inhuman system is this that allows a wealthy company to send out a single boat to take away for all time the means of livelihood of 2,000 people? And all for the sake of the profits on a few measly tons of fertilizer.

The resolution endorsed by the fishermen's committee and the councillors of the Indian tribe in the area reads as follows:

Whereas herring is being rapidly depleted on the northern coast of Graham island, Langara island in particular, and incidentally salmon being caught in the seine also, and

Whereas where herring have been depleted on their feeding grounds, such as the above mentioned, the grounds are also destroyed for salmon, and

Whereas we consider the use of this superior quality of herring in a reduction plant should be prohibited and conserved as much as possible for food purposes only, and

Whereas about 400 fishermen, Indians and whites (with their families about 2,000 persons), are dependent on those salmon grounds for their livelihood, and further, consider this $300,000 industry is of more importance to Canada than the operation of any reduction plant,

Therefore be it resolved that (at this joint meeting of Indians and white fishermen) we desire to take all legal means to protect our source of living, but, we demand and intend that seining for herring on the above mentioned grounds be stopped.

I should like some assurance from the minister that this matter will be investigated and the interest of these fishermen properly protected.

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries): I have received a communication along lines similar to that just read. Last evening and this morning we inquired from our officers on the Pacific coast, and we have been informed that what happened there was that a boat has been prospecting during the last few days. We were told that there has been no fishing going on and that there is no likelihood of any fishing being carried on in those waters.

Mr. REID: A moment ago when I was speaking I could not place my hand on the telegram which I had received from the fishermen asking that immediate action be taken in connection with the Sooke traps. This telegram reads:

Any intimation that Fraser river fishermen wish Sooke traps to remain absolutely false. Every fishermen's organization on Pacific coast to the best of my knowledge want Sooke traps out immediately and expect action to this end from parliament this session.

Before I resume my seat may I say to the hon. member for Nanaimo that I was made a member of the international sockeye commission to represent the Fraser river fishermen. My views with regard to traps were well known before I was placed on that commission. I would be derelict in my duty if I did not support the Fraser river fishermen in their attitude against these traps and in their request for immediate action. In case I am misrepresented, I want to assure my hon. friend that I am opposed to the continuation of traps at Sooke.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will the minister give us some assurance that if it is shown that seining for herring in the vicinity of Langara islands threatens the interests of the fishermen in that vicinity, it will be prohibited?

Mr. MICHAUD: Certainly.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I do not think it is necessary for me to protest, but I hope the minister will study this question of the Sooke traps as he has done hitherto. I hope he will do this in the interests of the conservation of the salmon and in the light of the peculiar conditions under which these traps were established.

Mr. REID: And the profits of the man who has the concession.

Mr. NEILL: As regards the herring situation, I brought this up when this matter was before the house on April 26. It is a lifelong grievance on the Pacific coast, the reducing of herrings which are not very profitable to reduce because they are very small in oil content as compared with pilchards, and the fishermen claim, I think without contradiction, that they are the food of salmon. It is a well known saying among fishermen, "No herring, no salmon." That is, if the herring are scarce this year, the salmon run will be short.

The minister says they are only experimenting out there. Quite so, but what for? With a view of taking larger quantities for reduction. That is the sole purpose for which they are seining in the waters to which the hon. member for Vancouver North has alluded, and the reason why there has been no depletion there is because it had not been fished before. I would ask the minister if he will not yield this much to our representations: Why not put that area up there under the same conditions as obtain on the west coast of Vancouver island, where experience has shown it is absolutely essential to have a close season, and we have a close season running from February 5 to, I believe, October 1. That would give the herring at least half a chance.

Mr. MICHAUD: As my hon. friend knows, under the present regulations there is restriction upon the quantity of herring to be caught in some areas. I understand it has been and I can assure him it is the policy of the department at the present time that when the catching of herring for reduction purposes is a menace to the salmon industry, the prohibition of fishing for herring is made and will be enforced.

Mr. NEILL: Yes, but the only trouble is that it is not. There is a quota put on, yes. The quota is only that amount which the reducing plants want. I have in my possession a letter from the local minister saying that he was not going to allow herrings to be reduced on the west coast. A year later he announced that he had gone into the matter very thoroughly, and the dead limit he was going to allow was 20,000 tons.

Mr. MICHAUD: That was the provincial minister.

Mr. NEILL: Yes. But we have the control of the fishing. He said it would not go beyond 20,000 tons. I replied, saying, "Oh, yes, it will. The amount of the quota will be limited only by the desires of the reduction plants." Sure enough, next year, instead of 20,000 tons it was 40,000 tons. Before that season was over—even in that one season—it was raised again another 5,000 tons, raised up to 45,000 tons in the comparatively limited waters of Barkley sound and the west coast. My experience is that while a quota is put on and they say they will not allow it to be exceeded, that quota will be raised to whatever quantity the reduction plants want. The minister has had scientific men out there who have demonstrated, to their satisfaction at any rate, that herrings on the Pacific coast are being depleted. They proved that by the size of them. Long experience tells them that the depletion of a run is first indicated by those taken being smaller. That was demonstrated, and an expert sent in a report to that effect. My information is—I cannot prove it at the moment, but I think I could if I were given time—that the official got a hint not to send in reports like that because they were not acceptable at Ottawa.

Mr. MICHAUD: All I can say is again to reassure my hon. friend that whenever it is demonstrated that fishing for herring in any waters is detrimental or a menace to the salmon industry, fishing for herring will be restricted.

Mr. BROOKS: With reference to the matter of herring being used for fertilizer, this is a subject which concerns not only the west coast but also the east coast. I have received letters from fishing organizations in the maritime provinces stating that a splendid market for herring could be obtained if there were instructions issued, by men properly trained to instruct fishermen, how to prepare the herring for market. Has the minister received any requests that a practical instructor, conversant with both French and English, be appointed by the department to instruct the fishermen of the Northumberland strait or any other part of the maritime provinces in the preparation of these herring for the market?

Mr. MICHAUD: I do not recall having received any request from fishermen or residents along the Northumberland strait. My recollection is that in Charlotte county, the bay of Fundy and that district there is a very valuable herring industry, and we have instructors giving demonstrations and instructing the fishermen how to prepare their fish for the market. I believe the best herring that are processed and put into foreign markets and into our own markets come from that area and command the best prices.

Mr. BROOKS: The minister, then, is not aware of any request from Westmorland or Kent county in New Brunswick, or that section, for a bilingual instructor to instruct the fishermen in the preparation of herrings?

Mr. MICHAUD: It is possible that a request has been made to the department, but at the moment I do not recollect any.

Item agreed to.

Building fishways and clearing rivers, $9,000.

Mr. NEILL: The last time this item was up on a general basis I discussed the question of the fish ladder on the Puntledge river at Courtenay. The minister, no doubt, has had time to look into the matter. Has he any statement to make in connection with it?

Mr. MICHAUD: The hon. member is correct. On the last occasion when the matter came before this committee I think I gave the information which was then before me, that is, that a fish ladder or fishway had been built in that river in 1922, had been washed out in 1927, was renewed in the same year, in 1935 was washed out again, and has been replaced.

Mr. NEILL: And again last December.

Mr. MICHAUD: And again last December was washed away. Since then there has been some difference of opinion as to whether the same kind of fishway should be built or a different method used. To build another fishway to meet the wishes of some people who are advocating a change, it is claimed, would impair the use of that river for water power development; and, looking over the files of the department, I find that there is a great difference of opinion between the residents of the locality, the company which is operating the water power—I think it is the Dunsmuir Collieries—and the engineers. Since then the local engineer of the department has reported that it would be costly and would not be as efficient as it is claimed to build a new type of fishway, and it would impair the use of that water power. However, I know that the citizens of the localities—I think these are Courtenay and Cumberland—have different views; and in order to settle the matter or set at rest the minds of these people, if it is agreeable that an independent engineer should pass upon the position, I am satisfied that this shall be done. My colleague the Minister of Public Works will lend me the use of his resident engineer or one of the staff on the Pacific coast to look over the situation and make a report as to what he thinks should meet the requirements.

Mr. NEILL: I think that is a satisfactory suggestion, and I know the public works engineer is a man of great ability. I have no doubt, therefore, his report will be exactly what he sees.

I want to say a word or two in connection with the statements that have been made to the effect that it would not be possible, or that at any rate it would be very difficult, to put the ladder up where it ought to be, namely, at the end of the dam. After being washed away three times, it is no use where it is; we must put it somewhere else, and the obvious place in which to put it is around the end of the dam in the rock. The departmental officials say that this would be dangerous to the dam on account of blasting. But you can blast anything, anywhere, if you are careful. I have blasted within three feet of the glass windows of my house without shattering the windows, and in the city you will see workmen using dynamite a few feet away from the sidewalk without any damage ensuing, because they know how to do it. They use discretion; they cover it up, and so on.

The next question is, Would it be workable? Well, we have an example of a fish ladder at Stamp falls in the neighbourhood of Alberni, and people come from far and near to see the fish going up the ladder pretty much as people go upstairs. That cost only $4,000 and the height was twenty-two feet. At Maggie lake the ladder was nineteen or twenty feet and it cost only $3,000. At the Puntledge riger the dam is fourteen feet at the outside, probably less. It would not, therefore, be a big undertaking and would not need more than six steps for the fish to jump from one pool to the other.

Let me give an illustration of what science can do. I allude to Bonnieville falls in the Columbia river where the fish have to ascend an average of fifty feet, lower at high water and higher at low water. The ladder is cut out of the rock on both sides. Of course, the higher the elevation the greater the cost. At Puntledge river they ascend fourteen feet at the most and less than that when the water is higher. The cost would not be deadly at all, and it would be a means of establishing a run there which used to be a valuable cohoe run and one that could be made into a sockeye run as well. I would remind the minister that the department pledged themselves, when they obtained the consent of the house, to do away with the policy of having hatcheries for the propagation of fish, to devote more money to the development of fish along natural lines, clearing out the rivers and putting in fish ladders. They put one in at Maggie lake last year in pursuance of that policy, and as we are saving large sums in connection with the hatcheries, I suggest that we can well afford to undertake such work as I have indicated. The minister has made a statement about bringing in an outside engineer, and I am glad to see an independent man brought in, because a mistake was made about ten or fifteen years ago. We all make mistakes; but a mistake was made at that time, when the wrong type of ladder was put in, and it is difficult to get a local engineer to turn around and admit that he made a mistake. It is against human nature. I would be prepared, however, to accept the judgment of an independent engineer.

Development of the deep sea fisheries and the demand for fish, $62,000.

Mr. NEILL: When this matter was up before, I brought up the question of the prospect of a foreign power—it does not matter who they are—fishing off the shores of British Columbia in such a way as entirely to eliminate our industry. We are talking about fish traps and guardians, and all that sort of thing. But if the policy that I mention, which is being pursued by the foreign power in question, is continued, then the fisheries department, so far as British Columbia is concerned, might as well shut up shop, because there will not be any fish at all. That applies not only to cod and herring, but to halibut as well. We have built up a wonderful business in halibut under the United States treaty and that will be wiped out if the present policy is continued. The minister did not give me much encouragement before. He said I ought to have more confidence in the government and should know that matters of such importance would be considered in the way they ought to be. I am sorry, but I should like to get a little more information.

The situation is this. Three years ago there appeared off the shore of Alaska—it is Alaska to-day, but our funeral to-morrow—a large number of fishing boats belonging to the Japanese. The procedure was to bring a great mother ship from Japan and it would be loaded up with what, in the east, would be dories. They are small gas-driven motorboats, and they string a line of nets 200 miles long—I wish to impress that fact upon the committee—right across the run of the fish making into Alaskan waters. Through the use of aeroplanes it is now possible to spot the fish far at sea and see the direction in which they are running, because fish do not run all over the ocean, but move in one concrete body towards a definite destination. It is therefore possible for the Japanese to run this line for 200 miles, as they have done more recently on the Russian shore and at a distance of ten or twenty or thirty miles out, entirely cut off the fish and there catch every fish that comes along. They are bothered with no restrictions. The Japanese idea of fishing in their own waters—and they demonstrated it there fairly well—is to take every fish they can possibly get. The Jap does not know the meaning of conservation, nor does he know anything about restricted hours or seasons. His idea is to take whatever is there, and when that is gone, to go somewhere else. They exhausted their own fisheries and then turned to the Russian fisheries. They are now beginning the same thing in Alaskan waters, and it is only a matter of a year or two when we shall find them taking the halibut banks off the British Columbia coast and the salmon runs going into the Fraser river and into all these rivers to which we have referred.

This is no idle dream of mine, because it is actually going on. I have a number of newspaper cuttings here, but I shall not read them. One or two of the headings are interesting. Here is one for instance, "United States fisheries known to Japs" and another, "United States fishermen armed to drive out Japanese." They found that the Japanese were not playing the game; that they were not living up to the agreement with the United States; so these men sent for a couple of hundred rifles and ammunition and they proposed to take the law into their own hands. The situation attracted the attention of the United States government. I do not know whether the minister was aware of it, but I do know that the United States government took the matter up with Japan and I have here the brief they presented. I shall touch on some of the points. They pointed out that beginning in 1930, and ever since then a large number of Japanese fishing fleets, made up of floating canneries and auxiliary vessels, have been operating. The mother ship acts as a floating cannery, or a reduction plant, or a freezing plant as necessity warrants, and they stay through the whole season and take the whole catch back to Japan. The Americans object to that. They say that the reports are becoming more and more insistent and reliable, and during the past season their authenticity has been supported by impressive affidavits and actual photographs of the fishing operations in question.

The Japanese, with their usual diplomacy, explained that they were fishing not for salmon, but for crabs; they said that they were simply engaged in a few exploratory operations, looking for crabs. The white men, however, flew over the mother ship and got so close to them that they could read the names on the boxes of canned salmon, and they saw thousands of fish on their decks. They could even identify the varieties of fish on the decks of the mother ship and they took photographs. In other words, Japanese diplomacy was rather at a discount. The Americans say that the United States government has understood, from assurances given by the Japanese government, that there are no licenses granted, but that is all a midsummer night's dream. They say they are sorry; but the reports they get and the photographs raise a strong presumption that the Japs actually are fishing there. Then the Americans deal with the enormous trade that they do in Alaskan waters, pointing out that the people of Alaska are allowed to fish only for one month, with the idea of conserving the fish, but the Japanese will fish for the whole period. They say the Japanese fishermen appear to be unrestricted as to season or equipment. Large bodies of United States fishermen are of the opinion that the salmon runs of Bristol bay are a United States resource, as they breed in Alaskan waters. The prospect is that the use of these more effective methods by Japanese nationals, while similar methods are denied to United States fishermen has provoked among United States fishemen serious concern and resentment. It is clear to all that if foreign nationals are permitted to carry on these operations off the shore of Alaska, the conservation efforts of the United States government within a comparatively short period will be of absolutely no effect. They point out that some 25,000 people are employed in the trade in Alaska, what they pay in wages, and the enormous business they do.

Then there is some correspondence. I shall read only a final extract from a confidential release dated March 25, 1938. They say that as a result of discussions between the United States government and the government of Japan in connection with these matters the Japanese government has given, without prejudice of course, assurance as follows: that the Japanese government is suspending—that means stopping for a short period, doesn't it?—the three year salmon fishing survey which has been in progress since 1936, and inasmuch as salmon fishing by Japanese is not permitted without licence from the Japanese government, that government will continue to suspend the issue of them, and if the United States government will prove Japanese vessels are fishing illegally, they will take cognizance of it. The United States government accepts these assurances and hopes they will live up to them. But between the lines you can read considerable doubt about that. Since that, these headings appeared that I have quoted about the United States fishermen arming themselves against the Japanese, because they are still there and are proceeding to fish. It is not a local matter to Alaska, or even British Columbia; it is of nation-wide concern. If that is persisted in, it means that with modern methods they will clean up the whole Pacific coast from Alaska to San Francisco. They can keep offshore, outside territorial waters, and I suppose they are legally correct.

But there are methods of bringing pressure to bear even upon Japan. If it were suggested that there would be retaliation in the way of non-trade, they would probably see reason. But unless the government do something more than tell me I ought to have confidence in the government looking after these matters, I shall not be satisfied. The minister knows the situation; has he taken any steps about it; has he associated himself with the United States in this protest? If not, then if the Japanese make any deal with the United States to keep out of Alaskan waters, there is only one place they will go, namely, to British Columbia waters. Has the minister had any communication with the Japanese or the United States government, so that we might join in any action that has been taken? And it is not only the Japanese; there was a suggestion last year that a British boat was coming from the Atlantic to fish for halibut, also a Norwegian boat. Unless we do something to stop them soon, the Japanese will establish their claim and our fishing will be non est. Will the minister give the committee some information as to what progress has been made in connection with the matter?

Mr. MICHAUD: As the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has stated, this is a delicate matter. These operations are carried on, on the high seas, where the Japanese, Americans, Norwegians, Canadians and others have a legal right to fish. It can be stopped only by mutual agreement between the countries interested, And I dare say it can be stopped by those countries only by preventing their nationals from resorting to those waters; that is, the Canadian government would have no right or power to prevent natives of a foreign country from carrying on such operations. As stated by my hon. friend, the government of Japan have said that they are going to refuse permits to their own nationals to carry on such operations, and that is the only way by which what is desired can be accomplished. When I said on a previous occasion that the hon. member should have enough confidence in the government to accept the statement that the matter is in hand and would be looked after, I knew my hon. friend would realize that this was what was intended. As far as the Department of Fisheries is concerned, it is not within our power to take up questions of that kind with foreign countries; all these matters are dealt with through the Department of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. But I know the matter is being dealt with. As far as the Department of Fisheries is empowered, we are following up with a view to protect the sources of supply for our fisheries as much as possible, and trying to impress upon neighbouring countries that the fisheries can be protected for all concerned only by mutual understanding and cooperation in conservation.

Mr. NEILL: No doubt the minister's statements are correct as far as they go, but they are more in the nature of truisms which do not lead to any definite action. He says it can be done only by agreement. I admit that; it is out in the open ocean. And he says that the Japanese government say they have refused to allow their vessels to operate in Alaskan waters. Yes. They promised the United States that, but have they promised us that they will not do it in our waters? We, it must be remembered, are next, and we have under the hand of the Canadian embassy at Washington the assurance that the Americans have been promised that the Japanese will keep out of Alaskan waters; but have we any such assurance? It is just as vital to us as to the Americans, and as far as I can find the fisheries department has done just nothing in the matter. Is that not the situation? If it is not, I shall apologize. If it is not so, will the minister bring down some correspondence showing the progress of negotiations? I submit nothing has been done, but still he asks me to have faith and confidence. Our neighbours to the south have done something; we apparently have done nothing. If we have done anything, what was it? Have we a promise that they will abstain? I have in my hand a long three column page of regulations made by the department in connection with mackerel on the east coast. There are about nine different brands: large, small and medium summer, and dark summer, and large, medium and extra large and choice fall, and dark fall, and so on. I notice that the biggest size in one case is not the biggest in the other; this is calculated to deceive people. It ends by saying that in the event of these sizes not being suitable, the minister may authorize a tolerance in the count to suit the requirements of the trade. Is that not a comparatively petty matter? Perhaps $150,000 worth of mackerel is packed, but should not the heads of the department at least be negotiating matters of such vital importance to us on the western coast? If I am wrong, and negotiations have been taking place, what are they? How far have they got? Will the minister bring down the correspondence? If not, will he initiate such correspondence; because it is for us to act to-day, not to-morrow? The Americans made their arrangement on March 25; what have we done?

Mr. MICHAUD: My hon. friend has read some newspaper clippings intimating that some Japanese boats had been fishing off the coast of Alaska. But he has not shown that any of these boats have been operating in territorial waters along the British Columbia coast, and as far as the department is concerned we do not know of any specific instance of Japanese boats carrying on such operations there. Until we have some specific case to complain about, I do not think we should anticipate any possible operation of that kind in waters adjacent to our country by adopting the methods of negotiation which have been adopted by the United States.

Mr. NEILL: If that is the attitude of the government, I will throw up my hands and not bother them any more. Here is the situation. Suppose there is a war and an enemy fleet lands in Vancouver. Somebody on the prairies says, "It will be time enough for us to fight when they reach Winnipeg." I know they are not doing anything in our waters to-day, but I was trying to look ahead, to galvanize the government into a little foresight in the matter. To-day it is the Alaskan situation, but, the United States have negotiated a treaty—whatever it may be worth—under which the Japanese are to keep out of Alaskan waters. But there is the mother ship and there are these boats; where are they to go next? The minister says it will be time enough to do something when they take some action. It will be too late then, because they will have established a precedent; they will have their equipment ready. Surely it is the part of wisdom to look ahead and try to reach an understanding about these things before they become acute, before there are large sums involved and vested interests concerned.

There is no use saying I quoted newspapers only. I quoted our own Minister to the United States. I obtained this information from Sir Herbert Marler in Washington. This was a confidential intelligence release given out by the United States government, which finally led up to the announcement that they had successfully—I hope it will be successful in its permanence—negotiated a deal by which the Japanese agreed not to fish outside the territorial waters of Alaska. Is this not the time for us to take some action? But if the minister takes the view that it will be time enough when the enemy is knocking at our door, I am afraid there is no use in discussing the matter.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I should like to ask the minister whether this whole matter does not come within the ambit of the international sockeye commission.

Mr. NEILL: No. Halibut are not sockeye.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): In any event I want to say that since the speech of the hon. member for New Westminster I have been rather disconcerted. I understand that this is an international sockeye commission. If the Canadian representative only represents the fishermen of the Fraser river, then I want to ask the minister if he will kindly see that the Canadian representative represents also the district of Nanaimo. I want to feel that the interests of Canada in the matter of salmon are being protected by our representative on the international sockeye commission.

Mr. REID: Would the minister tell the hon. member that there are three commissioners, not just one?

Item agreed to.

Fish culture, $240,740.

Mr. BARBER: I think we all regret that almost each year the estimates of this department are brought in on the last day of the session. Under this item I notice that the number of inspectors and those employed in canneries is exactly the same as it was a year ago; thirty-five; there has been no reduction. Seeing that the fish hatcheries in British Columbia have been closed, what portion of this vote will be expended in that province, and for what purpose?

Mr. MICHAUD: The only expenditure under this head in British Columbia during this fiscal year will be for the payment of the salaries of officers whose leave has not yet expired and who have not been either superannuated or transferred to some other district.

Mr. BARBER: I understand that at the beginning of the present year the control of sport or game fish in non-tidal waters of British Columbia was transferred to the province by a federal order in council. That has raised the question of licences. I understand that non-resident anglers' licences are still collected by the federal government, and at present it is understood that the dominion Department of Fisheries have placed licence books in the hands of custom officers and other agents in the interior and along the southern border of the province. One is quite safe in saying that ninety-five per cent of the licences issued will be used in non-tidal waters. This is somewhat confusing, if it has not been straightened out.

Mr. MICHAUD: I am pleased to be able to inform my hon. friend that we have been able to come to a satisfactory understanding with the government of British Columbia. The federal government has withdrawn from the sport fish business. We have left the field; we do not issue licences any longer, nor do we collect licence fees.

Mr. NEILL: But I understood there was some confusion. We collected a fee for tidal waters and the province collected a non-tidal angler's fee, which meant that the tourist had to pay double.

Mr. MICHAUD: No; he will not pay any federal fee now.

CRIMINAL CODE

RECKLESS DRIVING, SALTING MINES AND MINE SAMPLES, ETC.—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 137, to amend the criminal code.

He said: The first amendment is to section 12, which deals with the definition of common gaming house. The object of the original amendment to the section was to include within the definition of "common gaming house" one where any direct or indirect fee is charged to or paid by the players or any of them for the right or privilege of participating in a game. There was the exception concerning the house, room or place occasionally being used by a charitable or religious organization for playing a game the proceeds from which are to be used for the benefit of any charitable or religious object.

The senate has added another exception concerning:—

—any house, room or place while occupied and used by an incorporated, bona fide social club or branch thereof, if the whole or any portion of the stakes or bets or other proceeds at or from such games is not either directly or indirectly paid to the person keeping such house, room or place, and no fee in excess of ten cents per hour or fifty cents per day is charged to the players for the right or privilege of participating in such games.

I understand that unless this amendment had been accepted, the whole section would have been rejected. It is a compromise, and I am quite willing to accept it, although I preferred the section as it was.

Mr. BENNETT: There is nothing objectionable about it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No. Then, section 14 deals with disorderly conduct, and contains the words:—

Causes a disturbance in or near any street, road, highway or public place, by screaming—

And so on. At the end of the section are the words "or in any other way." My right hon. friend had objected to them. They are now struck out, and the word "shouting" is added before the word "swearing."

Mr. BENNETT: I should not think there is any relation between the two things.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I do not know; however, I do not object.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps it is better.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Perhaps. If it were not, it would not be the first bad thing the senate has been doing.

Mr. BENNETT: And not the first good one, either.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Then, section 17 refers to everyone who steals any plant, root, fruit or vegetable production. The penalty was not exceeding $50 or imprisonment of two years. This has been changed to six months.

Under section 18 there was provision for two years imprisonment, in connection with stealing cultivated plants. There, again, the penalty has been changed to six months, and for a subsequent offence a penalty of three years imprisonment has been changed to one year.

Mr. BENNETT: Apparently they are not such lovers of horticulture as we are in this chamber.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Apparently not. Then, the amendment to section 22 is a good one. They have added the words "gold, silver, platinum or other precious metals" at one place where obviously it had inadvertently been omitted.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF ELEVEN O'CLOCK CLOSING RULE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That this house shall not be adjourned at eleven o'clock p.m. this day.

He said: This motion having to do with the sitting of the house does not require notice. I would say that with the progress we have been making, unless we run into some unexpected discussion, I think it might be possible to arrange for prorogation by midnight.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I think it should be understood clearly that we would not sit beyond midnight. This is a suspension of a standing order, and I think we should not sit beyond midnight. If we cannot dispose of the business by midnight, clearly we shall have to sit to-morrow.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): It is never "to-morrow" so long as we sit to-day.

Mr. BENNETT: I would judge from what has taken place in the last six months that it is always to-morrow.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

The house again in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES

Special—To enable aiding fishermen, groups of fishermen and others to establish or better establish themselves in the industry, $500,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I would ask the minister to place on Hansard the information for which I asked some time ago. Last year parliament voted a sum of money to be distributed among fishermen; it was for a specific purpose. This vote is to enable fishermen, groups of fishermen and others to establish or better establish themselves in the industry. What was done under the vote passed last year? I suppose, in view of the notice given, there will be no difficulty in giving the information.

Mr. MICHAUD: Last year $500,000 was voted to aid in the reestablishment and reorganization of the dried and pickled fish branches of the fishing industry on the Atlantic coast, which because of world economic conditions had become acutely depressed. It was hoped to rehabilitate those engaged in the industry by granting assistance in processing, storing and marketing, and attempting to expand the demand for the products of the industry by assisting in the provision of transportation facilities on those portions of the coast where they were inadequate. All of this was to be carried on under conditions to be approved by order in council. Only about $60,000 was expended.

Mr. BENNETT: Might we have the details of the expenditures?

Mr. MICHAUD: A total of $24,451 was expended to increase the demand for fish by way of advertising, mainly in rural newspapers, because it was expected that dried and salt fish would be consumed mainly in rural districts.

Mr. BENNETT: Was that all within Canada?

Mr. MICHAUD: Yes. About $5,000 was expended to send two men to the West Indies, Puerto Rico, Cuba and other countries in South America, which in the past had taken most of our exports of cured fish.

Mr. BENNETT: Who were they?

Mr. MICHAUD: Mr. O. F. MacKenzie, of Halifax, and Mr. F. Homer Zwicker, of Lunenburg. Mr. MacKenzie received $2,229.70.

Mr. BENNETT: How was that amount determined?

Mr. MICHAUD: That was made up of travelling expenses because he did not accept any remuneration for his time. Mr. Zwicker received $2,717.75 for travelling expenses and a small allowance of $600 or $700 for his time. Both these gentlemen made a report which has been printed and distributed. To the end of the last fiscal year the balance of the vote could not be expended because the propositions made by the department to the industry and by the industry to the department could not be accepted. That is, no mutual understanding could be arrived at as to how this money should be expended, so we decided we had better keep it. However, negotiations are still continuing in the hope of having the industry take care of the weaker sections of the maritimes, such as eastern Nova Scotia and northern New Brunswick. The government is offering to subsidize certain processing plants which are necessary because of loss of European markets and changed conditions. An effort is to be made to get these people to adapt themselves to new methods so that they will be able to process a product which can be marketed more profitably than dried and salt cod.

Mr. BROOKS: Some time ago I intended to make a few remarks in connection with the fisheries of the maritime provinces. I shall not impose myself upon the committee this evening except to protest to the minister and to his department over the treatment given to the maritime fishermen. Last year $500,000 was voted to rehabilitate the fishermen in the maritime provinces, and the minister now tells us that some $40,000 of that vote was spent in advertising. I consider that the fishermen in the maritime provinces have received very poor treatment from the department, and I take this opportunity to protest to the minister. These facts are well known because the press of these provinces have called attention to the conditions under which the fishermen are living. These men are receiving very little for their fish. As a matter of fact, they have been receiving only starvation prices. This afternoon we listened to hon. members from the west talking about fixing a price of 85 or 87½ cents a bushel for wheat. The fishermen of the maritimes have been receiving for their product a price far below what they should. I contend that all the money which was voted last year should be spent along with whatever is being voted this year. The minister must know the conditions that exist, and he must be aware that this money could easily be spent to good advantage in rehabilitating the fishing industry. I shall not weary the committee with any more comments, but I feel that more attention should be paid to this great industry. When money is voted by this parliament for these men I contend that it should be spent by the minister and his department.

Mr. MICHAUD: I do not think my hon. friend is fully aware of all the facts and circumstances. There were two votes last year, one of $400,000 to assist the needy fishermen, and another vote of $500,000 to rehabilitate the industry. The vote for the needy fishermen has been all expended.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall want the particulars of that.

Mr. MICHAUD: That vote was expended in cooperation with the provinces. My hon. friend must appreciate that these individuals are not the wards of the dominion government. They are not subject to our jurisdiction unless they come within the scope of the fisheries regulations.

Mr. BROOKS: Many individuals in other industries in Canada have become the wards of the government.

Mr. MICHAUD: Unfortunately. The Department of Fisheries has recognized its obligations in this emergency. This is the primary responsibility of the provinces, but the federal government has offered to cooperate in helping the needy fishermen. Agreements have been signed with Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, and also Quebec in connection with that portion of the province still under federal jurisdiction, that is, the Magdalen islands.

We have entered into successful agreements whereby we have allowed to Nova Scotia $150,000; to New Brunswick, $100,000; to Prince Edward Island, $50,000, and to Quebec, $50,000. We have kept in reserve a certain amount which was offered to another province and which was declined because conditions there were not such that they could embark upon the policy which was suggested by us. So, as far as the money voted for the individual fisherman is concerned, I think we have done our duty by appropriating it to the provinces in proportion to the number of fishermen registered in each of such provinces.

Again this year we are negotiating with the same provinces with a view of continuing the help which was given for the last two years. As far as individuals are concerned we are leaving it with the provinces to determine what methods should be adopted to help them. Even in one province the problem is not the same in all sections, and it would be very difficult to adopt in Ottawa a uniform policy applicable even to one province. We prefer leaving this to the provincial governments that are willing to cooperate with us.

As to the industry, we are trying to adopt the best methods possible to help it and place it in a position where those engaged in it can regain the standard which they held prior to the depression. I am pleased to state that in this year we have reached a point where the fishing industry is back to where it was in 1930.

Mr. BROOKS: With regard to the amounts allotted to the provinces, have the provinces taken advantage of those allotments? I have here a return which I received some time ago from the department indicating the contributions to provincial funds from which aid was given by the provinces concerned in establishing or better establishing groups of fishermen in the industry. I notice from the return that Nova Scotia expended $96,792.99; Prince Edward Island, $42,406, and New Brunswick, only $18,180. I should like to know why so small an amount was expended in New Brunswick, and why it was expended only in one month out of the twelve months? Nova Scotia seems to have taken advantage of it for eleven months of the year, and Prince Edward Island, for eight months.

Mr. MICHAUD: This was due to the fact that at the time that information was given to the hon. member, accounts for these amounts only had been rendered to us. Since then, further accounts have been rendered, and up to the time that these estimates were made Nova Scotia had paid out $100,000; New Brunswick, $75,000; Prince Edward Island, $77,000, and Quebec, $75,000.

Mr. NEILL: How about British Columbia?

Mr. MICHAUD: They did not expend anything.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will any portion of this sum be made available to aid the fishermen of British Columbia? If no agreement exists, is there any prospect of an agreement with British Columbia?

Mr. MICHAUD: A portion of it was offered to that province, but no agreement was entered into. The prospects of entering into an agreement depend on the attitude of the province.

Mr. NEILL: Will it be open to British Columbia to participate in this sum?

Mr. MICHAUD: Part of it was always open to British Columbia.

Mr. NEILL: To what quota would British Columbia be ordinarily entitled?

Mr. MICHAUD: About fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister knows that I have taken a deep interest in this matter, for reasons which, I think, are obvious to every thoughtful man. Nova Scotia is a pretty rocky province. In pre-glacial days there was some soil on the rocks, but the soil has been largely removed, and these people live on a very rocky coast. I have visited their communities. I learn from the press that they are getting one cent and one and a half cents a pound for halibut, and the consumer is paying anywhere from twenty to twenty-five cents. As the minister knows, cod brings a much smaller price. These are facts. It is true that the amount I mention is an extremely depressed price. We know what the Atlantic halibut is, compared with the Pacific halibut; it is a smaller fish. They have also the haddock, which is an excellent fish, and the cod, which is not as clean as the others. These fish are being sold to-day at a very low price by the fishermen. When I say they are getting a cent and a cent and a half per pound, and the fillets are being sold on the markets to consumers at fifteen cents and as high as twenty-five cents a pound, the minister will realize what the condition of mind of these fishermen is. Certainly it is an attitude of great resentment against conditions. Everyone knows that.

I have a suggestion to make to the minister. Last year we voted a large sum of money to help the industry. To-day the minister has given an explanation of why only $60,000 has been spent. We now come to the other half million dollars which has to do with the individual fisherman, and what do we find? We find that in one of the provinces we gave $150,000 under the terms of an agreement by which we exercise little or no jurisdiction over the spending of it, leaving it, for the reasons the minister mentioned, to the province to deal with. In New Brunswick the situation is the same. I have followed with increasing interest the operations of the cooperative movement in Nova Scotia. Whatever else may be said, Mr. MacDonald, who is associated with St. Francis Xavier university, has done a most remarkable work. They endeavoured to get him to go to upper Canada. Fortunately Nova Scotia has retained his services. When he was here the other day I had an opportunity to talk with him regarding the work which is being done in Nova Scotia. I suggest to the minister that he should make available out of this sum of money a substantial grant to assist in cooperative enterprises among these fishermen. I believe that by so doing he will achieve a very great reform, and of course he is anxious to do so.

And, sir, I know something more. I know of the money that is being made out of the fishing industry. I recall a man who left Halifax with a reasonably small sum of money; he went down to a Nova Scotian port and established a fishing industry, and in combination with a great company which has existed in that industry he has made a substantial fortune. The hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare probably knows whom I mean, although I am not mentioning any name. He acquired a very large sum, somewhere, I believe, between a quarter and half a million dollars. To no small extent that fortune should have been distributed under proper conditions amongst the fishermen themselves, because the inability to sell their fish for more than one or one and a half cents per pound made possible the accumulation of these large returns. I suggest that the minister utilize some part of this vote—and he will have everybody behind him in doing so—in helping these poor unfortunate men to forward a cooperative movement which will ensure that a larger part of the price paid by the consumer goes into their pockets.

Mr. MICHAUD: Members of the committee must have noticed in the main estimates that we have this year for the first time an appropriation—small indeed— to the United Maritime Fisheries organization, which is the central organization of the cooperatives of Nova Scotia.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but it is only $3,000.

Mr. MICHAUD: That is for organization purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: What good is that?

Mr. MICHAUD: Besides this, we have an agreement, under another head, with the extension department of St. Francis Xavier university whereby we vote them an appropriation to cover the expenses of carrying on their movement in the three maritime provinces.

Mr. BENNETT: How much is that?

Mr. MICHAUD: Eight thousand dollars this year.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite. Well, they spend $25,000 per annum.

Mr. MICHAUD: I know. But this movement is growing and we are increasing our grant each year. We are in constant consultation with the head of the department, Doctor Coady, under whom Doctor MacDonald works, and we follow exactly their directions. We leave them free to act as they feel they should. I may take the committee into my confidence and say that last year we were willing to put a substantial amount at the disposal of the organization to help them to establish a base on the eastern coast of Nova Scotia, but as will be seen from their petition and the records of the department they were not yet prepared to take advantage of the offer and were not sufficiently well organized to begin in a large way to take care of themselves. That is one of the main reasons why the amount was not given them. Admittedly they were not ready to take advantage of the offer. They wanted the government to start a publicly owned plant, and the opinion was shared by the heads of the movement that this was not the proper thing to do. It was felt that we had better wait a little while until these people were ready to take hold of the movement themselves and to administer their own business without any governmental interference or control.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will admit that a cent or a half-cent a pound is ruinous.

Mr. MICHAUD: Absolutely, and if we knew of any method whereby we could compel those through whom the fish is processed and marketed to pay higher prices, it would be done. The only hope is to encourage these cooperative movements so as to enable them to manage their own affairs and market the products of their own industry in order that they may get everything that is in it and enjoy all the profits.

Mr. BENNETT: Try icing a few cars and paying the freight on them from the seaboard to upper Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That was done a few years ago.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but it was stopped before it was developed.

Mr. MICHAUD: The trouble arises in connection with the distribution. The organization is not quite prepared to take care of distribution in foreign markets, and until they are ready to do so, I do not think it would be in their own interests—they say so themselves —to go ahead too fast and to undertake a venture which might bring ruin to themselves and discredit upon the organization.

Mr. HARTIGAN: While the amount of $2,000 given for organization purposes may do some good, we cannot obtain lasting benefit unless we give a sufficient amount of money to the cooperative societies. A good many people, no doubt, share my conviction in this regard, but the idea may prevail that this is a partisan or a religious movement, merely because it is sponsored by St. Francis Xavier university. I can assure the committee, however, that the cooperative movement in Nova Scotia is non-sectarian and non-political. I had the pleasure of listening to the Rev. Nelson MacDonald when he explained the aims and objects of the society. I fancy he is known to most members here, by reputation at least, because he is one of the most assiduous workers in the cause of the cooperative movement, working hand in hand with the St. Francis Xavier extension movement. If we want any lasting benefit, I repeat, we must give the greater proportion of the money to some extension movement to educate the fishermen. You may spend all the money you like, but unless you spend money to educate the fishermen you will not get any permanent results. Give them a course of six months or a year under such leadership as is provided by the extension movement to which I have referred. In other parts of the country other colleges may come into the picture; perhaps they may be in a better position by reason of location to further the work. At the present time, however, we have only the St. Francis Xavier extension movement in eastern Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and if you gave them $100,000 you would get more value for the money and it would result in more ultimate good for the fishermen than from other expenditures. The cooperative movement is not local; it has assumed international proportions, and the day has gone when you can regard it as purely local.

I am not going to take sides and argue whether the trawlers should or should not operate. As a matter of fact, I do not believe there is anyone in Canada to-day who can argue convincingly on that question, and therefore I suggest that we should move cautiously before making any change in our system in that respect. I do urge, however, that if you give the fishermen proper leadership and the educational facilities furnished by the extension society, you will enable them to look after themselves. One of the chief things they are taught is to look after their financial condition and the processing of their fish. I hold that through the processing of the fish the market in the future will be gained, and the benefit that will accrue to the fishermen will depend upon their ability to process fish in such a way as to render them salable to the rest of the country.

I know that the great concerns which have operated in the past, the fish companies, deserve some credit; in fact they deserve a good deal of credit. For one thing, we cannot overlook the fact that they established the market; they placed their fish on the markets of the world. You cannot, therefore, eliminate these great fish concerns and expect the fishermen to step in at once and fill the gap. I do urge, however, that they be given an amount of money which would enable the St. Francis Xavier organization, or any other college that wishes to take up the work, to function. I am speaking irrespective of any religious denomination or political persuasion. If this were done, the fishermen would be able to look after themselves and to process their fish properly, and they would be ready to fill the gap that would be left by the elimination of the large fish companies if that were necessary—and it will be observed that I add that proviso. It may not be necessary. My guess is as good as anybody else's, I suggest that we are going through a transition period in the economical distribution of foods of all kinds, and there is no man, I do not care how good an economist he may be, or how many letters he may have after his name, who can tell the people what the outcome is likely to be so far as distribution is concerned. The minister will have the whole-hearted endorsation of the country if he devotes a greater amount of money to the cause I have been advocating. Do not give it away, as in the past, to ship-owners, but give it to a worthy extension movement which will put the fishermen on a higher plane and enable them to look after their own interests. That would be doing something worthy of the government of Canada.

Mr. POTTIER: I realize that the time is late, but we have waited five months for the fisheries estimates, and this is our first opportunity. I would impress upon the minister that there has been developing in the maritime provinces a condition which is serious in two ways. It is serious from the standpoint of the individual and from the standpoint of the industry. The individual is getting to the point where he is becoming discouraged, and in any project which we undertake we must realize that the individual himself must be convinced that the department is willing to assist him in his difficulties. It is not sufficient to think only of the industry; we must attack the problem fundamentally from the standpoint of the individual. Until we convince the fisherman that we are willing and anxious to help him and are in with him in this fight, we shall not get very far with broad policies touching the industry only. I suggest to the minister that when he distributes this amount he think of having the dominion government, the provincial government and the individual fishermen acting in cooperation. All three must come in before any lasting good to the fishermen or the industry is achieved. At this late stage of the session it is impossible to deal with the matter at greater length, but I ask with final emphasis that the minister think particularly of the help he can give to the individual fisherman to encourage him and restore his enthusiasm.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND RESOURCES

Mines and geology branch—Payment in connection with the movement of coal under conditions prescribed by the governor in council, $2,250,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Here is an item of great importance, a couple of million dollars or more. It involves a national policy with respect to fuel. It affects largely the maritimes, and to some small extent western Canada. The movement of coal from the east to the more densely settled communities has been going forward slowly, but the realization of our expectation of a million more tons of coal being lifted in Cape Breton than formerly as a result of this policy, is now an accomplished fact. But I have been reading with a good deal of care something that touches this matter. There are in Nova Scotia two great enterprises—or were; I do not know whether you can now call them two or not—the Dominion Steel Company, and for the purpose of this statement we will call it the Nova Scotia Steel Company; among the companies it owned was a coal company called the Acadia Coal Company. I observed the other day that there has been some discussion with respect to this matter in connection with its liquidation, and I made up my mind that I would bring it to the attention of the minister. If we are to have a stock-jobbing proposition with respect to this company; that is, if the Acadia company is to be acquired by Scotia and then Scotia is to be closed down and Acadia closed down and the Dominion company issue shares or securities or guarantee payments in any sense, the time has come when we must make it perfectly clear that if there is a curtailment of subsidies because money is used for those purposes, that should be utilized for the purposes for which we voted it, then the complaints that will come should be complaints made to those responsible for this action being taken, and not against this parliament. This parliament has provided money for these purposes, but is not providing money for stock-jobbing exploitations. That is what I want to bring home to the minister.

If anything such as the newspapers indicate is contemplated, he should make it his business now to ascertain what is being done and prevent it from being done out of moneys provided by the taxpayers of Canada in connection with the movement of coal from Cape Breton and other parts of Nova Scotia to the more central parts of this country. It has been a difficult matter to educate the people of the central regions of this country to purchase their coal requirements from the maritimes. It has been an effort on the part of governments, not of one party but of all parties, to get them to take that point of view. It is fundamental that the great enterprise in Cape Breton should not be utilized for stock-jobbing exploitation by the use of any part of the moneys which we pay in large sums—large sums, mark you!—to assist in employment on that island. This money should not be used to advance the interests and stock-jobbing ambitions of those who have been responsible for some of the happenings which are now before the courts of this country. I give the minister timely warning in order that he may take steps to see that the government is protected by appropriate action, and by doing so he will prevent what I regard as a very serious matter and ensure that these subsidies, heavy as they are, are utilized for the purpose of providing for employment and the development of a fuel policy that will enable this coal from Nova Scotia to be utilized as it now is in the consuming markets of upper Canada.

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): My right hon. friend's statement is the first I have heard of the matter. I understand two of the companies mentioned are in financial difficulty or liquidation. I quite agree with the general principle he has enunciated. Certainly I would be the last one in this house to support the payment of public moneys for stock-jobbing propositions of any kind.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe that; that is the reason I bring the matter up here.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall be glad to get some information in regard to what my right hon. friend has said.

Mr. BROOKS: How much of this money was expended for the movement of coal from the coal areas of New Brunswick last year?

Mr. CRERAR: It amounted to $32,362.

Mr. BROOKS: The amount paid in New Brunswick is not at all in proportion to the amount paid in Nova Scotia. If we received the same proportion in New Brunswick, I think we would get about ten times that much, or about $300,000. Would the minister look into this matter and see that the coal areas of New Brunswick receive the same consideration that is given the coal areas of Nova Scotia?

Mr. CRERAR: Nova Scotia is in a preferred position because a large amount of its coal moves by water. It is my information that even in New Brunswick the mines have not anything like succeeded in supplying the requirements of that province.

Mr. BROOKS: The difficulty is that the assistance given under this vote is enabling Nova Scotia to displace New Brunswick coal even in that province.

Mr. CRERAR: The fact of the matter is that the basis upon which the subventions are paid apply precisely the same in New Brunswick as they do in Nova Scotia. If a variation should be made to meet the suggestion of my hon. friend, it would simply mean that New Brunswick would be getting something over and above what Nova Scotia was getting. I shall leave it to the imagination of my hon. friend and of the committee as to what would happen under those circumstances.

Mr. KENNEDY: Has the minister given any consideration to the possibility of stabilizing these subventions? At the present time they are voted by parliament year by year, and we in western Canada think it would help the industry if this was done by statute for a period of five or seven years. Then the subventions would be sufficiently stable for mining interests to invest in mines and establish warehouses in Ontario in order to compete for the markets now supplied by United States coal. I wonder if that policy has been considered at all.

Mr. CRERAR: No. I should be glad to give consideration to it, but I would point out to my hon. friend that since we have had these subventions they have been applied on the same basis. Without having given the question a great deal of thought, I should say that very careful consideration should be given before making any change. However, I shall be glad to keep in mind the suggestion of my hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will find in the files of the department that the suggestion has been advanced.

Mr. HARTIGAN: I have just a few words to say about these subventions and about conditions in the coal mining areas of the country. Some hon. members were asking whether or not consideration has been given to the equalization of rates in order to get down to a stable basis. As I see it, the chief trouble in Canada is that we have not given the coal situation, with regard to Nova Scotia or any other province, enough consideration to know really what it is all about. I do not attribute this situation to the minister at all; but he is supposed to be aided by the fuel board, and I venture to suggest that this board has not met as such for a couple of years. I may be wrong, but I very much doubt if it has. Of course I know that the secretary is indefatigable in his efforts, but I doubt if the board has ever had a real meeting. It exists in name only, and what is the result?

I wish I had more time at my disposal to deal with this question, but I do not want to block this item at all. However, I think this is the opportune time to say what I have in mind, and I believe I should be doing wrong if I did not bring to the attention of the minister a few suggestions which I consider may be helpful. The first is that in spite of slack employment conditions in the coal mines of Nova Scotia I venture the prediction that there has been no slackening in the importation of coal into central Canada. There would be no need for only three or four days work a week in the coal mines of Cape Breton or any other part of Canada if we did not import so much bituminous coal from the United States. According to my information that importation amounted to 9,720,000 tons last year. I do not want to enlarge on that; I think hon. members can get the point as well from those few words as if I spoke for an hour or two.

I go now to another matter to which not only the fuel board but also the minister should give some attention. While we do not stand in the way of progress; while we realize that progressive methods must be introduced in industry in order to increase efficiency, still industry owes something to this government as representing the people of Canada. This, I think, is a most inopportune time for any company to install electrical devices which will automatically throw one-third of the working population out of employment. That is just about what we are facing in Cape Breton to-day. I do not wish to obstruct progress; I believe in progress, and I realize that the time is coming when electrical mechanization will be the only process used in mining coal. But at this time, when unemployment is such a great issue in this country, I say these people should be slowed down. Let them introduce it to some extent; let them try it out if they wish, but I think the introduction of electrical mechanization into the coal mines of Nova Scotia gives the explanation to the problem presented by the right hon. leader of the opposition in his reference to the Acadia coal area. Take one electrical unit in a mine. It will produce perhaps 250 tons of coal, and will require perhaps eleven men. Put ten units in a mine, and you will have 2,500 tons of coal spilling out of that mine if these machines work efficiently, as I believe they do. With eleven men to a unit that would mean 110 men. Then put three men, let us say, behind every man attached to the unit. There you have a small crew producing 2,500 tons of coal a day. It is easy to figure out the result; it does not require any advanced mathematics. If you electrify three or four mines, you will drop about a third of your crews; instead of having 1,800 men at work, you will employ only 600 or 800 men at the most. The remainder will be a burden on the people of this country, and ultimately a large part of the coal mining districts will close down.

My argument is that while neither I nor any other member of this house would want to obstruct progress, this electrification process should go forward very slowly, so as to not throw into the ranks of the unemployed a large number of men whom the rest of the people will have to support, making so much worse the unemployment situation of the country. These are facts which cannot be gainsaid. I do not make the statement critically, but I doubt very much whether the government as a whole is cognizant of what is happening throughout the dominion. I again come back to the fishermen and point out that we are in a transitional stage. By ignoring the fact that we are in a transitional stage we shall not improve our unemployment situation. Rather than throw back on to the unemployment lists a great number of men, let us increase the coal subventions by giving a higher rate, or even by an amount of money equivalent to that which would otherwise have to be paid to the unemployed, if they were pushed on to relief.

I think the economic outlook the government should take would be that of considering the man power, the greatest economic factor in Canada. If the government does not look at what is happening, with the men working only two or three days a week in Nova Scotia, and coal still being imported in the vast quantities I have mentioned, we shall have another 9,000,000 or 10,000,000 tons of bituminous coal coming into Canada.

A short time ago the hon. member for Royal spoke about New Brunswick. In that connection, if the government had been on the alert, and had been watching what was happening, the condition of affairs he described would never have been allowed to exist. The royal commission appointed to investigate conditions brought out the facts that the conditions under which those people are living are horrible in the extreme. What was happening at the same time? At the same time our government owned railways were playing the coal miners of New Brunswick against the coal miners of Nova Scotia, to keep the price down. They got their coal from New Brunswick for from $3.20 to $3.60 per ton. Is that taking into consideration the economic man power of Canada? I submit it is not. These are factors which should be gone into exhaustively by a fuel board, so that they may know what is happening in our coal industry.

We do not know what the future of coal mining may be. I do not pretend to know. But I say that during this transitional period the lot of the coal miner in Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Alberta and British Columbia can be eased a great deal by having correct supervision by a board which would take an active interest. I bring these facts to the attention of the committee, not by way of criticism, but in the hope that the minister may take action to see that the conditions are investigated, and that they will not continue to exist. I trust that he will see to it that conditions do not become much worse than they are at the present time. If those men are thrown out of work, our unemployment situation will become aggravated to a great extent.

Mr. HANSELL: Some of us regret that the item has not been brought down until this late hour.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. HANSELL: No; it is not carried yet. There are some of us who refrained from debating the budget because we believed we would have the privilege of talking on this item, and saying what we wanted to say. However, we find that now we are almost within minutes of the time for prorogation. I protest against that procedure. Under the circumstances I shall limit myself to saying briefly what I want to say. The hon. member who has just spoken has brought to the attention of the government the matter as it relates to the unemployment situation in Canada. Last year this situation was placed before the national employment commission, and Mr. Purvis delegated a special man so far as possible to investigate whether or not if operating at capacity, the coal mining industry could relieve the unemployment situation in this country. We understood something would be done in the present year. We now notice that the commission's report has been presented, and the matter entirely ignored. I cannot emphasize too much the fact that if the coal situation were viewed from a national standpoint, we would to a very great extent solve our unemployment problem.

We should have time to go into a discussion of the matter from a national point of view. The coal mining industry of Canada is almost on its last legs, if the matter is not dealt with within a very short space of time. I should like to know how much of the appropriation goes to the coal mining industry of Nova Scotia and how much to Alberta?

Mr. CRERAR: In Nova Scotia the amount was $1,786,000, and in Alberta, about $400,000.

Mr. HANSELL: Let it be remembered that for every ton of Alberta coal bought in eastern Canada there is that much more money out west to buy eastern Canada's goods.

Mr. PELLETIER: What is being done by the department to increase the export of Alberta coal to the western United States market?

Mr. CRERAR: We do not give subsidies for the export of coal.

Mr. PELLETIER: I understand that; but is the department doing anything towards increasing the export of Alberta coal to the western United States market?

Mr. CRERAR: That is a matter for the mine operators in Alberta. They must try to find a market in the western United States if they wish to have one there.

Mr. HANSELL: I admit it is a matter for the mine operators of Alberta, and they are doing the best they can; but they are operating on a shoe-string. That is the trouble. They have no money to go out to find markets. In Canada we have a Department of Trade and Commerce, and I would say it is their job to try to obtain markets for Alberta coal. It can be done.

Mr. NEILL: Did I understand the minister to say there was no bonus for the export of coal?

Mr. CRERAR: Not to the United States. The hon. member's question was with respect to exports to the United States.

Mr. BENNETT: I appreciate the minister's action, and I believe it will make unnecessary a large number of questions which he would otherwise be asked. I desired to have it in order that I might be able, by sending for Hansard, to answer questions which I might be constantly asked.

Mr. WALSH: Is the grant to these various schools based upon the unit cost?

Mr. CRERAR: It is based upon the cost of operation. As I stated, I believe it was last night, these grants vary from approximately $150 to $200, depending on the location of the school and the cost of operation and maintenance. For instance, if a school is located in the wilds of northern Saskatchewan, it would be more expensive to operate than one located in a settled district.

Immigration branch—administration of the Immigration Act and the Chinese Immigration Act, $179,923.

Mr. GREEN: About four months ago the government announced that two committees had been or would be appointed to look into the question of the illegal entry of Japanese into British Columbia. We were told that an inter-departmental committee had already been at work for almost a year, and subsequently a board of review was appointed, which I believe brought in a report early in May. What reports have been made by these two committees?

Mr. CRERAR: Some interim reports have been received from the board of review, but their final report has not been issued. So far as the inter-departmental committee is concerned, its considerations—

Mr. BENNETT: It was treated as privileged.

Mr. CRERAR: I understand the inter-departmental committee has not made a report but the board of review is operating.

Mr. GREEN: Has either the committee or the board of review been responsible for sending back to Japan any Japanese who had entered Canada illegally?

Mr. CRERAR: I am told that there are cases under investigation, but I cannot say at the moment whether any actual deportations have taken place since the board of review started to function.

Mr. GREEN: Have these two boards found it to be a fact that there are many Japanese in British Columbia illegally?

Mr. CRERAR: At the moment I cannot give my hon. friend any more information than I have just stated.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Mr. GREEN: On May 26, the Prime Minister told us that a statement would be made by the government on the interim report which had been received from the board of review. When are we to get that statement? We have been led to believe right along that the government was anxious to get results quickly from this inter-departmental committee and the board of review, but it would appear now that this is another case of waiting and seeing.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is quite wrong, and I am quite sure he does not desire to be unfair in any sense. This is a matter that involves a great deal of investigation, and I think my hon. friend will appreciate the inadvisability of broadcasting in the house or to the public the progress of these investigations. When the board of review has finished its work I have no doubt that a report will be made.

Mr. BENNETT: How many have actually been deported since the beginning of the year?

Mr. CRERAR: I am unable to give that information at the moment.

Mr. NEILL: Has the government under consideration the making of a census of either the orientals or the whole population of British Columbia? I suggest that this is the only way to ascertain really whether any orientals are in the country illegally.

Mr. CRERAR: I might say that the matter has not received consideration at the moment, but I imagine that when the board of review completes its investigation it will have something to say on that score.

Item agreed to.

Empire settlement, $1,000.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister care to make a statement with regard to the results of the empire conference held last year in London? I believe a representative of Canada attended that conference at which was taken up the matter of British empire settlement and immigration.

Mr. CRERAR: The Canadian government did not have a representative at that conference.

Item agreed to.

Mines and geology branch—To assist in provision of transportation facilities into mining areas and to authorize subject to the approval of the governor in council, the appointment of such extra temporary officers, clerks and employees as may be necessary to carry out the purpose of any of the following items designated "special" under this department, $1,310,000.

Mr. CRERAR: A typographical error has been made in the printing by including the word "following" in the description.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move that the word "following" be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. PELLETIER: How much has been allotted to each province under this item?

Mr. CRERAR: The allotments are as follows:

Nova Scotia	$ 25,000
Quebec	250,000
Ontario	250,000
Manitoba	230,000
Saskatchewan	125,000
Alberta	50,000
British Columbia	240,000
Yukon	50,000
Northwest Territories	43,000

There is a small sum unallotted and another small amount reserved for administration costs.

Mr. PELLETIER: Last year some $25,000 was supposed to be allotted to Alberta. Has that money been paid to the province?

Mr. CRERAR: The money was not spent in Alberta last year.

Mr. PELLETIER: There was no payment made to the province?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. PELLETIER: What about the $50,000 supposed to be spent this year? Have any requests been received for the expenditure of this money from the government of the province?

Mr. CRERAR: The $50,000 is to be spent this year in the improvement of the Athabaska river from Waterways down. As my hon. friend probably knows, the water of the Athabaska river has been low this year. The freight movement on this river down to lake Athabaska has increased considerably in the last five years. It is proposed to appropriate, out of this, $50,000, and I think a similar amount is coming from the Department of Public Works, for a commencement of definite river navigation improvement on the Athabaska. Then I draw to the attention of the committee that $42,000 is being spent in the northwest territories, which is solely under the control of the federal administration; and since Alberta gets all the benefits, what is really being expended in relation to benefits which will accrue to Alberta is $93,000.

Mr. PELLETIER: I quite understand. But was there any request by the government of Alberta for money to be expended at that particular spot?

Mr. CRERAR: Well, I think we had requests from the province of Alberta and we certainly—

Mr. PELLETIER: Pardon me; I said "the government of Alberta."

Mr. CRERAR: Well, I am not going to get into an argument with my hon. friend with respect to terms. Requests came from the province of Alberta over a year ago for the improvement of transportation into the north country. The suggestion was made that a winter road might be built from Waterways to lake Athabaska. That would incur a very heavy expenditure and, in our judgment, was not the best method of proceeding with the development of transportation facilities into that area. I believe the Alberta government are quite agreeable to the spending of the money on the improvements on that river. As a matter of fact, the Alberta government are not being asked to make a contribution to that work. Personally I do not think they should be. River and harbour improvements are usually—indeed, I think, invariably—a federal responsibility. From present appearances the developments year by year will increase in the north country. One of the most promising mining fields to-day, potentially, is the area north of Slave lake. Several companies are now going in there. I believe three mills are being built in the vicinity of Slave lake. All that freight has to move down the Athabaska river, and with the improvements made from Fitzgerald to Fort Smith better facilities will be afforded for the movement of that freight. Personally I think that is the sensible course to follow.

Mr. PELLETIER: I am in entire agreement with the minister so far as transportation facilities to the north are concerned, and I am sure they will be received with pleasure by those concerned in the area. Nevertheless I would point out to the minister that last year the demand was made that this $25,000 which was supposed to be allotted to the province should be spent. The minister tells us that in the opinion of the department the proposed location of the work was not suitable. I happen to have letters on file from the minister's department telling me that they have not even given this such consideration as they would like to do and have never been advised that this location is not suitable. If that is the case, this must be a brand new decision on the part of the government, because at that time there was no decision of that kind considered.

In that connection I should like to point out that a vast amount of money has been spent in northern British Columbia surrounding the property of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company. I agree that development should be encouraged, and undoubtedly the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company should be encouraged to develop mining in that country. But let me point out that last year they made a profit of over $17,000,000. When it came time to obtain a grant of $25,000 from the federal government, not for the benefit of one particular company but for the benefit of many people in that particular part of the country, that grant was said to be not in accordance with the views of the department. Of course, if the minister has now come to the conclusion that the project is unsatisfactory to the government, I repeat it is simply a brand new decision on the part of the government, because I well recall a visit which the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) paid not so long ago to the Peace River country. He then definitely made the statement that in so far as the $25,000 grant was concerned, arrangements had been made and undoubtedly it would be expended. I suggest that there should be a little more cooperation among the various ministers of the crown. The people in the section believed that the grant would be made. Now the minister tells us that the government has decided that such a propect is unfeasible and unworthy of their consideration. I ask the minister to consider it once more.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is confusing two things. He is referring to the road from Grimshaw to Great Slave lake. I am referring to a request from the Alberta government over a year ago that a road be built form Waterways to lake Athabaska.

Mr. PELLETIER: The point is this, that the $25,000 which was supposed to be allotted to Alberta last year never was paid to that province. I say in contrast with that, when a certain company in the northern part of British Columbia desired assistance, vast sums of money were expended in that particular territory. Will the minister be good enough to state how much money was spent last year in the northern half of British Columbia and how much in the northern part of Alberta?

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot at the moment give my hon. friend the information. The money which was expended in British Columbia was spent getting into metal mining areas. No such areas have so far been discovered in Alberta. The development at lake Athabaska is in Saskatchewan, though of course immediately north of Alberta, and as I said before, the city of Edmonton and the province of Alberta generally are going to benefit greatly.

Mr. PELLETIER: Just finally, there is this word to be said, that so far as the development at Fort McMurray is concerned, that request, I understand, did not officially come from the government of Alberta. I agree that the work should be carried on, but I merely want to point out that this is not the policy which is adopted in connection with other provinces. If my understanding is correct, every provincial government is always consulted before expenditures of this kind are undertaken. I well recall last year when a return was brought down, the minister advised me that British Columbia was consulted before the particular expenditure was undertaken. I beg to point out that Alberta is the only province where the provincial government is not consulted as to the disposition of the money voted.

Mr. HANSON: I should like to draw to the attention of the last speaker that if he looks through sessional paper No. 313, he will find out what has been spent in northern British Columbia from 1930 to 1938, and he will find that reasonable consideration has been given to that portion of the country.

Item as amended agreed to.

Lands, Parks and Forests Branch—Government of the Northwest Territories—General administration, operation, maintenance and improvement of services, including Wood Buffalo park—further amount required, $20,300.

Mr. GREEN: Have there been any negotiations yet between this government and the government of British Columbia concerning the taking over of the Mackenzie river basin or any other portion of the northwest territories by that province?

Mr. CRERAR: No; there have been no negotiations of that kind.

Item agreed to.

Special — National Parks bureau — national parks, $400,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I have a very large body of information which I should like to impart to this committee as to the conduct of affairs in the national parks. But at this late hour I shall refrain from saying more than this, that life has become a great burden by reason of the method employed by the superintendent at Banff in the enforcement of regulations under leases which have been issued over a period of years. He is compelling those who seek some sort of remedy for their difficulties to sign documents which would have the effect of putting them completely and absolutely in the hands of the government, regardless of what their legal position may be. If I were to utilize the information at my hand, it would take at least an hour to present to this committee, and I would offer no apology; for it spells a condition which I think is intolerable in a country such as this.

I mentioned the matter to the minister, and some time ago he gave instructions that in my judgment, had they been carried out, would have had the desired effect. They have not been made effective. I have again discussed the matter with him, and I think he proposes to take such action as will bring about an improvement in that situation. If the minister is prepared to make a statement that will cover the situation, in the light of the knowledge that has been presented to him, I will refrain from taking up the time of the committee in discussing a matter which I think is of very great importance. I trust I shall not be regarded in any sense as suggesting that the minister should do this rather than that I should give effect to what may seem to be my duty, but which I shall refrain from doing if the minister is able to carry out the suggestions which he has already made to me.

Mr. CRERAR: I may say briefly to my right hon. friend that I know his interest in the Banff national park, and while there has been some little difficulty I do not think it is so very serious, as he states.

Mr. BENNETT: See the telegrams that I get.

Mr. CRERAR: There is a town of 3,000 people in the park with all the ambitions of a town that size. We desire to make certain improvements. The right hon. gentleman has called my attention to some of the difficulties that exist there, and within the next few days I am going to take steps to have a special investigation made. I can assure him that I am as anxious as he is to have Banff become a first-class national park.

Mr. PERLEY: Are any new parks to be developed in Saskatchewan this year?

Mr. CRERAR: There is no provision for additional parks.

Item agreed to.

Development of tourist highways, $1,750,000.

Mr. BARBER: What proportion of this vote is being given to British Columbia? Has any agreement been entered into?

Mr. CRERAR: The allotment for British Columbia is $150,000.

Mr. BARBER: That is this year.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the Alberta allotment?

Mr. CRERAR: Alberta's is $75,000.

Mr. PERLEY: And Saskatchewan?

Mr. CRERAR: These are the various amounts, Saskatchewan, $175,000; Manitoba, $390,000; Ontario, $500,000; Quebec, $175,000; New Brunswick, $100,000; Nova Scotia, $135,000; Prince Edward Island, $40,000.

Mr. MacNEIL: What projects have been agreed upon in British Columbia?

Mr. CRERAR: The allotment will be spent on the development of a highway from Blaine into Vancouver.

Mr. BARBER: That is the point I wanted to bring up to-night. We have a paved highway from Blaine to the Westminster bridge, and what I want to direct the minister's attention to is this. At the port of Huntingdon you enter from Seattle, through Bellingham and Sumas, to the trans-Canada highway. The port of Huntingdon is the fifth largest port in Canada from the standpoint of business, and we have there, on the Canadian side, what is commonly termed a dirt road. It takes three or four miles to reach the trans-Canada highway over the dirt road and one can imagine what an impression it must make upon tourists coming from the United States and hitting that sort of road. What must be their opinion of Canada, and what encouragement will they have to return and to induce others to come?

Two or three years ago a survey was made, and through the construction of one mile of road direct connection can be made with the trans-Canada highway. I was in hopes that provision would be made out of this vote, in conjunction with the province of British Columbia, to complete what is known as "C" street, which would connect directly from the United States highways with our own paved trans-Canada highway. To complete it there would be required perhaps, in addition, two miles of paving. I do not like to make the charge; but it seems to me, from information I have received that party politics is entering into this question to some extent. To the west of us there is a riding on which there is going to be spent some $300,000 or $400,000 for the construction of a wide new highway from Blaine to Westminster bridge, whereas in this other district, which happens to be represented by a Conservative, we cannot get a highway completed with a two mile hard surface. This is a matter that was taken up with the provincial government two or three weeks ago, but no answer has been received, and I wish to impress upon the minister the importance of this construction from the standpoint of the tourist industry. The tourist industry can be encouraged and considerably increased at this point by the expenditure of a very small sum of money, and I wish to urge upon the minister the importance of that particular road.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Will the minister give a break-down of the $500,000 which is being spent in Ontario?

Mr. CRERAR: I am not able at the moment to give that information. That question is under study now, and the province is being asked in each of these cases to provide at least an equal amount. The allocation of this particular vote in Ontario has not yet been definitely determined.

Mr. STEWART: Will the administration of these funds be under provincial control?

Mr. CRERAR: It will be under agreements with the provinces. The agreements are similar to those we have had in the past, except that the projects, the places where the roads would be built, have to be approved by the federal government. The provincial government also consents, both contributing, and we take the necessary steps under the agreement to see that the provisions are carried out by inspection in regard to labour, the sort of labour employed, and everything else.

Mr. BENNETT: Having regard to the fact that in Alberta we have not only Jasper park and Banff park, but communicating roads and the Kootenay park which is reached through these roads, I cannot but think that the sum allotted to that province is wholly inadequate. In the ultimate analysis the tourist trade is almost as valuable as the mining industry, and that trade is so important that unless we provide decent roads we shall lose it. This long dust line leading into Alberta from the south must be replaced with properly surfaced roads. In the great province of Ontario they have such roads; they have money. In Alberta and Saskatchewan they have no money, and there is no place in which federal grants should be expended so readily as in those provinces, which have not the road material. They have road material in Alberta; but in the prairies and the plains they have not, and the only way by which we can keep the tourist traffic is to provide proper roads into those parts. The sum of $75,000 is a miserable amount.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In item No. 536 there is a further sum of $300,000.

[Mr. Barber.]

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but that is the one road which is under contract. That does not help these matters at all. That only continues the road from Banff. It is Jasper and the road through to Revelstoke. Those are two different roads. I am talking about the roads that lead to these parks, coming in by Kingsgate in British Columbia, by the ports in Alberta and Saskatchewan and by way of Lethbridge. Surely $75,000 is a paltry sum to talk about for Alberta, where they have little money, and where the importance of these roads to these great parks cannot be estimated. The other day I saw the road leading from Calgary to Banff; it is partly covered with oil, with a surfacing substance to keep down the dust. But the road leading to the United States is not in that fortunate position. Surely something must be done to make these roads passable. As an allotment to Alberta I would almost say that $75,000 is in the nature of a punishment, not a reward.

Mr. CRERAR: No, that is not so.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, it looks like it.

Mr. CRERAR: No; my right hon. friend is a little less than fair in this. As far as the road from Calgary to Waterton Lakes park is concerned, we hope that road may be completely hard-surfaced this fall. The improvements to the road have been going on for two years; in each of the two years grants were available when no other grants were being made elsewhere in the dominion for hard-surfacing and dust laying, except on the Kingsgate-Radium Hot Springs road in British Columbia. No one will appreciate more than the right hon. leader of the opposition the interesting time a minister has in trying to allot a vote of this size. There are claims from all parts of the country. In Alberta this year $300,000 is being spent on the Banff-Jasper road. Also there is further work being done for which British Columbia is paying 50 per cent, looking towards the completion of the Kingsgate-Radium Hot Springs road. We are also spending $100,000 in hard-surfacing in Banff this year. That is entirely in the province of Alberta, with the exception of the Kingsgate road, and when that road is completed Calgary and all the towns down to Waterton lakes are going to derive the main benefit.

Mr. BENNETT: It is roads leading to the United States that I am concerned with.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, but tourists will come in by Kingsgate and go out through Calgary and the Waterton lakes. Alberta is bound to get a large benefit from that. I would have liked to see a larger vote, because the development of the tourist business is a great asset for this country, an excellent way to increase the national income, and I hope the public consciousness will develop to support increased assistance from the federal government in the development of what I consider one of our great national assets.

Mr. BARBER: Is the responsibility for these expenditures and the selection of the sections where they are to be spent up to the provincial government? Do they initiate it?

Mr. CRERAR: The provincial government submit the project to us. I shall be glad to look into the road referred to by my hon. friend; but the representations that have been made to us—and they have, I think, been borne out convincingly—are that the present road from Blaine, where the Peace arch is on the international boundary, to Vancouver, is hopelessly inadequate for tourist traffic. I was told recently that on one day over fourteen thousand cars passed over the new Pattullo bridge at New Westminster. That is an indication of the development and the possibilities of that traffic.

Mr. BARBER: That traffic can be relieved to a great extent by improving these other entries. I am not opposing the other road, but this road has just one mile to complete. I urge the minister to look into that.

Mr. PERLEY: On what roads in Saskatchewan will this money be spent? Have the provincial government made application stating what roads they want it spent on?

Mr. CRERAR: No decision has yet been reached on that.

Mr. PERLEY: It was a live question during the recent provincial election in Saskatchewan. Roads were promised to be built from the southern boundary through to Regina and Humboldt and Melfort, and another by Moose Jaw to Prince Albert park. Surely, when the discussion took place, it had been decided which road the money was to be spent on.

Mr. MacNEIL: Does the minister's department control the conditions under which labour will be employed on the new Pacific highway? If so, has provision been made to absorb a number of the single unemployed men now in Vancouver?

Mr. CRERAR: The agreements with the provinces carry provisions that cover the point raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. MacNEIL: From the sessional paper tabled a few days ago I read from a telegram sent by Mr. Pearson, Minister of Labour, dated June 10, conditions which practically exclude the absorption of the unemployed transients now in Vancouver:

> Only two major projects are Big Bend highway and New Pacific highway former under entire control federal government while latter will be constructed through districts that now have hundreds of families on relief nevertheless employment of unemployed persons in areas through which road runs will relieve competition from labour market. Assume terms agreement will provide fifty per cent relief labour and fifty per cent contractors choice. Single men will be free to compete for latter quota without specific preference being given to any one group.

I point out that those conditions as laid down will not lead to any solution of the distressing problem confronting the city of Vancouver at this time.

Mr. CRERAR: That will be governed by the agreement, not by some statement Mr. Pearson has given to the newspapers.

Mr. ESLING: From the international boundary there are 140 miles of hard-surfaced road to the south. It is about eight miles from the international boundary to connect with the trans-provincial highway leading to Vancouver on the west and Banff on the east. Last year this government contributed $10,000 towards the completion of two miles out of the eight. Is there any contribution to complete the remaining six miles this year? It is entirely a tourist highway connecting with the transprovincial highway through the port of Paterson, the point of entry. There is so much business there that the department has to put on extra help for the collector of customs.

Mr. CRERAR: The matter to which my hon. friend refers certainly was not under the Department of Mines and Resources last year, and consequently I am not familiar with the point he has raised. I shall be glad to look into it.

Mr. ESLING: It is a tourist highway.

Mr. CRERAR: We did not build any tourist highways last year.

Mr. ESLING: Is there no appropriation towards the completion of that highway this year? If so, is it because the provincial government has not made any recommendation for it? There has been plenty of publicity in the press to the effect that those six miles were to be completed this year.

Mr. CRERAR: I am not familiar with the geography of the district to which my hon. friend refers, so I cannot say at the moment whether that project is under consideration this year or not. Certainly it was not last year as far as the Department of Mines and Resources is concerned.

Mr. ESLING: But from the standpoint of the development of tourist traffic; over which matter the minister has control, this road comes from Spokane to Trail and Rossland, connecting there with the southern trans-provincial highway, and I want to ask explicitly if the provincial government has made any suggestion as to the completion of that road.

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot say at the moment. I shall be glad to ascertain that information and give it to my hon. friend. But I can say that it is not in the program for this year.

Mr. ESLING: The newspapers said it was to be in the program this year. Is there any appropriation at all for the completion of tourist highways in southeastern British Columbia?

Mr. CRERAR: It may be in some provincial program that we have nothing to do with; I cannot say as to that, but it is not in the program that comes under this vote.

Mr. MacNEIL: The minister was under a misapprehension a moment ago when he said I was quoting newspaper statements. I was quoting from a telegram contained in a sessional paper, from the provincial minister of labour of British Columbia to the federal Minister of Labour, evidently referring to the agreement. I am directing the attention of the minister to the fact that the people of Vancouver have been advised that this project will be so conducted as to relieve the distressing situation which exists following what is rightly termed "bloody Sunday" in that city. Under the terms of the agreement, as disclosed in this telegram, there is no suggestion of any solution of that problem. A works project will be developed without absorbing a single man from that group.

Mr. ROGERS: If I may answer that question, the telegram to which the hon. member refers was sent before the agreement was drafted which covered that work. The work was announced, but the agreement was not drafted. I can assure my hon. friend that the clause dealing with the employment of labour on that project does provide for a certain number of single unemployed men to be taken through the Employment Service of Canada at Vancouver and New Westminster.

Item agreed to.

[Mr. Crerar.]

Surveys and Engineering Branch—Hydrographic and map service—legal surveys and map service—further amount required, $11,000.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): What is being done with the claim of Saanich municipality in connection with the dominion astrophysical observatory at Victoria? Some four years ago they spent a considerable sum of money in assisting to put out a fire which raged on the hill.

Mr. CRERAR: I remember something about the fire, but at the moment I cannot recall what has been done about it. I shall be very glad to ascertain that information and give it to my hon. friend.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I do not think it should be dismissed in that manner, though I am sorry to have to say so. The minister and his department must be well aware that I have written about the matter many, many times.

Mr. CRERAR: I remember my hon. friend speaking to me about it, but at the moment I cannot recall the precise position. I did not wish to be discourteous to my hon. friend; he is certainly one of the last members of the house to whom I would desire to give any impression of discourtesy. What I said was that I would be very glad to get the information and give it to my hon. friend. I may be able to get it in a moment, but just now I do not have it.

Item agreed to.

Indian Affairs Branch—welfare and training—Indian education—further amount required, $25,000.

Mr. NEILL: I assume this provides for the further construction of schools. The Indian school at Alberni was burned down some two years ago, after having been in use for about forty years. I understand there is no provision for the reconstruction of that school this year; that the money allotted has gone to build schools elsewhere. Can the minister give us any assurance that it will be considered next year?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; I will say to my hon. friend now that it will be considered in our program next year; and if the generosity of my colleagues is such that I can get an amount for it, I shall be glad to include it. But I can say seriously to my hon. friend that it will be considered.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister use the word "favourably"?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not like to give such guarantees a year ahead.

Mr. LOCKHART: I understand there have been increases in the estimates for Indian education this year, and I should like the minister to explain in what way the work has been extended. Last year I said that in my opinion the work was being neglected in some ways, but this year I see a considerable increase in both the main and supplementary estimates. In what way has this work been increased, and in what way are the Indians receiving a better education?

Mr. CRERAR: The increase is due entirely to the fact that, as I recall the figures at the moment, there are from 200 to 250 new Indian children coming in for education every year. The Indian population is increasing, and the school population is also increasing.

Mr. LOCKHART: To what extent is the school population increasing?

Mr. CRERAR: As I said a moment ago to the extent of about 250 pupils per year.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is a definite increase of 250?

Mr. CRERAR: I would not be certain that that was the precise number.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. LOCKHART: We should not make a burlesque out of this thing; it is information we want, and it does not help to have a few hon. members keep calling, "Carried." I want to know if there is any new phase of education for the Indians being taken up this year. I do not want to go into the details of what might be considered the neglect of their education; but have there been any new branches of education undertaken or any enlargement of the scope of their education throughout the country.

Mr. CRERAR: I think there is a general desire to make education more vocational in character. That does not involve any increase in the amount of money required. As I stated, however, when the main estimates were before the committee, and as I said a moment ago, there is an increase in the number of Indian pupils each year because of the natural increase in the Indian population; and of course, as the number of pupils increases, the amount of money for education has to be increased. That is the explanation for the increase.

Mr. LOCKHART: Then, am I to gather that the work is being carried on exactly as it was a year ago, with no changes in the curriculum and no new methods adopted for the education of the Indian children?

Mr. CRERAR: I did not say that.

Mr. LOCKHART: The minister said the increase in the amount of money required was due to the natural increase in the school population. I am asking if there has been any change in the system of education or if the work is being carried on just as it was last year, and if it is only the natural increase in school population that has brought about the increase in the amount of money required.

Mr. CRERAR: I have said already that the increase is due practically altogether to the increase in the number of pupils requiring school care and education. So far as the general problem of education is concerned, I stated before and I repeat now that study has been and is being given to the matter of making that education more vocational in character, so that it may be of more value to the Indian youngsters when they leave school and go out for themselves.

Mr. LOCKHART: That is the point I am trying to arrive at, and it seems to be taking some time. Is there any change in the vocational education being given to the Indian children? Goodness knows there is necessity for it. Is it only to be studied for another year, or has it actually been accomplished?

Item agreed to.

Immigration branch—to provide for investigation of illegal entry of aliens into British Columbia, $15,000.

Mr. BARBER: Is this item to provide for the investigation going on in connection with orientals. If so, what has this commission cost to date?

Mr. CRERAR: I am unable to give that information.

Mr. BARBER: What is the per diem allowance, and how are these men being paid?

Mr. CRERAR: There is a per diem allowance to Doctor Keenleyside for living expenses. At this time I cannot recall what it is. The other members of the board of review are government officials resident in Vancouver.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Is the minister able to say anything about this Saanich business?

Mr. CRERAR: I am not in a position to give the hon. member the information he desires, but I shall look into the matter and advise him.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I have been repeatedly asking about this one matter. Saanich municipality spent $1,100 in putting out a fire on the dominion government's observatory hill. The reeve of the municipality attempted to get the money back from the government. I have taken a hand in it and have made many representations to the department. I understand that finally, after the matter being set aside several times, it was referred to the director of the observatory, and that some compromise has been effected. I am asking how the compromise was made and when the money is to be paid over. Is there a provision in this year's estimates whereby that long standing claim may be settled? I could take up a great deal of time in discussing the matter, but shall not do so. In view of the promises made to me and to the municipality, I would ask the minister to look into the matter.

Mr. CRERAR: I will do so.

Wadena—public building, $24,500.
Wynyard—public building, $15,000.
Yorkton—public building, $35,000.

Mr. PERLEY: What was the building purchased for postal purposes at Sintaluta, Saskatchewan?

Hon. P. J. A. CARDIN (Minister of Public Works): The expenditure is to purchase from Mr. George Hill a building now used as a post office.

Mr. PERLEY: Has the purchase been completed?

Mr. CARDIN: No.

Mr. PERLEY: The department has agreed to take the building?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. COLDWELL: Would the minister explain the expenditure of $20,000 for Biggar?

Mr. CARDIN: It is to provide for the purchase of a site and the erection of a building for postal purposes, and also to provide accommodation for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

Mr. COLDWELL: For the purchase of the property or the building?

[Mr. J. S. Taylor.]

Mr. CARDIN: The site and building.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the price of the building at Broadview, and what amount will be spent on alterations?

Mr. CARDIN: This is an amount of $4,200 to provide for the purchase of a Sons of England lodge property, consisting of lots 26 and 27, together with a one storey frame building thereon, and the adjoining lots numbers 28 and 29. It is to be used for armoury purposes. The alterations and repairs are estimated at $800, and that amount is included.

Alberta

Cardston—public building, $5,000.
Jasper—public building, $20,000.
St. Paul—public building, $20,000.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I notice that in the total vote of $45,000 there is one revote of $5,000 and another of $12,000. The total amount to be spent in Alberta on public buildings would be only $28,000. Why is such a small amount spent in Alberta when such large sums are spent in the adjoining western provinces?

Mr. CARDIN: It is probably due to the fact that I have not received requests for larger expenditures in Alberta.

Mr. LANDERYOU: From whom would the minister receive requests? Would they be from the government of Alberta?

Mr. CARDIN: No; requests of that nature generally come from the members.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I would recommend that the minister build more buildings in Alberta. What is the nature of the building at Jasper?

Mr. CARDIN: It is a public building for postal purposes, located in the park.

Mr. HANSELL: Was the minister serious in the answer he gave a little while ago? Are the appropriations made to the provinces because certain members ask for them? I would like to know if he was joking or was serious?

Mr. CARDIN: I was certainly not joking, and was serious. I always respect the recommendations which come from members representing constituencies. A member is supposed to represent to the government the needs of his constituency.

Mr. HANSELL: I can assure the minister that I shall have a few requests to make next year.

Mr. POOLE: I might point out to the minister that I made a request last year for certain work which I have not got as yet.

Mr. CARDIN: My hon. friend should not lose hope.

Mr. POOLE: I understand a minister of the Alberta government is here now, and I hope the minister will be more generous with him than he has been in the past. I understand a request has been made.

An hon. MEMBER: Too late.

Mr. POOLE: It is never too late unless it is always too late.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Why was not the building at St. Paul completed last year?

Mr. CARDIN: The site was not obtained early enough to start the building. The contract was awarded in December, 1937.

Mr. CARDIN: I am sorry I have not that information for my hon. friend, but I shall expedite the asking for tenders.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister be good enough to let me know by letter when they will be called for, if they have not been called for already?

Mr. CARDIN: With pleasure.

Mr. STEWART: In this item there is a revote of $75,000 for breakwater repairs and improvements at Brooklyn, the total estimated cost being $165,000. What is the explanation of this item?

Mr. CARDIN: The contract for the work has been awarded, but I understand that this year it is not expected that we can spend more than $75,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Do these items cover the entire estimated expenditure or only that part of the contemplated expenditure which may be made in this fiscal year?

Mr. CARDIN: In many instances they cover the whole expenditure, but in others they cover only that amount which we reasonably expect to spend during the year. Generally speaking, we do not award a contract without having a substantial amount in the estimates, generally about half.

Mr. BENNETT: Whatever is contemplated to be expended in the fiscal year. What does this item really contemplate in the way of public expenditure? What will be the total expenditure by the taxpayers of Canada under this item?

Mr. CARDIN: That would be hard to give. In connection with many items, particularly the small ones, we shall be spending the whole amount.

Mr. BENNETT: What will it cost to complete the program outlined in this item?

Mr. CARDIN: I am sorry I cannot give that information, because we have not added up the different items where only a portion of the total amount is indicated. For example, in connection with the Brooklyn breakwater, the amount asked for is $75,000, but we indicate that the total cost of the work will be $165.000. The same thing would apply to other items.

Mr. BENNETT: The total of this item is $1,051.055, and I should like to know what it is contemplated must be spent to complete the program.

Mr. CARDIN: The commitments covered by this item will probably run to $1,500,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I am afraid the total will be more than that.

Mr. CARDIN: I do not think so.

Mr. STEWART: Another item about which I should like some information is the harbour improvements at Dingwall. In this case the estimated expenditure is $350,000 and $90,000 is being asked for this year. What is the nature of the work to be carried on here?

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. CARDIN: A gypsum deposit was discovered at this point, and a considerable business has been developed. A few years ago the government undertook to deepen the channel in the harbour, provided the company operating there would agree to build up a traffic of 120,000 tons. The company has carried out that undertaking which goes back as far as 1933, and it is now asking that the harbour be deepened still further in order to permit the entry of vessels with a deeper draft, that is, vessels of eight or nine thousand tons. Instead of providing a traffic of 120,000 tons in eight years, the company has increased the annual capacity of the plant to 120,000 tons. In order to help it to develop this business, which is quite important to that section of Nova Scotia, the government has agreed to deepen the harbour.

Mr. STEWART: I recall quite well the facts in connection with the start and development of that industry. What the minister has said now recalls to me the terms of the agreement. How much has been spent altogether on that harbour since 1933?

Mr. CARDIN: In 1933, $43,000 was expended; in 1934, $40,000; in 1935, $28,000; in 1936, $48,000; in 1937, $113,000. The total that has been spent there is $274,000.

Mr. STEWART: Port Hood—closing northern entrance, $48,200. What is the reason for undertaking this work? It is one that has been under consideration, I know, for a number of years, and there seem to be reasons why it should not be done.

Mr. CARDIN: This amount of $48,000 includes a revote of $6,500, and is required for the completion of the work under contract with Mr. Condon, consisting of placing fascine mattresses across the northern entrance to the harbour of a length of 2,645 feet. The amount of the contract is $51.520. The ultimate object of the work is to close the northern entrance, which is exposed to northerly seas to such an extent that shipping cannot anchor safely during a northerly storm. I am informed that this is to complete the work.

Item agreed to.

Prince Edward Island—
Basin head—boat harbour, $12,500.
Belfast—wharf repairs, $6,000.
Belle river harbour—breakwater extension, $5,500.
Boughton island—wharf, $6,300.
Canoe cove—breakwater, $14,800.
Malpeque (Kier's shore)—wharf repairs, $6,000.
Mont Carmel—breakwater extension, $3,600.
Summerside—to take over and reconstruct Queen's wharf, $16,500.
Wood islands—harbour, $150,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This item raises the question we discussed in this chamber last year, namely the expenditure at Wood islands and at Pictou of $150,000, involving an entirely new ferry for a distance which renders it impossible to create any more rapid transit between the two sections. Would the minister give the committee some explanation of what has been done and what is contemplated.

Mr. CARDIN: A contract was awarded some days ago for that work at Wood islands.

Mr. BENNETT: Were tenders called?

Mr. CARDIN: A contract was awarded to the Dominion Construction Corporation Limited, of Toronto. Several tenders came in, and that was the lowest.

Mr. BENNETT: How much?

Mr. CARDIN: There were tenders also by J. P. Porter and Sons, Montreal, and T. C. Gorman Construction Company Limited, Montreal. The amount of the contract is $254,143. That is the amount of the lowest tender. It is certain that we cannot spend that whole amount of money this year.

Mr. BENNETT: How much was spent last year?

Mr. CARDIN: Nothing was spent last year except upon the preparation of the plan and the survey.

Mr. BENNETT: It might be well to have on record just where are Wood islands. I just want to follow this up, this ferry from Wood islands to Pictou.

Mr. CARDIN: It is on the eastern end of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. BENNETT: The eastern coast of Prince Edward Island. How far north of Charlottetown?

Mr. CARDIN: Wood islands are situate at the southernmost point of Queens county, on the Northumberland strait coast of Prince Edward Island. The strait has a width of about twelve miles. The establishment of this ferry service will enable the government to dispense with the subsidies now given to the steamship service on the Charlottetown-Pictou route and also the service between Sydney and Bras d'Or ports and the west coast of Cape Breton and Prince Edward Island.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not by a long shot. I suppose that here is one of the finest managed bits of work which has been before this committee for a long time. Hon. members will perhaps remember the discussion last year. There is just as much necessity for this as there is for a fifth wheel to a coach, but because I dared to mention it a gentleman rose in his place and denounced me for being opposed to money being spent in Prince Edward Island. The minister knows perfectly well why this is being done. He might tell the committee. What hon. member asked for this?

Mr. CARDIN: It is to provide a shorter ferry service between Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And do away with certain subsidies.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, I heard that. I happen also to know the story of the subsidies, of the $30,000 grant given to a firm located in Montreal who bought an old ship, and the government endeavoured to reduce the grant to $25,000 in the main estimates and increased it to $30,000 in the supplementaries. The application for the same subsidy will be there when the new route is established. At the present time the ship runs from Pictou to Charlottetown. It leaves in the afternoon and it arrives in the afternoon. Who is to carry on the service between Wood islands and Pictou without a subsidy? Perhaps the minister will say.

Mr. EULER: Perhaps I might be permitted to intervene, because the Department of Trade and Commerce is concerned in this particular subsidy. The purpose of having the improvements made here is to shorten the distance between the mainland and Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island to something like twelve to fifteen miles. The present connection between the mainland and Prince Edward Island is from Pictou to Charlottetown, a distance, I think, of something like fifty miles, taking a considerable time to traverse. On that route, as the leader of the opposition knows, there is and has been for some time a subsidy of $30,000 a year. At one time it was reduced to $25,000; at another time it was $30,000. Now the purpose of transferring—because it is going to be transferred—the subsidy that is now being given, for the service between Pictou and Charlottetown, because the longer distance is to be discontinued, is to give the subsidy for a ferry which is to run between Caribou and Wood islands, a distance of some fifteen miles. The sole purpose, as I understand it, is to shorten the distance between Prince Edward Island and Nova Scotia.

Mr. BENNETT: It does not run in the winter, you know.

Mr. EULER: The other does not run in the winter either. It is to substitute a shorter route for a longer one, and a contract has been made for a subsidy for the construction of a new ship, a ferry, to run on this new route.

Mr. BENNETT: With whom?

Mr. EULER: The firm, I believe, is called Farquhar and Company.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly. Remember there was to be no subsidy a while ago. Now we have one.

Mr. EULER: No; we were giving a subsidy of $30,000 for the longer distance.

Mr. BENNETT: But the new one was to get none.

Mr. EULER: No; I never heard of anything of the sort.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister was not listening.

Mr. EULER: The new one is to get a subsidy of $28,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course, that is $3.000 more than the $25,000 which is voted in the main estimates, and it is $2,000 less than the $30,000.

Mr. EULER: It is $2,000 less than we are giving now.

Mr. BENNETT: The effect will be to hand to private industry $25,000 instead of the $30,000 that was given from year to year. It will shorten the distance and deprive the Canadian National of the additional revenue it had in the summer traffic. The Canadian National enjoyed almost a monopoly in the moving of cars across the strait, and we are now going to move the traffic down to Pictou and lose the money that was heretofore paid for the purpose of conveying cars—

Mr. EULER: Motor cars.

Mr. BENNETT: —to Prince Edward Island. We are giving to private industry $28,000 a year and spending $250,000, and we are spending an additional sum at Pictou harbour, which is indicated here. Now, $28,000 a year is four per cent on $700,000, and they are going to build a new ship. Why should they not?

Mr. EULER: The Canadian National ferry crosses at a point much further north, at Tormentine. At that point motor cars may come over and now proceed to the island and enter Nova Scotia at another point, completing the circuit. That will not deprive the Canadian National of any business.

Mr. BENNETT: They lose the return traffic.

Mr. EULER: With the tourist traffic developing, the tourist who enters at one end of the island does not want to go back the same way, but leaves from another point.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister is wrong.

Mr. EULER: I am quite sure I am right

Mr. BENNETT: What is the cost of the development at Pictou island?

Mr. CARDIN: The plans and specifications are not ready yet, but we contemplate about the same expenditure.

Mr. BENNETT: We are going to spend half a million dollars and provide an annual subsidy equivalent to four per cent on $700,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. BENNETT: I protest against the expenditure.

Item agreed to.

New Brunswick, $725,200.

Mr. STEWART: This is one of those long items covering nearly a page. If we are not going to finish to-night, I suggest that we rise now and take the item to-morrow.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I had hoped it would be possible to announce prorogation this evening. There are, however, still a number of items which have to be passed, and it might be pressing the house unduly were we to seek to pass all the votes to-night. There are not very many, but it might be thought a bit arbitrary on the part of the government were I to urge hon. members to remain until all were passed. Possibly, therefore, the suggestion of the former Minister of Public Works, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Stewart), might be accepted, and the house adjourn at the present time. I believe hon. members generally are anxious to have prorogation as soon as possible, and were we to meet a little earlier to-morrow morning, we might definitely decide to arrange for prorogation at one o'clock. The government is always in the hands of the house in seeking to make an arrangement of the kind, and no one can say exactly what hour can be fixed, but I believe that we should be able to count on prorogation by one o'clock to-morrow were we to adjourn now and reassemble at 10.30 o'clock in the morning.

I wish to say a word about prorogation itself. As hon. members are aware, His Excellency the Governor General has arranged to pay a visit to England this summer. About three months ago, in conversation with His Excellency, I suggested, that, having regard to the probable length of the session, it might be well not to fix a time for sailing before the first week of July and His Excellency so arranged. For some weeks past his sailing has been fixed for July 1st which is to-morrow. He is here this evening. As hon. members are aware His Excellency has been in residence at the Citadel in Quebec city for the past few weeks. He left Quebec this morning in anticipation of prorogation of parliament this evening. He is quite prepared to prorogue parliament at three or four in the morning. Moreover, His Excellency is quite prepared to postpone his sailing another week should his not being present to prorogue parliament occasion any disappointment. I feel that I will have the support of the house if I advise His Excellency not to alter, at this late time, his plans for sailing but to leave from Quebec to-morrow on his journey across the sea. I intend to advise him accordingly and shall arrange for prorogation by the deputy of the governor general. That is all I wish to say in that respect. If it is the wish of the house that we do not sit later to-night, the committee might rise now and report progress and ask leave to sit again, and after that is done I shall have a motion to propose, that for its next sitting the house meet at half-past ten o'clock in the morning.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Ten o'clock.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carry on.

Mr. BENNETT: That can be done only with unanimous consent. This is another day and I object to continuing after midnight. I shall be glad to meet the wishes of the Prime Minister and agree to the house meeting at 10.30 o'clock.

Progress reported.

ADJOURNMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. MACKENZIE KING moved:

That when this house adjourns to-day it stand adjourned until 10.30 o'clock a.m. the first day of July, 1938.

Mr. HEAPS: Quite a number of members would prefer ten o'clock instead of 10.30.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 12.20 a.m., (Friday).

Friday, July 1, 1938

The house met at ten-thirty o'clock.

MESSAGE FROM THE GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SECRETARY

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following message:

Ottawa, 1st July, 1938.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Hon. L. A. D. Cannon, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber on the first of July, at one o'clock, for the purpose of proroguing the present session of parliament.

I have the honour to be, sir,

Your obedient servant,

F. L. C. Pereira,

Assistant Secretary to the Governor General.

PENITENTIARIES

STATEMENT AS TO FAILURE OF THE PENITENTIARY ACT, 1938, TO BE PLACED ON THE STATUTES OF THE PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Before the orders of the day are called I wish to make a statement concerning the bill to amend the Penitentiaries Act which was adopted by this house unanimously but will now fail to be placed on the statutes of this session. The government is disappointed and I, personally, am sorry, indeed very sorry. When I stated in this house on my responsibility as Minister of Justice that I needed the proposed change for the proper administration of penitentiaries, the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) declared that he waived all his objections to the bill because of that statement.

What I regret more particularly is that this legislation involving a social question of momentous importance, has been rejected in another place on a straight party vote, and, if I read the reports aright, because of a question of persons.

All I may add is that this postponement of a needed reform, apart from being detrimental to public interest, and increasing to a dangerous degree the difficulties of my task, will not serve any useful purpose, not even that which seems to be at the basis of the adverse vote.

I repeat that I am very sorry and I feel that the seriousness of the situation they have created is not realized by those who have brought it about.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I think, in fairness to all parties, the minister has overlooked the fact that according to the press reports this morning the reason was also given that there had not been ample time for the study of that report or the bill itself. I think it is well to bear that in mind as one of the reasons given.

DOMINION DAY

REFERENCE TO LACK OF DECORATIONS AND OTHER MEASURES IN OTTAWA TO COMMEMORATE CONFEDERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. FRED JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): There is a matter of importance that I should like to bring to the attention of the house. The calendar reminds us that this is the first of July and I could not help thinking as I came up to the buildings this morning how little had been done in this capital city to commemorate the event of this day. Walking along the streets I saw scarcely a flag in evidence.

Mr. STIRLING: Oh, yes; there were.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): Very few. As one turns the corner at the Rideau club he finds the flag of the great republic of the United States displayed over the main entrance in such a way that he cannot help seeing it. I think that this building, the houses of parliament, should have been decorated to-day.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Hear, hear.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Lake Centre): We, as Canadians, do too little in that regard, though we sometimes criticize other people for doing too much of that sort of thing. According to the press, in the city of Kingston the national convention of fascists is taking place to-day, and it occurs to me that perhaps we have not done enough in the past to educate our youth to a realization of exactly what this confederation means to the young people of the country. I trust that when the first of July comes around next year, there will be in this capital city more evidence of our remembrance of Canada's national birthday.

SUPPLY

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS

Harbours and rivers — New Brunswick, $725,200.

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister give us some information as to the nature of the work being done at Miramichi bay, $75,500 for dredging, and at Tracadie harbour, $40,000. As to the latter, I should like to know if that will complete the work at Tracadie harbour?

Mr. CARDIN: This is to provide for widening to a width of 200 feet and deepening to a depth of 22 feet at low water the present channel in the Miramichi bay.

Mr. BENNETT: What will be the complete cost?

Mr. CARDIN: The tenders which are in amount to $63,000. That will complete the work.

Mr. BENNETT: The total of to-day's appropriation is $725,000. What will it cost to complete the undertakings mentioned in the vote?

Mr. CARDIN: As I am informed, $50,000 at the most will complete the work which is covered by these items. As regards Tracadie, this amount of $40,000, including the revote of $13,400, is required to complete the channel across the flats by dredging the channel for an approximate length of 3,750 feet to a depth of 9 feet at low water.

Mr. STEWART: Will this complete the channel? I know it was under consideration for some time.

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that we have to expect a certain amount of maintenance. I understand there is some silting.

Mr. STEWART: Maintenance only? All right.

Mr. BENNETT: Every winter it drives back.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers—Quebec, $2,479,150.

Mr. MacNICOL: I should like to speak briefly in reference to one item on this vote, namely that of $400,000 for Richelieu river improvements. Since the amount asked for this year is only $400,000, whereas the last two or three years it has been $500,000 each time, I assume that $100,000 has already been spent on these proposed—said to be—improvements. I shall speak briefly and I have no intention whatever of holding up the item, because I have no doubt it will pass readily, anyway.

What I have to say is by way of warning. I cannot help feeling that these so-called improvements on the Richelieu are akin to those which were made a number of years ago on a small river on works which were afterwards called the Newmarket canal. Up there in northern Ontario you will find docks and locks out in the middle of the fields, with water more or less miles away. Of course I realize that the Richelieu river is a much finer river; it is magnificent compared with anything we have up in that part of Ontario. But I cannot forget what happened two years ago, when the United States government and the Canadian government were considering, through the International Joint Commission, a recommendation to canalize the Richelieu river so that boats of large tonnage could go down that river from lake Champlain to the St. Lawrence, and south again into the Hudson river, so that there might be an ocean seaway from New York to Montreal via the Richelieu. Apparently that is all abandoned and some other scheme is now proposed. I note from the communication which the Canadian government made to the International Joint Commission in 1937 that the scheme has been changed from one of navigation to one of flood prevention, similar to the scheme proposed in 1907, which was also one of flood prevention.

Now, what was the application of the government of Canada to the International Joint Commission with respect to Richelieu river remedial works? On page 1, paragraph 2, we read:

> The parliament of Canada, at its last session, appropriated the sum of $500,000 under vote 408, S.S.E. 1936-37, as follows:
> "Richelieu river—improvement of river and Chambly canal system, $500,000."
> This vote is for the purpose of the construction of remedial works for the reclamation and protection of low lands in St. Johns, Iberville and Missisquoi counties, in the province of Quebec.

The International Joint Commission granted the application of the government. It is referred to on page 7 of this same report that I am reading, in paragraph 11:

> This matter is, accordingly, being submitted to the commission by the government of Canada, and it is hoped that the commission, in view of the need for protection against flood conditions, will expedite matters so that construction can be commenced at an early date.

I understand that later on the International Joint Commission gave that right. What I am trying to get through my head is, how are the figures of the water levels in this report to be reconciled with those of the water levels contained in the submission to the International Joint Commission some two years ago? The low water level of lake Champlain is 93·3, and the high, 102·6. But this report states that the work proposes to lower the water level of lake Champlain to 92·5. For it states on page 6:

> It is the intention of the government of Canada that during the navigation season the water level above the dam will be maintained at or above the present ordinary minimum elevation of 92·5—

If it is to be maintained at that level, has the government obtained the consent of the United States to the lowering of the low water level of lake Champlain from 93·3 to 92·5? I have not found anything in the reports to indicate that the United States government has endorsed that low water level. Last fall, in company with an engineer and a newspaper man, I spent some time along the Richelieu river trying to find those low lands, and had great difficulty in doing so. As a matter of fact only a very small part of lake Champlain, about seventeen square miles, is in Canada. I went all around that area. The day I visited the north end of lake Champlain, at Missisquoi bay, the water level was between 95 and 96 feet above sea level, approximately three feet higher than the level proposed by the government; and on that day the water was five feet below the road level. I measured it. I asked some of the old-timers there what was the effect when the lake was at high water level, 102·6, and they told me that the road was sometimes covered to the extent of a foot or a little more, but that the water did not stay there very long.

I should like the minister to tell us, if he can, how many square miles or acres of so called low lands are flooded by lake Champlain, and if it will be of much value to relieve these low lands of the water for two or three weeks in the spring. The land did not appear to me to be very good. The trees did not seem to be damaged at all by the high water. On the west side of the river the banks are high; on the east side there may be a little more flooding of land, but it does not last very long. According to the information I obtained at the engineer's office, the dam is to be eighteen feet high. I may not have the correct figures, but if the dam that is proposed to be built at Fryer's island is to be eighteen feet high, each side of the river at that point will be flooded. I believe the banks on the east side are about fifteen feet above the river and those on the west side about twelve feet. I should like to find out from the minister if it is proposed to build dykes along where the dam is to be built in order to keep the land, which is good at that point, from being flooded.

I have no objection whatever to the work if it is necessary and there is any value to it. I do not want the people of that community to think I am opposing it for any reason other than what my own judgment tells me.

I know that last year all the local newspapers gave me a fairly good dressing down for opposing the vote. They should not do that. I do not talk in this house from any motive whatever other than to do the best I can for this country. If the government can say that any real service will be rendered or any worth while improvements made in that area through the erection of this dam, I will not oppose it. I do not see that it is going to be of any particular value, however, and certainly if the time comes when that magnificent river is canalized so that large ships can go up and down it, a dam of this kind will not be worth a fig anyway; a much larger dam will be required, and this money will be wasted. I do not want the minister to think I am opposing this for any other reason than what I believe to be right.

Mr. CARDIN: I do not propose in any shape or form to object to the criticism and fair observations made by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. MacNicol). I recognize that it is his absolute right to inquire about these things and inform himself as to the conditions existing, and I would be the last person in the world to criticize him for doing so.

When the matter was placed before the International Joint Commission it was not formally the question referred to in this vote. At the same time, as my hon. friend stated last year and mentioned again this year, the commission had under consideration three proposals that were made more particularly by United States interests. One of the proposals was to have a canal from lake Champlain right up to Montreal through United States territory, reaching lake St. Francis.

Mr. BENNETT: Not up to Montreal through United States territory, but from the Hudson river to one of their lakes, then connecting with the Richelieu.

Mr. CARDIN: No, lake St. Francis. They offered another proposal also, to build a canal across Canadian territory from the town of St. Johns on the Richelieu river to Laprairie, in front of Montreal, on the south side of the St. Lawrence. Then their third proposal was to have a canal built from the foot of the present Chambly canal, at Chambly, going right up to Montreal on the south shore of the St. Lawrence, somewhere near St. Lambert. The fourth proposal, which they studied at the same time, was the canalization of the Richelieu river from lake Champlain down to the St. Lawrence. But the idea of the United States people interested in the proposals was to have a deep canal, capable of being navigated by vessels of the type that would navigate the proposed St. Lawrence waterway.

Mr. BENNETT: Up the Hudson river to Albany.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. They wanted to have the same depth of water in the Richelieu river, if it was canalized, that would exist in the proposed canal for the St. Lawrence. They expressed the view, I admit, that a depth of about twenty-seven feet was the only thing in which they were interested. The Canadian interests were satisfied with a depth of twelve feet, which is the present depth of the United States canals from Lake Champlain to the Hudson river. Part of the Richelieu river has a depth of twelve feet at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: It is eight feet for the most part, is it not?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, and less. The Chambly canal has not more than five and a half or six feet. We would have been satisfied if the canalization of the Richelieu river had been carried out to provide a depth of twelve feet, but, as I have said, the Americans concerned were not interested in such a shallow depth.

In addition to the suggestions I have just indicated, the present proposal was submitted to the International Joint Commission to build a regulating dam between St. Johns and Chambly.

Mr. BENNETT: On the Richelieu river.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, bringing forward an old proposal that had been submitted to the international commission as far back as 1907. At that time parliament voted a certain amount of money to dredge the Richelieu river from the city of St. Johns up to the boundary. There are natural obstacles in that river,—a natural dam, we might call it. There is little water at that particular place, the shores of the river are very low. But when the Canadian government started the work of dredging between St. Johns and the boundary, the United States intervened and claimed that by doing away with the natural obstacles existing in the river we would cause the flow of the water to become very rapid, and as a consequence would lower the level of the water in lake Champlain. As a result of the objection raised by the United States the work which had been under contract for some time was stopped, and the representatives of the two countries discussed the possibility of building remedial works.

At that time the International Joint Commission, or the board which preceded the formation of that commission, approved of a regulating dam to be built at Fryer's Island, and with that regulating dam being built they said they would have no objection to the dredging of the natural obstacles existing between St. Johns and the boundary. Although the approval of the international board was on record, we thought that so long a time had elapsed since the approval had been given that it would be advisable to renew the request to the international board. We placed the facts before them again, and made a request for the approval of a regulating dam, the dam which is contemplated by this vote.

Mr. BENNETT: For $300,000.

Mr. CARDIN: I believe it is $400,000. As contemplated a number of years ago the building of that dam would permit the dredging of the river from St. Johns to the boundary, and would relieve the situation that existed so far as flooding the land was concerned. The representation made to previous governments was that the high water of the spring would not flow rapidly enough and soon enough to allow every year the cultivation of the low land between the town of St. Johns and the boundary.

The hon. member says he has not seen any low land there. It is there, however. In fact, the Richelieu river from St. Johns to the boundary to a certain extent becomes a lake. The shores of the river are so low that one would form the idea that he was passing through a lake.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is the arm of a lake.

Mr. CARDIN: In the spring when the water flows slowly on account of the natural obstacles between St. Johns and the boundary these lands are flooded for too long a time to permit satisfactory cultivation of them. That was the reason given a number of years ago. It was urged that if dredging were done the water would flow more rapidly and the land would be ready for cultivation sooner than otherwise. We had an estimate from an engineer that each year the farmers would be saved a loss of several hundred thousand dollars if they could cultivate the low land between St. Johns and the boundary. This regulating dam therefore has for its object the cultivation of the lands by permitting a flow of water earlier in the spring and over a shorter period. When built, and when the natural obstacles between St. Johns and the boundary are disposed of, the dam would permit much freer navigation between St. Johns and lake Champlain.

Mr. BENNETT: Twelve feet.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, twelve feet at least. The building of the dam about half way between St. Johns and Chambly, where the present canal exists, would reduce the length of the Chambly canal.

Mr. BENNETT: And help both countries.

Mr. CARDIN: It would reduce the length by about half. Instead of boats navigating twelve miles they would have to navigate only about six miles.

Mr. MacNICOL: It is the intention to give a twelve foot canal from Fryer's island to Chambly?

Mr. CARDIN: No, not at present. We would be satisfied for the time being to have the regulating dam to reclaim the land that has to be reclaimed to give St. Johns a twelve foot navigation channel to the United States and lake Champlain, and to reduce by half the present distance of navigation through the Chambly canal. These are the three reasons in my mind which would justify the present expenditures.

Tenders have been asked on the vote of last year, and the contract has been awarded to the Cape Construction Company of Montreal for the amount of $416,000.

Mr. MacNICOL: For the dam alone?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. My information is that the land which will be flooded in the vicinity of the dam amounts to only a very small portion of the land around the dam.

Mr. MacNICOL: Has the minister any idea of the value of that land?

Mr. CARDIN: The total value of the land being expropriated would be in the vicinity of $60,000 or $70,000.

Mr. BENNETT: The explanation the minister has given is much better than the one he gave last year. I doubt whether there could be a better exemplification of the principle the minister mentioned yesterday than the one he has just given us. He said yesterday he usually made these appropriations at the request of the member for the constituency. How did he address himself in this case?

Mr. CARDIN: The work is not in my constituency.

Mr. BENNETT: What about the expenditure at Sorel? Perhaps that is nearer home.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, that is very near home. In connection with that item I would express very sincere regret that the amount is not larger. This is an expenditure of $200,000 to provide for harbour improvements.

Mr. BENNETT: It will not make it a second Montreal, but will make it a competing port.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, in the course of a few years.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers—Ontario, $2,202,658.57.

Mr. STEWART: Would the minister explain the rather large expenditures on the Grand river improvements, $300,000, and the Hamilton harbour improvements, in the same amount?

Mr. CARDIN: The Grand river project is a conservation scheme. The hon. member possibly knows better than I do the situation in connection with that river.

Mr. BENNETT: It is in cooperation with the province?

Mr. EULER: And the municipalities.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes, and the municipalities. The work is to be undertaken by a commission which has been appointed by the Ontario government.

Mr. BENNETT: Any relation to the penitentiaries commission?

Mr. CARDIN: I think not. The item for Hamilton harbour is to provide for the carrying out of work in Hamilton harbour which has been strongly urged by the harbour commission. A contract has been let to the Russell Construction Company for the construction of a steel sheet pile wall 2,000 feet long, with sand filling, this being the initial section of a large reclamation scheme proposed by the harbour commission north of Burlington street. There is some dredging to be done in the main channel in front of the wharf and plant of the Steel Company of Canada, and the reconstruction of the easterly face of the James street slip of the harbour commission.

Mr. MASSEY: What work is to be done in Toronto harbour? Is that the extension of the western gap?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. MASSEY: That is to accommodate the new air port.

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers—Saskatchewan, $27,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: What dredging is to be done at Waskesiu lake?

Mr. CARDIN: This amount of $12,000, including a revote of $9,400, is for the deepening of the enclosed harbour on Waskesiu lake in the Prince Albert national park by the removal of approximately 15,000 cubic yards of material.

Mr. PERLEY: Has the contract been let for the dredging?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. Four tenders were submitted.

Mr. PERLEY: Who got the contract?

Mr. CARDIN: The contract has been awarded to Macaw and Macdonald of Winnipeg.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers — British Columbia, $359,435.

Mr. BARBER: I should like an explanation of four items in this vote. The first has to do with the dredging at Harrison river, for which an amount of $16,800 is being asked. The next covers wharf repairs and improvements at Harrison lake, for which $4,500 is being asked. In this connection I should like to know if this work is being done on the government wharf or some other wharf on the lake. Then I should like an explanation of the protection work being done on Nicomen island. Is this to replace work that has gone out, or is it to be new work? Then in connection with the work at McIvor's landing; what federal district is that in?

Mr. CARDIN: McIvor's landing is in New Westminster. In connection with Harrison river, an amount of $16,800 is being provided for dredging the river channel for a distance of 3,200 feet, a width of 80 feet and to a depth of four feet below low water level, and removing bars and raising banks on dredging work done during 1937 and 1938. Also to clean out the channel connecting Harrison lake with Little Harrison lake, all on the Harrison river water course. The amount of $4,500 for wharf repairs and improvements at Harrison lake is to provide for renewal of decking on approach and substitution of level platform 42 feet by 32 feet, and inclined landing platform 112 feet by 32 feet for the existing float and gangway.

Mr. BARBER: Is that in connection with the wharf built by the government, or the old wharf that was there?

Mr. CARDIN: The residents of Harrison lake district requested that the site of this landing be changed to a more protected one about 1,000 feet away. The district engineer advises that a wharf can be constructed at the new site for the amount submitted in the estimates.

Mr. BARBER: This is really to cover the construction of another wharf?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. BARBER: They are not moving the old float; they are constructing a new one.

Mr. CARDIN: They have not gone into the details of the matter, but it is being studied. The $7,000 being provided for protection work on Nicomen island is for the construction of a groin to protect the river bank on the south side of Nicomen island in the vicinity of McDonalds Landing. Erosion is taking place to such an extent as to endanger the main dyke. Our attention was drawn to this by the district engineer in January, 1938. He advised that a recent examination revealed that the bank is cut back to within 130 feet of the main dyke and he contends that it is essential that this erosion should be stopped.

Mr. BARBER: The minister has intimated that at times members neglect to bring to the attention of the minister certain needed works in their districts. He cannot make that charge against me in connection with one particular work, namely, the landing opposite McMillan island wharf which was constructed over a year ago. It was understood at the time that this wharf was being constructed as a ferry landing, and it was made known throughout the district that in the near future a similar landing would be constructed on the north side, somewhere in the neighbourhood of Albion. We were encouraged to believe that a ferry service would be inaugurated by the provincial government, but there is only a landing on one side of the river. I took up this matter with the minister on May 16, and I received his reply under date of June 20. He claimed in his letter that the wharf on McMillan island was constructed for the accommodation of the fishermen and small boats. If that was the sole reason for construction, then there was no reason for expending $5,284.53, because the landing on the north side was constructed for about $1,800. As I said before, the main reason for constructing this landing was for ferry use. Then the minister also pointed out that there is a small float at Albion for the use of fishermen. The intimation was given to the people of that district that this McMillan island landing was being constructed so that a ferry service could be provided, and that a similar landing would be constructed on the other side. I know the minister will contend we have nothing to do with ferries, but this government has undertaken to build a ferry landing on one side of the river and has refused to build a similar landing on the other side. I wonder if that is due to the fact that the other side is in another district which may be considered to be not as favourable. I agree with the minister in this, that the responsibility for operation of ferries rests with the provincial government, but in this case this government constructed a ferry landing on the south side, it is only fair, I submit, that the same construction should take place on the north side. The McMillan wharf is absolutely useless unless it can be connected with similar construction on the other side.

On the north side of the river we have many industries, and a demand for the products of the south. So there is the necessity of providing a crossing. I believe there has been a promise from the provincial government that if the federal government would construct these wharves, the provincial government would consider establishing a ferry service. I trust the minister will give his further very serious consideration to this request.

Mr. CARDIN: Mr. Chairman, in view of the serious commitment I made yesterday and in view of the repeated requests of my hon. friend in regard to this matter, possibly we can find a few precedents and I can assure my hon. friend that I will give my best attention to his representations.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Will the minister explain the item of improvements to assembly wharf at Nanaimo, $8,000, and say when it is proposed to have these improvements finished?

Mr. CARDIN: It is contemplated that the work will be done this year.

Item agreed to.

Harbours and rivers—Generally—improvements, maintenance of service, repairs and additions, $500,000.

Mr. STEWART: There are two items of $500,000 under "generally." Were there similar amounts last year, or is this an extra amount of $500,000?

Mr. CARDIN: The first item, No. 591, is the ordinary general item that has been in for several years. The other one, No. 593, is to cover employment works under contemplation for this year, and this is the only one of such items that is included in the estimates of the Department of Public Works. This item 593 includes protection works generally. I am sure that my hon. friend when he was Minister of Public Works received a number of requests for work of this nature, and no doubt he tried to limit them as much as he could, as I have done. But there are certain cases where our responsibility is not much disputed. In certain districts where there is navigation, for example, where big boats are going up and down a river, and the main channel is not far from the river banks, erosion is caused by the waves of passing vessels and protection works are needed. This item can cover work of that kind. The vote is of a temporary nature, and is one of the proposals of the government for providing employment relief work.

Mr. STEWART: I thought this was a new item. As the minister says, there are many requests for protection works, and I am sorry I did not have this item to take care of some of the requests I received when I was in the department. The minister ought to be able to do a good bit of protection with $500,000.

Mr. CARDIN: It is for the whole country.

Mr. STEWART: Yes. But once you admit liability for erosion along the banks of a river, and undertake to provide protection works, you are in for a continued and very large expenditure over a period of years. The policy of the department has been to resist so far as possible claims for such erosion, because once you get into that field it is almost unlimited. I am sure the minister can easily spend the $500,000, and I hope he will protect everybody who needs protection.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Will the minister state if it is possible to do anything in connection with Ladysmith wharf this season? I understand the matter is under review.

Mr. CARDIN: We are getting a report on that, and I seriously hope we shall be in a position to satisfy my hon. friend.

Item agreed to.

Roads and bridges—Interprovincial bridge, Campbellton, N.B., to Cross Point, Que., the provinces of New Brunswick and Quebec each to pay one-third of the cost and maintenance thereof, $100,000.

Mr. BROOKS: Is it not the usual thing, where interprovincial bridges are being constructed, for each province to make a contribution and then appeal to the federal government for a contribution?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes. We are providing under this vote for the federal government's share, and the two provinces will have to contribute a similar amount each.

Mr. BROOKS: Have they applied to the federal government for a contribution?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. BROOKS: Have they voted their own contributions?

[Mr. Cardin.]

Mr. CARDIN: No, not yet, but they have applied to us, and we are providing this amount in case the provincial governments provide a similar amount.

Item agreed to.

Telegraph branch—Saskatchewan and Alberta —telephone line from Ile a la Crosse to Buffalo Narrows, $10,000.

Mr. STEWART: Is this a new telephone line?

Mr. CARDIN: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: I understood the policy of the department was not to build any more lines than were necessary. Why is this one being built?

Mr. CARDIN: I am informed that it is in the class defined as pioneer lines where private companies refuse to build. But, as my hon. friend suggested with regard to protection works, we try to resist requests of this kind as much as possible.

Item agreed to.

Public works—generally—to provide for balance required to complete any projects already undertaken, no new works to be undertaken, $200,000.

Mr. STEWART: Is this the same as last year or is there an increase?

Mr. CARDIN: It is the same as last year.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

National Defence—departmental administration, $425,720.

Mr. MacNEIL: There is a matter in regard to which I wish very briefly to lodge a protest. On March 7 I moved for a return of the house, as follows:

For a copy of all orders, decisions, letters, telegrams, recommendations and recorded evidence relating to the court of enquiry held by the Department of National Defence in Quebec, August 24 to August 28, 1936, to deal with charges against officers of the Royal 22nd Regiment.

The acting minister at that time, apparently acting on the advice of the departmental officers, stated:

The proceedings of the board of inquiry are of a confidential character. The documents and memoranda relating thereto come within the category of privileged communications.

So far as I am informed with regard to the procedure and usages of this house I consider that my rights as a member of the house were infringed upon. I did not ask for privileged documents. My motion might have been accepted by the government with the usual reservations. I did not ask for any military secrets, but simply for information regarding ordinary matters of departmental administration. I am not going to occupy any time, but as the minister is aware, serious allegations were made in regard to this matter. Information was put in my possession, properly documented and supported by statutory declarations, indicating a very serious state of affairs in regard to the administration of the Royal 22nd Regiment, concerning serious irregularities in the expenditure of government funds and the disposition of government property, and in the general discipline of the regiment. I have, therefore, no recourse but to place on record some of these charges and ask for a statement from the minister, as to whether the charges have been investigated, and what findings were given with regard thereto; and as the matter becomes of particular importance, in view of the fact that certain of the senior officers involved have been retained in the service and since promoted, having been given responsible positions that appropriate action be taken in the matter. One junior officer who made some effort to expose these irregularities has been victimized, grossly discriminated against and dismissed from the service. His career is blighted, and generally his future is darkened. Certain specific charges were made. One was that the regimental funds of the Royal 22nd Regiment have been misappropriated and in some instances expended upon things alien not only to the regiment but also to the militia.

Officers' mess and regimental property have been irregularly disposed of by a commanding officer of the Royal 22nd Regiment. Some commanding officers of the Royal 22nd Regiment have made it a custom to delete their names from the list of debtors submitted to the district officer commanding, on the 15th of every month, although they paid their mess bills approximately biannually or whenever they could find the money.

A company commander, Royal 22nd Regiment, solicited and charged his men three dollars per month to teach them English for the educational training examinations. I am qualified to state that this officer does not know the English language well enough to teach it. The commanding officer not only tolerated but supported that officer's most unethical practice.

It has been the custom of most married officers of the Royal 22nd Regiment to draw servant allowance, although they employed soldier servants. The daily amount involved is small, being forty cents; but, spread over a period of ten years, it amounts to approximately one thousand five hundred dollars.

A commanding officer, Royal 22nd Regiment, took possession of and used, for himself and his family, not only at camp but also in town, most of the bed linen which the government supplies for the accommodation of the unmarried personnel living in barracks.

Another serious charge was that commanding officers were guilty of an indictable offence, that is to say, bootlegging, permitting the use in the officers' mess of spirits on which the excise tax was not paid, contrary to the provisions of the Liquor Control Act.

I have a number of statutory declarations of those employed in the mess in support of this charge. The junior officer concerned had certain rights as well as responsibilities. He had a right to interest himself in any such irregularities, and he did so, with the result, as I have said, that he was grossly discriminated against and dismissed from the service without a proper inquiry. I have the confidential report of his service and there is not an entry in that report on the part of the senior officers indicating that his conduct was anything but completely satisfactory. But a return was brought down into the house which I think was in very bad taste on the part of the officers of the department, because it shows a most vindictive attitude towards this gentleman, Captain Roy. It is stated:

> This officer's retirement was promoted by the fact that over a period of some eight years, and notwithstanding repeated warnings to the contrary, there occurred very many instances of derelictions from duty, failure to comply with regulations, acts detrimental to discipline and to the good of his regiment, the cumulative effect of these being not only subversive to discipline in the unit but also giving a bad example to the younger officers, and thus making it essential in the general interests of the service to remove this officer.

These charges were placed on the record without this officer being granted a hearing, and I have reason to believe that this action was taken in consequence of his having made some effort to stop gross irregularities in the administration of the affairs of the Royal 22nd Regiment. I have made it my business to consult other senior officers who had knowledge of these affairs and they corroborate the statement of this officer. The conditions existing in Quebec were an open scandal throughout the force. I will not deal with the matter at length. I simply wish to bring it to the attention of the minister and to protest against the fact that I was not given the information I had the right to receive as a member of this house with regard to the administration of government funds. I have asked that proper steps be taken, if the charges have been confirmed by inquiry, to deal with the senior officers who condoned practices so vicious and irregular. I also make a definite appeal on behalf of a young officer of good family and good record—and this is substantiated by a number of officers who have since retired from the force. I ask that this gentleman be granted plain justice in this instance, because I feel that he has been grossly discriminated against and victimized by the very men whose conduct is in question. I hope I shall have a statement from the minister in this regard.

Mr. BENNETT: Not only do the conditions exist in Quebec, as indicated by the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. MacNeil), so far as that particular regiment is concerned, but I have had occasion to bring to the attention of the minister other cases in which men have been punished, it seems to me, simply because they dared to assert themselves in favour of honest and decent administration in the units with which they are connected. I am bound to say that I think the minister in the two cases I brought to his attention has endeavoured to do everything that a minister reasonably can do, but the officers will not give effect to what should be done and it is disturbing to think that this is going on. It happened in years gone by in this country and created considerable difficulty.

There never has been a time when there was in connection with the militia a situation such as we have to-day, and it is attributable to exactly such conditions as the hon. member has just referred to. It is believed that there is direct interference on the part of some officials with respect to what should be the orderly administration of a department, and I can only say to the minister that I believe —I want to be fair about it—that though he is a strong partisan he has been endeavouring to do something to remove the difficulty that exists. I would say to him something of the sort once said by a queen to her son—"Charles, be king!" I suggest to the minister that, after all, he is minister, and not somebody else in his department, and that the conditions that exist in Quebec call for a real investigation. In connection with the Royal 22nd Regiment they cry aloud for an investigation The man who has been promoted—the story will be told to this house some day—I will not mention by name. I say that purposely, for it would not be the proper thing in view of what the minister is trying to do. At Winnipeg the condition got down to this: Is it possible because of social and other pull for any man to misappropriate money and then, because decent, honest men wish to see that sort of thing stopped, they should be punished and deprived of their positions and treated in this way? That is what it gets down to. I will refrain at this time of day from going into the details of all this, because I have found the minister himself reasonable in his attitude of mind and in his approach to these problems. But for some strange reason action always falls just short of realization. I wrote and told the minister that I thought he had done the fair and decent thing but to my horror I discovered that after all, although he thought it had been done, it had not. That sort of thing must stop in this country. No little band in this country is going to defy either ministers or public opinion in the observance of the amenities of life, merely because they happen to be the favourites of particular individuals. The sooner that is understood, the better.

With respect to the matter to which the hon. member for Vancouver North has referred. I intended myself to speak about it, but I am not going to do so now. We have a right to these papers—and when I say "we" I mean this house. No sort of private star chamber business is going to be set up here; if I were to adopt the language of the Prime Minister with respect to a somewhat similar matter I would characterize it even more strongly, but I content myself with these observations. I still rely upon the minister carrying into effect what I believe he honestly wants to do in the interests of the service of this country, and I say to him again, in the language of the old queen, "Ian, be king!"

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): First I desire to thank my right hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) for his very fair comments.

Two cases mentioned, the one by my right hon. friend and the other by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) arose before I was entrusted with the responsibility of being Minister of National Defence.

Mr. BENNETT: That is true.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): With respect to the Winnipeg case, I am not going to discuss the right or wrong of it, but I have endeavoured to the best of my ability to see that substantial justice was done.

Mr. BENNETT: Hear, hear.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Two different courts of inquiry were held in that case, and I trust that even further measures will be taken to see that final justice is rendered in every individual case in connection with the Winnipeg incident.

The case mentioned by the hon. member for Vancouver North was disposed of in May, 1935, after a very thorough investigation by the chief of the general staff, a board of officers, and the district officer commanding. The case was brought to the attention of my predecessor, the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling), who, this committee will agree, is a gentleman of very fair and very eminent judgment. I perused all the files—I am not going to refer to any confidential documents in connection with this officer; I do not think it is necessary for me to do so—I considered the reasons for dealing with him as he was dealt with, and I am constrained to say with great regret that I agree with the action which was taken with respect to him.

My hon. friend has mentioned charges in connection with a Quebec regiment. A court of inquiry was held. As my hon. friend says, he was denied access to the proceedings of the court of inquiry. He was, however, offered private access to the proceedings of the court. If this house wishes to assert as a matter of principle that the proceedings of courts of inquiry in the Department of National Defence shall be open to any hon. member of the house, I have not the slightest objection. The principle all through the years has been that these are confidential proceedings, and not producible, but if the house wishes to establish another principle I am entirely willing and even anxious to see that all these proceedings are brought down with reference to any of these troubles which have arisen.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe that in the British parliament they bring down courts martial proceedings.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Personally I would have no objection; indeed I rather agree with my right hon. friend with reference to the proceedings of the court of inquiry he has mentioned, and I have not the slightest objection to bringing them down. I agree with the judgment of my predecessor with regard to this case. I want to say nothing reflecting on this officer. It would not be fair to use the privileges of parliament to reflect on any officer. But I do say this, that a court of inquiry was held with reference to the allegations mentioned, and honestly mentioned, by the hon. member for Vancouver North. As I have said, if the committee wishes that the proceedings of courts of inquiry in every case shall be made available, I am not only anxious but willing that these documents shall be brought down. Both these cases were left on my doorstep when I was entrusted with the responsibilities of the department. I endeavoured to do the best I could in the Winnipeg case; in the Quebec case I sustained the judgment of my predecessor, and I think I was doing justice in so doing.

Mr. BENNETT: And in the Nova Scotia case also.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes.

Mr. MacNEIL: Were the charges against the principal officers concerned substantiated in any form, particularly with regard to dealing with funds and the misuse of government property? If they were not cleared of these charges, why have they since been granted promotion?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I am informed—this is subject to further inquiry—that these charges were not substantiated. I should be very glad to bring down the proceedings of the court of inquiry for the hon. member to see.

Mr. MacNEIL: Can the minister make any statement with reference to the proceedings against the junior officer?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I recall that it was arranged that there should be a conference in October, 1937. I instructed the deputy minister and the adjutant general to be in my office to meet with that officer. The officer, however, never turned out for that investigation or inquiry.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister has referred to the fact that action in the Roy case was taken during the time of his predecessor, and as I was that predecessor perhaps I should make a remark or two. As to that portion of the reference which the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) has made to the Royal 22nd Regiment, dealing with Captain Roy's case, I have a general recollection of the case. I cannot be expected to remember the details, but I do recall that before making any decision I gave careful study to all the related facts and circumstances, because to take such action against any man is a serious matter. The inquiries were held consequent upon repeated instances of alleged misconduct on the part of the officer in question. That it was not one isolated incident, but a number of incidents reported over the course of years, is my recollection. Not only was the matter reported on by his commanding officer; it went to the district officer commanding, and then to the chief of the general staff. After I had considered all the reports produced by those three officers, I could come to no other conclusion than that the action should be taken which was taken.

Mr. MacNEIL: There is one further matter to which I wish briefly to refer, in the hope that it may bring forth a statement from the minister as to the policy regarding the construction of armouries across Canada. The people of Canada at this time are making serious sacrifices for the purposes of national defence, and I see no reason why in certain instances armouries should be constructed with a consequent diversion of funds required for purposes of coastal defence. I refer to sessional paper No. 210 of this year. I find that the total cost of armouries and barracks, including lands, and exclusive of maintenance and repairs, has been $20,163,586. That is quite apart from the lands and buildings transferred by the government of the United Kingdom to the Dominion of Canada free of cost. The annual cost of maintenance of armouries and barracks in Canada is $994,994—approximately $1,000,000—including structural repairs, care of buildings, grounds and equipment; also heating, lighting and water services.

I have in my hand a list of the locations of armouries across Canada. In military district No. 1 there are armouries at places like Chatham, Erin, Galt, Ingersoll, Listowel, Parkhill, St. Thomas, Strathroy, Walkerton, Windsor, Elora, Forest, Guelph, Kincardine, London, Sarnia, Stratford, Watford, Wingham, Woodstock, Port Elgin.

In military district No. 2 there are armouries at places like Aurora, Brantford, Brampton, Cannington, Dundas, Georgetown, Haileybury, Markdale, Niagara Falls, Orillia, Paris, Simcoe, Toronto (Fort York), Whitby, Barrie, Burford, Beaverton, Clarksburg, Durham, Hagersville, Hamilton, Meaford, Norval, Oshawa, St. Catharines, Toronto (University avenue), Welland, Milton.

And so it goes on, representing not so much a plan of defence as a first class map of political expenditure. I am concerned because in the estimates just voted for public works there are included a number of items for the purpose of further construction of armouries. For instance, one at Hull, at a cost of something like—

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): $260,000. It is partly rebuilt.

Mr. MacNEIL: —and a similar expenditure in Cornwall. Quite sincerely, I can see no relation in these expenditures to defence. I oppose this expenditure because it is my belief that it is made largely for political purposes. When you consider the use that is made of these armouries, the comparatively small number of men involved, and the fact that they are dark the greater portion of the time, I consider it is a needless expenditure at this time. I urge the minister to abandon the construction of armouries. I believe that to do so would accord with the opinion of a large number of senior officers interested in sound policies of national defence, and that such funds as may be expended in this connection should be directly related to coastal defence, which is our real problem at this time.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I appreciate very much the point of view expressed by my hon. friend, but I must take issue with him at once in regard to the value of armouries in Canada. Particularly since the reorganization of the militia units and the attempts to complete the mechanization of them, I submit that armouries are absolutely indispensable for the training of our Canadian forces, especially in the winter months when they cannot possibly train outside. The only way these units in the interior and the colder portions of Canada can train throughout the year is in these armouries. As a matter of fact I must express my personal regret that the very obvious necessities for the present year with regard to more armoury accommodation in Canada have not been met, because you cannot possibly have complete training of your militia units unless you have the necessary buildings where such training can be carried on.

As I say, I appreciate my hon friend's point of view, but I must take issue with him. To-day the armouries in Canada are used not only for the training of our militia but also to a tremendous extent for community purposes in every small community throughout the country. If this year I had been able to meet all the requests, not only of supporters of the government but of hon. gentlemen in all quarters of this house, with reference to needed armoury accommodation, a further amount of $5,000,000 would have been required for this purpose. That is the actual situation from the defence point of view. I receive wires and letters every day asking for the loan of armouries for public functions, very often charitable functions, and at the present time these armouries are rendering magnificent service in the smaller communities throughout Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: There are three matters I should like to bring to the attention of the minister on which I should like an expression of opinion before we rise. The first has to do with supplies. The minister has pointed out that he receives requests for the use of armouries for public purposes, and with what he has said as to the necessity for these buildings I absolutely agree. But we have a rule that militia supplies, with the exception of rubber carpeting, should not be allowed out on loan. That rule, of course, has not been observed; I have a list, which was obtained from the proper source, of many of these applications for loans. What I put to the minister is this, that there should be no favouritism with respect to these matters.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: For instance, there is an issue of swords under loan. The rule is very, very severe; in fact, as I read it, it is almost prohibitive. There are tents loaned at times, as well as other supplies of the department. I should like the minister to satisfy himself personally as to the impartiality that is exercised in connection with these matters. The second point I desire to raise is much more serious. It has to do with whether or not we should have the private manufacture of arms in this country. The real truth is that the papers brought down, dealing with an agreement in connection with the manufacture of Bren guns, contemplates a profit of ten per cent.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): No. That is the outside limit, but it actually works out much less.

Mr. BENNETT: I should say they contemplate a possible profit of ten per cent. Time after time we have had discussions with respect to that matter; articles and indeed volumes have been written as to the evil effects of this practice upon the general life of the country. Yet we have made a bargain with a private enterprise, through a man untrained in this particular job, who has nothing to do with manufacturing, who has taken the old, second hand machinery of the John Inglis Company, which everyone in Toronto knows is obsolete, and to that we have added about $250,000 worth of our own machinery. I think that is the estimated value of it. That we have given freely, because it is intended that it will reduce the unit cost of what we are doing; and we have given an order for these Bren guns and secured an order from Great Britain. This could be justified if the effect of it has been to enable another member of the commonwealth to secure supplies that otherwise might not have been made available rapidly and satisfactorily; but in the meantime we have to build up the unit that produces them, and that unit is being built up of old, second hand, obsolete machinery of the Inglis company in Toronto, plus our machinery which is now at least twenty-five years old, I think some of it much older. I am not in any position to speak with authority with respect to machinery, but I do say that modern manufacturing is predicated upon the assumption that machinery of this kind is entirely obsolete, that long since its obsolescence has been such that it would be no longer regarded as satisfactory for the purpose.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I may say that the technical advice is to the contrary in regard to this particular machinery.

Mr. BENNETT: I understand that some people have advised that the heavy machinery, which is always useful and which never becomes obsolete until it is absolutely worn out and will not function at all, is acceptable; but that the manufacture of these arms, which is a matter of great precision, depends upon more modern machinery rather than upon old, obsolete machinery, either of this particular firm or of our own.

In that connection I think we should have some statement, because it does appear to me that we cannot justify private firms being created for the purpose of manufacturing arms unless we can give a valid reason for it concerning the interests of the country itself or of the commonwealth. It may be that it is desirable because of the large order that comes from Great Britain that we should embark upon this method of dealing with it. I should like to have the minister give as full a statement as possible as to just what were the operating causes. I am only saying that we have times without number declared against the theory of the private munition manufacturer being able to place himself in a position which permits him to influence public opinion in the manner that has been so strongly condemned, shall I say, in various parts of the world.

The third point has to do with the utilization of portions of this country for the purpose of training grounds for the training of aviators. There has been much discussion in the public press and in another place with respect to the matter. It is well known that in England there is a limitation on the training that can be carried out in connection with their aircraft, because of the density of population. That is, the limitation imposed upon them with respect to flying and training, because of the very dense population, render it essential that they should carry on their operations in some other part of the world. I believe Newfoundland was considered at one time; I believe other parts of the British Empire have been considered, and the information is that not a request but what is equivalent to it, namely an approach to this government, was made to ascertain whether or not there would be any objection to this being done. Obviously no member of the commonwealth is going to ask this government, and face a refusal, because that is not the way governments do business. But the information I have is that the British government was desirous of finding here an opportunity for the training of flyers and aviators, because of our climatic and other conditions that made such training possible, as compared with the limitations imposed upon them by reason of the density of their population and other matters of that kind.

What I was anxious about was whether the government would not be very greatly concerned to assist in this being done, not only because we are a part of the British commonwealth of nations but also because it would enable us to derive the benefits that would come from such an arrangement. Then there is another matter which becomes of importance. I am informed that the commission which visited the country some time ago did not go into the factories at all, but received from the department a memorandum showing what our factories in Canada were capable of producing; that they had no knowledge, for instance, that this country could produce shells of a certain type, and were ready and willing to enter into a contract for the production of shells if we were prepared to sanction it. That also becomes a matter of very considerable importance.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): That is entirely incorrect, may I say right away.

Mr. BENNETT: That may be; but certainly it is clear that the British government were willing to purchase supplies in this country, just as they were of Bren guns; and the question is whether or not they were given the opportunity to do so, as they were with respect to Bren guns. That is the only question, and I think that puts it clearly. Those two matters should be cleared up.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I will deal briefly with the three points raised by my right hon. friend. In the first place, with respect to the issuance of supplies I can assure my right hon. friend that so far as I know there is not the slightest suggestion of any partisan consideration in regard to the issuance of supplies.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say "partisan."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I thought my right hon. friend did suggest that.

Mr. BENNETT: No, far from it. I did not even mention it.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Last week I had the pleasure of accommodating three of my good colleagues from the other side of the house with respect to supplies, and I can assure my right hon. friend it is fully a matter of supplies being available. Where we are able to accommodate the public demand we are only too pleased to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: I referred to favouritism, and did not use the word "partisan."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I accept the amendment—but I am not conscious of that, either.

With reference to the contract for Bren guns, I want to say immediately that it is a very important question. I suggested myself very early this session that all these contracts could very well be examined by either the public accounts committee or a special committee of this house. I feel it is due to myself as minister, and to the department, that there should be a complete investigation from the business point of view, because I do say this, that from the business point of view this is one of the finest contracts that was ever signed in the public interest of Canada.

I want to say in the second place that the minister cannot take the slightest credit for the contract, and the minister never sat in on any of the consultations, and never met Major Hahn until after the contract was signed. The contract was discussed by an interdepartmental committee which was formed about two years ago. I think that a subcommittee studying the terms of the contract for three months found they had various possible alternatives. One would be that once the unit basis was established with reference to the contract that they might possibly call for tenders. That suggestion was made to those who had already organized the main details in England of a complementary contract, and we were told that if any further delay occurred the arrangements could not be proceeded with. That was exactly the situation.

Mr. BENNETT: If any delay ensued.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. We were told that if that suggestion was carried out the contract as had been arranged would have been impossible. Major Hahn went to England in 1936 and evidently made a favourable impression upon the British people. He also had access over there to the specifications of the Bren gun. I want to leave the idea with the committee that these are secret specifications and we had no control over them. It is quite possible they would not be available to any competitor of the firm which got the contract. I want to say this: Once we were informed by the war office of the attitude of the British government we went into figures with the Enfield factory in England which produces those guns at the rate of fifty a week—

Mr. BENNETT: It is more than that.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): —and we established the following figures: If we produced in Canada only 7,000 guns, on the same unit price basis as in this contract, the cost would be $4,887,923.63. Under the joint arrangement the cost of the guns would be $3,515,894.11. In other words there is a saving to Canada, as a result of production being increased from 7,000 to 12,000 guns, of $1,372,029.52.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the old story of increasing the unit production and reducing the unit cost.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes, increasing production and reducing the cost of production.

My right hon. friend referred to the possibility of applying the same principle in other directions. It would be of tremendous advantage to the Department of National Defence, to the government and the people of Canada if we could do that. I want to assure my right hon. friend and the committee that nothing has been done except so far as we can to encourage the placing of these orders, where we ourselves were handicapped through the impossibility of the production of orders in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Making the unit cost prohibitive.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Yes. We cannot always ask industry to go ahead with our small orders in Canada, because they cannot do it on a satisfactory financial basis.

I want to repeat what I said. I would like to see this contract examined from a business basis, through and through. I think it is one of the finest things ever done, since we had to do it in Canada, for the dominion. I would prefer to see it done by public ownership, because I am against the principle of the private manufacture of arms.

We studied the report of the royal commission in Great Britain of the senate committee in the United States and of a distinguished committee in Ottawa under the chairmanship of Doctor Skelton which sat two and a half years ago. They considered this one problem. As the result of the recommendations of that committee we tried to combine the principle of public ownership with private management. That is exactly the principle followed out to-day in connection with this. I realize it is capable of political attack but I do say to my right hon. friend that it is the very best thing that can be done to-day in order to expedite matters and to do a job at the cheapest possible cost for the production of the material in Canada.

With reference to the third point raised by my right hon. friend in regard to the air force may I say I looked up the files of the department on the question and I have found that in 1937 there was an editorial in the Vancouver Sun written on July 7 of that year, as follows:

> The announcement that the Canadian government had refused permission to Great Britain to establish royal air force training stations in Canada, but will permit the British authorities to recruit Canadians to be trained in that service, would seem to indicate that this country has rather fumbled the issue.

I made an inquiry, and received from the senior air officer the following:

> I regret I have been unable to trace the authority for the statement in question. A search of central registry has failed to reveal any request by the air ministry for authority to establish a training station in Canada. No one in this office has any recollection of having seen correspondence dealing with such a request.

Mr. BENNETT: I would not expect there would be.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The other day, after certain remarks were made in another place, I made further inquiries, and the situation is still the same. As a matter of fact I want to say that in regard to the training of Canadians, and preparing them for commissions in the air force in Great Britain, we have met every request. We are sending 120 a year to Great Britain, and training some at Trenton—fifteen at the present time—who will later proceed to Great Britain and take commissions there, and then qualify after short term commissions for reserve in the Canadian air force.

This insidious campaign outside—not in the house—that there has been a lack of willingness to cooperate, I say is absolutely false in every word. There has been absolutely a full spirit of cooperation, and I would ask the Prime Minister, if he will, to read a letter which came from the British government the other day indicating their appreciation of the cooperation extended to the recent air commission in Canada.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: First of all I have to say that I am somewhat surprised that the right hon. the leader of the opposition in this house, and the leader of the opposition in the senate, assert that they have information with respect to conversations which have taken place between the British government and the Canadian government, because I am unable to gather from what source information of that kind could have come.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not what I said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What did my right hon. friend say?

Mr. BENNETT: The right hon. gentleman has a habit of making statements of that character. I did not say that. I said I had information that they had endeavoured to establish training schools in this country. I was sensible enough to know that they did not make any formal request to the government, but would rather ascertain through informal discussions what the attitude of the government was.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Perhaps my right hon. friend will tell the committee where he got his information so we may judge how authentic is its source.

Mr. BENNETT: I have no intention of saying that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I thought not. I want to have it understood that neither the right hon. leader of the opposition in this house nor the leader of the opposition in the senate is prepared to state the source of his information. On the other hand, they both have been prepared to have a controversy take place in the press which has misrepresented entirely the position of the present government and which I think has helped to create embarrassment in the old country as well as here.

Mr. BENNETT: The Vancouver Sun started it.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is an old Tory trick.

Mr. BENNETT: The Vancouver Sun is a Tory paper, is it?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It has been started at different times and in different ways. However, I think we shall clear up the matter once and for all this morning. The letter my colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie), has asked me to read is a communication which was received from the High Commissioner of the United Kingdom, Sir Francis Floud, and which reads:

Office of the High Commissioner for the United Kingdom
Ottawa

June 21, 1938.

Sir,

With reference to your note No. 6 of the 16th April, I have the honour to inform you that I have been instructed by the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs to convey to His Majesty's government in Canada an expression of the warm appreciation of His Majesty's government in the United Kingdom for the valuable assistance rendered by the Minister of National Defence and his department to the air mission from the United Kingdom which recently visited Canada.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your most obedient servant,
F. L. C. Floud.

The Rt. Hon.
The Secretary of State for External Affairs,
Ottawa.

Mr. BENNETT: Read the letter of April 16, to which that is a reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have not that letter here. The letter of April 16 I think, intimated that a mission would be coming to Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: That will be a letter from the government of Canada to Sir Francis Floud.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It had I imagine reference to the mission.

Mr. BENNETT: The Prime Minister should not read a reply to a letter, without reading the letter to which it is in reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will send for the letter. I think my right hon. friend knows what it would likely be.

Mr. BENNETT: I know nothing of that.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is nothing in the other communication which would affect or alter in any way the significance of the present communication.

Mr. BENNETT: The terms of that letter would determine the reply.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: With respect to what has been asked this morning by the right hon. leader of the opposition in this committee, and with respect to the questions asked by the leader of the Conservative opposition in the senate, I would say that the government has nothing to add to the statement made by the leader of the government in the senate in response to an inquiry by the leader of the opposition in that house, the statement then made was to the effect that no requests have been received from the British government for the establishment in Canada of training centres for aviators of the air force of the United Kingdom. Confidential and informal exploratory conversations with respect to training of British air pilots have taken place, but nothing has developed which it was felt warranted a statement of policy. As has been indicated, if any proposals are made by the government of the United Kingdom, the Canadian government would of course be prepared to discuss them with that government and to make its position known to the Canadian people and to parliament.

Possibly hon. members have noticed that this matter has been brought up in the British parliament at Westminster where replies have been made to questions asked. In the Ottawa papers of June 30 there appeared a dispatch from London dated June 29 setting forth a reply that Sir Thomas Inskip, Minister for National Coordination, made to a question asked by Sir Percy Hurd, Conservative. Sir Percy Hurd asked what arrangements were being made to enlist Canadian cooperation in the government's rearmament plan. Sir Thomas Inskip replied:

His Majesty's government in Canada, in common with His Majesty's governments in other dominions, have been kept informed in regard to the rearmament program of this country. The possibility of placing orders in Canada is under examination, and orders have been placed in certain cases in which suitable terms, including times of delivery, can be arranged.

I think that dispatch indicates upon what the British government wishes to give in the way of information on matters which have been the subject of confidential communication between the two governments.

May I say a word with respect to the idea of having the Imperial air force set up flying schools in Canada to train their pilots; in short, a military station put down in Canada, owned, maintained and operated by the imperial government for imperial purposes. I must say that long ago Canadian governments finally settled the constitutional principle that in Canadian territory there could be no military establishments unless they were owned, maintained and controlled by the Canadian government responsible to the Canadian parliament and people. In the end the imperial naval stations and army garrisons were withdrawn and Canadian authority took over. A reversal of that principle and that historical process at this date is something the Canadian people would not for a moment entertain. Such domestic ownership, maintenance and control of all military stations and personnel is one of the really indispensable hall marks of national sovereign self government and an indispensable basis for friendly and effective cooperation between the governments of Canada and those of other parts of the British commonwealth of nations, including the government of the United Kingdom. Outside its homeland a state may have military stations and quarter military personnel in countries which it "owns," in its colonies or "possessions," or in its mandated territories according to the trust deed, or in countries over which it has assumed or been yielded, by some arrangement, what amounts to a protectorate. But no country pretending to sovereign self control could permit such a state of affairs or its implications and consequences. I need only add that what I have said has, of course, to be sharply distinguished from the case of actual war where a country may have to permit its partners, associates or allies to maintain, operate and control military establishments and forces within its territory, forced to do so by the actual strategic or tactical necessities and for the purposes, but only for the purposes, of the actual joint war.

Mr. MacNEIL: In the light of the statement just made by the Prime Minister, I wonder if he would clarify our position with regard to the naval bases at Halifax and Esquimalt? I hold in my hand copy of sessional paper No. 285, tabled last year. At that time the following question was asked:

What are the obligations, if any, of the government to the government of the United Kingdom in respect of the naval bases at Halifax and Esquimalt?

The answer given was as follows:

The naval bases at Halifax and Esquimalt were taken over on conditions that the dominion government would maintain them in a state of efficiency, would provide storing accomodation for coal and other fuel for the admiralty, and dock yard facilities for his majesty's ships visiting Canadian waters.

I am not asking this question out of mischievous curiosity. As the Prime Minister is aware, this matter has been discussed at length in articles appearing in important publications. It has been stated that this commits Canada to a state of belligerency, without reference to parliament, in the event that Great Britain should be involved in a war. Is the Prime Minister prepared to make a statement with regard to our obligations in connection with the defence of these bases should the United Kingdom become involved in a war?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I can only repeat what I have said time and again, namely, that there are no commitments of any kind on the part of this government with respect to any war in which the United Kingdom may be engaged. What may be done will be done as a result of the action of this parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: The question I was about to ask has been answered by the Prime Minister. I would be derelict in my duty if I did not say at once that I wholly and entirely and utterly disagree with that statement. When the ancient partner upon whom we have leaned all these years is not to be permitted to provide effective means for maintaining, not her life but the life of an empire and commonwealth, then I say it is time for us to take stock of the situation.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There has been no statement to the effect that effective means would not be provided, but the means that have been suggested by the right hon. leader of the opposition are means that would be destructive of all effective cooperation.

Mr. BENNETT: To say that any partner in our commonwealth should not, if it so desired, be given every opportunity to establish training fields for the safety, not of themselves but of the commonwealth, is destructive of the whole theory of 1926 and 1930. We said that we were freely associated with one another, that we were partners, and now we are told that if we try to act as partners we will be violating some unheard of national right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There was nothing in the statement I have made to justify any such inference.

Mr. BENNETT: It justifies no other inference than that. It can be interpreted in only one sense. The language is clear, it is unambiguous—for a change. But, sir, I do not believe that the people of this country share that view. Every man who has read the history of modern warfare and knows what is being prepared realizes that the bombers of to-day will make the British islands the very forefront of attack in the next war. They are threatened, and where are they to prepare for their defence, which is our defence? Not in those little islands. And if they want to come here and train and prepare to send their bombers across the ocean if the occasion arises, should they not be permitted gladly to do so and be welcomed? For what they are saving is our civilization, and Canada—and Canada, I repeat. The idea of the first minister of Canada suggesting that this is a Tory trick, when the article to which reference was made by his minister sitting beside him is from the Vancouver Sun, a Liberal paper, of the seventh day of July, 1937, almost a year ago.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: A Tory trick, just the same.

Mr. BENNETT: There we have it. What a spectacle!

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What a spectacle. That is what I say.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: The idea of the first minister of this country, when the Liberal organ of Vancouver makes this statement and the Minister of National Defence was so impressed with it that he at once instituted proceedings for the purpose of ascertaining its origin—he so stated here this morning, and he got a report. That statement in the Vancouver Sun did not come from me. I heard of it as others did, and I was as shocked as the Vancouver Sun apparently was. I knew nothing of it. I wonder how many members of this house knew anything about its origin. I do not know yet, and the Minister of National Defence says he is unable to find out. But there it was. And to-day we are told that it is inconsistent with our national sovereignty that the Dominion of Canada should permit training fields and centres to be established here by one of our partners for the defence of our common empire, a commonwealth of nations.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: We establish our own.

Mr. BENNETT: We have not the facilities to establish our own to offer to them. I know something of the difficulties even with regard to these 125 men to which reference has been made. I know the clamour of Canadians to join that force. I have had them come to me, not by ones and twos but many more, asking what I could do to assist them to get across the water and join the Royal Air Force. We made provision for a few men training at Trenton and for the medical examination of Canadians going to join the air force in England and we put a quota on those who desired to join the Royal Air Force. And now we are told it would be inconsistent with national sovereignty that we should permit a partner to provide for a contingency that means our life. Do not let us have any misunderstanding about it. When Britain goes we go. Who stands if freedom fall; who dies if England lives? If it was the last word I ever uttered in this house or with the last breath in my body I would say that no Canadian is worthy of his great heritage and his great traditions and his magnificent hope of the future who would deny to the old partner who established us the right in this country to create those centres which she may not have at home to preserve her life and the life of every man who enjoys freedom and liberty under the protecting aegis of that flag.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I knew the flag would be the last word.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly and proudly so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my right hon. friend that the course above all others which serves to unite and which serves to keep united the British Commonwealth of Nations is that which is implied in the words "complete self-government on the part of each of the self-governing dominions" and self-government means control by the government of a country over its own military establishments.

Mr. BENNETT: Free association.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Free association but complete control of its own military establishments.

We have in Canada our Department of National Defence; we have our army and our air force and our naval service establishments as the British government have their army and navy and air force establishments under their own control and a responsible minister. You cannot have two military forces operating in individual countries responsible at one time or in part to the one government and at another time and in part to another government. We have to take complete responsibility ourselves with respect to everything we do and for everything that is done here.

Mr. BENNETT: This is not a military force but a training force.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want the house and the country to understand clearly what is being discussed. My reference was with regard to the idea of having the imperial air force set up a flying school somewhere in Canada to train their flying pilots. In short, a military station to be put down in Canada, owned, maintained and operated by the imperial government for imperial purposes

Mr. BENNETT: Not for imperial purposes.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is for imperial purposes. Is it for Canadian purposes?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, very much so.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say that we will look after our own defence in cooperation with other parts of the empire, just as they will look after their own defences in cooperation with other parts of the empire, but that cooperation will be most effectively maintained and carried out by each part managing its own affairs and being responsible to its own parliament for all its actions in respect thereto.

I have made this statement at this time this morning so that there can be no mistake about the attitude of the Canadian government on this question, and if at any time my right hon. friend wants to go before the Canadian people and have this issue fought out, I am quite prepared at the appropriate time to go before them.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound, Mr. Chairman, to say "So am I." I want to say, further, that his own Minister of National Defence is my authority that we are going to depend on the might of our partner, Britain, for our naval defence, and that means our life. That is not what I said, but what the Minister of National Defence said; that means, the defence of Canada by the taxpayer of England, who is denied the right to train his men in Canada for the purpose of protecting that navy.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I want to take issue at once with that statement.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what it means.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: They are two entirely different things. This government has never at any time said that it was not prepared to give in our own establishments the opportunity to British pilots to come over here and train, but they will do it in our own establishments, controlled by our own Minister of National Defence who is responsible to this parliament. That is an entirely different thing from having a branch of the British forces establish headquarters in this country, direct their own men here and be responsible, not to this parliament for what takes place in Canada as a consequence, but only to the British parliament and the British people.

Mr. BENNETT: And yet in Canada, sir, the road to the Yukon and Alaska—a military road—not for a partner of the empire but for an alien—

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What?

Mr. BENNETT: An alien.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What about it?

Mr. BENNETT: Just that. I am asking is that consistent with this discussion?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Who has suggested that?

Mr. BENNETT: The premier of British Columbia, has he not? He cannot do it unless this government gives him permission, for the Yukon is under our control. And he goes to Washington and says that he does it with the approval of the Prime Minister.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, he did not; I beg your pardon.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what he said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: No, he did not.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what he said.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He did not.

Mr. BENNETT: All right.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He himself has stated specifically to me that what he did he did entirely on his own responsibility.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I gave him no encouragement or authority, nor has he had any from any federal source so far as the Yukon road is concerned. When the question comes up for consideration by this government, this government will give its answer with respect to what is to be done.

Mr. McGEER: Do I understand from the leader of the opposition that he is opposed to the construction of the Alaska highway?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly he is.

Mr. McGEER: I am glad to know that.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly he is, under the conditions suggested, because the back door is as open as the front door. Always keep that in mind, and I have said so frequently. There is nothing new about it. This morning we have the Minister of National Defence leaving it to the Prime Minister to make the statement he has made, and it is the same Minister of National Defence who has told this country that it is on the British navy that we are going to depend, plus the American navy on the Pacific. There is his speech; I read from it again the other day. He did not say that we were going to have the American navy for sure, but that he felt as a matter of friendliness that they would probably see us out of our difficulties.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I never mentioned the word American.

Mr. BENNETT: He mentioned the word neighbour.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): But not the word American.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, he did not mean Mexico as far as I know. Now I will put one point and leave it at that. If it is essential that we should depend upon the British navy for our national life, is it inconsistent with our position of free association with the people who provide it that they should have an opportunity to establish a training school in Canada for those who will defend, not their country, but our common heritage with their navy upon which we depend, according to the minister himself? Everybody, I think, will agree with that, and I believe that the great mass of public opinion in this country would support that view.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Would my right hon. friend extend that principle even to the land forces, the militia—to have the militia of the United Kingdom use Canada as a crown colony for training purposes?

Mr. BENNETT: No sir.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Well, what is the difference?

Mr. BENNETT: I made it clear at the threshhold of my observations that aerial attack and defence are entirely different from other warlike operations. We are dealing with operations in the air. It has never been suggested that England should undertake defensive or offensive operation's in Canada, but to train their airmen where they would be free from attack, that they might protect that navy on which we depend, that navy which is to save us and our harbours and our trade and commerce east and west. The training for air service is different from that for the navy and army. I would not for a moment suggest that the militia of England or the army of England should train here. Far from it.

Mr. VIEN: The principle is the same.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not the same.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is exactly the same.

Mr. BENNETT: It is quite different, carrying into the air bombs with flying machines and training men to meet an enemy at our gate and to defend the navy that preserves from destruction our commerce on the open seas is quite unlike military operations. There is no similarity in the world.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say one word in conclusion. There is not a man in this parliament who believes more strongly in the British Empire and the part it is playing in the world to-day than myself. I believe that the British Empire can be kept together and made an effective instrument for peace throughout the world by effective cooperation between the self-governing dominions and the United Kingdom. But I do say that any reversal of the trend, of which we are all fully cognizant, that has taken place in the last century with respect to military establishments, whether they relate to the army or the air or to the naval service, would be a factor in dismembering the British Empire and would create all sorts of controversy and discussion in the country, serving no useful purpose in the end. This empire can be kept together by effective, helpful cooperation. This government is prepared to cooperate with the British government and with the governments of all the other self-governing dominions in ways which we believe will most effectively help to preserve the unity of the empire and make it a great force for peace and good will throughout the world and for the maintenance of peace. But we are not going to take a step which we may believe might have the effect of beginning to disrupt the exceptionally happy and united relations which all parts of the empire enjoy to-day each with the other.

Mr. CAHAN: I would ask the Prime Minister whether he seriously suggests that affording facilities, at the expense of the government of the United Kingdom for the training of men in flying, with the idea of ultimately employing them in the British air forces for the protection not only of the United Kingdom but of all the other dominions, is a retrograde step. The training of British air forces in Canada would be the first step, it seems to me, in cooperation in that direction. Such reasonable cooperation would not, I think, imply the exercise of British military authority over this country. It would not be a military force; it would not be a force under military control; it would not necessarily be a military establishment at all. It would be simply providing an establishment with ample facilities in this wide country for training men for ultimate service in the aerial defences of the empire. It seems to me the right hon. gentleman is going very far astray in his definition.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I am glad my hon. friend has asked the question he has. I wish to go a step further than he has gone, in his statement that this country should cooperate in a way that will be helpful to all parts of the British Empire in matters of defence by saying that whereas he proposes that we should have the British government come and pay for establishments which they are supporting in this country for the training of pilots, we ourselves are prepared to have our own establishments here and to give in those establishments facilities to British pilots to come and train here. But they must come and train in establishments which are under the control of the government of Canada and for which the Minister of National Defence will be able to answer in this parliament with respect to everything concerning them.

Mr. CAHAN: The facilities at the present time are utterly inadequate to attain the objects which the right hon. gentleman suggests. Will he in parliament, on behalf of his government, ask for adequate appropriations for the purpose, so that there may be ample facilities in this country, under the supervision, direction and control of the Canadian government, for the training of adequate air forces for the United Kingdom and the other dominions? If he will do that, I will go a long way with him, but there has not been one practical step taken yet in that direction.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say again to my hon. friend that when we have requests from the British government for a particular purpose we shall be prepared to consider them, but we have had no requests from the government of the United Kingdom for the establishment of training stations in this country up to the present. We have had some exploratory conversations with respect to what might be desirable with a view to affording facilities for pilots to train, and we have indicated our position, as I have stated it on the floor of this house this morning, that we are quite prepared in connection with our own establishments, to help in affording facilities to British pilots if that will be of service to them. But I ask my hon. friend this question: Does he believe that an announcement by any government, either Liberal or Conservative, in this parliament, to the effect that the Canadian government was going to permit military establishments in Canada to be owned, controlled and operated from Great Britain, would for one minute make for peace and unity and helpful, cooperative relations between Canada and the United Kingdom and other parts of the British Empire? I am not prepared to go that far, because I believe that that kind of announcement would be prejudicial to the exceptionally happy cooperative relations that we at present enjoy.

Mr. BENNETT: The question has been answered. No British government, after the statement made this morning by the Prime Minister of this country, will ever apply to his government for permission to establish an air training school here.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Well, then, my right hon. friend has served a doubtful purpose by his exuberance this morning.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry; but I have obtained from the Prime Minister a statement which makes it obvious that no British government will face a refusal; and we have the refusal now, before application is made.

An hon. MEMBER: No.

Mr. BENNETT: It is as clear as it is possible to make it that we have refused, not a military establishment, but a training ground. That is all that ever was thought of or suggested. The position is quite clear now.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): A training ground?

Mr. BENNETT: A training field.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And that is not a military establishment? Is it, then, a plaything, a church organization, or what?

Mr. BENNETT: It is to coordinate their activities with the navy in order that our ports may be defended. Would you not train men here for flying if they were to cooperate with the British navy to defend Canada? Atmospheric pressure, weather conditions, everything that goes with flying out to sea or across the stormy Atlantic must be considered to enable us to cooperate with the British fleet, with the submarines, with the torpedo boat destroyers—all these things are involved. Train in Canada? Of course. Where else would they be able to do what the Minister of National Defence says he is relying on that navy to do, namely to preserve our commerce from destruction. That is the reason. There is no other training place they can go to. This is the only place they can do it and do it effectively to attain the end which the Minister of National Defence says must be attained.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Special—Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $3,500,000.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister give us information as to the number of projects likely to be undertaken in Saskatchewan under this item?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The item is $3,500,000 made up as follows:

Headquarters administration	$ 146,950
Cultural experiments and research	513,190
Land utilization	1,339,860
Water development and water storage	1,500,000

The number of projects which will be undertaken in Saskatchewan is somewhat smaller than the number undertaken last year, and it will be proportioned to the amount expended last year. It will be impossible to give the total number for this year. The numbers undertaken and completed in 1937-38 are:

Manitoba	696
Saskatchewan	1,697
Alberta	372
Total	2,765

Mr. PERLEY: Will the work be let by contracts or units of work? I understand that last year several of the larger projects were carried on by calling for tenders for units of work. Will this be a general contract system?

Mr. GARDINER: The government, of course, pays one-half the cost of the dug-outs, and these works are usually done by the individual farmer on his own farm. The small dams are done in exactly the same way. Community projects are usually carried out by the individuals concerned. That is, if a dam is going to serve three or four or a dozen people, these three or four or a dozen people do the work, and the government assists financially as well as by giving advice. As far as the larger projects are concerned, tenders are called and the jobs are let to contractors, in most instances to the lowest bidder, unless there is some really good reason for not giving it to him; either he has so much work already that he is probably not able to carry it out, or there is some other good reason for his not getting it.

Mr. PERLEY: Last year we had a statement from the minister that where there were units of work, for instance on the Cypress dam, there would be federal government inspectors. I believe the minister stated that this inspector or a representative of his department would have the say as to who should get the work on this project. I am not saying that there was not a certain purpose in view to see that the work was properly distributed to those who needed it. But I should like an understanding now that there will be no discrimination whatsoever by inspectors who will be on the job, and that all those needing any work will get it. I wish to be assured that there will be no discrimination—I would not exactly say for partisanship reasons—but that the inspectors will be fair.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not recollect ever having made the statement—and if I did, it was wrong—to the effect that the inspector determined who was to be employed on the work, say at Cypress lake. The facts are, that with respect to the two dams, one at each end of Cypress lake, there is also work being done there in order to run the Battle creek into Cypress lake and also again to take the water out of Cypress lake to supply irrigation projects along the Battle creek south of Cypress lake. In addition, a ditch is being put in for the purpose of carrying water out of the west end of Cypress lake into the Robstart district, in order to irrigate certain lands there. All these works are being carried out under four contractors who tendered for the work and obtained it on condition that they would take the local people on the job.

In order to make it possible for them to know where to go in order to obtain labour, an office was established in the nearest village, I believe in Consul. A man was put in charge of the employment office; people were asked to make application for work, and the contractors go to that office for their employees. They were instructed to take them in the order that these people applied for work. I understand that this undertaking was carried out, and that persons from those communities were given employment in so far as they were able to supply the type of labour required.

Mr. FAIR: In the case of the Bartman dam, there were two tenders, one from the Poole Construction Company for $19,332.50, and the other from the special municipal areas board for $19,155.60. This contract was let to the Poole Construction Company. Why was that done, when there was a lower tender?

Mr. GARDINER: The other tender in connection with the Bartman dam was from the special areas board of the government of Alberta. The Poole Construction Company is an organization well equipped to do that kind of work. The tenders were considered somewhat late in the season, and as far as we were able to find out the board had little if any equipment with which to proceed with the work immediately. There was another reason why it was considered somewhat doubtful as to whether we should give consideration to the board's tender. At that time we had not established the principle as to whether or not we should put the government in competition with others who were tendering in connection with works of that kind, and since this was the first case we had to consider we decided to give it to the contractor, since there was a difference only of two or three hundred dollars.

Mr. FAIR: I do not think this was very good business, because the dam built by the Poole Construction Company washed out. On the other hand, the special areas board built a dam six miles further along which was able to withstand the high water that wrecked the other dam. So I say it looks like a case of one being on the patronage list, perhaps, while the other was not.

Mr. PERLEY: Does the project for the water supply for the city of Moose Jaw come under this vote, and is it intended to undertake that work, which was announced by the hon. member for Moose Jaw during the provincial campaign. According to a Regina newspaper which came to hand this morning, a motion was introduced in the city council of Moose Jaw on Monday evening last by a certain alderman——requesting J. Gordon Ross, M.P. for Moose Jaw, to make a public announcement regarding the Saskatchewan river water project to supply the city with an ample water supply. Announcement was made prior to the recent provincial campaign by Mr. Ross that the project would be completed this fall providing the Patterson government was returned to office.

What authority had the hon. member for Moose Jaw to make that announcement during the campaign? Has any work been done on this project and are any engineers on the job? During the campaign the hon. member stated that engineers were on the job and had been making a survey. How many engineers were there, what was their report and will the contract be let by public tender?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Before the minister replies I hope my right hon. friend and the committee will permit me to put a motion which will enable us to continue sitting without adjourning at one o'clock. I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again this day.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF INTERMISSION FROM ONE O'CLOCK TO THREE O'CLOCK, P.M.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That there shall be no intermission at one o'clock in the sitting of the house this day.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Special—Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $3,500,000.

Mr. GARDINER: In reply to the question of the hon. member for Qu'Appelle I may say that so far as the department, or the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act organization is concerned, we have no undertaking to place water in the city of Moose Jaw; nor have we any understanding with anyone that we shall do so. At certain places throughout the west we are undertaking to establish water storage. That is, at some future time we may store in different places water that can be used for irrigation purposes or as a water supply for people in the neighbourhood. At the moment we have under consideration the placing of water storage at Caron, Saskatchewan, which

I think is about twenty miles, or a little more, west of Moose Jaw. At present the city of Moose Jaw gets its water from the supplies that are to be found in the sand areas in the vicinity of Caron. By establishing water storage in that sand area, Moose Jaw in the end might be able to obtain better supplies of water than they are able to obtain from that district at the present time, and to that extent we may be assisting Moose Jaw. But any arrangements that may be made by that city to improve their water supply will concern the area between Caron and Moose Jaw. So far as we are concerned we are taking no part whatever in that. My understanding of the statement made by the hon. member for Moose Jaw during the election campaign in Saskatchewan is that he discussed the possibility of the Saskatchewan government doing something to assist the city of Moose Jaw in bringing water from Caron to that city, and that he made some statement in regard to the matter. Of course that does not concern us here; that is a matter between the constituency which he represents and the provincial government. It does not come under this vote except in this way, that we are providing water storage at Caron, and Moose Jaw may go there in order to obtain water. With regard to the engineering, we have had our own engineer report to us on the possibilities of establishing water storage at Caron, and the reports are to the effect that this can be done satisfactorily.

Mr. PERLEY: That is, bringing it from the Saskatchewan river down Thunder creek?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. PERLEY: Are any engineers working on the project at present?

Mr. GARDINER: The engineers are not actually working at the moment, but engineers have been over the route that a ditch would follow in order to bring water from the Saskatchewan river to the Caron area.

Mr. BENNETT: There are just two questions I should like to ask the minister. The first is, in view of our desire to hasten prorogation would he give us the assurance that public tenders will be called in connection with all these undertakings except those he described as dug-outs? The second is, will all contracts contain the provision which is now inserted in contracts of the labour department, that there will be no discrimination because of politics, religion or race?

Mr. GARDINER: I can give the right hon. leader of the opposition the assurance that tenders will be called for on all contracts of the type for which tenders properly can be called. I would vary that only to this extent, that there may be some cases similar to that of the Cypress dam, for example, where it would be necessary to limit the number bidding on the contract because of the fact that we want to get the type of equipment which will put to work the people in the particular community.

Mr. BENNETT: The maximum number of local people?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. Of course, in connection with these works these people are really selected by the contractors themselves.

Mr. BENNETT: I realize that, and that is the reason why I ask the minister if he would see that there is inserted in the contract those provisions now inserted in contracts of the Department of Labour. In fact, I thought those clauses were inserted in some of the contracts, but I now understand they were not. It does seem to me that having regard to the fact that through an act of God this condition has arisen, and because we are all interested in it, the same provision should be incorporated in these contracts as in those of the Department of Labour. That is, there should be no discrimination. The Minister of Agriculture will recall the general sense of the clause.

Mr. GARDINER: I understand there is a clause to that effect in our agreements. I am not sure that there is one in the contracts entered into with the individual contractors.

Mr. BENNETT: I think there should be.

Mr. GARDINER: I will see that something to that effect is put in. So far as wages are concerned, I would point out that we have in the contract a clause which requires the payment of the prevailing wage in a community. The leader of the opposition will understand the reason for that. Much of the work is done by farm labour.

Mr. BENNETT: I am familiar with the operations which have been carried on. Now that Mr. Spence has left the Saskatchewan government, he has become charged with the responsibility for the administration of the whole undertaking. I think the assurance the minister has given with respect to public tenders is quite satisfactory, from my standpoint. Do I understand that in tenders the bids are limited to particular people, or that there is a strictly public tender? It is thought that there should be public tenders, except in exceptional cases about which we might agree that this condition should not apply.

Mr. GARDINER: There have been very few exceptions to this general rule. There is only one I can recall. Tenders have been called for through public advertisement in the press, and the tender of each tenderer has been considered. Unless there has been some special reason to the contrary, the job has always gone to the lowest public tenderer.

Mr. BENNETT: From my standpoint that is satisfactory. On the second point I would like the assurance of the minister, if he can give it, that a similar clause to that appearing in Department of Labour contracts should appear in these contracts. I believe that would be desirable, because it would prevent trouble for the department itself and for Mr. Spence. I believe it would be helpful to everybody, and would restore a measure of confidence; because, I must say that if I brought down the letters I have in connection with the administration of relief, for which the minister says Saskatchewan is wholly responsible, I think he would be somewhat surprised. Some of them are pathetic in their descriptions of what they were compelled to do in recent weeks. I should like, if possible, to avoid bringing that information down, and if we could have an assurance that a clause similar to that placed in labour contracts providing against discrimination, will appear in these contracts, I believe it would be satisfactory. I think the clause refers to political and religious belief.

Mr. ROGERS: Race, religious or political belief.

Mr. BENNETT: I believe that is right. My mind was somewhat confused as to the exact words, but I knew they were to that effect. If some such clause were inserted, I believe it would serve an extremely useful purpose in restoring some measure of confidence, because we must realize that three and a half million dollars is a great deal of money.

Mr. GARDINER: There can be no objection to inserting it. Of course in the contracts which are only half way through—

Mr. BENNETT: I understand that.

Mr. GARDINER: —we may not be able to change the wording. But I have no objection to accepting the suggestion, and will give the assurance that it will be carried out.

Mr. HANSELL: With regard to the proposed irrigation project at Enchant, Alberta, many hopes were raised in the people's minds. Evidently the project was quite agreeable to the rehabilitation officer at Regina; but, eventually, as the minister is aware, the scheme was turned down. I believe the only reason why the project was turned down was that the water rates from the irrigation company were high. I believe the farmers are prepared to pay that sum, and would ask the minister to reconsider the matter.

Mr. GARDINER: The Enchant area is alongside an area now irrigated by the Canada Land and Irrigation people. There are farmers in that district who have been dry farming, and my memory is that at one time they had an opportunity of joining the Canada Land and Irrigation project. I have not the details before me, but I know that the question of providing them with water from the Canada Land and Irrigation ditch was reviewed. Arrangements had gone so far as to have the contract prepared to supply water to these people a year ago. But that contract provided for water at a cost of $2.95 an acre, and all the advice we can get is to the effect that a farmer cannot succeed in farming land carrying a water cost of $2.95 an acre. It is all very well for a farmer to come along and say to the Canadian government, "You put the water in, anyway; we will be prepared to pay that rate." But if we were to take the responsibility of developing a project to put in water, knowing that the farmer would have to pay the rate, I believe we would be assuming a responsibility which we should not assume. We have said to them simply that we think a new plan should be worked out, and that it should be possible for them to secure water from that ditch at a cost lower than the charge proposed.

Mr. HANSELL: Was the figure of $2.95 the latest one given?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; that is the figure in the contract which came to me for signature. That was the last contract I saw.

There is this further fact to be considered: The government has already put $70,000 on one occasion and $80,000 on another occasion into making water available to the Canada Land and Irrigation Company itself. We spent $80,000 two years ago to put in a flume. If the flume had not been put in, we were told that even the Canada Land and Irrigation people would have been without water. If there were slackness at any time, then I say it was on our part at that time for not securing an undertaking from the Canada Land and Irrigation Company to the effect that when we required water, as a result of that expenditure of money we would get it at special rates. I have indicated to the Canada Land and Irrigation Company that if they expect further assistance from the government of Canada in connection with these activities, they can expect that we shall require that kind of clause in any arrangement we may make with them.

We think water should be supplied to the Enchant people at a lower rate than could be provided under any contract which has been considered up to the present, and we think it would be better to wait a year or two to get a proper kind of contract, rather than have these people sign something which will place upon them for the next twenty years a charge which they cannot pay.

Mr. HANSELL: May we assume from the minister's reply that if a satisfactory rate can be secured from the Canada Land and Irrigation Company, everything else will be in order to go ahead.

Mr. GARDINER: I would say that if a satisfactory arrangement can be made with regard to the whole project, we are prepared to give consideration to it.

Mr. PERLEY: I had several matters I should have liked to bring to the attention of the minister, but I realize that we are anxious to get on. Some of them will have to stand until another time. I take great exception, however, to the attitude of the minister as indicated at page 4012 of Hansard, when he was making the comparison between the cost of handling relief under the present system and under the relief commission which operated between 1930 and 1935. However, that can stand.

What amount of this vote will be spent on roads in Saskatchewan? Has the minister approved expenditures being made on the highway from the boundary through Regina, Humboldt and on to Melfort? Has the government approved expenditures on the western highway from the boundary, through Moose Jaw, Saskatoon and on to Prince Albert?

Mr. GARDINER: No expenditures for any of those projects are involved in this item. They would be all under the Department of Mines and Resources.

Mr. PERLEY: I understand the promise was made during the last campaign that part of this vote would be used in the construction of highways.

Mr. GARDINER: There was no discussion of this vote at all.

Mr. PERLEY: The hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) evidently was out of order when he was promising the electors that expenditures would be made on a highway from the boundary through Humboldt on to Melfort.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): On a question of privilege, that statement was never made, suggested or hinted at in any manner, shape or form.

Mr. PERLEY: I am sorry the reports of the speeches of the hon. member were so grossly exaggerated. I understand he referred to a certain letter he had received from the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to the effect that that road would be completed this year.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is entirely wrong.

Mr. HANSELL: What would the minister consider to be a fair and proper water rate to the farmer?

Mr. GARDINER: That would depend a great deal upon the type of development and what crop was to be grown on the irrigated lands. If my memory serves me aright, the rate under the Brooks scheme, which is similar to this one, was $1.75. The hon. member can see that $2.95 is considerably above that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What is the cost of the most expensive project being carried on under this act?

Mr. GARDINER: The largest project, which is not yet completed, is the Cypress lake project. The total cost of this will eventually be in the neighbourhood of $300,000. This is to provide storage for five or six smaller projects. Cypress lake is the source of Frenchman river, which in turn forms part of the Missouri river system. The water flows south to the Missouri river and on to the gulf of Mexico. Along the Frenchman river we have two irrigation projects developed up to the present, with a possible irrigation of in the neighbourhood of 30,000 acres along the valley. Then along Battle creek, which is fed from Cypress lake, there is a project which will irrigate 10,000 or 13,000 acres. Between 40,000 and 45,000 acres will be irrigated as a result of this expenditure. It can hardly be said that this is one project by itself, but that is the expenditure which will be involved.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have on several occasions indicated to the minister that I consider this to be one of the most important acts that have been passed in the history of the west. There is one matter to which I should like to direct the minister's attention with as much brevity as possible, but with sufficient detail to make him realize what is in my mind. I refer to the importance of considering the type of crop which can be raised to advantage on irrigated lands. I have the growing of sugar beets particularly in mind. About 14,000 acres of irrigated land will provide enough sugar beets for one year's run of a factory. It will be seen, therefore, that the prairie farm rehabilitation projects are rapidly reaching a size where they can support sugar beet factories.

I should like to draw to the attention of the committee in as short a time as possible what I consider to be an important matter which has been overlooked in Canada's development. There has been too great a tendency to look upon the sugar beet industry with scorn and contempt as being a matter of little concern. In developing irrigated lands the farmers are confronted with the problem of cleaning their land. They must have something to take the place of the summer fallow, and they might well be at a loss to know what crop to use. For example, in the Enchant area the farmers could raise corn to good advantage if they had a cash market, or if there were a suitable processing plant. However, it might be rather difficult to establish one in that area. The farmers might raise sunflowers if a profit could be made in converting them into ensilage. However, there is no possible profit, as they cannot sell to advantage the ultimate products of butter, milk and cream. There is going to be considerable difficulty as we go forward with these irrigation projects. I speak from considerable experience because we have had irrigation farming in my constituency for some time. There are four distinct irrigation projects, in whole or in part, in my constituency which have been in operation more or less since 1902. The result is that there is to be found in that area an accumulated store of wisdom of which I wish the minister to have the benefit. I am particularly concerned about this because it was reported to me last year that a commitment had been made by the dominion government to the effect that it would not encourage further the development of sugar beet growing in Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not know anything of that.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Let me quote from a statement made by the Canadian representative at the London sugar conference, held in May, 1937. He is reported as saying:

> At the same time the government of Canada reiterate the assurance already given that they do not propose to stimulate the production of sugar in Canada during the term of this agreement by subsidy, increased protection, special remission of taxes or by any other similar measure.

Mr. GARDINER: That is a little different. I do not know of any branch of agriculture that is stimulated by those methods. There is just a possibility that it might be a mistake to start in to stimulate the sugar beet industry by paying bonuses or doing other things of that kind. Making it possible for people to grow sugar beets in irrigated areas is a different matter.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am glad to have the minister's statement on that because it indicates that he is rather in sympathy with the development of the beet sugar industry, which is of great importance to western Canada. When you remember that there has already been expended in Alberta in irrigation projects $35,000,000, and that the soil and climate of that province is particularly adapted to the production of sugar, and that this industry has been singularly successful in Alberta for years, you can realize that it is an industry which ought not to be disparaged.

To be very brief, this year, for example, there was produced in the harvested sugar beet area where the two beet sugar factories are located in my constituency 3,813 pounds of refined sugar per acre. All one has to do to realize the volume of that production is to imagine thirty sacks of sugar piled on this floor, and remember that that was produced from one acre. It shows the tremendous potentialities of production from irrigated land in raising sugar beets. There was a gross return of $155 per acre, $77.50 of which went to the farmer and $77.50 to the manufacturer, $25 going to labour. That indicates how important and how deserving of serious consideration this industry is.

I notice the Minister of Labour has been following with close attention, and I am sure he will be deeply interested when I again bring to his notice the fact that one sugar factory in my constitutency with a slicing capacity per day of 1,200 tons will support, according to United States figures, ten thousand people. These people are not all, of course, directly engaged in raising or processing sugar beets, but in the allied industries as well, in the production of coal and coke, sacks and a great number of other things used in the production of sugar. Some are engaged on the railways and others in other transportation activities as a result of this sugar production.

I know we are all anxious to get the business of the session closed so I shall just say in conclusion that there is a great possibility in Canada for the development of the sugar industry. The sugar industry is not by any means the ten-cent affair which a number of people have been for some reason or other considering it. It is, on the contrary, a going concern. It has already proven itself beyond question a success. There are people in Canada who say that it cannot compete. But the price of sugar in Canada to-day is as low, I understand, as it is in any first class country, five cents a pound, while the price in some other countries runs as high as thirteen and fourteen cents per pound. Now if the beet sugar industry can compete successfully with other sugar refineries with prices as low as they are in this country to-day, that is good evidence that we have in our native sugar industry a successful business, a going concern. When you remember that Alberta at the present time could support seven sugar factories of the size of the Raymond sugar factory, and that by so doing she would be able to produce thirty-five per cent of the sugar requirements of Canada, you can realize what a tremendous difference the development of this industry would make to the dominion.

Mr. BENNETT: Where would you sell it?

Mr. BLACKMORE: We are using that sugar in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: How would you move it as against competition from the seaboard?

Mr. BLACKMORE: It would be most interesting to go into that phase at some other time, but we could probably do it by establishing a quota system which would make it impossible to import sugar until we had marketed our own production. As the leader of the opposition is concerned as to our balance of trade, I am sure he will realize the force of what I have presented when he remembers that we can produce in Canada all our own sugar requirements, thereby saving ourselves the necessity of importing any.

I do not wish under the circumstances to go into the question at any greater length. I would not have brought it up now except that for a long time I have been waiting for this item in order to deliver a message that needs to be delivered in this house to the people of this country, from my constituency, where this sugar industry has unquestionably proved to be a great success.

The agreement that was entered into last year certainly offended the people of my constituency. They looked upon it as a direct slap in the face. If their industry had not been successful it would have been different but it has been very successful. Our irrigated areas are sufficient to support seven factories which would supply thirty-five per cent of the total sugar consumption of Canada. Surely something can be done to give those factories a market, in western Canada at all events, which I understand consumes in the neighbourhood of $10,000,000 worth of sugar per year.

There is one other matter which I shall mention incidentally, without wishing to prolong the discussion of these estimates. I believe the minister has received a letter from me, and possibly from a number of others, with respect to the government's action in reducing the duty on Australian lamb from three per cent to one-half per cent. I want to state in this house that that action of the government greatly offended the people of my constituency.

Mr. GARDINER: That has nothing to do with this vote.

Mr. BLACKMORE: No, not directly, but it has to do with it in one sense, in connection with the development of irrigation projects.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I would point out to the hon. member that we are not discussing the tariff or duties. His remarks are out of order.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I shall bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but this is an important thing. If you are going to put people on the land with irrigation and water supplied to them you must be sure that conditions are such that through the adoption of irrigation they can make a success of their farming. Otherwise you reduce them to a condition of despair.

Mr. GARDINER: Lamb prices are better this year than they have been for many years.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That may be true; nevertheless the people who are directly concerned in my constituency had put 55,000 lambs into the feed lots at prices which they thought would be safe before the reduction in duty, but then prices suddenly dropped, much to their disadvantage.

Mr. GARDINER: The price is up now.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I wanted to draw the situation to the minister's attention as a word direct from my constituency with regard to the effect of the reduction of the duty.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Labour—Special—To provide for commitments and completion of works in connection with federal contributions to provincial and municipal projects, $1,075,000.

Mr. MacNEIL: I want to direct the attention of the Minister of Labour to a telegram I received yesterday from the secretary of the single unemployed committee at Vancouver, reading as follows:

No truth in emergency relief for single unemployed men. Only those with home taking transportation offered food. Such are few. Great majority homeless. Situation just as desperate. Need emergency relief. Home question could be settled after. Single unemployed refused work on federal and provincial projects. Investigate.

I wish briefly to refer again to the sessional paper recently tabled, wherein it is shown that the Hon. Mr. Clubb of Manitoba protested against the issuance of transportation to these men on the basis that they designated no particular point, and he asked that they indicate their home. That same basis is now being applied to the situation in Vancouver which makes it impossible for these men to qualify for either relief or transportation. They have been rendered homeless through no fault of their own, and so cannot designate their homes.

Second, I wish to make the point that was dealt with last night that these men have to some extent been blacklisted, I am informed from Vancouver, and are not being considered eligible to work on projects which are now being opened up by reason of federal contributions. I would appreciate a statement from the minister to clarify the situation.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): I do not think the committee would want me to retrace ground I have already covered in this connection. So far as emergency relief is concerned, the dominion government has offered to assume complete financial responsibility for emergency relief extended to those non-resident single unemployed men who were formerly in the forestry conservation camps. If such emergency relief is not being given at the present time, it can be only for the reason that these men have declined to accept the offer of transportation as made in the original proposal by the minister of labour of British Columbia. Certainly the dominion government has given the requisite authority that the emergency relief shall be extended to those men, non-resident transients formerly in the forestry conservation camps, upon their acceptance of transportation to their homes.

As to discrimination against those men in public works, that question was raised yesterday in another connection and I gave my hon. friend the assurance that in any joint works done in British Columbia, provision would be made for the employment of at least a number of single unemployed. That is fully in accord with the undertaking previously given that these men will be placed on the same footing as other groups of unemployed with respect to eligibility for employment on public works.

So far as federal public works are concerned, provision has already been made that in connection with certain public works which are now either actually in progress or immediately in prospect some of those unemployed men will be taken care of through the employment service of Canada.

Mr. HEAPS: There is one matter I wish to raise, not in connection with this item but in a general way. Every member of the committee realizes that the manner in which we have been discussing the estimates in the past few days has been entirely unsatisfactory. Very important items come under discussion, and in the rush to get through they do not receive just consideration. Important questions of administration and government policy are involved, but in the general desire to get through the business of the house members are not afforded an adequate opportunity to discuss these matters as they should. My remarks are not directed particularly to the Minister of Labour. What we have been doing this session has been done in a similar way in previous sessions. I am directing my remarks more particularly to the Prime Minister and in general to the members of the government.

On many occasions in the past we have considered the question of referring estimates to committees of the house, and there is no reason why that principle should not extend further than it does at the present time. Let me illustrate. The estimates of the Canadian National Railways, amounting to many millions of dollars, are considered each year by a committee of the house, and when they come back to this chamber they do not provoke very much discussion because members are usually satisfied with what that committee has done. I suggest to the Prime Minister that many of these estimates which we are now considering might be referred to a committee which would go into the question at far greater length and in far greater detail than we do in this house, and that would serve a much better purpose. The people would be satisfied that the estimates were receiving more careful consideration than they do under present circumstances. There is no good reason why the estimates of the Department of Labour should not be referred to the committee on industrial and international relations, the estimates of agriculture to the committee on agriculture, the fisheries estimates to the committee on fisheries, and the post office estimates to the committee that deals with Canadian National affairs. If that were done, a good deal of difficulty would be avoided and we would not find ourselves each session in the position in which we are at the moment.

The Prime Minister and the government should take into serious consideration the proposal that when the next session comes around some of these estimates that are being considered in the house might reasonably be sent to various committees where they might receive more detailed study.

There are many matters that I should like to discuss on the question now before the committee; but knowing the desire of the members to wind up the proceedings of the house and in view of the scant attention which the deliberations are receiving at this juncture, I content myself with the suggestion to the Prime Minister that he take into favourable and serious consideration the proposal I have now made for submitting to the various committees of the house estimates that are now discussed in this chamber where they do not receive the best consideration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: My hon. friend has made this suggestion on previous occasions, and I believe I have expressed my sympathy with it. So far as the government is concerned, we should be glad of any step that would help to expedite the business of the house. When the matter has been discussed among members generally, there has been a feeling that in supply members get an opportunity to deal with many matters which they would never be able to discuss otherwise, and some are rather fearful of any change in the present method which would, as they think, somewhat restrict their possible discussion of affairs. I do not myself share that view, and probably, as the matter receives further consideration, we shall get more unanimity of feeling on it. However, during the recess the government will be glad to consider further the suggestion which the hon. gentleman has made.

Mr. HEAPS: I suggest to the Prime Minister that during the next session he might try the proposal with the estimates of two departments. We could see how it worked, and the house could then determine whether it was a proper course to follow.

Mr. COLDWELL: Before discussing the item before the committee I would associate myself with the hon. member for Winnipeg North. I cannot help thinking that this rush of business in the past few days—

The CHAIRMAN: In the last minute or two the discussion has been out of order, but I did not interrupt it. I would, however, ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the item under discussion.

Mr. COLDWELL: I shall be glad to do so. The item under consideration is a labour item, and I feel that parliament is proroguing at the present time with a very grave condition facing the country. We have heard of the difficulties at Vancouver and of the single, transient men there. Although much has been made of the Vancouver situation because of the regrettable incidents which occurred there recently, it is a condition that is to be found in almost every centre of Canada. Yesterday I received from a gentleman in Saskatoon, a former moderator of the Presbyterian church, a letter in which, in discussing another matter, he remarked that he had just come from meeting a group of some fifty single, homeless, transient men whose condition he described as pitiable because there was provision for neither food nor shelter. He remarked how tragic it was that these youths throughout the country were being consigned to a more or less aimless wandering. I had hoped when the minister accepted the portfolio of labour that, while he might not solve the problem—I did not expect that he would—he would be able at least to bring before the house some measures which would meet it in part. Here we are rising at the end of the third session of parliament, with literally thousands of these young men roaming the country without any place to stay in and without provision for food. I feel that at the close of the session this parliament has not done its duty in this particular matter to the young people of Canada.

There are many who think that we can afford to let this problem ride for a little while; that if we have the good crop which is promised in western Canada, a great deal of this transient labour will be absorbed. I do not think so. I believe that if we have a good crop, it will help conditions in Canada quite materially; but, with the high powered machines which now operate on the prairie, very little additional labour will be required for any length of time, and these young men, particularly,—and there are, of course, young women in the same condition—will not be able to earn a sufficient amount of money to look after themselves during the winter months. In my opinion we shall be faced with young men congregating in our centres all across Canada, and the government will face a quite serious situation before the house reassembles. I do not see any really adequate provision to meet this condition. I would urge the Minister of Labour to suggest to the committee, if he is in a position to do so, ways and means of grappling with this problem between now and the time when parliament meets again. I regret that we are rising without having dealt adequately with this problem, which in my opinion is one of two of the gravest problems which this country faces at the present time.

Mr. HANSELL: I wish to ask the minister a question relative to this item and to one or two others. Members of parliament are sometimes uninformed when agreements are entered into with the provinces. Could the minister extend the courtesy which he accorded members last year when he sent them a copy of the youth training agreements? That facilitated tremendously my work. Young men were asking me for information, and I had it because I had a copy of the agreement. Such a facility could be extended in connection with other agreements. I do not mean that members of parliament want to know the details of everything which is going on throughout the whole country; but if, for instance, there is an agreement with the Alberta government concerning something of this kind, it seems to me that the members from Alberta might have the details. The same applies to hon. members in other provinces. I would offer the same suggestion also to the Minister of Agriculture. Very often we are not supplied with the information we should have. Would the minister consider the matter?

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be very glad to consider it, and at the present time I can see no reason why I cannot comply with the request.

Item agreed to.

Special—To provide for outstanding claims for direct relief under the Relief Act, 1935, $33,000.

Mr. ROGERS: I have a slight amendment to make to this. The wording in the supplementary estimates is incorrect, due to a typographical error. It should read "To provide for outstanding claims for drought area relief under the Relief Act, 1935."

The CHAIRMAN: Shall item No. 519 as amended carry?

Item as amended agreed to.

Special—To provide for federal contributions to farm employment and supplementary plans, $1,870,000.

Mr. MASSEY: When we were discussing a matter which now comes under this vote No. 520 in the supplementary estimates, the minister told the house that the province of Ontario had not participated and was not prepared to participate in this scheme, but he had some hopes that this situation might be remedied. I should be very much interested to learn whether any progress has been made with the government of Ontario in regard to this matter.

Mr. ROGERS: This item is intended to provide for the special plans designed to meet the needs of single unemployed men during the winter months. Obviously it is too soon as yet to make approaches to the provinces with regard to their cooperation in such plans. Last year the eastern provinces did not feel that the transient problem or the problem of the single unemployed men within their borders was sufficiently acute to require their cooperation in these plans. The farm employment plans were confined to the prairie provinces, and the forestry conservation plans to the province of British Columbia.

Item agreed to.

Special—To provide for development and training projects for unemployed young people, $1,750,000.

Mr. MASSEY: It is to be regretted beyond all measure of ability to state the matter that this vote should come up at this stage of the session. We were prepared to spend in the last stage of the session an hour or two hours on the discussion of wheat, the life-blood of our agriculture. Now we come to an item which virtually deals with the life-blood of our Canadian people; that is, our Canadian youth; and I am sure one could not be accused of indecent delay if he were to spend a few minutes at least in discussing this item. The minister cannot be blamed for the fact that the item has not come before the committee until this time. At the same time I think we should have some discussion of this matter. I have no intention of making any protracted remarks with respect to it. I have already made my position clear in connection with such a vote as this. But I do think that it would be valuable to the committee if the minister made a statement as to the progress which has been made as a result of the setting up of the youth committee under the employment commission: first what steps have been taken since and how the moneys expended last year were spent. It might save the time of the committee and avoid many questions if the minister were to make such a statement.

Mr. ROGERS: I should like to point out first of all to my hon. friend, while fully agreeing with him on the importance of this item, that under the relief bill and in the debate on the address there was a previous opportunity to discuss this matter. That is to say, he and others have not been confined to this item in discussing the importance of youth training. I have here all the information which he desires. It would take up some time of the committee to give it in tabular form.

Mr. MASSEY: Can it be put on Hansard in that form?

Mr. ROGERS: With the consent of the committee I can place on Hansard a statement: first, a statistical summary of the numbers given training in the various provinces and the type of training received; also, a statement of the amounts allocated to the various provinces:

Total of days work or instruction.....909,609

14,649 young people finished courses designed to train for employment and of these 3,282 or 22·4% found work.

I might say further that, from present indications, all provinces will continue to cooperate during the coming year in the youth training plans.

Mr. MASSEY: I appreciate that. The questions I had in mind were essentially: How many projects have been started under the vote; what are those projects and in what provinces; a detailed statement in regard to the projects of each province and the number registered therein; what organization was required to administer the vote last year; what was its cost, and how were those registered selected?

Mr. ROGERS: The statement I would place on Hansard would be quite comprehensive. Anything that is not included and that the hon. member desires, I shall be glad to send to him personally.

Mr. MASSEY: I realize that. There is one further point, which might not be covered completely by the minister's statement in Hansard and which is very important, namely, in regard to apprenticeship. I realize that there are plans under way, in Ontario particularly, with regard to apprenticeship courses. Would the minister give a statement as to the progress of those particular courses and what are under way for next year?

Mr. ROGERS: I can say to my hon. friend that urban occupational training, which covers apprenticeship and shorter learnership courses, has been adopted in most provinces, but in varying degree. In the large industrial provinces, of course, there is a greater opportunity for this type of work, and we shall do whatever is possible to extend it during the coming year.

Mr. MASSEY: Has the minister found the experience to date satisfactory? In other words, has the employer been ready to cooperate?

Mr. ROGERS: I should say the readiness of employers to cooperate has increased, and on the basis of the experience of last year we believe we will obtain greater cooperation during the coming year.

Mr. MASSEY: Has the minister any plans in connection with those who complete these learnership or apprenticeship courses or whatever projects they may be engaged in, to aid them in securing employment wherever it may offer?

Mr. ROGERS: In some provinces before young men and women are registered in these special courses ultimate employment is found for them on the completion of such courses. We do believe that it will be wise to appoint at least one placement officer, and possibly more in the various provinces, certainly in the larger ones, who will give full time to assisting these young men and women to find their way into employment on the completion of their courses.

Mr. MASSEY: How are those selected who register in these courses?

Mr. ROGERS: They are selected through the Employment Service of Canada, where possible, and there is provision for ultimate approval of men or women in higher age groups, even if they have not come within the original qualification as to age.

Mr. MASSEY: Must they be unemployed?

Mr. ROGERS: Not necessarily unemployed, but the preference is given to those who have been unemployed or whose families have been on relief. The phrase also used is "in necessitous circumstances."

Mr. MASSEY: What is the name of the committee that is operating?

Mr. ROGERS: There is an advisory committee.

Mr. MASSEY: What are the administration expenses of this committee?

Mr. ROGERS: That committee was not actually in operation last year as such; it has been set up only within the present fiscal year. Some of those now serving on this committee were formerly members of the youth employment committee and the women's employment committee, and in future they will serve without remuneration, receiving only their actual travelling expenses. That is all that has been paid so far.

Mr. MASSEY: This vote amounts to $1,750,000, and I was wondering what part of that would apply directly to the training of young people and how much would be expended in administration, travelling expenses, and so on.

Mr. ROGERS: Practically all of it will go for the training of unemployed young people. The administration costs have been very small.

Mr. KENNEDY: Will the statement the minister is going to place on Hansard include the expenditures made by the provinces in connection with these schemes, or has he that information?

Mr. ROGERS: I will see that it includes the amounts allocated to the different provinces.

Mr. KENNEDY: I believe this is on a dollar for dollar basis between the provinces and the dominion?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY: I believe the dominion is paying only dollar for dollar for the actual training, while the provinces have to pay the expenses of transporting the young people to the various training centres. Can the minister tell us the amount expended by each province under this scheme? I should think there would be more expended by the provinces than by the dominion.

Mr. ROGERS: Actually the province assumes certain administrative costs which are not shared by the dominion, but apart from that the costs of the projects are divided equally between the dominion and the provinces?

Mr. KENNEDY: Including the cost of transportation?

Mr. ROGERS: In certain cases it includes the cost of transportation.

Mr. COLDWELL: Has the minister any record of the number of young persons who, having taken these courses, have found employment afterwards in the work in which they were trained?

Mr. ROGERS: Our present figure is twenty-two per cent of those who were actually engaged in occupational training, forestry or mining. Of course that does not apply to the special rural training courses.

Mr. COLDWELL: That is rather a dismal picture.

Mr. ROGERS: I would not consider it so.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, that leaves 78 per cent, and I understand those figures do not include the rural training.

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then I think the picture is rather dark, if only 22 per cent, after taking the training, are able to get positions. That emphasizes the point I made earlier, that we have made no adequate provision for the employment of these young unemployed people. I want to press that upon the minister and the committee.

Mr. ROGERS: Those I have mentioned, of course, are those who have gone direct from training to employment. Certainly I would not consider that for the first year twenty-two per cent was a disappointing figure. Naturally I would wish that it were larger, but we hope to have better results this year.

Mr. COLDWELL: Would it not be well for the department to keep a record of the persons who take this training and have them, within six months or a year, notify the department if employment has been found, in order that we may have an adequate picture?

Mr. ROGERS: That will be given consideration.

Mr. GREEN: Are the younger men among the single transient unemployed in British Columbia being given an opportunity now to go into the forestry training camps and the placer mining camps in that province?

Mr. ROGERS: I believe my hon. friend raised that question before, and I have taken it up with the minister of labour of British Columbia. Actually, following their practice in previous years, they have not admitted to their forestry training projects men who were in the forestry conservation projects during the winter months. That is the position in British Columbia. However, in our agreements with all the provinces, which will be concluded as soon as these estimates pass, we are inserting a clause which will provide that there shall not be discrimination against non-resident transients; in other words, that they shall be given at least some opportunity to secure training under these plans.

Mr. GREEN: We have these younger men in British Columbia among the single transient group, and is the minister going to insist that they be given an opportunity to go into, or that they be placed in, these camps, or is it all going to be left to the province?

Mr. ROGERS: That question is still under consideration between the dominion and the provincial governments.

Mr. GREEN: Are the men registered? I notice, according to the press, that a registration was to be carried out.

Mr. ROGERS: The registration has not proceeded as quickly as was hoped originally. That has been due not to a lack of facilities but apparently to reluctance on the part of some of the leaders of the relief project workers' union to expedite the registration.

Mr. GREEN: Attempts are being made to register them?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. MASSEY: Have all the provinces already indicated their willingness to cooperate during the coming year, and particularly during the coming winter?

Mr. ROGERS: I have already stated that all the provinces have indicated their willingness to cooperate.

Mr. MASSEY: How many young persons between the ages of sixteen and thirty, say, are unemployed at the moment?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not that information available at the moment. I shall be glad to secure it and send it to my hon. friend.

Item agreed to.

Special—To provide, in cooperation with the provinces, for rehabilitation of unemployed persons, $500,000.

Mr. GREEN: This is something new. Apparently it is carrying out one of the recommendations of the Purvis commission. What type of rehabilitation is to be carried on?

Mr. ROGERS: We are following the same course here that we did with the youth training projects. That is to say, we are asking the provinces to submit training projects for older unemployed men, which will be most likely to bring about their reestablishment in the particular province. We are asking the provinces to submit these projects to us for study and approval before they are adopted.

Mr. GREEN: Have no projects been submitted yet?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, from one province there have been. But the hon. member will understand that the vote itself has not been passed. Letters have gone out to all the provinces asking them to submit proposals.

Item agreed to.

Amount required to provide for administration expenses generally, including salaries and travelling expenses; unemployment relief branch, $211,500; national registration, $110,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This would seem to be the appropriate place for me to say that since we last had under discussion the conditions of unemployment I have seen the Hon. Wesley Gordon, former minister of labour, and he informs me that the copy of a letter attached to a public file and marked "personal" from Ralph Webb was not to the best of his belief and knowledge on the file when he left the office. Secondly, I have looked in my own personal files, and I find no trace of any such document being received from Mr. Webb. But I assume it did come to the office. He was advised, I notice, that the Hon. Mr. Murphy, then Minister of the Interior, would go to Manitoba and investigate the whole situation there, that he did so, that the very persons who were discussing the matter in this house were publicly in favour of the work being done, and that after conferences with the provincial government the Minister of the Interior did so advise, and that action was taken.

Further, Mr. Gordon informs me that the reason it was determined that no further work should be carried on after the date of the election was that the time for the writs had expired, and as the now Prime Minister had been criticizing the action of the government in entering into contracts, contracts entered into after that date contained the provision that no further commitments should be made after the election, and that they could then be the subject matter of further consideration.

Lastly, it is wholly in violation of all the rules that govern that a personal and private letter marked "personal and confidential" should be submitted to parliament; for the privilege is not the privilege of the receiver but that of the sender. When Hon. Vincent Massey wrote a letter to Hon. Arthur Meighen marked "personal," even after he had gone into the government, and Mr. Meighen asked him to release the privilege, he declined to do so. It was recognized in all quarters that that was the privilege of the sender or the writer of a letter, and not of the receiver or addressee. Upon that we have acted continuously, including shall I say the case in which Mr. Abramsky says he had a personal letter from the minister. Whether he has or not I cannot say. But the privilege is the privilege of the minister, and not of the receiver of the letter. I say this in view of the definite knowledge I have, and which can be further supported when occasion necessitates.

Mr. ROGERS: I should add first of all that the letter to which my right hon. friend has referred was on the file. I was not aware that it was on the file until the file was requested. But there is no question whatsoever as to the letter having been on the file.

Mr. BENNETT: When was it put there?

Mr. ROGERS: I assume it was there from the beginning; I have no reason to assume otherwise.

Mr. BENNETT: I have, and so has Mr. Gordon.

Mr. ROGERS: As to the question with respect to the termination of the work, as I recall it that was not a point at issue. The particular agreement to which the right hon. gentleman refers called for the beginning of the work—

Mr. BENNETT: No; that the work should not proceed beyond October 10.

Mr. ROGERS: It was required that the work should begin as of a certain date.

Mr. BENNETT: October 10.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, October 10. That had occurred on rare occasions before, but not to my knowledge during the last three years—certainly not under any agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I say Mr. Gordon tells me that it was limited entirely to the work that arose after the date of the return of the writs. Instructions were issued that such provision should be made with respect to all expenditures. In other words, if the government was defeated, the new incoming administration should not be bound to pay any commitments for expenditures after the date of the return of the writs.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not wish to labour the point, but the agreement actually contained a clause requiring that the work should begin on October 10.

Mr. BENNETT: No—

Mr. ROGERS: That it must begin at least before October 10.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Copies of that letter were sent to Hon. R. J. Manion and Hon. Mr. Lawson. Once a letter is sent to four or five people, surely, taking my right hon. friend's own view, the letter ceases to be private and confidential, and this was a copy. The copy has been circulated all over the country.

Mr. BENNETT: The copies were each marked "personal and confidential."

Mr. BEAUBIEN: But when a man writes a personal and confidential letter, has he the right to send a copy to everybody?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The point is that the letter which was addressed to Mr. Gordon making a request was not marked personal, confidential or private. It was a public letter signed by Mr. Webb and appeared on the files as such. It would have been improper that it should not be there. That letter contained a reference to an enclosure, which the original letter said was of importance as giving the reasons why the request made in the original letter should be carried out. That letter was attached to the formal public letter, and I submit the minister or anyone in his department would have been violating every sound rule if he had detached from a letter, which was a public letter, any part of the communication which was referred to in it as an enclosure, and which was intended to explain the letter itself.

May I say something in regard to what my right hon. friend has just said with respect to publicity to be given letters marked "private and confidential." He himself made a statement on the subject on May 30 of this year.

Mr. BENNETT: He certainly did.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: And I should like to read it. Speaking on May 30, the right hon. gentleman is reported at page 3337 of Hansard in these words:

> Right Hon. R. B. Bennett (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the issue is far larger than a controversy between the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) and an hon. member of the house. It is a matter of extraordinary importance. I do not think any words I could use would be language too strong to employ in dealing with the matter.
> A member of a public tribunal created by this parliament has seen fit to write a letter to a member of a firm which does business with this country. There cannot be anything personal about that, if it touches public business.

This letter touched public business. It was wholly and solely concerned with public business.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it was not.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Then it was concerned with political organization, I suppose; that is the only other thing. But the one was inseparable from the other.

> There cannot be anything personal about that, if it touches public business. He can write about visiting the city, or he can write about social engagements, but the minute he touches upon public business he has no privacy.

That was the position taken by my right hon. friend, namely that he may talk about anything, such as visiting the city, or social engagements—

Mr. BENNETT: Or political organization.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He said:

> —but the minute he touches upon public business he has no privacy. He cannot protect himself by putting "personal" on the letter, and the rights of the House of Commons so much transcend that that I trust the minister will not arrive at a hasty conclusion with respect to it.
> I wonder if he realizes just what is involved. I had occasion to traverse this matter with a great deal of care some years ago when I was leader of the opposition, as I still am. I had difficulty in dealing with a matter in which certain correspondence was marked "private." The minister properly took the view that it had to be introduced and was on the file.

That was the statement of my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, because it was on the file. And this was not on the file.

Mr. ROGERS: The leader of the opposition has suggested that this letter was not on the file. That is an extraordinary suggestion.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the minister's suggestion, I say.

Mr. ROGERS: It is an extraordinary suggestion.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not at all.

Mr. ROGERS: If the leader of the opposition has received any information which would indicate that any members of the Department of Labour altered the files in any way, I wish he would give it to me here and now.

Mr. BENNETT: I will deal with the first question first. The Prime Minister read my statements with respect to the Minister of Transport. That represents my considered opinion with respect to a matter which was discussed with the right hon. the leader of the government, and it referred to a file which had to do with post office matters. We came to the conclusion that when you deal with public business you cannot escape the publication of it by merely putting "personal" on it. It also had to do with questions raised in connection with pensions. But the present letter, dealing with a political matter, marked "personal and confidential," is a privileged communication, and always has been in this house, unless the writer of the letter removes the privilege. That is his privilege, not somebody else's. I think the most striking case of this kind was that concerning a letter written by Hon. Vincent Massey to the present Conservative leader in the senate, Right Hon. Arthur Meighen. He marked that letter "personal," and in view of the fact that he had become a political factor in the life of the country, Mr. Meighen desired that Mr. Massey should remove that privilege. He declined to do so, and after careful investigation Mr. Meighen was satisfied that he could not use or publish that letter unless he had the consent of the writer. That is his privilege, not somebody else's. So far as the other feature of it it is concerned, it is the considered opinion of the former minister that he did not leave that letter on that file.

Mr. ROGERS: Where could it come from?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what he would like to know.

Mr. ROGERS: It was attached to his letter.

Mr. BENNETT: It was there in 1936 and 1937 but it was never produced in this house. The motion was made on the sixth and acceded to on the ninth. The return was made so hurriedly that it was signed by the Minister of Labour for the Secretary of State. The return had to do with correspondence between two dates, one in August and one in October. The former Minister of Labour has no detailed recollection of it; all he says is that to the best of his belief and knowledge that letter was not on the file when he left that office. That is his view.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. ROGERS: The only answer to that is that the letter was there when the file was examined. I have said already that I had no knowledge that the letter was there until the file was requested. The file was requested by a member of this house who was particularly interested in the construction of those roads.

Mr. BENNETT: Apparently he had knowledge of the fact that the letter was there.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I deny that I had any knowledge.

Mr. BENNETT: We know differently.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: My right hon. friend knows that if he looks through his files he will find a copy of that letter.

Mr. BENNETT: I have had my files searched carefully, and I took the trouble myself to do it. There is no letter or copy of that letter on my personal file. But in my opinion some such letter was received from Mr. Webb, for he was advised in four lines that Hon. Mr. Murphy, then Minister of the Interior, was going to western Canada and would investigate the whole question in connection with rust and drought. Those matters were mentioned separately. He did so, and the very hon. member who has just spoken was one of those who urged that the work should be done. The work was continued after October, but has not yet been completed.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: My right hon. friend cannot deny that the work was started with the object of winning three seats and not to give work to those who needed it.

Mr. BENNETT: I say no such thing—just the opposite.

Mr. MacNEIL: I cannot allow this vote to pass without a brief reference to the unfortunate disturbance that occurred in Vancouver on June 19. I have already stated my views with regard to that situation. I regard it as a terrible blot on the record of this administration. Since this matter was last discussed in the house several points have come into view which I should like to bring to the attention of the committee. We have had an opportunity to examine the sessional paper containing the correspondence and telegrams exchanged between the department and the departmental representative in Vancouver and the department of labour in Victoria. I cannot condemn too definitely the incompetence of the departmental representative in Vancouver, Mr. Mitchell. I have carefully read his communications to the minister, and in my opinion he made no attempt, while staying at the hotel Vancouver in Vancouver or the Empress hotel in Victoria, to do anything more than send clippings and quotations to the minister. There is no indication that he made any effort to effect a conciliation or to ease the continuation of the situation. On the contrary he definitely minimized the gravity of the situation and emphasized what he termed to be the subversive character of the leadership. He told the minister that the patience of the men would be worn down and they would disperse.

Mr. ROGERS: I have already pointed out that Mr. Mitchell, whom I have found to be a most competent officer of the Department of Labour and who was a former member of this house, was sent to Vancouver to keep me advised of any developments in that situation and to serve as a medium of communication with the provincial government, if that should appear desirable. Mr. Mitchell carried out both of those orders. He was not authorized to deal directly with the single unemployed men, for the simple reason that the provincial government was dealing with the matter.

Mr. MacNEIL: The sessional papers disclose that Mr. Mitchell entered into frequent consultation with Mr. Pearson and with the mayor of Vancouver. Such influence as he may have had on the situation was exercised in the wrong direction. I have before me a copy of his telegram to the minister under date of June 17, from which I quote:

> John Stanton, president, youth council, on return from Victoria to-day said, "Premier Pattullo and Hon. G. S. Pearson made it clear the government would do nothing for the unemployed in the post office."

Then follow what are apparently Mr. Mitchell's own words:

> We hope to prevent the trip to Victoria on Sunday. Now I suppose they will go anyway but I don't believe they will get anywhere.

As an answer to his emphasis on the subversive leadership, I should like to quote from an editorial that appeared in the Vancouver Daily Province of June 24, reading as follows:

> The public knows, unquestionably, if Mr. Pearson does not, that the subversive element among the transient unemployed, though present, has been numerically small and that is the reason for public sympathy for the unemployed and public criticism of the governments at Victoria and Ottawa.
>
> The public knows that the men who immured themselves for a month in two of Vancouver's public buildings were neither reds nor scalawags nor hoodlums, but of the fair average type of young Canadians—men who want work, and would be happy to get it, men who want to get on in the world but find themselves frustrated by the turn of events.
> If these men have yielded to so-called subversive influences, they have, of course, made a mistake. But the mistake is entirely understandable—much more understandable than the government's harsh and narrow and immutable policy. The subversive influences at least seemed to offer a hope. The governments to which the men had a right to turn in their distress offered nothing but insults and flouts and starvation.

There is one further point I desire to make. The photographs taken prove beyond a shadow of a doubt that inexcusable brutality was used to evict the men from the post office and that the officers and the police, acting as we understand on the orders of the federal government, as is indicated by the sessional papers, singled out the leaders of the men and used clubs and lengths of water hose upon them until they were insensible. These men are at present in the hospital in Vancouver. That is something that should not be condoned by this government. That day is rightly called "bloody Sunday" in Vancouver because of the inexcusable brutality used upon these men who are properly described by the words I have just quoted.

Mr. ROGERS: There is one other point arising from an item which was passed previously by the committee. The leader of the opposition drew the attention of the committee to some direct charges that had been made against the superintendent of the employment office in Kingston, Ontario. I said I would bring these charges to the immediate attention of the superintendent of the employment services in the Ontario government.

Mr. BENNETT: They were investigated.

Mr. ROGERS: They were investigated, yes. I wish to place on the table of the house a letter from Mr. Rigg, director of unemployment, to Mr. Hudson, general superintendent for Ontario, and a copy of a report made by Mr. Hudson to the minister of labour of the Ontario government. My right hon. friend fully acknowledged at the time that the superintendent of the employment office in Kingston was a provincial official.

Mr. BENNETT: All of them are.

Mr. ROGERS: Therefore the report was properly made to the minister of labour of Ontario. I should like to refer to it very briefly. One charge was that Mr. Mooers had given his services to those who had offered to do him special favours. The basis of that charge was a statement made by Mr. Leggatt before the magistrate's court in Kingston.

Mr. BENNETT: There were others as well.

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Hudson interviewed Mr. Leggatt, and Mr. Hudson says in his report:

> When I interviewed Mr. Leggatt he was absolutely unable to provide me with the name of one individual whom he knew, from his personal knowledge, had obtained employment by adopting the course of action indicated in his remarks, namely, by the purchase of beer for the Kingston office superintendent.

I cross-examined him carefully on this point for at least five minutes, offering to take him anywhere in Kingston or to go to any address however remote where substantiation of his charges might possibly be obtained. He could not even give me the name of anyone who might have definite information, and I am submitting for your consideration my conclusion therefore, that the statement made in court was without adequate foundation in fact.

The second charge was that the superintendent was not performing his duties properly because of drunkenness. On that point Mr. Hudson states:

A very thorough investigation in Kingston convinces me that the word "drunken" is too strong an adjective to apply to Mr. Mooers, although it is admitted that he is not a teetotaller. I have made unannounced visits to Kingston at least twenty times during the past four years, and never once have I found Mr. Mooers absent from duty during office hours, and never once has there been the slightest evidence of his having indulged in beer or any other intoxicating beverage during business hours.

I am sorry to take up time with this matter; but on the other hand it was raised before, and as the investigation was made by Mr. Hudson, I felt I ought to provide the information, which I now lay on the table of the house.

Mr. BENNETT: I would regard the investigation as wholly inadequate. It is general knowledge in Kingston that the last finding cannot be justified.

Item agreed to.

Grants-in-aid—Amount required to provide for monthly grants-in-aid to the provinces, $17,500,000.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): The gross expenditure for relief in Toronto in the first five months of this year was reduced from $3,591,420 to $3,481,159, a reduction of $110,461. That is the gross expenditure. The estimated amount of the government contribution to that city has been reduced from $2,430,000 to $2,106,601, a reduction of $323,399. There has been a net increase in the cost of relief in Toronto of $213,138 for the first five months of the year, which on a yearly basis would be about $500,000. In other words, that city is bearing about one-fourth of the total reduction in this vote. I want to protest against the reduction in the government's contribution to relief because the taxpayers of Toronto are burdened just about as heavily as they can stand at the present time. What is the use of trying to do something about housing when taxes are so high? Why was that reduction made?

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. ROGERS: Actually there has been no reduction in recent months. As my hon. friend is aware, the amount paid monthly during the winter months was $465,000 to Ontario in the last quarter, or 30 per cent of the actual costs, whichever sum was the lower. There has been no reduction since then. The amount of $465,000 per month is being continued to Ontario, governed by the 30 per cent principle, namely, that the amount paid shall be either $465,000 or 30 per cent of the total cost, whichever sum is the lower.

Item agreed to.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT

Air Service—Civil Aviation division—Airways and airports—Operation and maintenance including lighting, radio and meteorological services—further amount required, $50,000.

Mr. GREEN: What is the present position with regard to trans-Canada airways, when are operations expected to commence and over what portion of the route?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Since March 1, the mail service has been operated between Winnipeg and Vancouver. On the first of July a day and night mail service, that is two services a day, will be operated over that part of the route. Experimental flying is being conducted from Winnipeg to Kapuskasing, and I believe, although I am not sure, that mail is being carried over part of that distance. Facilities at the eastern end are nearing completion. The Malton airport at Toronto we expect to be ready about the first of August, and the same with regard to North Bay. It is expected by that time a mail service can be carried from coast to coast. The carriage of passengers has been held back to some extent on account of shortage of equipment, but the balance of our equipment will be delivered in August, and I sincerely trust that the route from Vancouver to Montreal and Toronto will be in full operation not later than September 1, for mail, passengers and express.

Mr. GREEN: This year?

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The services conducted to date indicate that a very high operating efficiency has been maintained which has been entirely satisfactory to the Post Office Department, and there has been no accident of any kind to life or property.

Mr. GREEN: We hear very little of the transatlantic service. What progress is being made with that?

Mr. HOWE: My understanding is that the first flight will be made between the tenth and fourteenth of July. It is a flight on an experimental basis, trying out a type of equipment not previously used over this route.

Mr. GREEN: There will be nothing but experimental flights this year?

Mr. HOWE: That is all.

Mr. BENNETT: How many men were brought in from the United States to assist in managing our airways?

Mr. HOWE: Five.

Mr. BENNETT: What are their relative positions?

Mr. HOWE: One is Mr. Johnson, vice-president in charge of operations, with his assistant, Mr. Collyer, stationed in Winnipeg. We have one man in charge of radio training, Mr. Stevens, and then we have Mr. Snaith, who was born in Canada, naturalized in the United States, and is now being repatriated. We count him one of the five. He is chief pilot. Then Mr. Lee is in charge of the technical training of pilots.

Mr. BENNETT: Were any of them British subjects?

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Snaith was born in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Are any of them British subjects?

Mr. HOWE: None of those five. They are the only ones on the line who are not British subjects.

Item agreed to.

Airways and airports—Construction and improvements including lighting and radio facilities (capital)—further amount required, $800,000.

Mr. BARBER: It was my intention to take up at some length under this item the question of airports in the lower Fraser valley, but I shall not do so at this stage. Since this matter was last discussed in the house, I have received a return which bears out what I said in regard to influence being used in the selection of landing fields. When this matter was under discussion before, the minister stated that he would investigate the Chilliwack field and the Langley field, and that he might possibly make a trip out there this summer. If I could receive an assurance from the minister that he will look into this matter and give it his careful personal attention, I should be satisfied to let the item pass.

Mr. HOWE: I am glad to give that assurance. The fields that are being fully developed to-day are the one hundred mile fields that are essential to the operation of trans-Canada. The matter of secondary fields has been entirely suspended until the necessary fields for the operation of the trans-Canada line are completed. However, I shall be in Vancouver this summer and shall be pleased to drop in at both sites.

Mr. BENNETT: If the minister will take the file with him, he will see that there is direct interference with respect to the acquisition of the field. I took some part in the debate that occurred, and the minister said that he would look into the matter. I have gone over the file, and I have the letters. It is clear that orders were given to clean it up by direct instructions of the minister, and it would seem that action was not taken. If he says he will look into it, that covers the matter, but he should see the file.

Mr. HOWE: All this happened before I had anything to do with it.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite so.

Mr. BARBER: I wish to make it clear that the present minister is not to blame. This took place under the department as it was before, and I absolve the present minister of any blame in regard to the development or non-development of any of these fields. I shall be pleased to meet him this summer or arrange for him to see the property.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): When will the island airport be completed, and what percentage of the service will operate therefrom? What arrangement has been made for connecting the island with the city of Toronto?

Mr. HOWE: The island airport and the Malton airport are really matters for the city of Toronto. They are both municipal fields. All we had to do with the situation there was to examine the fields chosen by the city of Toronto, give approval for flying purposes and contribute roughly one-quarter towards the development of the fields. Any arrangements made for the use of the field are made by those desiring to use it, and they are made direct with the managers of the airport. Trans-Canada Air Lines has made an arrangement for the use of both fields. I have not seen the details of the arrangement, and therefore I am not familiar with the matter. I assume that whenever weather conditions permit, the island airport will be used, and whenever the weather is difficult, Malton will be resorted to.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): If the air lines use the island airport what arrangement will be made to take passengers to the city?

Mr. HOWE: I have no knowledge of that. I have heard the suggestion that there will be a ferry across, but it will be entirely up to the municipality and the users.

Item agreed to.

To provide for assisting municipalities to improve existing airports or to provide new airports—further amount required, $500,000.

Mr. BENNETT: I was asked whether or not some were favoured as against others, and I said I understood that there was a fixed rule established from which there was no departure. Is that correct?

Mr. HOWE: That is not altogether correct. In building the line it has been found impossible always to get the necessary facilities. In Calgary, for example, we needed an airport, and the city was unable to provide it. In that instance we made the only arrangement that was workable. We said that if the city provided the land and undertook to operate the airport, we would build it. In Lethbridge we had to go beyond the proportion simply in order to get the field into condition to operate. That, however, was done because they needed it.

Mr. BENNETT: Public necessity.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. There are no others treated in that way.

Item agreed to.

Railway service—specials—Amount to be applied towards the actual cost of construction work for the protection, safety and convenience of the public in respect of highway crossings of railways as the governor in council may from time to time determine, $1,000,000.

Mr. COLDWELL: I would impress upon the minister the extreme need for proper protection at railway crossings. A large number of accidents are occurring, and I believe it is at times impossible on account of drainage and other conditions to build subways or bridges. Does the minister contemplate a large expenditure this year on the installation of safety devices? If so, would he consider looking into Canadian devices, of which I believe there are some. The majority of those now in use for the protection of crossings, are, I understand, of United States origin.

Mr. HOWE: The minister has absolutely nothing to do with the expenditure of the fund, which is administered entirely by the board of railway commissioners.

Mr. BENNETT: On public application made by the municipality.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The application comes from interested parties.

Mr. COLDWELL: But this is public money, and perhaps the minister, if it is at all possible, will see to it that Canadian equipment is used.

Mr. HOWE: In so far as I have anything to do with the matter, I shall be glad to consider the suggestion.

Item agreed to.

Special—To provide for contribution to cost of railway projects now needed but which have been deferred under present conditions, $850,000.

Mr. BENNETT: This looks like a deferred maintenance item which should be in another place.

Mr. HOWE: It is similar to the vote put through in the first session of this parliament. The purpose is for cooperation with the railways to absorb unemployment.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, that is what it is for.

Mr. HOWE: Yes. The contribution that we shall make will not be more than the actual labour involved in the project.

Mr. BENNETT: That is sufficient to identify it. It did not indicate on the face of it what it was.

Item agreed to.

Government Owned Enterprises
(Non-active Accounts)

Canadian National Railway Company

Amount not exceeding $42,000,000 to be paid from time to time, under such conditions as the Minister of Finance may prescribe, to the Canadian National Railway Company (hereinafter called "the national company") and to be applied by the national company in payment of the deficit arising in the calendar year 1938, including such supplementary contribution to the intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railway employees' provident fund as may be necessary to provide for payment in full of monthly allowances under the provisions of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway Employees' Provident Fund Act notwithstanding, the limitation contained in section four of the said act, and including such supplementary contribution to the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada superannuation and provident fund as may be necessary to enable payment to be made of monthly allowances under the rules and regulations of the fund, notwithstanding the limitation contained in section thirteen of chapter sixty-five of the Statutes of Canada, 1874, but not including amounts charged to proprietor's equity of the national railway system as defined in chapter twenty-two of the Statutes of Canada, 1937—

Canadian National Railways, exclusive of eastern lines, $39,900,000.

Eastern lines, $2,100,000.

Mr. BENNETT: These amounts have been considered by the special committee?

Mr. HOWE: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Acting Minister of Finance) moved:

Mr. BENNETT: And to-day—July 1.

Mr. ILSLEY: That has been covered previously.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

SUPPLY BILL

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Acting Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of ways and means.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. ILSLEY moved:

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 176, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the fiscal year ending the 31st March, 1939.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

RIGHT HON. R. B. BENNETT

REPORTED RETIREMENT FROM PARTY LEADERSHIP—OBSERVATIONS OF THE PRIME MINISTER

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): This concludes the work of the present session so far as the sitting of this house is concerned. As hon. members are aware, my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has indicated that he does not intend to continue in the office of leader of the Conservative party, and therefore may not be sitting where he is to-day when the house resumes at its next session. We have sat opposite each other for some eleven years in our capacity as leaders of our respective political parties, and I should not like to allow this moment to go by without just a parting word to my right hon. friend. He has indicated, as I have said, his desire to retire from the leadership of his party for reasons that are known to all of us. However, since his first intimation was given there have been persistent rumours to the effect that my right hon. friend might still be persuaded to continue in the position which he now holds. The last announcement we have had on the subject which I have regarded as at all authoritative were his words, as reported, that he had no desire to succeed himself as leader of his party. That may be his personal desire, but desires may be overruled by the persuasion of the coming Conservative convention. Not being too sure what the outcome of the convention may be, I do not think I should attempt at this moment to go too far in the way of pronouncing a eulogy upon my right hon. friend. For that reason I shall simply content myself by saying to him, "Au revoir, but not good-bye."

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I cannot find terms adequately to express my grateful appreciation of the observations of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). We have sat opposite one another for eleven years. Sometimes our relations have been very cordial, and other times they were not. We have both given and taken. I should think that probably I have given as much as I have taken, and taken as much as I have given. It is all part of the rough and tumble of public life. It is a tiresome task. It is a wearying task. It is an ungrateful task. Yet someone must discharge public duties. Sometimes the lot falls on one and sometimes on another.

In a country like this, where we have so few accumulations, it is almost impossible for a man to adopt public life as a career. I wish we had provision in our universities for endowments which would enable young men to undertake great public service to the state. Whether they be in office or out of office is not a matter of importance. Sometimes one is able out of office to render as useful service to the state as if he were in office. The only thing is to endeavour to keep in mind always some thought of the nation as a whole. Here it is the first day of July, 1938. He would be a bold man indeed who would say that the sense of Canadian unity is anything like as great as we should like to have it; and he would be a bold man who would say that there are not in operation forces that we fain would destroy, that do not conduce to that unity of thought, of purpose and of action which is essential to the development of a national outlook in this dominion.

I have tried to keep that thought in mind. I think perhaps I had better say to my colleagues in the house that this is not the time to deliver a valedictory; and while I have expressed myself as clearly as I can as to what is my own position, I shall never forget your kindness at times or your cruelty at others, and I again thank the Prime Minister.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as the oldest member of this house in point of service, and representing more particularly a certain section and element of the population of Canada, I wish to pay a tribute to my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). We have fought many battles; we have differed, at times violently; but I must say that my association with the right hon. gentleman has always been of the finest kind. I am pleased to have been associated with him, and personally, as well as in his capacity in the public life of the country, I am pleased to render him my warmest tribute and homage. At the first session after he was selected as the leader of his party, I said he was a fine type of Canadian manhood, and I wish to repeat those words on this, his last day as leader of his party.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sorry that the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) had not spoken before I said what I had to say, because two speeches in the form of valedictories are too much for this assembly to listen to in one day. I should like to say this, however. I went to the province of Quebec a stranger. I went into the small communities, and I shall never forget as long as I live the kindness, the hospitality and the courtesy that I was shown there on every occasion. It has always been a matter of regret to me that I have not been able to see more of the people of that province. Certainly the relations between the Minister of Justice and myself, strained though at times they were, have always been characterized by courtesy and kindness when we removed that veneer which sometimes is the result of political associations and partisan views. At heart we have never had any differences. We belong to the same profession; we have been members of the same associations; we know some of the vicissitudes of public life, and I shall never forget his rising in his place to-day and, in the face of many political differences, expressing himself in such a kindly manner.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, as one of the representatives of Alberta I should like to take this opportunity to express our happiness and satisfaction that the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) is an Alberta product. His heart and soul were in that province. I think we have always been proud of his stalwart defence of Canadian and British unity and greatness. There are those who do not understand the social credit movement which I represent. Let me take this occasion to state this: that man is deliberately deluding himself who persists in believing that the movement which to-day is outstanding in Alberta is any less enthusiastic for Canadian and British unity and greatness than is the illustrious right hon. leader of the opposition. If at times it seems that this is not so it is simply because we are not understood.

I rejoice greatly in tendering to the right hon. gentleman the tribute of respect which I think we all feel for him, whether or not we agree with his political and economic ideas. Throughout Canada it is believed, I think, that to the extent of his ability all during his public life he has honestly and sincerely discharged his duties.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I hope the right hon. leader of the opposition and other hon. members of the house will excuse me if I leave at this time. It is part of my official duties to meet the deputy of the governor general when he arrives for prorogation, and I shall have to leave the house for that purpose.

Mr. A. A. HEAPS (Winnipeg North): I feel sure that if the leader of our group had been in his seat at this time he would have been extremely happy to associate himself with the sentiments that have been expressed to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). It may be true that the right hon. gentlemen has had his heart and soul in the province of Alberta, but I think his real heart and soul have been in the work carried on in this chamber. I can think of no one in this house who has given more time and attention to the work carried on here than has the right hon. leader of the opposition. If I were to be asked who was the hardest working member of this house I think I would give first place to him. I believe many of us who try to follow the work done here, who give as much time to it as we possibly can, often sit and marvel at the way the right hon. gentleman attends here day after day, week after week, concentrating upon his work, and at the wealth of information which he has drawn upon in connection with many of the important questions that have come before us from time to time. Whether he continues to be leader of the opposition or whether he remains in this house as a private member, I feel sure that to those of us who have been associated with him the work he has done in this chamber in the past will always be worthy of the highest traditions of this parliament. I am sure many of us would exceedingly regret it if the right hon. gentleman should cease to be a member of this chamber, because it is difficult to think of this house without him. However, whether he retains the leadership of his party or whether he becomes a private member of the house, we wish him all good health and happiness.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, I trust the hon. members who have paid such eloquent tribute to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) will not leave this chamber this afternoon with an entirely erroneous impression as to his retirement from public service. I have known the leader of the opposition for very many years, ever since, in the autumn of 1890, he commenced his law studies at the Dalhousie School of Law at Halifax. He was then a young man, avid for information. In his second year he received an appointment as assistant law librarian of the law school, in order that he might successfully complete his law studies, as he did in 1893. I have been associated with him more or less closely ever since. He then started out on a great career, with high aspirations for Canada and for the empire of which Canada forms a part. Never throughout his public career has there been any wavering from that high ideal which inspired him when I first heard him delivering addresses in the old Sodales Club of Dalhousie University.

But do not rest under any misapprehension. Though the present leader of the opposition may possibly leave this chamber, he certainly cannot altogether retire from political life, and he will not, I think, cease to exercise a very powerful influence upon the public opinion of this country, and I trust a still more powerful influence upon the public life of the empire of which we form a part.

GOVERNOR GENERAL'S SPEECH

After which His Honour the Deputy Governor General was pleased to close the third session of the eighteenth parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following speech:

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

In bringing the present session to a close, I desire to express my appreciation of the careful attention given the many measures submitted for your consideration.

International relations and domestic conditions continue to be affected by conflict, disorders and tensions in different parts of the world. The disturbed situation abroad, and prolonged and unprecedented drought in western Canada, have, unfortunately, somewhat retarded recovery. Improvement in economic conditions has, however, been more steadily maintained in Canada than in many other countries. Gratifying factors in the situation are the further diminution in the numbers on relief, and the progressive and substantial reductions in the deficits in the national accounts. The outlook for agriculture in the west is more hopeful than it has been for some years.

An outstanding feature of the session has been the adoption of measures constituting a long-range nation-wide program of conservation and development, designed to stimulate employment and enlarge the national income. They include a comprehensive housing scheme, under which special assistance will be afforded in the construction of houses to be owned by families of limited means, and of housing accommodation in urban centres to be leased at less than economic rentals.

The dominion has undertaken to pay a substantial proportion of municipal real estate taxes, over a three-year period, on new houses erected before the end of 1940, and to make loans, at low interest rates, to municipalities to enable them to undertake projects of a self-liquidating character.

The housing program has been further aided, and increased activity in the construction industry fostered by the exemption from sales tax of materials entering into the construction of houses and other buildings.

Under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, further progress has been made, in the development and conservation of water supplies, and the formation of community pasture areas where lands are not suitable for cultivation.

Appropriations have been made for the continuation, on a broader scale, of the youth training program, and for its extension to include persons of older age.

Provision has been made for the complete nationalization of the Bank of Canada through the acquisition by the government of the ownership, in its entirety, of the capital stock of the bank.

The Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada has been superseded by a Board of Transport Commissioners, with authority in respect of transport by air and water, as well as by rail.

The trans-Canada air service is now operating a regular air mail schedule over a considerable area of the dominion. It is expected that, at an early date, a coast to coast service will be in operation.

The provisions of the criminal code relating to the improper driving of motor vehicles have been made more stringent. Other important amendments have been adopted.

The War Veterans' Allowance Act has been amended to provide for veterans who, although not totally incapacitated, are incapable of maintaining themselves, and for those who served in South Africa and were domiciled in Canada at the time of their enlistment.

The registration of shop cards has been authorized, a measure which has been advocated for many years by labour unions in Canada.

The special committee of the House of Commons on Elections and Franchise Acts has given careful study to the means employed to effect redistribution in Canada and other countries, and to proposals with respect to political expenditures. A new Dominion Elections Act has been enacted.

Considerable progress has been made in the negotiations which, for several months past, have been carried on with the government of the United States, with a view to revising and extending the trade agreement concluded in 1935. It is hoped the negotiations will result in a comprehensive Agreement, which will facilitate the further development of trade between the two countries.

Members of the House of Commons:

I thank you for the provision you have made for the public sevice.

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

In taking leave of you at this time, I pray that the blessing of Divine Providence may rest upon your labours.

This concluded the third session of the eighteenth parliament.

END OF VOLUME IV.
