I understand that the minister has also been very fully advised by the Indian agent on the spot. Surely his understanding, training, and devotion to the service should also be set on the scales in this matter. It is possible that some advantage might develop from civil marriages to avoid the present farcical practices. Marriages could later be solemnized for Christian members of Christian churches, but do not let us perpetuate this evil of the potlatch, as it is now being perpetuated.

Mr. NEILL: As I represent the district in which these horrible orgies are supposed to have taken place, it is perhaps my duty to say something in defence of these poor Indians whose character and reputation have been so bitterly and unfairly assailed. I yield to no one in this house in my regard for the good qualities of heart and mind of the hon. member for Nanaimo, but his judgment is negligible; that is the trouble.

I have listened with amused horror to his remarks which contained a little bit of sordid truth, very much exaggerated, and an immensity of imagination which would make another volume of Grimm's fairy tales. The two mixed together have produced the treatise which the hon. member has read. These people live from 200 to 250 miles away from the district which the hon. gentleman represents. They are in the far northern part of the district I represent.

In some respects we are a peculiar people in Comox-Alberni, in a scriptural sense, and we do not very much care for outside interference. We somehow think we are capable of looking after our own political affairs, and we believe in doing as we would be done by. Six months ago I was asked to go down to the district represented by the hon. member and to interfere in a matter connected with the Indians. But it was purely a local trouble, one which had nothing to do with my district; and as it had nothing to do with provincial rights or interests I declined. I recommended that they go to the hon. member who I said I knew was a man of good intention and of good heart, and one who would do what he could. I was doing only as I would be done by. Therefore we hesitate to be guided by the advice of the hon. member.

So far as his statements are concerned, he has been talking out of the dead past. Let us realize that the passage of the Indian from savagery to civilization has been one which has taken place in two generations. In the case of the white man, it has been ten centuries. He is trying to compare the one with the other. If we are going to do that, we shall have to go back to the days when maidens were sacrificed on the altars of the Druids. That has long since passed. It is only two generations since the Indians were living under the same conditions as we were so long ago.

I can illustrate what happened to my hon. friend. I know quite well what occurred. He went up there looking for horrors, and he got them. Let me give an illustration of a similar case. Many years ago when I was Indian agent there came into my office a gentleman bearing credentials from the Ottawa department. They instructed me that he had come to write up Indian folklore and I was to give him every assistance possible. A Mr. Cox was chief of the white police at that time and he could talk the Indian language. I enlisted his sympathies, and we arranged for this gentleman to talk with some of the old people. In each band or tribe there is generally one old person who is regarded more or less as the historian of the band. He gets up at potlatch time and hands on the traditions of the tribe. That is the only way they can do it. I arranged for this gentleman to get in touch with the historian of this tribe, but we found out that that was not satisfactory. That would involve sitting in a dirty Indian hut with a mud floor and possibly in unclean conditions, draughty, smelly and everything else. He did not like that.

In the course of a few days he intimated to us that he was able to run things in his own way. He got hold of an Indian boy just out of school. He paid him what was a fabulous sum in those days, $3 a day, to come down and sit in the comfortable hotel room and furnish him with this folklore. Presently it got noised about what wonderful folklore this gentleman was getting. This information came to Mr. Cox and myself and we hunted up this Indian boy. We knew very well that the stuff he was giving this gentleman was pure nonsense. We knew it had no relation whatever to the folklore as we knew it. We asked this Indian lad what he meant by fooling this gentleman from Ottawa. The result was that we learned that this boy had given him what little folklore he knew, and then finished off with a garbled version of what he had gotten from a book in the Indian school. I often yearned to see that book published. This boy had a very comfortable job, and he wanted to keep it. The man from Ottawa wanted to get some folklore under comfortable circumstances, and he got it.

My hon. friend went snooping around in a district 250 miles away from the country with which he was familiar. He was asking for horrors and he got them. He mentioned this Mr. Comley. Mr. Comley is quite an old gentleman, a former church missionary. He referred to this horrible red bark dance at a place called Quathiaski Cove.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I never mentioned that.

Mr. NEILL: At Cape Mudge, which is close by.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): In the early days.

Mr. NEILL: That is right. I hold in my hand a letter which appeared in the public press, from the Reverend M. F. Eby, a very reliable man whom I know well. He is in charge of the missionary society at this place called Cape Mudge, and he writes to protest strongly against Mr. Comley having suggested that this dance had been held by his Indians. He states that they are quite decent Indians and have not practised that dance for many years.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): That is precisely what the Reverend Mr. Comley said.

Mr. NEILL: Mr. Comley writes back to Mr. Eby, and he prints the letter. Mr. Comley blames the press and states that he was misunderstood, that it did not take place recently at Cape Mudge, but twenty-nine years ago. He describes it as "The Most Devilish Spectacle" he has ever seen. Then he goes on to elaborate upon the whole thing. Remember, this is Mr. Comley, not me. It is interesting to note that the words "The Most Devilish Spectacle," are in capitals. He describes how this awful dance is carried on and states that the children are neglected. Are not our white children sometimes neglected when their parents go out to play bridge? He states these dances cause strife and malice, but unfortunately to-day we find strife and malice not only between people but among nations. But this "devilish spectacle" took place twenty-nine years ago. That is a long time ago.

Then he talks about selling women. He has twisted a very small matter and tried to make it into a large one. We do not need to go so far back into history to the time when the chiefs of the Scottish clans or the knights in England had the bestowal of the wards under their authority. Quite often a girl was given to one of the knights, and if the gentleman was a seemly looking man, the girl was not long in accepting him. That is the true explanation of this selling. There is absolutely no justification for the statement that these girls are biologically raped by their husbands. As to the tale that there is a mortgage which is in effect until it is repaid, it is like our dowry. The trouble I had when I was Indian agent was in getting the men and women to stick together. Wives and husbands had a playful habit of getting rid of each other and taking newer and younger mates. It was not a case of getting back their mortgage money. All the time I was Indian agent I never heard of one woman being sold in that way.

Another complaint is that there is no policeman at Alert Bay, and then he qualifies that statement later on by saying he meant no dominion policeman. By making such a statement he insults the reputation of the provincial police, a very fine body of men. I wrote to the chief of police in Victoria asking him if he had any trouble in handling the crime situation at Alert Bay. He told me that he had not. He said they had two men there now and if an extra one was needed, he would be put on. He told me that there was no need for an extra man up to the present. Then I asked him about these dreadful orgies that were supposed to go on and this potlatch business. It turned out that this was a most trivial matter. He told me there had not been a murder, a bank robbery or a burglary in many years. The worst crime was drunkenness and he told me he averaged one and a half cases a week over a period of two years. The provincial police are perfectly capable of handling the Indians. They also administer other dominion statutes, because that is part of the bargain made between the dominion and the province.

A long quotation was made from a book written by Mr. Walkem, describing conditions in 1876, sixty-two years ago. He talked about eating dogs. There used to be something about taking bites out of a living dog, but that never occurred in the district about which he is talking. That was away up in the north, and that practice has been out of date for at least thirty or forty years. He has been loaded up with all this stuff of the past. He wants to know why the law is not enforced. The law is strictly enforced. Any one who takes part in any Indian festival, dance or other ceremony of which the giving away or giving back of money, goods or articles of any sort forms a part, is liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months and not less than two months. The question is whether it is wise to take these Indians by the throat, so to speak, and try to make Christians out of them. Here is a telegram I received from the Indians. They did not send it collect either, as many white men would. It reads:

> Investigator on potlatch went Alert Bay only, which not fair deal. We want investigator for both Indians and Indian agent, not one-sided. Hold his report until you hear from us. We desire square deal and want honest and truthful man. We know he is taking report on potlatch which he got from young people, not from older people.

And they send a letter in which they say the same thing. It is not in very good English, but they say that they are not satisfied with the work of the investigator who was at Alert Bay—that is, the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Taylor)—and they want an investigator to interview them and their officials. The letter went on to say that there were people who were deadly against their custom who would feature one instance, possibly an undesirable one, and ignore everything else in its favour, and also listen to gossip and rumour.

I wrote to the minister and asked if he knew anything about the matter in his department, and I have a reply saying that he did not sanction anybody going up there and that he knew nothing about it.

I have a further letter from the chiefs to say that they had word that a Mr. Taylor was at Alert Bay, who is also an M.P.—that is how they express it—they ask me to find out what knowledge of the potlatch Mr. Taylor got from the people, and they remark with a good deal of truth that what he should have done was to meet the chiefs and the people of this agency. As a matter of fact, he was trespassing and stirring up one bunch of Indians against another, which is illegal.

There is one other phase. My hon. friend quoted the good book. Let me follow his example. Scripture says something about taking the beam out of your own eye before you meddle with the mote in your brother's eye. And when he was pussyfooting around my district, without invitation, and with a very restricted welcome, what was going on in his own district? I have a cutting here from a paper published in Nanaimo, the capital of his seat, with a population of about nine thousand people, and eight hundred Indians were turned loose there one day, these dreadful debauches, in his own capital city! Here is the heading on the article describing it: "Day long potlatch is held at Nanaimo." The article goes on to say that eight hundred Indians participated and it reveals the dark and awesome tale. It all amounts to this: There was a marriage, which is neither an illegal nor an uncommon thing, and they had a feast, also not unusual. The article also goes on to say:

Potlatches are banned under British Columbia law, but special sanction was obtained for the Nanaimo celebration.

Very well, it was illegal, but special sanction was obtained. When or where? Was the hon. member a party to it? If he was, then he was allowing a potlatch to go on in his own district while he was denouncing one in mine. If he was not a party to it he was neglecting his duty by not taking the beam out of his own eye. It would have been very much better if he had attended, to put it roughly, to the details of his own district.

But I must hurry on. I have here a letter from these people. They write requesting me to get in touch with His Excellency the Governor General to ask if he would act as patron of the opening of their new church, to be dedicated by the bishop, and the ceremony in connection with a totem pole which they had erected at great cost and trouble to the memory of King George. I have the very kindly letter of his excellency saying that he was pleased to be a patron and that he was reporting their action of loyalty to the king. Then I have an invitation, very nicely printed, with "God Save the King" on it in dialect, and a picture of the totem pole. I will send the two photographs over to the minister and the Prime Minister, but they are to be passed as an order for return because I want them back again. I have here the Victoria Colonist, a half page of which is devoted to the ceremony. There is a picture of the hall and of the church, a much better one than I worship in at home; the bishop is shown in his robes on the steps of the church, and there is a picture of the communicants taking their first communion. It is very nicely written up, and there is also a picture of the totem pole. These are hardly the people, one would think, who would indulge in these bloody orgies about which my hon. friend talks. Surely good progress has been made in two generations.

Let me cite South Africa. They just recently, within the last few months, passed a law allowing native courts to be set up to deal with the natives in accordance with native law and customs, and among other things polygamy is allowed, which will horrify my hon. friend. The idea is to make decent, Christian natives out of these people, instead of imitation white men. They have passed that law in Africa, declaring that the law shall be in accordance with the native customs, and that is how to make these people Christians, not by force of arms and by policemen, but by teaching them in a reasonable way.

Here is what a man, a missionary, wrote to the paper the other day; I quote one paragraph:

The mistake we have been making is in trying to make of the Indian what he was never intended to be—a white man. The church, by adopting compulsory measures, may succeed in suppressing the potlatch but she will never win the Indian.

He will respond, as he has always done, to sound leadership, wise counsel and, above all, consistent example.

It goes on to say:

It is not the intention of this letter to minimize the evils in some of these old Indian customs—

Nor am I trying to do it.

—or to cast any reflection upon those who, under great handicaps, are labouring in Indian communities: its object is respectfully to commend to the leaders of the church a far better and more effective way of dealing with this problem, namely the christian way of sympathetic understanding and moral suasion.

Which is the better method? The policeman with his revolver in his hand saying, you shall not do that, or the kindly moral suasion of the church, leading the Indian step by step? My hon. friend himself says there has not been a public potlatch since 1916. The custom is wearing itself out. It only needs time and moderation. It is the old principle again, if you tell a man not to do something that he has been habituated to doing for a hundred years, that never stops him; but if you tell him that it is not a good thing, you can gradually lead him to different ideals. That is better than putting a policeman there and trying to make the Indians what they were never intended to be—white men.

Item agreed to.

Reserves and trusts—administration, $55,980.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the amount of the fund now available for administration?

Mr. CRERAR: Indian trust funds?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. CRERAR: About $14,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: How is it invested? It is part of the consolidated fund, of course, but what interest does it pay?

Mr. CRERAR: About five per cent. The capital fund has increased during the past year. I am not in a position to say how the accretion to the fund through interest was disposed of.

Item agreed to.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Sixth report of the standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Moore.

JUDGE T. M. COSTELLO

REPORTED WARNING TO RECIPIENTS OF NATURALIZATION CERTIFICATES NOT TO JOIN COMMUNISTIC OR SOCIALISTIC PARTIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to a dispatch in the Toronto Daily Star, June 8, from Guelph, in which it is stated that Judge T. M. Costello of Goderich in recommending that certain people should receive naturalization certificates warned them that they should not join any communistic or socialistic parties. "Keep away from them, because they are trying to teach you something that is not good for either you or me to know," he is reported as saying. I should like to ask whether it is proper for a judge to participate in this way in distinctly political affairs.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I shall inquire as to the accuracy of the report before making any comment upon it. May I remark, though, that it shows that sometimes even freedom of speech has to be restrained to some extent.

BANKS IN ALBERTA

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF COMMUNICATIONS WITH RESPECT TO POSSIBLE CLOSING OF BRANCHES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): I should like to direct the following question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Is the Prime Minister prepared at the present time to make public his reply to the telegram of June 3, from Premier Aberhart of Alberta, and the letter from Premier Aberhart, with regard to the threatened withdrawal of some of the branch banks in Alberta.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend gave me notice of his intention to ask this question, and I sent immediately for the communications to which it was supposed to have reference. His question asks to have made public the reply to a telegram of June 3. I have no telegram of June 3, from Hon. Mr. Aberhart, but I believe the telegram to which my hon. friend refers is one of June 4. My reply is dated June 6. The telegram of June 4 is as follows:

Calgary, Alberta,
June 4, 1938.

The Right Hon. Lyon Mackenzie King,
Ottawa, Ont.

This government has been advised of several instances in which local managers of banks have informed residents that unless the existing laws in regard to certain taxation are disallowed or withdrawn branch banks throughout the province will be closed. The matter is being investigated at this end but as your government claims complete jurisdiction over banks and banking I must point out that this action of the banks has serious implications. Firstly it could be interpreted as a coercive threat to the people of Alberta and directed against his majesty's government in this province. Secondly the withdrawal of an essential service will place this government in a position of being forced to take such action as may be necessary to safeguard the welfare of our people. The banks are under definite obligation to serve the people and it is the duty of your government to see that such obligation is adequately discharged or alternatively that due notice is given to the government of Alberta of the banks' unwillingness to maintain these necessary services in which case we must insist that we be left free to organize our own banking system to serve the needs of our people.

William Aberhart,
Premier.

To this message I sent a reply on June 6, as follows:

Hon. William Aberhart,
Edmonton, Alberta.

I wish to acknowledge your telegram of June the 4th regarding the possible closing of branch banks throughout the province of Alberta, and to assure you that its representations are receiving the careful consideration of our government.

W. L. Mackenzie King.

NATIONAL PARKS

AMENDMENT OF EXISTING LEGISLATION AFFECTING WAWASKESY, ELK ISLAND AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND PARKS

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the National Parks Act and the Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island National Parks Act, 1936, to abolish the Wawaskesy national park in the province of Alberta and vest the land in the province; to change the boundaries of the Elk Island national park in the said province by adding to and parting with certain described areas and transferring the latter to the province; and to withdraw certain lands from the Prince Edward Island national park and vest the same in His Majesty in the right of the province.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Chairman, the purpose of this resolution is to lead up to a bill amending The National Parks Act and The Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island National Parks Act. It is necessary to make some corrections in the boundaries of the park in Prince Edward Island. As the members of the committee are aware, the government of Prince Edward Island set aside or acquired the area that was later transferred to the dominion administration for the development of a national park in that province. This involved the acquisition of property from various individuals, and in the adjustments incidental to the acquisition of this property it is now found necessary to change in some slight particulars the boundaries of some of the areas acquired.

There is also an amendment to The National Parks Act relating to a slight change in the boundary of the Elk Island park east of Edmonton. This is a slight rectification to permit the provincial government road, which passes by the park, to take off one small corner of it, which is replaced by an addition of some thirty-five or forty acres, according to my recollection, in another part of the park.

Then there is provision for the abandonment of a park known as the Wawaskesy national park north of Medicine Hat. This was acquired quite a number of years ago for the purpose of creating a preserve for the pronghorned antelope in Alberta. It has never been fenced. It consisted of a sort of elbow in the Saskatchewan river. At the same time another park west and south of Medicine Hat, known as the Nemiskam park, was secured for the same purpose, and now it is felt that it is unnecessary to maintain both parks. A resolution was passed by the Alberta legislature, I think at its last session, to the effect that the Wawaskesy park should be either fenced or abandoned by the federal government. Since the other park which I mentioned a moment ago is quite sufficient, in the judgment of the park administration, for the maintenance of the pronghorned antelope, under this legislation it is proposed to abandon the Wawaskesy park and let it revert to the ownership of the province.

I believe that covers all the amendments proposed under this legislation.

Mr. PELLETIER: Unfortunately we could not hear very much of what was said by the minister. I was wondering if he would mention the negotiations that preceded the introduction of this resolution.

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot hear my hon. friend.

Mr. PELLETIER: I could not hear the minister, either. Would he be good enough to tell us what negotiations took place between the province and the dominion before this resolution was introduced?

Mr. CRERAR: The matter of adjusting the boundary of the Elk Island park has been taken up with the Alberta government; indeed the request in the first instance came from that government to make this slight correction in order to permit them to carry through a road at a certain point. At the same time, according to my recollection, they suggested that they would give us an area at another point somewhat larger than the few acres we were asked to give up. So far as the Elk Island park is concerned, this action is the result of an understanding with the Alberta government.

As to Wawaskesy park, I said a moment ago that the Alberta legislature at its last session passed a resolution to the effect that the parks administration should either abandon this park or fence it. This park includes some forty or fifty square miles in a bend of the south Saskatchewan river, with a natural boundary on two sides. There has been some slight supervision given the park, costing a few hundred dollars a year, but since we have the Nemiskam park, which is a preserve for the pronghorned antelope, it is considered unnecessary to continue the Wawaskesy park. Rather than go to the expense of fencing it and providing supervision, which would involve a considerable capital outlay and a further few thousand dollars a year thereafter, we are giving up that park. No national interest will suffer in any way, because a place has been provided where this special species of antelope may be maintained.

Mr. STEWART: Is the change in the boundaries of the Prince Edward Island park in the nature of an enlargement of the park, or otherwise? I gathered from the remarks of the minister, perhaps on a former occasion, that this area had been acquired by the provincial government and that there had been no expropriation or expenditure directly by the dominion government in connection with the acquisition of these lands. I should like to know if my recollection is correct.

Mr. CRERAR: That is correct.

Mr. STEWART: Then I should like to know whether the compensation to the owners of the land included in the park has been adjusted, if that is all settled, and why the area is being either enlarged or decreased.

Mr. CRERAR: My recollection at the moment is that the park area is being slightly curtailed; I think I am correct in that. There are some minor adjustments in connection with the acquisition of the property, but of course that is not a matter that concerns the federal administration. All we are concerned with is whether or not the area which the provincial government is willing to turn over to us is suitable for park purposes, and the slight rectifications in the boundary that are suggested will not in any sense interfere with the utilization of the area for park purposes.

Mr. STEWART: Then with respect to the park in Alberta, was there any expenditure by the dominion in connection with either its acquisition or its maintenance; and since it is now to be abandoned to the province of Alberta is there any provision for compensation, or is it just being given back?

Mr. CRERAR: I think I am correct in saying that there was no expenditure in connection with the acquisition of the area, which was set aside at a time when the resources of Alberta were still under the control of the federal government. The only cost involved has been a few hundred dollars per year by way of supervision. As I recall it, a settler adjacent to the area was paid a few hundred dollars a year simply to be in a position to report to the federal administration anything which needed reporting.

Mr. MITCHELL: The Wawaskesy national park, which has just been spoken of, is in my constituency. I am familiar with the neighbourhood and I was surprised to hear that any money had been spent on it at all. I know that the land has been vacant, with the antelope either going on or off, as they see fit, in their grazing. I must say that both governments are to be commended in releasing this area from its original condition as a national park. As such it is purely a waste. Furthermore, so far as paying money to anyone for the superintendency of Wawaskesy park is concerned, I would say that such money has been wasted. I am surprised to learn that anyone has been paid, because it has been the natural place for anyone to go who wanted to hunt antelope. In my opinion, this is an excellent step.

Mr. CRERAR: The only expenditure incurred in the past in connection with this park was approximately $200 a year, which was paid to a resident close to the park, so that if occasion arose for the making of a report to the federal parks administration someone would be on hand to do it.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Crerar thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 154, to amend the National Parks Act, and the Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island National Parks Act, 1936.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

SUPPLY

UNEMPLOYMENT—CONCENTRATION OF SINGLE UNEMPLOYED MEN IN VANCOUVER—STATEMENT OF MR. BENNETT

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, before the house resolves itself into a committee of supply I should like again to direct the government's attention to the situation that exists in Vancouver, unless it has been modified within the last few hours. There appears to be a complete violation of any thought of law and order, or regard for it. A federal property has been at the command of a group of trespassers for between three weeks and a month. Such a thing has never been heard of before in Canada, or, so far as I know, in any other British dominion.

There is an entire and utter disregard of the provisions of the law. Public property, a post office, is under the complete control of a band of men so far as the lobby is concerned. It is useless to say there is no interference with the transaction of public business; for people cannot come and go as they have been accustomed to do by reason of the presence of these men.

I am not expressing any opinion as to whether they have a grievance or not. That is a matter to be settled at some other time. But I do protest against this complete disregard of law and order. If there is one thing this country should stand for more than another, it is the observance of law and order. And when one has regard to the wording of a poster that has been placed on a telephone pole in the city of Vancouver, having reference to the young communists and their activity in this connection, one realizes that the matter is much more serious than would appear upon the face of it.

The question is: What has this government done as the custodian for the time being of the reputation and good name of the Dominion of Canada to see that the federal property maintained by the Post Office Department of Canada has been made available for business and free from trespassers? It is not the duty of the provincial government to remove these trespassers from that property. It is not their job. The duty falls upon the people who represent the crown in the right of the dominion, and the crown in the right of the dominion is the Dominion of Canada, not the province of British Columbia. It is the bounden duty of this government to maintain law and order, to free from trespassers the property erected for a post office, and to see that the grievance is adjusted.

Certainly we must make it clear that trespassers cannot take possession of property that belongs to the people, or the crown, in the right of the dominion, and not the province or the city.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not like to have that form of presentation go without a protest. I myself have urged again and again that the dominion government should take action with regard to the situation in Vancouver. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) suggests that the men may have a grievance, but that that is not the point, and that this grievance may be settled at some other time.

I cannot think of the matter in that way, at all. If the men have a grievance, as I believe they have, now is the time to settle it. These men have resorted to extraordinary expedients in order that attention may be called to their situation. But the question is not that law and order shall come first; it is primarily whether the grievances of the men are looked after. The maintenance of "law and order" involves that justice shall be shown in the maintenance of that law and order. In my judgment, when we have hundreds of young men incapable of finding positions, we should not insist too strongly upon the maintenance of law and order as a primary consideration.

In my judgment this government has not dealt vigorously or effectively with the question. It is all very well to say that these men may go to the places from which they came. But as has been stated before in the house, most of them are not in a position to establish residence anywhere. They belong to the great army of transient workers, who have done such a great deal in the past in building up this country. As anyone who has had much to do with unemployment must know, the majority cannot readily establish residence anywhere. If they came to Winnipeg, my own city, I think in many respects they would be just as badly off, or worse off than they are in Vancouver.

We know of the situation which existed a few years ago, when the present leader of the opposition was handling the situation, and when the men came as far as Regina. What happened? Nothing much was done until there was some overt disturbance, and then action was taken. I for one do not wish to be accused of urging that these men should break the rules of law and order. They have so far maintained law and order, as that expression is generally understood. There has been no overt action. But if the government maintains its present attitude, what can be expected but that one day an incident may occur which will necessitate forcible action being taken?

The leader of the opposition contends that these public buildings are federal property, that they are held by the crown in the right of the dominion, and that these men are guilty of trespass. I suggest to the leader of the opposition and to this house that the men and women of this country are worth infinitely more than our public property.

If civilization is worth anything, these men have the right to obtain a living. They are not able to obtain a living at the present time on their own initiative. What are they to do? Again and again they have appealed to this house, but in vain. I shall not discuss whether the primary responsibility lies with this parliament or with the provincial assembly. It is true that this government actually did provide projects for these men during the winter months. Under ordinary circumstances it might have been expected that with the coming of spring the men would be able to find work in building construction and so on. However, this year the situation is different. I was thinking of their case when I was out on the prairies the other day. Under normal circumstances, the farmers keep their horses and cattle under cover during the winter, feed them, and when spring comes along put them out to graze. If that practice had been followed this year the horses and cattle would have died, because there was practically no grass on the prairies, especially in the drought areas. If they had acted on the supposition which is the basis of the attitude of the federal government, these farmers would have turned their horses and cattle out to graze as usual no matter what might have been the expected results. That has been the attitude adopted by this government.

Under normal circumstances these men would have been absorbed in the labour market, but there is little demand this year. The men can ride the freight trains and come east at the risk of being arrested or injured, as a number have been. If they get to Regina or Winnipeg they will find that things are no better. Within a block of this building we are stopped as we go to lunch by men in need of food. What would be the use of adding more men to the group already here?

Only a few days ago I received a copy of a resolution that had been passed at a meeting of the Vancouver local council of women. This reads:

> Whereas: There is existing at the present time in the city of Vancouver a very serious situation in regard to the single unemployed men, and
> Whereas: On several occasions the Vancouver local council of women has asked the dominion government to provide a works' scheme which would absorb these single men and thus build character, be it
> Resolved: That the Vancouver local council of women reiterate its stand for a dominion public works scheme for these men, and further, be it
> Resolved: That pending the implementing of such a scheme that the dominion government provide shelter and sustenance for the men.
> Yours very truly,
> Harriette C. Porter,
> Honorary Corresponding Secretary.

Personally I would rather adopt the view taken by the Vancouver local council of women than that of the leader of the opposition. I believe they are in a better position to judge the needs of these men, and their sympathies are on the right side. Boys from ordinary families are involved in this matter, and I am glad the local council has passed this resolution, which I pass on to the minister as instructed. I do hope that not many days will go by before the government realizes, to use the words of the leader of the opposition, that this situation cannot go on indefinitely. We should not wait until there is some overt act and force is necessary. In my opinion the only way to settle this matter is to provide a work and wages program.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, it is my opinion that there is altogether too much neglect of this situation. I realize the position in which the government finds itself, but I should like to say to this house that these men are Canadians. They are the same kind of men as those who fought in the great war from 1914 to 1918. Those men were heroes when we needed them. We sang songs about when the boys would come home, and we should not forget that these men bear the same names and the same blood runs through their veins. They have been raised in the same country. They are moreover the same kind of men as those who pioneered Canada. Once in a while we hear someone say that we must have population. They will sometimes say, let us have a more active immigration policy. But what is the use of having an active immigration policy when we do not take care of the men who are here now? If we recognize that we need more people in Canada, and we surely do, we should first take care of those who are here.

This country should be filled by a great population. Are we never going to change the conditions in Canada so that our people can make a living? Have we reached the point of saturation with respect to population? What is happening in Canada is due to the present system. It has been the constant contention of my group that there should be a modification of our present system, as a result of which all these men could be cared for. Members can sneer about this all they want to, but they cannot sneer those men out of that post office building. They cannot sneer into employment the thousands and thousands of men in this country who are in a similar situation.

Very often those who are well fed contend that there is work for all, but the experience of these unfortunate boys is patent evidence that there is not. There are too many who believe that all the unemployed have to do is show a willingness to work. Last year I saw something which I shall never forget. I saw hundreds of these boys riding the freight trains, going from place to place. I saw them get off the trains and wander out into the far places. I saw them seeking work and willing to do anything for almost nothing. Yet they were being turned away. What are they going to do? Something must be done. We cannot have men in a position like this indefinitely. It is a disgrace to this country. There is no doubt that we are strong enough to smash them if we desire. We have our tear gas. our poison gas, our bombs, our airplanes and all the rest of it, and these men are more helpless than sheep. But the mere fact that we rely on the strength of our civilization should make us more conscious of the fact that we should initiate action and not wait until they put on the pressure which may bring about that result.

There is inadequate work in this country for the willing workers. There must be a change in our system so that people may be employed. To say that there is no work to be done in producing goods and services is to say a thing which is an utter and manifest absurdity. Why should we not make such a change as will enable these men to be absorbed? These changes could be made. All that the well-fed people do who are placed on parliament hill to take care of these men is simply to treat lightly, laugh or sneer about the whole matter, and disregard any suggestions that may be made as to a possible solution. That is all I have seen since I have been in this house. It may be believed that the old system under which we are living will solve this problem, but I say it will not. All the generations in the future will prove this. Why should we wait until we are forced into the ditch before we begin to build a bridge?

I was talking with a lady the other day when coming down on the train. She was a refined lady from one of the best of homes, and she was telling me something of the conditions existing out there. She says that the butchers and various suppliers of food take turns to give these boys the things they need to live on, and it must be done. Women also take turns in cooking and bringing in food for them. That indicates clearly that the citizens of Vancouver sympathize in the deepest way with these unfortunate boys, realizing that their own boys might under other circumstances be there. Hon. members can easily realize how serious conditions are if they imagine their own boys being there. It is easy for anyone with a good income sufficient to take care of his own boys not to be disturbed by the situation, but suppose one of our boys was there and we were as helpless as the fathers of these boys are to give them any employment whatever or to take care of them; we should begin to realize the gravity of our problem. If the ordinary citizens of Vancouver will make the sacrifices they are making to maintain these boys for three weeks, surely the united people of Canada, speaking and acting through this parliament, can do something to alleviate their hardships.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this question has been before the house on a number of previous occasions. This afternoon it has been approached from three different points of view. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) would have us deal with it by means of forcible ejection.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to permit the Minister of Labour any longer to misrepresent what I said. I never used the word force in the observations I made. I said the men were trespassers and that it was the duty of the government to see that this trespassing ceased.

Mr. ROGERS: Certainly I accept the correction of the leader of the opposition.

The leader of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation has suggested that the situation should be met by what can only be described as submission upon the part of the government to a mass demonstration in one province looking towards the provision of special works projects for a particular group of unemployed. I do not say that offensively in any way. I think it is entirely borne out by the facts.

The leader of the Social Credit group would have us meet the situation by the provision of work to relieve all those who are unemployed right across this dominion.

We as a government have had to meet this situation from the beginning with a due sense of responsibility, and we felt that we had to meet it on the basis of justifying any action we might take upon grounds of principle, and not upon grounds of mere expediency. We have proceeded upon the basis of consultation and cooperation with the provincial government. We have taken the ground that those closest to the situation were best able to advise upon it. Therefore when the Minister of Labour of British Columbia made his statement that so far as non-resident transients were concerned they should be given transportation to their homes or places of origin, we gave support to that view. The Minister of Labour in British Columbia at the same time expressed his opinion that with regard to those transients who were not non-residents but who could establish residence in British Columbia, there would be available employment for them in the next few months. Whether the Minister of Labour is correct or not in that assumption, none of us is able to say.

I would point out, however, that this situation has not now developed for the first time. Last year these camps were closed; they had in them an even greater number of men than they have had in the past season, and there was no mass demonstration in Vancouver; there was no provision of works projects to give employment to the men. This year a very considerable number of the men who were in the camps last year did not return, proving that they had either found employment elsewhere or returned to their homes on the prairies. I believe that at the present time not more than five hundred of these men who are in Vancouver are non-residents. At the beginning of the difficulty possibly the number of non-resident transients would have been in the neighbourhood of twelve hundred. That at least is the information that comes to me.

I have stated before to this house, and it must commend itself, I think, to every member, that you cannot cure this problem of transiency by creating preferred conditions for transients in any one province of the dominion. I think that must appeal to everyone as being reasonable, upon reflection. If you establish a special position for these men, whatever justification my hon. friends have said they are willing to give them, and who have sought to obtain their ends by methods which do involve at least a breach of order—if you establish a special position for them how can you deny providing special works projects to every single group of unemployed right across this country? That has not been the policy of this government or of any other government in this country.

An hon. MEMBER: Why not?

Mr. BLACKMORE: That does not matter. It is time we had a change.

Mr. ROGERS: This government has met that situation from the beginning, and must take and does take full responsibility for the policy that has been followed. So far as the administration of relief within the province is concerned, that is a matter which is effectively within provincial control. We have never withheld generous assistance with respect to relief to any province of this dominion.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, I have just this to say with regard to the words of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). Members from the city of Vancouver have endeavoured in every way possible to bring the gravity of the situation home to the minister, and his statements in this house, in which he takes refuge, are the strongest indictment that could be brought of the most cruel and callous indifference of the government to the most serious distress. The men were released en masse a few months ago without adequate means for their support.

Mr. ROGERS: Not en masse.

Mr. MacNEIL: In rotation. The last deferred pay vouchers that were given to a comparatively small group of these men were distributed on May 15, and they have been absolutely without means since. They were compelled to organize for their mutual benefit—something they had a perfect right to do.

The minister refers to conditions of last year. The conditions this spring were entirely different. There was no demonstration last year because there was some work available. At the present time plants and subsidiary operations are closing down. Yesterday the Woodfibre and Port Alice plants closed down, which every year absorb a large number of men, and all operations connected with these plants are at a standstill. The Powell river pulp and paper plant, that tremendous plant, is working only half time, and all related bush operations are slack.

I am going to tell the minister now that the real cause of the trouble is that he has an incompetent officer on the job in Vancouver. One good man representing the federal government would have settled this matter weeks ago. He is being badly advised. Read the editorials in the Vancouver papers and the resolutions that have been passed by different bodies of the citizens of Vancouver. The member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has referred to the resolution of the local council of women, which resolution must have reached the minister. Resolutions have been received by him from responsible bodies of citizens who have no friendly alliance with the communist party, on which the minister places all the blame for this situation. I have a resolution from Reverend Father Cooper, than whom none is more outstanding for his devoted and unselfish service on behalf of the underprivileged. This resolution was signed by Archbishop DePencier, of the diocese of New Westminster. These men in their considered judgment all say that the correct remedy is to provide employment for these men. It is not a question of the government submitting to mass demonstration. Mark you, these men who are unemployed in Vancouver went prior to the demonstration in an orderly, helpful and lawful way to the authorities asking for consideration of their special needs this spring, and were denied consideration of their needs or any proper consideration of their problems. It was only when municipalities all across the country had been wired to, and the men found that there was no work for them elsewhere, that they resorted to this spectacular means of demonstrating their needs. One good man with some authority to deal with the situation could devise a plan, with perhaps a little face-saving on both sides, and a little understanding of the problem, which would end the trouble. The problem could be dissipated overnight; but for the minister to sit here and say that nothing will be done, and take refuge behind official red tape, can only provoke trouble in this situation.

Why does the minister suppose nothing has been done? Colonel Foster, the chief of police of Vancouver, is a cool-headed man. and many times the citizens of Vancouver have been thankful that at the head of the police administration we have had a cool-headed man. He has ample force at his command. He has at his call the provincial police reserves. It would be a comparatively easy matter to toss tear gas bombs into the Post Office and art gallery. Why does he not do it? He knows that the art gallery, in which have been stored irreplaceable art treasures which mean a great deal to the people of Vancouver and to the cultural development of that city, would be ruined in a few minutes by the attempts of the men to escape. Have you ever seen a mob of men try to escape from the effects of tear gas, as I have seen them, not once, but several times in Vancouver? Incalculable damage would be done, and there is always the danger of loss of life. Force is not being applied because the citizens of Vancouver are well aware that the men have a legitimate grievance. They know that there is not work available for them, and it is the definite responsibility of the minister to present in direct negotiation with the men some plan which will disclose to them avenues of employment, so that they shall not be thrown out by force into a situation which confronts them with nothing but blank hopelessness.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I doubt if there is anything more that we can do here to get action from this government. We have appealed to them from every point of view, I think, from which an appeal can be made. I wish to confirm what has already been said by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil). In my opinion you may wear these men out, but the possibilities are that by the time you have worn them out they will be prepared for anything, and then we are going to have trouble, and trouble that could have been avoided by compromise and good-will on both sides. If a compromise were offered by this government or its representatives I am satisfied that the men would meet them more than half way.

Mr. ROGERS: Will my hon. friend permit me? Has he seen—I assume he has—a copy of the telegram which I sent to Mr. Matts, the secretary of the committee, in which it was made clear to him that, either in British Columbia or in any other province, these men would not be disqualified in any way, would be equally eligible with others in the same position for youth training plans or for any other public works which might be available?

An hon. MEMBER: What does that mean?

Mr. ROGERS: It means as much as it ever meant.

Mr. MacINNIS: That does not mean anything to a hungry man. What the Minister of Labour says to these men is, "You may be hungry to-day, and we are not going to do anything about it, but if you move out of here and go on being hungry, we won't hold it against you six months from now."

That is not good enough, and I do not think if the minister were hungry he would accept what he said to-day as being good enough. Perhaps the provincial government will do something for the unemployed two or three or four months hence. It may be that the provincial government will do something then; but again, it may be that the provincial government will not, until they get federal assistance. The city of Vancouver to-day is carrying 2,500 men more than it was carrying this time last year, because of the shifting of the burden on to the city by the federal and the provincial authorities. Let me tell the minister that that was not the basis on which this government went to the country in 1935. That was not what was promised the unemployed by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) in the city of Vancouver. That was not what was promised the unemployed by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) in the city of Vancouver time and time again. All that these men are asking is that the government fulfil its promises and provide work. And let me say again that they are not very particular; the wages they have been working for have not been very high.

Mr. MacNEIL: They worked hard last year.

Mr. MacINNIS: They worked hard; and if the government has nothing more than the excuses which have been offered by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) in the last six weeks, all I can say is that this government is bankrupt indeed, and will pay the price of that bankruptcy some day in the near future.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): It appears to me that the minister views the situation as being temporary, that he thinks that unemployment is a temporary condition; so he suggests that the unemployed leave the province of British Columbia and go back to the locality from which they came, and when they arrive there the federal government will assist the province in providing employment or some measure of relief for them. But I do not believe that the government has assured these men that if they do go back to the locality from which they came, work will be provided for them. Can the minister tell the house whether that is so? Has the promise of work ever been made to these men provided they go back to the point from which they originally came?

Reference has been made to the promises of the Liberal party, one of which was that they would issue money and credit to meet the needs of the people of Canada. The unemployed in Vancouver, in common with the unemployed throughout Canada, are in need of purchasing power so that they may be able to provide for their basic needs. They want to have a place to sleep and something to eat. This is an emergency situation. If war were to break out, that also, would be an emergency situation, but the government could then find the money to provide the men with food, clothing and shelter, and possibly give them $1.10 per day. If unemployment is a temporary condition, if the minister thinks that Liberal policies are going to provide the citizens of this country with the opportunity to work, surely during this emergency he can provide them with at least $1.10 per day. I am sure that in that event the men will vacate the premises they occupy at the present time. I do not believe they want to create any difficulty. They are taking this action solely with a view of bringing to the attention of Canada their legitimate claims. They have a just grievance. I believe if the minister offered them employment in the areas from which they come he would have no further difficulty with them.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): I should like to add my views to those of my leader in his protest against the conditions under which these men are compelled to exist. I was struck by one word used by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), namely the word "submission," his remark that he hates to submit to the dictates of unemployed men. I sometimes think that we in this house have lost all sense of democracy.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The hon. member never had it.

Mr. POOLE: Let me say that we have the duty of satisfying the demands of the public. That is what we are here for, not to dictate and to tell them what they cannot have, but to supply their needs. This is not a new condition. Not only during the term of office of this government but while the last government was in power, excuses were made. They passed the word from the federal government to the provincial government, from the provincial government back to the municipalities; and now, after seven or eight long years, we find these conditions still existing. Are we to have another Regina incident? Or are we big enough to get down and reason these things out on the right basis? Is there work in this country? Have we the money to put these men to work? Can we use the national credit and all the instruments we have at our disposal to give these men employment and create national assets? Those are the important questions. Anything which happens in Vancouver will not be the responsibility of the men who at the present time are occupying a public building; it will be the responsibility of this government.

We are not dealing with units; we are dealing with human beings. For seven years we have continually carried out the policy to which this leads, destroying men's souls, taking the best that is in men and destroying it, because being stiffnecked we make these men political footballs—"We are not going to give way to the dictates of provincial governments," and all that kind of thing. We should not in this house, on these questions, speak as social crediters or Liberals, we should speak as Canadians and as representatives of the people. If we are going to do anything to bring about a new feeling of confidence in this country I do not think there is any better place to begin than in the city of Vancouver by providing these men with employment. If this government has to bend a little, if it has to give way to what has been described as "demands," what does it matter? The essential thing is, let us get results. We have money for all kinds of purposes less deserving than the unemployed situation. I ask the Minister of Labour: Could not the government within twenty-four hours, if they were determined to do so, put these men to work? They could do it if they made up their mind that these men were going to work in a fair way; why then will they not do it? What are they waiting for.

An hon. MEMBER: Twenty-five dollars a month.

Mr. POOLE: Well, that remark is stupid nonsense, and it is time to cut it out. This question is too serious for this shouting across the floor "$25 a month" every time I rise to speak. We are dealing with the unemployment problem facing the youth of this country, youth, the finest asset any nation has. It is your job to make your contribution and see that these men get a break.

Mr. HANSELL: Ask him what solution he has to offer.

Mr. POOLE: This excuse about transients and non-residents has been used on so many occasions. "Send these people back to where they came from." I do not care if they came from Halifax; they are Canadian citizens, that is all that matters. We should treat them all on an equal basis, not say to them: Go back to Halifax, and we will do something for you there. People know by this time that that is only a way of passing the buck, of evading responsibility. I do not think the minister is lacking in humanitarian feeling; I know he is not. I have a high regard for him, but I should like to see him do something now about this situation. Do not let us have another disgraceful incident such as we had in Regina, where men were clubbed down; that leaves only bitterness and disunity and division when we should be giving the world a lead in national unity and reasonable understanding, getting together and discussing common problems. There is no use in letting a situation like this develop. I appeal to the government, joining my voice with the voices of my colleagues who have spoken this afternoon. There is no more serious question before the house at this time than this Vancouver situation. Put these boys to work and you will find that communism and radicalism will pass away like mists before the morning sun.

SASKATCHEWAN ELECTION—ALLEGED USE OF CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS FOR POLITICAL PURPOSES—STATEMENT OF MR. COLDWELL

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Before you leave the chair, Mr. Speaker, I have another matter which I wish to bring to the attention of the house. It concerns the Canadian National railway and an attempted use of it for political purposes by Liberal officials in some parts of Canada.

I have in my hand a notice which was sent out through the regular roadmaster's channels on the Margo subdivision of the Canadian National railways just prior to the provincial election in Saskatchewan last week. I hold in my hand new form 171, dated at Kamsack, Saskatchewan, June 6, 1938. It reads:

To Section Foremen and Section Labourers

The Liberal government is very strongly against amalgamation with the C.P.R. If the Saskatchewan Liberal government is defeated in this election we will get amalgamation very soon, trains will be taken off and branch lines, many of them, will be closed. All Canadian National employees should vote Liberal.

"Liberal" is underlined with red ink.

See that your wives and as many of your friends as possible vote Liberal.

Attached to that is "A plain talk to railway workers" published by authority of the Saskatchewan Liberal Association, Regina, Saskatchewan. The "plain talk" reads:

A railwayman who has a job is a useful citizen of the community. He has his pay cheque, his community interest, he looks after his family, he puts something aside for his later years.

A railwayman out of a job is just another one of the unemployed. He becomes a problem to himself and to the community.

Those who would merge or amalgamate the two railway systems of Canada are more interested in things than in human beings. They may say that they are working to save the taxpayer but they overlook the fact that the railway worker is one of the best taxpayers in Canada.

The railways of Canada and the railway workers of Canada are needed to carry on the business of the country. Given a ten per cent upturn in business the railways will be able to get along. They will be needed.

In a large, richly-endowed country like Canada that ten per cent increase is sure to come. In the meantime the railways may do something to help themselves by minor adjustments.

A railway monopoly, whatever it might be for the country, will be of no value to the railway workers. The workers will be in the hands of the monopoly.

The Liberal party is the one party that has stood firmly against amalgamation. It stands there to-day.

Numerous leaders of the Conservative party are working for amalgamation of the Canadian railways. Read the speeches of Senator Meighen and others.

The C.C.F. would "socialize" the railways, creating a monopoly. It would be referred to as a publicly-owned enterprise but it would still be a monopoly.

Social credit has no railway policy. It works on the theory that if enough money is printed by printing presses, as handbills are printed, the railway problem would look after itself.

The Liberal party is the safe party for the railway workers. The Liberal party has never wavered as to the rights of the railway worker. Saskatchewan railway workers can show by voting Liberal that Saskatchewan wants no amalgamation.

Vote Liberal.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. COLDWELL: Now, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal benches applaud. If this kind of letter, sent out by roadmasters to the railway workers of Saskatchewan, containing this leaflet, is sent out by a national railway official, he should be subjected to the severest criticism and to discipline.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Who sent the first letter out?

Mr. COLDWELL: I have given particulars, and I can provide the name.

An hon. MEMBER: Who sent the first one?

Mr. COLDWELL: I will tell you in a few moments.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Why not tell it now?

Mr. COLDWELL: I say further that there is no group in this house which stands as unitedly as the group with which I am associated against railway amalgamation or unification, and people throughout the country know that.

I have here the letter, dated June 9, received by me to-day, which accompanied the communication I have just read. It is from Mr. A. M. Nicholson. I quote:

The enclosed was handed to me just before a meeting at Canora on June 7. It was received by a C.N.R. employee who prefers not to have his name known.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COLDWELL: The reason for the omission of the name is quite obvious; anyone who knows anything about that Saskatchewan Liberal machine knows that it intimidates large numbers of workers and relief recipients in that province.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is not true.

Mr. COLDWELL: The letter continues:

Three other employees came to me after the meeting and had similar communications. The employees are Ukrainians who had intended voting C.C.F. but who were greatly disturbed by the contents of this message on company stationery, and also by the fact that it was delivered through C.N.R. mail in the roadmaster's envelope.

Will you please do what you can to see that whoever has been responsible for intimidating voters in this manner is properly dealt with.

This occurred on the Margo subdivision of the Canadian National railways. I shall be glad to supply any necessary affidavits. Will you please return by registered mail.

That is signed by Mr. Nicholson. A moment ago I was asked who signed the original letter. The writer had not the nerve to sign his name to it, but it is so easily traceable that, now that it is brought to the attention of the Minister of Transport, there will be no difficulty in finding out who sent it. I had not seen one of these letters, Mr. Speaker; I had heard of similar communications in other parts of the province, though I could not lay my hands on them. This came to me, without having been requested, by registered mail this morning.

As a believer in public ownership, I stand for our publicly owned institutions; yet when attempts to use them are made by political parties or officials interested in the success of political parties for partisan ends, then I say it is time this house sat up and took notice of the situation. This is the rankest kind of intimidation. A few moments ago we heard speakers from several quarters of this house discuss the situation at Vancouver, where men are jobless. These in Saskatchewan, humble railway workers, some of them with families, receive a communication of this description and are intimidated; they are made to fear that if certain things happen they will be in the bread line, and I say that in a British democracy any group of people who dare use the bread of our fellow citizens in order to take from them their full rights of citizenship and franchise ought to be condemned in the eyes of every decent citizen of this country.

I rise in my place this afternoon because I have been associated with elections in Saskatchewan for a very long time, and I have seen this sort of thing go on year after year, with teachers afraid to express themselves because it was so worked that the boards would get rid of them if they did; with ministers of the gospel moved from place to place if they expressed an opinion against the most unscrupulous political machine you can find in north America. What we have heard this afternoon is the sort of thing that should be frowned upon by every citizen. From time to time I have quoted in this house from Escott Reid's article in the Political Science Quarterly of February, 1935, wherein he outlines the methods under which the Saskatchewan Liberal machine has operated in days gone by. We know that whenever movements arise in western Canada that seek to unite the people, that machine is able to intimidate and divide. It was the attorney general of Saskatchewan who, in regard to social credit, confessed, "We started a prairie fire. Now we have to put it out." We know what that phrase meant. We know how some of these social credit candidates came into Saskatchewan in 1935, into some of the constituencies which we represent. We know the whole story, and in bringing this matter to the attention of the house this afternoon I have in mind not only this sort of intimidation but also the reference made by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Poole), a few moments ago to the situation that occurred in the city of Regina in 1935.

When men are jobless they are desperate; and if they are threatened with the loss of their jobs they become desperate also. I say a threat of this description is something of which we should take notice. I was in Regina just three years ago, almost three years to the day. I saw those seventeen hundred boys arrive there. I mingled with them that evening; over the air I appealed to citizens to assist them. I moved among them and found them peaceful, law-abiding boys. I believe the government at Ottawa was misinformed regarding the situation there, and day by day I saw those boys become more restless. Just a day or so before the riots occurred I was among them, and they told me there was no need to worry. I had done what I could for them; I advised them to obey the law and maintain order, and then the riots occurred. I do not want to see a repetition of that in Vancouver, in Regina, in Calgary, in Winnipeg, or in any other city of Canada. But that is the sort of thing that is brought about when you take from the people the right to express themselves at the polls. Then you leave them only one alternative, an alternative to which I am absolutely opposed; but matters such as we have discussed this afternoon make it more difficult all the time for those of us who believe in democracy to maintain and propagate it for the achievement of orderly progress.

So I am bringing to the attention of the government and this house this communication, which is easily traceable, in order that steps may be taken to see that the person responsible for this sort of thing may be properly disciplined. In the future I believe conduct of this sort should be punishable not by fine but by imprisonment, and by a fairly steep sentence at that.

Mr. GRAY: Is the hon. member stating on his own responsibility that this leaflet or pamphlet which he has just read was sent out by an official of the railroad?

Mr. COLDWELL: On the responsibility of this letter which I have in my hand, from Mr. A. M. Nicholson of Hudson Bay Junction, Saskatchewan, who is a minister of the gospel—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Was.

Mr. COLDWELL: Or who was a minister of the gospel—

Mr. GARDINER: The C.C.F. organizer.

Mr. COLDWELL: Maybe he is, but that does not make him—

Some hon. MEMBERS: You know he is.

Mr. COLDWELL: I submit that does not make him any the less a minister of the gospel of good news, any the less a citizen of Canada, or any the less a man. Mr. Nicholson forwards this to me stating that it was sent out on company stationery. That is obvious; the form is there, showing that it was sent out in a roadmaster's envelope on the Margo subdivision of the Canadian National railways, dated Kamsack, June 6, 1938.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I would say to my hon. friend who has just spoken (Mr. Coldwell) that I take no exception to his having brought forward the matter he has, but strictly speaking I think his protest should have been made to the president and directors of the Canadian National railways rather than to hon. members of this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Hon. gentlemen say "oh, oh," but may I ask my hon. friends if they assume that members of this house or members of this government have been in any way party to the transaction to which my hon. friend has referred.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Sure.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If they say that let them prove it. Let them make any direct charge and it will be investigated immediately by the government. More than that, may I say that if my hon. friend who has brought forward this matter will communicate his representations to the president and board of directors of the Canadian National railways they will, I believe, proceed to deal with it in the manner in which I think it should be dealt with; and if they do, they will have the wholehearted support of this administration. That is the body responsible for the action of its officers, who in turn are responsible for the actions of their men.

Mr. McGREGOR: The election is over now.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: The election in Saskatchewan is over, and I do not see that much good can be served by fighting it over again in this House of Commons when we have more important matters to attend to, but that is what the representations made this afternoon amount to.

Mr. MITCHELL: May I ask whether the Prime Minister is averse to having this matter investigated by the government or the Minister of Transport?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I have been stating that the Canadian National railways is a body that is supposed to be independent of government control, and the government should not interfere one way or the other in this matter unless, after the Canadian National authorities have investigated, they communicate to us their need of government assistance in order that rules and regulations may be enforced.

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort): Mr. Speaker, we have had the amazing spectacle to-day of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) trying to drag the Canadian National railways into partisan politics in this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COLDWELL: I object.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): And this on the unsupported word of a hired socialist organizer who left the preaching of the gospel to engage in partisan politics.

Mr. COLDWELL: I rise to a point of order. I am referring to a document sent out through the regular railway channels and dated at Kamsack.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): If the hon. member would give me a minute, I would come to that phase of it. At the very outset, the complaint that has been made before this house to-day should not have been made here. It is that either someone used Canadian National stationery for improper purposes, or that someone improperly used the Canadian National name in printing stationery for his own purposes.

Mr. BENNETT: Or the Liberal leaflet attached.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I never knew there was a law against sending out Liberal propaganda in this country. The leaflet in itself was perfectly all right. It was truthful, moderate, reasonable and constructive. My hon. friend said a moment ago that he and his party were opposed to amalgamation. I can get the original handbook distributed by the hon. member, either by himself or by his agent in a meeting which he was addressing, in which he said the object of his party was to socialize the natural resources of this country, and the implements of production and means of transportation.

Mr. HEAPS: What has that to do with this?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Let me ask this: How can you socialize public ownership? How can you socialize the transportation system of this country without having a monopoly? Would you with one hand administer the Canadian National Railways, with the other hand administer the Canadian Pacific railway, and depend on your feet to administer the other means of transportation?

Mr. COLDWELL: Does the hon. member wish me to answer that point?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): My hon. friend has said that people have been losing their jobs because of political pressure being brought to bear on them. I would tell him that in my observation more men have lost their jobs or had to change their locations because of pressure brought by his socialist friends than I have seen affected by the democratic parties. A complaint of this nature should not have been made. Everyone in this house, who has had anything to do with public business, knows that Canadian National business is dealt with in another manner. It is dealt with by a special committee of the house, which considers the accounts of the company, and officers of the company appear before the committee. It might be quite true that the hon. member does not believe in these men on the Canadian National railways being encouraged to express their own opinions about amalgamation, or more socialization than there is at the present time. I think the hon. member would agree with me in saying that the only wrong that has been done in this case is either the using of the stationery of the railway, the misusing of the company name, or the enclosing of political statements in company mail. If one of these things has been done, it certainly can be investigated by the company.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I think that the point at issue has escaped the attention of both the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. McLean) and the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). The point is this: Here is a document alleged—and I use the word advisedly—to have been sent out by an officer of the Canadian National Railways.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Alleged by whom?

Mr. STEVENS: Just a moment. The document is on the stationery of the Canadian National Railways, new form, No. 171. It is typical railway stationery and appears to be quite genuine. The document is dated at Kamsack, Saskatchewan, June 6, 1938, which would indicate the source from which it was issued. That would aid in the investigation of the matter, should the government desire to investigate it.

Now, nothing can be said against the Liberal party or any other party expressing its views in connection with governing this country on railway or other matters. If the Liberal party, as indicated this afternoon by the applause of its members in the house, are opposed to unification and amalgamation, that is their privilege. They have a perfect right so to advocate. But when Canadian National Railways stationery is used, or appears to have been used, and sent out by an official of the railway, as the evidence would indicate, and when on it one finds language in these words: "The Liberal government is very strongly against amalgamation with the C.P.R.", I suggest the matter should be considered. Then, I ask the Prime Minister to note this particularly:

If the Saskatchewan Liberal government is defeated in this election, we will get amalgamation very soon, trains will be taken off and branch lines many of them will be closed. All Canadian National employees should vote Liberal.

That is what I think is the serious point in the matter. It all depends upon whether the document is as it appears to be.

An hon. MEMBER: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEVENS: Just a minute; I will come to that, if hon members will be patient. The point in the matter is this: If Canadian National officials, by virtue of their office and influence with employees and workers on the railway, are permitted to use Canadian National stationery to make declarations which, if not untrue, are obviously not based upon any authority, then I say it is a very serious matter. That is the sort of thing that drags the Canadian National into politics. My opinion during the years I have been in the house—and I think it is shared pretty generally by hon. members on both sides—is that it is highly desirable to keep the Canadian National Railways out of politics, if we can. I say, "if we can", because the experience over a long period of years would indicate that it is an extremely difficult thing to do. I think no one can say that we should not make every endeavour to do so.

A moment ago the Prime Minister suggested that the complaint should have been addressed to the president of the Canadian National Railways. I differ from him, and I say that this is the proper place in which to discuss a matter of this kind.

Mr. GRAY: An anonymous letter?

Mr. STEVENS: My suggestion is that the Prime Minister represents the government of the country, and he ought to draw the attention of the president of the railways to it, and request that the whole matter be investigated by a competent officer of the company.

Mr. GRAY: An anonymous letter?

Mr. STEVENS: It is not an anonymous letter.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Surely it is.

Mr. STEVENS: I asked the hon. member to let me have this document.

Mr. GRAY: I refer to the other one from which the hon. member is reading.

Mr. STEVENS: If the chief whip of the Liberal party would permit me, I should like to proceed. Any citizen of Canada is at liberty, through a member, to bring to the attention of the House of Commons any grievance, and particularly at this point, on going into supply. He may mention any grievance to which he or others may be subjected.

I am not vouching for this, because I do not know the man. I simply say that the evidence of the stationery warrants that the matter be investigated.

Mr. GRAY: The stationery?

Mr. GARDINER: You can pick it up in any station in Canada.

Mr. FACTOR: Is there a signature on the document?

Mr. STEVENS: No, there is no signature. I suggest that that is quibbling, if I may be permitted to use the term without offence. It is rather begging the question. I submit to the Prime Minister that with this stationery before us, and with a responsible citizen, whatever his views may be, bringing it to the attention of parliament through the proper channel, namely through a member of the House of Commons, the Prime Minister and the government owe it to the house and to the hon. member who brought it to the attention of the house to investigate the matter. I would not condemn the Liberal party or anyone else on this evidence until it has been investigated.

Mr. GARDINER: It is not evidence at all.

Mr. STEVENS: The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) says it is not evidence, but I submit that though it may not be sufficient to condemn, it is sufficient to warrant investigation. That is the point I make. I submit to the Prime Minister that the matter should be investigated carefully at the instance of the government. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar or myself or anyone else has not the right to request the president of the railway to do anything, but the government has the right, particularly where it is alleged—I use the word advisedly—that officers of the railway have projected themselves into a political controversy and have used influences which they were not justified in using. In my opinion that is the point at issue.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: May I say to my hon. friend that if instead of the Canadian National Railways being involved, this particular incident had had to do with some high official of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, that he had used stationery belonging to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to accompany an anonymous circular and have it distributed at the instance of the employees of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, would he not assume that the president and the board of directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would take cognizance of a matter of the kind? The position of the government with respect to the Canadian National Railways is that the Canadian National stands on all fours, so far as freedom from government interference is concerned, with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. Assurance has been given the president and the board of directors that if in investigating this matter themselves they should require the assistance of the government, that assistance will be given in the fullest measure. I think myself it is the duty of the higher officers of the railway concerned to investigate matters of the kind, whether they have to do with the government owned or the privately owned railway. I do not think it is the business of the government to be continually telling both railway companies what they should do with respect to their officials and employees.

Motion (Mr. Mackenzie King) agreed to, and the house went into committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Employment Offices Coordination Act—administration, $63,925.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): When this item was before the committee previously the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Green) inquired as to the connection between the Employment Service of Canada and the youth training plans. I told him then that this question might be answered more appropriately when we were dealing with the item having to do with training projects for unemployed young people, but that I would try to supply the information while the present item was under discussion.

My information is that all agreements specify that applicants for training, living in a locality where there is an office of the employment service, must be registered there as a proof of unemployment. In some provinces, particularly Ontario, the selection of trainees for different projects was made by officials of the employment offices, but in most provinces the employment offices were not used in that capacity. The women's section of the employment service gave valuable assistance in helping to select young women for home service training schools and in their subsequent placement in employment. The facilities of all employment offices were available to trainees on the completion of their course to assist them in finding employment. With respect to the other training plans carried on during the past year, it is suggested that the connection is a valuable one and ought to be improved further by the appointment of a number of special placement officers in the provinces where these plans are being carried out.

Mr. GREEN: Could the minister state how many of the men now in the Vancouver post office and art gallery would be eligible for forestry training? I understand that the forestry training camps were opened again last week and that some hundreds of young men from British Columbia have been sent to these camps.

Mr. ROGERS: I have not that information before me, but I shall be glad to get it for my hon. friend when the item which refers more specifically to the matter is under discussion.

The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) asked a question with regard to the follow-up facilities of the employment service in connection with the placing of domestic help. I may say that when this matter was brought to the attention of the committee last year by my hon. friend I arranged for the director of the employment service to speak directly with him in order to secure specific complaints. My information is that at that time my hon. friend did not supply any specific information which would have enabled an investigation to be made. Later on he made it clear that he had Vancouver in mind, and a telegram was sent to Mr. McVety, the superintendent of the Employment Service of Canada in British Columbia. The text of Mr. McVety's reply is as follows:

> Only one case in twenty years where employment service has received unfavourable criticism and this was in May, 1934. Girl twenty-one years of age, sent as domestic to residence in good district, was accompanied by a married woman with whom she was living who inspected home and advised girl to take position. Home later turned out to be operated by procurers who were sent to prison for various terms. Position of department in matter fully investigated by minister—> and local council of women who agreed every precaution had been taken. Vancouver city police prosecutor who made investigation and handled prosecution in preliminary hearing quite satisfied no blame attached to department and expressed thanks for assistance in obtaining witnesses. If Mr. MacNeil has any other case in mind will be glad to have particulars.

That is the minister of labour for British Columbia—

[Mr. Rogers.]

As my hon. friend is aware, it is very difficult to follow up these cases unless specific complaints are made. I can assure him that if he has any particular case in mind I shall be only too glad to investigate it for him.

Mr. MacNEIL: I wish to assure the minister that neither at this time nor last year was I attempting to single out the Vancouver office for criticism, nor was I suggesting that they were conniving to bring about circumstances which would be to the disadvantage of these single homeless girls. I advocate, and I hope the minister will encourage, the development of facilities that will afford every precaution. I hesitate to bring specific cases to the attention of the department or to introduce them into a public discussion. There is no doubt that sometimes young girls in destitute circumstances are exploited by unscrupulous persons. They are asked to work at low wages or to do work that is too arduous. Advantage is deliberately taken of their unfortunate circumstances. Frequently they have been exposed to the operations of procurers for the chain of brothels in the interior of British Columbia. I am not criticizing the Vancouver office. I am urging the federal government to give them every cooperation in extending the follow-up facilities. I believe it would be the desire of the officials in charge of the women's division of the Vancouver employment service to develop those facilities as far as possible, and I urge that some definite plan be adopted so that these transient young women, who are frequently in a helpless condition when they reach Vancouver, shall be given every assistance and protection.

Mr. ROGERS: I can assure my hon. friend that that certainly is the desire of those who direct the employment service, and some indication that the service is operated reasonably well in that respect is that very few complaints have been received. Certainly as soon as any are received they will be investigated.

Mr. MacNEIL: Will the minister develop the follow-up facilities?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, I shall do whatever can be done in that direction.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like certain information as to the advertisements for the second contract that was made with respect to Fort Henry. We had the date of the contract, and looking at the local newspapers there appears to have been no notice given of any tenders having been called for. The minister was of the opinion that notice was given, that the notice appeared in the Globe and Mail, and he was going to look into the matter. It becomes important in view of what was said by the minister the other evening, especially with regard to the terms of the contract. I do not know whether or not the minister has a copy of the contract before him.

Mr. ROGERS: No, I have not a copy of the contract before me. In the return which was asked for in the early part of the session, and which appears in Hansard of April 7, 1938, it is made quite clear that in the first year of the work at Fort Henry the contract price was $72,288.50, and in the second year $305,448.50.

Mr. BENNETT: It was the notice of the call of tenders for that contract of which I was speaking. The minister said the other evening that the date was March, 1937. I told him that the contractors had complained that there was no notice of any such tenders being called for. The minister thought that the notice appeared in certain papers, but a search has failed to indicate any such notice in the local papers, and the question is whether or not there was an extension of the unit basis of the first contract without tenders being called for.

Mr. ROGERS: There are three companies which appear to have tendered.

Mr. BENNETT: For the second year?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Who were they?

Mr. ROGERS: The Frid Construction Company, Harold Harvey, and McGinnis & O'Connor.

Mr. BENNETT: The Frid Company is of Hamilton, and both the others are local companies?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: What were the tenders?

Mr. ROGERS: For the second year the lowest bid was that of the Frid Construction Company, $305,448.50; Harold Harvey, $335,008; McGinnis & O'Connor, $328,743.50. I stated that according to information I received the other day the tenders were advertised in the Globe and Mail and in the construction journals. I shall be glad to confirm that.

Mr. BENNETT: It does not appear to have been advertised in the local Kingston paper, and a very casual search did not indicate the notice in the Globe and Mail. Was the Globe and Mail one or two papers at that time?

Mr. ROGERS: I think only one.

Mr. BENNETT: There is another matter. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) is not here, and I was desirous of obtaining certain information. When the minister was absent from the department the Minister of Labour was acting Minister of National Defence, and in view of what took place in this house the other day I have now authentic and much more complete information than I had when I was speaking then. The first question I desire to ask is this: Did the administrating officer at the Royal Military College make a report, which was entered in the R.M.C. central registry in May, 1937, and which was communicated here, and did the minister himself as acting Minister of National Defence make a reply to that document?

Mr. ROGERS: I will answer at once that I have no recollection at the present time of that report having been brought to my attention or of a reply having been made, but I shall attempt to ascertain if that was the case.

Mr. BENNETT: I will help the minister with respect to it. At noon on the second day of January, 1937, Major Stethem, now Lieutenant-Colonel Stethem, retired administrating officer of the Royal Military College, was proceeding to his home when he saw a large two-ton truck, No. 33511C, bearing the name of Louis Drinka, loading up and carting away a full load of crushed stone from the Royal Military College government stone pile near Navy bay. This pile had been diminishing in size and there had been discussions about it. As administrating officer Major Stethem followed the stone through the city and saw the truck proceed to a laneway, running west from Sydenham street. The stone was dumped into a shed in the rear of a house said to be owned or rented by Mr. Stansbury. The shed was being converted into a garage. Stethem asked the driver what authority he had for taking the government stone, and he stated he got his orders from Mr. Stansbury.

Stethem reported the matter in consequence of certain threats and matters of that sort which took place afterwards in respect to himself. The further taking of the stone was stopped; but in consequence of what happened, on the first day of May Stethem requested that his original report be a matter of record in the R.M.C. central registry. I wonder if the minister will be good enough to look at the files of the acting minister of National Defence, where I believe he will find a reply to that report. In view of the fact that the Minister of National Defence is not here and these papers will be looked for, I suggest that the item stand until we get that information, and that the minister proceed with other items, because when I deal with this I should like to deal with it completely and fully.

Mr. ROGERS: Most certainly I shall have no hesitation at all in letting the item stand until that information is brought down. But there is nothing in the report read by the leader of the opposition which in the slightest degree is at variance with the statement I made to the committee some time ago, that Mr. Stansbury himself acknowledged that he had received a load of this crushed rock with the consent of the officer in charge and that he laid that crushed rock upon places on the roadway leading to his garage. He denied vigorously the statement made by the leader of the opposition that his garage had been built with public property.

Mr. BENNETT: The observations I made are completely at variance with the statement made by the minister. The minister himself states that Mr. Stansbury said that he had permission to do what he did. As a matter of fact such is not the case, so far as I have been able to ascertain, for the simple reason that on the report being made by Stethem to his commanding officer, the adjutant, steps were immediately taken by telephone and further removal of the stone was stopped. The stone was quarried by government relief labour, taken to the crusher, and the operation was paid for entirely out of government funds. In consequence of what was said in the house the other day, this information has become available from the one source from which it could come and be authentic, and that is why I ask the minister to look at the files and see this report and ascertain what reply he himself sent to the Royal Military College as to what action was to be taken in the matter. A copy of his letter in any event is available at the office. The original, of course, is at the Royal Military College. That is the position at the moment.

The other matter I mentioned was in connection with white lead which disappeared. The minister, is, of course, aware of the young man's name. Perhaps I should not mention it. He was convicted before Magistrate Shea for stealing a tarpaulin, and ultimately sentenced to a month's imprisonment, and the time that he was in prison ran as part of the month. He went to Guelph. At the time he was in the public employ, and when he came back he was given the same job again, it having been held down during his absence by his father. He has since been convicted of a more serious offence, which involves punishment for just a day under two years, I believe. There is a case under appeal—I am not mentioning the name—but he is the man who gave information with respect to the white lead and where it went. Apparently it is a small matter, but it arises out of the administration of this office in Kingston and the methods that have been pursued in connection with this administration.

There is another matter which I think I should mention, although the minister who referred to it is not at present in the chamber. This question in connection with coal is not at all a new matter. To my surprise I found that it was the subject matter of public discussion at the last election, and Mr. Sowards, who has been attacked in this house, publicly said to his opponent, "I will put up a thousand dollars; you will put up a thousand dollars; I will name an engineer; you will name an engineer; they will choose a competent arbitrator; and if the bins to which you refer do not hold the amount of coal for which charges have been made. I forfeit my thousand dollars and am liable to any other penalties that may accrue to me by reason of it." That offer is still open. What is more, I have the measurements of the so-called bin. If the minister will read the solemn declaration of Mr. Gibson he will find that it does not touch this point at all. The cubical contents of the so-called bin are here, and I will give them, in view of the fact that although the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) dealt with this, and not the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), the Minister of Labour says he is responsible for procuring the statutory declaration. The bin was 31 feet, 6 inches long, 11 feet, 9 inches wide, and 6 feet, 9 inches high, which makes a total of 2,498 cubic feet. The number of tons it will hold depends upon the kind of coal that is used, but in any event at all times that number of cubic feet would hold more than is charged for in the ledger account which has been sent to me.

There is another point with respect to that. This matter has been discussed fully on the hustings and elsewhere. The offer Mr. Sowards made is still outstanding. His opponent has never taken it up. Mr. Sowards not having access to the public buildings, I understand some changes have been made in them since then. That, however, is not a matter of great importance, because it is well to understand the kind of bins they were. They were bins with holes in the outside through which coal was dumped; there was a central opening out of which part of the coal ran until it was thrown back in the bin, and there was a fire hole to which coal was delivered to obviate the necessity of carrying it from the storage bin to the place where it was used. The question as to the quantity of fuel used by the school, that is the public building, is not a matter over which Mr. Sowards had control. The deliveries were checked as to weights and other relevant matters, and if the government desires, although it is not their property, although it is purely a local matter and the other instances were purely provincial and not federal matters, if an honest opportunity is offered for the measurement of the bin and the determination of its capacity he will be only too glad to deal with it. We obviously as a federal power have nothing to do with it except as it was utilized by Mr. Gibson, who is a provincial and not a federal employee, who is dealing with a provincial and not a federal matter, and whose declaration, it will be observed at once, leads nowhere as far as this matter is concerned.

I was unable at first to understand why the Minister of National Defence made the statement in view of what he said the other evening; but when the Minister of Labour made the observations he did as to his part in it, I then quite understood, and this endeavour to think that an answer is made to the question of the administration of the Labour department's office in Kingston by making that declaration against John Sowards is, I think, somewhat beside the point. Mr. Sowards is ready and willing to meet the Minister of National Defence or anybody else, but obviously he cannot meet him with respect to provincial matters. And it is an odd thing that he had no complaint in this respect from the provincial authorities, but that the first intimation of it, so far as any official act is concerned, came from the federal authorities here. I need hardly say that the matter was so discussed, according to the public press, in Kingston during the last election that it became known apparently to everybody. But no action seems to have been taken by the people concerned, namely the provincial government. It is a strange circumstance that the declaration, which is by a very competent man, does not in any sense indicate the size of the bin or that he made any measurement. All he says is that it will not hold the amount of coal charged for and the amount, he says, charged in the ledger account in round figures; but the coal deliveries were weighed in; the men who weighed them are prepared to support their statements and produce the ordinary vouchers and papers which belong to the administration of a business of that kind, and this was the method pursued over a long term of years. I do not know that we can get any further with respect to the matter, it being a local one; for we have no documents or papers that can be produced.

Mr. ROGERS: Possibly my right hon. friend has not read the report of the penitentiaries commission, tabled to-day. I had not read it—

Mr. BENNETT: No, I have not read it.

Mr. ROGERS: —until the noon hour. That report refers specifically to two coal companies in Kingston, one of them the Sowards company, another the Morris company, with respect to which there had been complaints regarding short weight of coal. Two investigations were made by officers of the penitentiaries branch of the Department of Justice, one, I believe, by the warden of Collin's Bay penitentiary, the other by Mr. Dawson, an inspector of the penitentiaries branch. The commission has taken the view that the reports in each case which dealt with these matters were inadequate, and that the evidence which would exonerate the Sowards company and the other company involved is not conclusive. So it appears at once that there is this additional reason why the Sowards company, and I would say equally the other company involved, should be disqualified from tendering for public contracts until such time as the Department of Justice is able to deal with the subject matter of the report to which I have referred.

Mr. SLAGHT: May I make this suggestion to the leader of the opposition? This matter, as I understand, is primarily provincial and not federal. I think we are all familiar with the bombastic pre-election habit of offering to deposit a thousand dollars against somebody else who probably does not have a thousand dollars.

Mr. BENNETT: No trouble about that.

Mr. SLAGHT: Well, perhaps not, if my right hon. friend is as generous as he usually is. But my suggestion is. Should the time of the House of Commons at very great expense per hour be occupied with a problem which, as I understand, is one of somebody measuring the bins and bringing down a report for future discussion of the size of the bins, and also to determine whether a load of cement had a content of the value of two dollars or two dollars and a half? My suggestion is that these are picayune matters of detail in the individual cases which my right hon. friend is exploiting. Should he not persuade the gentlemen at Kingston who are priming him with the information to take their complaints to the tribunals which have jurisdiction, namely the provincial departments whose officers are said to be lax; and if, as was suggested the other day, crime is involved, to take their complaints to the department of the attorney general of Ontario. If some other hon. member produced some complaint from Halifax, we should have to have bins measured there for the House of Commons; and some other hon. member might hear of something at Vancouver where the size of a load of gravel would have to be appraised. This would be wasting woefully the time of parliament. There are efficient ministers in Ontario with efficient investigators and inspectors whose duty it is to have these matters set straight if there is a real foundation for the complaint. I suggest to my right hon. friend that it is his duty, if he will permit me to put it so strongly, to tell those gentlemen to take their complaints to the proper authority, and if they are not properly investigated, and if wrong-doing has occurred and is not punished, then surely it will be time enough to waste the time of the House of Commons on what seem to me trifling matters which should be corrected by the proper tribunal.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) had been diligent in his attendance in the House of Commons since he came to it, he would realize what the duties of the House of Commons are. One of the duties of that branch of the House of Commons known as the opposition is to investigate the expenditure of public moneys. Unfortunately the present opposition is small in numbers, so there falls upon me a much larger obligation than I like to contemplate, but one which as long as I occupy this position and am paid a salary for it under the provisions of the Public Service Act I shall continue to discharge to the best of my ability.

The question of John Sowards came up in connection with a tender for coal, involving a large sum of money. He was the lowest tenderer. He was not given a form of tender, but he sent in the lowest tender. The hon. member was not in the house when this matter came up. Sowards was not awarded the contract because it was said that he was not a fit and proper person to have it. The Deputy Minister of National Defence was used as the figurehead upon whom to put the blame. It now appears that this should not have been done. The Minister of National Defence, on being asked, in connection with the passing of his estimates, whose was the lowest tender, gave the figures, and the lowest tender was that of John Sowards. Then he said, "Here is the order in council." It was produced pursuant to an order of this house, with the relevant papers and the submission to council, and it showed that John Sowards did not get the contract because the minister, on the advice of the deputy minister, recommended that something should not be done. As I said, it appears that the deputy minister was not responsible at all. The Minister of Labour said in this chamber, as reported in Hansard: I am responsible for this; I say so and so; and in consequence of what I said about Sowards, he was not awarded the contract at the lowest tender. Thus this country was involved in the loss of a substantial sum of money.

I have not the slightest apology to offer for bringing the matter to the attention of the committee: that is my duty. If the hon. member is a diligent reader of the records of this house since confederation and will take the record of the Liberal party in opposition, he will realize that it is regarded by them as their first duty to deal with these matters, even such small matters as the number of brandy and liqueur glasses on the table of Sir Charles Tupper when he was high commissioner in London. When public finance is involved it is the duty of every member of the opposition to endeavour to show whether the country got the greatest value possible for its money.

I brought out the facts and let it rest at that. Then the other evening the Minister of National Defence, on the discussion of an item in the estimates for the Department of Labour, rose in his place and read a solemn declaration of one Alfred Leonard Gibson of Kemptville. The sixth paragraph of that declaration states:

> I measured the coal storage at the said school and according to measurements and the cubical contents of the said storage space it would be impossible to put more than fifty tons of dry coal into the coal storage space.

I can only say that anyone who knows anything about the cubic measurements of the given area and the solids that might be put in that space, allowing for air, knows that it would hold seventy tons.

I quite realize that the matter cannot be the subject of further discussion here, except for this: The minister has now risen in his place and speaks of something that he saw at noon. It was a report that was tabled to-day. As a member of the government he obviously had opportunity to see it. He finds that a commission appointed by the government to deal with the penitentiary situation in Canada has made a report. That investigation, conducted by the Department of Justice, under which the penitentiaries fall, has not been satisfactory. Who are these men? Are they more eminent than the Department of Justice? The minister says one company is the Morris Coal Company, and the Morris Coal Company was the coal company that Mr. Gibson says delivered the coal to him, that enabled him to get his year's supply at less cost than when he got it from Sowards, although he paid a higher price. It is the other company mentioned in the declaration read by the Minister of National Defence. Obviously men cannot be tried in that way. Clearly this commission had no right to do this. If this government feel that fraud has been practised, their duty is clear. But it is an odd thing that although this matter was discussed in the provincial election campaign, no proceedings have been taken by the provincial administration against anybody. As the hon. member has very properly pointed out, that is their business, not ours.

The question is incidental to the large question that we are discussing, namely, the administration of this labour office in Kingston. There is behind it one of the most important questions that this house will have to consider, one which, trifling and insignificant on the face of it, is yet a subject which engaged the attention of the mother of parliaments for two long debates. In certain questions there are great principles involved, and this happens to be one of them. When I secure the information which I am hoping to get—the minister is not here to-day—we shall finish that phase of it; and when I am doing so I shall deal also with another matter in which the statements were as grossly inaccurate as it is possible for statements to be with respect to the expenditure of public money in connection with roads in Manitoba. I listened to the extravagant language used, and I shall deal with it in the proper way at the appropriate time. But I want the rest of this information, which I was promised and which I dare say public duty has prevented the minister from furnishing up to the present. I am not complaining, but when I receive it I shall deal with it.

But I say to the hon. member for Parry Sound and to every hon. member of the committee that the control of the expenditure of public money is the basis of democratic institutions. Public money has always been the subject of most acute discussion in the House of Commons, and will continue to be. It was because of the questions that arose out of this item that I have ventured to discuss it; I offer no apology for doing so, and I am going to continue to do so until I get to the bottom of it; I make that abundantly clear. I assure the hon. member that it is much harder for me than it is for him, but as long as I have a duty to discharge I am going to discharge it. I am not unmindful of the references that have been made to my retirement, and the very nice language that has been used; but I wonder if the hon. member for Parry Sound knows just what did happen. Even the cost of my food was investigated. Does he realize that while I was Prime Minister questions were put on the order paper as to the cost of my food, as to the cost of the quarters I occupied, and all that sort of thing? That is what I had to endure, but I did not offer the slightest objection.

Now comes this last point, and when we deal with that I hope we shall put it just where it belongs. I am not going to deal with it until the information I have sought is produced, and I do not in any sense attach blame to the minister for the fact that the information is not available to-day, since the Minister of National Defence, probably on account of a very sad occurrence, is absent, I understand, on public business. Therefore it would be wrong for me to complain because the information is not forthcoming; but when that information is produced, these letters, this report and so on, I hope we shall dispose of these matters very quickly.

Mr. SLAGHT: The right hon, gentleman entirely misapprehended the suggestion I was making to him. It was not intended in any way to curb his investigation of the Sowards contract or the conditions under which it was granted or refused. My suggestion was that, having or purporting to have information indicating improprieties on the part of provincial officers at Kingston, who he admits are solely under provincial jurisdiction, he had a ready place to procure relief in regard to any wrongdoing that may have occurred there. The right hon. gentleman says he marvels that the provincial authorities did not take steps, because this was the subject of an election discussion. Well, if the provincial authorities began to take real steps in connection with matters that are bandied back and forth on the platform, there would be no end to it. But when definite information is in the possession of the right hon. gentleman, or people in Kingston who are advising him, it is not only their privilege but their duty to lay such information before the proper authorities. That was the suggestion I made to the right hon. gentleman, instead of wasting the time of this house on the petty side of it; giving him full opportunity and recognizing his perfect right to go forward with the matter of the Sowards contract. That is the only observation I desire to make.

Mr. ROGERS: As the right hon. gentleman has said, this matter can be very well carried further when the additional information is procured. I should like to point out, however—and I think this is the time to do it—that over the past six weeks the leader of the opposition has made a number of vague allegations, which I shall not dignify by the name of charges, with respect to a number of occurrences in Kingston and the neighbouring constituency of Frontenac-Addington.

I just want to go back over these allegations one by one, and I am in the judgment of the committee when I say that with respect to each one there has been not the slightest hesitation on my part either to investigate the complaint immediately or to produce anything that my right hon. friend has acquired with regard to it. The first specific statement made by the leader of the opposition was with reference to Mr. Stansbury, connecting him with the Frid Construction Company. The right hon. gentleman said that was due to his faulty recollection.

Mr. BENNETT: Do not magnify that; it was cleared up at once.

Mr. ROGERS: Nevertheless I am going to deal with it at the same time, because it went out in press dispatches all over the country.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the least important thing about him.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall come back to that again. When my right hon. friend made his correction and acknowledged that Mr. Stansbury was not a director of the Frid Construction Company, he said he confused the Frid Construction Company with two other companies, the Campbell Construction Company and the Frontenac Construction Company. What was the inference to be drawn from that? The inference obviously was—

Mr. BENNETT: Those were not the words.

Mr. ROGERS: —that Mr. Stansbury was connected with one of the other companies.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman must use the words correctly. Those were not the words used. Do not draw an implication from the wrong use of the words. Take the words.

Mr. ROGERS: The right hon. gentleman said there were two other companies there. My right hon. friend can look up the words, but he referred specifically to two other construction companies.

Mr. BENNETT: He certainly did.

Mr. ROGERS: Why, then, did he refer to these other companies if the intention was not to suggest that Mr. Stansbury was connected with them?

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly did not suggest that. Mr. Shea is the man who has to do with the Frontenac Construction Company.

Mr. ROGERS: Then what reason was there to mention that?

Mr. BENNETT: A good deal of reason, because it comes out in connection with the supplies that I have been talking about, and the Labour department. That is the point.

Mr. ROGERS: As a matter of fact, Mr. Stansbury had no connection whatever with either the Frid Construction Company, the Campbell Construction Company or the Frontenac Construction Company. Those were the three companies mentioned particularly by the leader of the opposition. Then I come to the further statement made subsequently, that Mr. Stansbury had built his garage with public property.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the way it was put.

Mr. ROGERS: That was the way it was put.

Mr. BENNETT: No. Just read it. Why should the minister put it inaccurately?

Mr. ROGERS: I leave it to the judgment of the committee whether I have put it inaccurately. I read from Hansard:

> Mr. Rogers: Certainly my right hon. friend seems to have made a special purpose of conducting a minute investigation in the constituency of Kingston, if he is now coming down to the question of the garage in the yard of the president of the Liberal association of that constituency.
> Mr. Bennett: If he built it with public property, that is my duty.
> Some hon. Members: Did he?
> Mr. Bennett: He certainly did.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly. I am coming to that, and that is exactly where the stone was delivered, into that shed that was being made into a garage.

Mr. ROGERS: I have already given to this committee the statement by Mr. Stansbury, which is in unequivocal terms and which was elaborated, as a matter of fact, in a statement which he gave to the Kingston Whig-Standard and which appeared in the issue of Friday of last week. In that issue he gave a detailed statement of the materials that went into that garage. The building itself, as I stated here, is some seventy years old. The building was renovated, but with materials purchased by Mr. Stansbury. The only question remaining is as to this truckload of crushed stone, which was obtained with the permission of the official in charge of that particular material.

Mr. BENNETT: Who says that?

Mr. ROGERS: That stone was placed upon the gravel road.

Mr. BENNETT: Who says that?

Mr. ROGERS: I have that from Mr. Stansbury.

Mr. BENNETT: Not the officer in command, as the reports will show, if I am correctly advised; and I wish the minister would get the documents before he makes that statement.

Mr. ROGERS: The documents will be found and produced; but I understand that Major Bissonnette—and that is the name used by my right hon. friend—was said to have given that permission.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly, and he is not available; but that is not what the record shows.

Mr. ROGERS: What remains, then, of this statement by my right hon. friend that this garage was built with public property? Was it correct or not?

Mr. BENNETT: Correct to this extent, that I read, as I had authority to read, of this truck that went from Navy bay, where stone was quarried at the expense of the Canadian people, with machinery paid for by the Canadian people, down to where its contents were dumped into that building. The streets were described, and the number of the truck was taken by the officer in charge at the military college, who reported it to his superiors who telephoned Stansbury and stopped it. He did not make any suggestion then that he had authority from anybody.

Mr. ROGERS: All that appears in the statement I made in this house on Friday, with specific reference to the fact that this crushed stone had been laid upon the roadway leading to the garage; but my right hon. friend said that this was a garage built with public property. The statement was absolutely incorrect, and I think the right hon. leader of the opposition ought to retract it here and now.

I come to the next statement, in regard to the Frid Construction Company having removed certain crushed stone from the quarry to another building, the Crain building, which was being constructed by the same company at Queen's university.

Mr. BENNETT: No; cement.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend referred to rubble-stone as well. I have a report here to the quartermaster-general, and I place it on Hansard here and now, because I think the sooner these matters are dealt with the better:

1. Reference the matter of disposal of stone from departmental property at Royal Military College and at Barriefield. The only information available on file is as follows: (a) In May of 1937 a request was received from the Kingston tennis club for a few loads of waste material from the rock crushing plant at Barriefield. This request was refused as all of the material was required for roads in R.M.C. grounds. (b) In July, 1937, a request was received through military district No. 3 for the use of waste stone from the Barriefield quarry, to be used for wall facing on a building at Queen's university. This application was approved on the understanding that the Frid Construction Company would pay 20 cents per cubic yard for an approximate amount of 200 cubic yards of stone.

In other words, that was done with the full permission of the Department of National Defence, and was a commercial transaction.

Mr. BENNETT: Had the stone been moved at that time?

Mr. ROGERS: I am reading from the report as I have it here. Most certainly the transaction was one which was agreed to by the Department of National Defence, and was not a case of the Frid Construction Company transferring to the Crain building at Queen's material that ought to have been used elsewhere.

Mr. SLAGHT: No false record in that.

Mr. ROGERS: I continue:

(c) An application was received in September, 1937, from Mr. Harry McLean, Kingston, for the purchase of 1,500 cubic yards of waste rock from Barriefield quarry at 5 cents per cubic yard, for crushing purposes. This was duly approved, subject only to the provision that it did not interfere with the supply of waste rock from the same quarry to a contractor who was at that time making a rock fill for the department at Tete de Pont barracks. Protests were received from persons in Kingston against the sale of rock to Mr. McLean with the result that Mr. McLean was ordered to take his crushing plant out of the quarry, but that he would be permitted to remove the balance of the 1,500 cubic yards. Mr. McLean then rented his crushing plant to the Frid Construction Company, who used it for crushing rock for their Fort Henry work.

(d) I can find no trace of a report from the commandant, Royal Military College in connection with rock or stone removal, and as the quarry at Barriefield was under the control of the D.O.C., M.D. 3, it is unlikely that the commandant would have submitted any such report.

(e) There is no report from the D.O.C., M.D. 3 on any other matter in this connection than as above stated.

This is signed by E. Schmidlin, Colonel, D.E.S. That is an official report from the Department of National Defence with respect to another matter raised by the leader of the opposition, namely the transfer of rubble rock from this quarry to the Crain building, the inference being that the Frid Construction Company had done it for some sinister purpose, and that the public interest had been jeopardized thereby.

I come now to another matter with which I dealt the other day, but with which I think I shall deal again at this time, namely, cement. The leader of the opposition has referred to the matter at some length. I have in my hand a telegram from the Frid Construction Company which sets out the entire transaction. It is, as I stated originally, a transaction which is common among contractors who have a number of jobs in the same area. It was done with the consent of the provincial authorities. I wish to place this statement on Hansard:

Confirming our statement re cement on our work Kingston. From our car shipped to Crain building Kingston May 29th/37 we took 350 bags to Fort Henry. When government car CN 412639 arrived we returned the 350 bags borrowed from Crain building car. During construction work at Fort Henry in order to keep work going borrowed cement in similar way from Drurys and Daltons supply houses. When government cars arrived returned borrowed cement from cars. On June 25th/37 arranged with government authorities to borrow from Fort Henry balance of cement required to complete Crain building in small quantities. The dates and quantities taken are shown on list sent you. We completed Crain building November 1st/37 and on same date returned 1,000 bags in car load quantity to Fort Henry. The balance 750 bags car load returned when Fort could handle same January 24th—

Mr. BENNETT: January 24, 1938?

Mr. ROGERS:

—both cars we purchased from Drury Supply Company.

This is signed by the Frid Construction Company. The list of cement loaned from the Fort Henry project to the Frid Construction Company is as follows:

Date	Bags
June 28	60
June 29	150
July 2	60
July 7	60
July 20	150
July 21	150
July 31	130
August 4	250
August 27	70
September 1	100
September 2	200
September 9	180
September 15	225
September 16	100
September 20	60
	1,945

That was a list kept by the Frid Construction Company of the cement which was loaned in this way.

Mr. BENNETT: Loaned from where to where?

Mr. ROGERS: From Fort Henry to the Crain building, and some of it the other way. The Frid Construction Company happened to have two contracts in the same area at the same time. The leader of the opposition certainly intended to convey the impression that the Frid Construction Company was defrauding the government, and that the dominion government, inasmuch as it was contributing to this particular project, had suffered accordingly.

This information certainly denies any sinister character in that transaction. The accounts, I may say further, are all submitted through the provincial government, and are audited by the representative of the comptroller of the treasury before the dominion government recognizes any financial responsibility at all therefor. But the transaction as set out here is one which certainly, on the face of it, appears to be, and in my opinion is, an entirely honest transaction. I am advised that arrangements of this kind are by no means unusual with respect to contractors having a number of jobs in the same district. At all events it is clear beyond question that the cement which was loaned was fully returned. The Frid Construction Company is certainly a firm which enjoys the highest reputation. I have never for a moment at any time heard any suggestion to the contrary.

I come now to another statement made by the leader of the opposition. I am disposing of these, one by one. Another statement was to the effect that in the disposal of the equipment from the relief camps there had been some evidence of malfeasance, or evidence that the public interest had not been well served. The other day the Minister of National Defence dealt specifically with all the equipment that had been disposed of from camps 42 and 37, when those camps were closed. The equipment was disposed of by the salvage officer of the dominion government, and was disposed of in no other way. As a matter of fact, a very small amount of the equipment was actually sold. Certainly the report effectively disposes of any suggestion that there was anything out of the way in the transaction connected with the disposal of that equipment.

Mr. BENNETT: Horses were not mentioned by the minister.

Mr. ROGERS: The minister made a complete statement as to the equipment disposed of. Any other equipment of the relief camps is still on storage in the district. There is a further reference to this strange and mysterious fire which occurred one night. There again the statement by the Minister of National Defence is complete and conclusive. An investigation was made by the Department of National Defence, and it was found that no blame attached to anyone who had any connection whatsoever with the equipment which was disposed of in the manner set out in the report made by the Minister of National Defence.

We now come to the question of white lead. I believe there was mention of twenty-five containers of white lead. With the best will in the world I have been unable to discover as yet where this white lead was originally located when, as the leader of the opposition states, it was removed. I wish he would tell me now where it was located. He said originally it was at Fort Henry. My information is that there has never been more than two twenty-five pound cans of white lead in Fort Henry at any time. That is sufficient for their purposes. Yet my right hon. friend stated that this amount of white lead was taken from Fort Henry. Will he tell me now where the white lead was originally?

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I am trying to find out.

Mr. ROGERS: But the leader of the opposition is supposed to be making an allegation.

Mr. BENNETT: I inquired what had happened to the twenty-five cartons of white lead that disappeared.

Mr. ROGERS: Where were they located originally? I have inquired from the Frid Construction Company and—

Mr. BENNETT: They were at Fort Henry.

Mr. ROGERS: —I have inquired from the Department of National Defence, who have no information at all with respect to the matter. All I ask the leader of the opposition with respect to the white lead is that he provide me with more information, and I will make an investigation. I have not withheld a single document in connection with the whole matter. I have from time to time tried to deal with these complaints as they have arisen. But the pity of it all is that the leader of the opposition in this case is willing to accept evidence which I suggest, as a barrister he would not submit to a justice of the peace.

Mr. SLAGHT: Do not call it evidence, please.

Mr. ROGERS: "Evidence" is really not the word for it. When you take what is left of these vague allegations made by the leader of the opposition, what you have in effect is this: Mr. Stansbury was applied to by a returned soldier for assistance in getting employment; Mr. Stansbury gave him a letter, but he was told by the foreman on the job that he could not secure a position because he was a Conservative. I believe Mr. Stansbury acted in entire good faith in that matter. We have also had certain charges made against the director of the employment office in Kingston. On Saturday morning I instructed the director of the employment service that the charges made by the leader of the opposition should be brought at once to the attention of the superintendent of the employment service of Ontario for such investigation as was required.

Mr. BENNETT: They have been made for some time.

Mr. ROGERS: It is entirely a matter for the superintendent of the employment service of Ontario to take whatever measures appear to be required as a result of his investigation. There has been no interference on my part with the administration of that employment service.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not suggest that there had been. I suggested there had been local interference in Kingston.

Mr. ROGERS: I have gone over the statements of the leader of the opposition most carefully, and on Friday and to-day I have given to the committee such information as I suggest disposes of at least ninety-five per cent of the allegations made. So far as the others are concerned, I shall certainly investigate them with the least possible delay. May I say that if any member of this committee has reason to have a personal grievance against another, I have reason to have a grievance against my right hon. friend. Six weeks ago he made his first charge. He says he did not mention me as being personally responsible in the matter, but my right hon. friend has it in his power as leader of the opposition —he is assumed to speak only with a full sense of responsibility—to create newspaper headlines, and he did. Newspaper headlines were published throughout this country on at least four separate occasions suggesting corruption and debauchery in the constituency of Kingston.

Mr. BENNETT: Who suggested that?

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend suggested that. Not only that, but time and time again it has been stated that the leader of the opposition was making an attack upon the Minister of Labour because of these conditions which were alleged to exist. As I have said, this has gone on over a period of six weeks, and it was not until Friday that the leader of the opposition rose in his place and said that he absolved me from any personal connection whatever with the charges.

Mr. BENNETT: I said that at the very beginning.

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend did not say that.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I did.

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend certainly did not succeed in convincing those who send out the press reports that I was entirely absolved in the matter. I suggest to him that what he really did was to apply what might be termed the slow poison of defamation over a period of six weeks. At the close of that time, to use the words of the hon. member for Queens-Lunenburg (Mr. Kinley), he bestows upon me the kiss of high regard. I suggest that the leader of the opposition would have been far better advised if, when he received these pieces of information, he had brought them to my attention to be dealt with in a manner in which I hope he has some reason to believe they would be dealt with—with a full sense of my responsibility as a minister of the crown. Sometimes I am inclined to think my right hon. friend has a dual personality. For his better self—for the public-spirited statesman—I have nothing but the highest respect; but for his other self—for the vindictive partisan—I can only say that I have a mixture of sorrow and contempt. If my right hon. friend is going to deal with these matters from the standpoint of his responsibilities as leader of the opposition, I think it is high time that he alters his manner from that in which he has been dealing with these questions during the past few days.

Mr. BENNETT: I am obliged to the hon. gentleman for his lecture.

An hon. MEMBER: It will not do you any good.

Mr. BENNETT: It will not do me any good; it will be wasted on me, as the hon. gentleman says. The hon. gentleman has been so accustomed to lecturing that he undertakes now to lecture me with respect to my conduct in parliament. For nine years he was around about Ottawa. His great claim to fame is as a biographer of the Prime Minister and as a competent secretary who prepared many speeches to which I listened with great interest and sometimes amusement. I have a duty that is quite as great as that of the hon. gentleman; only I am out of office while he is in office. I was in office once, and he was out of office. When he sought the support of the people of Kingston he undertook to outline a new order of things. The old order was to pass away.

Mr. ROGERS: I said the relief camps would be closed, and they were.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not the relief camps that we are talking about; it is a question of the administration of the affairs of this country. The hon. gentleman found himself placed in charge of the Department of Labour. The relief camps were closed by the federal government and opened by the provincial government in British Columbia.

Mr. ROGERS: On an entirely different basis.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite. Those camps were closed, and to-day we have people asking that the federal camps be reopened. That request is being made by many people who complained bitterly in those days. We now have a public building owned by the people of Canada, by the crown in the right of the dominion, made into the kind of camp which the minister approves. It is true that the camps to which he referred were abolished, but a public post office has now become a camp. We had the spectacle of the acting Postmaster General (Mr. Euler) rising in his place the other evening and telling us about the games the men had on May 24 and the efforts to which they went to clean things up afterwards and leave the property in proper shape. So far as we are concerned, we had the camps closed last year in British Columbia, as the minister promised—he pounded his desk vigorously and said he closed them up—but we have a camp established in the post office at Vancouver to take care of six or seven hundred people. That is the sort of camp he prefers. But I was dealing with his statements to the electors of this country and he must remember—

Mr. ROGERS: Read them then.

Mr. BENNETT: The Whig-Standard contains a fair report of the hon. member's speeches.

Mr. ROGERS: I am sure my right hon. friend has a file of them and he should read them.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not the file beside me. Like the hon. gentleman, I did not bring all the papers from the library. I do not think it necessary to say more than I said a few evenings ago, namely, that he said he was going to create a new order of things. Much more was expected of him than would be expected of the average man or of the average minister. He was bringing to bear his wide knowledge and vast experience in connection with public affairs in his particular riding. We were not going to have the conditions that existed in days gone by. We were going to have a new order of things. He was the new salvation, and a new earth was to come into being with the election of the hon. gentleman to parliament and his appointment to office. I have been pointing out that the conditions which exist in Kingston are worse to-day than they have been in the past, and that the whole atmosphere was redolent of patronage of the worst possible kind.

Mr. SLAGHT: What about the Manitoba case?

Mr. BENNETT: There will be no difficulty about that, and if all the private and confidential letters sent to the hon. member were put on record here to-day I do not think he would stay here long; that is all.

Mr. SLAGHT: Mr. Chairman, that is too contemptible really to pay much attention to. Because my right hon. friend is caught red-handed in one of the most nefarious patronage deals of which this country has ever heard, he loses his temper.

Mr. BENNETT: I merely repeat my statement, and I say it applies to many more besides the hon. member.

Mr. GARDINER: Repeating it does not make it true.

Mr. BENNETT: And if all the private and confidential papers in respect to the conduct of elections in Saskatchewan were made public here, what would happen? What would happen about the contributions?

Mr. GARDINER: Mine can all be published, but yours cannot.

Mr. BENNETT: I think some people would feel awfully sick if yours were.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I want to tell the leader of the opposition that that was not a private but a public document belonging to the house when I read from it.

Mr. BENNETT: I was interrupted, Mr. Chairman, and I made my observation in consequence of it, which I think is a fairly true one, as everybody knows who has anything to do with politics in this country.

I stated to the minister that in view of the attack which was made against me personally at the time of the election—I was Hitler, Stalin and Mussolini combined, the Prime Minister said at Kingston, and the building of armouries was the beginning of militarism which the then Prime Minister was creating in this country—that was the position then.

Mr. ROGERS: And what is this, reprisal?

Mr. BENNETT: No; this is the result of what I then determined, that I would ascertain to the extent of my ability just how far this new departure was going to cleanse and purify politics.

Mr. ROGERS: If I might say so, the leader of the opposition might discharge his informants for inefficiency.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister perhaps will think that quite in keeping with his general reputation for cleverness, but it has nothing to do with the issue.

Mr. ROGERS: It has a great deal to do with it.

Mr. BENNETT: The issue is this: The minister was to create this new condition at Kingston, and I said, and I repeat, that Kingston has been a very difficult place for a very long number of years. The first year I came to this house was in 1911; I was in parliament from 1911 to 1917, and during that time the then Conservative member for Kingston, Mr. Nickle, was complaining of certain things that had been done in connection with the penitentiary. That was going on, and there were questions of patronage with respect to every other department; there was the question of the guards, and whether the regulations had been carried out; and then the civil service came into the matter. That was all going on during that period. I came back to the house in 1926; from then until the present time I have been a member of the house, and from 1926 to 1935 to my knowledge there was always trouble about Kingston. When the hon. gentleman, now Minister of Labour, made his excellent declaration of public policy as to the preservation of our institutions and of democracy itself, I wanted to see whether his actions would be in keeping with what was done in the country to the south where, when President Wilson left the president's chair and became governor of New Jersey, he had to fight the machine in order to vindicate the position he had taken before he went into politics, and I was curious to see whether the Minister of Labour would be able to resist the pressure of Kingston as expressed in the Liberal party machine.

Mr. ROGERS: There is no Liberal party machine there. The Liberal party was out of power there for thirty years.

Mr. BENNETT: I say that is what I wished to ascertain. It was not a question of reprisals or of vindictiveness, but a question of whether there was strength to resist and destroy or whether he would succumb and attorn, and the minister attorned to the party machine and succumbed to it.

Mr. ROGERS: That is not true.

Mr. BENNETT: That language is not quite in order.

Mr. ROGERS: But true nevertheless.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not in order but—

Mr. ROGERS: The only time to deny it is when you make the statement.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister might say it is inaccurate. I think that is the way he intended to say it. Now, assuming it is inaccurate, let me put this to him: Why is it that you have on the public records of this country the Minister of National Defence answering questions and pointing out that the president of the Liberal association appointed this man, that man and the other man, with his recommendation? If this condition was prevailing, the machine was still in control. Why was it that Rollands had to go to Stansbury to get a position? Why was it that Stansbury gave him a letter stating that Mr. Shea, who was the magistrate to whom I referred the other day, was ill in hospital? He is one of the heads of the Frontenac Construction Company. Why did you have the conditions you had in the employment office? Why did you have these men in court stating they were being charged with non-support of their wives, and saying: "We cannot get a job."

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. ROGERS: One person.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is symptomatic. The minister assumes there is personal vindictiveness towards him, but I assure him that is not the case. He knows that I have for him personally a warm regard, but I say that conditions in Kingston as indicated by the illustrations I have given—and they were not intended to prove—

Mr. ROGERS: What remains of them now?

Mr. BENNETT: Every one remains just as it was. You had first of all men who could not secure positions. What about the positions that men sought for and could not get? What about the men who were convicted and sent to the reformatory and who came back to the job? What about it? These things are not denied. What about the conditions that prevail in that employment office?

Mr. ROGERS: Did I not tell my right hon. friend that that matter is being investigated?

Mr. BENNETT: Quite, but the difficulty I point out to the minister is that it is no good going to him quietly and for him to say he will investigate. Parliament is the place for publicly airing these grievances. It is the place where one may counter the declarations of policy that were made from the hustings. That is what it is for, and no one knows it better than the minister. Then there are the cases with respect to the employment service. These are cases that, quite obviously, are symptomatic of a condition.

We come now to the question whether public moneys have been properly guarded. The minister says that with respect to cement and rubble the consent of the provincial government was given. I ask him, when? I gave him evidence of cement being hauled up to the college building, and I knew perfectly well they would say they had consent. Why did they haul the bags back to Fort Henry?

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend has not given the source of his information in a single instance. I have done so in connection with every one.

Mr. BENNETT: But not under oath any more than the statements I have made. Mine are just as valuable.

Mr. ROGERS: I have the statements from the reports of the officers of the Department of National Defence. Rubble-stone—

Mr. BENNETT: The rubble-stone I was dealing with has not been dealt with there. With respect to cement, there is a carload of cement, and here are the plans and specifications. They supply the cement. It belongs to the crown in the right of the province. The contractor takes the cement and uses it on a private contract, and he says, "I got consent." When? What is more, everyone knows he should not ask for consent with respect to crown property; and what is more, the count of the paper bags in which cement is put is the evidence that the crown in right of the province has, to use it as a check, when it comes to pay its bills for the job. Those bags were carried from the Crain building to Fort Henry at night.

Mr. ILSLEY: Who says so?

Mr. BENNETT: Who says so? The man who did it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Who is he?

Mr. BENNETT: Drinka was the man in charge.

Mr. ROGERS: Does my right hon. friend want to have the explanation which is given for that?

Mr. BENNETT: I know the explanation that the contractor made; and he says, "This is rot." That is what the minister read the other day.

Mr. ROGERS: The reason is that in the grounds of Queen's university there was not space for storage of the cement, and when the cement was loaned, and taken out of the sacks, the bags were simply returned to the Fort Henry depot to be destroyed.

Mr. BENNETT: Not to be destroyed, to be counted.

Mr. ROGERS: They were counted, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly. And I ask the minister if he can establish by any testimony that that consent was given until after the discussions took place in Kingston with respect to this.

Mr. ROGERS: My information is, yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Then all I can say is, check it up. What is more, it is just this type of thing which has created the condition that has warranted me in bringing the matter before the committee. Just what condition? These irregularities, this seeing in the community the dragging of cement from the government of Ontario's car of cement to a private contract, and the drawing of the empty bags at night back to Fort Henry—that is not the way in which business is transacted as honest business, and the minister knows he does not approve it.

Mr. ROGERS: I gave a full statement in the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: I beg pardon.

Mr. ROGERS: I gave my right hon. friend a full statement in the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: This is the way in which they dismiss this matter of the paper sacks, that it is "rot." There used to be cloth sacks, jute sacks—

Mr. ROGERS: But I read a telegram.

Mr. BENNETT. The word the minister read the other day was "rot." I suppose it is. Is that the idea? The minister accepts the denial of these people, who are the people concerned, with respect to it all. How does he know who sent the telegram?

Mr. ROGERS: The difference is this. This statement will be audited. The dominion government will not pay a cent unless this statement is correct, but my right hon. friend will receive information from any source whatever without making the slightest effort to corroborate it. That is the difference.

Mr. BENNETT. The hon. gentleman knows that the system with respect to payments was established by the former government, and he has clung to it.

Mr. ROGERS: It has been improved.

Mr. BENNETT: I daresay that experience enables the hon. gentleman to improve it. But there was a pre-audit before the account was paid. First of all, there were three certificates. I am not going into that now except to say there was a pre-audit. But the paper bags were counted at Fort Henry to determine the quantity of cement that went into Fort Henry, and the cement that went into these bags was left over at the Crain building. The minister says, "Here is the statement of the bags they changed, 1,745 bags." And when did they buy back the cement that replaced it?

Mr. ROGERS: Will my right hon. friend permit a question? If the Frid Construction Company had intended to make fraudulent use of this cement, would they have taken a careful count each date of the cement that was so transferred? Does that appear to the leader of the opposition to be logical?

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact, they had that, of course, as they checked them into the Crain building from the car. Of course they did. Where else would they get it? And then, they say, "we returned it and checked it on behalf of the Dominion of Canada."

Mr. ROGERS: But if they had wanted to steal it, as my right hon. friend was suggesting—

Mr. BENNETT: I did not suggest that.

Mr. ROGERS: —they would not have kept count of it.

Mr. BENNETT: Does the minister approve this way of doing business? That is the issue. That is the short way to put it.

Mr. ROGERS: That is not the short way to put it.

Mr. BENNETT: That is satisfactory to me; if he says he approves it, that is all I want.

Mr. ROGERS: I have already told my right hon. friend that with respect to any financial responsibility of the dominion we act on accounts approved by the department. If this is a correct transaction, it will be approved, otherwise no. But it is a correct transaction according to our records so far.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not the issue. Does the minister give the high sanction of his approval to that method of doing business?

Mr. ROGERS: My answer at once is that, according to the evidence I have at this time, which I am prepared to investigate further, but which does not appear to require anything further at this point, I would say that there had been no loss involved in this transaction. As to whether this is a practice among contractors, I am not a contractor myself and I cannot say; but my information is that this cement was taken from one job to another, both jobs being done by the same contractor, and that it is not at all unusual for contractors to make loans and replacements of that kind. That is the information which comes to me.

Mr. BENNETT: And nobody questions that in connection with an ordinary transaction. But this is a case in which, as I read from the specification, the cement belonged to the crown and was supplied to the contractor; it was not the contractor's cement; it was not his to deal with.

Mr. ROGERS: When he took delivery.

Mr. BENNETT: No; he did not take delivery for himself; he took delivery to work it into that property at Fort Henry. I ask, does the minister give the sanction of his approval to that method of transacting public business?

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. GRAY: The contractor must surely have been charged with it when he took delivery?

Mr. BENNETT: The contractor was charged with a carload of cement.

Mr. GRAY: When he took delivery.

Mr. BENNETT: Delivery on the siding at Kingston; and it is so written in the specification, that they will supply the cement, and the cement is supplied. Then this man trades it off by hauling it to another job that he has. What have we as to the accuracy of the statement that he has made as to these bags, and when were replacements made? The minister gave the dates. When were the replacements made? In November. And when were deliveries made? I only point out that this is not a proper way of doing business; that is all.

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend said more than that. He said it was dishonest.

Mr. BENNETT: I say it is a dishonest way of doing business. I say this is a dishonest way of doing public business.

Mr. ROGERS: Whether it is a proper way of doing public business is another question, but certainly it is not dishonest.

Mr. BENNETT: I say it is a dishonest way of doing public business, and I do not believe the minister will rise in his place and give his approval to that way of doing business.

Mr. ROGERS: I will say that certainly it is not dishonest. Whether or not it is improper is a question, I would say, which should be determined on the basis of what is the practice of contractors. I would say that certainly they should have had and in all probability did have the consent of the provincial authorities to make that transfer.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Parry Sound will admit that unless the consent was given antecedent to the change, it is theft under the criminal code; for it is fraudulent conversion.

Mr. SLAGHT: Since I have been invited to express myself, my right hon. friend should know, and I am sure he does, that it must be without colour of right; that is, with an evil mind.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES

PROVISIONS FOR WIDENING OF CAUSES FOR DIVORCE IN CASES BEFORE COURTS

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre) moved the second reading of Bill No. 119, respecting divorce and matrimonial causes.

He said: As the house will recognize, this is a senate bill. It came over to this house and remained on the order paper for several days, and, I take it, would have been dropped had I not sponsored it.

An hon. MEMBER: Let it drop.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No. I have taken it up because I believe it is highly desirable legislation. I could have wished that someone else had undertaken to pilot it through the house. However, it seemed that no one else was willing to do this, so I felt it was my responsibility because I believe this legislation should pass. Personally I have no very special interest in divorce as such. Several years ago I sponsored a bill providing for the setting up of divorce courts in Ontario. I did so simply because as one member of the house I was utterly weary of going through the performance that we do go through in passing divorce bills. Every hon. member I think recognizes the procedure: The bill is introduced in the senate; the case is investigated by a senate committee, which perhaps is not strictly in the nature of a court—members coming in and going out again in the course of the hearing—and after that it comes to us. We have a private bills committee which gives scant attention to these cases, unless, indeed, there is some special lobby, and then we may consider the case to a certain extent. But we rarely have witnesses before us; as a rule we rely almost entirely on the printed evidence as it comes to us from the senate committee. Then, when the bills come over to this house, they are frequently passed, as they were to-night, en bloc. None of us, I fancy, knows anything as to the merits of the bills which we passed a few minutes ago. None of us knows anything much about them. We give them readings in this house, first, second and third, in a purely formal way. That procedure is not at all satisfactory. Indeed, I agree very largely with what was said the other day by the hon. member for Témiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) to the effect that it is rather a scandalous procedure.

The trouble a few years ago was that we were getting large numbers of divorce cases from Ontario; indeed, it had become an open scandal, and it was for that reason that I sponsored the bill which had come from the senate providing for the setting up of a divorce court for Ontario. I believe that is the right way to handle the question of divorce. That bill did not include Quebec because of the very strong feeling against divorce which prevails in a certain section of that province. However, I think a majority of hon. members in this house will agree that the setting up of a divorce court for Ontario was the right thing to do. Certainly by this time this house would have been deluged with literally hundreds of cases, to which it could have given very little attention.

This new measure has been, as it were, laid at my door.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): As my hon. friend knows, the legislation in respect to Ontario has multiplied the number of divorces in that province ten times.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Perhaps it has. But let me point out to my right hon. friend that before that legislation was enacted it took a considerable amount of money to see a divorce case through parliament. Therefore only people who had money to spend to come to Ottawa and to employ lawyers could secure a divorce. My idea of justice is that it ought to be just as possible for poor people as for wealthy people to secure relief; and if people at Windsor or Niagara Falls or anywhere found it impossible to secure divorce solely for the reason that they could not come to Ottawa and employ lawyers, I think it is right that courts should be established within their reach.

Mr. CHEVRIER: The condition is no better to-day in the courts so far as fees go than it was when divorces came before parliament.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not see how it can be worse! I do not want anyone to state here that I am out to break up the home. I am just as anxious to preserve the home as any hon. member in this house. This measure deals only with cases in which a home is already broken. Further, I do not want anyone to say that I desire to encourage immorality. I firmly believe that this measure, if carried, will save many from temptation to immorality. Perhaps I may be permitted to say that I speak as a child of a happy home. I speak as the father and husband in a happy family. I am supported in this measure which I am advocating by a large number of people of the very highest character. Hence I hope that, whatever the nature of the debate that may follow upon the introduction of this bill, no one will begin to sling mud and suggest that there are any other than the highest motives on the part of those who favour this bill.

I speak also as a social worker who knows something of the broken homes, and would seek if possible to save something from the wreckage.

To adultery as a ground for divorce this bill would add desertion, cruelty and insanity. The bill is an adaptation of the act passed in the British House of Commons in 1937. The British act was passed on the report of a royal commission of 1912. The majority of the royal commission laid down the principle that marriage ought to be dissoluble upon any grounds which frustrated what by universal admission were the fundamental purposes of marriage. I pause to repeat that statement, because it is a rather far-reaching principle.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the basis of the bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is the fundamental principle of the report of the royal commission, and the basis of the English bill. There are, of course, some who think that marriage can never be dissolved. I am not speaking to that group at the moment. But I am speaking of a situation which exists where divorce is recognized. The idea behind the report of the English commission was that when the very purposes of marriage were frustrated, a divorce was the best possible solution. Let me read that principle again: Marriage ought to be dissoluble upon any grounds which frustrated what by universal admission were the fundamental purposes of marriage. The preamble to the English act puts its purpose very clearly:

> Whereas it is expedient for the true support of marriage, the protection of children, the removal of hardship, the reduction of illicit unions and unseemly litigation, the relief of conscience among the clergy, and the restoration of due respect for the law, that the acts relating to marriage and divorce be amended.

Then follows the bill. In introducing the measure Colonel Herbert said the bill was to prevent perjury, immorality and collusion, and I am afraid we have had all these evils existing under our mode of procedure here in this parliament. I am not prepared to say to what extent they exist in the courts.

An hon. MEMBER: And they will continue to exist under this bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Well, my hon. friend expresses an opinion, to which of course he is entitled; but that was not the opinion, for instance, of that very representative commission in Great Britain, nor was it the opinion of the majority in the British houses of parliament.

I want to emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that the constitutionality of the bill was carefuly considered in the senate, whose counsel showed that there was no doubt as to its constitutionality. So I do not think we need pause to-night to discuss that question.

Again let me point out, as is done in the explanatory notes, that the only courts in Canada to which this bill applies are those which now have jurisdiction to decree divorce. We are not setting up any new courts; we are not instituting any new procedure. We are simply dealing with the grounds of divorce in the courts which now have jurisdiction.

The bill deals with divorce, judicial separation, avoidance and alimony, of which, of course, divorce is the most important section. The grounds for divorce are enumerated in section 6:

> A petition for divorce may be presented either by the husband or the wife to, and it may be entertained by, the court, on the ground that the respondent:
> (a) has since the celebration of the marriage committed adultery; or
> (b) has deserted the petitioner without cause for a period of at least six years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition; or
> (c) has since the celebration of the marriage treated the petitioner with cruelty; or
> (d) is incurably of unsound mind and has been continuously under care and treatment for a period of at least five years immediately preceding the presentation of the petition.

The first ground, of course, has long been recognized; that is adultery, and I do not intend to enter into a discussion of that ground. The second ground is desertion for six years, which really means seven years before the case can be tried. It has sometimes been charged that the effect of a bill of this kind would be to introduce trial marriage. I do not think anyone can seriously contend that such would be the case. It is only after desertion for seven years that action can be secured. Let me further point out a fact that was new to me. In preparing to present this bill I was reading the Life and Letters of Lord Birkenhead, and I found that since 1573 desertion has been a ground for divorce in Scotland. I do not think anyone can contend that immorality has been more rife in Scotland than elsewhere; that more homes have been broken up in that country, or that there have been any specially injurious results. Yet desertion, a new ground for divorce as far as England was concerned, and as far as this country is concerned, actually has been a ground for divorce in Scotland since 1573.

Mr. HANSELL: Desertion for what period?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I could not say; I did not look that up.

Mr. REID: It is very seldom used.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I could not say as to that; but that has been the law, and there is no special reason why it should be used more frequently outside Scotland, except possibly the fact that in this modern day people are travelling about more than they once did.

The third ground is cruelty. Again let me say that some people have become quite frivolous in their explanations as to what constitutes cruelty. I think we need not pay much attention to such objections, because cruelty is defined in the English law in the case of Russell v. Russell,—1897 Appeal Cases, page 395, as follows:

> Legal cruelty was conduct of such a character as to cause danger to life and limb or health, bodily or mentally, or such as to give rise to a reasonable apprehension of such danger.

It is only that class of cruelty which can be alleged as a ground for divorce, and that is incorporated in the definitions contained in the bill.

The fourth ground is that a person is of unsound mind. I recognize that possibly there may be some little hesitancy with regard to this, because we all know that some remarkable mental cures are being effected. Yet here it should be noted that it is provided that the patient must have been continuously under care and treatment for a period of at least five years.

I am going to ask the indulgence of the house while I read a paragraph or two from a brilliant speech delivered by Lord Birkenhead on March 24, 1920, during the debate on the matrimonial causes bill. He said:

> I, my lords, can only express my amazement that men of saintly lives, men of affairs, men whose opinions and experience we respect, should have concentrated upon adultery as the one circumstance which ought to afford relief from the marriage tie. Adultery is a breach of the carnal obligations of marriage. Insistence upon the duties of continence and chastity is important; it is vital to society. But I have always taken the view that that aspect of marriage was exaggerated and somewhat crudely exaggerated in the marriage service. I am concerned to-day to make this point by which I will stand or fall, that the moral and spiritual sides of marriage are incomparably more important than the physical side. . . . If you think of all that marriage means to most of us—the memories of the world's adventure faced together in youth so heedlessly and yet so confidently, the tender comradeship, the sweet association of parenthood, how much more these count than that bond which nature in its ingenious telepathy has contrived to secure and render agreeable, the perpetuation of the species.

And again, in discussing the special case of desertion, particularly as it affects the woman, Lord Birkenhead said:

> What is the remedy open to a poor woman who, when she married, gave up the pitiful pursuit by which she made her living until her marriage, and, relying on the marriage, is left penniless, and is left for the whole of her life unable to identify her husband, unable to obtain the slightest relief from the law? She is neither wife nor widow; she has a cold hearthstone; she has fatherless children for the rest of her life. . . .
> In the cases which have come to me within the last fortnight, if I had time to deal with them I could give your Lordships particulars which would bring tears to your eyes. What is a young woman of 22 to do who is, for the rest of her life, with no hope of alleviating the future, with a fugitive husband whom she can never identify, while the law says to her plainly, finally and brutally: "We will do nothing for you." It is said, "You have open to you judicial separation." Choosing my words advisedly and being prepared with chapter and verse of a hundred cases even at a date when the royal commission reported, and in a thousand cases since,. I say that I can prove that this state of judicial separation—admittedly the only alternative—is a hot-bed of vice.
> We are told that such a woman as I have described is to remain chaste. I have only to observe that for two thousand years human nature has resisted, in the warmth of youth, these cold admonitions of the cloisters, that I do not believe that the Supreme Being has set a standard which two thousand years of Christian experience has shown that human nature in its exuberant prime cannot support.

And one other paragraph also dealing with the question of desertion. This is from Viscount Dawson of Penn:

Passing to clause 2, surely there can be nothing but praise, alike on grounds of logic and humanity, for the granting of divorce for desertion and cruelty. They both frustrate the purposes for which marriage exists. If they exist over years they destroy a marriage and that marriage is not worth preserving. The yielding to a chance physical temptation is as naught compared with the cold calculation of desertion or with a cruelty going on through the years, which can convert a home into a chamber of torments. In my judgment the community has no right to inflict on any human being the continued torture of such a home for any cause whatever.

Since it became known that I had put my name to this bill I have received various letters from people who have told of the desperate straits in which they have been placed, or have urged that some relief be given. I shall quote a sentence or two from the very plain letters of very plain people. Here is a letter from a woman who many years ago had a separation from her husband because of cruelty and non-support. He was a confirmed drunkard. The woman was given custody of the six children, the youngest of whom was only a few months old. All the children are now married. For twenty years the woman has not heard from her husband. She writes:

I am alone now and I have a chance to marry a very good man who would give me a comfortable home, and we would be company for each other in our old age.

I ask the house why she should not be permitted to marry again.

Here is the case of another woman, also elderly, whose husband had given up a position and a salary of $5,000 a year. He had allowed all insurance policies to lapse after he had borrowed their full value, and had walked out, leaving his wife and three children penniless. The woman says that she believes she is entitled to a divorce from a man who has treated his wife and children shamefully, and for whom she has neither respect nor liking. She states:

My love died years ago for repeated and various forms of neglect.

Members of the House of Commons, I suggest, ought to try to get away from the involved legal and theological ideas with which we complicate the discussion of this subject. We should come to consider some of the extremely practical cases in actual life which face us at the present time.

Sections 12 and 13 of the bill deal with nullity. I need scarcely direct attention to the difference between nullity and divorce. Section 12 specifies these grounds for a decree of nullity:

(a) that the marriage has not been consummated owing to the wilful refusal of the respondent to consummate it; or

(b) that either party to the marriage was at the time of the marriage either of unsound mind or a mental defective within the meaning of any statute in force in the province of the court concerned or subject to recurrent fits of insanity or epilepsy; or

(c) that the respondent was at the time of the marriage suffering from venereal disease of a communicable form; or

(d) that the respondent was at the time of the marriage pregnant by some person other than the petitioner.

I need not at the moment go into the other details of the bill which undoubtedly will come to the attention of the house when we reach the committee stage. I think, however, I have presented in as concise form as possible the principles underlying the measure.

I recognize that according to certain theological doctrines marriage is indissoluble. That is a theory which, if consistently held, is worthy of respect, and undoubtedly may retain a very strong hold on people belonging to certain religious faiths. But let me point out that divorce is recognized in this country. Let me point out further that there are divorce courts in nearly every province of the dominion. All this bill attempts to do is to place divorce on a more reasonable basis. My hon. friends who do not agree in principle must remember that in Canada we must work out some sort of modus vivendi.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Hear, hear.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: It is perhaps entirely unnecessary for me to point out that majorities as well as minorities in this country have certain rights. Further, it is perhaps hardly necessary that I should point out that the state cannot allow itself to become a policeman to enforce certain religious beliefs or practices. Let me point out that no one needs to take advantage of the existing legislation or of the proposed legislation. That is an entirely voluntary matter.

Further—and I trust that this will be kept in mind—the bill directly affects only those provinces in which divorce is already recognized. May I repeat that, as my closing appeal. I would urge that it be kept in mind by all hon. members that the bill directly affects only those provinces in which divorce is already recognized. I believe that recognition of this might considerably shorten the debate.

Mr. BENNETT: And provinces in which divorce is dealt with by the courts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, those provinces in which divorce is already recognized, and dealt with by the courts. I thank the right hon. the leader of the opposition for the additional words.

I believe there is nothing further I can usefully add at this time. I hope that this bill, which has been very carefully considered by the senate, and amended in some important respects, will receive equally careful consideration from this house.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) upon the splendid speech he has made in support of this bill. What a speech he could have made had he been on the other side! It was easy to see that he was not speaking with the same fire and conviction he would have displayed if he had been dealing with the question of unemployment. I rise to move:

That this bill be not now read a second time, but this day six months.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. McIvor) which was agreed to on the following division:

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO PERMIT SWEEPSTAKES ORGANIZED BY PROVINCES FOR BENEFIT OF UNIVERSITIES OR HOSPITALS

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bertrand (Laurier) for the second reading of Bill No. 28, to amend the criminal code.

Mr. SPEAKER: When this bill last came up, a point of order was raised by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Barber), and I now proceed to render my decision upon it.

Bill No. 28, an act to amend the criminal code, was introduced and read the first time on February 24, 1938. It did not then contain explanatory notes as required under the regulations adopted in June, 1923, but the bill itself was not in imperfect shape. Standing order 70 which prohibits introduction of an imperfect bill was passed on December 20, 1867, long before the adoption of the regulations in respect of explanatory notes on the right hand page. This standing order was probably directed against the introduction of blank bills as often happened in early days. The explanatory notes do not form part of the bill proper and they do not have to be approved by the house. They are only given as reasons for the text and to facilitate discussion.

On May 11 Mr. Bertrand (Laurier), sponsor of this bill, and the only member who had until then spoken to the second reading, asked the law clerks to have it reprinted with explanatory notes in pursuance of my decision on the previous day. He did so under standing order 86, which provides that it shall be the duty of the joint law clerks of the house to assist members of the house in drafting legislation and to revise, print and put notes upon all bills.

The reprint was fully distributed amongst the members of the house on May 13 before debate resumed, so that the regulation of June, 1923, which had been ignored prior to the first reading, was then duly observed. None of the members suffered any prejudice as the bill has been in their hands now for a month and debate has already taken place thereon during four sittings of the house, namely, on May 13, 20 and 31, and June 7.

The practice followed in connection with several government measures and Bill No. 11 which were reprinted with explanatory notes between first and second reading pursuant to my decision of May 10, must also apply in this case. As long as a defect of this nature is corrected before other members than the sponsor have spoken in the debate on the second reading, the rule is sufficiently observed and the bill is in order.

The explanatory notes are of minor importance in this case, but it is necessary to give a decision which will be followed in future.

I therefore rule that the house may proceed with the debate on the second reading of this bill.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I cannot give a silent vote on this bill, and I propose to give the reasons why I oppose it. I shall endeavour to be brief.

The criminal code of this country, rightly or wrongly, has declared against gambling and lotteries. That represents a crystallized public opinion. That opinion has prevailed for many years; it is the law of Canada. There are exceptions to that provision. This seeks to extend the exceptions so that lotteries may be held with respect to hospitals and educational institutions. The simple, single question is, is there any warrant for thus interfering with this exception to the generally accepted law of Canada?

Lotteries and gaming are nothing new. They have been before the world for centuries; in fact, games of chance go back to very early days indeed. But the settled experience of mankind has been that they are detrimental alike to the nation and the individual. That is the finding of the world in the light of all these years. Every now and then a nation sets up a commission to investigate, and without exception commissions have found against the continuance of lotteries or gaming. George Washington in one of his letters points out that gaming is framed in avarice, and other great men have pointed out that the effects of it are destructive of the vital character of a people. This is not a question of what my view may be; it is the verdict of the experience of centuries, and that experience is embodied in the criminal code of Canada.

It is suggested that through gambling or lotteries we can make it easy to increase the funds of hospitals. That argument has been adduced in many countries before commissions which have sat upon this question, and for a time, it would seem, the funds have been swollen by the contributions thus received. But in course of time this source of revenue dries up; men and women who were once willing to contribute to charitable objects are no longer inclined to do so; and in the end, it has been found, the state of that community from the standpoint of either hospitals or learning is worse than before it began. Consider the South Sea Bubble, the Great Mississippi question, the Louisiana Lottery; examine these and other similar ventures in the light of what I have said; without a single exception it will be found that they were detrimental to the nation and the individual.

We as legislators are concerned with two things and two only. One has to do with the welfare of the nation, whether or not it is desirable to encourage among the Canadian people the thought that fortunes come by chance, that funds available for learning and for hospitals come by chance, and that because a game of chance will add something to an institution, whether one of learning or a hospital, the individual should take a chance of adding to his personal fortune. Is this the time to encourage that attitude of mind? I think not.

I could elaborate by extensive quotations and by what I conceive to be fairly logical arguments why, from the standpoint of the nation, this proposal should not be adopted. But, sir, the case as it affects the individual is yet stronger. What habit does it encourage in the individual? It conduces to unemployment, because men are ever seeking to get money to buy a sweepstake ticket. I am not unmindful of the tremendous pressure brought to bear upon many of us to support this sort of thing. Other men may have convictions quite as strong as mine, and I give the same measure of respect to their convictions as I hope they do to mine. But when I say to an individual, "Yes, we are going to encourage sweepstakes in Canada so that you may be able to beg, and sometimes"—as commissions have made clear—"you may go so far as to steal to buy tickets on those sweepstakes," I am encouraging him to risk all upon a hope which is but a vain delusion; for it has been established beyond all question that never was there a vainer delusion than the belief that in the end you can get rich by chance.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Employment Offices Coordination Act—payments to the provinces in connection with the organization and coordination of employment offices, $150,000.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): Mr. Chairman, I believe it was the suggestion of the leader of the opposition that this item should stand until the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) is in the house, and I am quite content that this should be done.

Mr. BENNETT: Had I not better finish what I was saying? I was in the middle of an observation.

Mr. ROGERS: If the right hon. leader of the opposition wishes to continue, I am ready.

Mr. BENNETT: I am quite willing to defer it until I have the information asked for from the government.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall try to have that information available to-morrow.

Item stands.

Technical Education Act—
Administration, $2,325.
Payments to the provinces for the encouragement of technical education, $50,000.

Mr. MASSEY: Would the minister give the amounts that have been granted under this act since its inception?

Mr. ROGERS: As my friend is aware, the amounts payable under the Technical Education Act are paid to the provinces. Some of the provinces did not take up their allotment, and there has been subsequent legislation by this parliament to enable those provinces which had not taken up their allotments to do so.

Mr. BENNETT: They are still within their original quota?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. The amounts available during the period of the act and the amounts paid by the federal government to the end of the fiscal year 1937-38 are as follows:

	Amounts available	Amounts paid
P.E.I.	$ 198,187 86	$ 198,187 86
Nova Scotia	662,113 94	662,113 94
New Brunswick	512,461 28	512,461 28
Quebec	2,569,655 53	2,569,655 53
Ontario	3,178,608 97	3,178,608 97
Manitoba	719,746 56	417,407 33
Saskatchewan	847,620 91	827,620 91
Alberta	678,524 40	678,524 40
British Columbia	633,080 55	633,080 55

In the case of Manitoba there is an unpaid balance of $302,339.23.

Mr. MASSEY: What were the amounts for last year?

Mr. ROGERS: Last year an amount of $14,813.56 was paid to Manitoba and $34,055.90 to Saskatchewan.

Mr. MASSEY: Were there amounts payable out of amounts available to the other provinces?

Mr. ROGERS: No; the only province that now has an amount outstanding is Manitoba.

Mr. MASSEY: When were the amounts for the other provinces used up?

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps I can answer that question in this way: The term of the act was ten years. As I recall, it was originally passed in 1919. Then there was a five years extension. At the end of the five year extension there were three provinces, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Nova Scotia, which had not been able to take full advantage of their apportionment, and in order that these provinces might not be deprived of any part of their original appropriation the act was extended at the 1934 session for another five years. Nova Scotia exhausted the balance of its subsidy in 1936; New Brunswick, last year, leaving Manitoba the only province which has an amount coming to it.

Mr. MASSEY: What is the purpose of this $50,000 that we are now discussing?

Mr. ROGERS: To meet possible claims by the province of Manitoba under the provisions of the extension of the Technical Education Act.

Mr. MASSEY: The amount of this vote is actually $2,325; perhaps I misled the minister in mentioning the $50,000 statutory grant.

Mr. ROGERS: The amount of $2,325 is for administration. There is one official in the Department of Labour, Miss McKellar, who has been in the department since the inception of this legislation. She is the only official who devotes her time, in part at least, to the administration of the Technical Education Act. The rest is for what may be claimed by Manitoba.

Mr. MASSEY: It is possible, I believe, to extend this act further, even though there has been a lapse between the payment of the last amount to the provinces.

Mr. ROGERS: The only province that could claim an extension would be Manitoba. The other provinces have all exhausted the amounts that they might claim.

Mr. MASSEY: The original act was extended five years; is it not possible to do that again?

Mr. ROGERS: Only to permit this province to take up its full apportionment.

Mr. MASSEY: The existing act is now through?

Mr. ROGERS: It expires next year. If Manitoba has not taken up its full apportionment, and it is desired to permit Manitoba to do so, a further extension will be necessary.

Mr. MASSEY: Has the minister any plan for further payments along the lines originally intended by this act?

Mr. ROGERS: No policy has been announced in that regard. My hon. friend may recall that the Vocational Education Act was passed during the last administration, but the provisions of that act have never come into force.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. MacINNIS: Did the minister say that the $50,000 provided by statute cannot be called for by the province of Manitoba if it is not taken up this year?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does that $50,000 and the possibility that it may be called for by Manitoba demand a full-time stenographer for a year for its administration?

Mr. ROGERS: Miss McKellar does other work in the department as well, but she comes under this vote.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would not this be the least part of her work? Surely there could not possibly be much work in connection with this. It is not fair to vote a full year's salary for a stenographer for what might require only the writing of one or two letters.

Mr. ROGERS: I am informed that Miss McKellar is not a stenographer. I do not know at the moment just what her rating is.

Mr. BENNETT: She is an administrative officer with respect to this act.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; she is really an administrative officer. She is frequently called upon to do other work in the department. But she was originally under this vote when the vote was much larger, and her salary has been paid out of this vote as long as the legislation has been in force.

Mr. MASSEY: Over the week-end of May 21-24 there met in Toronto the Third Canadian Youth Congress. During the course of their deliberations they prepared various resolutions, among them one on vocational guidance, which I should like to read:

> The present trend for more technical training in our schools increases the need for trained vocational counsellors. These counsellors can assist students in choosing an occupation to which they will be suited and from which they will be able to derive an adequate livelihood. Statistics regarding trends in employment, opportunities in industry, as gathered by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics, should be placed at the disposal of vocational counsellors. The employment of such counsellors in our schools should be encouraged.
> In view of the costly labour turn-over and unfitness due to the lack of direction, trained vocational counsellors should be included on the staffs of government employment bureaus, in order that the percentage of permanent placements may be increased.

I think one may recognize the sincerity of that resolution and also the fact that it makes a suggestion which is most worthy. One of the reasons why I was asking the minister the questions I did a few moments ago, under this item dealing with technical education, was that I was wondering whether it would not be possible to find funds for the purpose suggested by the resolution. Those of us who have had dealings with the younger generation realize how often they are ill advised in regard to the courses they should follow. Our technical schools are doing a magnificent job. There are enrolled in these schools some 125,000 or 130,000 young people, many of whom are not altogether sure as to what courses they should follow. Accordingly there is placed upon the principals and teachers a rather difficult problem, in view of the numbers with which they have to deal. They do not know the personnel of their student body as fully as they might. I was going to say as fully as they should, but that is hardly fair, because they do the best they can, and they do it well; but they do not know the individual students as fully as others might if they were rendering assistance directly in connection with this work, such as the assistance that might be rendered by a counsellor. I wondered if the minister had given any thought to the idea that perhaps it would be desirable to make contact, perhaps through the youth committee, with the various technical schools across the dominion, with the view of placing counsellors here and there in some of the larger centres.

Mr. ROGERS: I find no fault whatever with the terms of the resolution to which my hon. friend has referred. He would be the first to agree, I think, that the resolution should be addressed to the provinces as well as to the dominion.

Mr. MASSEY: Quite.

Mr. ROGERS: Indeed, under the existing organization of the employment service I should say the responsibility of appointing additional vocational officers would rest rather upon the provinces than upon the dominion. As I mentioned this afternoon, it is the intention of the government in connection with the training projects for unemployed young people to appoint special placement officers in the various provinces, who will be in close touch with the facilities for technical education and also with the offices of the Employment Service of Canada. I feel that probably this would meet the immediate situation.

Mr. MASSEY: I thought perhaps the advisers or counsellors would deal more with those seeking employment than with those seeking some course of education; but if it is the plan that they will work in close contact with the technical schools, of course that answers my question.

Mr. ROGERS: When I say they will work in close contact with the schools, that is in the sense that technical schools would be used and have been used to some extent in connection with the training plans for unemployed young people.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I do not know whether I have missed the discussion I wish to raise or whether it has been raised already, but several times I have heard men say that there is a demand in Canada for skilled workmen, for which there is not a sufficient supply. I have heard this on fairly good authority. I am wondering whether the minister has any means of determining just what may be the nature of that demand. For example, is there any means whereby anyone in a school in Manitoba could find out just in what kind of skilled labour there is a deficiency in the dominion? I had the matter brought to my attention several times while the highly commendable work of the minister in giving special training to young people was in progress, that probably the young people did not know what to prepare for, and had no idea whether or not there would be a demand for them when they were trained. I was just wondering if the minister had adopted some definite plan in this regard and, if he had, what means he had adopted for advertising the fact so that those in need of the information might readily acquire it.

Mr. ROGERS: In each province the employment office would have a record of applications by employers for additional help, and we have also a record of those who had registered in these various trades, so a study of those two records would enable the employment service in a province to determine whether there was a special demand for a certain type of mechanical training. I remember some years ago hearing, in connection with technical education, of one province —at the moment I have forgotten which— that felt there was a demand for telegraph operators, and they turned out a very large number of telegraph operators, far more than could possibly be absorbed. Obviously that was a mistake. In connection with our training projects for unemployed young people we are trying to avoid that by applying training only in those fields where there is either an immediate or a prospective demand for employment.

Mr. BLACKMORE: To give a specific case, it was brought to my attention the other day by a statement from a young man who not long ago had come from Germany, that there was a distinct dearth in Canada of skilled toolmakers, and that anyone who was really proficient in that kind of work could readily find employment in Canada at good remuneration. I thought that was most remarkable. Here we have thousands of boys eager to get some sort of work that can be depended upon, and here we have a demand that is not being supplied. I wonder what provision we have for stopping up that gap.

There is another matter to which I should like to refer. I may say that I am very much interested in this question, having been a school principal for a good many years. I am sincerely and sympathetically interested in the minister's work, and I am well pleased with the efforts he has made. It is not well known how long it takes to train for some of these occupations, and there are vocations which require something in the nature of apprenticeship. It would greatly assist many of our boys if they knew what firms were prepared to take apprentices, what the conditions would be and how long it would take them to qualify.

There is another matter which, I think, must be cleared up very soon. I have mentioned it several times, and I mean to speak sympathetically, though I intend to be emphatic. It is this. There is altogether too widespread a belief, loosely entertained, that in this country there is work which can be obtained. I find that belief on every hand among the more prosperous, well-equipped, well-to-do people, who are not really in contact with realities. In order to get an accurate knowledge of just to what extent there are or can be jobs, this sort of service is particularly valuable. I hope I make my meaning clear to the minister; I should like to hear him speak in this regard.

Mr. ROGERS: As to the first question, I believe it to be true that there is a dearth of toolmakers in Canada. I cannot speak positively on that point, but I have understood that in connection with the aeronautical industry, for instance, it has been found that there is an insufficient supply of well-trained machinists. A number of these industries that are now going into aeroplane production are themselves arranging for apprenticeships. I think it must be recognized that this field is not one which belongs exclusively to governments. In Great Britain, as the hon. member is no doubt aware, an apprenticeship system has been established over a long period of time. That is carried out jointly by the industries and the trade unions. In this country there has not been as much interest in apprenticeship as one might have wished. I believe I am correct in saying that at the present time only three provinces have apprenticeship legislation. I may point out that other provinces are expressing an interest in the apprenticeship system, and we hope that similar legislation may be passed in those provinces in the very near future.

As to the second question, I believe there can be no doubt at all that the man who trains himself for a particular job, provided there is a reasonable expectation of a demand for such a job, is in an infinitely better position during a period of unemployment than is one who has no special training. That is one reason, among others, why in the training projects for unemployed young people we are doing whatever can be done within the limits of the appropriation voted by parliament to provide occupational training in the various cities. I shall not say that up to the present time we have done more than make a modest contribution to the problem; but I think what has been done is an indication of the wisdom of pursuing the policy, and I hope it may be extended as time goes on.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I am more interested in the means by which one may get information. Supposing I am the principal of a school—as I was, before I was elected—and I wish to know just where a particularly bright boy might be taken on as an apprentice, or what kind of technical training he might get in Calgary or some other centre, in order to qualify for admission to apprenticeship; where and by what means at the present time can I get information so as to guide that boy?

Mr. ROGERS: I would say the first application should be made to the provincial employment office. That would be done to determine where there would be a greater likelihood of a boy trained in a certain mechanical trade being absorbed. An application could be also made directly to the larger industries in the province. The truth of the matter is that our industries are under no compulsion to register with the employment service. Registration is a purely voluntary arrangement, so that it might very well be that the information which would come from the employment service would not be conclusive.

Mr. BLACKMORE: If a boy in northern British Columbia wishes to qualify as a toolmaker, for instance, and if he applied to an employment bureau in that province, is there a strong likelihood that they would know of the needs in Ottawa, or in any of the industrial centres of Ontario or eastern Canada? Is the need registered in Ontario and transmitted to British Columbia, so that the officials in the latter province may know? I believe one of the reasons we are not as effective in the matter of apprenticeship is that distances are so tremendously great, as compared with those in Great Britain. Therefore we need to be particularly careful in getting details.

Mr. ROGERS: I believe that is undoubtedly true. The difficulties of carrying out apprenticeship here are greater because of the distances involved. Each provincial employment office may secure information with respect to employment opportunities in other provinces. That is one of the purposes carried out by the dominion coordination branch of the Employment Service of Canada. Therefore there would be no reason why an employment office in British Columbia could not or would not be advised of possible employment opportunities in a particular trade in Ontario or Quebec.

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would it be advised through the minister's department?

Mr. ROGERS: It would be advised through the clearing-house here.

Mr. MARTIN: Is it not a fact that in Ontario information is readily obtainable through a system of inspectorships which have been established by the government of Ontario with respect not only to apprenticeships but to learnerships as well?

Mr. ROGERS: I believe that is correct.

Mr. POOLE: I think the minister will admit that there have been very few apprenticeships through employment bureaux. A very small percentage of employers make application to employment bureaux for employees. In support of my colleague I should like to repeat a conversation I had a year ago with one of the chief engineers of the Canadian Pacific Railway. He told me that when they were building stream-lined trains in Canada they could not obtain tradesmen or mechanics qualified to carry out the work, and I understand they had to import them from the United States. Of course, that is a terrible state of affairs.

During the period of depression in Great Britain they had a system of youth training, and I say that system is long overdue in Canada. If in the last seven years we had developed the natural ability of people between the ages of eighteen and twenty-five, we would have built up a great national asset for the future. I do not think it is too late to begin.

There are in Canada trade schools qualified to teach various trades. Unfortunately, however, it has been learned that the activities of some of them have been more or less fraudulent, and some have acted under false pretences. That is by no means true of all of them. Unfortunately, provincial legislatures have passed legislation making it impossible in some instances for these schools to operate. I wonder if the minister would not give consideration to the establishment across Canada of a system of youth training so that the youth of the country may have an opportunity. Certainly they have not in the last six or seven years had an opportunity to learn a trade. When they are trained to a point where they are useful to industry they will be ready to slip into available positions. I say it is a scathing indictment against us to find that we had to import mechanics at a time when there were thousands of unemployed in Canada. Some appropriation should be made to see that these trades are kept right up to date, and that the men have an opportunity to learn mechanical engineering, and other types of work.

Mr. ROGERS: Is the hon. member aware that last year parliament appropriated a million dollars for the precise purpose he has in mind? That amount was not entirely expended, but the amount that was expended —and we shall be dealing with it later—was duplicated by the provinces. In the hon. member's native province of Alberta, for instance, an excellent work was done under the superintendence of Doctor McNally of the board of education. Certainly we propose to extend the work during the present year.

Mr. POOLE: What trades were covered?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not that information before me, but I would suggest that this discussion might proceed more properly under an item in the supplementary estimates, and we can deal with it there.

Mr. BARBER: Is the amount authorized by statute a balance that remains over from a sum that was voted some years ago, and allotted to each province? Which provinces have used up their amounts?

Mr. ROGERS: Probably the hon. member was not in the house when I gave that information. All the provinces except Manitoba have used their amounts, and this amount is available for that province.

Mr. MASSEY: At page 12 of the interim report of the national employment commission I find this:

The commission recommended the following as a basis upon which such plans should be framed:

Training projects of an occupational nature;

Short-term learnership courses not exceeding one year in duration, devised to provide theoretical training concurrent with specific employment;

Work projects incorporating re-conditioning, training, and conservation features, for the purposes of restoring morale and of conserving natural resources.

Then on page 39 of the main report appear these words:

An adequate supply of skilled or semi-skilled labour is an essential at all times for the efficient carrying on of commercial, industrial and agricultural or other primary activities. The number of unskilled workers that can be placed in employment depends, to a considerable extent, upon the adequacy with which this requirement for the more skilled worker can be met.

There are two main phases to the work of training which fall within the commission's purview:

1. Rehabilitation work arising out of the necessities of intermittent period of economic stress;

2. Permanent training measures, e.g., apprenticeship and learnership, applicable at all times.

In both cases it would seem proper that the main responsibility (other than that which falls on industry itself) for providing adequate measures suitable to the varying conditions in the different provinces should lie with the province in question. It is not suggested by the commission that jurisdiction in these matters should be assumed either in whole or in part by the dominion, except that, when special need exists as at present, or as it may in similar future periods of economic stress, the dominion might contribute towards the cost of particular rehabilitation or training projects.

That is all I can find in either the interim or the final report dealing with vocational training as carried out in technical schools. I wonder if any other reports have been made by the national employment commission and particularly by the youth training committee of that commission dealing with this particular phase of the matter? The Technical Education Act was very successful in establishing technical education in the provinces. This act was so acceptable to the provinces that perhaps we are missing an opportunity here to carry forward a work which has been in progress now for a matter of nineteen years and which has given such extraordinarily satisfactory results. I was wondering why the national employment commission omitted that phase of the work from their report.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend will recall that it was as a result of the recommendation of the national employment commission, following the report of the youth employment committee to the commission, that the special item of $1,000,000 was placed in the estimates last year for training projects for unemployed young people. The report of the youth employment committee was not made to the minister or the government; it was a report of a general nature made to the commission. Many such reports of a special nature were made to the commission. The commission went over this material and derived from it the recommendations which appeared in the interim and subsequently in the final report.

Mr. WALSH: In a debate some weeks ago I referred to this particular item which used to appear in much larger figures in the annual estimates. I deplored the fact that the amount granted was not as large as previously. I recognize the fact that education comes primarily within the jurisdiction of the provinces, but this is one instance where the federal government has been able to assist materially in a work under provincial control. It has been my observation that those small cities having technical schools suffered less during the depression.

I am thinking particularly of Shawinigan Falls in Quebec where a technical school was started many years ago by the Shawinigan Water and Power Company. Later on the school received assistance from the Quebec government and the city of Shawinigan Falls. This school also received a tremendous impetus from the grant given by the federal government under this legislation which is about to pass out of existence. This technical school in Shawinigan Falls offers an outstanding example, not only to the province of Quebec but to Canada as a whole. French and English boys are able to receive a technical education after having obtained a primary education in their own schools or classical colleges. The result is that the labour market in and around Shawinigan Falls is well supplied with trained labour. These boys attend technical school for a certain number of years and then are absorbed into the various industries in Shawinigan Falls, Grand-Mère, Three Rivers and other places. The school is operated also in the evenings, and many of the boys continue their education at those classes. Many of these boys, by reason of the technical education they have received, have risen in the community to high positions which they otherwise would not have been able to attain.

This grant has been withdrawn. Naturally a work of this kind and importance could not be allowed to suffer simply because of the withdrawal of a grant. In some instances the additional burden imposed by the withdrawal has been taken over by the province, while in other instances it has been taken over by the municipality concerned. This has all added to the general burden of local taxation. Two weeks ago I urged that this curtailment should not be made. I am generally urging the reduction of expenditure, but I do not think this is an item where that should be done. I do not feel the dominion government is doing enough in this phase of education or youth development. The minister points to the million dollars voted last year and the two million dollars to be voted this year for—

Mr. ROGERS: A little less than that.

Mr. WALSH: —a particular need at this particular time, but I am thinking more of the permanent feature of technical education as exemplified by these technical schools. I feel sure that if parliament would continue to vote this grant, technical schools similar to the one at Shawinigan Falls would be constructed in other cities and a tremendous benefit would be the result, not only to the particular city but to the industrial areas in the immediate vicinity. I should like to urge this point upon the minister. I know it is difficult to find money, but I believe curtailment could be made in other directions and the necessary money found to apply to this particular field. As an educationalist I recognize the value of this type of education. In this country we have overemphasized classical and academic training, and in certain provinces we have no provision for the vocational and technical training of young boys and girls. I think this is an opportunity for the federal government to supplement any local efforts which are being made.

Referring again to Shawinigan Falls, I know that something of this kind would be most advantageous. I know the conditions which prevailed in that part of the country during the depression, and if the hon. member who represents that district is in the chamber, I know he will bear out what I say. They did not feel the full effect of the depression because most of the boys had received technical training after their regular education. Many of them continued attending evening classes until they found work in some of the industries. The result was that these boys were not roaming around the country in an effort to find work. They were improving themselves and getting ready for something better in the future. You may say they could have done that equally well in a classical college or academic institution, but that is not so. Unfortunately the boys and girls in that type of school are rather difficult to absorb into employment, particularly in an industrial centre, and it is the industrial centres which as a rule furnish the great bulk of our unemployment.

I would urge upon the minister, first, that the withdrawal of this grant has placed an additional burden of taxation on localities or on provinces to maintain what was started or, at all events, received an impetus as a result of the previous grant, and, second, I would stress the good work that could be done if this grant were continued, in view of the developments which are taking place in certain of our industrial centres. New industrial centres are springing up here and there throughout the country. I have in mind one, a tremendous development, which opened only last week in the province of Quebec, and within a short time it will no doubt receive the benefit of provincial assistance in erecting a technical school. If this government had a fund for assisting and giving impetus to work of that kind, it would be of immense advantage to these places where industrial developments are taking place.

I would urge upon the minister, when he is introducing the legislation next year with the view possibly of extending the act, that he leave it as it was before and give the provinces an opportunity of receiving a further share of federal funds to assist them in developing technical schools and technical education for the benefit of the boys in particular and also, in certain localities, of the girls. In that way you will lessen the prospect of unemployment in the future, and give these young people an opportunity to train themselves for something definite in life. I was glad when I heard the minister deal with that phase and suggest that the person trained for a job has less difficulty in finding work than one who has received just a general training without any particular line of work in view, and I feel that the only way in which we can give that definite training is by the establishment of technical or vocational schools. It might be said that this is a field for the provinces and the municipalities, but they are finding it difficult enough to navigate through their present financial difficulties, and if they could only receive some assistance towards this end from the federal government I know that dividends would soon be forthcoming. I recognize that the Minister of Labour is as much interested in this problem and in the development of technical education as I am myself.

Mr. MASSEY: Mr. Chairman, I have no desire to make a speech nor am I going to, neither do I wish to hold up these estimates. The hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Walsh) has just made many remarks that I was going to make on this item.

I think all of us who have had to do with Young Canada, particularly in the last few years, realize without any question whatsoever in our minds that the most practical contribution which can be made to the development of the young man or young woman who has some idea of gaining the most useful information possible in the way of development, and so forth, can be given by our technical schools, and therefore I think it is very unfortunate, after all the provinces, I believe, until 1929 were still participating in this plan in view of the fact that the Technical Education Act was extended for a further five years, that this work contributed to by the dominion government should be handicapped by the fact that its contribution is no longer forthcoming.

The hon. member for Mount Royal states that the municipalities have been forced to extend taxation in order to carry on this work and to take up the slack occasioned by the fact that this grant was not forthcoming from the federal government. If he will permit me to differ, I think he will find that instead of further municipal taxes being collected for this purpose the work was simply not carried on to the same degree as it had been in the past with the assistance of the dominion government's contribution, and when that grant was no longer received the work more or less ceased at that point.

The records will show, as the minister well knows, that technical education has been taken advantage of by increasing numbers of our young people throughout the years, and particularly from 1919 on. Apprenticeships, no matter how well organized they may be, can never fully take the place of technical education or education in the technical schools. After all, the boy who goes to work in a shop, even with the best available instruction, is deprived of the theory which is back of the practice in which he is engaged. In the shop he is taught practice rather than theory, whereas in the technical school he has theory and practice together; then later when he gets himself a job, wherever it may be, he starts with a definite amount of theory and a certain amount of practice, and then added to that theory and practice comes the experience within the shop itself. Therefore the apprenticeship courses which in great part no longer exist, and which have recently been revised as a result of the activities of the past year, never will, no matter how well organized they may be, take the place of the technical education which the lad or young girl gets in a technical school.

I therefore earnestly urge on the minister that he again give consideration to introducing a technical education act to function as the past act did. Here we find ourselves facing a "sure thing," if I may use the phrase; for we realize, as a result of experience over a matter now of some nineteen years, that the purpose to which these funds are devoted is a worthy and worth while purpose and has accomplished a definite job of work which has been most beneficial not only to the individual but to the community in which he lives.

The projects which have been launched under the youth training plan, which we shall come to shortly in the supplementary estimates, are in a very great degree experimental, and the minister will admit that some have proven to be better than others. On the other hand, here we are dealing with a project that is no longer speculative but has proven to be of value. The provinces have been accustomed to accepting this grant, to accepting it gratefully, and to bear their own share, and therefore there is no difficulty whatsoever about cooperation with the provinces in regard to this matter. There was no pious hope that this or that province would accept the grant even though it had at first refused it, or whatever the case may have been. Accordingly, Mr. Chairman, in view of our experience under the act and the results that were obtained, I urge upon the minister with all the earnestness of which I am capable that he give consideration to bringing down next session a new technical education act, to function as the old.

Mr. LOCKHART: May I add a brief word on one particular phase which probably has not been referred to in the discussion so far. Under the Technical Education Act technical schools have been started and maintained over a period of years in some of the larger urban centres, assisted by the provinces to a very great extent at the beginning, to the extent probably of fifty per cent for equipment, and with large grants for teachers' salaries, but as the years went on these grants have gradually been cut off. Technical education has been established as a necessary form of education. I think everyone who has experience will admit that. Now, as the years roll by, the grants from the provinces have been reduced. When it comes to getting replacements to carry on the technical schools it is impossible to obtain the necessary money from the provincial government. I want to join with the hon. member for Greenwood and the hon. member for Mount Royal in stressing the necessity of the federal government giving serious consideration to the encouragement of this work and of aid to it by the provincial departments, because when replacements and, possibly, additions to the schools are necessary, on account of the popularity of this type of education, the onus comes back on the municipality. I believe many of us who have had experience in the matter have found that out, and I urge the minister to give consideration to that particular angle of the situation, in order that assistance may be given, possibly by the reintroduction of the Technical Education Act, also by encouraging the provincial departments to agree to continue to assist the municipalities upon whom the burden of replacement and of future extensions now falls, and thus to meet the growing demand for a type of education which conforms to the requirements of the present day.

Item agreed to.

Fair wages and conciliation, $49,320.

Mr. MacINNIS: Would the minister give a short review of the work done by this branch during the past year?

Mr. ROGERS: As my hon. friend is probably aware, this item covers the salaries of the fair wage and conciliation officers. There are fair wage and conciliation officers stationed at Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver and Ottawa. Their duties include the preparation of wage schedules for insertion in government contracts and the investigation of differences arising on this point between contractors and workmen. It is found that these officers by proceeding at once to the point of dispute, are very often able to adjust differences, thus avoiding the expense of a board of conciliation under the Industrial Disputes Investigation Act. I might say at this point that provision was made last year for the appointment of four junior conciliation officers. These junior officers are attached to the various offices I have mentioned in order to obtain the necessary experience in connection with fair wage adjustments and the settlement of labour disputes.

Mr. MacINNIS: Who is the junior conciliation officer in the western provinces associated with Mr. Harrison?

Mr. ROGERS: Mr. Harrison, of Vancouver, is the senior officer. Mr. Currie is the junior.

Mr. MacINNIS: Where is his home?

Mr. ROGERS: His home is in Saskatoon. All four of these officers were appointed by the civil service commission. I believe I am correct when I say that all four are returned soldiers.

Item agreed to.

Annuities Act, $287,885.

Mr. LOCKHART: What constitutes the main reduction in this item?

Mr. ROGERS: The reductions are accounted for almost wholly by the expectation of commissions to be paid during the coming year. There is a decrease. Perhaps I had better run over the details. In the permanent salaries there is an increase of $8,833; in the temporary salaries, a decrease of $5,004; printing and stationery, an increase of $8,500; telephones and telegrams, an increase of $150; commissions to agents and publicity, a decrease of $50,000.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Does that mean that fewer annuities are being sold?

Mr. ROGERS: It is largely a matter of forecast of the business that will be done in the course of the year. Upon the basis of the business done last year it is anticipated that the amount here voted for commissions to agents will be adequate.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): What totals of annuities have been sold during the past few years?

Mr. ROGERS: I will begin with 1933-34:

Year	Number of contracts issued	Receipts
1933-34..	2,412	$ 7,071,439 00
1934-35..	3,930	13,376,400 02
1935-36..	6,357	21,281,981 31
1936-37..	7,806	23,614,823 95
1937-38..	5,725	13,595,158 60

Therefore my hon. friend will see there has been a rather sharp drop in the last year. This is due no doubt, in part at least, to the increase in the rates.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the sum total of the annuity fund at the moment?

Mr. ROGERS: The total receipts to March 31, 1938, are $115,153,853.45.

Mr. BENNETT: What has been paid out? Of course the amount to the credit of the fund is just that sum less the payments out from year to year.

Mr. ROGERS: The balance on credit as of March 31, 1937, is $87,984,935.74.

Mr. BENNETT: That fund, of course, stands to the credit of the annuities branch in the consolidated fund, and is really working capital of this country, available as such. The minister spoke on the question of the increased rates. There has been some controversy, as the minister knows, with respect to that matter. On what principle are the rates increased? I confess that they do not come within the actuarial rules which are laid down by the insurance companies, because the administrative costs are absorbed by the country generally, as I understand it, as was originally intended when the bill was introduced by Sir Richard Cartwright. The question I was anxious to have answered was on what principle the rates were increased. Our superintendent of insurance or our actuarial department did not do it. It was done, I think, by a gentleman from the university of Toronto.

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend will recall that a special committee of the senate gave attention to this question over a year ago. They expressed the view that the existing rates for annuities were too low, and that actually the dominion government was losing a sum amounting to several hundred thousand dollars a year because of the low rates. As a result of that investigation, despite the fact that the rates had been in existence a great many years, we felt it would be wise to have the question reconsidered. I think I can best explain the difficulty which had arisen with regard to rates by saying that these rates were based upon a mortality table—

Mr. BENNETT: On the assumption that money would earn four per cent.

Mr. ROGERS: —based upon the experience of the British offices in respect of life annuities, male and female, 1863 to 1893. That is the table which was used and upon which the rates were based.

Mr. BENNETT: They have kept within and done better than the mortality table, but it was a question of the rate of interest, was it not?

Mr. ROGERS: Not specifically; the point was rather to investigate our actual mortality experience upon the basis of our own annuities. That had not been done before. That was the special work undertaken by Professor Mackenzie of the university of Toronto, a very well known actuary, who I believe had served as special actuary of one of the Carnegie foundations. Upon his advice we made an interim increase in the rates amounting to fifteen per cent. That was put into effect temporarily. On the basis of his recommendation a report was tabled some time ago. We have adopted the new British mortality tables, with a reduction—

Mr. BENNETT: A reduction in the light of our own experience?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; that is correct. So that is the position at the present time.

Mr. BENNETT: This matter raises the whole question—which is not going to be discussed to-night—as to whether or not our mortality tables, upon which our whole insurance structure is based, might not well be revised; because certainly the expectation of life in this country is greater than in some countries upon which the tables were built. As I understand Professor Mackenzie's work, he took the last British tables, but he did not apply them in terms of premiums but, because of our experience, made a lesser premium than they would call for. He did not, however, purport to do it in a completely scientific manner. I read a criticism of it on that basis. I think what he did was a perfectly sound thing; he gave us the benefit of an arbitrary basis because of our decreased mortality or increased length of life as compared with the British table. The result is that to-day our rates are still somewhat lower than rates based upon the purely British actuarial basis or the United States expectation of life, either one; quite substantially lower in some instances.

The point which I think does arise is the question of the interest rate. We predicate the rate upon the fact that the entire fund is in the consolidated revenue fund, and that the nation itself will pay interest on that money; the interest used to be at the rate of four per cent.

Mr. ROGERS: It still is.

Mr. BENNETT: That four per cent is slightly higher than the insurance companies can earn, although not higher than their average rate up to the present time. Owing to the diversity of their investments and matters of that sort they have been able to obtain an average interest income in Canada slightly better than four per cent; I think some obtain even five per cent. Some United States companies have been able to obtain slightly beyond four per cent, but none of them calculate their reserves now on a four per cent basis. In the British offices they base their reserves on a rate of two and a half per cent, and I think practically all our insurance in Canada is predicated upon a three per cent rate on the long range maturing contracts.

My understanding was that what Professor Mackenzie did was to apply the actuarial rules to our conditions, on the basis of a four per cent rate, and then reduce that rate, having made what he conceived to be an arbitrary—but in my judgment proper—allowance for the longevity of Canadians as compared with others. But longevity is the thing you are not looking for in annuity contracts. In such contracts gain results from the shortening of life, if I may put it in that way. The longer the expectation of life, the more money has to be paid for the annuity. Therefore the interest rate has to be considered; and as I understand, he adjusted that on the basis of this arbitrarily fixed four per cent rate. Perhaps the minister knows that the reason the late government reduced the maximum annuity contract to $1,200 a year was just that very thing; we were getting large numbers of single payments for immediate annuities of $5,000, at rates substantially lower than the life insurance companies' premiums, with the result reflected in the figures the minister gave a few minutes ago.

The increased rate has placed the business on what is nearer to a balance than before, although it is still very much in favour of our limited $1,200 annuity, which was the basis of Sir Richard Cartwright's introduction of the measure, the whole theory being that it was not a well-to-do or rich man's annuity but an annuity which might be obtained by men in almost humble circumstances by payments extending over their working lives, beginning when their earning power began at about sixteen to eighteen, and continuing up to the ages fixed, namely, fifty, fifty-five, sixty; but generally what we endeavoured to do in those early days was to place sixty as the age. We had practically the lowest rates in the world for the kind of contract we gave. The money went into our consolidated fund; it was available for us at a four per cent rate, which was less than the going rate at the moment but still higher than the rates upon which the insurance companies made their computations. The result was that when money became very cheap and the expectation of life extended we had a new situation. The extension of the expectation of life operates to increase the cost of annuities, not decrease it as some people think.

As I understand it, instead of making a reservation from year to year for the purpose of paying the annuities, what we do is pay the liabilities as they arise under the contracts, and doing that we have discharged our duty. There is always a surplus, as there is bound to be, and the minister says that it now amounts to nearly $88,000,000. If we issued no more annuity contracts, that fund would gradually diminish until it disappeared; but as long as we continue to do business we may be able to bring and keep it up to even $100,000,000, which is capital always available for the dominion, but carries a fixed rate of four per cent.

That is my understanding of the situation at the present moment. I know that was correct at one time. Whether or not the modification brought about by the revaluation under Professor Mackenzie has effected any real change I should like the minister to indicate.

Mr. ROGERS: I believe the leader of the opposition has correctly stated the present situation. What Professor Mackenzie did was to take the life experience of our annuitants and study that in the light of the new British mortality tables. Perhaps I might quote briefly from his report:

> We tested the fitness of several tables and found that the mortality rates of the new British offices tables, known as the a(m) and a(f) tables were, when taken at ages one year younger than the actual ages for each sex, more nearly in safe agreement with the experience under investigation than any other standard rates. The number of deaths among male lives over age fifty-five which actually occurred is five per cent less than the number "expected" by the a(m) table at tabular ages, but three per cent greater than the number expected when ages are rated down one year. The number of deaths among female lives over age fifty-five which actually occurred is four per cent less than the number expected by the a(f) table at tabular ages, but five and a half per cent greater than the number expected when ages are rated down one year. We have therefore decided to recommend the adoption of the a(m) and a(f) tables with a reduction of one year in age, which means that calculations on a life aged sixty-five for example will be made as if the life were aged sixty-four.

That, in effect, is what was stated just now by the leader of the opposition. It is quite true that the interest rate has been kept at four per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: It is still that.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; that is statutory, and it has been maintained at that rate despite certain fluctuations in the interest rate down through the years. There has been some criticism with respect to the maintenance of that interest rate.

Mr. BENNETT: I think in the light of the reduction of the amount, that is an unfair criticism.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; it seems so, because originally the purpose of the legislation was that the dominion government should offer a definite encouragement—

Mr. BENNETT: To thrift.

Mr. ROGERS: —yes, to people of small means to take out these annuities. I would feel that it might almost be regarded as in the nature of a contributory pension.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what this really is.

Mr. ROGERS: Not in form, but in fact it is. I might further say that in view of the adjustments in rates it may be necessary to make some adjustment as well in the amount that is held in reserve.

Mr. BENNETT: In view of the fact that it is in the consolidated revenue fund and we have assumed liability, that never becomes a matter of very great importance.

Mr. ROGERS: It is purely a question of accounting.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): In view of the relationship which the minister has suggested, that these annuities are very much like contributory pensions, is it possible to have these contributory pensions, these annuities, paid without reference to old age pensions? By that I mean that people who save all their lives and purchase these dominion annuities should be entitled to receive the benefit of that money irrespective of any other consideration.

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct; they do.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I brought up in the house, I think last year, the case of a man named Rhodes in Vancouver who had his old age pension definitely reduced because he was the recipient of an annuity for which he and his wife together had paid some $8,000. The thing seemed so utterly unfair—

Mr. ROGERS: If my hon. friend will permit me, with respect to the old age pension there is what is described as a means test. With respect to an annuity there is no such test, obviously, because the annuity is purchased by the annuitant.

Mr. BENNETT: The maximum pension is provided by law.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. I can readily understand why the old age pension might be reduced by the amount that might be received in annuity by the person in question.

Mr. BENNETT: When it reaches a given figure the reduction must be made because of the statute.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): All the same I venture to say there is no excuse for it.

Mr. LOCKHART: From the figures given by the minister there would appear to be a considerable shrinkage in business last year. The amount paid in commissions to agents and for publicity has been reduced by $50,000, but on the other hand I observe that the staff has increased by five. Would there be any particular reason for a staff increase in view of the fact that the business has diminished? I was wondering if there was any particular explanation for that.

Mr. ROGERS: The business fluctuates, of course. I gave the number of contracts over a period of years, from 1933 onward. In 1933-34 there were only 2,412 contracts.

Mr. LOCKHART: We are dealing with last year now.

Mr. ROGERS: Last year the number was very much larger, though it was less than in the previous year. I must say that 1936-37 was an altogether exceptional year. The number of contracts issued was 7,806.

Mr. BENNETT: Because they expected the rates were going up after the investigation.

Mr. ROGERS: Exactly. There was a great rush of business for several months at that time. Now we are more nearly back to normal, but at that time I think it would be fair to say that the branch was understaffed, having regard to the work that had to be done.

Item agreed to.

Departmental administration, $115,226.

Mr. NEILL: I wonder if the minister would answer one or two small questions that perhaps are not directly connected with this item, but I cannot find any other place to pin them. I should like information on the following points, and it will not take a minute if the minister has the information under his hand. I am sorry the right hon. Prime Minister is not here at the moment, but the other day in reply to the hon. member for Fraser Valley he dealt with the question of unemployment insurance. I should like to know if the minister would just expand that a little. I should like to know, first, what provinces are unwilling to join in an amendment to the British North America Act; second, which provinces have refused to cooperate in passing bills providing for unemployment insurance, and their reasons for so doing; and, third, would it not be possible and wise to publish the draft which the right hon. Prime Minister says is ready, in order to influence public opinion? Each of us has some little influence, and if we went home and boosted for the bill as we saw it, we might be able to bring some pressure to bear on the various governments; but until the provisions of the bill are made known, we are asking people to endorse something more or less in the dark. At any rate I should like to know which of the provinces have flatly refused to join in an amendment to the British North America Act and why; which have refused to join in an unemployment insurance measure, and why; and if we could not have the draft act made public.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend will understand that if I appeared to speak cautiously in connection with this matter, it is desirable that I should do so, as I speak wholly from recollection. My impression is that all the correspondence with the provinces in relation to this matter has been tabled from time to time. The original letter asked for the cooperation of the provinces in the enactment of a national scheme of unemployment insurance. As I recollect it, replies were received from all the provinces. Three provinces expressed the view either that there should not be a national scheme of unemployment insurance or that no action should be taken pending discussion of the matter in their legislatures.

Mr. NEILL: Which three?

Mr. ROGERS: Quebec took definite exception to a national scheme of unemployment insurance. New Brunswick wished to have the matter discussed in the legislature. Alberta took precisely the same position. Subsequently a further letter was sent to the provinces asking for their cooperation in a constitutional amendment which would permit this parliament to enact a national scheme for unemployment insurance. I believe I am correct when I say that answers were received from all but two provinces with respect to this request for assistance in putting through the constitutional amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: A draft amendment was enclosed, was it not?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; a draft amendment was actually submitted to the various provinces. Alberta declined to cooperate. New Brunswick expressed the view that no action should be taken pending the report of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations. Quebec had already expressed its opinion in regard to the first question and, so far as I recall, did not specifically answer the letter referring to the constitutional amendment. Ontario had originally supported the proposal for a national scheme of unemployment insurance, but I do not recall that there was a letter received from that province with special regard to the constitutional amendment. That is the situation as I know it at the present time.

Mr. NEILL: The minister spoke about all the correspondence having been tabled. Could he look into the matter and see that it is all tabled, so that it will all be available?

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. NEILL: What about the legislation itself? What does the minister think about letting the public into his confidence with respect to the draft bill? After all, we have to deal with it finally, and it might help to formulate public opinion in its favour if we were familiar with its provisions. Would the draft bill form part of the matter to be laid on the table?

Mr. ROGERS: I would not care to answer that question without consideration. I can see some merit in the proposal, but I can also see some objections. I should like to have a full opportunity to give the proper weight to each.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say I had in mind the same suggestion as has been expressed by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni with regard to the publication of the bill. I realize, of course, that under the rules of the house it cannot be introduced into the chamber. Having regard to that fact, I think it might possibly be tabled with the correspondence, leaving blanks, of course, where expenditures of public moneys or matters of that kind were involved, as is usual in bills of that sort.

It has not been unusual to lay bills on the table, to give them first reading, and then have them printed for second reading and circulated widely throughout the country. In view of the limitations in connection with the introduction of the measure, and in view of its having been declared to be beyond the legislative competence of parliament, it does seem to me it would be fair to have it made public, so that to some extent public opinion could crystallize around the concrete proposals, rather than in connection with an abstract discussion or suggestion.

Mr. MacNEIL: The minister said the other evening that he had a special representative of the department in Vancouver, and that the remuneration to that officer was $500 a month. From what vote is provision made for his salary, what is his title, and what is the exact nature of his duties?

Mr. ROGERS: That would come under the administration vote in the supplementary estimates, and I think it would be preferable to discuss it at that time.

Mr. MacINNIS: I think the point raised by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni is worthy of support. This government adopts the attitude that if there is any opposition at all from certain quarters, it would immediately drop a measure like a hot coal, and do nothing further about it. It is quite clear, I believe, that in a country such as this, with such a large area and a wide diversity of opinion, there would not be unanimity in any measure the government may propose. Here is a measure, however, of which I believe enlightened opinion in all parts of the dominion is in favour. I believe the government itself is in favour of it, as indicated by the fact that it has proposed it. Should not the government take steps to familiarize the people of the provinces with the measure, because we must remember that this is a government of the provinces just as are the legislatures. We must learn their reaction to the setting up of a national employment insurance scheme to be used as a means of safeguarding the social welfare of the people.

In this way I believe the government would be able to bring pressure to bear upon the provincial governments, through the people in those provinces, and in that way would get consent. We are living in an age in which advertising and publicity of various kinds play an important part in our lives. If the sentiment in favour of unemployment insurance is crystallized, those backward provincial governments, which would like to build a Balkan states of Canada, would have to give way to enlightened opinion. In my opinion such enlightened opinion should be fostered and extended by the federal authority.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not think I can do more than take that proposal under advisement at the present time. I believe the hon. member will realize that it is not possible to do more than that. The leader of the opposition, as I understand it, suggested that the draft bill might be published without the financial provisions.

Mr. BENNETT: I mean that there would be blanks as to contributions by governments.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; that would, of course, deprive the bill of what would be one of its most important provisions.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no, you would be leaving out the question of contributions by employers and employees, and leaving the question of contributions by the government blank, because it would have to be preceded by a message. I think one might get a fair grasp of the general principles of the bill, having regard to the fact that the bill placed upon the statute books was one which was prepared in the light of knowledge obtained from the British labour office in connection with the operation of their act.

Item agreed to.

Combines Investigation Act, $46,670.

Mr. MacNEIL: Have steps been taken with regard to investigating complaints in connection with the milling and baking monopoly in Canada, in order to regulate, if possible, prices paid for bread?

Mr. ROGERS: Some years ago there was an investigation of that kind. Does the hon. member refer to an investigation made some time in the past, or one made recently?

Mr. MacNEIL: Recently.

Mr. ROGERS: I believe complaints were made recently in Vancouver, and a preliminary inquiry was conducted. I have not the report of that inquiry before me, and therefore I am not in a position to give further information.

Mr. ESLING: Because of instances arising in my own constituency, I brought to the attention of the government earlier in the session the conditions existing in connection with the holding of radio patents. We now have a combines commissioner. Under the statute it is necessary to go through a lot of red tape to bring to the attention of the commissioner conditions as they exist. The minister saw fit—and he must have had reasons for so doing—to refer the whole matter to the tariff board.

We now have on record over the signature of the officials of the holding company the fact that they control seventy-one patents. We have on record their letter, over the signature of the solicitor for the holding company, that they reserve the right to collect royalties on every radio brought into Canada; and no matter whether the purchaser pays the duty or not, if a radio comes from any other country this holding company reserves the right to collect the royalty.

There is no likelihood of the tariff board reaching this matter this year because they have too much business on hand. The government knows the conditions that exist. The government knows that every radio sold in Canada costs from forty to sixty per cent more than it would in the United States. This is due to the fact that this holding company controls these patents. In the first place there are twelve companies concerned. They turn over their patents to this holding company and obtain a licence from the holding company to use their own patents. That results in a primary dividend earned through the use of the patent and a second dividend paid because of the increased price. Not only do they control prices, but they control the output.

It would be a simple matter for the minister to instruct the commissioner of combines to make an investigation. A practical, experienced radio man could complete this investigation in a week. He could tell the minister the true difference between the cost of producing a radio in Canada and in the United States. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) has been subjected to considerable criticism during the present session because the radio licence fee has been increased by fifty cents. This combines act permits the minister to make an investigation without any red tape, and if an investigation were carried on I am sure the result would be that the purchaser of a radio would save enough to pay his $2.50 licence fee for twenty years. The people know they have to pay this extra price because of this holding company. Why not get action? Why not give the public that relief for which the Combines Investigation Act was created?

Mr. ROGERS: I understand my hon. friend to say that the matter to which he is referring is now formally receiving the attention of the tariff board.

Mr. BENNETT: Referred to it by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), was it not?

Mr. ROGERS: I believe it was so referred. I doubt the propriety of the Minister of Labour instituting an inquiry under the combines act while the matter is still before the tariff board. I shall be glad to look into the matter and see just where the reference to the tariff board stands at the present time.

Mr. ESLING: The tariff board has not reached this matter, and it has innumerable other matters before it for investigation. It should have been considered at the first of this year in order that the people of Canada might be saved money. As I say, the minister has the power under the combines act to appoint an investigator just as in other cases where the question of prices on controlled production is being considered.

Item agreed to.

Special—To provide for commitments under relief settlement agreements with provincial governments, $200,000.

Mr. BARBER: Would the minister kindly explain this item?

Mr. ROGERS: This amount of $200,000 is needed to provide for commitments under relief settlement agreements with the provincial governments. It will be remembered that these relief settlement agreements were entered into with a number of the provinces by the previous administration. The purpose of the agreement was to take families who were on relief and place them on selected farms. This was a tripartite arrangement under which contributions were made by the dominion, the province and the municipality concerned. At first these agreements were entered into with most of the provinces, but at the present time the only provinces to which we are contributing are Quebec, Manitoba and Alberta. The total of $200,000 now asked for is accounted for by the following requirements:

Quebec	$100,000
Manitoba	80,000
Alberta	20,000

Mr. BARBER: Contributions are made by the municipality concerned, the province and the dominion?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes. The intention is to take families on relief, place them on farm land and provide assistance for a period of four years in order that the family may be able to establish itself.

Mr. MacNEIL: What progress has been made in this regard in British Columbia?

Mr. ROGERS: Very few have actually been placed in British Columbia. The total number covered by agreements in British Columbia is 285, made up of fifty-two families and 233 dependents.

Mr. BARBER: I notice this is a revote; was it unexpended last year?

Mr. ROGERS: The agreements were entered into in 1936. They are four-year agreements, and our commitments are determined upon the number of families actually placed.

Mr. LOCKHART: What is the situation with respect to Ontario?

Mr. ROGERS: The agreement with Ontario has expired, but the numbers placed under previous agreements were 606 families with 2,384 dependents, making a total of 2,990 persons. They were placed from 1932 to 1934.

Mr. LOCKHART: There has been no continuation of that agreement?

Mr. ROGERS: No. That plan has not been continued in Ontario.

Mr. LOCKHART: The provincial government does not want to negotiate, is that it?

Mr. ROGERS: They have not expressed a desire to revive the agreement for this purpose.

Mr. MacINNIS: Were these families placed in rural areas?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. MacINNIS: How many are still on the homesteads where they were placed?

Mr. ROGERS: In British Columbia fifty-two families where they were originally placed.

Mr. MacNEIL: They are still on the land?

Mr. ROGERS: I shall have that information in a moment.

Mr. MASSEY: What is the total number of those placed?

Mr. ROGERS: The total number placed across Canada is 5,916 families, numbering with dependents 26,030. I can give the abandonments and cancellations for Canada as a whole, and then for British Columbia. Of the total of 5,916, the abandonments and cancellations are 1,313.

Mr. MASSEY: Families?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, so the net result is 4,603 families are still established under the terms of the agreement.

Mr. MASSEY: Were any established in Ontario at all?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; I gave the number a moment ago, 606 families.

Mr. MASSEY: How many of them are still on the land?

Mr. ROGERS: So far as we are aware, 431 families are still established on farms in Ontario.

Mr. MASSEY: Was I correct in understanding the minister to say that Ontario was not anxious to proceed further with this scheme?

Mr. ROGERS: The agreement expired in 1934 and was not revived.

Mr. MASSEY: What reason does Ontario give for not wishing to renew it?

Mr. ROGERS: I do not recall any reasons that were given, but there was a change of administration.

Mr. BENNETT: And they have their own settlement plan.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; I believe that is true too. In British Columbia there were nineteen abandonments of the fifty-two families originally placed, leaving thirty-three families still established.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the exact number at present?

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. ROGERS: There are still established 4,603 families, with 20,762 dependents, making a total of 25,365.

Mr. BENNETT: How many had we a year ago?

Mr. ROGERS: We have not that information here. I gave the number of abandonments from the inception of the plan, 1,313 abandonments out of a total of 5,916 families.

Mr. BENNETT: There were some additions, and the net number is still a little over four thousand established?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. STEWART: I notice the item under consideration is a revote. What was the amount voted last year, of which the revote now is $200,000? I assume the minister will be able to tell how much was expended out of last year's vote.

Mr. ROGERS: The amount voted for this purpose last year was $400,000.

Mr. STEWART: How much of that was spent? Was it $200,000? Possibly I could make the point on which I am seeking information a little clearer to the minister. Take another department, the Department of Public Works, for instance. We vote, we will say, $100,000 for a building this year. When you come to the end of the year you have spent only, say, $50,000, and you wish to complete the building. Then you have by way of revote the balance of the original $100,000, which would be $50,000 to revote. Does the minister mean by a revote here a reappropriation of part of a vote of last year? Is this a new vote or a voting again of something that has already been voted?

Mr. ROGERS: The amount voted last year was $400,000.

Mr. STEWART: If we are revoting $200,000 this year, then approximately $200,000 was spent last year.

Mr. ROGERS: I am just trying to get the information. The actual expenditures are made under the terms of agreements. The agreements are not limited to a specific number of families, except as to a maximum, so it is not always possible to tell in advance how much will be expended. Perhaps we might let the item stand, and I shall see that the information is brought down.

Mr. MASSEY: Will the minister also be good enough to tell the committee how much was spent on each family? Does it depend on the farm to which they are going?

Mr. ROGERS: The dominion pays one-third of an amount not in excess of $1,000 with respect to the settlement of families on land from organized municipalities who would otherwise be in receipt of direct relief. The agreement also provides for a fifty per cent contribution by the dominion not in excess of $300 per family taken from an unorganized district. That is extended for a period of four years. Some of it is used for the provision of equipment and food while the family is getting established.

Mr. ESLING: Under what item may we discuss contributions to the provinces in aid of public works?

Mr. ROGERS: I think the appropriate item will be the next one, No. 517.

Mr. STEWART: My reason for seeking information was that the same question arises under three votes, Nos. 516, 517 and 518, and what I am anxious to ascertain is just what "revote" means. Is it a revote of the amount that was originally appropriated and that has not been exhausted, or is it a new vote altogether?

Mr. ROGERS: It is really a revote of the amount to which we were committed under the agreement made subject to the legislation of last year, and which we were not called upon to pay. I am not sure that a revote in that sense is a revote in the sense in which it is generally understood and applied in the Department of Public Works.

Mr. STEWART: That is exactly what I was trying to make clear to the committee. These items are not revotes in the ordinary sense of the word to which we have been accustomed in connection with public works estimates. It seems to be the voting of a similar item to last year, but unless it is part of an appropriation of last year I believe it is not really a revote at all, but a new vote.

Mr. ROGERS: I think it would be fair to say that certainly the first and the second and the third are votes to provide payment for commitments made last year.

Mr. STEWART: That is what I thought; but unless, as I say, it is part of the same item that was voted last year, it is not strictly correct to call it a revote. It is a vote to meet obligations that will mature during this year under agreements that were made last year, or possibly prior to that.

Item stands.

To provide for commitments and completion of works in connection with federal contributions to provincial and municipal relief projects, $1,075,000.

Mr. ESLING: How much by way of contributions to British Columbia has been voted by this government, we will say in the last five years?

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to take note of that question. I am quite sure that this item will not pass to-night because there will be some further discussion on it.

Mr. ESLING: While the minister is looking that up, will he also look up whether the government is going to give that money—I know it is $33,000,000—to the province, or will it expect the province to repay it?

Mr. ROGERS: Is my hon. friend now referring to loans or to actual contributions made by the dominion government to British Columbia for joint works over a period of five years?

Mr. ESLING: Well, I am referring to the matter of $33,000,000, of which about $3,000,000 has been repaid in some way, I do not know how. I am asking the question particularly for the reason that for almost everything which is lacking funds for the purpose of completion the federal government is blamed if it does not come through with the money. But I have before me a press dispatch in which the finance minister at Victoria makes the statement that he does not expect the federal government to demand repayment of this money, or to collect this money.

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to secure that information for my hon. friend and to make it available when we are in committee again on this item.

Mr. GREEN: What public works are being undertaken in British Columbia, either by the dominion government, or by this government in conjunction with the provincial government, on which the unemployed men who are in the Vancouver post office and in the art gallery can be placed?

Mr. ROGERS: Well, there are no joint works to which the dominion government is now contributing through the Department of Labour. There are two stretches of highway, the Big Bend highway and the new highway from the international border to New Westminster, either to which the dominion government is contributing or for which there has been an undertaking that the dominion government will contribute.

Mr. BARBER: Is that under this vote?

Mr. ROGERS: It is not under this vote at all, no.

Mr. GREEN: Those are the only two projects on which these unemployed men could be placed at work?

Mr. ROGERS: Oh, no, I would not say that, because a number of other public works projects of the various departments—the Department of Transport, for instance, and the Department of Public Works—are being carried out in various parts of the province. My hon. friend has raised his question rather under the Department of Labour votes, and I am able to tell him only with regard to the votes that are given here. As a matter of fact, although last year our contributions to highways were under the Department of Labour, this year they are rather under the Department of Mines and Resources, and to some extent under the Department of Transport in so far as our contributions pertain to the abolition of level crossings.

Mr. GREEN: I take it that the minister is very much concerned to have these men working, or at least to offer them work. Can they be placed on the work on the Big Bend highway and on the road from the boundary to New Westminster? If so, I suggest that this information be conveyed to them at once. If that were done, we might get quite a number of them out of the post office and the art gallery, and public support would be swung behind the government instead of, as I think it is to-day, being largely behind the men because it is felt that nothing is being done. The tragedy is that no move whatever is being made by this government. At least that is the feeling in Vancouver. Cannot the minister take some step to offer these men work right away on these two highways?

Mr. ROGERS: The work on the Big Bend highway has been continued over a period of years under agreement with British Columbia. The work on the highway from the international boundary to New Westminster has not yet been started. In all probability it will be done as a joint project with British Columbia. I believe an announcement has already been made with regard to that work, and it has been stated that those who are single and unemployed and residents in British Columbia will be upon the same footing as others as to eligibility for this work, but I am not saying and could not say that there would be an opportunity on this work for all those who are at present unemployed in the city of Vancouver.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Could the minister give us in regard to Alberta similar information to what he has just given with respect to British Columbia?

Mr. ROGERS: There is nothing in these votes, at least in the particular vote that is before us, for Alberta. My hon. friend is really now asking me to speak from memory of votes in other departments. I happened to recall the vote for the Big Bend highway in British Columbia and the highway from the international boundary.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Can he tell us under which item we can discuss this?

Mr. ROGERS: The matter can be discussed under No. 517, the item now before the committee.

Mr. MacINNIS: How much of this amount of $1,075,000 is allocated to British Columbia and what projects will be carried out under the vote?

Mr. ROGERS: As I explained before, this is a revote. It is designed rather to carry out commitments under agreements of the past year, that is to say, to complete the program in which the dominion government agreed to participate in the past year. I will give the break-down of them:

To provide for commitments under agreements with the provinces for which claims covering work done prior to March 31, 1938, will not be received in time to be paid before the close of the present fiscal year, 1937-38:

Quebec	$ 76,500
Ontario	207,500
Manitoba	15,000
Alberta	13,500
British Columbia	45,400
Total	$357,900

That is not for new work, but to provide rather for the payment of accounts which will be received after March 31 of this year but pertaining to work done last year.

Mr. MacINNIS: This work is already done? It provides only for payments for work done?

The CHAIRMAN: It is eleven o'clock.

Mr. ROGERS: It largely provides for the completion of work.

Progress reported.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Wednesday, June 15, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

EX-SERVICE MEN—MEDICAL CARE

Mr. MacNEIL:

1. What was the total expenditure for the medical care of ex-service men, under orders in council P.C. 1842 and P.C. 91, for the fiscal years 1935-36, 1936-37, and 1937-38?

2. What was the total expenditure for hospital allowances for ex-service men, under orders in council P.C. 1842 and P.C. 91, for the fiscal years 1935-36, 1936-37, and 1937-38?

3. What were the total admissions to hospitals of ex-service men, under orders in council P.C. 1842 and P.C. 91, for the fiscal years 1935-36, 1936-37, and 1937-38?

4. How many ex-service men were granted treatment as class 1 patients, under orders in council P.C. 1842 and P.C. 91, for the fiscal years 1935-36, 1936-37, and 1937-38?

1935-36	$1,548,643 61
1936-37	1,392,321 43
1937-38	1,461,855 96
Total	$4,402,821 00

1935-36	$1,315,347 09
1936-37	1,083,919 42
1937-38	943,430 68
Total	$3,342,697 19

3.

1935-36	12,678
1936-37	11,527
1937-38	11,031

4.

1935-36	7,562
1936-37	5,990
1937-38	4,571
Total	18,123

MONTREAL POSTAL EXAMINATIONS

Mr. DENIS:

1. How many persons were candidates at the examinations held in Montreal, in June, 1937, for: (a) postal clerks; (b) letter carriers and mail porters?

2. How many were successful in the said examinations for: (a) postal clerks; (b) letter carriers and mail porters?

3. How many of the successful candidates were appointed since as: (a) postal clerks; (b) letter carriers and mail porters?

4. How many returned soldiers were successful in the said examinations for: (a) postal clerks; (b) letter carriers and mail porters?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. (a) 1,767; (b) 2,593.

2. (a) 402; (b) 824.

3. (a) 63 (full time); 41 (part time). (b) 10 (full time); 42 (part time).

4. (a) 1; (b) 18.

LIFE INSURANCE POLICIES

Mr. FAIR:

1. What is the total amount of premiums paid on the life insurance policies that have lapsed during the calendar years 1930 to 1937 inclusive?

2. What is the approximate average length of time the above policies have been in force?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. The information required is not available from the annual statements received from the various life insurance companies registered at the Department of Insurance.

2. Answered by No. 1.

NATIONAL PARKS

AMENDMENT OF EXISTING LEGISLATION AFFECTING WAWASKESY, ELK ISLAND AND PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND PARKS

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of Bill No. 154, to amend The National Parks Act, and The Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island National Parks Act, 1936.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the house went into committee thereon, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2.

Subsection (3) agreed to.

On subsection (4)—Lands added to Elk Island national park.

Mr. BENNETT: With respect to Elk Island, is it proposed to vest in the crown in the right of the province the lands not required?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; they are transferred to the province. They are really for road purposes, to permit some slight change the provincial authorities wish to make in a road.

Mr. BENNETT: The section says "are hereby declared to be no longer required for park purposes." I do not see that it is vested in the crown in the right of the province of Alberta; however, as in the case of Prince Edward Island, I should think it would be proper to vest it in the crown in the right of the province.

Mr. CRERAR: Is that suggestion for purposes of clarity, or is it essential?

Mr. BENNETT: It struck me that it might be essential, though I am uncertain as to that. When the natural resources agreements were made the reservation for park purposes was made also, as the hon. gentleman said yesterday; and in the case of Prince Edward Island, as will be observed, we have stated that the lands are hereby vested in his majesty in the right of the province of Prince Edward Island. I suggest that somewhat similar words should be used with respect to the two areas mentioned in subsections (3) and (4) of section 2. Whether or not it is essential would be seen only by going back over the various statutes to find whether that was done. But it is simple to add the words, "hereby vested in the crown in the right of the province of Alberta." I think it may be essential, but it may not. I am asking the minister for information.

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot say definitely at the moment, but my impression is that it is covered in the natural resources transfer agreements. I think I am correct in saying that there is some provision somewhere in the agreements that lands which may be no longer required for park purposes shall return to the province. However, I have no objection to adding—

Mr. BENNETT: No; I was just asking the minister for information.

Subsection agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—Lands withdrawn from Prince Edward Island national park.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister can give a little information in respect to a matter which I brought to the attention of the house some time ago. There was a rather serious dispute between the province and some of the landowners. I felt that the landowners, on the evidence submitted in their declaration had made a fairly good case; and the minister said he would look into the matter. I take it, when we place the obligation upon the province to acquire the lands, the Dominion of Canada has no desire to occupy lands with respect to which the previous owners felt that they had a grievance. Perhaps the minister could tell us what the effect of this legislation may be upon the areas which were in dispute and the values which were fixed upon them by the arbitrary provisions of a statute of Prince Edward Island.

Mr. CRERAR: My information is that the matter to which the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) has just referred, and which was mentioned by him on a previous occasion, has been satisfactorily adjusted. I think these changes or rectifications in the park boundary lines relate to the adjustment made with the people from whom the property was acquired.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. CRERAR: That is my information at the moment. I wish, however, to add that I do not think there is any responsibility on the federal government through the parks administration to see that people whose lands may be taken for park purposes are properly compensated. That is wholly a matter within the province, and of course the province has to answer to those from whom the land is acquired.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not saying that the duty rests primarily on the parks branch, but I think it rests on the dominion as a dominion, when it is acquiring property by way of a trust, to satisfy itself in a general way that those who have been deprived of their property have had it taken from them by due process of law. I am not going to traverse the ground I went over before; but the minister will remember that the province passed a statute which allowed them to take the property and fix the compensation. That is, the people who compulsorily take it fix the compensation, and there was no recourse either to arbitration or otherwise. I suggest that, not the parks branch but the Dominion of Canada would not care to acquire that land which had a trust attached to it unless the dominion felt that at least those reasonable precautions, which have always obtained in British dominions when property is taken from an owner, had been observed.

Mr. CRERAR: A rather nice point.

Mr. BENNETT: No. I think the minister said this adjustment cured it.

Section agreed to.

Section 4 agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

EXCISE ACT AMENDMENT

MISCELLANEOUS ADMINISTRATIVE CHANGES INVOLVING NO ALTERATION IN RATES—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to bill No. 123, to amend the Excise Act.

He said: The amendments are harmless. There is really only one amendment which substitutes the word "suffers" for the word "allows."

The other amendment is merely an amendment in point of form. Section 17 of the bill states that the word "five" shall be substituted for the word "two," the form in which the section is drafted violates the rules—or perhaps the accepted practice—of parliament. Instead of section 17 being drafted in the terms that appear, the whole section should have been repealed and the word "five" substituted for the word "two." The senate has made that change in the wording of section 17. Those are the only two amendments. I would ask that the house concur in them.

Mr. BENNETT: There is one about fines, penalties. There are three altogether.

Mr. ILSLEY: I was told there were only two.

Mr. STEWART: It is in the votes and proceedings:

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Production services—Live stock and poultry—further amount required, $24,785.

Mr. LEADER: What progress, if any, has been made with regard to shipping fresh killed beef to the old country market?

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): The first shipment left last week.

Mr. SENN: When this item was up for discussion some time ago I registered an objection against the practice followed by the department of going to the stockyards to buy brood sows rather than obtaining them from breeders of pure bred swine. Will the minister give the committee the details of what has been done during the past year along this line. How many sows have been purchased in this way for distribution among the farmers for use as breeding animals?

Mr. GARDINER: I am informed by the deputy that he has not that information for the past year.

Mr. SENN: I think it is a very unwise policy to purchase animals in this way for distribution among farmers, particularly when there are so many live stock breeders who are doing such good work in breeding pure bred animals. They are helping, at considerable expense to themselves, to build up the breeding stock of this country, but if these animals are purchased at the stockyards the breeders will have no encouragement whatever to continue the work they are doing. They have rendered a wonderful service to the dominion by the production of pure bred hogs, cattle and other animals. Rather than continue in this way, I think it would be better if the department discontinued this service entirely and let the farmers buy from the breeders or wherever else they wish. It would be unfair to the pure bred live stock breeders to continue this practice any longer.

Mr. GARDINER: I can understand that there may be some objection to this policy, but there are also some advantages. I have shipped at one time as many as thirty or forty pure bred Yorkshire hogs to market, and many other producers have done the same thing. By there being some one at the market to make selections, many of those animals are saved from slaughter. Quite often the community in which the animals are bred is not such that they can be disposed of to advantage. Many farmers who would like to take advantage of such a distribution do not live in the immediate vicinity. We are trying to work out a policy whereby these animals will be selected at the local points rather than at the stockyards. That would provide some improvement over the present system. The department will be more than pleased to cooperate with the breeders in providing a more convenient distribution of pure bred sires.

Mr. SENN: The minister's answer goes a long way to prove just what I have said. These pure bred live stock breeders are forced to send their animals to market because they have no other market for them. They will never have a market so long as these animals are distributed in the way they are at present. I think the proper thing to do would be to purchase the animals from the pure bred live stock breeders. I believe these animals could be got for a very small premium over the prevailing market price for slaughter animals. That would assist the breeders and encourage them in the work they are doing.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I agree with what the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) has said. I do not think the department is giving the pure bred live stock breeders of this country sufficient assistance. About the only market they have is the ordinary meat auction, as one might call it. Considerable advancement has been made with reference to advanced registration of pure bred swine, and serious consideration has been given to initiating a record of performance in connection with swine, such as we have with dairy cattle. It seems to me that the department is giving the pure bred live stock breeder very little incentive to carry on a work which is essential to the production of high-class bacon. Has any consideration been given to the payment of bonuses for the production of pure bred swine, such as are paid in connection with cattle and sheep?

Mr. GARDINER: The bonus policy in connection with swine has been largely done away with. This policy was in force generally some years ago, but it is not now in operation in a number of provinces. The service in connection with registration and all that goes with it is given to the breeders of pure bred swine as well as to the breeders of other pure bred live stock. However, the situation in connection with hogs is a little different from that prevailing in connection with cattle or horses. The price of a pure bred sire, as far as cattle or horses are concerned, is much higher than the price of a pure bred hog. The same thing is true with regard to females. For example, when you ship hogs to market, even if they are pure bred, you would get in the west probably fifteen or sixteen dollars a head for them. It is very difficult to make selections on the farm pay the cost of those selections and add that cost on to the price of the animal. But when the individual can go perhaps to the local yard from which the hog is shipped or to the stock yard to which it is shipped, he can purchase pretty much at the market price. In addition, the amount of money involved in the animal itself renders it difficult to add the cost of the service on to it, which would mean going around and selecting the hogs where they are to be found on the farm. That is one thing which it is difficult to overcome, the matter of cost alone. When you are dealing with a bull or a stallion, it is an entirely different matter. There you can make selections and add on the cost of selection, the cost of inspection, and all that kind of thing without doubling the price of the animal, but with the hog you would probably more than double the price. I would say this, that I think the results which have been obtained across Canada from one end to the other in the improvement of swine is a fair indication that the services of the department have been not only appreciated but effective.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Perhaps the minister did not get my point. I believe the department would be well advised to give consideration to the encouragement of the production of high-class, pure bred swine that come up to the standard required and have the record of performance credentials. I see no more serious difficulty in providing a system of general application with regard to hogs than in providing one with regard to sheep. I quite agree with the minister that great strides have been made in assisting in the production of better swine throughout the country, because farmers take advantage of the pure bred swine that are placed on the market; but that is more or less drying up the fountain from which the better swine have come; and while it slightly improves the general quality and general standard throughout the country, it does not offer much incentive to the breeders to whom the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Senn) has referred.

As to advanced registry, I observe in last year's report that the department was completing arrangements for two advanced registry test stations, one in Edmonton and one in Saskatoon, and I should like to know what progress has been made in that regard and whether the department has given consideration to the establishment of advanced registry test stations at other points throughout the dominion. If we are going to keep in step with the improvement made in other countries in quality of production, special efforts should be made and special encouragement given by the department to the swine breeders throughout this country, so that breeding swine with special credentials as to record of performance might be more widely distributed. The department might well seriously consider the taking of special steps for the encouragement of pure bred swine because, after all, the swine from which we produce our better bacon to-day are all pure bred or eligible for registration. I quite agree that the small price secured for pure bred swine does deprive breeders from having a record of their breeding in many instances; but recently great strides have been taken with respect to advanced registry tests and records of performance credentials, and that is fundamental if we are steadily to improve the quality of our swine. But I am speaking more with reference to the encouragement of the breeder of recorded pure bred swine, than of what might be called the commercial breeder, who is merely taking advantage of the better hog he gets at the ordinary market price.

Mr. BLAIR: We already have a premium on first-class hogs and I think that might perhaps serve the purpose. It is extremely important that our bacon should be properly displayed in the old country. For many years we have heard that we have never had a proper display of our bacon in the old land. We have also heard that our Canadian packing organizations do not wish to have a proper display of our bacon in the old land because they say that if the price of our export bacon, which comprises 15 per cent of our production, goes up then the price of the 85 per cent we consume at home would also go up, and if the price of the 85 per cent for home consumption goes up, it will come in competition with fowl, fish, eggs and salmon, and we shall not have the turnover in bacon that we now have. Their interest is in looking after the packer. Our interest is to see that we get the highest possible price for our Canadian bacon.

I have received a number of letters complaining of our Canadian display, and I have one here which I got from Glasgow only two days ago, from a drover of my home village. He visited the empire exhibition in Glasgow and viewed the situation in regard to our export cattle and hogs. I will read a few sentences from his letter:

> I came to Glasgow on a cattle boat from Montreal for three reasons: first, I wanted to see how Canadian cattle were being handled for export; second, I wanted to see what Canada in particular had to show in the empire show windows at the empire exhibition; and third, I just wanted to see what sort of country our Canadian pioneers came from.
> I have been greatly impressed by the beauty and historical interest of Scotland. I have just finished going through Edinburgh castle and I am writing this as I did the enclosure, in the waiting room in the castle. Canada had the most pretentious building on Dominion avenue at the exhibition, but I don't think it would sell Canada to the British Isles. While Australia had a more modest building, I believe her display was much more businesslike.

> Peter C. McTavish.

That letter, as I said, was from Glasgow, from the empire exhibition.

Mr. GARDINER: If I might make the suggestion, the remarks just made by my hon. friend relate to item No. 485. We are now on the item for the production of live stock and poultry, and I would rather reserve until we reach the other item, any remarks I have to make in reply to my hon. friend.

To deal with the questions raised by the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe), the first of these advanced registry establishments that was built was in Ontario. Later there was one placed in Quebec, and later another in Prince Edward Island, and one in Nova Scotia, which serves both Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. Last year again there was one built in Saskatoon, as my hon. friend indicated, and one in Edmonton. This year we are rebuilding the one in Ontario; that is, we are building a more up-to-date plant.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Where?

Mr. GARDINER: Near Waterloo, in the same vicinity where the old one was established. That is now being arranged for. The desire is to promote the production of the best strain of Yorkshire hogs, particularly, right across Canada, and to encourage breeders in producing them by giving them this registry and also a test of the production under certain feeding regulations. That is being done at all these plants, and the work will be enlarged as funds are available.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): No consideration has been given to the breeders who produce the desired type of hogs for breeding purposes?

Mr. GARDINER: Of course the present system contemplates that they will reap a premium on the sales when their live stock is sold. I think it has been the experience that they do, as a result of the records given by and maintained by the government.

Mr. PERLEY: When this item was before the committee on a former occasion, I think it was May 25, I tried to persuade the minister to give consideration to the live stock breeders of Saskatchewan by way of providing sires. I wonder if he can tell us what he proposes to do to assist Saskatchewan live stock breeders this summer, and if he has reconsidered his ideas? At that time he was not very favourably disposed.

Mr. GARDINER: We have not the figures made up yet for this year. The work is now being carried on. But I gave the figures, I believe, on two previous occasions, when we were on the general estimates and also on the date mentioned. The number of bulls put out in Saskatchewan was, last year, 65, and the previous year, 70; in Manitoba 61 last year and 52 the previous year; in Alberta last year 78 and the previous year 88. In addition to this policy of putting out bulls in the communities, we are this year in Saskatchewan putting bulls into the community pastures that were established. This year 18 are being placed in those pastures, to be used by those adjacent to them.

Mr. PERLEY: How many of those pastures are in Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: All eighteen are in Saskatchewan.

Mr. PERLEY: Can the minister give us any idea as to the number of breeding stock, females, in the pastures?

Mr. GARDINER: If it would serve just as well, I should prefer to deal with these figures when we are discussing rehabilitation. I shall then have the figures available of the number of cattle served in each of the pastures.

Mr. PERLEY: How many sires is the department putting out this year in Saskatchewan under the loaning scheme?

Mr. GARDINER: The number has not yet been fully determined. As I have just indicated, we are now supplying the pastures and other areas. I am not able to give the completed figure for this year. It will be a number greater than last year.

Mr. LEADER: The minister has given the number of sires placed in the different provinces in the last two years. Could he give us the number by breeds?

Mr. GARDINER: For the three provinces I have the totals back over a period of years, but not just for last year. I can give those figures if they will be satisfactory.

	Alberta	Saskatchewan	Manitoba
Shorthorns	539	604	295
Herefords	128	153	90
Ayrshires	6	11	2
Angus	86	70	18
Holsteins	16	12	12
Redpolls	47	24	7
Jerseys	7	...	...

Mr. LEADER: There is just one suggestion I wish to offer to the minister. Thinking over our live stock industry and the condition it is in at the present time, and realizing that we are not making very much headway in developing a better quality of beef cattle—I am speaking particularly of beef cattle at the present time—I have come to the conclusion that the production of good live stock should be left entirely with the provinces, each of which has a department of agriculture. Over this large dominion, farflung as it is, the federal government cannot undertake to supervise better sires for our live stock; therefore, I believe, it should be left entirely to the provinces. But I think the federal department could assist in the marketing of our products; I would say that that is their job. I believe also that they should supply funds whereby the provinces could give bonuses in the production of better sires. I wish just to throw out that suggestion. I know that in the past the different provinces have had policies of their own, sometimes overlapping with the policies of the federal government. But I am firmly convinced that the production end should be left to the province, with the federal department assisting in every way possible in providing a market and also giving financial aid. When I read of the action which has been taken, in particular, by Ireland, which is our greatest competitor in the old country market—the policies that country has adopted, the strides it has made in producing better feeder cattle for the British market—I am amazed that we in Canada have just leaned on our oars and have not made use of the advantages which we enjoy. It is all right to send stocker and feeder cattle to Great Britain, but we should send what the market demands. We are not doing so in any quantities. Most of our feeder cattle, store cattle that go to the old country markets, are the progeny of dairy and dual purpose bulls. Can you expect them to compete successfully with Ireland, which is using the very best beef bulls it can buy in Scotland and in England? We in Canada should be concerned in providing the very best type of beef bulls we can secure, not limiting them to any one beef breed, but getting the best we can in all breeds, thereby giving the market what it demands. The same thing applies exactly to the United States. Those two countries provide us with our markets, and if we have not the initiative and the ambition to provide ourselves with the very best stock we can possibly obtain to supply those markets, then I say there is something seriously wrong.

Item agreed to.

Plant inspection, insects and diseases—further amount required, $30,185.

Mr. PERLEY: Does the grasshopper question come under this item?

Mr. GARDINER: No, under entomology. There is a special item for it.

Item agreed to.

Grants for fair buildings and improvements, in the amounts detailed in the estimates—further amount required, $65,850.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. GARDINER: The purpose of the vote is to provide for a number of grants. For the maritime winter fair at Amherst, Nova Scotia, there is an additional $5,000. That is one year's amount to provide for a building that is being put up at Amherst to serve the three maritime provinces. The one winter fair serves the three. This will constitute part of the amount that is to be spread over ten years under arrangement with these provinces. The provinces themselves are contributing $5,000. The Vancouver exhibition is a similar arrangement, but there is some doubt whether that will proceed in view of the fact that the amount has been found scarcely sufficient to take care of the cost of the building. It may have to be delayed for another year, but at the moment the amount is being voted. I do not know whether we shall be able to go through with the arrangement, but that is the intention. The additional amount for the Montreal exhibition represents a special expenditure that has been incurred there, the province of Quebec having joined with us on a fifty-fifty basis to clear up the expenditure that has been made. As a matter of fact, Quebec is giving more than fifty per cent. The Ormiston exhibition is a similar one. The British Columbia Cattle Growers' Association receives $600. It is to increase the grant to the Kamloops exhibition for a similar purpose. With respect to the Discovery Day fair in the Yukon, we are providing a grant to take care of some special exhibits having to do largely with horticulture in the north country. The request was made by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mrs. Black) and I thought it was a good purpose to encourage the production of vegetables and flowers in that far northern country. The hon. member can explain it more fully than I can. The other amount of $50,000 is for small exhibitions across Canada, for improvements of fences and buildings and so on, where employment may be given in a small way.

Mrs. BLACK: I wish to take this opportunity particularly to thank the Minister of Agriculture for making this grant: Our Discovery Day celebration, the day on which we celebrate the discovery of gold in the Yukon, is on August 17, and fairs are held in the capital city, Dawson, and at White Horse and Mayo. At White Horse, Dawson and Mayo, tourist steamers call and tourists are interested in seeing what our country will produce. In the three months of the growing season when we have practically twenty-four hours of daylight or sunlight, the country produces almost all the vegetables that one gets on the outside, and our flowers are unusually beautiful. Some of our gardens rival in beauty those of the "outside" world, as we call it. Prizes are offered for the best display of flowers and the best display of vegetables. There is now one experimental farm in the vicinity of Carmacks. I do not believe that any grant is given to that farm, but seeds and roots are sent to Mr. Brown and he in turn, I believe, sends samples of the foodstuffs he has raised in that part of the world. Yukoners, I am sure, will be particularly pleased, because while this amount is not large it will at least show them that the government is taking an interest in the agricultural work away in the north country.

Item agreed to.

Branch farms and stations and illustration stations—further amount required, $42,230.

Mr. PERLEY: Explain.

Mr. GARDINER: These are the items making up the vote: Branch farms and stations and illustration stations, salaries, additional amount required for new and reclassified positions and statutory increases resulting from reorganization, $7,510. Then there are wages, additional amount required for increase in wages of labour and so on, branch farms and stations, amounting to $27,525. For illustration stations, to provide for the establishment of new stations, at $350 per station, and travelling expenses of supervisors, there is an amount of $2,035. There is a substation at Fort William, Ontario, for the study of crop improvement methods, soil improvement, live stock production, tree, fruit and vegetable production; and including salaries, rent, supplies and so on, the amount is $2,340. For the substation at Creston, British Columbia, for the study of crop possibilities, type of crop rotation most desirable on reclaimed Creston flats, there is an amount of $2,820.

Mr. MARSH: How many of these branch farms and stations are there? I was interested in ascertaining whether this money is distributed over three or four branch farms, or whether there are many of them throughout the country, and in what provinces they are located.

Mr. GARDINER: There are many of them all across Canada. I was just looking for the list. I did not have it at hand because this matter was dealt with on the general estimates and, as has been indicated, this is only a supplementary estimate. But we have the information, and I can get it shortly.

Mr. MARSH: It is not necessary, thank you.

Item agreed to.

Entomology—further amount required, $19,210.

Mr. PERLEY: Would the minister make a statement with regard to the grasshopper plague in Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: The latest information is that grasshoppers are hatching in moderate numbers in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and parts of Alberta. There is an organization set up to deal with the attack of the grasshoppers on the crops; as to how effective it will be we are not yet in a position to say. While I was in the southern part of Saskatchewan recently I was told that in certain sections down in the neighbourhood of Oxbow and Carlyle there is a somewhat serious development of the grasshopper plague at the moment, but they hope to be able to keep it under control.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Some parts of northern Ontario are seriously affected as well. There is a grasshopper plague in Fort William and Port Arthur, and recently the Huntsville district showed signs of it.

Mr. GARDINER: I am glad to have that information, and the department will take the matter under consideration.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What steps are being taken to combat the grasshoppers? I had word this morning that on several farms in the south, half the crop is said to have been destroyed. That is not general, I understand, but it is so in these cases.

Mr. GARDINER: The attack on the grasshopper plague is always made by the provincial governments. We do not carry on that service. We do make available any of our men from this branch of the department in order to assist in developing ways and means of handling the plague, but the work is actually financed and carried on by the provincial governments.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is any subsidy given by the federal government?

Mr. GARDINER: There is no subsidy; just this assistance which is given through this branch.

Item agreed to.

Marketing services — agricultural economics, including grant of $5,000 to the International Conference of Agricultural Economists—further amount required, $7,690.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): What is this further amount for? I thought the item in the main estimates provided for a grant of $5,000 for this conference.

Mr. GARDINER: The purpose of this additional amount is first to provide for additional sums required for new and reclassified positions and statutory increases resulting from reorganization; also the adjustment of salaries of graduate assistants and student assistants as provided in these classifications. Second, it is to provide for financial assistance to the International Conference of Agricultural Economists to be held at Macdonald College, Ste. Anne de Bellevue, in Quebec, August 21-28, 1938. This is a conference that is held from time to time in different countries. This year it is to be held in Canada, and we are doing here what is done in other countries, providing some assistance towards the cost of it. The extent of that assistance is $5,000.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Is it the intention of the government to send another committee overseas in 1939 to investigate marketing conditions?

Mr. GARDINER: We have our organization over there at the moment; that is, we sent over Mr. Allen of the university of Saskatchewan, as was indicated when the general estimates were up, and we also have six men, sent there in previous years, who are acting under Mr. Allen. In addition others may go over from the department from time to time in connection with certain activities, but it is not anticipated that a definite committee will be sent over for that purpose. That is, the action we have taken is a result of the activities of that committee of a year ago in establishing the set-up of the marketing branch. There is one man over there now, Mr. Arkell, who is making some investigations along with Mr. Allen.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Does he report to the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): If any other committees are sent overseas at public expense, such as the very able committee that was sent over last year, I suggest that their report be tabled as it is presented, whether it criticizes or praises any department of the government. I think the house and the country are entitled to a full report on conditions as they exist overseas, and as they are found to exist by any such committee, rather than a report such as that to which we referred previously at some length. I do not propose to refer to it again more than to say that I want to compliment the minister on naming such outstanding and experienced agricultural representatives as made up that committee. I think it most unfortunate, however, that the original report was not presented; perhaps because in some respects it did not give any added political colour to the Department of Trade and Commerce, or perhaps it was embarrassing to the Department of Agriculture. The report was so rehashed that it was, I repeat, merely a political document complimenting the government for what they had done, advertising what they intended to do and leaving unsaid many things that the committee found essential for the better marketing of our agricultural products overseas. I do not think it is unfair to say that now, because since referring to it before I have observed in the minister's discussions of his estimates the statement that seed tomatoes of a certain kind had been distributed to only a few of the experimental farms. But on page 10 of this report, which was more or less an added entry or added compliment to the government rather than any report of a committee, clause 4 states:

The seed of a particularly promising new variety of tomato has been purchased. It has been distributed among canners throughout Canada who have undertaken to have the crop produced and processed under the superivsion of the Department of Agriculture. This particular variety is very promising and it is hoped that it may be the means of improving our product on the British market.

We find that only a few experimental farms have received this choice seed. That is only one example of the statements made throughout this so-called report, which to my mind is more a political handbook than anything else; it has not even the name "report" on it. It is most unfortunate that the advice and findings of such an excellent committee have been so much befogged by what to my mind is merely a political scramble of difficulties between two departments.

It is not in any spirit of sarcasm that I ask the minister whether he would consider again sending a committee overseas. The committee did excellent work last year. I should like to see them go back to the old country, investigate British markets as they did before, and be allowed to present in this house a report not manufactured by someone after their return and added to and subtracted from and changed in its whole purport until it is of little value except politically for the government and the department under which they were sent.

Item agreed to.

Dairy products—further amount required, $20,050.

Mr. TUSTIN: The details on page 24 of the supplementary estimates show a chief of dairy products marketing and merchandising services. In the main estimates there was an assistant director of marketing services. Is this a new position that has been added in the supplementaries?

Mr. GARDINER: This position was provided for when the reorganization was arranged, but it is not yet filled.

Mr. TUSTIN: Then it will be a new position?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Item agreed to.

Subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, and special grant of $90,500 to Manitoba Cold Storage, Limited, Winnipeg, Manitoba—further amount required, $178,836.80.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Will the minister explain?

Mr. GARDINER: The following contracts have been signed since the main estimates were submitted:

Edmonton Cold Storage Co. Ltd., Edmonton, Alberta, $8,926.80.
Elgin Growers Cooperative, St. Thomas, Ontario, $525.
Oxford Fruit Cooperative, Ltd., Woodstock, Ontario, $2,355.
Creston Cooperative Fruit Exchange, Creston, British Columbia, $4,080.
Vancouver Ice and Cold Storage Limited, Vancouver, British Columbia, $15,000.
Total, $30,886.80.

Then, as to applications received but contracts not yet signed, these have been investigated by the department and we are practically committed to them:

Crown Fruit Company, Kelowna, British Columbia, $4,875.
Allied Cooperative Cold Storage, Hamilton, Ontario, $37,500.
Keremeos Growers Cooperative, Keremeos, British Columbia, $6,600.
Okanagan Valley Land Company, Okanagan Centre, British Columbia, $3,525.
Timiskaming Producers Cooperative, New Liskeard, Ontario, $1,050.
British Columbia Fruit Shippers, Ltd., West Summerland, British Columbia, $3,900.
Special grant, Manitoba Cold Storage Co., Ltd., Winnipeg, Manitoba, $90,500.

The Timiskaming Producers Cooperative will have to come under the special grants, as well as the Manitoba Cold Storage. The reason is that strictly speaking, as the law stands, anyone making application for one of these grants must do so before any activities in connection with the building are started. These two concerns had unofficially made application before starting activities, but before we could get into the position of inspecting and taking the action necessary under the law they found it imperative to go on if they were to get construction under way this year. They started with the understanding that if we found them to be in every way in accordance with the law we would proceed. In every other way they have conformed to the law.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): The amounts are in keeping with the terms of the act?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Has the minister with him a copy of the contract form that is entered into in all these cases?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not a copy of the agreement here. It is the same agreement as has been in use for a long term of years.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. I am under the impression that the form of contract gives some jurisdiction to the minister in regard to rates of charges.

Mr. GARDINER: That is correct.

Mr. STEVENS: I am not approaching this in a critical spirit at all, but I should like to point out that the original idea of the Cold Storage Act—I think that is the act under which subsidies are granted—was that it would be a service to producers; that was the foundation of it. It was with that thought in mind that parliament passed the act, and it has been carried on ever since. Now the strange thing is that over a long period of years since this act first came into operation there has grown up a tendency on the part of those who control some of the cold storage plants to use the plant as a method of enhancing their own profits rather than stabilizing the market for the producers. I do not apply this to all. A substantial number of those named by the minister are cooperatives, and they are not included in this at all. I am referring to the cold storage plants located in certain of our cities. I believe the department should make a careful study of these to ascertain whether the large contributions, running into many millions of dollars, that have been made out of the public treasury, are being used for the enhancement of private companies rather than to stabilize the market. I did not know that this item was coming up to-day, or I would have been fortified with more data.

Let me give one illustration. For the last ten years statistics have been published from time to time with regard to the amount of butter in storage. I looked at these the other day and I believe there is something like 20,000,000 pounds of butter now in storage. Hon. members who are familiar with this business will understand my illustration. The flush period of production in Canada is from June to September, tapering off, of course, as the grass dries up in the latter months of the summer. As we pass into the winter, when the cattle have to go under shelter, the production drops off. Usually the cold storage accumulation around September is in the neighbourhood of 20,000,000 pounds, and this will gradually diminish from about the end of October. Frequently the substantial portion of this accumulation has disappeared by February or March.

When the increase in storage ceases around the month of September the price paid to the farmer for butter fat ought to increase and continue to increase until the middle of the winter. Frequently the farmer does not get the advantage of increased butter fat prices until January, February or March. Mark you, the natural conditions are fairly steady. The large corporations, such as the Eastern Dairies, argue that an increased price should not be paid because of the presence of this accumulation still in storage. This happens as regularly as the seasons. My conviction is that the large dairy companies have used their storage facilities for their own profit rather than to assist the farmer.

Let me put the story the other way around. When this legislation was approved parliament realized that Canada was unique, as compared with New Zealand and certain other countries, in that we had a very cold winter season but a summer season of prolific production. Parliament accepted the view that subsidies should be paid to provide cold storage facilities in order that fair prices might be maintained and that the farmer might receive a higher price for his butter fat during the winter. It was felt that the production could be sold at a price which would enable the cold storage company to pay the farmer a fair price in the summer. But that is not the way it has worked out. To use the words the head of one of these corporations uttered some time ago, "There is the consumer dollar from which must be obtained the cost of freight, the cost of processing and our profit, and the farmer gets what is left."

That is an absolutely false philosophy; yet it dominates the butter business, and also the cheese business to a certain extent. The same philosophy dominates the hog and bacon market. I implore the minister to give some thought to this philosophy that works eternally against the farmer. My contention is that there should be a fair price paid to the farmer. That should be your kicking-off point. Then you have the cost of processing, cold storage, freight, handling and distribution. The function of parliament should be to watch these intervening processes and see that they do not become too costly. Naturally I am just as much interested in protecting the consumer as I am in seeing that the farmer gets a fair deal. Parliament should exercise its discretion and control as far as possible.

I venture to say that scores of millions of dollars have been contributed to assist in providing these cold storage facilities. I recall one instance where a grant of a couple of million dollars was made. These cold storage companies that have received millions of dollars from the public treasury ought not to be allowed to use these facilities to control the market for their own advantage. These facilities should be used for the stabilizing of the market so that the farmer may receive a fair price for his butter fat and other products involved in the cold storage business.

Mr. GARDINER: The remarks just made apply to what was said when the main estimates were up some time ago. At that time we discussed the question whether this particular provision should be continued. My understanding of the discussion at that time was that there was an overwhelming opinion that these subsidies should be continued. When the question was raised before, I had somewhat the same idea as has been raised to-day. There is a question whether we have not reached the time when it can be said that we have given sufficient encouragement to the establishment of cold storage plants.

Mr. STEVENS: I would not want the minister to be under any false impression. I want it understood that I am not arguing for the cessation of grants under the Cold Storage Act. What I am suggesting is that these companies have taken advantage of these subsidies, and that the whole matter should be carefully surveyed from the standpoint of the farmer. That is all I am asking for at the moment. I am not making any charges, nor am I criticizing the minister. This is not a matter for which he has any particular responsibility.

Mr. GARDINER: Nevertheless there is a question whether we have reached a point where we should reconsider the whole matter. There is just a possibility that in some places we are promoting a commercial venture rather than assisting the producer. However, we feel that with the legislation as it is, those who meet all the conditions are entitled to the assistance provided. The storing of butter at comparatively low prices during the production season and selling it at higher prices during the winter is something that goes on rather generally all across Canada. It is something that develops with the seasonal conditions prevailing in this country.

Mr. SENN: Not only as regards butter.

Mr. GARDINER: No; as regards other products as well as butter. The whole question is one which is receiving consideration by the department in an endeavour to find some way of meeting the situation, but up to the moment we have not found any effective way of meeting it.

Reference was made to the amount. The total amount of subsidies was $2,570,525.94. I think it advisable that we should place that on the record just to keep it straight.

Mr. STEVENS: May I add one suggestion to what I have already said about this matter, and it is this: When we come to the month of August, September or October, there is somewhere during that period the possibility of moving out of Canada a substantial amount of butter. I recall that some four years ago, possibly five, I took an interest in the matter from the standpoint of the Department of Trade and Commerce; I know that a considerable amount was moved out, and it eased the tension at once and had an immediate effect on the price. I believe that even if it were to cost a little, it would pay us to move some of that butter out just at the peak of the period because the flush period is always used as an excuse for beating down the price to the farmer for his butter fat. I do not know the price now, but for many years it got down to sixteen, seventeen and eighteen cents for butter fat, which is a disastrous price. I think these cold storage companies and the large dairy corporations ought to be brought into line so that a reasonable price will be paid to the farmer throughout this flush period, and I am quite certain that if we had some attention paid to the science of marketing during that period, in September and October particularly, a great deal could be done to assist. But, above all, during the summer months these companies ought not to be allowed to beat down the price as they do on the presentation of statistics of storage.

Mr. BLACKMORE: The suggestion of the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) causes me to point out that in my judgment we shall never get the economic life of this country on a stable basis until we introduce from one end of it clear to the other the principle of the just price.

An hon. MEMBER: How?

Mr. BLACKMORE: First of all, go to work on it; realize it has to be done. Then, probably call in those who know how to do it. There has been no evidence so far that anyone has attempted to do it, and the farmer is being destroyed. It is the same in Ontario as in other parts of the country. I do not wish to labour this unduly, but the words of the hon. member for Kootenay East are absolutely true, and this situation ought not to be.

I have come to the point where I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture three or four questions just to get clearly in mind the point of view of the Department of Agriculture. I am not sure whether this is the right place to ask these questions, but the first one is this:

What is the purpose of the Department of Agriculture in the Dominion of Canada? Is it here to increase the agricultural output in Canada, or is it here to increase the farmers' prosperity and stability in Canada, or is it here to improve Canada's agricultural possibilities? I believe that if we can definitely answer these three questions to start with, we would be on a basis from which we could go forward.

The next question which ought to be asked, it seems to me, is this: Is our Department of Agriculture primarily concerned with producing Canada's needs or the world's needs?

An hon. MEMBER: Both.

Mr. BLACKMORE: A very sound answer came from the other side of the house—both. That is also my opinion. If that is the case, it helps us to direct our agricultural thinking. I come from an agricultural constituency, and I am deeply interested in these questions, as I know all members are. My province is primarily an agricultural province, and my constituency is an agricultural constituency. I have said several times already in this house that unless something is done to regulate the situation for the farmers in my constituency, then we are destroying the agricultural life of my constituency, which thing ought not to be. I think everyone will grant that.

I propose to ask several other questions after a while. I do not want to be too truculent, but the time has come when the farmer's voice must be heard, and attention must be paid to it. Otherwise we must frankly acknowledge that in this Dominion of Canada the agricultural industry no longer counts, that it is a secondary consideration. Once that is acknowledged so that everybody knows it, well enough. Then we shall all know how to act; then we shall all know what to do. We shall all know that it is not wise to stay any longer in the western provinces, that we had better move to Ontario and Quebec where the industries are.

Miss MACPHAIL: Mr. Hepburn will look after you.

Mr. BLACKMORE: We shall have to move east. That is how many people from the agricultural areas are feeling. While we do not want to have anything unpleasant, I think probably the time has come when there ought to be a show-down. That is how the farmers are feeling. We are pretty much with our backs to the wall. It is practically impossible for us to move across the line into the United States as tens of thousands of farmers have done, and it is rapidly becoming impossible for us to live on the farm. If we leave the farm and move into the cities, we face a life of misery, and we have much the same situation to face as those boys in Vancouver of whom we were speaking yesterday. While I do not want to precipitate anything unpleasant, I would ask the minister, as man to man—I know he is as deeply interested in the farmers as I am—

An hon. MEMBER: More so.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. BLACKMORE: You must not say more deeply interested. You can think it, and say it if you want to be wrong. But the minister comes from the west and is a westerner with me. He is interested in the west, first, as the west itself. Second, he is interested in it because of the part the west can play in making Canada a great and happy country, and that is the attitude we all have. I have asked very few questions on the estimates, but if I could get an answer from the minister to the questions I have put, I have several others.

Mr. LENNARD: Ask them.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I have asked several already, and they will take some answering. First, what is the purpose of the department? Is it to increase the agricultural output of Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: If I may be allowed, I move, Mr. Chairman:

That under vote 483, supplementary estimates, subsidies for cold storage warehouses under the Cold Storage Act, there be added: "and special grant to the Temiskaming Producers' Co-operative, New Liskeard, Ontario, $1,050.

Mr. GARDINER: As I explained a few moments ago, that will rectify the position in which the item now stands. The amendment will put it in the same position as Manitoba.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Are the same statutory terms applicable to limited companies as to cooperative organizations engaged in cold storage?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. It is just a matter of cold storage as long as it is available to the public.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): So long as it is available to the producer?

Mr. GARDINER: To the public generally. For cold storage purposes, as long as the space is available, at a fee, to the public generally, whether it is for producer or consumer purposes. The public has the use of the service.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): It must be kept open for public purposes?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. LENNARD: In connection with this $37,500 grant to the Allied Cooperative Cold Storage Company of Hamilton, what further grant will this firm receive?

Mr. GARDINER: The first amount paid is fifty per cent of the total grant. The remainder is spread over four years.

Mr. LENNARD: What type of cold storage plant is this?

Mr. GARDINER: It has a space of 300,000 cubic feet, and it will be open to the public for general storage.

Mr. LENNARD: It is not a processing plant?

Mr. GARDINER: There may be a processing plant built along with it; I am not sure about that. But the only part to which we give assistance is cold storage.

Mr. LENNARD: Who are the officials at the head of this concern?

Mr. GARDINER: That is one which is pending; the agreement has not yet been signed. I have not the names of the officials here.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I should like to have the minister answer the questions I put, because they are, to my thinking, important. Perhaps he will tell me whether or not he would answer them in the affirmative. I asked three questions which were covered up, probably, by a later remark. The first one was: Is it the purpose of the federal Department of Agriculture to increase the agricultural output of the dominion? I would say the answer is, yes. If that is not right the minister will correct me.

Mr. GARDINER: I think that on two or three previous occasions I have answered these questions, particularly when I was discussing the reorganization of the department. We have reorganized the department on a basis which we think indicates what the intention of the department is. The first division is the science and research division, which investigates all possibilities in connection with the fighting of diseases of plants, and animals and other problems of scientific agriculture. Then we have an experimental division, which makes use of the discoveries made by research and otherwise, and tries them out on our experimental farms. Then we have the production branch, which promotes the production of farm products on the farms generally throughout Canada. And we have the marketing branch, which promotes the marketing of these farm products.

In reply to the remarks made by the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens), I would say that what he is suggesting really did occur last year in the carrying out of the activities of those who had dairy products in cold storage. Approximately 5,000,000 pounds of butter was exported last fall, mostly in October and November, and a little more than 5,000,000 pounds were imported this spring to take the place of what had been exported last fall. The intention was probably a little different from the result obtained. It was probably thought last fall that there would be a slight surplus, and butter was exported; but as we got into the winter months, and found, because of the falling off of production towards the end of the season, particularly due to the fact that there were poor feeding supplies in different parts of Canada, that our butter production was down and the quantity in storage had diminished, it did become necessary to bring in later approximately the amount which had been exported early in the season. Whether if this happened every year it would invariably work out to be a good thing I am not so sure. After all what really happens in a case of that kind is that you add cost of transportation at least to somebody, somewhere. If you transport 5,000,000 pounds of butter from here to Great Britain there is the cost of carriage; if you bring butter back from Great Britain later on in order to supply the needs of this market, there is another transportation cost. Somebody must bear that expense, and, as I say, whether it would always work out to be a good thing for the producer in this country is difficult to determine. I believe last season it did work out beneficially to him: the fact that there was a slight shortage at the end of last year resulted in a better price this year for the farmer.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): How much New Zealand butter is in storage at the present time?

Mr. GARDINER: The amount in storage in the country at the present time is very small.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Has the minister any idea how much New Zealand butter was brought in last year?

Mr. GARDINER: A little over 5,000,000 pounds, from Australia and New Zealand.

Mr. SENN: And some from England as well?

Mr. GARDINER: There was a shipment from England, but it is possible that it was Australian butter.

Mr. STEVENS: Has the minister before him the butter fat prices during the months of July, August and September last year?

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps it would be well to place on record the wholesale jobbing prices at Montreal throughout the year 1937, by months:

	Cents
January	26·32
February	24·98
March	26·04
April	26·52
May	23·49
June	24·67
July	26·00
August	26·77
September	26·64
October	28·39
November	29·92
December	30·06

The average price was 26·65 cents. Taking the next five months, in 1938, the jobbing price at Montreal was:

	Cents
January	31·88
February	34·29
March	35·75
April	31·72
May	26·35

The price for May this year is almost three cents a pound higher than the price in May last year.

Mr. STEVENS: These are wholesale prices. What I am concerned about is the butter fat price to the farmer in those months.

Mr. GARDINER: I have not that price here. There is a ratio generally prevailing between the two, but it does vary, and I should not like to quote it in relation to those prices.

Mr. STEVENS: While I thank the minister for the information, these prices are of no value at all in considering the matter from the agricultural standpoint. It is the butter fat price that is the vital point.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes. I have it here now, for Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Ontario. Is there any particular one the hon. member would like to have? It is a rather long list.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister give us the figures for Ontario, with here and there an indication of the corresponding western price, which, I think, is much lower?

Mr. GARDINER: There are two lists for each province, one west and one east. I will give eastern Ontario, taking one date out of each month, to represent the average. These are weekly prices:

	Cents
January	31
February	30
March	30
April	31
May	26
June	27
July	29
August	30
September	31
October	31
November	34
December	36

These figures are all averages, of course. For example, the figures for the four weeks of April were respectively 31, 32, 32 and 29 cents.

Mr. STEVENS: Do I understand that that is the butter fat price per pound to the farmer?

Mr. GARDINER: It is the price at the creamery in Ontario. Two cents would be deducted from that in order to give the price to the farmer.

Mr. WARREN: What are the butter fat prices to the farmer for 1938 to date?

Mr. GARDINER: The prices I have just read are prices to the creamery. The butter fat price to the farmer would be two cents less. For this year the price in January was 37 cents; as a matter of fact it was 37 cents for every one of the five weeks listed.

Mr. BLACKMORE: What province?

Mr. GARDINER: Eastern Ontario, around Belleville. These are the figures:

	1st week	2nd week	3rd week	4th week	5th week
January	37	37	37	37	37
February	37	37	39	39	..
March	39	41	41	43	..
April	43	43	39	32	30
May	31	31	32	31	..
June	29	..	..	..	..

Mr. PERLEY: Can the minister give the figures for Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: The figures for Saskatchewan are:

	1st week	2nd week	3rd week	4th week	5th week
January	26	26	26	27	27
February	28	29	30	31	..
March	31	31	31	31	..
April	31	31	31	30	28
May	24	23	23	23	23
June	22	..	..	..	..

That is in the north, in the Saskatoon area. In the south it is about half a cent higher all the way through.

Mr. STEVENS: In order that the figures may be intelligible to a layman like myself, will the minister tell us what amount of butter is secured from a pound of butter fat?

Mr. GARDINER: About 1·22 pounds.

Mr. FAIR: The price list shows a difference of 9 cents between Saskatchewan and Ontario. Is that correct?

Mr. GARDINER: About 9 cents.

Mr. SENN: I was very much interested in what the hon. member for Kootenay East had to say about the rapid and violent fluctuations in farm prices in the flush months of production and in the other months. No doubt certain interests have taken advantage of facilities afforded them by cold storage warehouses to profit thereby. On the other hand, I believe that the cold storage warehouses have done a great deal of good for agriculture, because in these flush periods of production, particularly as regards perishable products, it would have meant that the farmers very often would have had to take little or nothing for their products if there had not been cold storage facilities available. The minister has said that five million pounds of butter were exported last fall and that this had a good effect on the price in the winter months. He also said that some five million pounds or more of butter were imported this year, particularly in the months of April and May. I understand that butter was imported under special privileges granted by order in council in connection with the amount of duty that had to be paid on butter from New Zealand especially in regard to the exchange adjustments which were made. If I am correctly informed we still had a considerable carry-over of butter in Canada when this was done. It immediately had the effect of lowering the price of butter perhaps five cents a pound or more, and I should like the minister to state upon whose recommendation this order in council was passed allowing butter to come in at a lower rate of duty or at any rate without the exchange arrangements being taken into account, and whether it was assumed that there was going to be an absolute shortage. I doubt that, and it seems to me matters could have been allowed to remain as they were without anyone suffering, and the farmer would have received the benefit; whereas the importation of five million pounds or more of butter created more than the normal surplus and consequently lowered the price immediately.

Mr. GARDINER: No order in council was passed changing the rate of duty on butter from either New Zealand or Australia. There was an order in council that waived the dump as against butter from New Zealand, but that applied only to 25,000 boxes from New Zealand, and some from Australia. The total quantity that would be allowed in was 50,000 boxes, which would be in the neighbourhood of 1,400,000 pounds, which is less than one-third of what came in. As a matter of fact there was no reduction of price as a result of butter coming in. The price went gradually upward from the time that butter started to come in until the full amount was in. The price was 32 cents when butter started to come in and it went up to 41 cents.

Mr. STEVENS: Was that in 56 pound boxes?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. SENN: What time did butter come in?

Mr. GARDINER: From January 14 to April 8.

Mr. SENN: As a matter of fact was not that butter kept in bond until a good deal later in the year? Then, when it was released, the price dropped.

Mr. GARDINER: There has been no perceptible drop. The price has been from three to four cents per pound higher than in previous years all during the season. There has been no perceptible drop except what comes about in May and June regularly, and up to June 1, the drop has not gone as far this year as in some other years. It is not true that the butter was kept in storage; it was supplied to the market during the season. In fact, at one time there was placed before me a picture of a window in Toronto advertising it effectively.

Mr. SENN: I understand that. As a matter of fact when the arrangement was made there were no companies authorized to bring in butter and receive the benefit of the order in council exchange premium, but different companies, I understand, brought in far more butter than the regulations allowed, with the result that the department had to allot the amount of butter which each could bring in under the new arrangement. Is not that correct?

Mr. GARDINER: As a matter of fact, on June 1 there were 215,000 pounds of imported butter in Canada, "put in bond" and 57,000 pounds "in bond." That is a very small proportion of what was actually brought in.

Mr. SENN: I can scarcely understand how the minister can claim that after this butter was brought in the price rose, particularly after the butter was placed on the market. If I have the figures correctly, in March the price in Ontario was 35·75 cents; in April it was 31·72 cents, and in May, 26 cents. That was before the cattle were out on the grass at all, before there was any great increase in the amount of butter that was being produced.

Mr. GARDINER: My statement was that the butter came in from the time the order in council was passed which suspended the application of the dumping duty, which I think was some time in January or early in February. The butter came in up to April 8. While it was being admitted, following the passing of that order in council, the price of butter was gradually going up, right to the end of the winter season. When the summer season came along, of course butter dropped in price.

Mr. SENN: Is it not a fact that until butter is released from bond there is no account of it in the statistical branch? I believe I am correct in saying that a certain amount of butter was never released from bond but was used in quite considerable quantities to provision ships leaving the country from time to time, butter that possibly could have been produced in Canada. A short time ago the minister said there was no order in council allowing for the suspension of the exchange premium or the dumping duty. How can these regulations be changed except by order in council?

Mr. GARDINER: That was the only thing that was done by order in council, and it was simply a matter of stipulating that the dump would not apply up to 25,000 boxes. After that the dump did apply, but as a matter of fact the price of butter in Canada was so much higher than it was anywhere else that the price continued to go up after that and the butter came in anyway, altogether apart from any regulations. The greater part of this butter came in not as a result of any action on the part of the government but because the price here was higher than anywhere else.

Mr. STEVENS: A moment ago the minister said there were 50,000 boxes, each containing 56 pounds, and he then gave a total of 1,400,000 pounds. I think that figure should be corrected; it is 2,800,000 pounds.

Mr. GARDINER: The figure I gave was for 25,000 boxes, which was the amount allowed from each country, but we did not have 25,000 boxes from each. We received 25,000 boxes from New Zealand and 25,000 boxes from Australia. So the total from New Zealand would be 1,400,000 pounds, and in addition there would be an equal amount from Australia. But they went right on importing, even after that amount of 50,000 boxes was made up, because the price was sufficiently high to allow importation even with any dump that might have been put on.

Mr. McGREGOR: Who imported those 50,000 boxes that did not come under the dumping duty?

Mr. GARDINER: The different firms dealing in the product. It was pro-rated among the different companies that buy and sell butter.

Mr. McGREGOR: Has the minister the records?

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. GARDINER: No, I have not the records here. The customs department handled the pro-rating of it, not the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. STEVENS: And they will not give it.

Mr. FAIR: Why is there a difference of nine cents a pound as between Saskatchewan and Ontario?

Mr. GARDINER: There really is not a difference of nine cents a pound on butter. On account of the freight rate there is a difference, which amounts to just about the freight, but much of what was sold in eastern Canada was used as fresh cream, which commands a premium. It was used really as cream, not as butter.

Mr. FAIR: Then in Ontario they can drink cream, while in Saskatchewan they must have skim milk.

Amendment (Mr. Ilsley) agreed to.

Mr. SENN: Would the minister table the order in council having to do with the suspension of the dumping duty on butter coming in?

Mr. GARDINER: Very well.

Item as amended agreed to.

Live stock and poultry—further amount required, $7,040.

Mr. BARBER: There is a matter which I think has been brought to the attention of the minister by the poultrymen of British Columbia, in regard to a little more publicity to aid the marketing of eggs. From information I have received, and which I believe a large number of hon. members have received, the consumption of eggs in Canada to-day is some forty-five carloads a week less than it was seven years ago. The poultrymen of British Columbia, and I believe of Canada generally, are of the opinion that some policy should be pursued similar to that adopted by the Department of Fisheries, some general publicity campaign to encourage the consumption of Canadian eggs. I understand they have suggested that the minister make provision for the expenditure of something in the neighbourhood of $100,000 on such a campaign. It is a very serious matter when we find that the consumption of eggs in Canada has decreased to such an extent, because I believe that decrease is mainly responsible for the low prices of eggs in this country to-day.

Mr. GARDINER: We have a vote similar to the one referred to in the fisheries department. This year it amounts to approximately $200,000. We use that money for advertising farm products generally; for fruit, poultry, eggs, dairy products, in connection with the marketing of our beef and bacon, and so on. So it may be seen that out of this sum it would be impossible to use the $100,000 that it is suggested might be used in connection with eggs. However, a part of it, what we consider to be the proper proportion, will be used for that purpose.

Mr. BARBER: Is that for advertising in the domestic market?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, largely.

Mr. STEVENS: I want to discuss the question of the handling of live stock in the public stockyards. The public stockyards were undoubtedly established for the purpose of providing an impartial and, shall I say, government supervised market to which the producer could send his live stock and be assured of competitive buying. If anything intervenes that destroys the competitive nature of the business at the buying end, obviously the shipper or producer of live stock will suffer. I am convinced, from considerable study that I have given to this matter, that in our live stock markets, particularly Winnipeg and Toronto, which are the two main ones—and I would add Edmonton to a certain extent; as to Montreal I would hesitate to say very much, because I am impressed with the competitive nature of that market—there has grown up over the years an element of control which deprives the farmer of his right as an individual producer to a fair marketing system. One very important factor is the competition of direct trucking to the abattoirs, but I am not going to discuss that question to-day. The effect of it is that the large packing industries are able by direct shipments to maintain such a backlog of supply that they are able temporarily, if they wish, almost to ignore the public market. That is the condition to which that form of competition with the public market has grown. But what I am going to deal with now are the abuses which I believe are prevalent in the market itself.

The public market, or stockyard, is served by commission houses or brokers who handle the stock on a commission basis for the producer, acting as a medium between him and the buyer. The buyers consist in the main of the large packing companies; but in addition there are what are known as the wholesalers who purchase some portion of their supplies from private abattoirs, separate from the packing companies. These wholesalers are a distinctly healthy element in the buyers' market, looking at it from the standpoint of the farmer. They constitute something in the nature of a check on the overwhelming power of the large packing concerns. I have before me a very definite case which the minister will recall I brought to his attention. I wish to present this case to the committee as an illustration of what goes on. It will be noted as I read the correspondence that the minister on the advice of his officials is under the impression that the practices with which I shall deal are not prevalent on the market. This is the issue I take with the Department of Agriculture. It is extremely difficult to discuss a matter of this kind without appearing to be critical of the minister. I shall certainly be critical of him as far as it is deserved, but that is not my point. My point is that here is a grievance, of which this case that I shall cite is only a type. It exists; it is prevalent; I know it is prevalent: all I am asking is that the matter shall be grappled with and the practices stopped.

On March 11 last I brought to the attention of the minister a case where some 800 lambs were brought to the Toronto market. They were offered for sale, and the Toronto municipal abattoir, a responsible organization, bid on 200 of these lambs. The representative of Canada Packers, Limited, indicated to the commission house that if they sold a part of this lot to anyone else he, the buyer for Canada Packers, would not bid for or take the balance. And when it is understood, as it must be to understand this question at all, that Canada Packers exercise an overwhelming influence on our markets, particularly the stockyards, by virtue of the large quantities that they buy, it will be clear that any commission man who goes in the face of or does anything contrary to the desires of Canada Packers is subject to be blacklisted and driven out of business, as some of them have been driven out of business by that organization. In this instance the Canada Packers buyer declared that he would not buy the balance if the commission house dared to sell the 200 lambs to the Toronto municipal abattoir. The commission man told the municipal abattoir that he was sorry, and turned the lot over to Canada Packers. The municipal abattoir was short of lambs for its trade. That abattoir supplies the wholesalers. Fortunately, by scurrying around, he managed to get part of his supply. But the day after,—the letter will show this—the sales agent of Canada Packers rang him up and offered to sell him carcases. The point is this: Canada Packers did not require for their own requirements the 800 lambs; they could easily have spared the 200; but they said, No, all or none. The point is that when they offered to sell to the municipal abattoir a supply of carcases they quoted a price half a cent a pound above what Canada Packers were selling at to the retailer, which it can easily be understood would put the abattoir in an impossible position.

I communicated this information to the minister on March 11, and on March 15 I got an acknowledgment from his secretary. On March 29 I got an acknowledgment from the minister saying:

I am placing your representations before the deputy minister and asking him to make full inquiries into the particulars and report to me.

But it was not until April 26 that I got any definite reply to my letter of March 11. On April 26 the minister wrote:

On my return to the office I have your letter of April 1, which refers to the previous letter received from you under date of March 11.

With regard to my advice to you in my letter of March 29, consideration has been given to your representations with respect to relations between the officers of this department and Canada Packers Ltd., and also certain practices by Canada Packers in the purchase of live stock. Officers of the department state emphatically that Canada Packers have not, and do not, in any way unduly influence them in either the formulation or administration of department policies. They point out that representations from this firm, as from all other packers, which have to do with the regulations and policies of the department as they affect the packing industry as a whole are presented through the industrial and development council of Canadian meat packers.

By the way, that company is presided over, I believe, by Mr. Charles Todd, who is really the mouthpiece of the head of Canada Packers. The letter continues:

With respect to politics and regulations affecting bacon hogs and bacon, which have been an important feature in the relations of the department with packing companies, it is contended that the record of these relations clearly shows that there has been no discrimination as between Canada Packers and other packing companies and that, when necessary, steps and action have been taken to compel Canada Packers to comply with the requirements. In all this work cooperation as between the packers and the department has played an important part in the development of it and it is believed that without this the progress which has been made could not have been realized.

With regard to the cases of lamb purchases by Canada Packers which you refer to, since the identity of only one party to the transactions has been given it has not been possible for the department to trace the first of the two alleged malpractices. We should be glad, therefore, if the date and the name of the party involved in the first transaction mentioned in your letter of May 11th could be furnished.

In the case of the second transaction, which you report as follows:

"On another day there were four car loads of western lambs on the market, and again Canada Packers declared they must have all or none. There was another packer willing to take one car load at $9.35 per hundred pounds, but Canada Packers persisted in taking the lot and got it at $9.25. This seemed a small difference, but you of course appreciate that every fraction of a cent on a pound makes a difference to the farmer. I respectfully request that this and other practices on the union stock yards perpetrated by Canada Packers be investigated and stopped."

I had no knowledge of the transaction until I read your letter and of course have no desire to take sides in what appears to be a matter of controversy within the trade. I have had the complaint checked. The report is that what actually occurred was as follows. On March 7th, Dunn and Levack sold 800 western lambs to Canada Packers at $9.25. On March 8th, the same commission firm had a further 800 head to offer and shortly after the opening of the market Canada Packers' buyer bid on them and secured the lot at $9.25. Somewhat later in the day, Swift and Company's buyer made it known that he would like to have 200 head, and he offered $9.35. As the lambs were already sold, the commission firm could not sell them again unless Canada Packers were willing to give up part of their purchase, which, we understand, they were not willing to do. Local deliveries of lambs were light, and, not having secured any of the western lambs, Swift's apparently were short and they therefore contracted for the next shipment which amounted to 400 head and for which they had to pay $9.50. Thus although the commission merchant did not secure the 10 cent advance for his client, on the 200 lambs which were already sold, they were able to secure a 25 cent advance on the 400 head. If this story is the complete report then, following the same line of reasoning as your informant, the complete transaction resulted in a 15 cent raise in the market.

With respect to this transaction it is pointed out that while at one time it was a fairly common practice for one packer to purchase the entire lamb offering and subsequently divide it with other packers, this practice was considered inimical to the best interests of producers and, because of the strong objection taken to it, it was discontinued.

Yours very truly,

James G. Gardiner.

It will be noted that this letter makes reference to the fact that I did not disclose the name of the person. Well, I did not have the authority to do so at the time, but I did secure it and I then furnished the minister with the original letter from the municipal abattoir, which I shall now read. This is dated March 9, 1938, and is addressed to me:

Having knowledge of your attitude toward mass buying and unethical business practices, we beg to take this opportunity of drawing your attention to the "cut-throat" tactics adopted by the Canada Packers Limited on the Union stockyards this week in regard to the purchase of live lambs.

On Monday of this week there were 800 western lambs for sale by the commission firm of Dunn and Levack.

One buyer was instructed to purchase 200 lambs (one car load).

The commission people were perfectly willing to sell us 200 lambs "out" of the 800 lot, but they were told by the Canada Packers' buyer (Mr. R. McDonald) that of the 800 lot were broken they would not take the balance. Mr. McDonald was instructed by head office that it was a case of "all or nothing."

The commission house had no other alternative but to sell the entire 800 lambs to Canada Packers Limited.

This, of course, left us without a lamb in our coolers and to add insult to injury a Canada Packers' salesman called us by telephone Tuesday morning asking if we wished to buy dressed lambs, saying that he was advised that we were without lambs. The price which he asked us for dressed lambs was a half cent per pound more than Canada Packers' price to the retail trade.

Fortunately, we were able to contact a feeder in the country who came to our help. We were able to purchase approximately half of our requirements from this feeder and will be forced to accept only half of our regular lamb trade, which as you can readily see, will seriously affect our dressed beef and veal trade.

This vicious practice has happened on five different occasions since the beginning of the year.

Until this week we have been successful in obtaining our full requirements of lambs either by bringing car loads in from Lacombe, Alberta and Lethbridge, Alberta, or purchasing small amounts from Ontario feeders, who, incidentally would rather sell to a small wholesaler than to the big packers.

These feed lot lambs, however, are rapidly diminishing and before long we shall be forced to go on the union stock yards to purchase our entire requirements. What then shall we do if the Canada Packers persist in this unethical practice?

In fairness to the Swift Canadian Company we would point out that these people are the essence of fairness.

On several occasions when we have run short of lambs, Swift's have sold us lambs which they already had bought and charged us market price.

We have absolutely no quarrel with the Swift Canadian Company.

This organization (Swift's) were subjected to the same treatment on Tuesday at the hands of Canada Packers Limited as we, on Monday.

Swift's at present are feeding a number of lambs behind their West Toronto plant, and are, therefore, not a big factor on the stock yards at present.

On Tuesday, however, they (Swift's) required 200 lambs to round out their requirements.

There were four car loads of western lambs in the market Tuesday and once again the Canada Packers openly declared that they must have all the lambs or none.

Another very serious angle of this Swift incident is that Swift's were willing to pay $9.35 per 100 pounds for lambs; the entire four car loads were sold to Canada Packers at $9.25 per 100 pounds.

We understand that Swift's are taking this up with the authorities at Ottawa, and are also advising the owner that they had bid $9.35 per 100 pounds for his lambs.

The Canada Packers Limited know full well, that on an even price basis, the small wholesaler, in most cases will be given the business, but as their method of doing business is "defeat your opponent by fair means or foul" the small wholesaler is placed at a serious disadvantage.

We do not ask for special privileges (we don't need them) but we do demand and expect British fair play.

We feel sure in placing this matter before you, that corrective measures will immediately be taken.

Yours sincerely,
Alexander Mackenzie, Limited.

The point which is made in the minister's letter and which I desire to emphasize is that Swift's offered to pay $9.35, whereas the whole lot was sold for $9.25. If the market were a free market, the fact that Swift's bid $9.35 for 200 would have had a tendency to raise the price to the $9.35 price level. But Canada Packers came along and said that they would not buy any if the lot were broken up.

The same thing is done right along with hogs. A double-decked car of hogs, containing possibly 150 animals, will come on the market. In that carload will be selects, bacons, heavies, butchers, lights and possibly some stags, boars and so forth. But those are the five principal types that will be found. Here you have a carload, mixed. Canada Packers come along and say this: If you want to sell your hogs, we will take them all. But these wholesalers want the butcher type. They are willing to buy the butcher hogs in that lot. Montreal market is an excellent market for heavy hogs. Montreal will take the heavy hogs if they can get them. But Canada Packers say: Nothing doing—give us the whole carload or nothing. That is done right along.

Now let me give you the effect of that from the price standpoint. Under the regulations the price is fixed by the bacon grade. We will say the bacon grade is nine. The exact differential is not in my mind at the moment, but the minister will correct me if I am wrong. The bacon grade, we will say, is nine. The premium is one dollar a hog for selects. The penalty for butchers, the next grade, is one dollar a hog, I think, and then the penalty for lights and for heavies is another dollar, and another dollar, or it may be $1.50 below the bacon price. But the wholesaler wants the butcher type. He prefers the butcher type to the bacon hog or the select. It suits his business. He would be willing to pay the bacon price or possibly the select price in order to get the butcher type, but he cannot get it. If he competes with Canada Packers he must take the whole carload. The commission man is not allowed to divide them.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not want to interrupt, but I assume my hon. friend is aware that what he is suggesting was tried out at Montreal three years ago, and that the very men he is now saying wish to have that done expressed the desire to change back to the old method. In other words, they said they did not desire to carry on in the way my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. STEVENS: But the reason for that is this: It is not done in Toronto or Winnipeg, and those are the markets that control live stock in Canada. Toronto is the market that controls live stock in Canada, and the practices in Toronto—why, Mr. Chairman!—I digress but I will come back in a moment—if a farmer in northern Saskatchewan, yes or in the dried-out area of British Columbia at Prince George, or in the back districts of Ontario, brings in two or three head of cattle to the local market he is paid what the Toronto price is at ten o'clock in the morning. He has no bargaining power. He must take that price or take his cattle home. The significance of this thing is not appreciated, it seems to me, and yet it is fatal, in my opinion, to the whole live stock market of Canada.

I come back to the hog. Montreal will buy heavies. In Toronto there is a good market for the butcher type. These wholesalers would buy the butcher type. The same thing applies in the outlying districts. But by this stranglehold which Canada Packers have over the commission houses whom they will blacklist if they do not dance to their piping, these practices go on; they are going on to-day, and have gone on right along. The thing should be stopped, Mr. Chairman, and I say this to the minister in all due deference. I know it is not nice to get into difficulties with these large packing concerns, but I say there is a principle upon which these things can be done, and it is the duty of government to see that these principles are applied.

I hesitate to go into the story of the marketing of hogs, but I intended to do it and perhaps I might as well do it now. I have said it before and I want to emphasize it because until this situation is corrected the farmers of this country, the five millions of people living on Canadian farms, are not going to get a square deal. They are not getting it to-day, and they will not get it until these things are corrected.

It may be said that the matter of the price of hogs is not going to ruin the farming industry of Canada. But in the last ten years the live stock sales in this country have been almost equal, I venture to say to the grain sales. They are at least one of the biggest factors in the life of the farmer, and if the farmer cannot get a fair price for his cattle and his hogs he is simply heading for bankruptcy, as farmers have been doing by the tens of thousands.

What is the method of fixing the price of the Canadian hog to-day? I have told this story before. There is a committee in England consisting of the English buyers—not Canadian representatives in England, but British buyers for British firms that are purchasing our goods. That committee sits once a week, I think on Wednesday, and announces the price which goes into effect on Thursday for the following week. That price of Canadian bacon on the British market is telegraphed back here to Canada Packers—I say Canada Packers advisedly because they get the whole business—and Canada Packers fix the price of hogs in Canada on the basis of the price of bacon in England. Now in the first place I challenge the soundness, shall I say, of that method of fixing the price, for this reason. In the last ten years we have not exported more than ten per cent of our hogs. In the last year the export has gone up to eighteen per cent, or some such figure, but in the last decade we have not exported more than ten per cent of our hogs. Now, the price of bacon fixes the price not only of that ten per cent but of the other ninety per cent for the whole of Canada. It may be argued that that is a fair barometer, but if that philosophy is sound, then let me put this: The Canadian farmer ought to be getting as high a price for his hogs in relation to the price of Canadian bacon on the British market as the Danish farmer or the Dutch farmer or the Irish farmer gets for his hogs in relation to the price of Danish, Dutch or Irish bacon on the British market. The question is, does he do so? Here are the facts, and it took me about two years to get them. I have not the schedules under my hand, but I have the facts very clearly in my mind.

The price of Dutch bacon runs somewhere near our own, with Irish and Danish bacon considerably higher, particularly Danish, from eight shillings often to fourteen shillings, a hundred. What I did find in my study was, that the differential, and mark you, it is argued in London that that is the proper basis on which to determine the price in Canada; let us accept that position—I did find that the spread as against Canadian bacon was double that as against Dutch, Danish or Irish. In other words, the packer in Canada was getting double the price—what is the term the economists use? It has slipped me for the moment—the Canadian packer was getting double the spread on the price of hogs in relation to Canadian bacon on the British market that his competitors did. That is a fact that challenges both the method of marketing and the philosophy and the fairness of Canada Packers and other packers in relation to the price on the British market.

There is another thing. We have as a matter of fact, over the years, persisted in sending into the British market a grade of bacon lower than we are competent to send. That is, they mix into their export business lights, heavies and butchers, which are not the best type of bacon hog, instead of limiting their exports to the bacon hog or the selects. It is sometimes said by people who are somewhat careless that we cannot get enough selects or bacon hogs to supply the export trade. That is absolutely false. I have the facts. I do not know whether I can put my fingers on them readily, but I can say from memory, that last year there came on our markets many times the number of select and bacon hogs which would have taken care of the total export trade of Canada.

Mr. GARDINER: Is it many times the possible export trade?

Mr. STEVENS: Yes. I would say more than double. I am safe in saying more than double our quota, which we have not yet filled. It may be said, "Well, we are not going to denude the Canadian market." There is no need to denude the Canadian market, but one thing is certain. If you accept the philosophy that the price of bacon on the British market fixes the price of hogs in Canada, the only thing to do is to ship the best bacon you can to England and get the best price you can for it. Can we do that? Yes. Dumart and Schneider and the Owen Sound plant did it, and actually got a premium over Danish bacon. On one occasion they got one shilling and two shillings over Danish bacon. On the British market we can compete with Danish bacon, probably with not all our export but with a substantial portion of it, with a grade which would get the Danish price, and if we got the Danish price, which is eight shillings to fourteen shillings above the Canadian price, and if the price of Canadian hogs is based on the price on the British market, you can see what the farmer has lost. I made a calculation over a five year period, and I figured that the Canadian farmer had lost, because of this method of handling his business, $36,000,000 which he might have had in enhanced price had this practice not been in vogue.

Mr. GARDINER: I do not want to take the time to reply to all that has been said, but there are some things that might be answered. My information is that all the bacon of the select and bacon types which is available at plants for export is exported, and that is the complete export.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, I have the figures. They are all in the government statistics. I have winnowed them out, but whether I can lay my hands on them at the moment I am not sure.

Mr. GARDINER: The reason for the extra amount of lower grades is the fact that the higher grades are not available.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not the case. If I had the time I could find the facts. I submit that there was more than twice as much bacon and select hogs on the market last year than was necessary for the processing of the bacon that was exported.

Mr. GARDINER: Just to get the full information, there may be double the number necessary to supply the trade; but when you make provision for bruises; for those that are softs; for those that are culled out for different reasons, and for those which do not go to plants that export bacon—when you make provision for all that, all that is left goes to the export market.

Mr. STEVENS: With all due deference to the minister, who may have been told that by the Canada Packers, I am going to say frankly to my hon. friend—

Mr. GARDINER: I have not been in correspondence with Canada Packers at all. I got that from officials of the department.

Mr. STEVENS: Well, they got it from Canada Packers. I do not accept it at all, and I have given a lot of study to the question. It so happens that I cannot put my fingers on the exact tables, but I checked the tables very carefully. I know that McLean argues right along that there are not enough selects; he sends out advices to the farmers—I have copies in my office—of what they should do, and all the time he has double and three times the select and bacon hogs that are necessary for him. There is no doubt about it that he is kidding the farmers of this country, making monkeys of them, and I say further that he is making monkeys of the officers of the agriculture live stock branch and has been doing so for ten or fifteen years. I have not any hesitancy in saying that. The other day I went over the file. It was prolific.

As a matter of fact, when I asked for the letters, the Agriculture department told me there were seventy files; they brought me along a large sample, and there was hardly a day when there were not letters on every little detail going down to Canada Packers; that is, to Charlie Todd. Do not differentiate between Charlie Todd and the Canada Packers. He is nominal head of the packers' association. He is in reality the mouthpiece of Stanley McLean, and the worst enemy the Canadian farmer has. I say that without any hesitancy: it is just about time that this parliament put its foot down on these practices.

Mr. GARDINER: I think we should get the records right. I have not any brief for Canada Packers or for any other packing concern, but the packing concerns of this country have an organization which they set up, and of which Mr. Todd happens to be secretary.

Mr. STEVENS: I know all about it.

Mr. GARDINER: Because Mr. Todd happens to be an employee of Canada Packers does not remove the fact—

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think he is.

Mr. GARDINER: —that he is acting as an employee not of theirs, but of the council.

Mr. STEVENS: I know all about it.

Mr. GARDINER: The fact that he happens to be an official is the only reason why all the correspondence goes to him. To say he is the mouthpiece of some particular packing concern is scarcely correct.

Mr. STEVENS: I know all about it. I sat in with Mr. Todd on the committee. I pay this tribute to the packing industry of Canada other than Canada Packers, that on the whole I think they are trying to do their business fairly and right. When I was minister I sat in at Toronto with this so-called council—Norman McLean, the brother of Stanley McLean, was there representing Canada Packers, and Charlie Todd is the nominal head—and discussed business with them. Well, nobody had anything to say or could have anything to say except Norman McLean, representing Canada Packers. They all know it. They are helpless. There is not a packer in Canada who, if he did not fear the weight of the hand of Canada Packers, would not endorse every word I have said this afternoon. And I have had some interesting letters from them, not very long ago either.

This man Todd, as I say, is the nominal head of the packers' council. He is nothing more or less than the lickspittle of Stanley McLean, and has been for years. When I was Minister of Trade and Commerce I had a meeting with the Agriculture department right here in Ottawa.

Mr. GARDINER: Why did the hon. member not deal with him then?

Mr. STEVENS: I will show you why, and I will show you why I said a moment ago that the officers of the live stock branch of the Agriculture department are under the thumb of Canada Packers. I called a meeting between myself and the Minister of Agriculture of the day and his officers. He brought in some of his staff. I had at the meeting the head of the commercial intelligence branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce. It was an interdepartmental conference on the question of marketing hogs or bacon in Great Britain. That was the purpose of the meeting. Whom did the agriculture officials bring with them? Mr. Charlie Todd and Mr. Sales Manager of Canada Packers, whose name I have forgotten. They sat in. They were not invited; but they were there, brought there by the officials of the live stock branch of the agriculture department.

Mr. GARDINER: While the hon. member was a minister of the government.

Mr. STEVENS: While I was a minister. The Agriculture officers, as far as I recall, did not open their mouths. They turned to Mr. Todd and Mr. Sales Manager whose name I have forgotten. They were the men who told the story. And what did they tell us? What was their position? Our position as the government marketing agency of the dominion in regard to marketing was that we should raise the standard of our bacon on the British market in order to raise the price of hogs. That was our general stand, and we drew attention to and gave data of inferior bacon which had been going over there. Todd and this other man representing Canada Packers argued that they definitely and deliberately included second grade hogs in the bacon trade of Great Britain, because they found there was some market there for it, and because in my opinion—I add my own—it kept down the price of hogs in Canada. There was no other motive than that, to keep the price of hogs down in Canada for the ninety per cent that is consumed here. If for ten per cent you can keep down the price by using inferior hogs, as they do—I have the sworn evidence as to what goes into the export business—if you can keep down the price on ten per cent, by putting inferior hogs into the making of bacon for that market, you keep down the price on the ninety per cent.

I make this further statement. If Canada Packers put out the bacon they could put out on the standard of Dumart's or Schneider's or some of the other small packers, and raised the price of standard bacon in England, they would have to find another million dollars of working capital, and that is another reason why they do not want to raise the price here. If the price goes up, the amount of working capital will have to be increased, and so the price of hogs is kept down. I can find no other reason for it, no other justification for the course that is persistently pursued. There cannot be any other reason.

I do not want to delay the committee unduly, but I make this statement in regard to this practice that I have disclosed with respect to these lambs: It is one indication of dozens of cases of which I know. These people disclose their name and everything about the matter; and if the practice in question, namely, of Canada Packers going on the live stock markets of Canada and telling the commission houses that they must sell all or none, is allowed to continue, then every day we allow it to continue the farmers of Canada are defrauded of those fairer returns which they are entitled to receive for their products. If one had time, one could go into the sale of cattle, one could discuss the trucking business and show how Canada Packers will provide facilities for the truckers, fill their gasoline tanks so that they may be able to bring farmers' produce to them. Trucks will go fifty or a hundred miles away from the centre of operations, get the farmers' cattle, and take them—where? Right to Canada Packers' plant. They do not go on the live stock market at all. The live stock markets of Canada at Winnipeg and Toronto particularly are a joke and a by-word, though they were established for the purpose of maintaining an element of free competition for the farmers' products, where the farmer could take his hogs and his cattle and expect to get the advantage of competitive buying and selling. But that element of competition is not there because of the overwhelming and pernicious influence of Canada Packers.

Mr. GARDINER: Of course, even if I had the time I would not take the trouble to try to defend Canada Packers or any other packing concern, but in the minute or two that is left before six o'clock I wish to make this statement. I do not regard the letter which was written to the hon. member for Kootenay East as typical of a condition that exists in connection with the marketing of live stock in Canada whether at Toronto or Winnipeg or elsewhere. If the person who wrote the letter had intended to have the matter investigated at the earliest possible date and in the natural way in which anyone expects to have a matter of that kind investigated, he would naturally have written to the Department of Agriculture. But he apparently wanted a speech of the type we have heard this afternoon with regard to it.

Mr. STEVENS: I rise to a point of order. The minister is not stating the case as it is disclosed in the correspondence, or as it was disclosed in the correspondence from myself to him, to which attention was directed on March 11.

Mr. GARDINER: The hon. member himself directed it to the department, and he did the proper thing in directing it there. But the person who wrote the letter in the first place could just as well have written it to the department and had the matter investigated directly. Of course, there is a reason which is made apparent in the correspondence itself. This man had been in the habit of buying all his lambs from drovers and others here and there outside the yards altogether; when he was short on a certain day he went and asked for a certain number from someone else who had purchased them in the yards, and all he is complaining about is the fact that this particular packing concern did not see fit to give him the 200 lambs which he required at a certain time at a certain price. One may be able to criticize Canada Packers or any other packing concern for not being as courteous to someone else in the trade as they might have been, but I do not see that you can go very much further in criticism in connection with that particular matter. In other words, I do not think it is a typical case upon which to base the kind of criticism to which we have just listened. There may be all sorts of reasons for that type of criticism; but from investigations I made myself in England, and from the investigation the committee which was over there last summer made, and which one of my hon. friends commented upon highly—it dealt with the same thing—an entirely different reason is given for the lower price of bacon in Great Britain. We must, of course, take the information we obtain from those whom we pay to get information for us, until such time as that information is proven wrong.

Mr. STEVENS: The minister is not referring to the report—

Mr. GARDINER: I am referring to the report of the committee that went over last year. That report is just as authentic, and the information received is as reliable, as that received even by the price spreads committee. This information was gathered at the source.

Mr. STEVENS: The report was a travesty.

Mr. GARDINER: It was, of course, critical of some people; it was critical of some activities in the past. But because it was critical it does not follow that it was a travesty. After all, the bacon industry is one that has been very carefully investigated, very carefully checked by the department, and while we are not satisfied with all the actions of the packing concerns, I do not think anyone can base the type of criticism to which we have listened this afternoon merely upon the assumption that some price is set over in Britain for some particular reason.

The CHAIRMAN: It is six o'clock.

Mr. STEVENS: I happen to have the prices of bacon, which I shall give later.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock the house adjourned without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Thursday, June 16, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

VALIDITY OF ALBERTA STATUTES

TABLING OF ORDERS IN COUNCIL WITH RESPECT TO QUESTION OF DISALLOWANCE

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I beg to lay on the table copies of order in council P.C. 1367 approving the report of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) to His Excellency the Governor General in Council respecting certain measures enacted by the legislature of Alberta; and of order in council P.C. 1368 disallowing an act of the Alberta legislature for the security of home owners and an act to impose a tax on certain securities in the year 1938.

I had hoped if possible to table these orders in council before the house adjourned yesterday, but as the signature of His Excellency the Governor General had not been affixed until a minute or two after six o'clock, it was not possible to do so.

[Mr. Stevens.]

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REPORTED TRANSFERENCE OF WHEEL SHOPS FROM TORONTO TO LONDON, ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. G. CLARKE (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) in connection with a question I directed to him about ten days ago with respect to the transfer of wheel shops from Toronto to London. I have in my hand a letter from the secretary of the International Association of Machinists, stating distinctly that he understands there are twelve cars of defective wheels, four cars of new wheel blanks and three cars of axles rebilled to London from Toronto. Would the minister give me information in reference to the matter, because it is indicated that the work was being taken from Toronto and sent to London?

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I referred the questions asked in the house to the management, and was advised by them there was no work being transferred from Toronto to any other place. It is simply a case of an oversupply of products in the Toronto shops, and the work is suspended until the oversupply is used.

VALIDITY OF ALBERTA STATUTES

INQUIRY AS TO ACTION OF FEDERAL GOVERNMENT WITH RESPECT TO QUESTION OF DISALLOWANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. H. MITCHELL (Medicine Hat): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the tabling of certain reports confirming disallowance of legislation of the province of Alberta, I should like to ask the following question of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King). Are we to understand that sixteen men comprising this government have taken upon themselves—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member should state his question.

Mr. MITCHELL: It is a question, Mr. Speaker. Have these men taken upon themselves the responsibility of imposing their will and judgment upon the democratic province of Alberta composed of many thousands of people?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): If that is a question, it is not a proper question to ask in this house.

THE BUDGET

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved:

That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the year which it now falls to my lot to review has been an eventful, indeed a dramatic, one. In the budget speech of last year I stressed the extent to which continued economic progress for Canada as for other countries depended upon the preservation of peace and the lessening of international friction. But in February, 1937, there were few who were bold enough to predict the sudden and, in some countries, drastic reversal of world economic trends which began last autumn, and fewer still, at that time, who could possibly foresee the astounding series of crises and near-crises in international political relations which the ensuing twelve months were to bring. Yet these things have come to pass. A new major war has embroiled the Asiatic continent and in Europe we have had a succession of incidents which at times have strained the fabric of peace almost to the breaking point. In the last four months of 1937, our nearest neighbour experienced a decline in business activity more drastic than that which followed the collapse of 1929. World production, trade and prices have also declined but less rapidly than in the United States.

Functioning under the shadow of these disturbing world events, the Canadian economy, nevertheless, has given a good account of itself. The recovery movement which had been under way for some time continued with surprising vigour almost to the end of 1937. The physical volume of business which is our most comprehensive measure of current economic activity expanded by 4 per cent from March to August and by nearly 4 per cent additional between August and November. In December a moderate decline set in and by April, the index of the physical volume of business in Canada was about 9 per cent below that for April, 1937. The low point, however, was reached in February and since that time the Canadian index has risen by 5·3 per cent. In the United Kingdom, the index of business activity compiled by the London Economist rose slightly over 2 per cent from March to August, 1937, and began falling in November to a point in April 6 per cent below the level of April, 1937. In the United States, industrial production fell slightly from March to August, 1937, then dropped sharply by 25 per cent between August and November, and by April of this year was 35 per cent below the level of April, 1937. In neither of these two countries which constitute the most important markets for Canadian products has there been in recent months any tendency to that reversal of the downward trend of the business curve which has been evident in Canada since February. World industrial production which apparently reached a peak in the first quarter of 1937, and maintained a fairly horizontal trend until August, has been declining for the last eight or nine months, the New York Annalist's world index for March, 1938, being 17 per cent below the level of March, 1937. According to the League of Nations, the physical quantum of world trade was 12 per cent less in the first quarter of 1938 than in the last quarter of 1937, and in most of the leading countries the level of wholesale prices has fallen 5 to 10 per cent from the high point reached in 1937.

The lag between the downward trend in Canada and that in other important countries is all the more remarkable when we recall that as early as last June or July it became apparent that drought conditions on the western prairies were to produce a wheat crop failure of a magnitude which a few years ago would have rendered our then less diversified economy almost prostrate. Last year Canada harvested only 182,000,000 bushels of wheat, barely 50 per cent of the average of the previous ten years, and the smallest crop since 1914. In 1914 we produced 90 per cent of last year's total from an acreage which was only about 40 per cent of the acreage seeded last year. The havoc wrought by this plague of drought reached its extreme in Saskatchewan where only 37,000,000 bushels were harvested from an acreage of almost the same size which in 1928 had produced a crop of 321,000,000 bushels.

I need not discuss the effect of this disaster on the purchasing power of western Canada—it is self evident—but I shall have occasion later to indicate what it meant to governmental expenditures. Fortunately, agricultural conditions in other parts of Canada and in respect to other farm products were more favourable and preliminary estimates show a net value of all agricultural production aggregating $681,000,000 in 1937, only $9,000,000 less than in 1936 and higher than in any other year since 1930. I recognize, Mr. Speaker, that he who ventures to make a crop forecast in the middle of June must take his courage in his hands, but I think we can safely say this much—that by and large in the wheat-growing area crop conditions at this stage are better than at any time since 1932, that in the southern drought triangle the improvement in moisture conditions has been substantial although current rains are needed in certain other areas, that the increased planting of Thatcher wheat gives a more effective insurance against rust than we have ever had before, and that the adequate preparations being made by the prairie provinces to deal with the somewhat less intense but perhaps more widespread infestation of grasshoppers should assure that losses on this account will be minimized. In other words, although we are only at the beginning of the critical period for the wheat crop, we may agree that there appears to be a sounder basis, than at any time in the last ten years, for that buoyant optimism which is again evident on the western prairies. Even with a lower world level of wheat prices, a good wheat crop would in my opinion do more than any other single factor to revitalize our whole economic life, to establish confidence and to restore a more normal balance between east and west.

It was inevitable that a wheat crop failure to the extent of our 1937 experience would exercise a depressing influence on Canadian business. Apart altogether from the effect of external factors reduced purchases by the farming community of consumable goods and of farm implements, reduced volume of freight traffic on our railroads, the reduced volume of wheat and flour for export and the unfavourable reaction on business psychology would in any case have caused some slowing up in our rate of progress. But the timing and nature of the slowing up of business in this country indicate that external factors were of predominant importance. Certainly it would be difficult to discover any evidence of lack of balance or other unsoundness in our internal situation which in itself would have caused a set-back. In spite of a prolonged, consistent and indeed a rapid recovery, Canadian industry and trade had expanded and developed on a rational, well-balanced basis, the tendency for speculative activity to get out of hand had been curbed at an early stage, the normal equilibrium between various prices and items of cost was being gradually restored, and there was no evidence of any undue piling up of excess inventories, except perhaps in the newsprint industry which again is so dependent upon foreign markets. A critical examination of all the major factors leads me to the firm conviction that, had it not been for economic depression and political tension abroad, Canadian business would have continued its upward trend with only a moderate slackening in its rate of advance.

[Mr. Dunning.]

TRADE OF CANADA

The influence of these external factors may best be seen in the statistics of our foreign trade, particularly of our exports. Export trade is the chief medium through which changes in economic conditions in other countries affect the Canadian economy. Up to August last business conditions throughout most of the world had been improving and the world price level had been rising. These favourable external conditions, coupled with the efforts which this government had made to widen export markets for Canadian products, had resulted in a steady expansion of our exports which had been the principal factor generating a steady increase in the national income of this country during the last few years. This expansion was particularly rapid during 1936 and the first nine months of 1937. Since that time, however, the business depression in the United States, the more moderate recession in the United Kingdom and several other countries, the pronounced fall in the world prices of many raw materials and the small Canadian wheat crop, have had their inevitable effect, a smaller total value of Canadian commodity exports each month than in the corresponding month of the preceding year. There have, however, been certain counteracting factors and the surprising thing is that the decreases in the latter part of the fiscal year were not sufficient to offset the gains made in the early months of the year. Thus for the 12-month period ending March 31, 1938, our aggregate external trade was within $54,000,000 of the two billion dollar figure and was $154,684,000 or 8·6 per cent above the total for the preceding fiscal year. Our total export trade aggregated $1,148,000,000 or $27,000,000 in excess of that for the year 1936-37. While our imports have been declining since January, they registered an increase for the full fiscal year of $127,000,000 to a total of $799,000,000.

In the figures given for our total export trade I have included all exports of gold, including $22,000,000 of gold which has been sold and paid for by foreign purchasers, although the gold is still physically held earmarked in the vaults of the Bank of Canada. I have also included shipments of gold coins which are classified as monetary gold in our trade returns but which in reality are commercial gold, having been shipped in substitution for a corresponding amount of gold bullion newly produced by our gold mines.

I now desire to place on Hansard a table showing the comparative figures for imports, exports and total trade during each of the last two fiscal years:

TRADE OF CANADA

An understanding of the course of our foreign trade during the past year and of its effect on the Canadian economy, however, must involve an analysis of the changing composition of our export trade as well as of changes occurring throughout the year in the direction of that trade. For instance, if we are to make a fair comparison of our exports during the last two years to particular countries, it is necessary to exclude gold movements, changes in the direction of which are not primarily related to trade considerations. For this reason, in the tables which I now present showing comparative figures for the last two years of the trade of Canada with the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries, and with the United States, the figures given do not include gold of any kind but relate solely to other merchandise transactions:

	Mar. 31, 1937	Mar. 31, 1938
Imports from the United States	393,720,662	487,328,980	+ 93,608,318
Total trade with the United States	758,075,652	830,579,649	+ 72,503,997

From these tables it will be noted that the United Kingdom purchased from us during the last fiscal year goods to the value of $407,798,000. This is slightly in excess of 41 per cent of our total exports of merchandise, excluding gold. Exports to other commonwealth countries showed an appreciable improvement, the increase being 23 per cent, and the total volume $108,700,000. Commonwealth countries as a whole, including the United Kingdom, took approximately 52 per cent of our total merchandise exports. Imports from all commonwealth countries increased during the past fiscal year by over 17 per cent, accounting for about 29 per cent of our total purchases from abroad. From the United Kingdom alone our purchases were $15,000,000 greater than in the previous year and amounted to $145,000,000. With the United States our total merchandise trade, again excluding gold movements, amounted to $830,600,000, as compared with $758,100,000 for the preceding fiscal year. Total exports to that country fell six per cent below the figure for the previous year to a total of $343,300,000, while imports at $487,300,000 showed an increase of nearly 24 per cent.

It is significant of the influence of business depression in the United States that during the first quarter of 1938, our exports to that country were only $61,600,000. This is a decrease of 31 per cent from the first quarter of 1937 as compared with only a 6 per cent reduction for the year as a whole. Imports from the United States for the same three-month period totalled $106,400,000, a decrease of about 3 per cent. During April, exports to the United States decreased by 21 per cent and imports from the United States by 14 per cent. An analysis of a few individual items will show more clearly the adverse effect of restricted United States demand on important Canadian industries. Thus, during the first four months of this year, exports of newsprint to the United States fell by 25 per cent, of wood pulp by 41 per cent, of planks and boards by 35 per cent, of nickel by 58 per cent, of live stock by 64 per cent, of hides by 77 per cent and of furs by 44 per cent. The comparison in each case is with the first four months of 1937.

Fortunately, economic conditions in other markets were not so depressed and important increases in exports to other markets of various types of products tended to offset these substantial declines in shipments to the United States. Thus, for instance, during the first four months of 1938, Canadian exports to the United Kingdom increased by 4 per cent as compared with the same period in 1937, while our exports to Australia and New Zealand increased by 35 per cent and to all empire countries by over 5 per cent. Similarly, if we take the exports of non-ferrous metals, other than gold, we find that during the first four months of 1938 total shipments to all countries were over 12 per cent in excess of those for the same period in the preceding year. Moreover, examination of exports of individual commodities to the British market for the last fiscal year as a whole shows such striking increases as 17 per cent in the case of bacon and hams, 33 per cent in the case of coarse grains, 86 per cent in the case of tobacco leaf, 49 per cent in the case of fresh and canned fruits and 27 per cent in the case of iron and steel products. As a result of these divergent trends in the trade with particular countries and in particular commodities, the reduction in our total merchandise exports during the first four months of this calendar year, when our economy was feeling the full brunt of the world depression, has been kept to what I regard as the very satisfactory figure of 9 per cent.

Before leaving this discussion of our export trade, it is essential to refer to an important decrease which is not the result of external influences. For the fiscal year ending March 31st last, our exports of wheat and wheat flour are down from the previous year by 43 per cent, the total amounting to only $139,000,000 as compared with $245,000,000 for the year 1936-37. This drastic decline reflects of course the failure of the western wheat crop, and with the small amount of wheat now in the country no improvement in this export can be expected until the new crop comes on to the market.

From the figures I have given for total exports and total imports, it will have been noted that the balance of trade remained favourable to Canada during the fiscal year and amounted to $348,000,000 as compared with $448,000,000 during the preceding year. However, the calculations of our international balance of payments are made by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics on a calendar year rather than a fiscal year basis. For the calendar year 1937, their figures show a favourable merchandise balance of $212,000,000. Gold exported or earmarked established a further credit of $145,000,000. Visiting tourists are estimated to have spent no less than $290,000,000 in Canada during 1937, which is an increase of 13 per cent over the amount expended in 1936. After deducting expenditures of Canadians abroad, there emerges a net credit of $170,000,000 on account of the tourist trade which, by the way, it will be noted is substantially larger than the value of our total exports of wheat and flour during the fiscal year. Adding up these three items we get a total credit of $527,000,000 which was sufficient to enable us to meet all of our foreign obligations on account of interest and dividends as well as various miscellaneous debits, and at the same time enabled us to pay off foreign indebtedness or repatriate Canadian securities held abroad to an estimated amount of approximately $215,000,000. These facts indicate not only a highly favourable position for Canada in international payments during the past year but also a considerable strengthening of our ability to meet any strains that the future may bring.

All who have listened to this recital of the facts in connection with recent developments in our foreign trade will, I am sure, be impressed with how vulnerable our economy is to the impact of adverse external influences, and there may also be some who will question the wisdom of any substantial reliance upon foreign trade. There is no doubt about the high degree of vulnerability in our position. Whether we like it or not, our whole economy, including particularly our primary industries, is geared to the world economic machine and particularly to that of the British commonwealth of nations and that of the United States. It is thus much more than the mere friendly interest of a sister commonwealth or of a good neighbour which leads us to follow with anxious eyes the progress of economic conditions in these countries. This dependence on other nations inevitably follows from the simple fact that Canada is highly fortunate in possessing an abundance of what many other countries lack, namely, a rich and diversified treasure-house of agricultural, forest, and mineral resources. If we desire to capitalize these resources by specializing in their development and marketing the products abroad in exchange for commodities which we cannot ourselves produce or which we can only produce at greater cost, we must assume the risks inherent in the fact that our well-being will to a considerable extent be dependent upon the prosperity of our customers and upon the fluctuations in that prosperity. We can only avoid these risks, if we are content to place our economy on a self-sufficient basis. This would mean not only tremendous costs and wastes in the adjustment process but also a permanent and substantial lowering in the Canadian standard of living, not merely in times of economic depression but at all times. There are few in this country, I am confident, who are willing to pursue the mirage of national self-sufficiency. But, if that objective is not to be accepted, the course which should be followed by any government charged with the administration of affairs in this country is clear, and I submit it is the course which is represented by the policies which this government is following. In the field of external relations, it means not only such action on our part as may appropriately be taken to lessen the evils of international friction and political tension but also active cooperation in all efforts to re-open the markets of the world to the normal interchange of goods and services.

In emphasizing as I have done certain external and uncontrollable forces which have been influencing our economy, I would not have you think that I neglect or minimize the importance of the domestic factors. The fundamental fact that in this modern world no nation can live unto itself alone does not lessen, indeed it reinforces, the necessity for Canada to devote its maximum energies to the solution of its own internal problems. Concentration upon its domestic problems is the primary duty of any nation. It goes without saying that conditions favourable to economic expansion must be maintained. The fundamental structure of business in itself must be sound. Costs must be in the right relationship to prices. There must be a properly adjusted balance of factors within the price structure. Ample credit accommodation must be available for the needs of trade and for business expansion. Speculative enthusiasm must not be permitted to get out of hand. Maladjustments in the economy must not be allowed to develop. Above all, under our present economic system, there must be a prevailing atmosphere of confidence in regard to our institutions, broad governmental policies and general conditions.

I have already expressed my own conviction that, measured by these tests, the Canadian economy during 1937 was in a sound position—that it disclosed no serious weaknesses which required the drastic corrective processes of a depression or even of a "recession." I shall now give some evidence to support this conviction but I do not wish to weary you with statistical details and shall confine myself to comment on some of the more important industries and factors which may have special significance for the outlook as to the immediate future.

In each of the last two years I have had to refer to the failure of employment to keep pace with the striking gains in business activity and to point out that this was a condition usually met with in the early stages of recovery from business depression. I am therefore pleased to be able to report that during 1937 the increase in the volume of employment was for the first time since 1929 more rapid than the rise in industrial production, and also that since the downward trend in business began last December employment has declined less rapidly than other business indices. Estimates by the Dominion Bureau of Statistics of the total number of wage earners employed in all industries show that the number in employment was higher in March, 1938, than in the corresponding month of the preceding seven years, and only slightly less than in March of 1929 and 1930. The estimated number of unemployed wage earners, including unemployables, was 456,000 in March, 1938, which was lower than in the same month of any year since 1931. The index prepared by the bureau based on reports from 10,550 firms employing over a million persons, rose from 110·4 on May 1, 1937, to 119·6 on October 1, 1937, and on May 1 of this year stood at 111·5, still about one per cent higher than a year ago. The trend disclosed by this index is confirmed by the figures showing the numbers on urban relief rolls. Preliminary estimates of the number of relief recipients in April show a total including all dependents of 1,038,000 persons, which represents a decrease of 121,000 since April, 1937. However, if we exclude, as we should, recipients of agricultural relief whose situation is a result of climatic rather than of economic conditions, we find that the number of persons on relief including all dependents declined from 833,800 in April, 1937, to 632,000 in April, 1938, a decrease of 201,800 persons or over 24 per cent during the period. Costs of urban direct relief have perhaps not been reduced proportionately with the decrease in numbers on relief but considerable progress has been made in many communities in securing a more effective control over expenditures.

I know of no better means of expanding employment in Canada to-day than by stimulating building activity. The construction industry is the most important of our capital or durable goods industries and it is the drastic fluctuations in this group of industries which largely account for the wide differences in general economic activity as between good and bad times. Purchases of consumers' goods maintain a fairly steady volume, but the durable goods industries tend to expand to abnormal proportions during boom periods and to lapse into comparative stagnation during depressions. Perhaps in no other industry is the range of fluctuation apt to be so great as in construction. It is difficult to exaggerate the bad effects which this extreme variability has upon the general welfare of the community. The reason will be obvious to anyone who takes the trouble to examine the magnitude of the dollar value of the products of the construction industry in normal times; the long series of industries which produce its raw and processed materials—lumber, iron and steel, cement, lime, brick, stone, glass, heating equipment, plumbing equipment and many others; the very large number of skilled craftsmen and unskilled labourers to whom it gives employment, both directly and indirectly; and the fact that its effects on employment and business activity ramify so widely in every community throughout the country. It has been frequently pointed out that this industry suffered most from the onset of the great depression, that it has been the most laggard of our major industries in recovering from the depression, and that its many branches include the occupations in which unemployment has been most heavily concentrated. In the eleven years from 1921 to 1931, the average annual value of all construction contracts awarded in Canada was $370,000,000 and the annual totals ranged, during that eleven year period from a low of $240,000,000 in 1921 to a high of $577,000,000 in 1929. During the worst year of the depression, 1933, the total dropped 73 per cent from the 11-year average to less than $100,000,000. From that low point the industry has been slowly recovering and during 1937 this upward movement was accelerated, total contracts awarded rising by 38 per cent over 1936 to $224,000,000. The increase of residential contracts by 31 per cent to $56,000,000 was very largely attributable to the stimulus provided by the Dominion Housing Act and the Home Improvement Plan. But, even with this increase, the total volume of construction during 1937 was still less than half the total for 1930, and construction during the first five months of 1938 again fell 25 per cent below the level of the corresponding period in 1937.

The experience of several countries with expansionist policies during the last few years has proven that only a rise in the rate of new investment can provide a durable basis for an upswing in business activity. Attempts to stimulate consumption by government expenditure or by suddenly improving labour conditions have been tried on more than one occasion but in every case they have been found wanting. They produced, it is true, an immediate temporary stimulus, but they did not awaken the more normal and permanent motive forces which are essential to continuing prosperity and they tended to put too heavy a burden upon production which ultimately produced an effect the reverse of what was intended. Furthermore, we have had several conclusive demonstrations of the principle that government expenditure to create or stimulate employment will not have beneficial results if it is carried on in such a way or on such a scale as to create an atmosphere of fear and uncertainty. It is of little use to prime the pump of business enterprise with government expenditure if at the same time we dry up the springs of private initiative which feed the well. It may be arguable as to whether a system of free enterprise is the most desirable economic and social system but as long as we believe in such a system—and few of us have seen any other system which we would be willing to accept as a substitute—we must follow policies that will enable it to work in accordance with its essential principles. The most important of these principles is that decisions as to whether the individual shall spend and consume, or shall save and invest, or shall save and hoard, are left to the individual's own initiative. If, therefore, the answers to the questions as to whether plants are to be built or extended, new houses are to be erected, and industry is going to expand or to stagnate, depend upon the decisions of tens of thousands of individuals who are free agents and not regimented sheep, it follows that governments must pursue policies which create confidence rather than fear and uncertainty—which give leadership and guidance and encouragement rather than stifle initiative and paralyze new enterprise. If in order to create employment we embark upon expenditures which create undue deficits, or if in any other way we show no sense of financial responsibility, we are certain to find that the relatively small amount of employment which we create is much more than offset by new unemployment resulting from paralysis of private enterprise. Under our system at least, government expenditures cannot take the place of private enterprise, and I do not think that our people are prepared to accept the alternative system of regimentation under which all or practically all expenditures would be government expenditures.

It was this set of principles and the set of facts which I have given in regard to the construction industry which led the government to ask parliament's approval of the Municipal Improvements Assistance bill and of the comprehensive housing program which I had the privilege of introducing the other day. Two phases of the tripartite housing program seek to restore a more normal volume of construction activity by removing obstacles which have hampered individual initiative and by providing facilities and incentives which are designed to bring into full play the energies and resources of the various branches of the industry itself. The third phase provides for a larger measure of governmental assistance but this is in the field of low-rental housing, where such direct governmental assistance can be given without the risk of subsidizing competition to private builders and thus discouraging more building than is stimulated. Moreover, the program for the most part involves government aid by way of loan for productive undertakings of a self-liquidating character. If there is, as there undoubtedly will be, a proportion of loss in respect of these loans, that loss will be amply compensated for not only by the employment created during the present emergency but also by the permanent improvement in the living conditions of our people.

I said the other day that the program constituted a challenge to the building industry. I repeat that challenge to-day with all the emphasis I can command. I wish to add that I am confident the challenge will be accepted. If it is, the contribution which it can make to the elimination of unemployment, to the stimulation of our whole economic life and to the expansion of the national income will be difficult to exaggerate.

While I am dealing with one of our major durable goods industries, let me say that activity in our factories producing capital or producers' goods was one of the brightest spots in the manufacturing field during the past year. The output of industries engaged in the manufacture of producers' goods showed a gain of 13 per cent in 1937 over the preceding year. The primary iron and steel industry reflected the revival in the domestic demand for industrial equipment and durable goods as well as a brisk demand from the United Kingdom. The output of steel ingots recorded a gain of nearly 26 per cent over the preceding year, while the increase in pig iron production was over 32 per cent. The index of employment in this industry averaged 18 per cent higher than in the previous year. Since the first of the year, activity has declined but it is interesting to note that while in the United States the steel industry is operating at less than 30 per cent of capacity, the Bureau's index of steel production in Canada for April was 161·7 and for pig iron production 108·5 as compared with averages of 178·1 and 148·7 respectively for the boom year 1929.

The industry, however, which during the past year has been responsible, and is still to-day responsible, for the greatest stimulus to an upward movement in our economy is the mining industry. In 1937 for the third consecutive year it established a new record in the total value of its output. Reflecting in part a higher level of prices during most of the year, total production was estimated at $457,000,000, an increase of 26 per cent over the 1936 output. The dollar output of copper rose by 77 per cent, of nickel by 36 per cent and of lead by 43 per cent. Production of gold increased by 9 per cent to a total of $143,000,000, or more than double the output of eight years ago. While prices, particularly of base metals, have been substantially lower this year, and while the exports of nickel to the United States have been affected by the depression in that country, the performance of the mineral industry during the first four months of this year in the face of declining trends elsewhere, has been a truly remarkable one. The Bureau's index of physical output of the mines rose by 18 per cent from January to April and the figure for April was almost 15 per cent higher than that for April, 1937. Particularly noteworthy were the increases recorded in April of this year which would appear to forecast the impetus to general economic recovery which may be expected from this industry during the balance of the year. In this connection it is estimated that thirty new gold mills will come into operation during 1938, increasing existing capacity by more than 11 per cent.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Less encouraging has been the record during the last few months of that other great primary industry which is based on the products of our forests. During 1937, it is true there was a rapid expansion of production in its various branches, but this rapid pace has been slowed down materially because of a combination of factors, including the slackening of the British building boom, restricted demand from the United States and from the far east, severe weather during the winter months in British Columbia, and an over-accumulation of stocks in at least one branch of the industry. Newsprint output expanded during 1937 to a record high point, not far from the practical limit of capacity of the mills, and reached a total volume for the year more than 14 per cent in excess of that for 1936. But in the third quarter an excess of stocks in publishers' hands in the United States began to appear and sharp curtailment of Canadian production became necessary. However due to the substantial falling off in the United States' demand consequent upon the business depression, the industry has made relatively slow progress in disposing of accumulated stocks of newsprint. During the first four months of 1938, total output of newsprint mills in Canada was down 27 per cent from the corresponding period of 1937, and the industry will in my opinion do well if it is able to operate for the year as a whole on an average basis of about 65 per cent of capacity.

Other branches of the forest industry have fared considerably better. Logging operations required an expansion in number of employees of 36·5 per cent during 1937 while saw milling and paper industries recorded an advance of 11 per cent. Timber scaled in British Columbia which is a good index of saw mill operations showed a gain of 7·5 per cent while the exports of all wood and paper products rose by 25 per cent to a total of $263,000,000. During the winter months, however, lumbering operations were on a smaller scale than during the previous season and the general level of activity to-day is probably substantially below that of a year ago. On May 1st, employment in logging operations was 12 per cent higher than on May 1st, 1937, but in the rough and dressed lumber industries it was almost 9 per cent lower. Exports of planks and boards decreased by about 20 per cent in the first four months of 1938. It is difficult to forecast the outlook for lumber demand from foreign markets during the balance of the year, but the sharp decline in ocean freight rates to United Kingdom ports from the excessive levels of 1937 will place British Columbia lumber on a more advantageous basis in that market in competition with Baltic timber. The lumber industry should also be one of the chief beneficiaries of expanding activity in the domestic construction field which the government's housing program is designed to bring about.

Summing up the net production of goods and services in all fields of economic activity, we reach that most significant of the measures of national well-being, namely, the total national income. By national income I mean not the revenues of the dominion government but the aggregate of the individual incomes of all the people. Unfortunately, the statistics of our national income, although the most important of all statistics for purposes of analysis and policy determination, leave much to be desired both in their adequacy and in the time at which they become available. I believe that the methods used by the Bureau in compiling their estimates are being revised and their compilations for the year 1937 have not yet been completed. Preliminary estimates from unofficial sources, however, appear to indicate that Canada's national income in 1937 amounted to $4,830,000,000, which is an increase of 13 per cent over the Bureau's revised estimate for 1936.

I turn now to a number of considerations which are primarily financial in character. Last July, the index of the wholesale prices of commodities reached a high point for the recent movement, only 12½ per cent below the average level which prevailed in 1926. Since that time there has been a gradual downward tendency, the index for April representing a drop of almost 6 per cent from the high of last July. This 6 per cent compares with a decrease of 9 per cent in the United Kingdom and of about 10 per cent in the United States. During the last two years, however, the disparities which had previously been an unsound and retarding factor in the Canadian price structure have been largely corrected. For instance, it is significant to note that while the index of April of this year for all commodities stood at 82·3, that for Canadian farm products was 82·5 and for fully and chiefly manufactured goods 81·3. In other words, the normal equilibrium between farm prices and other prices has been restored.

The decline in common stock prices has been drastic. Canadian stock markets felt the full blast of the hurricane which swept the New York stock exchange last autumn and security prices in the two countries are about on a par. This is true despite the highly satisfactory earnings of Canadian business enterprises as a whole last year. A recent listing of the net earnings of 522 corporations for the fiscal year ending in 1937 gives a total of over $450,000,000, which is 17 per cent above the aggregate net earnings of the same corporations for the previous year. It is only natural, however, that our financial markets should move closely in sympathy with New York. Apart from the important relationships in trade and commerce to which I have already referred, securities of a value of hundreds of millions of dollars flow annually north and south between the financial centres on this continent. Elaborate machinery has been developed to facilitate these transactions, and the daily intercommunication between brokers and financial houses has its effect in tending to create the basis for a common outlook on business prospects. Obviously, this has dangers as well as advantages. Depression psychology may affect our financial and business leaders when our own conditions do not justify it, and what is more important, if the North American investor for any reason loses confidence in any phase of the Canadian position, capital may fly from Canada overnight and our own securities held abroad may be dumped on our markets in enormous quantities. Fortunately there is no reason for the American investor to lose his undoubted faith in Canada which has been grounded in long and satisfactory experience, but those in charge of financial affairs in this country must always keep such considerations in mind.

The bond market in Canada has given an infinitely better account of itself than the stock market during the past year. During 1937, bond issues were sold by dominion, provincial and municipal authorities and by private corporations to an aggregate amount of $701,700,000, of which $225,600,000 was for new cash and $476,100,000 for refunding purposes. During the first quarter of 1938, the total offerings were $162,100,000 of which $76,800,000 was for cash and the remainder for refunding. These are substantial totals for a country of small population and indicate a healthy functioning of the capital markets. To-day the interest yields of dominion bonds are lower than they have ever been before in our history except for a short period in 1936. In another connection I shall give details of the favourable basis on which we were able to carry out a heavy volume of dominion financing last year.

If hon. members will examine the statistics published by the League of Nations on the percentage yield of government bond issues they may be surprised to find that of all the countries of the world only the United States, Great Britain, Holland, Sweden and Switzerland show the obligations of their respective governments selling on as low a yield basis as the obligations of the government of Canada. This is all the more remarkable when you remember that these are great creditor countries while Canada is one of the greatest debtor countries in the world, that is to say, has more foreign capital invested within her borders than most other countries. In making such comparisons, care must be taken of course to see that maturity dates, coupon rates and tax exemption features are reasonably comparable. On a recent date the quotations showed the following yield basis for a government bond of 17 to 19 year term in the domestic markets of the respective countries: Canada, 3·01 per cent; United Kingdom, 3·09 per cent; Australia, 3·76 per cent; New Zealand, 4·31 per cent; South Africa, 3·45 per cent; and the United States, 2·56 per cent,—but that United States issue is free of income tax, and therefore is not strictly comparable. No comparable quotation could be secured for France, but her perpetual rentes were selling in March on a 4·43 per cent basis while Canada's perpetuals were on less than a 3·40 per cent basis.

I have also caused to be made certain calculations showing for the latest available date the average rate of interest being paid on the outstanding debt of several important countries. In the case of Canada, the average rate on our outstanding debt including treasury bills and allowing for the effects of the conversion issue floated in London last January, was 3·53 per cent. As the volume of outstanding treasury bills and other short term debt varies considerably as between different countries and as the information regarding this short term debt is not available in all cases, I will use for purposes of comparison the average rate on our Canadian debt excluding treasury bills. This was 3·67 per cent as at March 31, 1938. Contrast this percentage with the following figures for other countries: United Kingdom, 3·56 per cent; United States, 2·69 per cent, but again I must point to the tax free feature of the United States obligations; New Zealand, 3·79 per cent; South Africa, 3·92 per cent; Australia, 3·98 per cent; and France, 4·36 per cent. Of this comparison I think Canadians have real reason to be proud.

It may be of interest, Mr. Speaker, to make a further comparison with the Commonwealth of Australia. There is frequent controversy in this country as to whether we should have followed the plan adopted by Australia in 1931 when the interest rate on outstanding government bonds was cut by an average of 22½ per cent. I shall not undertake to pass judgment on the wisdom of such a policy for Canada in 1931 or 1932 but I do wish to point out that as at June 30, 1931, before the conversion operation took place in Australia, the average rate of interest on Australia's outstanding debt was 5·25 per cent and as at June 30th last, it was 3·93 per cent, a decrease therefore in the average rate on the Australian debt of 25·1 per cent. On the other hand the average rate of Canada's debt outstanding as at March 31, 1931 was 4·98 per cent, and to-day the corresponding rate is 3·53 per cent, a decrease in the case of Canada of 29·1 per cent.

In other words, by following a different and more normal policy, Canada has been able to secure a reduction in her average rate of interest by a larger percentage and to a lower relative figure.

To keep the record straight, I wish also to mention two additional facts. First, the arbitrary reduction in interest was applied only to domestic holders of government bonds, a policy which it was easy to enforce in Australia because of the established practice of issuing bonds in registered form rather than bonds payable to bearer, and bonds payable optionally in two or more currencies. Secondly, the policy was only one part of a comprehensive program designed to reduce all costs, including wages, by an approximately equal proportion.

Moreover, the Australian conversion offer was originally on a voluntary basis and it was only after 91 per cent of the bondholders had voluntarily accepted that the conversion was made compulsory on the 3 per cent who had dissented and the 6 per cent who had not been heard from. Canada has followed consistently the policy of offering voluntary conversions to holders of our bonds as these bonds become due or callable. This policy has amply justified itself. I have already shown the extent to which we have succeeded in reducing the average rate of interest on our outstanding debt. But rates of interest represent small figures and their full significance may not be apparent. Let me state the facts in another way. As at March 31, 1938, our total bonds, debentures and treasury bills outstanding amounted to approximately $3,315,000,000. This represents an increase since 1930 of $1,031,000,000 due mainly to the emergency expenditures incident to the depression. The annual interest charge, which represents the burden of this debt as at March 31 last, was $117,063,000 which was less than the corresponding figure at the end or any other year since the close of the war, with the single exception of March 31, 1930. The interest requirement on the funded debt outstanding on the latter date was $114,577,000. It should be remembered, however, that since 1930 we have invested a substantial sum in additional active loans and investments which as at March 31, 1938, accounted for an offsetting credit to the treasury of $5,470,000 in the form of interest receivable. If this sum be deducted, the net interest burden on the funded debt is less than in any year since the great war, in spite of the increase in the public debt itself of over $1,000,000,000 since 1930.

Let me now sum up the argument I have been developing. In the first place we have succeeded in getting our interest rates on current borrowings down to levels comparable with those of the oldest and wealthiest countries in the world. Secondly, we have been able to reduce the average interest rate on our total outstanding funded debt to approximately 3½ per cent, although much of that debt was created in years past when interest rates were substantially higher than they are to-day, again a level comparable with the oldest and wealtiest countries. Finally, in spite of the fact that during the depression years our funded debt has had to be increased by over a billion dollars, the burden of that debt in the form of its annual interest charge is less than the payment required to service our smaller debt in any year since the war except 1930. All this I submit is no small achievement for a young and debtor nation. It reflects careful administration of the government's finances, a persistent endeavour to achieve a budgetary balance at the earliest practicable date, a healthy functioning of the capital markets, and the results of an easy money policy efficiently carried out.

There are some, of course, who appear to believe that the government should not pay interest at all or, indeed, should issue debt free money to finance its expenditures or to retire its interest bearing debt or to do both of these things. It is incredible that this hoary fallacy should persist after so many historical demonstrations of its devastating possibilities. Perhaps I underestimate the insidious appeal of a program which promises to make something out of nothing, although I must say that for no one more than for a minister of finance should such a program have seductive charm. How much easier my task would be if I could draw on the accumulated savings of the Canadian people without paying interest thereon or if indirectly I could do the same thing by issuing credit against our natural wealth, that is, against the resources of farm and forest and mine and factory now owned by the Canadian people as individuals and not by the dominion government. I am sometimes criticized because I do not accept the so-called "new economics," which in fact is centuries old. It dates back to the first monarch who, finding it difficult to replenish the royal coffers by taxation, tried to filch the needed funds from the pockets of his subjects by debasing his currency. When first introduced this currency debasement gave some temporary stimulus to trade, because there were in circulation more of the sovereign's coins, albeit each had a lower intrinsic value. But when the smoke cleared away the net result became evident, namely, that the sovereign had obtained a larger share of the product of his people's labour. It may be that our taxation system is not the most scientific, but at least the attempt has been and is being made to make it progressively more equitable. The kind of device to which I have been referring takes many different forms, but there is nothing more certain than this, that in any of its forms it constitutes the most unjust and most inequitable type of taxation that could be devised. Not only that, but the inflationist expansion of currency and credit which it contemplates is bound to initiate unhealthy speculative activity and to result in overexpansion of particular industries. When maladjustments become too pronounced, the speculative boom always collapses and depression sets in. Surely we have suffered too much, Mr. Speaker, from the inflationist experience of the war and its sequel to deliberately embark upon such a program again.

This is not the way of sound and healthy prosperity. On a recent occasion in the house I had the privilege of discussing the monetary policy which has been followed in this country in recent years and of showing why in my opinion that policy was well conceived. It has been an easy money policy designed to offset any deflationary tendencies and to ensure that ample currency and credit would be available to meet the needs of industry and trade. Its general objective has been to promote the maximum possible sustained level of productivity and the minimum possible level of unemployment. It is a tribute to the skill with which this policy has been administered that while currency and credit have been expanded at a quite rapid rate, the substantial rise in production and trade which occurred has been consistent and has taken place without speculative excesses or other unsound features developing in our economy. To monetary policy must be given at least some share of the credit for the health and soundness of our internal economic conditions which I have already reported. We may feel confident, Mr. Speaker, that it will adjust itself with equal efficiency to the changing conditions that may arise in the future.

In this review of current economic conditions during the past year, I have tried to indicate the divergent influences at work. The net result of these conflicting forces will determine the course of Canadian business during the remainder of this year. On the unfavourable side we find two external factors which for us are uncontrollable and unpredictable. I refer to the progress of business depression abroad and to developments in the field of international relations. It is to be hoped that business in the United States is now dragging on the bottom and that the steps which have been and are being taken will promote an up-turn before the end of this year. In the United Kingdom and other European countries, the acceleration of the armaments program should exert a favourable short-term influence, although none of us look forward with confidence to the more distant results of a program which involves so heavy a concentration of the resources of the leading nations upon preparation for war. In the political field it is even more difficult to make predictions. Realism compels us to face frankly the fact that the potential dangers are indeed great. We can only hope that the forces which are striving to prevent war, while maintaining freedom, will achieve success.

Any improvement in conditions abroad will strongly reinforce the influence of the favourable forces which are at work within our own country. As I have already stated, our internal economy is sound, our price structure is in reasonable balance, ample credit accommodation is available for further expansion, and our people need not be affected by fear and uncertainty. Production in our major industries has shown what is relatively a moderate decline in the face of depressed conditions elsewhere and since February our index of the physical volume of business has been tending upwards. Moreover, there are now important forces at work which in my opinion should give a vigorous impetus to further recovery later in the year. Most important of these is the improved prospect for a good wheat crop and for good agricultural conditions generally. The mining industry may also be counted on to provide a further stimulus. Finally, I am confident that as a result of the government's program in relation to housing, municipal improvements, and national conservation and development generally, we may expect to see during the next few months the beginning of a more vigorous revival in the construction industry and the many industries which depend upon it. These are all powerful influences making for recovery, and if backed by the wholehearted cooperation of all elements in our population, they should make the current year a reasonably satisfactory one.

GOVERNMENT ACCOUNTS, 1937-38

Turning now, Mr. Speaker, to the government accounts, I am pleased to state that, because of the late date at which the budget is being brought down, I am able to present the figures for the past fiscal year in practically their final form instead of making the provisional estimates which are usually necessary. Following the procedure of last year, I shall first, with the permission of the house, place on Hansard a number of tables giving a complete summary of revenues and expenditures under the usual categories and of the over-all deficit or increase of net debt for the fiscal year 1937-38, together with comparative figures for the four preceding fiscal years:

REVENUES, 1937-38

With regard to revenues for the fiscal year 1937-38, the last fiscal year, our revenues from taxation and all other sources aggregated $516,692,000. This total exceeded that of the previous year by some $62,538,000, and surpassed by $55,835,000 the previous high total of the fiscal year 1928-29. The extent of our recovery from the low point of the depression is strikingly illustrated by the fact that our total revenue for 1937-38 represented an increase of more than 65 per cent over that for the low year 1932-33.

Total revenue from taxation amounted to $448,652,000, and exceeded the total for last year by over $62,000,000. Every major tax source contributed to this increase.

The sales tax for the second successive year led the field as a revenue producer. The total of $138,054,000 was $25,222,000 in excess of the previous year, and this increase resulted almost solely from a heavier turnover of merchandise and a higher price level, as the rate of tax has remained unchanged since May 1, 1936.

The income tax, which along with the sales tax now provides over one-half of our total tax revenue, was the second largest producer. Receipts from this source amounted to $120,366,000, an increase of $18,000,000 over last year, and much the highest total on record. There is no more conclusive evidence, Mr. Speaker, of the substantial improvement in both individual and corporate incomes. Of the total receipts, $69,769,000 was derived from corporations, $40,445,000 from the tax on individual incomes and $10,152,000 from the five per cent tax on interest and dividends.

Excise duties, levied principally on liquor and tobacco, increased $6,080,000 over the previous year, to a total of $52,037,000.

Customs duties accounted for $93,456,000, a substantial increase over last year when the total was $83,771,000. Although this revenue falls far short of previous high totals in 1929 and 1920, it must be noted that the proportion of imports entering this country entirely free of duty is larger at the present time than it has been since the turn of the century. In the two high revenue years mentioned, 1929 and 1920, for example, duty-free imports accounted for only about one-third of the total, whereas last year and the year before free imports amounted to almost one-half of our total imports.

Special excise taxes, of which the three per cent tax on imports is the most important as a revenue source, showed an increase of $3,124,000 over the previous year, the total receipts amounting to $42,765,000. The bank note circulation tax continues to decline from year to year due to the statutory decreases in the note circulation of the chartered banks.

Non-tax revenues, that is to say, the revenues derived from investments and from various departmental services, aggregated $61,647,000 during 1937-38, and increase of $3,169,000 over the previous year. This increase took place despite the fact that radio licence fees, previously shown as non-tax revenue, were eliminated from the government's accounts in 1937-38 and credited directly to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. The largest single item in this group of non-tax revenues is Post Office receipts which totalled $35,546,000, an increase of $1,271,000 over 1936-37. The nominal surplus on Post Office operations is estimated at $1,784,000. The other major source of non-tax revenue, interest on investments, totalled $13,120,000, as compared with $11,231,000 during the preceding year. This increase is largely accounted for by the receipt of $1,700,000 from the Canadian National Railways representing interest paid on capital advances made to the railway by the government. It will be remembered that payment of interest on these advances was provided for in the C.N.R. Capital Revision Act passed at the last session, so that this represents a new revenue item in our accounts.

Special receipts and other credits for the past fiscal year totalled $6,393,000, as compared with $9,125,000 in the previous year. The exceptionally large figure for 1936-37 was accounted for by the $8,000,000 payment from the Canadian Wheat Board for which there is no counterpart in the year under review. The total this year is comprised mainly of refunds on relief and capital expenditures and a net credit of $1,023,000 resulting from adjustments made in the railway accounts under authority of the C.N.R. Capital Revision Act.

EXPENDITURES, 1937-38

In dealing with expenditures, I shall, for the purpose of analysis and comparison with previous years, use the five main categories in which expenditures are now classified in the public accounts, but I wish again to emphasize the importance of concentrating our attention on the aggregate of our expenditures of all kinds, and on our over-all deficit rather than on ordinary expenditures and the surplus or deficit on ordinary account.

ORDINARY EXPENDITURES

The ordinary expenditures for the year totalled $410,954,000, an increase of $23,842,000 over the previous fiscal year. As ordinary revenues amounted to $510,299,000, the so-called surplus on ordinary account was almost $100,000,000. As I have already stated, however, this surplus on ordinary account has only slight significance under present conditions which require substantial expenditures for relief and other purposes.

The largest increase in ordinary expenditures was accounted for by the new defence program initiated last year. Total expenditures of the Department of National Defence during 1937-38 amounted to $32,760,000, an increase of $9,837,000 over the previous year. The dominion's share of the cost of old age pensions increased by $7,504,000 to a total of $28,653,000. Special grants to provinces increased by $4,250,000, reflecting depressed conditions in western Canada. The cost of running the Post Office, due chiefly to increased business, rose by $1,856,000 to a total of $33,762,000. I wish to call special attention to an item of $5,000,000 representing the estimated amount required to be transferred to the Government Annuities Fund to maintain the reserve. This amount is very much larger than the provision made in any previous year and the increase results from the necessity of valuing our liabilities under annuity contracts in force as at March 31, 1937 on the basis of the increased rates now in effect. I should add that the figure mentioned is only a rough estimate pending completion of the actuarial calculations by the Department of Labour. It is obvious also that this item adds to our expenditure for the past year an estimated $5,000,000 which is really attributable to the operations of many prior years. Other increases in ordinary expenditure were of minor significance.

Fortunately I am also able to report a number of decreases in ordinary expenditure. Of these the most important were declines of $2,134,000 in ordinary expenditures on public works, $1,306,000 in the cost of operations of the marine branch of the Department of Transport, and $5,292,000 in interest paid on public debt. This last-named decrease in annual interest charges is one to which I will have occasion to refer later.

CAPITAL EXPENDITURES

Total expenditures charged to capital account amounted to $4,430,000, an increase of $938,000 over the previous year. Of this amount $4,359,000 was spent for public works construction.

[Mr. Dunning.]

SPECIAL EXPENDITURES

The next category of expenditures which I wish to discuss is that important group of items which are classified as Special, and which this year, as last year, relate solely to disbursements made for unemployment relief purposes. The aggregate of these expenditures for the year 1937-38 amounted to $68,532,000, a decrease of $9,472,000 from the previous year.

Direct grants in aid to provinces declined from $28,930,000 in 1936-37 to $19,493,000 in 1937-38, and the dominion's share of joint dominion-provincial projects, including transportation facilities into mining areas, decreased from $13,913,000 to $10,165,000. The total cost of public works and other projects sponsored by the dominion alone amounted to $13,911,000 last year as compared with $23,554,000 during the preceding year.

The largest single item of special expenditures, however, was necessitated by the disastrous drought in Saskatchewan and Alberta to which reference has already been made. To meet the emergent and unforeseen problems created by this renewed drought condition, the dominion government felt obligated to appropriate funds by governor general's warrants in order to pay the expenditures involved in purchasing and distributing feed and fodder for live stock in the drought-stricken areas, and in providing direct relief to farmers living in these areas. Agreements were entered into with the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta under which the dominion agreed to bear 100 per cent of the cost of direct relief in the drought areas as defined, and 100 per cent of the cost of feed and fodder for live stock, including the net freight charges incurred on live stock shipped from the drought areas to suitable feeding ground and return therefrom. Arrangements were also made for the marketing of surplus live stock which cost the dominion treasury the sum of $337,000. The amount spent for direct relief was $11,925,000 in the drought area; for feed and fodder $11,352,000; and for the purchase and distribution of foodstuffs $971,000. The total of these special expenditures for western drought area relief amounted to $24,585,000, which compared with an expenditure of only $8,751,000 for similar purposes in the fiscal year 1936-37. Of this total, the sum of $19,232,000 was expended from the moneys provided by governor general's warrants.

The following table which I will place on Hansard compares the expenditures made for direct relief and various unemployment relief projects during each of the last two fiscal years:—

GOVERNMENT OWNED ENTERPRISES

The next main category of expenditures to which I wish to call attention comprises the losses of, and non-active advances to, government owned enterprises which are operated as separate corporations.

Canadian National Railway System

Operating revenues of the Canadian National Railways amounted to $198,396,000, an increase of $11,786,000, or 6·3 per cent over the corresponding figure for 1936, in spite of the falling off in grain traffic in the late months of last year resulting from the crop failure in western Canada.

Operating expenses of the railway increased by $9,311,000 or 5·4 per cent, to $180,789,000, although wage cuts were partially restored in 1937, the increase in the railway's payroll amounting to $6,584,000. This moderate increase in operating expenditures for the higher volume of traffic carried, compared favourably with the showing made last year by other railway systems on this continent.

The net revenue available for interest on the railway's debt was $8,287,000 compared with $6,409,000 in the preceding year. After payment of interest charges of $50,633,000, including $1,685,000 to the government on capital advances not paid in previous years, there was a net income deficit of $42,346,000 for the year, a decrease of approximately a million dollars from the comparable figure for 1936.

Under the provisions of the Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, certain changes were required to be made in the books of the dominion. These reflected the transfer to the securities trust of certain indebtedness formerly held by the minister on behalf of his majesty in exchange for capital stock of the trust, together with other adjustments in non-active accounts which resulted in a net credit of $1,023,000 as shown in the table of revenues. A recapitulation of these changes is given in the table which I now place on Hansard:

Adjustment in Public Accounts resulting from Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1937

Credit—
Non-active assets:
Railway accounts (old)	$ 25,607,393
Railway accounts (loans non-active)	655,527,456
Investments in Canadian government railways	589,708
		$681,724,557
Active assets:
Canadian government railway stores and open accounts		15,748,922
		$697,473,479

Adjustment in Public Accounts resulting from Canadian National Railways Capital Revision Act, 1937—Conc.

Debit—
Non-active assets:
Canadian National securities trust stock account	$269,325,706
Canadian National stock account	18,000,000
Investment in Hudson Bay railway	457,527
		$287,783,233
Active assets:
Canadian government railways working capital		16,771,980
Charges to consolidated fund		392,918,266
		$697,473,479

The increase of $1,023,058 in active assets shown by the above table is due to a transfer from Canadian government railways capital account to active assets—Canadian government railways working capital.

Canadian National Steamships

The operations of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited in 1937 after payment of bond interest to the public but before depreciation and interest on government advances, resulted in a surplus of $189,000, which was paid to the government in partial reimbursement of prior deficits and interest. The corresponding figure in 1936 was $87,000.

An advance of $16,000 was made to the company for capital improvements on vessels under its control. In addition to this non-active advance, the table of expenditure also shows a further amount of $88,000 which represents an adjusting entry in connection with the 1936 surplus which was credited in 1936-37 to loans and advances, non-active.

Harbour Commissions

The operations of harbours under the new national harbours board again showed an improvement over the results obtained during the preceding year. Operating income for the calendar year 1937, after payments of interest to the public but before depreciation and interest payable to the government, totalled $2,872,000 or an increase of $598,000, as compared with 1936. This does not take into account the operations of the Prescott and Port Colborne elevators and of Churchill harbour, which were placed under the control of the board during 1937.

Government assistance to harbour commissions charged to expenditure during the fiscal year totalled $2,272,000. Of this amount $289,000 represented the operating deficit of the harbours at Quebec and at Churchill and of the elevator at Prescott. The remainder comprised non-active advances of $367,000 for the deficit on the Jacques Cartier bridge at Montreal, $1,269,000 for retirement of obligations of the harbour commissions at Halifax and Saint John, and $347,000 for capital purposes at Saint John, Three Rivers and Churchill.

In addition to the foregoing items an expenditure of $1,565,000 on various works at certain of the harbours was made under authority of the special supplementary estimates and charged to special expenditures.

Trans-Canada Air Lines

A new item of expenditure appeared for the first time last year in our accounts under the heading of government owned enterprises. This was the net deficit of the Trans-Canada Air lines for the period June 1st to December 31, 1937. The amount of the deficit contributed by the government and charged to expenditure was $111,000.

To sum up, the total amount of assistance to the various government owned enterprises which was treated as expenditure in our accounts was $44,833,000. For 1936-37 the total was $44,218,000, the slightly smaller amount being accounted for by a substantial credit from Canadian National Steamships because of the winding up of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine. Advances to government owned enterprises which are treated as active assets I shall refer to later.

OTHER CHARGES

The final category of expenditures, namely, Other Charges, accounts for a total of only $1,718,000 last year as compared with over $19,000,000 in 1936-37. This is comprised of the usual write-offs of soldier and general land settlement loans and the old seed grain and relief accounts, amounting together to $764,000, ascertained losses and concessions granted and credited to settlers' accounts under the New Brunswick 500 British family settlement scheme, amounting to $139,000, and the final charge to consolidated fund of $805,000 of Manitoba treasury bills which were written down to non-active assets last year as the dominion's contribution to the voluntary debt adjustment program in that province. As the write-down to non-active assets took place last year, the charge to consolidated fund this year is offset by a corresponding credit.

SUMMARY OF EXPENDITURES

If we add together ordinary, capital and special expenditures as well as expenditures in connection with government owned enterprises and the other charges to which I have just referred, we find that the grand total of expenditures for which the government is responsible aggregated $530,467,000 during the fiscal year 1937-38. This is approximately $2,000,000 less than the total for each of the two preceding fiscal years.

I wish again this year to place on Hansard a table showing the percentage distribution of revenues and expenditures, that is to say, the percentage which each major source of revenue and each major item of expenditure bears to our total revenue as well as to our total expenditure. This table is subject to the same defects to which I called attention last year, but with the new form of estimates which we introduced this year I am confident that in future years most, if not all, of these defects can be removed.

OVER-ALL DEFICIT

As I have reported our total revenues at $516,692,000 and our total expenditures at $530,467,000, it is apparent that the over-all deficit, in other words, the increase in net debt, for the fiscal year which ended on March 31 last, was $13,775,000.

While naturally I am disappointed to have to report any deficit, I believe there is cause for gratification over this close approach to a balanced budget after eight years of very large deficits. It will be recalled that for 1936-37 the realized deficit was $77,851,000 and that when I delivered the budget speech last year I did not venture to forecast a deficit for 1937-38 of less than $35,000,000. That we have done so much better than that forecast is all the more gratifying when we consider the abnormal item of $5,000,000 added to the annuities reserve and the substantial unanticipated increase in our expenditures resulting from the crop failure in western Canada. As I have already indicated, the increase in our special expenditures resulting from intensified drought conditions was over $20,000,000, and the increase in the C.N.R. deficit arising from this cause was at least $7,000,000. Had it not been for this unfortunate catastrophe, it is clear that to-day I would have been able to report an over-all surplus.

The progress which this government has made in approaching its objective of a balanced budget within the shortest practicable period is indicated by the fact that, while the over-all deficit in our first year, 1935-36, was $159,989,000, the deficit was reduced to $77,851,000 in 1936-37, and to $13,775,000 during the past fiscal year.

LOANS AND INVESTMENTS

Active Assets

In addition to the expenditures for the year, as outlined, we should also take into account loans and investments which are treated as active assets in the public accounts. For the year under review, the transactions in loans and investments resulted in a net credit to the dominion treasury of $4,202,000 as compared with a net debit during 1936-37 of $21,457,000. In other words, total repayments of loans and advances made in previous years exceeded new advances made during the year by a substantial amount.

Loans to Provinces

The total of loans made to the four western provinces for relief purposes during the fiscal year 1937-38 was slightly higher than the total advanced in 1936-37. The net amount of such loans was $16,298,611 which compares with $15,462,477 made during the preceding fiscal year. The Unemployment and Agricultural Assistance Act of 1937 restricted such assistance to a maximum amount to be measured by the provincial share of the cost of unemployment relief and relief projects incurred under agreements with the dominion entered into pursuant to the act. Furthermore the terms of the act required any province desiring assistance by way of loans to establish the necessity therefor by the submission of detailed statements of the financial position of the province.

As at March 31, 1938, loans made to the four western provinces under authority of the various relief acts were outstanding in the dominion's books to an aggregate amount of approximately $129,800,000. The totals for the various provinces, in round figures, were as follows: Manitoba, $22,285,000; Saskatchewan, $48,350,000; Alberta, $26,079,000; and British Columbia, $33,087,000. In the case of Manitoba, the total which I have given is the amount outstanding after deducting the sum of $804,897 written off in accordance with vote 392 of the further supplementary estimates for 1936-37, and in the case of Saskatchewan the total given is after deducting the sum of $17,682,158 written down to non-active assets pursuant to vote 393 of the further supplementary estimates for 1936-37.

I desire now to place on Hansard tables showing the net loans made to each province during each of the last seven fiscal years, and a classification of such loans on the basis of the general purposes for which the loans were obtained.

Loans to Canadian National Railway System

In addition to paying the net income deficit of the Canadian National Railways, the government advanced to the Railway $11,035,000 for capital purposes and for the retirement of miscellaneous obligations. This amount, together with advances of $41,358,000 made for similar purposes in the years 1932 to 1936, were repaid to the extent of $50,000,000 out of the proceeds of a dominion guaranteed bond issue marketed in January, 1938. This issue took the form of $20,000,000 2 per cent four-year bonds yielding 2·20 per cent and $30,000,000 3 per cent thirteen-year bonds yielding 3·29 per cent. An amount of $2,393,000 of temporary loans remaining unpaid is carried on the books of the dominion as an active asset.

There was also advanced to the Canadian National Railway Company $3,390,000 for the construction of the Senneterre-Rouyn branch line, $1,500,000 for the purchase of the capital stock of the Trans-Canada Air Lines and $7,040,000 as a temporary loan pending the passing of the 1938 budget of the Railway Company. A repayment of $394,000 was received on account of loans made in prior years for betterment and repairs to railway equipment. The net result of these various transactions was a reduction in government loans to the Canadian National Railways of $27,429,000, but an increase in our indirect liabilities of $50,000,000.

Mr. BENNETT: But according to the arrangement.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Other Loans and Investments

During the fiscal year, the government's purchases of Canadian Farm Loan Board 3½ per cent bonds amounted to $3,550,000, and of the board's capital stock to $282,000. An amount of $10,000 was advanced to the board as initial capital under the authority of the Fisherman's Loan Act. A further amount of $6,000 was advanced to the board to cover losses on operations in respect of loans made under the provisions of part II of the Canadian Farm Loan Act. As at March 31, 1938, the total investment by the Government of Canada in the farm loan board had reached $31,598,000.

An amount paid out by the government during 1937-38 on loans approved under the terms of the Dominion Housing Act totalled $1,679,000. The dominion's share of such loans is not in excess of 20 per cent of the lending value of each property financed under the act and is paid out from time to time as required after loans are approved.

During the year $1,891,000 was advanced to the National Harbours Board for the ports of Montreal and Vancouver for capital purposes. These loans are considered as active assets, as both these ports have paid a substantial part of the interest accrued on their obligations held by the government.

A loan of $500,000 was made to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation to assist in the building of two broadcasting stations.

Owing to the winding up of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine, it was necessary to provide $450,000 by way of loan to the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited for working capital purposes.

Loans to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company made in previous years for relief purposes were reduced by $211,000. In addition, railway equipment was purchased to a value of $89,000 which in turn was leased to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

The dominion's investment in the government of Roumania's bonds was increased by $359,000 due to the receipt of bonds representing an adjustment for interest unpaid in 1931.

A repayment of $1,422,000 was received during the year in reduction of loans to provinces for housing purposes, made under the act of 1919. The increase in active loans to the soldier settlement board amounted to $505,000, which was more than offset by a write-off of $750,000 to consolidated fund.

The following is a statement of the amount of loans and investments made during the last fiscal year which are regarded as active assets, and the comparable figures for the four preceding years:

LOAN FLOTATIONS

The fiscal year under review witnessed a heavy amount of government financing. Obligations of the government falling due during the year, including $52,000,000 of sterling issues maturing on July 1, 1938 which it was considered wise to provide for by prior financing, totalled $321,920,508 and both my predecessor and myself had looked forward, perhaps at times with a little misgiving, to the magnitude of the task which the year 1937-38 would bring. I am now pleased to be able to report that all this financing was successfully accomplished, and the maturing obligations were paid off or refunded at a substantial interest saving to the country. New dominion obligations were floated to a total amount of $295,460,138, and the maturing obligations were redeemed out of the proceeds of these new issues and out of cash of $26,460,370 supplied directly from the treasury.

In the table which I now place on Hansard full details of the amounts and terms of each of the new issues and of the prices at which they were sold are set forth.

Issued in January, 1938, to provide funds to pay off bonds aggregating $52,327,237, which are to mature in London on July 1, 1938.

As a result of these refunding operations during the past fiscal year the government has effected a saving in interest charges of $6,342,000 per year. Since the present government took office in October, 1935, the refunding operations which have been carried out have effected an annual saving of over $10,200,000. In addition the calendar year 1937 saw the elimination of the last two tax-free bond issues sold to the public during the war period. These two issues—the five per cents maturing on March 1st, 1937, and the five and one-halfs maturing on December 1st, 1937—had been outstanding in total amount of over $326,000,000, and they required an annual interest payment of over $17,485,000. The fact that these tax-free issues have been replaced by taxable issues means that in future years our income tax revenues should be substantially increased. It is impossible to determine precisely what this increase should be, but if we assume that the cash proceeds of the two tax-free issues were reinvested by their former holders to yield an average return of 3½ per cent and if we assume that these holders paid an average rate of tax on this income as low as the corporate rate, namely, 15 per cent, the estimated annual increase in income tax revenues would be over $1,700,000.

During the year we continued the established practice of offering fortnightly issues of three months' treasury bills. While the primary purpose of these offerings is to assist in the effective functioning of the short-term money market by keeping available at all times a reasonable amount of liquid credit instruments of the highest grade, they also serve, of course, to provide a revolving fund of cash which is available at very low interest rates. The last issue of treasury bills during the fiscal year 1937-38 was sold at what was up to that time the record low yield of ·524 per cent. Since that time, however, rates have tended still further downwards, and our latest offering, dated June 1st, was sold on a yield basis of ·466 per cent. The average cost to the treasury of funds obtained by the twenty-four offerings made during the fiscal year was a yield basis of ·689 per cent. The total amount of treasury bills outstanding on March 31st, 1938, was $150,000,000, the same as was outstanding a year previously.

NATIONAL DEBT

As of March 31st, 1938, the outstanding unmatured funded debt and treasury bills of the dominion, less sinking funds, amounted to $3,248,900,000. Adding to this amount $287,400,000 of other liabilities, consisting chiefly of annuity, insurances and superannuation funds, post office saving deposits and certain trust and contingent accounts, we arrive at gross liabilities for the dominion of $3,536,300,000. Active assets, including cash on hand and investments, amounted to $438,573,000. After deducting the latter figure from the gross liabilities we reach an estimated net debt of $3,097,727,000 as at the close of the fiscal year. The increase over last year of $13,775,000 represents, of course, the amount of the over-all deficit to which I have previously made reference.

I now place on Hansard a statement showing the assets and liabilities of the dominion as estimated as at March 31st, 1938.

INDIRECT LIABILITIES

Bonds and debenture stocks bearing the guarantee of the dominion outstanding in the hands of the public at the close of the last fiscal year amounted to $1,050,608,000. Canadian National Railway guaranteed obligations increased by $47,577,000 to $1,019,947,000 due to the issue of $50,000,000 guaranteed bonds to repay temporary loans obtained by the railway from the government for capital purposes, less retirements of serial issues in the amount of $2,423,000. Guaranteed bonds of harbour commissions and steamships decreased by $304,000 during the year under review.

There are also outstanding other contingent liabilities arising out of guarantees given under relief and other acts. During the fiscal year under review the only new guarantee was that under The Saskatchewan Seed Grain Loans Guarantee Act, 1936. Under provincial statutes the province of Saskatchewan guaranteed loans made by chartered banks to municipalities or to the Department of Municipal Affairs for seed grain assistance to farmers during the crop year 1936. The provincial guarantee is in turn supplemented by a dominion guarantee, the amount of which at March 31, 1938, was $2,555,000.

A similar arrangement was made under the terms of The Seed Grain Loans Guarantee Act, 1937, to provide for seed grain assistance to farmers in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta during the crop year 1937. Pending the submission of definitive documents no formal guarantee has yet been given by the dominion. The amounts involved for each province are approximately as follows: Manitoba, $130,000, Saskatchewan, $6,498,000 and Alberta, $911,000.

There were also outstanding at the close of the fiscal year guaranteed bank loans to the Canadian Wheat Board in the amount of $489,000 and to the Canadian Cooperative Wheat Producers Limited in the amount of $169,000 for the purchase of oats for the account of the province of Saskatchewan. The guarantee of the dominion to the Winnipeg Grain and Produce Clearing Association Limited, referred to in previous budgets, is still outstanding, although trading by the board in futures is very limited. No liability in connection with the guarantee accrues from day to day as margin deposits are made to the clearing association daily.

At March 31, 1938, home improvement loans had been granted by banks and approved lending institutions to home owners in the amount of $14,526,000. The dominion's contingent liability with respect to these home improvement loans is limited to 15 per cent of the aggregate of such loans made by each approved lending institution. As claims for losses have been paid in the amount of $2,500, our contingent liability as at March 31, 1938, was $2,176,400. While it is far too early to form any judgment as to what our ultimate losses may be, it is encouraging to note that at the end of the first 17 months of the operation of the plan, the loss ratio is insignificant, only 11 loss claims for $2,500 having been paid out of 37,108 loans in the total amount of $14,526,000. In terms of dollar losses to total volume of loans, this means a loss ratio over the seventeen months of only slightly over 1/60th of 1 per cent.

I shall now place on Hansard a statement of the principal amount of bonds and debenture stocks and other indebtedness guaranteed by the dominion outstanding at March 31, 1938.

I now come to that part of the budget for which you have all more or less patiently waited.

BUDGET FORECAST 1938-39

I have already stated that the over-all deficit for the past fiscal year is estimated at $13,775,000. In the budget a year ago, I forecast a deficit of $35,000,000, and stated that in accordance with the government's definite program of attaining the final objective of a balanced budget at the earliest practicable date, I hoped to wipe out the deficit altogether during the current fiscal year. While we have been able to do very much better than my forecast for 1937-38, conditions beyond our control have made it difficult, if not wholly impossible, to achieve the goal I had in mind for 1938-39.

The house will recall that the main and supplementary estimates, already submitted, call for total appropriations of $524,600,000. If we can judge by the experience of previous years, the departments will be able to effect considerable savings in their appropriations, and these savings, judging from experience, should be more than sufficient to offset any additional expenditures that may be authorized. I believe, therefore, that I am safe in estimating that total expenditures for the current fiscal year will not exceed $524,600,000.

Our revenue prospects for the full year will be greatly influenced by whether or not our hopes for a good wheat crop are realized and whether or not the current trend of business in the countries which constitute our chief markets show improvement during the next few months. However, two and one-half months of our current fiscal year have already elapsed and our revenues for this period provide a fairly good basis for estimating our total receipts for the year. On the basis of these partial returns and of a reasonable forecast of business prospects for the remainder of the year and allowing for the tax changes which I am about to announce, I estimate that for the year as a whole our aggregate revenue will approximate $501,700,000 made up as follows:

Taxation revenue:
Customs duties	$ 82,000,000
Excise duties	51,000,000
Income tax	138,000,000
Sales tax	125,000,000
Manufacturers', stamp, importation and other special taxes	39,000,000
Banks and insurance companies	1,950,000
Total taxation revenue	$436,950,000
Non-tax revenue:
Post office receipts	$ 35,000,000
Interest on investments	13,500,000
Other	13,250,000
Total non-tax revenue	$ 61,750,000
Total ordinary revenue	$498,700,000
Special receipts	3,000,000
Grand total revenue	$501,700,000

These estimates of revenue and expenditure indicate an estimated deficit for the current year of approximately $23,000,000. I do not think it will be larger than this. It may indeed be substantially smaller, if the west produces a good crop, if the business trend in the United States and other important countries is reversed at an early date, and if our own construction industry takes full advantage of the opportunities now afforded to it. I may add that the results of such favourable developments will not be wholly realized until next year and not be fully reflected in the government accounts until the next budget.

In view of the current business situation, we have not thought it wise to attempt this year to wipe out a possible deficit of the moderate proportions I have indicated by imposing further burdens upon industry and upon the people. On the contrary in the tax changes which are being proposed we are trying in the first place to eliminate certain anomalies and inequities and in the second place to make certain important adjustments designed to accelerate the forces making for business recovery.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Tax Changes

Under the Income War Tax Act, no changes will be made in the rates of tax on individual and corporate incomes. Amendments to this act, however, will include a provision to allow Canadian companies a deduction in respect of lump sum contributions to employees' pension funds covering past years' services, such deductions to be spread forward over a ten-year period. The government hopes that this concession will encourage the present tendency in industry to create pension funds for employees. Annuities received under the provisions of any will or trust will be made taxable. In respect of royalties paid abroad from sources within Canada, no deduction will be allowed on account of the amount of any such royalties passed on to another party. An amendment will also be made to assure that financial companies operating in the small loan field will in future be subject in all cases to the normal corporation tax rates. The gift tax provisions are to be amended in order to allow an exemption up to one-half of a person's taxable income less the amount of income tax paid. This is to meet the objection which has been raised in this house to the fact that the gift tax in its present form is unduly severe in its effects on gifts which were not made for the purpose of tax avoidance. At the same time, we propose to discourage still further the making of gifts for tax avoidance purposes by substantially increasing the rates applying to gifts in excess of the increased exemption. The new schedule of rates will be graduated from 5 per cent on gifts totalling $25,000 or less, up to 15 per cent on gifts of $1,000,000 and over.

Provision is also to be made to allow Canadian parent companies an exemption from corporation tax in respect of dividends received from wholly-owned non-resident subsidiaries if at least 75 per cent of the combined capital of the parent and subsidiary companies is employed abroad and if the country in which the subsidiary is located grants a like exemption to parent companies in respect of subsidiaries in Canada.

It is also proposed to insert a provision in the act designed to prevent taxpayers from effecting transactions, using persons or corporations abroad for the purpose of evading Canadian taxation and not for business reasons.

No changes are proposed in respect of rates of tax under the Excise Act.

Under the Special War Revenue Act, one important change and several minor ones are proposed. The minor changes, include an amendment to exempt from the sales tax feed for all fur bearing animals, harness, harness parts and materials used in the manufacture thereof, ingredients used in making gopher poison, and materials for the repair of fishermen's boats. Another amendment provides that in future the special excise tax on tires and tubes will in no case be levied when the items in question are for original equipment of automotive vehicles including tractors, trucks, trailers and motor cycles.

I come now to the most important change in taxation which the government proposes. Starting to-morrow the major products used for the building of houses, will be given complete exemption from sales tax. It is proposed that this exemption from sales tax shall cover all lumber, sashes, doors, laths, and shingles; bricks, building tile, building blocks, cement, stone, plaster and lime; plaster boards, fibre board, insulating materials, building paper and wallpaper; paints, varnishes, white lead and paint oil; prepared roofings; glass for buildings; plumbing fixtures, not including piping and pipe fittings; furnaces for heating buildings; builders' hardware; and some other minor items. It will be realized, I am sure, that an exemption of the type here attempted presents considerable difficulties, and it was found impossible to provide specific exemption in respect of all the hundreds of various miscellaneous items entering into the construction of houses. It was necessary to make a selection but all the important materials which have their primary or predominant use in house-building are included. Accordingly, lumber, for example, although having many other uses, will be tax-exempt no matter for what purpose it is used. This will be the case with all the items exempted.

I believe the house will agree that this proposed tax change is highly constructive. Coupled with the various legislative measures which the government has already introduced, this tax reduction should act as a further powerful stimulus to the construction industry. If these various measures now before the house result in restoring normal construction activity, a large proportion of our remaining employable unemployed will go back on the payrolls of industry and to self-reliant citizenship. These important objectives are in my opinion ample justification for so radical a proposal. I need only add that the benefits of these tax reductions must be passed on to the consumer, and personally I am confident that the construction industry, for which so much is being done, will rise to the occasion with a renewed efficiency and vigour worthy of the great opportunity now presented to it.

TARIFF AND TREATY NEGOTIATIONS

For reasons which I believe will commend themselves to the house, I am not proposing any amendments to the customs tariff in the present budget resolutions. It is true that the government had hoped that it would be found feasible to deal with a new United States agreement as part of this year's budget. Circumstances, however, have compelled us to abandon that expectation and the government, therefore, is not proposing any changes in the Canadian tariff pending the satisfactory conclusion of the negotiations now in progress.

In the budget speech two years ago, I said, "Canada cannot give to-day and bargain to-morrow." It is even more true, Mr. Speaker, in the world as it is to-day that unilateral tariff reductions will not get the wider export markets which our products need and which the government is securing for them. Since the present administration came into office, Canada has been a contracting party to the two most comprehensive trade agreements that have been concluded since the great war. Our agreement with the United States in 1935 and our agreement with the United Kingdom in 1937 resulted in the reduction of effective duties on a wide range of Canadian imports. They also secured the enlargement and consolidation of marketing opportunities for Canadian exports in the two biggest import markets of the world, which in the last calendar year took between them about eighty per cent of Canada's total exports. They were long strides towards our goal—both in intra-imperial and international trade—of lowering tariff barriers and freeing trade from fettering restrictions. We are now ready for further progress in this direction and we hope to take it in concert with the United Kingdom and the United States.

No commercial treaty policy can, in the nature of things, ensure against the disturbing influences on our national economy of industrial depression to the south of us, or of wars and rumours of wars to the east and the west of us. These disturbing influences are apparent from the most casual scrutiny of our trade returns. The returns reveal an expansion of those exports for which demand has been increased by the fears of war, and at the same time a falling off in the value of those exports for which demand depends on peace and prosperity in the countries which normally buy our goods. This is not, fundamentally, a healthy condition. The world itself is not in a healthy condition and Canada's economic relations with the outside world reflect the disturbances beyond our frontiers.

I see no reasonable hope of restoring normal trade relations except by a vigorous prosecution of the policy of tariff reduction through bilateral trade agreements, a policy for which this government has stood since its entry into office. For better or worse, the force of circumstances has eliminated at least for the present the alternative approaches of unilateral or universal action. The United States is not prepared to reduce its tariffs except by way of trade agreements, and the United Kingdom is now pursuing a similar policy. This being the present attitude of our two best customers, it is surely apparent that Canada should try to reach agreement with them rather than to pursue at this time an isolated policy of further unilateral tariff reductions. I do not think there should be any real difference of opinion as to where the national interest of this country lies. It is bound up inseparably with the restoration of free and stable international trading conditions. Every effort in that direction has had and will continue to have our wholehearted support and practical cooperation.

It would not be proper for me, at this time, to make any statement with regard to the negotiations looking toward the conclusion of new trade agreements between Canada and the United States, and the United States and the United Kingdom, which have been pursued steadily in Washington for some months now. We have embarked, it is true, on a big and difficult undertaking which for its successful completion will require the continuing collaboration in good faith of all the countries concerned. We believe that all the benefits of the good neighbourhood which we in Canada appreciate in our relations with the United States of America can be fully realized only through closer cooperation in the economic field between the United States and all the countries of the British commonwealth. The process of translating these hopes, which we all share, into concrete results has been difficult and protracted. In the present instance, it is clear that if we are to find fair and practicable solutions to the problems involved, Canada must make its contribution along with the rest towards a general settlement. It is perhaps true that in some areas and in some industries we have been enjoying the best of both worlds, and it has been argued, therefore, that our interest is to sit tight and exploit such privileges for what they are worth—while they last. Such an attitude is obviously shortsighted; it is certainly not the policy of this government, which is striving, on the basis of reciprocity and fair dealing, to work out trade arrangements with all nations which will serve the best interests of Canada as a whole.

I shall not attempt to prophesy the consequences that may follow from a successful completion of the present negotiations. I cannot refrain, however, from reminding the house that proof of the will and capacity of the countries of the British commonwealth of nations and the United States of America to cooperate in the field of trade will be a political fact of world importance. Conversely, the acknowledgment of inability to do so would limit the influence of the great democracies as a stabilizing factor in a disturbed world. The economic benefits of success in our efforts would not be confined to the trade and prosperity of the countries directly engaged in these negotiations. They would, through the application of the policy of equal treatment in commercial matters, be shared in some degree by every country in the world. The progressive reduction of the tariffs of the great trading nations will undoubtedly lessen the present strains under which the economies of many less fortunate nations are labouring. It should help to turn the nations of the world away from economic nationalism which is both a cause and a consequence of the growing fear of war.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I do not exaggerate when I say that the fate of civilization to-day depends on whether the qualities of toleration, of good-will, of friendly cooperation, of ability to take the far-sighted view and of willingness to sink differences of lesser importance for the sake of the larger interest triumph in human affairs. If I may say so, these old-fashioned qualities are needed not only in international affairs but in the day to day relations between individuals, social groups and political bodies in this country. In spite of all our difficulties, I am confident that the Canadian people possess these qualities to a degree which will ensure continuous and progressive development of a united Canada.

RESOLUTIONS

Mr. Speaker, I beg to give notice that when we are in committee of ways and means I shall move the following resolutions:

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:

1. That lump sum payments made in Canada, which sever the funds permanently from the assets of the payor company, for the establishment of superannuation or pension fund plans with a view to providing benefits for employees in respect of past years' services, shall be allowed as a deduction to the extent of one-tenth of such lump sum payments in each of ten successive years, commencing the year in which the payment is made; provided that in the case of superannuation or pension fund plans heretofore established by lump sum payments the said deduction shall commence in the year 1938 and continue thereafter until ten years shall have elapsed from the date of the initial payment.

2. That every corporation, the main business of which is the making of small loans shall, notwithstanding any other provision contained in the Income Tax Act, be subject to normal corporation rates of tax.

3. That annuities received under the provisions of any Will or Trust shall be taxable income of the recipient. Such annuities shall be taxable for the year 1937 and each year thereafter notwithstanding when the Will or Trust became effective.

4. That the Gift Tax shall not apply to any gifts made in any year by an individual the aggregate value of which in such year does not exceed an amount equal to one-half of the difference between the income which was subject to income tax in the previous year and the income tax payable thereon. Any enactment founded on this resolution shall be applicable to gifts made in the calendar year 1938 and thereafter.

5. That the rates of tax set forth in the schedule to the Gift Tax be increased as follows:

On gifts up to and including $25,000—from 2 per cent to 5 per cent.

On gifts exceeding $25,000 but not exceeding $50,000—from 3 per cent to 6 per cent.

On gifts exceeding $50,000 but not exceeding $100,000—from 4 per cent to 7 per cent.

On gifts exceeding $100,000 but not exceeding $200,000—from 5 per cent to 8 per cent.

On gifts exceeding $200,000 but not exceeding $300,000—from 6 per cent to 9 per cent.

On gifts exceeding $300,000 but not exceeding $400,000—from 7 per cent to 10 per cent.

On gifts exceeding $400,000 but not exceeding $500,000—from 8 per cent to 12 per cent.

On gifts exceeding $500,000 but not exceeding $1,000,000—from 9 per cent to 14 per cent.

On gifts exceeding $1,000,000—from 10 per cent to 15 per cent.

Any enactment founded on this resolution shall be applicable to gifts made in the calendar year 1938 and thereafter.

6. That royalties paid by persons abroad out of royalties received from sources within Canada shall not be allowed as a deduction in determining net royalty income from sources within Canada.

7. That if any person or corporation ordinarily resident in Canada effects any transaction which at any stage makes use of any person or corporation ordinarily resident abroad, and which has the effect of reducing the liability to taxation under the Act of such person or corporation ordinarily resident in Canada, such person or corporation ordinarily resident in Canada, shall continue to be liable to taxation under this Act to the same extent as if the transaction had not taken place. This provision shall apply to any transaction only if the Treasury Board upon a reasonable interpretation of the evidence available makes a ruling that the transaction was effected mainly for the purpose of avoiding liability to taxation under the Act. An appeal shall lie from any such ruling of the Treasury Board to the Exchequer Court of Canada.

8. That dividends received by Canadian parent companies from wholly-owned non-resident subsidiary companies shall be exempt from the corporation rate of tax if at least 75 per cent of the combined capital of the parent and subsidiary companies is employed abroad. Such exemption shall be granted only if and to the extent that the country in which the subsidiary company is located grants a like exemption to parent companies in respect of dividends emanating from subsidiary companies in Canada and shall not extend beyond dividends that are equal to profits that have been subject to tax abroad in the year previous to the year of declaration of the said dividends. Any enactment founded on this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force at the commencement of the calendar year 1938 and to be applicable to the calendar year 1938 and to fiscal periods ending therein and to all subsequent periods.

9. That any enactment founded on the provisions of these resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force at the commencement of the calendar year 1937 and to be applicable to the calendar year 1937 and to fiscal periods ending therein and to all subsequent periods, except as otherwise provided.

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

Resolved, That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Special War Revenue Act, chapter one hundred and seventy-nine of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927 and amendments thereto and to provide:

1. That Schedule III to the said Act being the list of articles exempted from the consumption or sales tax be amended by adding to the said Schedule the following:

"Materials for use exclusively in the manufacture of gopher poison;

Harness for horses and complete parts therefor and articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture thereof;

Feeds for fur-bearing animals whose pelts have commercial value;

Articles and materials for use exclusively in the equipment or repair of boats used by fishermen in the fisheries;

Bricks; building tile, building blocks and building stone; plaster; lime, cement; stucco and stucco dash;

Lumber; sash; doors; shingles; lath; siding; stairways; balustrades;

Plaster boards, fibre boards, wallpaper, building paper, and materials manufactured wholly or in part of vegetable or mineral fibre for wall coverings or building insulation;

Paints, varnishes, white lead and paint oil;

Prepared roofings;

Shower baths, bath tubs, basins, faucets, closets, lavatories; sinks and laundry tubs, not including pipes and pipe fittings;

Glass for buildings;

Furnaces for heating buildings;
Builders' hardware, namely: locks, lock sets, butts, hinges, pulleys and window fasteners.

2. That Schedule II to the said Act be amended by striking out the following words in paragraph three thereof:

"Provided that the tax hereby imposed shall not apply to the goods mentioned herein, when sold to or imported by manufacturers of automobiles or chassis for the original equipment of such automobiles or chassis under the following conditions:

(i) If less than ten thousand automobiles or chassis are manufactured or produced per annum and at least fifty per centum of the factory cost of manufacturing or producing them, exclusive of duties and other taxes, is incurred in the British Empire;

(ii) If ten thousand automobiles or chassis or more are manufactured or produced per annum and at least sixty per centum of the factory cost of manufacturing or producing them, exclusive of duties and other taxes, is incurred in the British Empire;

Provided, however, that effective April 1st, 1938, the words "sixty-five" shall be substituted for the word "sixty" in this paragraph."
and substituting therefor the following:

"Provided that the tax hereby imposed shall not apply to the goods mentioned herein when used exclusively for the original equipment of such automotive vehicles."

3. That subsection two of section fifty-eight of the said Act be amended to provide that the excise tax payable upon the sale, transfer or assignment of any share at a price or valuation of one dollar shall be one-quarter of one cent per share.

4. That any enactment founded on this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the seventeenth day of June, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-eight and to have applied to all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

Hon. J. E. LAWSON (York South): Mr. Speaker, I desire to move the adjournment of the debate, and if the Prime Minister would be good enough to intimate whether Monday or Tuesday would in his opinion be most suitable to the house I should be glad to include the day in the motion.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Mr. Speaker, just whatever day will suit the convenience of hon. gentlemen opposite. We had thought of proceeding on Monday. I indicated that a day or two ago.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. LAWSON: Then, Mr. Speaker, I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

DEPARTMENT OF LABOUR

Employment Offices Coordination Act—
Administration, $63,925.

Payments to the provinces in connection with the organization and coordination of employment offices, $150,000.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): This was the item which was held at the request of the leader of the opposition pending the securing of some further information from the Department of National Defence.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): During my absence the other day some question came up with reference to the disposition of some horses, I believe, from project—

Mr. BENNETT: No; first, certain documents. This item is standing in order that I might be provided with a report which was made by Major, now Colonel Stethem, and the reply, and when the report reached here.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I will deal first with the first point, and then I will deal with the second. I have a memorandum here from the director of supply and transport, who says that prior to the date mentioned, namely June, 1936, all stores of whatever kind were transferred from project No. 37 to project No. 42, and the former project closed down. There were on charge to project No. 42, five horses. These had originally been on the strength of the Royal Canadian Artillery but became surplus and available for use with the unemployment relief work. These five horses were disposed of as follows: One was destroyed June 2, 1936, age nineteen; four were sold through the dominion salvage officer (salvage minute 8,849, dated June 8, 1936) to Mr. N. Greenlee, rural route No. 1, Joyceville, Ontario, for the sum of $300. The ages of these horses were sixteen, sixteen, fifteen and thirteen years respectively. So far as can be traced, the above were the only government owned horses employed on unemployment relief work in the Kingston area at the time of closing down the project.

The second request made by the right hon. gentleman came up during the last evening I was present. The first statement made by him was that a report had been made by the commandant of the Royal Military College.

Mr. BENNETT: Excuse me; he said no such thing. What he said was that there was a report made which was in the hands of the minister. He knew nothing of it. In consequence of what occurred here Friday night,—the minister was not in his place—I was in a position to state definitely there was a report by the officer administrating, which was placed in the central registry, and I gave the date.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The first remark made was that my right hon. friend believed there was a report made by the commandant. That was immediately investigated, and I told him later on that day that I was informed there was no such report. I believe that later on my right hon. friend suggested there was a report made through the quartermaster-general.

Mr. BENNETT: He asked if there was a report to the quartermaster-general.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I believe my recollection is correct. I will look up the question in Hansard. An immediate investigation was made, and it was found there was no report made through the quartermaster-general. What actually occurred was read in the house on Tuesday by the Minister of Labour. During the debate on Monday my right hon. friend suggested, I believe, that a report was made by Major Stethem to another officer of the Royal Military College.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister read what was said? That was made with leave, after what took place here on Friday.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I have accordingly since then made further investigations, and I have found that a letter was written by the officer in question on May 26. It was written to a fellow officer, the staff adjutant of the Royal Military College.

Mr. BENNETT: He is the person to whom Major Stethem should report.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Well, of course that is a matter of military etiquette which I do not choose to discuss with my right hon. friend at the present time. But a letter was written at the time to the staff adjutant. I shall read it. That letter arrived here yesterday at Ottawa by telephone message from the commandant of the Royal Military College. As far as my knowledge or recollection goes, I never saw this letter until it came in yesterday by telephone from the commandant at Kingston. Also the commandant stated yesterday over the telephone that he had never reported the letter to national Defence headquarters.

Mr. BENNETT: To whom did he say that? To the minister himself?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): To the adjutant general. I confirmed that by telephone, to the adjutant general yesterday, from the commandant at Kingston:

It will be remembered that on or about January 2nd I made a verbal report to the effect following:

"At about 12.10 p.m. on January 2nd, a large dump truck, no. 33511-C, bearing the name of L. Drinka, was seen loading up and carting away a full load of several cubic yards of crushed stone by the stone crusher at the R.M.C. stone pile near Navy Bay. I was unable to get in touch with the R.M.C. constable who had orders to watch this stone pile.

"I followed this truck to see where the stone was being taken. The truck pulled up at the entrance to a laneway running off Sydenham street and the stone was delivered to a stone shed which was being converted into a garage, the floor of which was under construction. This shed was near Johnston street. I asked the driver where he got his instructions and he replied he had received orders to take it from Mr. Bert Stansbury."

As stated above, I reported this verbally to you and to the commandant R.M.C. I would like this verbal report made a matter of record in the R.M.C. central registry as, from reports I have received, it would appear very possible that this may become a subject of controversy at a later date.

That is to the best of my recollection the first I ever heard of that report, and I have reason to believe that the action was taken on a verbal report by the commandant before this letter was sent. That is all with regard to that.

Mr. BENNETT: There was a letter written by the Minister of Labour as acting Minister of National Defence which I was anxious to see.

Mr. ROGERS: My right hon. friend will recall that when he raised the point the other day I had been acting Minister of National Defence at that time, I said I had no recollection whatever of having received such a letter and having replied thereto, but I would immediately ascertain whether or not such was the case. I gave instructions at once to my own officers that they should examine the files of the Department of Labour to see if such a letter had been received and a reply made thereto. Search was made, and no such correspondence is in the files of the Department of Labour. I feel sure, however, that if such a letter had been received, it would probably have been in the files of the Department of National Defence, inasmuch as it pertained clearly to a matter which affected the operations of that department; but again, my information is such as confirms my own recollection that no such letter was received and no reply was made by me to it.

What I stated with regard to it was absolutely in accordance with the facts as I knew them, and that appears to be fully confirmed by the statement just made by the Minister of National Defence, namely that this report was filed with the staff adjutant, placed in the central registry there, and not forwarded to Ottawa. I should also like to point out that the information contained in the report just now given to the committee is substantially the information which I gave as coming from Mr. Stansbury when this matter was first brought to my attention, namely that a load had been taken and placed upon a roadway leading to his garage.

Mr. BENNETT: If two ministers say that they have no such document; that there is none on the file, for the moment I must accept that but I think a little clearer search would perhaps disclose a different result. The Minister of National Defence says that the contents of that note were not communicated to Ottawa; the Minister of Labour says that they were not communicated to him. Do I understand him aright?

Mr. ROGERS: Most certainly. I said the other day that I had no recollection whatever of having received such a letter, but that I would immediately make an effort to ascertain whether any such letter could be found. If it could have been found, it would have been placed on the table before now.

Mr. BENNETT: If that be so, it is obvious that the minister did not send a reply to anyone, and for the moment I have to accept that statement. It will be observed that Major Stethem says that this stone was used in the construction of the garage.

Mr. ROGERS: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Excuse me, the floor of the garage—in the conversion of a shed into a garage. The document is laid on the table, I take it, inasmuch as it is a public document. Is that the original?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): It was telephoned yesterday from Kingston.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to ask for it that I might read it. One section of it I have not seen. I assume that this is what he reported:

> I followed this truck to see where the stone was being taken. The truck pulled up at the entrance to a laneway running off Sydenham street and the stone was delivered to a stone shed which was being converted into a garage, the floor of which was under construction. This shed was near Johnston street.

That is the shed which was owned by Mr. Stansbury. I assume that the Minister of Labour has satisfied himself as to why Major Stethem made the report that he did. The real difficulty about this lies in the fact that under our system of accounting we can have no public accounts inquiry with respect to these matters until the auditor general's report is filed, and the auditor general's report covering this matter will not be tabled in this house until next year. Ordinarily a meeting of the public accounts committee would be called; witnesses would be brought and evidence produced, so that there would be no difficulty at all on that score. But we found, to our dismay, on one occasion in this house that inasmuch as the transactions were not within the period of time covered by the auditor general's report as tabled, nothing could be done until the next year; and in view of the importance of the whole question to the general conduct of public business it was thought desirable that it should be discussed here.

I find, on looking through Hansard, that the hon. gentleman is entirely in error when he asserts that any effort was made to attack him in the first observations that I made in connection with the abuse of patronage at Kingston. I endeavoured to point out to him that a condition had prevailed there in years gone by which had been the subject matter of much acrimonious discussion in this house in 1911 and in succeeding years, with respect to penitentiary matters, with respect to the public service generally, and questions of that sort, and I pointed out to him that I believed and had hoped—and I gave my reasons for that hope—that he might be able to effect some improvement in the way of removing these abuses. I had been curious to watch and see what would happen, for the reasons I gave—I need not restate them—having regard to what was said in 1935; and now I say that so far as I can ascertain, there were on the Fort Henry job at one time four Conservatives, known to be such, who were allowed to work on it, apart from those who worked for the contractors. It may be the minister is right when he says that this was a contract made with the province. But if it is made with the province, I would point out that there were under the old contracts of the former government general powers of supervision with respect to the work itself. Leaving that out for the moment, it gets down to this: The minister gave certain dates with respect to the movement of cement, and I asked him the other day, Does he approve that way of transacting public business? These were not two contractors exchanging cement; the contracts provided that the province of Ontario was to provide the cement. It was the property of the crown in the right of that province, and the cement was to be delivered at a particular point, which was done. What happened is that the Frid Construction Company had a contract at Queen's university and one at Fort Henry; they took from time to time large quantities of cement from the car, as I pointed out, to Queen's university and placed it in bins, and at night the same trucker conveyed the paper bags which had contained the cement that had been left there, to Fort Henry. There was no one at the cars checking out the cement, and we were interested because half the cost of that is to be borne by the people of Canada. What I was endeavouring to ascertain was whether or not the minister had knowledge of the matter. I was only stating what the facts were; I was not endeavouring to suggest that he was personally responsible for what had been done. I was pointing out facts from which he draws an inference that I was not drawing at all, inasmuch as I was not drawing inferences but stating facts.

Mr. GRAY: Is it suggested that the Frid Construction Company was dishonest?

Mr. HOWE: You are attacking one of the most reputable firms in Canada, and through them the whole construction industry. Tell us whether you think they are dishonest.

Mr. BENNETT: I am reciting facts.

Mr. HOWE: What reason have you for stating them?

Mr. BENNETT: It is not for me to draw conclusions. I am telling the minister what the facts are, and I ask him whether he approves that method of dealing with public property.

Mr. ROGERS: The leader of the opposition has asked me a question—

Mr. BENNETT: Wait until I finish.

Mr. ROGERS: But you asked me a question.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not asking for the answer now. However, if the minister thinks that any advantage is being taken of him he can answer the question now.

Mr. ROGERS: I stated, when the question was first put to me, that I was absolutely convinced there was nothing dishonest in the transaction. In the first place, as the right hon. gentleman will understand, I do not know anything of the actual operating details of these contracts, nor did he or his Minister of Labour, in connection with joint works carried on with the provinces. Actually the contracts are let by the provinces, and the provision of materials is entirely a matter for the inspectors of the provincial department of highways. I stated further that I was informed, as soon as the matter was brought to my attention by the leader of the opposition, that this loan and replacement had been made with the knowledge and consent of the provincial department.

Mr. BENNETT: And I said it was not consented to until after. I asked him when consent was given.

Mr. ROGERS: I have a telegram just received from W. L. Somerville, the architect in charge of the work at Fort Henry. He was president of the Canadian Architects' Association last year—

Mr. BENNETT: What has he to do with it?

Mr. ROGERS: —and I assume my right hon. friend will have no complaint to make about the quality of his evidence.

Mr. BENNETT: What has he to do with the cement?

Mr. ROGERS: I might place this telegram on Hansard. It is addressed to me as Minister of Labour:

> In June, 1937, contractor at Fort Henry obtained permission to borrow cement which was duly returned.

He was the architect on the job, acting for the provincial department of highways.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not give any power with respect to this. I asked, when did the contractor obtain the consent? The minister said he had the consent of the provincial government.

Mr. ROGERS: In June, 1937.

Mr. GRAY: Where is the dishonesty?

Mr. BENNETT: In treating the property of the crown thus. This is not a case of two contractors. This is a case in which I say that without anyone checking the cement out of these cars, Drinka was hauling it to the Crain contract at Queen's university.

Mr. ROGERS: Both ways, in fact.

Mr. BENNETT: And he also was taking some to the fort. But he did take the paper bags to the fort, and the paper bags are the basis of the count that determines who shall pay.

Mr. HOWE: The counting of bags went out when the cloth bags went out.

Mr. BENNETT: Excuse me; it did not.

Mr. HOWE: They have no more importance than the paper bags you buy full of pop-corn.

Mr. BENNETT: I admit the hon. minister has had considerable experience, for some of which this country has paid.

Mr. THORSON: And got value for it too.

Mr. BENNETT: Go to Prescott. Let us go a step further. The minister says that paper bags are of no importance. But they give the count for the delivery, because there was no man there. That is the reason why they were preserved. As a contractor he should know that.

Mr. HOWE: I know no such thing. The delivery of sacks of cement is counted by the sacks themselves; the paper bags have no value as counters or in any other way. The right hon. member is talking about twenty years ago when cement was delivered in cloth sacks, and the bags had to be returned for credit.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the Minister of Transport is not going to get away with that sort of statement. He knows perfectly well the cloth bags were counted as they were delivered back to the company from which they came.

Mr. HOWE: And paid for.

Mr. BENNETT: And credit was given for them. The paper bags were counted merely for the purpose of ascertaining how many bags of cement had been delivered, which is an entirely different matter. This truckman loaded so many bags of cement, paper bags, he took them to Queen's, and from Queen's the empty bags were taken back to the fort. Why they were taken there I do not know—

Mr. HOWE: But the right hon. member insinuates.

Mr. BENNETT: I said the evidence was that they were taken there at night, and I asked why.

Mr. ROGERS: And you said it was dishonest.

Mr. BENNETT: So it is. It is a dishonest transaction for anyone to take cement belonging to the crown and use it on a private job on the say-so of the architect.

Mr. ROGERS: The architect was representing the provincial government and was in full charge.

Mr. BENNETT: He was in Toronto. The one to give the consent is the crown, who signed that contract.

Mr. ROGERS: He was representing the government.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. BENNETT: He did not represent the government with respect to that. It is distinctly provided, unless this contract is different from any other—and what is more, these contracts for joint work by the federal and provincial governments provided for supervision by the federal government.

Mr. GRAY: Does the right hon. gentleman say that this government lost any bags of cement in the transaction? That surely is the question.

Mr. BENNETT: I was observing, Mr. Chairman, when I was interrupted—

Mr. GRAY: Will the right hon. gentleman answer that?

Mr. BENNETT: When I was interrupted, Mr. Chairman—

Mr. GRAY: Will the right hon. gentleman answer that question?

Mr. BENNETT: This is the hon. member who examined with respect to the cost of my living, and I do not answer his questions, if I can avoid doing so.

Mr. GRAY: I suggest I made a fair job of it.

Mr. BENNETT: I have never forgotten that.

Mr. GRAY: I notice that.

Mr. BENNETT: I have now the document signed by the Canadian National—

Mr. SLAGHT: I rise to a point of order. Surely this debate can proceed without animosities and personalities of the kind the right hon. gentleman has just expressed.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not a point of order. I was interrupted in the course of my observation by questions which I do not see fit to answer and have no intention of answering from that source. And I have given my reasons. I think there is nothing that is personal about that.

I say that not only is it bad practice, it is dishonest for any contractor to take cement from a car of cement consigned to the crown at Kingston or anywhere else under the circumstances that this cement was taken. The matter has developed to this point, that we cannot have the public accounts committee investigate it this year, but surely we can have an adequate and proper investigation with respect to it at the right time. I say that the evidence discloses such a condition as should not exist with respect to public property. That is what I say. And I believe the people everywhere think so. I brought the matter to the attention of the minister for the purpose of having him make the necessary changes to see that we do not have that sort of thing taking place. He has become angry, abusive, has said many things which he should not have said; and I still bring these matters to his attention as indicating the conditions that exist at Kingston with respect to these contracts and with respect to the conduct of public business. I pointed out that I am not responsible, but I said that reputable persons saw a letter written to the Abramsky people who said they gave this man Stansbury $100 to be put on the list—

Mr. ROGERS: May I answer that? I always find it a little difficult to keep up with these charges.

Mr. BENNETT: These are not charges.

An hon. MEMBER: What are they?

Mr. ROGERS: I at once took the matter up with Mr. Stansbury and he told me immediately that there was no basis for it. I said, If that is the case, Abramsky should himself write a letter at once to that effect. And he did.

Mr. BENNETT: Which one of them?

Mr. ROGERS: Only one of them was in the city at the time; the other was in Boston. But he vouches for the truth of the statement—

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister will read the letter.

Mr. ROGERS: If they had both been there, I naturally would have had both sign the letter. This letter is addressed to A. E. Stansbury, and reads as follows:

> For your information and following up statement made on official report, Hansard, dated June 10, page 4072, the writer and his brother did not give Mr. Stansbury any moneys.
> My brother is out of the city when I make this statement and I have an idea that he was joking with some member of the Conservative party that may have been a friend of his.
> In closing, I assure you that no moneys have been paid by my brother or myself to Mr. Stansbury or any other individual in the Liberal party.
>
> Yours very truly,
> (Signed) Harry Abramsky.

Mr. BENNETT: That proves exactly what I said, that Mr. Abramsky said he did pay $100. Now he says he was joking.

Mr. ROGERS: But when my right hon. friend made this statement he said he made it on the basis of something someone had heard in the presence of two credible witnesses; but my right hon. friend has never mentioned a single name in connection with this or much more of the information or misinformation that he has brought to the attention of this committee.

Mr. BENNETT: It would seem to be abundantly established by Abramsky himself.

Mr. ROGERS: Why does my right hon. friend bring gossip into this place?

Mr. BENNETT: He established it without any difficulty.

The CHAIRMAN: It is six o'clock.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

After Recess

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, during the period that elapsed from the last time we had the matter under consideration until to-day I looked up the record, and I point out to the minister that I made it abundantly clear that no one expected him to do the impossible. In the very first discussion which took place I made it clear that there were a number of questions in connection with patronage. I was discussing that; and I said that the statement made by the Prime Minister the other evening had been highly satisfactory, and that I had said, "splendid," because his statement indicated he thought matters in these days at least should be conducted in a different way. Then I told the minister I would direct his attention to two or three matters in his own constituency. Whereupon this long discussion has taken place.

I repeat that if you take the record produced this afternoon, alone, the evidence indicates a condition which is not satisfactory; whether it be the Rollands case or the Marshall case or some other case, is not a matter of importance. I use the words I used then; being a substantial taxpayer I decline to believe that this government has a right to say that my taxes are to be used for the purpose of paying only those men who support the government and who are opposed to me. I say that is not sound.

The other evening I thought the statement made by the Prime Minister was an admirable one, and I said, "splendid," in answer to it, and asked the minister to give effect to it. That is all. I made the request as quietly and calmly as I could at that time, but apparently brought about a great deal of annoyance and anger. And the minister ever since has shown much animosity about the matter.

All I want to say is this: The answers then given had nothing to do with the case at all. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) rose in his place and read a declaration of a cheese inspector in eastern Ontario, an admirable man I am told, who makes a declaration that says nothing. He says that the bin would hold fifty tons of coal. This was a matter which was discussed during the course of the election, and I do not propose to endeavour to discuss it to-night, except to say that Mr. Sowards is perfectly content and willing to have the matter dealt with at once. What was said by the Minister of National Defence is at variance with what was said by me. He said it was some labour matter. Unfortunately, in the order in council the blame was put upon the deputy minister, and it turned out he had nothing to do with it at all.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): On a point of order, every order in council is prepared on the recommendation of the deputy minister of the minister concerned. There is nothing unusual in the slightest degree in the order in council.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say anything about its being unusual; I said that the deputy minister was blamed for something with which subsequent events disclosed he had nothing at all to do. The record shows that.

As a second line of defence the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien) read a statement from the records that were brought down on June 9 last. It is dated Thursday, June 9, and the motion, which was made only a few days before, limits the papers in this case to those between August 20, 1935, and October 15, 1935, and no others. The papers were asked for on June 6 and submitted on June 9, and limited to the two dates, August 20, 1935, and October 15, 1935.

Mr. GRAY: Is it suggested there are any other papers?

Mr. BENNETT: On that it is alleged there was a conspiracy to debauch three constituencies in western Canada. I propose to place upon Hansard the record, and when that record is placed upon Hansard, I may be wrong, but my experience of the fair-minded attitude of the citizens of this country induces me to believe that they will attach the blame, not against me, but against those who did this thing.

Mr. GRAY: Again I ask the right hon. gentleman: Is it suggested there are other papers?

Mr. BENNETT: The letter is dated June 7, 1935—

Mr. GRAY: On a point of order, the right hon. gentleman has in my opinion suggested that there are papers missing from the return brought down on the motion of the hon. member for Provencher. No other interpretation can be placed upon my right hon. friend's words. I ask that he answer.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no point of order there. The rules of order are plain about that. The order of this house was circulated—

Mr. GRAY: Mr. Chairman, I do think a point of order should—

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot be interrupted in this way by hon. members who rise and talk about a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member has raised a point of order.

Mr. BENNETT: He cannot raise a point of order to destroy the proceedings, when there is no possible point of order.

Mr. GRAY: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, do you rule that the hon. member for Provencher brought down to this house a complete file in relation to the matter?

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order raised by the hon. member for Lambton West is that the right hon. the leader of the opposition is inferring that all the papers are not on the file. Is that the point of order?

Mr. GRAY: Yes.

The CHAIRMAN: I think the point of order is well taken.

Mr. BENNETT: I repeat, Mr. Chairman, so that there may be no misunderstanding, that the order of this house was to produce papers only from August 20, 1935, to October 15, 1935. That is what I said, and I repeat it. I hold the return in my hand. In view of the fact that the rules say that one cannot attribute motives to any hon. member, what is the point of order that is well taken?

The CHAIRMAN: I have given my ruling.

Mr. BENNETT: What is it? I do not know, nor does anybody else.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What was the complaint in the first instance in regard to the return?

Mr. BENNETT: If the Minister of National Defence had been following, he would have observed I said that on June 6 the hon. member for Provencher moved for certain papers, which were brought down on June 9. Great promptitude! They are limited in the motion to those between August 20, 1935, and October 15, 1935, and no other dates.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): What is wrong with that?

Mr. BENNETT: I merely recite the fact; that is all. Whereupon a member of this chamber suggests that someone is inferring something. I am not inferring anything at all. I am making a statement of fact that a motion of this house was made to produce papers, at the instance of the hon. member for Provencher, limited from August 20, 1935, to October 15, 1935.

Mr. GRAY: Let us understand it then.

Mr. BENNETT: And the highways to which reference is made are the Piney highway, the Sprague-Morden highway, and the Brandon-Clear Lake highway in Manitoba. Those highways have in part been completed since this government came into office, and the file contains papers with respect to them. But the motion is limited to October 15, 1935.

Mr. ROGERS: Subject to agreement we found when we came into office.

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly. I am bound to say that I have not been able to see the original file; that is in the possession of the hon. member for Provencher.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I rise to a point of order.

Mr. BENNETT: Another point of order.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The right hon. gentleman has no right to impute motives to any member of the house, or to say things that are untrue. I have not the file in my office.

Mr. BENNETT: I inquired of the office downstairs for the original file. I asked to see it just before coming in here to-night, and I was told it had not been returned, that the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Beaubien), had it. Perhaps that statement was an error. I am stating the facts only as told me by the officials. I have what purports to be a copy. That is all I have been able to see up to the moment.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: I have just sent one of the page boys downstairs for the file itself. As soon as I get it I shall send it to my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: If my hon. friend is able to send for it, he must have control over it. The official of the house in charge of the office told me within the last twenty minutes that he had not the file.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): The file was produced as an official document of this house and any hon. member can see it.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. member for Provencher borrowed it.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Anyone can borrow it.

Mr. BENNETT: It had not been returned. I went downstairs to the office last week and I could not see it. I called to-night for it and it had not yet been returned. The Secretary of State circulated the order among the various departments. First of all, it went to the Minister of Public Works, and the reply was that there was nothing in the public works department. It then went to the Prime Minister's office and the reply was:

There is nothing on the files of the Prime Minister's office regarding this matter.

Edward A. Pickering,
Assistant Private Secretary.

Then we have the Department of Labour. I am going to place upon the record the story as it appears on this file. On July 23, 1935, the minister of public works and labour of Manitoba sent the following letter:

Department of Public Works and Labour
Minister's Office
Winnipeg,
23rd July, 1935.

Hon. W. A. Gordon,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Gordon:—

A large delegation interviewed the honourable premier and myself this morning in reference to the construction of a road, as a relief project, from a point four miles east of the town of Morden, thence easterly through the towns of Plum Coulee, Letellier, Dominion City, Stuartburn, Vita, Caliento, Sundown, Menisino and Piney, to the town of Sprague, an approximate distance of 115 miles.

Roughly estimated, this road will cost around $10,000 per mile, plus the construction of a bridge over the Red river at Letellier, which will cost in the neighbourhood of $125,000.

The delegates were very desirous of having this road constructed as an unemployment relief measure, and intimated that the dominion government would favourably consider same.

If you are prepared to do this as a relief measure, the province will undertake to do its part.

Yours very truly,
W. R. Clubb,
Minister of Public Works
and Labour

That is the first letter on the file, a letter from the minister of public works and labour of Manitoba seeking the construction of these roads.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is there any answer to that letter?

Mr. BENNETT: None here. Under date of July 27, 1935, there appears the following:

Department of Public Works and Labour
Minister's Office

Winnipeg,
July 27, 1935.

Hon. W. A. Gordon,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Gordon:

Last month when I was at Ottawa discussing relief projects that might be undertaken in this province, I submitted to Mr. Dickson, deputy minister, a list of same and in which was included the project known as the Piney highway.

This road was started in 1930 as a relief project and considerable work was done in that year and continued in 1931.

The list referred to above, I understand, Mr. Dickson referred to you but in your letter of June 27 you stated that you could not see your way clear to approve of any of this work other than that on the Trans-Canada highway and the Peace Garden road.

Since my return, I have had numerous requests asking me to again take up with you the matter of the completion of the Piney highway and to ask if you would be prepared to reconsider your previous decision.

This highway begins at the city of St. Boniface and runs in a southeasterly direction through the towns of Grande Pointe, Isle de Chene, Steinbach, La Broquerie and Piney and then five miles south to the international boundary, an estimated distance of ninety miles.

The estimated cost of this work is ten thousand dollars per mile less the forty miles which have already been graded.

I would appreciate it if you would let me hear from you in this regard.

Yours very truly,
W. R. Clubb,
Minister of Public Works
and Labour.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Any answer to that letter?

Mr. BENNETT: I am taking them from the file just in the order in which they come.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is no answer to that letter.

Mr. BENNETT: Then it was not necessary to ask. The next letter is dated August 23, 1935, and reads:

Conservative Dominion Headquarters
Province of Manitoba

August 23, 1935.

Dear Mr. Gordon:

I would appreciate it very much indeed, if you would kindly read the enclosed carefully. It does explain the situation, and means so much to us, and in view of the new conditions that have arisen owing to the rust and extreme heat on the crops, it might be good justification for really doing something at this time as a special consideration. There is not the question of a doubt but that if we do not do something, many hundreds and thousands of these people in these districts will be applying to the provincial and federal governments for assistance this winter.

Yours very truly,
R. H. Webb,
Director for Manitoba.

That is the next letter on the file. Attached to that is a letter marked "private and personal," written by Mr. Webb to Mr. Bennett. Copies are said to have been sent to the Honourable Wesley A. Gordon, K.C., M.P.; the Honourable J. Earl Lawson, K.C., M.P.; and the Honourable Doctor R. J. Manion, M.P. This letter is dated August 23, 1935, and reads:

The Right Hon. R. B. Bennett,
P.C., K.C., M.P.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

My dear Chief:

I have just come in from the constituencies of Lisgar, Provencher and St. Boniface particularly, and the situation at the moment is very good there politically, but it needs the necessary impetus to carry on.

I have already written to the Hon. J. E. Lawson, the Hon. R. J. Manion and the Hon. Wesley Gordon and the Hon. T. G. Murphy with regard to the two roads in these three constituencies that are vital factors to this election campaign, and they have the whole story in detail, both verbally and in writing.

In 1931 the federal government appropriated moneys for both of these roads. Both trunk highways enter the province of Manitoba, and as an unemployment relief measure, quite considerable work was done, which I think was shared by the federal and provincial governments fifty per cent each. The provincial government have or did apply again for these two roads to be carried on as an unemployment relief measure, but for some reason or other were more or less turned down as a matter of policy.

A new problem has arisen lately, which may be a good reason for reconsideration. As you know rust and extreme heat have destroyed the larger portion of our Manitoba wheat crop, and in some parts of Lisgar and Provencher especially it has created a very serious problem, and has left the farmers in a serious situation. My thought is that if your government will cooperate with the provincial government as an unemployment relief works measure, that work could be done on these roads that would give the farmers of these three constituencies plenty to do and help them to earn something, whereas if it is not done they possibly may appeal to the provincial and federal governments for some form of relief and for which we will get nothing, but on the other hand are perfectly willing to work themselves and use their teams and equipment. As a political measure, it assures us without any question of a doubt these three seats which we badly want to win, and which look very good for us at the present time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT: There will not be so much "hear, hear" when I finish. The letter continues:

The Liberal federal members in these three constituencies, supported to some extent, under cover, by provincial government members are endeavouring to blame the federal government for the fact that these two roads have not and will not be built, and it has become such a strong factor politically, that a great deal rests on a favourable decision being made.

May I intervene here to point out that according to the record the Liberal candidates in those constituencies were urging that these roads should be built and complaining that the federal government was not providing the means to have them built. That is the position at the moment.

Mr. GRAY: Read the next paragraph.

Mr. BENNETT: The letter continues:

I feel that we should play the game politically, call the provincial government's bluff, who have stated positively to delegates that they are prepared to put up dollar for dollar with the federal government in the building of these two roads as an unemployment relief works measure, and I understand, although I am not sure, that the provincial government have forwarded on letters of approval for both of these roads. They certainly did in their original letter of March or April 27, because I have a copy of it, and it was discussed at Ottawa with the Minister of Labour and the Hon. T. G. Murphy.

If the federal government would advise of participation in these two roads, it would be good politics; it would call the provincial government's bluff; it would kill the propaganda that the Liberals are carrying on at the present time; it would assure us of a victory in these three seats, and in my humble opinion, will not have cost the federal government anything, because by the time the work is organized, the election will be over, and winter will be upon us, and perhaps very little work will have been done before the end of the present financial year.

I am not for one moment endeavouring to justify that language. I did not write the letter. If I had written it—

Mr. GRAY: Couple that with paragraph 11 of the agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not write the letter. Just let me ask: Is there any member who has not received personal and private letters in which it has been urged that action should be taken because it would be good politically?

Mr. GRAY: But read paragraph 11 of the agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, will you be good enough to stop the interruptions?

Mr. GRAY: I would ask the right hon. gentleman to read paragraph 11 of the agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: I think I have the floor, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: I would point out to the hon. member that unless the leader of the opposition permits a question when he has the floor he cannot be asked questions.

Mr. GRAY: I am very sorry, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BENNETT: The letter proceeds:

The Hon. W. Gordon, the Hon. Dr. R. J. Manion and the Hon. T. G. Murphy know all about these two roads. They have the details, map locations and I believe thoroughly understand the situation. Our candidates are very alive to the situation, and no doubt have also been in touch with your own good self and the ministers, pointing out the actual situation and what it means. If it was not the right thing to do I would be the first to turn it down, but they are essential to the welfare of the province as a whole, running through two very thickly settled parts of the province, in fact the oldest settled parts, and there is not a road anywhere east of the Red river other than mud roads, and the people there are naturally aroused. I am not saying that it is a federal matter at all, we all know that, but as an unemployment relief works measure it is thought that something might be done, and particularly in view of the serious situation that has developed through rust and extreme heat in the crops of the farmers, and politically it means victory for us.

Yours very truly,
R. H. Webb,
Director for Manitoba.

Mr. DUFFUS: Might I ask the right hon. gentleman what Mr. Webb is director of?

Mr. BENNETT: I had not known him by that title until I heard it stated the other day. But it was stated then that he was director of the Conservative organisation in Manitoba.

Mr. DUFFUS: He is not personally the director of the road work?

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no, he is mayor of Winnipeg and was actively interested in politics.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING (reading):

Conservative Headquarters, Director in Chief for Manitoba.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I say. The The next letter is dated September 4, 1935, and is directed to Mr. W. M. Dickson, Deputy Minister of Labour, Ottawa:

Dear Mr. Dickson,—

I have received a telegram from the Minister of the Interior reading as follows:

"Regarding further works in the province of Manitoba which might be commenced for the relief of unemployment the following should I feel receive serious consideration: Construction of a highway leading south easterly from Winnipeg to the international boundary known as the Piney highway; construction of a highway from Morden eastward to connect with the Piney highway; construction of a highway from Russell to a point near Erickson to connect with the highway leading to the Riding Mountain park; construction of a bridge known as the Lens bridge Swan river district. The provincial government has addressed correspondence to the Department of Labour intimating their willingness to consider the construction of such highways and bridges as may be mutually agreed upon and to enter into a supplementary agreement in regard thereto."

Yours faithfully,

R. B. Bennett.

It was asked why that should be sent to the deputy minister and not to the minister. The answer appears in Mr. Clubb's letter to the minister. He said that he left his papers in regard to this matter with Mr. Dickson, because, the minister being absent, it was the custom to leave these matters with Mr. Dickson so that the minister would unquestionably receive them on his return.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: May I ask a question?

Mr. BENNETT: No. The next letter, which is dated September 4, 1935, reads:

Department of Public Works and Labour
Minister's Office,

Winnipeg,
September 4, 1935.

Hon. W. A. Gordon,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Gordon,—

Yesterday Senator Mullins, Mr. R. Peden, of Rossburn, and the Hon. Mr. Griffiths interviewed me with reference to the proposed gravelling of the road from Russell to Clear Lake via Silverton, Angusville, Birdtail, Rossburn, Olha, Oakburn, Menzie, Elphinstone, Sandy Lake and Rackham to Clear Lake highway.

This road, Mr. Peden informed me, had been approved by the parties interested at a meeting which he had attended. In discussing this matter Mr. Peden also informed me that Senator Mullins and himself had just returned from Neepawa where they had discussed the building of this road with the Hon. Mr. Murphy. They stated that Mr. Murphy had said that if I would write you requesting that this road be approved by you, as a relief project on the usual basis, that it would be built.

If this information is correct, and your government accepts this proposition, which we submitted to you on a previous occasion and which you refused, I take it that you would be prepared to draw up an agreement embodying this project, and forward same to me for signature.

Mr. Peden requested that I give you the approximate mileage and the estimated cost of this work which is as follows:

Mileage, 76 miles.

Estimated cost, $6,000 to $10,000 per mile, depending upon width of road.

I would appreciate hearing from you at your earliest convenience.

Yours very truly,

W. R. Clubb,
Minister of Public Works
and Labour.

Now no one asserts or has in this discussion asserted that Mr. Clubb was a supporter of the then government at Ottawa; no one has asserted that the Hon. Mr. Griffiths was a supporter of the government at Ottawa, and yet Mr. Griffiths, Senator Mullins and Mr. Peden, who was a supporter of the government, waited on Mr. Clubb, as the letter I have just read, dated September 4, 1935 indicates.

Then follows on the same day, September 4, 1935, a letter from the Department of Public Works and Labour, Winnipeg, as follows:

Hon. W. A. Gordon,—

Under date of July 27, 1935, I wrote you with reference to the Piney highway and also under date of July 23 with reference to the Sprague-Morden road. To date I have not heard from you with regard to the above projects and would appreciate it if you could give these matters your attention, and oblige,

Yours very truly,

W. R. Clubb,
Minister of Public Works
and Labour.

The committee will bear in mind that this letter was apparently written on the same day—whether before or after it does not indicate—it carries the same date as the previous letter containing the reference to the delegation consisting of Hon. Mr. Griffiths, who was an opponent of the then government at Ottawa, Senator Mullins and Mr. Peden.

Then on September 7, 1935, three days later, there was a telegram from Mr. Dickson, Deputy Minister of Labour, to Colonel G. C. MacLean, as follows:

Reference Mr. Murphy's telegram to Prime Minister re additional dominion assistance to provincial road construction kindly wire approximate mileage and cost per mile of proposed construction of road between Russell and point near Erickson on the Minnedosa-Clear Lake highway No. 26 referred to therein. At same time please indicate principal towns through which road passes.

W. M. Dickson,
Deputy Minister of Labour.

To which a reply was sent on the same day, a telegram to Mr. W. M. Dickson, Ottawa:

Replying telegram date regarding Russell Erickson road. Minister Public Works wrote Mr. Gordon September fourth and gave estimate of seventy-six miles at estimated cost of from six to ten thousand per mile. Engineers have not surveyed road so amount is approximate only. Principal towns Russell, Silverton, Angusville, Rossburn, Oakburn, Elphinstone, Sandy Lake.

Geo. C. Maclean.

Five days later, namely on September 12, 1935, we have a telegram from the Minister of Labour at Ottawa to the Minister of Public Works and Labour at Winnipeg:

Hon. W. R. Clubb,
Minister of Public Works and Labour,
Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Reference your letters fourth instant Piney highway Sprague Morden road and Russell Clear Lake road. Governor in council has now approved of supplementary agreement which authorized federal assistance to construction on the above highways also certain bridges and memorandum of agreement is being forwarded at once to the province.

W. A. Gordon,
Minister of Labour.

On the same date, September 12, Mr. Gordon writes a letter to Mr. Clubb, as follows:

Ottawa, September 12, 1935.

Dear Mr. Clubb,—

I forward herewith copies of agreement under the Relief Act of 1935 between the dominion and the province of Manitoba supplementary to the two agreements of July 10th and 15th respectively under the same act. Would you kindly have the same executed on behalf of the province and return one copy to me together with the authority for the duly authorized minister to sign on behalf of the province.

I have duly signed the enclosed copies of agreement on behalf of the dominion and enclose copy of P.C. 2851 of the 10th September, which is my authority so to do.

Yours very truly,
W. A. Gordon,
Minister of Labour.

I propose now to read the order in council which authorized the agreement, and the agreement itself:

P.C. 2851

Certified to be a true copy of a minute of a meeting of the committee of the privy council, approved by His Excellency the Governor General on the 10th September, 1935.

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report dated 9th September, 1935,—

That is two days after the date of the documents to which I have referred:

—from the minister of labour submitting:

(1) That parliament has enacted legislation which may be cited as the Relief Act, 1935;

(2) That clause 2 of the act provides, inter alia, that the governor in council may, upon such terms and conditions as may be agreed upon, enter into agreements with any of the provinces respecting relief measures therein;

(3) That the government of the province of Manitoba has signified a desire to enter into an agreement with the dominion under the aforesaid act respecting relief measures in the province, supplemental to the agreements authorized by orders in council P.C. 1769 dated June 28, 1935, and P.C. 2396 dated August 8, 1935.

The minister therefore recommends that he be authorized to enter into an agreement with the province of Manitoba on behalf of the dominion under the provisions of the Relief Act, 1935, in accordance with draft attached hereto.

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendations and submit the same for approval.

Signed, E. J. Lemaire,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

To The Honourable the Minister of Labour.

The next communication is, Canadian National Telegraphs, September 18, 1935:

Winnipeg.

W. M. Dickson,
Deputy Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ont.

Very large deputation appeared before provincial government this morning and urged that short stretch of road leading from proposed location of Piney highway to village St. Pierre be included as part of Piney highway under new supplementary agreement approved by province to-day. It is my understanding that representations have already been made to you asking that this road which is subsidiary to the Piney highway be included as part of Piney highway and on behalf of provincial government I recommend you grant this concession. Mileage six miles cost twelve thousand. Can be done within appropriation provided by agreement.

W. R. Clubb,
Minister of Public Works.

Under date of September 20 we have this letter:

Department of Public Works and Labour,
Minister's office,
Winnipeg.

The Hon. W. A. Gordon,
Minister of Labour,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Gordon,—

With reference to your letter of September 12, 1935, in which you enclose supplementary agreement between the dominion government and the province authorized by order in council P.C. 2851, I attach herewith certified copy of our order in council No. 1056/1935 authorizing me to sign this agreement on behalf of the province of Manitoba, and also original copy of agreement duly signed.

Yours very truly,
W. R. Clubb,
Minister of Public Works
and Labour.

Now we come to the order in council passed by the province of Manitoba, to which I direct attention, especially of those who endeavour to draw inferences and to distort the facts, because here is the basis so far as that province is concerned:

No. 1056/35

Copy of a report of a committee of the executive council approved by His Honour the Lieutenant Governor on September 30, 1935.

The Honourable the Minister of Public Works and Labour submits to council a report setting forth—

Whereas the parliament of the Dominion of Canada has enacted legislation which may be cited as "The Relief Act, 1935."

And whereas a letter signed by the Honourable Minister of Labour, W. A. Gordon, Ottawa, addressed to the Honourable W. R. Clubb, Minister of Public Works for the province of Manitoba, has been received advising that His Excellency, the Governor General in Council has authorized the Honourable Minister of Labour by order in council P.C. No. 2851, dated September 10, 1935, to enter into an agreement with the province of Manitoba.

And whereas a serious employment situation exists within the province, which necessitates the government of the province of Manitoba accepting the greatest measure of assistance which the Dominion of Canada will grant; it is therefore deemed advisable that the agreement with the government of the Dominion of Canada, as mentioned in the said letter of the Honourable Minister of Labour, be entered into.

That, Mr. Chairman, is the province of Manitoba speaking. It is not suggested, I hope, that I had anything to do with them.

And whereas a copy of the agreement duly signed by the Honourable Minister of Labour, together with copy of said order in council P.C. No. 2851 is attached hereto and marked "Exhibit A."

And whereas it is deemed advisable that the said agreement be executed and that the terms thereof be ratified and confirmed by the government of the province of Manitoba, and that the Honourable W. R. Clubb, Minister of Public Works and Labour, be authorized to carry out the terms of the agreement on behalf of the province of Manitoba and to proceed with the construction of all or any of the works.

In the recommendation of the Honourable the Minister, the Committee advise—

That the Lieutenant Governor in Council approve, and it is hereby approved, that the agreement hereinbefore referred to, copy of which is hereto attached and marked "Exhibit A," be ratified and confirmed by the government of the province of Manitoba, and that the Honourable W. R. Clubb, Minister of Public Works and Labour, be and is hereby authorized and empowered to execute such agreement on behalf of the government of the province of Manitoba, and to carry out the terms of the agreement and to proceed with the construction of all or any of the works mentioned in the agreement, copy attached.

Certified
(Signed) J. L. Johnston,
Clerk, Executive Council

Winnipeg, Man.
September 18, 1935.

(The Honourable Mr. Bracken in the chair.)

That is the position up to that date. Now we come to the agreement, and I am most anxious that every word of that agreement should be studied, because it is the agreement which the province of Manitoba approved without any suggested variation or amendment in any way, shape or form.

Supplementary agreement re provincial highways and bridges, Manitoba. The Relief Act, A.D. 1935.

Memorandum of agreement entered into this twentieth day of September, A.D. 1935—

The "twentieth" date comes about by reason of the fact that no date was filled in, and on return of the document to Ottawa Mr. Hereford pointed out that no date had been filled in, and so he filled in the twentieth, being the date of the letter enclosing it.

Memorandum of agreement entered into this twentieth day of September, A.D. 1935 between

His Majesty the King in the right of the Dominion of Canada (hereinafter called the "dominion"), represented herein by the Honourable Wesley A. Gordon, Minister of Labour, of the first part,
and

His Majesty the King in the right of the province of Manitoba, hereinafter called the "province," represented herein by the Honourable W. R. Clubb, Minister of Public Works, of the second part.

Whereas The Relief Act, 1935, empowers His Excellency the Governor General in Council upon such terms as may be agreed upon to enter into agreements with any of the provinces of Canada respecting relief measures therein and, for that among other purposes of that act, to authorize the payment out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada of such moneys as may be necessary;

And whereas the province, for the purpose of obtaining financial assistance in the execution of measures for the relief of distress within it has requested His Excellency the Governor General in Council, in addition to the agreements respecting relief measures authorized by orders in council P.C. 1769 dated June 28, 1935, and P.C. 2396 dated August 8, 1935, to enter into this agreement and he, concurring and having approved of its terms and conditions has authorized the Honourable Wesley A. Gordon, Minister of Labour of Canada, to execute the same on behalf of the dominion;

Now therefore it is agreed by and between the parties hereto as follows:

1. The dominion will pay to the province fifty per centum (50%) of the amount expended by the province during the term of this agreement on the construction and/or improvement of the following provincial highways exclusive of the cost of lands and/or damages to lands namely,

(a) A provincial highway, including the construction of necessary bridges and culverts thereon, from a point at or near the town of Russell, easterly to a point on the Brandon-Clear Lake highway to be agreed upon in writing by the parties hereto, a distance of approximately 76 miles, maximum dominion contribution three hundred and eighty thousand dollars ($380,000).

(b) Provincial highway number three, including the construction of a bridge over the Red River at or near the village of Letellier and all other necessary bridges and culverts, from a point at or near the town of Morden, easterly to a junction with the Winnipeg-Piney highway at a point near Piney thence easterly to the village of Sprague, a distance of approximately 115 miles, maximum dominion contribution five hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars ($575,000).

(c) A provincial highway, including the construction of necessary bridges and culverts, from a point at or near the city of St. Boniface south-easterly to the international boundary at a point approximately five (5) miles south of the village of Piney, a distance of approximately ninety (90) miles; maximum dominion contribution two hundred and fifty thousand dollars ($250,000).

It is understood and agreed between the parties hereto that the dominion will not contribute to a cost in excess of an average of ten thousand dollars ($10,000) per mile, in relation to any of the highway projects described in this agreement.

2. The dominion will pay to the province fifty per centum (50 per cent) of the amount expended by the province during the term of this agreement for the construction of the following bridges over the Assiniboine river, exclusive of the cost of lands and/or damages to lands, namely:

(1) At or near the village of Headingly, total estimated cost $30,000; maximum dominion contribution $15,000;

(2) Between the city of Winnipeg, authority P.C. 354, dated February 12, 1936—

I have not the original, but obviously 1936 must be an error, or the document that I have here is not the original.

Mr. HOWE: I have here the original, which I will send across to the right hon. gentleman if he likes.

Mr. BENNETT: Thanks. Here it is:

Between the city of Winnipeg, authority P.C. 354, dated February 12, 1936—

Obviously, Mr. Chairman, we had better stop this now. Here is a document produced with reference to something that occurred between two dates, one, the twentieth day of August, 1935, and the other the fifteenth day of October, 1935. Being unable to get the original, and reading from the copy, I thought the date set out here was a typographical error; but I find now in the original return that it is given as 1936.

Mr. GRAY: It is still signed by the Minister of Labour, the Hon. W. A. Gordon.

Mr. BENNETT: It could not have been signed by the Hon. Mr. Gordon in 1936.

Mr. GRAY: But it is.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, then, this document cannot be accurate.

Mr. GRAY: Is it signed?

Mr. BENNETT: The point is that I cannot proceed further until there is verification of this document. This matter has now become exceedingly serious. Here is what purported to be a return of papers lodged in the department between the twentieth day of August, 1935, and the fifteenth day of October, 1935. Not being able to get the original, and reading from the copy, I thought there was merely a typographical error, and I was willing to assume that. Now, thanks to the Minister of Transport, I have been handed the original, and I find, written in red ink, the following words in this document now produced as the original:

Between the city of Winnipeg, authority P.C. 354, dated February 12, 1936—

That is as plain as anything in the world. I cannot go further. This must be some other return.

Mr. GRAY: It does not change paragraph 11.

Mr. BENNETT: Fraud I have not suggested; but here is a document produced, upon which grave observations were made, which bears a date in February, 1936, purporting to be a paper that was lodged in the department between August and October, 1935. That is what I have in my hand.

Mr. ROGERS: I have not a copy of that before me.

Mr. BENNETT: This is the original; I should like to hand it to the minister.

Mr. ROGERS: It may very well be that the agreement was amended subsequently at the request of the province.

Mr. BENNETT: I have been very patient and very careful not to place any construction upon it but merely to state facts. Obviously, however, I cannot proceed with something which is handed to me as the original, bearing the date February 12, 1936, when the papers—

Mr. ROGERS: But that is not the date of the agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: No, but that is in this document.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, but—

Mr. BENNETT: I should like the minister to see it. Here is my difficulty now.

Mr. GRAY: There is no red ink in paragraph 11.

Mr. ROGERS: This is a memorandum apparently.

Mr. BENNETT: No, that is the original return; there cannot be any "apparently" about it. That is the original return.

Mr. ROGERS: The explanation is obvious. As my right hon. friend knows, under the agreements the provinces would sometimes request that an amount be transferred from one project to another or that a project be changed, and it appears here that there is a notation in red ink, which suggests clearly to me that this project was altered. Originally it was between Tuxedo and St. James; now it has been altered so that it is between the city of Winnipeg and St. James, and the authority for that, which was subsequent to the time when this government took office, is P.C. 354, dated February 12, 1936.

Mr. BENNETT: But surely the Minister of Labour would be the first to say that when a return has been produced in this house, a return upon which an attack was made upon me, and a return which deals, on the face of it, with papers dated between August 20, 1935 and October 15, 1935, and when in the return there is a document dated February, 1936, it is not a matter of explanation, but a question of the file. That is clear upon the face of it. I was willing to assume good faith at once and I thought it was a typographical error, so I asked two or three times for the original, but could not get it. To-night, however, the Minister of Transport has been good enough to send it over to me, and it is clear that until this document is explained in some way I cannot proceed. I do not know whether the rest of the return is valid. With respect to that private and confidential letter, was it on the file originally or was it put on?

Mr. ROGERS: If the right hon. gentleman will permit me to answer both questions, I shall do so.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely.

Mr. ROGERS: As to the letter, it was certainly on the file and because it was on the file it was included in the return. Second, as to this particular agreement, I am informed that when, at the request of a province, changes are made in the description of projects such changes are entered on the original agreement which is kept on the file and with the authority under which the change has been made. Therefore there is no difficulty as to that.

Mr. BENNETT: But there is a difficulty, because this is the document that has been handed to me. I received a document from the office downstairs where such documents are supposed to be lodged. I was told I could not get the original, but the official said, "You may have this copy." I said, "Have you copies?" He replied, "Mr. Lyons of your office has a copy," and so I did not take one. This is the document, but what has been handed to me as the original bears the date I have indicated. I cannot proceed with a document of that kind because it throws doubt upon the validity of the whole return.

Mr. ROGERS: Surely that is not so. I will hand this back to the right hon. gentleman. The explanation is as I have given it. If he wishes to ignore the red ink, he will have the agreement as it was made originally; if he wishes to take account of the red ink he will find the corrections that were subsequently made, at the request of the province, in the description of the projects.

Mr. BENNETT: But explanations in this house with respect to the validity of a return are not admissible.

Mr. ROGERS: But this is accurate; this is the agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like to have the original back now, if the Minister of Labour will be good enough to let me have it. This is the only time I have been able to get it, thanks to the courtesy of the Minister of Transport.

Mr. GRAY: Read it as it is.

Mr. BENNETT: The document as it stands, reads:

(2) Between the city of Winnipeg, authority P.C. 354, dated February 12, 1936, and St. James, total estimated cost, $150,000; maximum dominion contribution, $75,000.

The word struck out is the word "Tuxedo."

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; it was in the original.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, I am saying that it is the word struck out in the original. The copy furnished me reads:

(2) Between the city of Winnipeg, authority P.C. 354, dated February 12, 1936, and St. James, total estimated cost, $150,000, maximum dominion contribution, $75,000.

Mr. ROGERS: That is a fault not in the return, but in the copy of the return. The original, which my right hon. friend has, has both the projects as defined when the agreement was made, and the projects as corrected subsequently at the request of the province.

Mr. BENNETT: The return brought down is this. It covers the highway between the city of Winnipeg, authority P.C. 354, dated February 12, 1936, and St. James. That is what it is. And what is more, when you come to the fourth paragraph you have exactly the same words:

(3) At or near the city of Portage la Prairie, total estimated cost $80,000; maximum dominion contribution $40,000.

Now I read from the original:

(4) Near the town of Virden (Sproats Bridge) total estimated cost—

The figures are struck through with red ink and undecipherable figures put in their place.

Maximum dominion contribution, $11,100, authority P.C. 384 February 19, 1936.

That is a week later still. Then follow:

(5) And for the construction of a bridge over Swan river at or near Lens, exclusive as aforesaid, total estimated cost $30,000, maximum dominion contribution $15,000.
(6) And for the construction of a bridge over Pine river at or near Camperville, exclusive as aforesaid—total estimated cost—

The figures $12,000 are struck out in red ink and $7,800 substituted.

Authority P.C. 384 of February 19, 1936. Maximum dominion contribution $3,400.

The figures 6,000 struck out.

It is obvious that this return is either accurate or inaccurate. I am bound by the return as it is, and it purports to deal with matters done in 1936 when Mr. Gordon was no longer minister. This document is produced as one signed by him, in response to an order of this house for papers between August and October of 1935. Surely we cannot proceed with that, until there is some verification or explanation attached to the document; for the document, copy of which is produced, is one that has to do in its present form with matters several months later; in fact, one of them is as late as February 19, 1936. Under the circumstances I ask the minister to let the item stand until such time as this document can be verified.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Is not the fact simply that the document produced here is the document on the file in the department? The document on file was the original document with some changes that have been made in the customary way where an agreement is altered subsequently on the authority of some order in council. The document shows the alteration, the authority for the alteration and also contains the original wording. It does not affect the point we are discussing.

Mr. BENNETT: It affects the whole matter. Either this is a valid and authentic return, or it is not. Either this is a document signed by Mr. Gordon, or it is not. It is clear that Wesley Gordon did not sign a document dated February, 1936.

Mr. ROGERS: All my right hon. friend need do is ignore the red writing.

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot ignore it because it is part of this return.

Mr. ROGERS: They are both there.

Mr. BENNETT: No; one is struck out, entirely struck out. It is elementary that in a court of law you could not proceed with such a document, and this is the high court of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: If they brought the other document, it would not be the original agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: There should have been attached as part of it the order in council that authorized the alteration.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It is mentioned.

Mr. BENNETT: But it is not there. This document is not a document that was signed by Wesley Gordon. It is not a copy of a document signed by Wesley Gordon.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I think it is.

Mr. BENNETT: It cannot be, because it deals with matters in 1936. And the worst feature is this. It is not sufficient to say that the striking out of words makes it the original agreement. That is not so. Let us at least have some measure of, shall I say, decent accuracy with respect to this matter. Here is a document produced as having been signed by W. A. Gordon. Unfortunately, I departed from a principle which I make it a rule not to do, I took a copy; and I took the trouble to say to the gentleman in charge, because I have frequently seen mistakes made in copies. "Are you sure this is a correct copy?" And he said, "Yes, it has been verified." I think he said some man named Hill was in charge. But I could not get the original; if I had, I would have looked through it and seen this change at once. But this is not the document Wesley Gordon signed; it is a document that was amended in 1936; that is so obvious that it does not require argument or discussion. It is easy to say, Oh, well, something else was intended; but that was the whole point.

Mr. ROGERS: If my right hon. friend really wants to find the document Mr. Gordon did sign, he will have no difficulty; all he need do is to ignore the red ink.

Mr. BENNETT: What right has the minister to say that if I want to get a document signed by Wesley Gordon in 1935, all I have to do is to strike out certain words. Surely, with his wide knowledge, he knows he cannot add to this document. It is either authentic, or it is not.

Mr. ROGERS: The explanation is perfectly clear. We keep on our file a facsimile of the current agreements between the dominion government and the province in question. The original document is placed on the file; if subsequently there are corrections made at the request of the province and under authority of an order in council, these corrections are entered on the agreement. The order for return asked for the papers on the file. This is a facsimile of the agreement as found on the file. How otherwise could it be included in the return? As I recall, the corrections are not material corrections; they do not touch the expenditures on the important highways in question; they touch rather the smaller amounts involved.

Mr. BENNETT: One is $150,000. Well, Mr. Chairman, it is perfectly obvious that the documents produced here are not the documents that were signed by Mr. Gordon, the then minister. And the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), although he was not in this house at the time, undertakes to say what is the original. I want to know which was the original. Which is the one that is not accurate? Is the rest of the return as inaccurate as this? Is the whole matter inaccurate, or only part? Those are questions which would prevent this document from being produced in a court of law and regarded as the document.

But assuming that I read the red ink, and say that these words are added in red ink—

Mr. BEAUBIEN: The right hon. gentleman can verify the letter by his own files.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, there is no reason why, relying upon the immunity of parliament, the hon. member should make insulting observations of that kind.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: My right hon. friend has tried to insult more hon. members in this house than has any other hon. member who has ever sat in it. There is no hon. member who breaks the rules more than does my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: I decline to enter into any controversy with the hon. gentleman.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: Take your medicine.

Mr. BENNETT: That is in keeping with the hon. member's usual language. I continue:

(5) And for the construction of a bridge over Swan river at or near Lens, exclusive as aforesaid, total estimated cost $30,000; maximum dominion contribution $15,000.

(6) And for the construction of a bridge over Pine river at or near Camperville, exclusive as aforesaid, total estimated cost $7,800; authority P.C. 384 of Feb. 19, 1936, maximum dominion contribution $3,900.

In paragraph (2) of the document from which I am reading, being the original return, the word "Tuxedo" is struck out and the words "the city of Winnipeg—authority P.C. 354 dated Feby. 12, 1936," are written in in red ink.

In paragraph (4) the figures "18,000" are struck out and the figures "22,200" inserted in red ink, and the words "authority P.C. 384 of Feb. 19, 1936" added in red ink.

In the third line of the same paragraph the figures "9,000" are struck out and "11,100" added in red ink.

In paragraph (6) the figures "12,000" are struck out, and there is added in red ink what appear to be the figures "7,800" and the words "authority P.C. 384 of Feb. 19, 1936," and the figures "6,000" struck out and the figures "3,400" inserted in red ink.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: It should be $3,900. My right hon. friend said $3,400.

Mr. BENNETT: It looks like a four. The Prime Minister is reading from a copy, and I am reading from this red ink. It is $3,900.

Paragraph 3 reads:

The dominion agrees to loan to the province an amount not in excess of one million three hundred and sixty-five thousand dollars ($1,365,000) to enable the province to pay its share of the proposed expenditures mentioned in paragraphs one (1) and two (2) of this agreement, the terms and conditions of said loan to be settled upon in writing between the Minister of Finance of the Dominion of Canada and the province.

4. Except in such cases and with relation to such projects or parts thereof as the dominion and the province shall except in writing from the operation of this paragraph, the projects mentioned in paragraphs one (1) and two (2) of this agreement shall be executed by tender and contract. The province shall submit to the dominion, in respect of every contract relating to any of the said projects, certified copies of advertisements for tenders, forms of tenders, descriptions, specifications of works and the formal contracts entered into, and it shall be a condition precedent to the dominion's liability to contribute to the said projects respectively, that the Minister of Labour of Canada or his representative shall have approved in writing the formal contract or contracts for construction which relate thereto.

Bear in mind that this agreement provides that the contract is a contract made by the province, with a contractor, after public tender, and not by the dominion government. But before the contract is entered into there should be a copy of the proposal or tenders furnished to the Minister of Labour here, and he should approve before action is taken. Does that look like the dominion government being able to approve expenditures?

Mr. GRAY: The dominion government submitted this.

Mr. BENNETT: I make it perfectly clear that this is the usual form of tender under the agreements that had been provided, and that the province of Manitoba made this agreement with the dominion without amendment or a suggestion of amendment. Further on in the terms it provides for public tenders, and certified copies furnished to Ottawa, of every tender, and a public advertisement—not a hole and corner one—a public advertisement, and that there should be a submission to the Minister of Labour of these contracts themselves.

Mr. GRAY: A form submitted by the dominion to the province.

Mr. BENNETT: I continue:

5. The province will not make any charge as against the dominion for necessary timber, lumber, rock or gravel where such is taken from the province's crown lands other than for labour expended during the term of this agreement and/or for gravel used from property which has been bought by the province for the purpose of securing said gravel.

6. It is understood and agreed by and between the parties to this agreement, with relation to all work done in the execution of any or all of the projects mentioned in paragraphs one (1) and two (2) of this agreement from and after the tenth day of September, 1935, as follows:

(1) That contracts shall be let only to residents of Canada, including as such residents Canadian firms or corporations established and operating in Canada, prior to January 1, 1935, and no others.

(2) That contracts shall be let subject to the following conditions, which the province will enforce:

Not the dominion.

(a) While employment shall in general be afforded in the locality of the work which is from time to time being done, such employment shall not be confined to any one district, but, where it appears that unemployment is acute in any locality in the province, a reasonable number of unemployed persons shall be employed from such locality.

That was the condition, and the province was to enforce it, not the dominion. It was the Liberal government at Winnipeg. Then, proceeding from there:

(b) No persons other than residents of Canada shall be employed.

(c) No resident of Canada shall, with relation to his employment, be discriminated against by reason of his race, religious views or political affiliations.

There it is written in the record.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): And moved by us, in opposition.

Mr. BENNETT: The Minister of National Defence makes it stronger by saying, "we moved it in opposition." And there it is in the contract to be enforced by the province, not the dominion.

(c) No resident of Canada shall, with relation to his employment, be discriminated against by reason of his race, religious views or political affiliations.

(d) Political favouritism and political intimidation shall alike be avoided.

(e) The maximum number of hours of work per day per employee shall be eight.

(f) The rates of wages paid shall be fair and reasonable and shall be fixed by the province.

By the province, not the dominion. And then:

(g) Living conditions of employees shall be reasonably satisfactory. Provisions shall be made for proper housing, feeding, medical attention and mail facilities where same are necessary.

(h) Only goods and materials of Canadian manufacture or production shall be used if available.

(3) That the dominion shall be entitled to name a representative or representatives to act for it with the province concerning the operation of this agreement and the execution of the projects to which it relates. That the dominion may also appoint persons to cooperate with representatives of the provinces in supervising work being done and the employment of workers.

Not at the behest of the dominion, but by the province, the dominion reserving the right to govern the province with respect to these matters. It is so written in the contract, and the Minister of National Defence, says, "We fought in opposition that this be done," and here it is done. Here it is in the document. Then, further:

In the event of any exception being made and day labour being adopted with relation to any of the aforesaid projects, all of the foregoing provisions shall, mutatis mutandis, apply to the employment of said day labour.

"Day labour" employed by the province, by the government at Winnipeg,—by the government in Winnipeg and by the department over which Mr. Clubb presided. Then we come to paragraph 7:

7. The province agrees that it will maintain adequate records of all expenditures, supported by proper documents and vouchers and that such records, documents and vouchers will be segregated from, although reconciled with, the usual records of the province. The province further undertakes to make all or any of said records, documents and vouchers, available to the dominion for audit or examination upon request and to furnish information in relation thereto.

8. Statements of accounts for expenditures made by the province pursuant to the provisions of this agreement shall be submitted by the province to the dominion commissioner of unemployment relief, accompanied by a certificate of the provincial auditor that expenditures have been duly made in accordance with such statements and have been or within a reasonable time will be audited by him; and such statements and certificates shall be in the form prescribed by the dominion commissioner of unemployment relief.

9. The province shall bear its own expenses of administration with relation to any measures undertaken pursuant to this agreement, and no portion of such expenses shall be included in any statement of account rendered by the province to be paid by the dominion.

10. It is agreed that the dominion commissioner of unemployment relief may at any time direct an inspection in connection with any measures executed or being executed pursuant to this agreement and that the province will facilitate, as fully as it can, every such investigation.

11. This agreement shall be effective from and including the tenth day of September, 1935—

The day upon which the order in council was passed; the earliest date at which it could be made after that—

—and shall expire on March 31, 1936—

That is on every agreement made under the authority of that statute. That was the end of the fiscal year. And further:

—but shall not apply to any project on which work has not been commenced by the tenth day of October, 1935.

Why? Everyone knows.

Mr. GRAY: Three weeks before the election.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. If it had been for political purposes, it would have been right up to the day of the election, or the day of the nomination; instead of which it was made on October 10, 1935. Why?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: What was the date of the election?

Mr. BENNETT: The 14th, I am told.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Just four days out.

An hon. MEMBER: You should remember it.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound to say I do not remember. That is not one of the things with which I have charged my mind. It was very disastrous though, I understand.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He knew the date of the elections.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not see this document; and what is more he was not there.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: He knew the date of the elections when this was drafted.

Mr. BENNETT: He did not have anything to do with the drafting of it, in any shape or form, nor does it depart from the general principles which governed other agreements made by the former government, as well as by this one. And, as is done with respect to some projects, a date was fixed when the time should expire, because work was not commenced when winter was coming on.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: How did you know on October 10 winter was coming on? You are not a prophet.

Mr. BENNETT: In every case which had to do with these matters there was an effective date placed in the contract.

Mr. ROGERS: Never.

Mr. BENNETT: Never?

Mr. ROGERS: Can my right hon. friend give me one case of an agreement which required that the dominion government would not contribute to the work unless the work began on a given date? I never have known it at any time.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, will the hon. gentleman say he has gone through the contracts?

Mr. ROGERS: The right hon. gentleman said that it was customary. Tell me about it.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister made the statement.

Mr. ROGERS: I ask the right hon. gentleman to tell me.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister made the statement. He interrupted. Has he gone through the contracts?

Mr. ROGERS: I am familiar with the agreements that have operated for a number of years, and I have yet to find one that required that the work should be started at a certain date.

Mr. BENNETT: This does not say the work should be done.

Mr. ROGERS: Started on a certain date.

Mr. GRAY: Four days before the election.

Mr. BENNETT: Any work commenced after October 10 was not to come within that agreement.

Mr. ROGERS: Why should it be October 10?

Mr. BENNETT: Why?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Because that is the date which the minister fixed with the government of Manitoba.

Mr. GRAY: A strange clause.

Mr. BENNETT: It was fixed by the government of Manitoba.

Mr. ROGERS: The agreement was drafted here.

Mr. BENNETT: Could anything indicate more clearly the unfairness of men when they are influenced by political considerations? Here is the document which was sent by the department to Winnipeg, and it was open to the government at Winnipeg to do anything it pleased them to do. Instead of making any changes, they accepted the document in its entirety. The fact that it was accepted in its entirety by two governments, one being Liberal and the other Conservative, is supposed to indicate that I conspired with somebody to do something.

Mr. ROGERS: The only way by which they could get the money was by signing the agreement in those terms.

Mr. BENNETT: There you have an indication of the smallness of the mind of one individual.

Mr. ROGERS: That was one consideration.

Mr. BENNETT: I knew all we had to do was to give the hon. gentleman a chance. What a pretty sight it is for the country to have the Minister of Labour rising in his place to-night and saying that all that Bracken and Clubb could do was to sign that.

Mr. ROGERS: That is in the agreement.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there anything to show that they had to sign? What is there to warrant the suggestion of the hon. gentleman?

Mr. ROGERS: Because the agreement always goes from here to the province.

Mr. BENNETT: Does it?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; that is customary.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact, it may not be. You see, I have some memory with reference to these agreements, not as to the details of any of them, unfortunately, because I have not tried to keep the details in mind. But I have a very clear recollection of this. It is absurd and absolutely incorrect to say that every proposal made by the dominion was accepted by the province. They were the subject matter of negotiation.

Mr. ROGERS: They were drafted here and sent forward finally for approval.

Mr. BENNETT: The negotiation of the agreement took place between the dominion and the province. The date was fixed in the interests of the public exchequer.

Mr. ROGERS: What is the explanation of the October 10 clause?

Mr. BENNETT: It was not wise to commence expenditures when winter was beginning. There is nothing new about that. I continue:

> In witness whereof the Honourable Wesley A. Gordon, Minister of Labour, has hereunto set his hand on behalf of the Dominion of Canada and the Honourable W. R. Clubb, Minister of Public Works has hereunto set his hand on behalf of the province of Manitoba.
> Signed on behalf of the Dominion of Canada by the Honourable Wesley A. Gordon, Minister of Labour, in the presence of
> W. M. Dickson. W. A. Gordon.
> Signed on behalf of the province of Manitoba by Honourable W. R. Clubb, Minister of Public Works, in the presence of
> A. MacNamara. W. R. Clubb.

On September 23, 1935, Mr. Hereford writes a letter to Mr. Clubb, as follows:

> Ottawa, September 23, 1935.
> Honourable W. R. Clubb,
> Minister of Public Works and Labour,
> Winnipeg, Manitoba.
> Dear Mr. Minister,—
> In the absence of the deputy minister of labour, I am to acknowledge receipt of yours of September 20 enclosing supplementary agreement between the dominion government and the province authorized by P.C. 2851, also copy of provincial order in council authorizing you to sign said agreement.
> As you have omitted to date the agreement, I have dated it September 20, 1935, that being the date of your authority to enter into the agreement, and I shall be obliged if you will note this date on your copy of the agreement.
> Yours truly,
> Harry Hereford,
> Dominion Commissioner.

That was September 23. On October 1, which it will be observed is a week later, Mr. Clubb writes to the deputy minister as follows:

On September 18, 1935, I wired as follows—

I have just read the telegram. The letter concludes:

Inquiries were made to-day by a deputation from the district in this regard and I promised to write and ask for as early a decision as possible.

Thanking you, I am,

Yours very truly,

W. R. Clubb,
Minister of Public Works.

That is all there is to it. On that state of affairs the present Prime Minister alleges a conspiracy on the part of a former Prime Minister to bribe three constituencies. Not only is it not evidence, but I am going to say more. On the basis of a letter, which so far as I know I did not see—after I came back from England I did not deal much with correspondence as I was not well—that is what is done, but I had nothing to do with these negotiations. I sent to Mr. Dickson a copy of the telegram I got from Mr. Murphy. This whole argument proceeds upon the allegation of motives, not upon facts at all. It is doing something that the rules of this house say should not be done; it attributes motives to hon. members and says that there was a conspiracy. As a matter of fact, I did not intend to pay any attention to it; but the Prime Minister said: "Surely you are not going to let that go." I was not only going to let it go; but it struck me that the decency of Canada, the decency of the Canadian people would resent that sort of argument. Supposing all the suggestions that had been made to ministers in the form of personal letters were made public; would they be responsible?

Mr. BEAUBIEN: This letter was broadcast to every minister of the crown.

Mr. BENNETT: Would they be responsible? Am I responsible for Ralph Webb's letter? Am I to be responsible and charged as a conspirator because Ralph Webb wrote a letter which was marked "personal and confidential"?

Mr. FRASER: Your government acted upon it.

Mr. BENNETT: The government did not act upon it. It acted because of pressure brought by the province of Manitoba. An agreement was entered into, but who was to supervise? Who was to employ the labour? Who imposed the condition that local labour was to be employed? It was the province, not the dominion.

Mr. FRASER: Who originated the idea?

Mr. BENNETT: Since 1931 forty miles of the most important part of the road had been built. This road connected with the United States of America, and it was to have been part of the road system of the Riding Mountain park. The pressure exerted by Mr. Clubb was continuous. The records show that he had pressed for the building of these roads. Now it is said that all that pressure should go for nothing, that what should count is the fact that Ralph Webb wrote a letter and said that we would get three constituencies if money was spent, by the province, not by the dominion. That may be a good argument against Ralph Webb, but any man who would endeavour to make that an argument against me in a court of law in this country would soon know what would happen to him.

Mr. FRASER: Ralph Webb was the director of the Conservative party in Manitoba.

Mr. BENNETT: Supposing he was.

Mr. BEAUBIEN: If any one put up the defence the right hon. gentleman is putting up, he would soon know what would happen to him.

Mr. BENNETT: But we have evidence of cases that do not depend upon inference, cases that are written in the records of the parliament of Canada. When I heard the Prime Minister talking as he was the other evening, I wonder if he thought for a moment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). I wonder if he forgot when those hon. gentlemen were at Laurier House in the trying days of 1926? I have the record under my hand. He was trying to save not one constituency, not two, not three—his whole government remained in office because it was able to get those votes. Here is what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said upon the matter.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: At Laurier House?

Mr. BENNETT: They were at Laurier House.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I will ask the hon. gentlemen to state here if they were present at Laurier House and discussed any matter relating to politics.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say. Go and ask them.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I say immediately that at no time did I discuss either with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) or the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) at Laurier House any matter referring to the program of politics in this house.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman says in his letter that he discussed it with them. I am going to read it presently. I said, "at Laurier House", because that is my understanding of what the hon. member said. But if it was not at Laurier House, it was somewhere else.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: I never discussed with these gentlemen at Laurier House any matter that related to a political program in this house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Withdraw!

Mr. BENNETT: Just one moment. I have said I accept at once the right hon. gentleman's word on that point, but I am going to read about the discussion with these hon. gentlemen.

The government of the present Prime Minister did not secure a majority of the votes in the election of 1925. It did not secure a majority of the seats in the election of 1925. It held on to office, though nine ministers were defeated, including the Prime Minister himself, and when the house met on January 7, 1926, the Prime Minister was not in his place. He had been defeated; he had no seat in this house, and the house was led by the right hon. gentleman, the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). The question whether or not the then government would remain in office depended entirely upon the attitude of mind of a very few people. In fact, in one division the majority was one; in another the majority was two, and the majorities ran in and out. The present hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) was then in this house, as was also the present hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps). At page 560 of Hansard—

Mr. SLAGHT: Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

Mr. SPENCE: That is all you ever do.

Mr. SLAGHT: The retort of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) is refreshing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: State the point of order.

Mr. SLAGHT: Mr. Chairman, the point of order is this. As I understand it, we are discussing the estimates of the Department of Labour, and what on earth have they to do with the topic which the right hon. gentleman is at present pursuing?

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): You do not like it.

Mr. SLAGHT: Yes, I like it, if the hon. gentleman wants to meet me on the hustings or anywhere else to discuss it.

Mr ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): I have met you before.

Mr. FRASER: Worse for you, that time.

Mr. SLAGHT: It does seem to me, Mr. Chairman, that it is a woeful waste of time to be discussing this matter on these estimates. There may be a place and time at which the situation the right hon. gentleman has introduced may be discussed, but I submit this is not the time, and that he is entirely out of order.

The CHAIRMAN: On the point of order raised by the hon. member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght), I am of the opinion that the point of order is well taken. This debate has gone a very considerable distance and occupied a very long time. I think the discussion of the correspondence on the file which the right hon. gentleman has introduced is perfectly in order, also the discussion of the affairs at Kingston; but when the discussion goes back to 1925 and 1926 and to what happened in this chamber with reference to the elections of 1925 and 1926, I must rule the discussion out of order.

Mr BENNETT: Well, Mr. Chairman, the reason I discussed these matters is this. It is correct and right to refer to facts as showing that inferences drawn are unwarranted; and the statement made by the Prime Minister that I was a conspirator I am going to negative by showing that if I am, I was following his example—only his was much more so. I have the Hudson Bay Railway story. He said: "The length of the mileage depends on the number of members we get."

I am going to proceed by way of illustration. In argument one has the right to use illustrations. If I am charged with being a conspirator in 1935 and can show, by documents in Hansard and letters, that in 1925 and 1926, the right hon. the Prime Minister—well, if I cannot do that I shall have to accept your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but I certainly think I have a right to refer to the matters that were mentioned by the Prime Minister of this country in an endeavour to blacken my character by showing that at least what I did was not anything comparable—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. If the right hon. gentleman will permit me, I call the attention of the committee, in case it has been forgotten, that we are on an item in the estimates of the Department of Labour for the administration of the Employment Offices Coordination Act, and I would ask hon. members to confine their remarks from now on to labour matters under the Department of Labour. I have already ruled on the point of order raised by the hon. member for Parry Sound, and I am still of the opinion that my ruling is correct, and that for the last ten minutes, shall I say, the right hon. leader of the opposition has been out of order.

Mr. BENNETT: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McIVOR: I think this should be a splendid stopping place, Mr. Chairman, and time to call it quits, because as I see it, as an ordinary member, I do not think the discussion that has been going on is in keeping with the dignity of the House of Commons. We are becoming provincial. I think this would be a splendid stopping place for the discussion.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): You have given your ruling, Mr. Chairman, and while the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) may think this is a good stopping place for the discussion that has been going on, I would point out that the right hon. leader of the opposition has been charged by the Prime Minister with conspiracy and he was asked to reply. Then, when he started to reply, he was asked to stop.

Mr. GLEN: In my judgment, Mr. Chairman, this is not a proper time for stopping this discussion. I was hoping that the right hon. leader of the opposition would continue his argument in order to strengthen his position in regard to the letter that was written to him by Mr. Ralph Webb. The right hon. gentleman has introduced into this discussion a good many things which were not at issue; but I propose to deal with the real point at issue, and when the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) says that this is a good stopping place, I think he might well have said the same thing to-day when the leader of the opposition was attacking the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) as he has been doing for the last three or four days. This whole discussion has developed into a controversy between the right hon. leader of the opposition and the Minister of Labour. As I said before, the right hon. leader of the opposition is about to pass out of public life.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that in order, Mr. Chairman, under your ruling?

Mr. GLEN: I am quoting statements that have appeared in the press.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman's remark was very relevant to the item, Mr. Chairman!

The CHAIRMAN: I will ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the item.

Mr. GLEN: I will confine my remarks not only to the item but to that which has been introduced and allowed to be discussed in this chamber. For that reason I am proceeding to deal with the speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition. I am of course interested in this particular matter because one of these roads passes through my constituency. Let me tell the leader of the opposition that before the election the Conservative candidate, Mr. Peden, who is mentioned in one of the letters as having interviewed the provincial government, stated throughout the whole of the constituency that they were prepared to make these roads but could not do so because of the fact that the provincial government were not willing that this should be done. When it was brought to his attention that the provincial government had already made the offer to build these roads, not at all with a view to the election but for the purposes of relief, then approaches were made to the provincial government; and the letters and correspondence that we now have conclusively bear out what happened. The leader of the opposition says that he—perhaps—did not see this letter. Well, it is an extraordinary fact—

An hon. MEMBER: Oh, no.

Mr. GLEN: —that the letter was written by Mr. Webb and duly received by Mr. Gordon in Ottawa, and then there was a further letter from Mr. Clubb, written on that very day, September 4, that the leader of the opposition addressed his letter to the deputy minister conveying the telegram which was sent by Mr. Murphy. If it happens that the leader of the opposition, the then Prime Minister, would take the position that on the strength of a telegram from the Minister of the Interior he had nothing to do with this project at all except that he was interested from a constituency standpoint, how is it that on receipt of that telegram from the Minister of the Interior the right hon. leader of the opposition passes over the head of Mr. Gordon, his own minister, who had charge of this particular project? One can hardly understand, and I do not think I can believe—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. GLEN: —that the then Prime Minister did not know the contents of the letter that was written to Mr. Gordon, with a copy, sent to Mr. Gordon, of the original which must have gone to the then Prime Minister, who, fortified by the terms of that letter, authorized or rather instructed the deputy minister that serious consideration must be given to the building of these roads. Immediately the matter is completed and the project is entered into. I wish to call attention to the letter because in answer to the discussion that has taken place, Mr. Webb has made a statement from Toronto in which he corroborates in every way the statement of what he did at the election of 1935. In calling attention to his letter, I must say that I do not believe there will be found on the files of any of the departments a letter so callous and so cynical in its indifference to the people whom he is supposed to represent, as the contents of this letter reveal it to be. In my judgment it is so heinous that I cannot understand how any man can stay in public life after having given expression to it. It is dated August 23. As is usual in letters, the first sentence gives the subject of discussion.

An hon. MEMBER: What year?

Mr. GLEN: August 23, 1935. Usually the first sentence of a letter refers to the matter under discussion. In the first paragraph we find that he had:

. . . just come in from the constituencies of Lisgar, Provencher and St. Boniface particularly, and the situation at the moment is very good there politically, but it needs the necessary impetus to carry on.

That is the subject of the letter. The writer goes on further:

I have already written to the Hon. J. Earl Lawson, the Hon. Dr. R. J. Manion and the Hon. Wesley Gordon and the Hon. T. G. Murphy with regard to the two roads in these three constituencies that are vital factors in this election campaign, and they have the whole story in detail, both verbally and in writing.

In the next paragraph he endeavours to give an argument indicating why these roads should be built. He refers to them as a relief measure, and had he left it at that, the letter would have been entirely in order. In the next paragraph he speaks of the rust in Manitoba and the fact that the people there are likely to suffer and will need federal relief. That paragraph, too, would have been all right. But he comes back to the main theme of his letter, which is this:

. . . whereas if it is not done, they possibly may appeal to the provincial and federal governments for some form of relief, and for which we will get nothing. . . .

The main theme of his letter. Then further on:

As a political measure, it assures us without any question of a doubt these three seats which we badly want to win, and which look very good for us at the present time.

He continues on the same theme throughout the letter, that these two roads have not and will not be built, and it has become such a strong factor politically that a great deal rests on a favourable decision being made. To still further strengthen the argument he says, at the beginning of the next paragraph:

I feel that we should play the game politically, call the provincial government's bluff, who have stated positively to delegates that they are prepared to put up dollar for dollar with the federal government in the building of these two roads as an unemployment relief works measure.

The writer shows that the provincial government had already applied for this and they had been refused by the minister who had charge of it, namely Mr. Gordon, but he goes on further:

If the federal government would advise of participation in these two roads, it would be good politics; it would call the provincial government's bluff; it would kill the propaganda that the Liberals are carrying on at the present time; . . . and in my humble opinion, will not have cost the federal government anything, because by the time the work is organized the election will be over, and winter will be upon us, and perhaps very little work will have been done before the end of the present fiscal year.

Mr. SPENCE: We have had that letter read four times.

Mr. GLEN: The hon. member may have forgotten some of it.

Mr. MITCHELL: I wish we could forget it all.

Mr. GLEN: Some contention was raised with regard to clause 11 in the agreement, that it must be that no contribution should be made unless the works were commenced before the tenth day of October. All right, there was the reason. The reason is that "by the time the work is organized, the election will be over, and winter will be upon us."

Mr. SPENCE: The hon. member has now made his point several times.

Mr. GLEN: So there is no necessity for any money to be spent. Further on in the same letter he says:

The Hon. W. Gordon, the Hon. Dr. R. J. Manion and the Hon. T. G. Murphy know all about these two roads. They have the details, map locations and I believe thoroughly understand the situation.

The contention as contained in this letter is that these three seats must be won.

I assume, therefore, that these three gentlemen would know how these three seats were to be won, and the order in council for the completion of the agreement was passed with their consent. The writer says:

Our candidates are very alive to the situation.

I can assure you they were most certainly alive to the situation, because from every platform in my constituency they pointed out that these roads would be completed only by their government. He finishes as he began:

Politically it means victory for us.

Here is the letter of the leader of the opposition, dated September 4. I call attention to the fact that this letter, addressed to Mr. Dickson, deputy minister of labour, dated September 4, 1935, is written on the same date as the letter which Mr. Clubb sent to the Hon. W. A. Gordon. Therefore the letter from Mr. Clubb could not have been received at that time, the then Prime Minister having written on that day authorizing or at least suggesting that these roads should be completed.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, I cannot permit the hon. gentleman to make that statement without directing attention to the fact that was not the case. It was merely the transmitting to Mr. Dickson of a telegram from Mr. Murphy, and it so states.

Mr. GLEN: Quite. I have already referred to the fact that the Minister of the Interior could have had nothing to do with it—

Mr. BENNETT: He had everything to do with it.

Mr GLEN: —because this came under Mr. Gordon, the then Minister of Labour. The right hon. gentleman sent his letter under date of September 4, 1935, and on that date the letter was addressed from Winnipeg to Mr. Gordon. It also was dated September 4, 1935, the same date, so that the letter could not have been received or seen by the leader of the opposition. It was the same date on which he sent that letter to Mr. Dickson.

I wonder whether the leader of the opposition saw the report of an interview given by Mr. Webb from Toronto, dated June 11, as reported in the Winnipeg Free Press of June 13 of this year.

Mr. BENNETT: I have not seen it, but there is a rule against reading it.

Mr. GLEN: There is a rule against reading it, but many things have been read here and I am entitled to read this.

Mr. BENNETT: See what the Chairman says.

[Mr. Glen.]

The CHAIRMAN: What does the hon. member propose to read?

Mr. GLEN: I am going to read from the Winnipeg Free Press, reporting an interview that took place with Mr. Ralph Webb, dealing with this very matter. This is what he says:

"The road building which takes place before elections is the greatest method that exists for corrupting voters of this country," Col. R. H. Webb, Conservative organizer in Manitoba, said to-day. "It makes the tactics of Al Capone look like child's play in comparison.

"Premier King," he stated, "has seen fit to publicize a personal letter of mine and to ask for an investigation. I would welcome one," Col. Webb declared. "Let's investigate all confidential correspondence of all parties, particularly of Premier King's administration, and let us include all the governments in every province, not only the federal governments."

He takes in a lot of territory.

"My experience in politics, based on a number of years," he asserted, "is, that the best way to get good roads in a province is to have an election every six months."

"If there is one great need in Canada," he continued, "it is the need for good roads. And apparently governments in power and the opposition candidates, knowing that the people want roads, certainly don't hesitate to provide them and the party in power start to build before elections. The reason I say that there should be an election every six months is that the people know that as soon as an election is over the majority of road projects stop too."

All in conformity with the letter which he sent to the leader of the opposition.

"No matter what Premier King has to say," he stated, "one thing stands out. We needed roads in Manitoba and we got them. We beat the King government with their own weapons. My correspondence with Mr. Bennett was confidential. Maybe I was inexperienced in having written but all know politicians. I at least was sincere."

So that he was sincere in writing that letter in which he stated that it was good politics, and that they need not spend good money because winter would be upon them and there would be no need to spend it.

"The provincial administration who had asked for roads had done so in political partisanship with the federal Liberal party and hoped the Conservative government would not go ahead. I deemed it good generalship to fight them with their own weapons.

"In connection with promises that could do with a little investigating," Col. Webb said, "most unemployed remember the poster and advertising campaign of the present administration and the billboards telling them to 'vote for work and wages'." Ask the unemployed if they have work and wages. What about that?

"If we are going to have an investigation," he concluded, "I would welcome it. But let's investigate things from A to Z and make a real cleanup."

On the same page there appears an editorial calling attention to the fact that on September 18, 1935, when the Free Press referred to these roads as political propaganda, Mr. Webb stood on the platform in Winnipeg and denounced the Free Press, declaring that it was an insult to the intelligence of an ignoramus that the Free Press should call the building of these roads "good politics." I think it is well that this matter should be brought to the attention of the committee, and that for many reasons. During the whole of this debate there has been an attack upon the Minister of Labour in connection with matters in Kingston, which, in comparison with what happened in 1935, are as but a particle of sand on the seashore We have been dealing with twenty-five cans of white lead and $4 worth of rubble taken to a garage. The minister in the first instance was charged with connivance, but that charge was withdrawn and no attack was made upon him in that respect. Had the boot been on the other foot; had the leader of the opposition been in possession of such a letter as Mr. Webb's, addressed to a member of the party opposing him, one can imagine how he would have rent the heavens with righteous indignation against the government or members of the government who would allow themselves to be influenced thereby. I suggest that this matter must be brought to the attention of the committee. In my opinion the argument advanced so far by the leader of the opposition is not such as would lead one to believe that there was no knowledge on the part of those ministers of the purpose for which the roads in question were built at that time.

Now that the question of patronage is under consideration, I propose to do all I possibly can to put a stop to the practice. The question is being discussed in the civil service committee; it will come before this house, and there will then be an opportunity for members on both sides to give evidence of the virtue that is in them with respect to the question of patronage. It is a great pity that such things should happen in the country, because it makes the nation a laughing-stock; nevertheless there must be a reply when attacks are made upon ministers who are endeavouring to carry out their duties as the Minister of Labour is doing. I am not very much in favour of the tu quoque argument, but the fact is that this whole discussion has been introduced by the leader of the opposition, and he, alone, is responsible for it.

Mr. POOLE: What is the number of ex-service men employed in the employment bureaux throughout the country who are drawing one hundred per cent pension? I have no objection to their being employed, but there are so many ex-service men who are in receipt of small pensions who would be glad to have work. I understand there are others who are drawing one hundred per cent pensions and getting salaries in the department.

Mr. ROGERS: The officials in the employment service are appointed by the provincial governments. We have no information here as to whether or not they have a service record, but so far as the dominion government officials are concerned there are some who are dealing with handicapped ex-service men. I believe they are war veterans; but if my hon. friend will allow me to get the information for him and send it to him, instead of having the item stand, I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I wish to bring to the attention of the committee a difficult situation that has arisen in connection with relief. My colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North, early in the session, on April 28, directed attention to what he described as an attempt in our own city and in other parts of Canada to lower the standard of relief which was being given to families. He also said that there was an arrangement under which the incomes of families were being controlled even after the families had ceased to be on relief.

Mr. ROGERS: Will my hon. friend permit me to interrupt? Actually we are not on the item which deals with grants in aid to the provinces. We are on an item in the main estimates having to do with the Employment Service of Canada. I have no objection to having this matter discussed, but we cannot make progress if we discuss everything.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: As we discussed highways as relief projects, I thought I was in order in discussing another relief matter.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, if the hon. member wishes.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I shall not take very long. It is a matter dealing with administration. My colleague questioned the government as to why this policy should be pursued. The minister replied, as reported on page 2379 of Hansard for April 28, 1938:

> My answer to my hon. friend is that the dominion government has not in any way brought pressure to bear upon provincial governments with respect to any change in relief scales.

And again:

But there has been no pressure of any kind in respect of relief scales. That is something which, as my hon. friend is no doubt aware, is dealt with entirely by provincial governments in conjunction with the municipalities.

And again:

The only possible connection that might exist between the dominion government and relief scales is a clause in the agreements covering the last quarter of the past fiscal year which stated that the relief allowances should not compete, so to speak, with the prevailing wage in a municipality.

Some of us felt reassured when we heard those definite statements, and took it for granted that the responsibility for details of administration did not lie with the dominion government. I have been so informing the people who wrote to me about the matter. But there has recently come into my hands a letter written on January 26, 1938 by W. R. Clubb, minister of public works and labour of Manitoba, to Mr. Geo. F. Bentley, city clerk, Winnipeg. This letter shows the rigid control of the federal department which had been exercised for some months before the minister made those statements. It reads:

Dear Sir:

As you are aware a few weeks ago the dominion government proposed some very restrictive terms which had to be complied with in the administration of relief contributed to by the dominion.

The views of the municipalities were obtained and representations urging modifications were made to the dominion authorities. The honourable Minister of Labour for the dominion government decided to what extent the requests would be agreed to. Some of the suggestions were adopted, some were not.

A revised agreement has been received, and we are informed that the dominion government requires this agreement carried out effective from January 1, 1938, in order to qualify for dominion contribution towards relief.

In order to obtain the dominion assistance towards relief it is required that we approve of this agreement and return it. It has already been signed by the dominion authorities. A copy of the agreement is attached.

Under the terms of the agreement the province must undertake to see that the municipalities carry out the provisions of the agreement.

Attention is called to section in regard to earnings while off relief. Your municipality has been included as one of the places where this will be carried out. We shall be glad to have your suggestions as to the system which might be evolved for carrying out this arrangement.

Before we can put your January accounts through for payment it will be necessary for you to have a resolution of council forwarded to me, in which it is agreed that your municipality will carry out the terms of the agreement.

Will you kindly arrange to deal with this important matter as promptly as possible.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Among the terms of the agreement I find this, in the first part of section 6:

The province agrees to establish and maintain standards of eligibility for material aid in accordance with this agreement. . . .

Section 7 reads:

The province agreed that the maximum value of material aid (which is contributable to pursuant to this agreement) given to any head of a family or other individual, of itself, or together with any additional allowances or material aid made by the province and/or a municipality, shall be less than the normal earnings of an unskilled labourer in the district wherein the recipient resides, as averaged over the year proceeding the granting of aid with account taken of average loss of time; in determining said maximum for heads of families adjustment may be made for normal earnings of dependents of employable age and of proved employability.

I am informed by the city authorities that this in effect has led to a very low standard of relief. For instance this last clause I have just read has cut assistance to some families of ten persons to $70 a month, including clothing. Therefore it would seem as if this agreement, insisted upon by the dominion government, is made a prerequisite to the province receiving grants in aid of relief; and the province in turn is being forced to insist that the provisions should be carried out by the municipal authorities. This has resulted in a lowering of the standards that ordinarily prevail at least in my own city. Paragraph 9 of the agreement reads:

To remove from the minds of recipients of material aid the fear that in accepting such work as is available they may sacrifice the possibility of receiving said aid in the future when further need arises, and to ensure that seasonal workers shall make, out of their earnings, reasonable provision for seasonal employment, the province undertakes to require all cities and towns listed in schedule A to this agreement to provide each person in those jurisdictions who is ceasing to receive material aid during the term hereof, by reason of entering gainful occupation, a statement of the rate of material aid hitherto granted and a reasonable budget of expenditures for the individual or family while the breadwinner is in gainful occupation and to further require them to obtain a properly certified statement of earnings to be filled in and signed by employers of the applicant prior to his or her readmission for material aid benefits.

This means in effect that the standard of living is controlled for the man who has been in receipt of relief, even though he passes off relief. Talk about regimentation! We have heard from the other side of the house some very strong protests against anything that would look like regimentation. But, according to these arrangements, if a family has been on relief, the government pursues them after they are off relief, insisting that they carry on their budgeting in a certain way. One can understand that if a family has been on relief for a considerable time, a good many household supplies may be short; they may need bedclothes and a score of things that they have not been able to purchase. But the administration follows them up and says, "No you must not purchase this. You have been on relief and you still come under our control."

I submit that is an almost intolerable position. I can understand that the department may be anxious to keep the family from again seeking relief, but I know of no sound principle which should enable the dominion government to step into the city of Winnipeg and tell a family—working on their own—how they are to spend their income. That is going too far. I know it has created a very great deal of dissatisfaction not only among the recipients of relief, but also in the city council itself. Of my own city I can say this, that they have tried their best to meet the abnormal situation by treating the citizens as generously as possible. When they come to a situation of this kind the municipality is unable to act, because of the insistence of the provincial government, and the provincial government cannot act, because of this agreement, which if not lived up to would preclude the receiving of material aid from the federal government. I wish to point out to the minister that an agreement of this kind, with the interpretation of it which has been made by Mr. Clubb, the minister of public works and labour, seems to me to be quite inconsistent with the statement which was made by the minister in this house when the matter was under discussion earlier in the session.

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps I should deal at once with the question of inconsistency. I remember that when the point was raised for the first time I made the statement referred to a moment ago by the hon. member, namely that relief scales were not controlled by the dominion government. That statement was literally correct. We do not, for instance, set a scale in Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba or any other province. But at the same time we did, under the agreement to which the hon. member refers, covering the last quarter of the last fiscal year, set a maximum which would prevent relief payments from coming into competition with normal earnings of relief recipients.

It is quite possible I may not have made that as clear as I ought to have done when the matter was first brought up; but it did come up on a later occasion, and I believe I cleared it up then. That was during the debate on the unemployment and agricultural assistance measure. Actually both that recommendation, and the one with regard to budgeting, came from the national employment commission, and it was only adopted after conferences between the officials of the dominion Department of Labour and those of the various provincial departments of labour. I will not say that all the provinces were wholly in agreement with those two proposals; but certainly it was the consensus of opinion that the adoption of that maximum, which would prevent relief from being exploited, as it were, as against work, would be a satisfactory procedure. The one as to budgeting was really designed, in a large measure, in the interests of the relief recipient, but was also designed to prevent one who received casual work from going immediately upon the relief rolls, when that casual work ended. The hon. member may say that this is imposing a hardship upon those men. It was not designed to do that. It was, however, intended to prevent what might readily have become a rather serious abuse. I shall read the recommendation from the report of the national employment commission.

—grants in aid to be made under conditions which will include the following:

(c) Observance of the principle of maintenance of incentive to accept employment by relating the maximum aid to actual earnings of unskilled labour in each centre or regional division, while preserving standards of health and decency;

(d) Limitation of shelter allowances to a definite relationship with assessments and total shelter disbursements to a reasonable proportion of total cost of aid granted;

The next requirement is:

(e) Requirement of "Cancellation of Aid" cards to provide running records of earnings permitting of prompt assessment of further need for aid, this in order to facilitate the acceptance of casual employment;

In other words, it was designed not only to help the relief recipient in his budgeting, when he went into employment, but also to make it more readily possible for him to go back on relief, if he were entitled to do so. In other words, there would be there a definite and accurate record as to what he had received while employed.

Mr. HEAPS: It is quite possible—in fact, not only possible but likely—that under the terms of the arrangement between the government and the provinces, many individual families will become compelled to accept a lower scale of relief than they have received in the past. When this question was raised some time during the month of April the minister never made reference to the agreement then in existence.

Mr. ROGERS: I referred to the agreement a number of times.

Mr. HEAPS: No; at least on the particular occasion when the question was raised, as I read from Hansard—as I did, just a little while ago—there was no reference to the existence of any agreement between the provinces and the federal authority affecting the scale of relief in the municipalities.

Relief has to do with men who usually are earning low wages. In item 7 of the arrangement between the federal authorities and the province there is in effect a statement which says how much must be given to men who are on relief. It states the amount, and states further that the amount to be given on relief shall not be equal to or quite as much as a person would earn if he worked the average amount of time a labourer would work during the course of a year. Let us take the case of an average labourer, a man who may be working for thirty cents an hour, a wage which is common in these days. If he worked fifty hours a week at thirty cents an hour he would earn $15 a week. That would be the salary for a full week, or a salary of approximately $60 a month. If he worked six months in the year, his earnings would be $480. If he happened to be the head of a large family, he could not receive in relief more than he had been earning on an average during the year, or the sum of only about $40 a month during the twelve month period. The father of six or eight children under those circumstances would be compelled to live on $40 a month, and that is where the hardship arises. That is where we say there has been interference on the part of the federal authorities in connection with the amount of relief granted to those who unfortunately have been compelled to become the recipents of public relief.

I believe the federal government ought not to have interfered in the scale of relief, when relief was being given as in the past. I know of very few instances where the amounts given could in any sense of the term be called high. Early in the month of April I placed on Hansard the amounts received in Winnipeg by way of relief. I forget the exact amount, but I know it was a very small one indeed. I believe the minister or the Department of Labour has done a great injustice and a great harm to those men on relief to-day, by putting into the agreement with the provinces certain restrictions the effect of which would be to lower considerably the standard of living of those men whose standard both in the past and at the present time has been extremely low. I am wondering, in view of the hardship which has been pointed out to the minister, if something could not be done to relieve the situation by allowing the municipalities to determine the scale of relief to be given.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is a similar clause inserted in the agreement in force in British Columbia?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes; the clause was in the agreements with all provinces. That is to say, the agreements were identical in that respect.

I may say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) that there is a provision for taking into account the earnings of any other member of a family on relief. I think my hon. friend has put the case at its worst, rather than at its best. We have received some representations from the provinces with respect to the working out of this particular clause and will give consideration to them when the agreements are again considered.

Mr. MacINNIS: When the minister was reading from the report of the national employment commission he referred to the necessity of having a relief scale sufficient to maintain health and decency. Does the minister believe that any family can maintain health and decency on the present relief scale?

Mr. ROGERS: I am quite right in saying that so far as the relief scales are concerned they are determined by the provinces, subject to that maximum which I have described. I would remind the committee that the maximum is based upon the normal earnings of an unskilled labourer in the particular locality. The working out of the whole matter is left to the provincial government. If, in the opinion of the provincial government, a particular hardship is being worked, undoubtedly representations will be made to us. As I recall it, there has been always a certain amount of flexibility.

Mr. MacINNIS: Does the minister think that a standard of health and decency can be maintained with the normal earnings of an unskilled labourer? Would the minister adopt that scale for himself? If he would not adopt it, why accept it as a standard for others?

Mr. POOLE: Apparently the government now sheds responsibility because of having paid a lump sum. Representations have been made by certain cities asking that the federal government should take over the whole matter of relief. Relief will never be handled in a satisfactory manner until it is centralized.

Some time ago a lady called upon me. She had seven or eight children, and I understand her husband had been an inmate of an asylum. I believe she called on almost every member of the house. She had appealed to the local authorities, but the question of domicile had been raised. She was told that unless she returned to the province of Quebec she would not be able to obtain assistance. That seems to me a most stupid and unfair attitude to take. It should make no difference where a person resides. The fact that he is destitute should be sufficient reason for his receiving assistance. I do not know whether the minister is familiar with the case to which I am referring. This should not happen in the world's richest country.

I should also like to draw the attention of the minister to a matter in connection with the agreement entered into between the province of Alberta and the federal government. I have not the agreement before me, but I understand the effect of it worked out in this way. Certain road work was carried on in one part of the province. There were a number of farmers in that locality who were not classified as destitute because they had equipment and horses. Most of them were actually worse off than if they were destitute, because they had had no crop for some years. Men were brought in from as far away as Calgary, a hundred miles away, to work in this locality. People in the immediate locality could not get employment under this agreement.

Mr. ROGERS: The control of employment lies with the province subject to the proviso that fifty per cent shall be taken from the relief rolls, or from those who are otherwise certified as being in needy circumstances. We have no control over the movement from one district to another, apart from the relief quota.

Mr. POOLE: That is what I am dealing with right now. There were 100 men required on this work, and there were at least that many in that particular district who required work. Men were brought from Calgary to work. I discussed this matter with the provincial minister of public works, but he told me they could not do otherwise because it was on those terms that the money was obtained. To go into this question of relief would require hours. The whole system requires overhauling because it is a disgrace to this country. An investigation was held recently in the city of Ottawa and we saw spread across the pages of some of the local papers the statement that so many people on relief had radios and motor cars. I cannot understand the mentality of a man or woman who would deny the right of a person who has been employed at some time and who has purchased a radio to have some enjoyment from that radio when forced to go on relief. Some people seem to think the minute a man goes on relief he must give up every comfort. If a man should get employment at low wages and work for three months, when he goes back on relief his relief allowance is based on what he earned. In other words, these people are not encouraged to find employment. When they do obtain employment their condition is no better than when they were on relief.

Surely we are not so devoid of ideas in this country that we cannot change this condition. There is plenty of work to do in this country and we should devise a scheme to do it. Is there any logical reason why it should not be done? Unfortunately this whole matter has assumed a certain permanency. It is no longer temporary in character. It has been with us for seven long years. While we may be able to measure the cost of relief in dollars and cents, we shall never be able to measure the mental anguish that has been caused by this stupid policy. This policy has retarded our industrial expansion and is possibly the greatest factor in bringing on our present-day depression. It has increased the mill rate in our municipalities and has made heavier the burden upon the taxpayers. As the right hon. leader of the opposition said in one of his excellent speeches, it is only an insurance against insurrection. Before this session ends, the government should give consideration to the abolition of relief, with the exception of relief to those who are classified as unemployables. Relief should not be necessary in the world's richest country.

I think it is time the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) got together to issue credit in terms of public need. That would be the best answer to this problem. That would be the one way to get able-bodied men back to work. We are destroying the greatest asset possessed by this dominion. We are shrivelling up the initiative of the men of our country. Unfortunately, in party politics members sit back persistently and say nothing because they fear they may embarrass their party. Hon. members on the other side of the house should be bringing pressure to bear upon the government to do away with relief. It is a disgrace in the terms in which it is carried on at the present time. It is making slaves of men, and it has resulted in a reduction of wages all over the country.

Has the minister any information as to the number of men who have been laid off by the Canadian Pacific and the Canadian National railways in the last few weeks? I understand that men have been laid off on the plea of economy. If that is true, then we should consider carefully before giving such assistance as was given the summer before last.

I have another question I should like to put to the minister. Does he know the number of blankets purchased under the scheme put into effect a year ago when the government agreed to pay part of the cost of labour for the railways? The cost of these blankets was taken out of the wages of the men, and they did not get their blankets when they were laid off.

Mr. ROGERS: I have no information at the moment. I shall obtain it and give it to my hon. friend under another item.

Mr. POOLE: I think the federal government should get together with the provinces and municipalities and devise a uniform relief scale as the first step necessary to be taken. If we recognize that relief must be continued for two years until we get an unemployment insurance scheme or there is a greater degree of employment in this country, there will be continued suffering on the part of our people until we devise a uniform scale of relief, and this question of domicile should be dealt with as one of the first and major problems. One of the great things about the unemployment insurance scheme in Great Britain is that a man residing, say, in the city of London can move and take up his residence in Manchester and still be a beneficiary under the scheme. But here the limit of a man's activities in search of work is the distance he can walk, and that is one point that should be dealt with. If a man in Halifax happens to go to Vancouver and become destitute, if he can prove it, he should be a beneficiary of relief, and the fact that he has not resided in Vancouver for twelve months is a foolish reason for turning him down.

Mr. HEAPS: I wish to revert to the question of maximum relief and to clause 7 of the agreement between the provinces and the federal government. The minister must be aware of the fact that there have been men partly employed and even men fully employed who have been compelled to become recipients of public relief. I know instances of that kind in recent times, and if clause 7 is to be carried out according to the strict interpretation of its terms, the minister must realize the deplorable position in which cases of that kind must be. A man in that position would not earn more than $40 a month on an average, a totally inadequate sum as a basis of relief, and, under the agreement, cases of that kind could not be dealt with in any special way at all. They would be compelled to be dealt with strictly according to the terms of the agreement; otherwise municipalities and provincial governments would run the risk of having the agreement cancelled and the federal grant stopped. I am wondering if the minister would not merely consider but try to get some understanding with the provinces for the overhauling of this clause of the agreement to give some leeway to both provincial and municipal authorities so that they will not necessarily have to deal with the smaller family in the same way as the larger family seeking relief is dealt with.

Further, when you establish a scale of relief, its maximum tends to become the standard for all those in receipt of relief, and if a family of eight, two adults and six children, are compelled to live on $35 a month, that might readily determine the whole scale of relief to be granted in a particular area. That is something which ought to be seriously considered, and I am wondering whether the minister and his officials would not take into their serious consideration the necessity of revising that clause in the agreement to give the leeway I suggest to both the provinces and the municipalities.

Mr. HANSELL: Are the agreements between the federal government and the provinces of a hard and fast nature, or is there any method of making slight adjustments here and there in the agreement? I have reference particularly to the agreement with Alberta in connection with road work. I recall being at a place where a road gang was at work; they were doing very fine work, and the men were apparently happy to get the work. But the agreement evidently stipulated that a certain number employed on the work must be on relief, and some possibly could be employed who were not on relief. There were openings on this work for men who were on relief. Men and some horses were required to do certain work. This was noised to an adjoining municipality that had been very hard hit and had several families on relief, and it was suggested that they needed horses and one or two men to do this work. The horses happened to arrive when I was there, in charge of a young man from a family that was on relief. The father was an old man, and he did not feel that he could go over with the horses, do the road work himself, sleep in a tent and eat in a cookhouse, so he sent over his son who was living at home, a strong, young chap, but when he arrived he was told that it was impossible for him to get work because he himself was not on relief. He was told he could not work in his father's place. I recall going to the engineer or some official appointed by the federal authorities, but he could do nothing about the matter. I went to the M.L.A. for the constituency, but he could do nothing about the matter, and what finally happened I do not know to this day. It does seem to me that there should be some method of making adjustments in these agreements, that the agreements themselves should be elastic enough to permit of slight adjustments being made. What are the possibilities along that line?

Mr. ROGERS: I can only say that in the agreement with Alberta covering joint works provision was made that fifty per cent should be taken from the relief rolls or from those who were in necessitous circumstances. There was provision for those who were unemployed but who were not on relief. As a matter of fact, that agreement with Alberta was not carried out in its strict terms. I do not know if that is what my hon. friend has in mind. At all events the administration of it has to be left to the provincial authorities subject to the approval of a dominion representative or a dominion inspector, as the case might be. There is a certain amount of latitude with respect to the employment clause, as I have indicated; but my hon. friend will also realize that much may be said in the direction of making the terms of the agreement strict, in order to prevent the possibility of abuse. If you make the agreement too loose, obviously it is open to abuse.

I might point out, Mr. Chairman, that actually we are dealing with a special item in the supplementary estimates respecting relief agreements with the provincial governments, and not with the item in the main estimates for relief. I do not want to press that point too strongly except that I should like to make some progress.

Mr. PELLETIER: Is it not true that the federal government approves the various projects which the province may undertake?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes.

Mr. PELLETIER: I realize that this discussion might not come under the item before us, but the discussion has been going on for some time, and I should just like to raise this point. The federal government stipulates that a certain percentage of those employed on these projects must be relief recipients or people in necessitous circumstances. Second, the federal government must approve the project. Suppose the federal government approves a project which requires trucks for graveling a highway; how many relief recipients would have trucks? It is not logical to expect them to have trucks, and the result is that when the province makes its claim on the dominion government for payment the dominion government says: You did not employ people on relief. But it knows that it was impossible to engage people on relief because they did not have the necessary equipment. I believe that situation has arisen in several cases in Alberta, particularly in the northern part of the province, and it puts the provincial government entirely at the mercy of the federal government.

The point I should like to bring to the attention of the minister is this, that in the case of agreements of this kind being made with various provinces, I do not see any reason why some of these agreements or at least a standard agreement could not be embodied in the act authorizing the agreements, so that these things could be discussed in parliament. At the present time there is absolutely no way in which one can bring these things to the attention of the minister until the harm has been done. I suggest to him that if he would incorporate in his empowering act some standard agreement which he will put into effect with the provinces, we would then have an opportunity of knowing whether or not the thing was being properly handled from every point of view.

Item agreed to.

Special—To provide for commitments under relief settlement agreements with provincial governments, $200,000.

Mr. ROGERS: Item No. 516 was allowed to stand. I believe the hon. member for Leeds asked for some information regarding the expenditures under the relief settlement agreements of the past year. The amount in the estimates for last year was $400,000, and this year the amount is $200,000, designated as a revote. I find that the amount actually spent last year under the relief settlement agreements was $147,961.67, something under the $200,000 asked for this year.

Mr. PELLETIER: I believe that under this item we can very well discuss the question I took up a moment ago.

Mr. ROGERS: There is a more appropriate item I could mention.

Mr. PELLETIER: "To provide for commitments under relief settlement agreements with provincial governments"?

Mr. ROGERS: That does not cover works, as a matter of fact.

Mr. PELLETIER: Will the minister mention what item is appropriate?

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, I will, certainly.

Mr. BENNETT: Is item No. 517 passed?

Mr. ROGERS: It is the next item.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to ask whether any part of the money voted has been used for the purpose of paving the roads mentioned in the agreement that we have been discussing this evening, and whether or not a new agreement was made for their completion, and, if so, how much was spent under it.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall item No. 516 carry?

Item agreed to.

To provide for commitments and completion of works in connection with federal contributions to provincial and municipal relief projects, $1,075,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister the agreement here, the new agreement?

Mr. ROGERS: Under the 1937 act?

Mr. BENNETT: No; I am referring to 1936. What was done with respect to these highways that were mentioned to-night? When was the first action taken in connection with them? The papers will show at whose request, but that is not the matter at issue just now.

Mr. ROGERS: Does my right hon. friend mean the highways which were included in the agreement under discussion here this evening?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. It will be observed that the appropriation terminated in March, 1936. I want to know what was done in 1936 with respect to these highways, and what has been done with respect to them up to date. The papers brought down in sessional paper 107 in answer to a motion by the hon. member for Broadview indicate some of the actions, but I want to see what additional ones there were.

Mr. ROGERS: In the 1936 agreement:

	Manitoba Dominion contribution authorized	Dominion payment
Morden-Piney highway	$161,044 53	$159,142 56
Russell to Brandon—Clear Lake highway	116,739 32	112,797 67
Roblin to Duck Mountain and Benito	$37,305 50	$37,108 76
Dauphin to Fork river and Winnipegosis	27,819 27	27,721 81
Bridges over Assiniboine—Headingly village, Winnipeg and St. James, city of Portage la Prairie, town of Virden (Sproats bridge), Swan River, near Lens, and Pine River near Camperville	10,195 00	9,695 00
Crystal City to international boundary	1,906 46	1,906 46
Total	$355,010 08	$348,372 26

Mr. BENNETT: On what dates?

Mr. ROGERS: During the currency of the agreement, projects under the said agreement which were uncompleted as of March 31, 1936, and extended under agreement dated July 24, 1936.

Mr. BENNETT: That is up to March 31 in which year?

Mr. ROGERS: That would be up to March 31, 1937.

Mr. BENNETT: The expenditures made from October, 1935, to March 31, 1936, on these projects are the ones that I want.

Mr. ROGERS: I misunderstood my right hon. friend. I thought he wished to have the expenditures in subsequent years on these highways.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I want to see what expenditures were made after the present administration came into power up to March 31, 1936, and then up to 1937, because there is a revote of $1,075,000 with respect to the federal share of works to be completed, and I want to see whether in respect of these Manitoba projects we were discussing, the government went on with the work, and what they paid, and when.

Mr. ROGERS: Under the original agreement dated September 20, and up to March 31 of that fiscal year, for the town of Russell to Brandon—Clear Lake highway the amount authorized was $380,000 and the amount spent $8,925.96.

Mr. BENNETT: No; the total amount authorized. That was the estimated cost of construction. So far as that agreement was concerned, it terminated on March 31, 1936.

Mr. ROGERS: I am giving the amount spent in that period.

Mr. BENNETT: There was no estimate of the amount that would be spent in that time; that was the cost of the project. But that appropriation expired on March 31, 1936.

Mr. ROGERS: Quite, and I am giving the amount actually spent in that period—the two amounts.

Mr. BENNETT: No. One is the estimated cost of the project.

Mr. ROGERS: Well, the dominion actually spent $8,925.96 on the first road which I gave. Also:

	Manitoba Dominion contribution authorized	Dominion payment
Town of Morden to Winnipeg-Piney highway and Sprague village	$575,000 00	$9,037 73
St. Boniface to international boundary and village of Piney	250,000 00	54,542 74
Roblin to Duck Mountain and Benito	55,000 00	17,694 52

Mr. BENNETT: It is not actually the amount authorized.

Mr. ROGERS: I am simply reading from the memo I have here.

Mr. BENNETT: I say that is an inaccurate statement. That was the estimated dominion portion of the expenditure.

Mr. ROGERS: Yes, depending of course on how much work was done.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but it was not authorized.

Mr. ROGERS: If the work had been completed—

Mr. BENNETT: It could not have been completed by March 31.

Mr. ROGERS: But we were obligated up to the amount I have mentioned here.

Mr. BENNETT: No. The total amount is not to exceed that much money.

Mr. ROGERS: We were committed up to that amount if it had been spent. Those are the terms of the agreement. It was so reported.

Mr. BENNETT: No. I have read the agreement.

Mr. ROGERS:

	Manitoba Dominion contribution authorized	Dominion payment
Dauphin to Fork river and Winnipegosis	$37,500 00	$10,055 73
Crystal city to international boundary line	20,000 00	20,000 00
Bridge over Assiniboine river—Headingly village	15,000 00	14,972 42
Bridge over Assiniboine river—between Winnipeg and St. James	75,000 00	69,305 29
Bridge over Assiniboine river—city of Portage la Prairie	40,000 00	38,946 34
Bridge over Assiniboine river—town of Virden (Sproats bridge)	11,100 00	10,954 71
Bridge over Assiniboine river—
Swan River near Lens	15,000 00	12,703 15
Pine River near Camperville	3,900 00	3,602 57
Total	$1,477,500 00	$270,741 16

Mr. BENNETT: The return says, column 2, "total estimated cost." That is the way it is put. The question I wish to ask under this item is this: Were any of the undertakings authorized in the agreement which was brought down not proceeded with? If so, why? That is the red ink modification, and that is what I want to bring out. The record would seem to indicate that they were all proceeded with, except two, and with respect to them there is an order in council of February 12, and one of February 19, 1936, which modified them.

Mr. ROGERS: I will look up the orders in council. According to the two columns I have here, all projects were proceeded with.

Mr. BENNETT: That is so, except that there seems to have been a slight amendment.

Mr. ROGERS: In February.

Mr. BENNETT: I take it that that is what the red ink explanation means—on February 12, 1936, and on February 19, 1936. Therefore all projects were proceeded with except for a slight modification with respect to two or three of them.

Mr. ROGERS: That would be correct.

Mr. BENNETT: When were the projects finally completed, if they were?

Mr. ROGERS: They have not all been completed yet.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I thought.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I have here a letter from the city of Drumheller in regard to which I wrote the minister. I do not believe he has had time to reply. I might mention the subject matter. They say that for several months relief recipients have not been able to obtain clothing from Edmonton because all applications are returned to the relief office there pending dominion instructions. Is that correct?

Mr. ROGERS: We have nothing to do directly with the distribution of clothing in connection with relief.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They state they are awaiting instructions from the dominion, and I was asked to ascertain the facts. The complaint is made that these miners who are about to work and who have been on relief for some time are being notified that when they start working the dominion is going to withhold a certain amount for any relief they might receive in the future, less clothing and so on. Is that true?

Mr. ROGERS: I am informed that this is entirely a provincial regulation. The hon. member is right when he says that I have not seen his letter. I shall be glad to secure the information and forward it to him.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): They state further that the federal government is demanding from the province an eleven per cent reduction in the drought area.

Mr. ROGERS: That does not come under this item at all. As a matter of fact, the Department of Labour has no connection at the present time with administration of relief in the drought area. That is under Agriculture.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Under which item?

Mr. ROGERS: It will be in the Department of Agriculture.

Mr. GREEN: When this item was up for consideration before the house adjourned the night before last, I asked the minister what public works were being undertaken in British Columbia in which this government was interested and on which work might be available for the unemployed who are sitting in the Vancouver post office and art gallery. I understood him to say that the two main projects were the Big Bend highway and the new highway from the United States boundary to New Westminster, and he also said that these men, along with certain other classes of unemployed, would be eligible for that work. Last week I understood him to say that summer training in the special forestry camps could be undertaken by the younger men among these unemployed. He said at that time that the forestry camps had not yet been opened, but I notice from the Vancouver press that the first training camps were opened about ten days ago. As for the transients who do not belong to British Columbia, I believe the government's attitude is that they must go back to their own provinces if they wish to get assistance at all. Has any move been made to offer these men work or to offer those who are eligible training in the forestry camps, or has any promise been made that there will be work or training for at least some of them? This is of great importance, and it might help to solve the difficulty if an offer or a promise of that kind were made. Has the government made any move in that direction?

Mr. ROGERS: I answered my hon. friend the other day with regard to the chief works that were in prospect in British Columbia. As he has said, one of these projects was the Big Bend highway, and the other is the new highway to be constructed from the international boundary to New Westminster. There are other works in addition to that—harbour works and public works of various kinds, as well as work which is now under way in connection with the expansion of national defences in that area. Those who are single and unemployed, presently in Vancouver, and who are at the same time resident in British Columbia, would be on the same footing as others who are single and unemployed and resident in that province, so far as employment in these works is concerned. I told my hon. friend that the other day, and I cannot go beyond that at the present time.

Mr. GREEN: But the government has in Vancouver a special representative, a Mr. Humphrey Mitchell, who has been there for weeks. Has any offer been made to these men that they may go on this work, or has any promise been made that within the next week or two they will be able to do so? May I have an answer to that question?

Mr. ROGERS: I believe a statement was issued by the minister of labour of British Columbia with respect to employment on these projects when they were commenced. So far as federal government work in British Columbia is concerned, the work is conducted of course by the department concerned and is subject to the general clause with respect to preference in employment governing returned soldiers, married men on relief and single unemployed, and any work of that kind will be done subject to that clause.

Mr. GREEN: I have spoken about the seriousness of the situation on two or three occasions, and I hesitate very much to place it before the house again, but I believe that the government and perhaps most members in this house do not realize how serious the situation is. For four weeks to-morrow there have been hundreds of men sitting in the Vancouver post office and art gallery. It is what might be called a sit-down strike.

Mr. GOLDING: We have been told that a dozen times.

Mr. GREEN: And you will be told it again. The government is apparently carrying on a sit-down strike here. The net result is that Vancouver is being subjected to the most adverse kind of publicity possible. It is seriously affecting the tourist business, which means a great deal to the city. It is absolutely unfair to the citizens because they have to support the men, and there are threats of riots, there is always the fear of riots. In short, it is creating in the third city of Canada a spirit of hopelessness and the belief that there will be no action or leadership on the part of the government.

These men were cared for all winter by the dominion and the provincial governments in the regular forestry camps. They were let out, I believe, not all at once; the dismissals were staggered, which was a very good thing. But it was known, we warned the government weeks ago, that many men were losing their work in the logging camps of British Columbia and that it would be impossible to place these men in the logging camps as was done last summer. It was known that their funds would soon run out, that they would all congregate in Vancouver and that there was bound to be trouble. Yet nothing has been done; everyone is "just sitting." That situation is absolutely unfair to the people of Vancouver. Some action should be taken by the government without further delay. There is no excuse for this gap. The men were all out of the camps by the end of April, and yet the public works program does not start until July. There is a responsibility resting directly on this government; and all the more because its own commission, the Purvis commission, found that these men were the charge of the federal government, recommended that all employables should be the charge of the federal government. Yet nothing is done.

Mr. ROGERS: If I might correct my hon. friend, if he will examine the text of the report he will find that is not quite what the commission recommended.

Mr. GREEN: Well, it went about that far. The problem of the transient is the crux of the whole unemployment problem. How this or any federal government can say that transients coming from the prairies or Ontario or Quebec to British Columbia are the charge of the British Columbia government or of the people of Vancouver is beyond me. This unemployment is a national emergency. It is the problem of the national government. We have here another example of the spinelessness of this government; another case of "wait and see," just drifting along. Something should be done by the government about these men in the post office and the art gallery in Vancouver without further delay.

Mr. MacNEIL: The Vancouver rotary club was recently addressed by the secretary of the chamber of commerce of Hongkong. He recited some of the horrors he had witnessed in China. Then he concluded his statement, according to the press reports, by saying he was reluctant to make any appeal for funds in Vancouver, because on entering the post office he had found that Canada had a refugee problem of her own, and he saw people camped on the floor of this public building under conditions which, considering the difference in the standard of living, were worse than those in the refugee camps in China.

The minister has said that if these men disperse, they will have advantages equal to those of other unemployed in other parts of British Columbia and the dominion. I am receiving reliable information that the training courses in forestry and placer mining now being opened are not available to these men; the quota has now been filled. Furthermore, I am reliably advised that these men are now barred from any work that may arise, by reason of their connection with this affair. And that action has been condoned by the representative of the federal Department of Labour in Vancouver. These men are being blacklisted and outlawed. I suggest to the minister that not only has this demonstration on the part of the men revealed a problem which he has not lifted a finger to deal with, but he has actually condoned through his representative a procedure which outlaws these men and is likely to be provocative of serious disorder. The action of the minister or his representative must be explained. The minister's representative in Vancouver is responsible in large measure for provoking and continuing this extremely embarrassing situation.

Mr. ROGERS: Let me answer that at once. It is certainly not true that the representative of the Department of Labour of this government has had any authority, or to my knowledge has exercised any authority, such as that stated by my hon. friend. I indicated very clearly in my last telegram to Mr. Matts and the unemployed committee that so far as youth training projects or federal public works are concerned, these men on going to their own homes or their province of origin would be upon the same footing as others in a similar position; in other words, that they were not to be disqualified for such employment as is available. I have not altered that, it certainly applies to federal works, and so far as I am aware there has been no restriction as far as joint works are concerned. Of course, on joint works we can control employment only up to fifty per cent.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is there any truth in the statement that the department's representative, Mr. Mitchell I understand, in association with other officials in touch with the problem, has said that these men will not now get any work that is open; that he in conjunction with other officials has determined that.

Mr. ROGERS: If my hon. friend will be good enough to give me the authority for his statement, I shall look into it. I should be glad to receive it privately.

Mr. BENNETT: At relief camp No. 1, Vancouver post office, I am informed in a letter I received that the blankets and old coats and newspapers make such a stench in that building that it is no longer used as a public post office by those who have business to transact; that it is offensive to people to go there. I remember distinctly members of the present government when in opposition made very strong claims about sanitary conditions in relief camps, and we had officers of the Department of National Health take great care with respect to that. This relief camp No. 1 in Vancouver would seem to be in rather bad condition.

Mr. PELLETIER: Are there any sums outstanding owing to Alberta which are being withheld by reason of some dispute as to whether the agreements have been lived up to either by the province or the federal government?

[Mr. MacNeil.]

Mr. ROGERS: There was a matter in dispute between the dominion and Alberta which is now in the course of adjustment. Actually there was an overpayment to Alberta, and refund is being made accordingly.

Mr. PELLETIER: How long have negotiations been going on between the dominion government and Alberta for the payment of that sum?

Mr. ROGERS: For something over a year I should say.

Mr. PELLETIER: What is the condition which allegedly has been violated by Alberta, causing the present government to withhold those sums?

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend is not stating the position quite correctly. It is rather a case of Alberta having recognized that they were under obligation to make a refund. The particular clause of the agreement that was not carried out by the province related to the fifty per cent relief quota.

TARIFF BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORTS ON REFERENCES FROM THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning). I apologize for not sending it to him in advance, but it is a simple one. When will the tariff board reports be tabled, if they are to be tabled; and if so, on what subjects referred to the board? Perhaps the minister would rather not answer to-day, the next sitting will do.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall look into the matter and advise my hon. friend.

PRIVILEGE—MR. McNIVEN

REFERENCES BY MR. BENNETT TO STATEMENTS REPORTED TO HAVE BEEN MADE IN SASKATCHEWAN ELECTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. A. McNIVEN (Regina City): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, on my return to the city early last week I was twitted by a number of hon. members with regard to certain things I am alleged to have said during the progress of the Saskatchewan election. Although I searched diligently for it, I could not until Wednesday afternoon locate in Hansard what the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) had charged me with saying. I would have brought it to your attention yesterday, but out of deference to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) who was presenting his budget I deferred doing so until to-day.

I find on reference to Hansard of June 7 last at page 3619 the following:

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure your government would satisfy the hungry people.

Mr. Bennett: Do not let us talk about hunger. Just think of it! One hon. member, not here, saying that if you be hungry in Saskatchewan do not think of voting for this government. Do not think of voting for this government. If you be hungry think what will happen if you do not vote for the Patterson government. That is what the hon. member for Regina (Mr. McNiven) has been stating to the people of this country, according to the public press.

I want to assure you, Mr. Speaker, and other hon. members, that I never said anything, either directly or indirectly, which by any stretch of imagination could be so construed. What is more, I have diligently searched the Regina press, and I cannot find any reference therein that could be so construed.

Again on June 9, as reported in Hansard on page 3700, I find these statements in an address by the right hon. leader of the opposition:

And we have those who are responsible for providing the relief telling them that if they do not vote Liberal they will be hungry.

As a result of that statement the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) asked the leader of the opposition this question:

Will the right hon. leader of the opposition give the committee the name of a single individual who stated to any one that unless he voted in a certain way he would go hungry?

Mr. Bennett: The hon. member for Regina City is reported in the press to have said that the reason why the electors of Saskatchewan should return Liberal candidates in that province in yesterday's election was that they had obtained more money than they would have obtained if there had not been a Liberal government there and a Liberal government here.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I deny absolutely that I made any suggestion that any money had been obtained by the people of Saskatchewan, either through the provincial or through the dominion government, other than that which was necessary by reason of the disaster which had befallen that province.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I was not in my place when this matter was first raised. Had I known that it was to be raised I should have brought the papers with me to which the references were made. If letters from various citizens of Saskatchewan have any merit I shall be glad, when the appropriate time comes, to read them into the record.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): He has denied the whole thing.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, and I say I shall produce the press reports and letters.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

BOARDS OF REVIEW, TIME LIMIT FOR FILING PROPOSALS, ETC.—NON-CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENT

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate acquainting their honours that this house disagrees to their amendments to Bill No. 25, an act to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, for the following reason:

Because the adoption of the said amendments would impose hardship in certain provinces.

And that the clerk do carry the said message to the Senate.

Mr. BENNETT: Does that apply to all the amendments?

Mr. DUNNING: No, I will explain. The amendment to which exception is taken is an amendment to the last section of the bill as it left this house, section 8, an amendment which provided as follows:

On and after a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council, no new proposal shall be made or filed by any farmer or accepted by any official receiver in any province in respect of which the said proclamation is issued.

That was as the bill left this house. But coming back from the senate a new section 9 is added which provides to the following effect:

The said act is further amended by adding to section eleven, as subsection three, the following:

No proposal shall be received in any province later than the thirty-first day of December, 1938, except in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the senate amendment. The effect of it, of course, is to end the operation of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act at the end of this year in all provinces except Saskatchewan and Alberta.

The view of the government is that it is not at all certain at this time that in all the other provinces the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act should go out of business, so far as new applications are concerned, on the 31st of December of this year. The government, and I as Minister of Finance, have received representations from people in some of the other provinces that this would be unduly arbitrary so far as they are concerned, and I think that may be said particularly in respect of Manitoba. The discussion of this motion might serve to reveal the views of representatives of other provinces concerned, as to the desirability of arbitrarily terminating the operation of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act at the end of the year in all provinces except Saskatchewan and Alberta. The view of the government is that we should disagree with the amendment.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the motion that has just been placed in your hands should be amended so as to make it clear that this house disagrees with their honours with respect to the amendment they have made to section 11.

Mr. DUNNING: That is, the new subsection.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. The senate have added as subsection 3 of section 11 the following:

No proposal shall be received in any province later than the thirty-first day of December, 1938, except in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

We do not, I understand, disagree with the whole of their amendments, and as the motion of the minister reads, it would be an erroneous statement of the position of this house.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: So far as this particular amendment is concerned, it is a question purely for the government. They have indicated that they propose to deal with it by order in council, and the senate has dealt with it by fixing an arbitrary date in all the provinces but two. It is probable, as the minister has said, that the executive would be better able to exercise the discretion than would this parliament with respect to any particular province, and I would concur in the message to their honours if the motion be amended so as to make it clear that it applies only to section 9 of the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: I shall be glad to amend the resolution accordingly, if the clerk will put it in shape to apply only to the new section 9 that has been added by the senate. I should like, however, an expression of view from hon. members from other provinces who may take exception to this senate amendment.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased indeed that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has indicated that the government intends to oppose the amendment made to this bill by the senate. So far as I know, no representations have been made on behalf of anyone in the province of British Columbia that the operation of the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act should cease in that province at the end of this year. I was surprised that the amendment should have been moved by someone who had no interest whatever in British Columbia and had received no representations from that province, when the effect of the amendment is to leave British Columbia outside the operation of the act after the end of this year. The amendment would certainly work a great hardship not only on certain farmers but particularly on the soldier settlers, who we were told this year, would have the opportunity of going before the board under this act with a view to receiving an adjustment. I protest against the senate amendment, and I am glad that the minister has moved non-concurrence.

Mr. W. R. MACDONALD (Brantford City): Mr. Speaker, from statements made in this house and representations made from various parts of Ontario I believe it would meet with the approval of the province of Ontario if the act were discontinued so far as Ontario is concerned. Quite a number of members from Ontario spoke on this bill when it was before the house, and almost all of them, if not all, were in favour of having the act discontinued in respect to Ontario.

It occurred to me that instead of sending the message to the senate in the form suggested it might be possible to change the wording of the bill—I am making not a motion but merely a suggestion—to make it read that no new proposals shall be received in the province of Ontario after the 31st of December, 1938.

Mr. J. A. GLEN (Marquette): Mr. Speaker, I agree with what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has said, that this house should refuse to accept the amendment made by the senate. I know there are arguments pro and con respecting the continued operation of this legislation in Manitoba, but there has been no crystallized opinion in that province against the continuance of the act, and now that the question is before the house I submit that Manitoba itself should have the right to say whether the legislation should be dropped so far as that province is concerned. I am quite sure I speak for many in Manitoba when I say that the Manitoba legislature is the proper authority to cancel the operation of the act, and until that has been done I entirely agree with the Minister of Finance.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, while I heartily endorse the action taken by the Minister of Finance in rejecting the amendment made by the senate, I would call attention to a phase that has not been mentioned by previous speakers. At page 2710 of Hansard of May 9, when the minister was putting through this bill, I called his attention to the fact that——the opportunities of this act were largely relied upon by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) when he was putting through the amendment to the Soldier Settlement Act.

We asked him again and again what the soldier settler was going to do without an extension of the dollar for dollar bonus provision that we were asking for, and he replied that they could get relief under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act. I called the attention of the Minister of Finance to that and asked him to give his assurance that he would look into it before he made any decision, at least as regards British Columbia, and he did give that assurance. I may say I heard no suggestion that it should be done away with in British Columbia, and certainly, if it is done away with, one would expect in all good faith that the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) would introduce amendments to the Soldier Settlement Act giving us an extension on the dollar for dollar bonus.

Mr. H. J. BARBER (Fraser Valley): I understood that for some time the British Columbia government has been opposed to this legislation, and no doubt any information which the other house acted upon came from that source. Without doubt there have been complaints. At the same time I think we agree that this legislation has done a lot of good, in relieving many of the farmers in our province. However it cannot continue very much longer, and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) has been wise in proceeding as he has, and in providing that it shall be left to the governor in council, who would be in a better position than this house to ascertain at what period the legislation should be withdrawn from British Columbia or any other province.

Mr. T. A. THOMPSON (Lanark): I heartily agree with the hon. member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) that so far as Ontario is concerned we should like to see the act discontinued. I was in the house when this act passed, and we were assured it was to be a temporary measure, to give temporary relief to people who had purchased land in war time, when prices were very high, and had borrowed money at a high rate. They have now had four years to make these adjustments, and I should like to see this act wiped off the statute books. Any statute which interferes with a legitimate contract is dangerous legislation, and this act has interfered with legitimate contracts between borrowers and lenders. The government may have had some justification for entering upon this course four years ago, when farmers were paying high rates of interest and when it was thought desirable to adjust some sales of land which had been made at exorbitant prices. But they have had time to make these adjustments. I think the act has fulfilled its usefulness and should be discontinued.

Hon. H. A. STEWART (Leeds): This gives me an opportunity to repeat what I have said on former occasions in connection with this act. As has been stated by the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Thompson), it was intended to be a temporary measure. Moreover the act has application only to debts contracted before it was passed, which was in the year 1935; so that any debt contracted by a farmer since 1935 does not come under its provisions. Surely three years is a sufficient time within which debts contracted prior to 1935 could be brought to an adjustment under the provisions of this act. I believe that most of the farmers who can come under the act with respect to debts prior to 1935 have done so; at least they have had their opportunity, and if notice is now published and given to them that the end of 1938 will be the limit of the act, they will have had ample time to come in.

I regard it as in the public interest that the act should be terminated, and I think it ought to be definitely known when it will be terminated. Let us remove the uncertainty about it. I do not care to speak for any province other than my own, but in Ontario the sentiment is overwhelmingly in favour of immediate termination. I had hoped that the minister would end it by the first of July, but of course that cannot be done, under the provisions of this measure, until it passes. I still hope that he will take the very first opportunity to proclaim the termination of the act in its application to the province of Ontario.

Mr. T. F. DONNELLY (Wood Mountain): With reference to what the last two speakers have said, I am glad indeed to know that the act so far as the province of Saskatchewan is concerned is not to be interfered with, and I thoroughly concur in what the Senate and the House of Commons have agreed upon, namely, to leave the act, so far as Saskatchewan is concerned, still in operation. Certain portions of the province of Saskatchewan, over fifty per cent of its area, have not had a crop for nine years. How is it possible to go in there at the present time and adjust debts? The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act in those portions of the province has not even begun to operate. It is impossible to value land which has had no crop for nine years. No one can say what it is worth. Only after we have some crops—and we hope we shall have crops from now on—will it be possible to put the act in operation. So we are glad that the act is to remain operative so far as Saskatchewan is concerned.

Motion as amended agreed to.

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES ACT

AMENDMENT RESPECTING SHIPMENT OR TAKING OUT OF FURS WITHOUT PROPER AUTHORITY—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 110, to amend the Northwest Territories Act.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): This is really the preparation and submission to this house of an entirely new bill. It cannot in any sense be said to be a mere amendment. It proceeds on an entirely different theory from the legislation submitted to us in Bill No. 110. The bill contemplated the issue by the exchequer court of what is known technically as a writ of assistance. The senate has seen fit to draft a new bill, which provides that the Secretary of State may issue a certificate which has all the effects of a writ of assistance and is issued under the seal of the Secretary of State. After a cursory examination of it but taking some degree of care it would seem to me that from the standpoint of efficiency and effectiveness the senate's suggestion is probably a better one than ours. In every case it was contemplated to attend on the exchequer court and secure a writ of assistance. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) knows that a writ of assistance is something which is easily obtained but sometimes may be readily abused, and this gives the government complete control of the situation by the grant of a certificate the form of which is set out in the new statute, which contemplates that the certificate shall be issued only to some person in the public service of Canada and at the instance of His Majesty's Attorney General of Canada. To ask that we concur in the amendments means that we concur in an entirely new bill, with which I am not in disagreement at all, though I think it fair to point out that it is an entire departure from that which we commenced with when we considered Bill No. 110.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): The right hon. gentleman is quite right. This is entirely different from what has been proposed in the bill introduced by the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), and it is also rather a change from what is usually done under similar circumstances. But we have carefully considered the change made by the senate amendment. Neither the officers of the Department of Justice nor those of the Department of the Secretary of State have any objection to the change, radical as it is, and under the circumstances I am quite willing, so far as I am concerned, to accept it, and concur in the amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: It is the substitution of a new bill.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Absolutely.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

PELAGIC SEALING

PROVISION FOR SANCTIONS FOR VIOLATIONS OF NORTH PACIFIC SEALING CONVENTION—CONCURRENCE IN SENATE AMENDMENTS

Hon. J. E. MICHAUD (Minister of Fisheries) moved the second reading of and concurrence in amendments made by the senate to Bill No. 98, respecting the North Pacific Pelagic Sealing convention.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): There are quite a number of amendments, but for the most part they consist in the striking out of certain sections of the bill, which brought in certain sections of the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act, bringing pelagic sealing under those sections. The senate has struck out those sections and substituted a sort of summary of them, and I should like to call attention to what is now proposed. I know that they have only followed the wording of the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act, but the fact that something is old does not necessarily mean that it is right, and if we never did correct anything on the ground that it was long established we would not make much progress. At page 456 of Votes and Proceedings the proposed amendment to subsection 2, of section 1 reads:

If the master or person in command of any such ship, vessel or boat does not, upon any examination under oath by any officer or person under the authority of this act touching the cargo, equipment and voyage of such ship, vessel or boat—

That is, any boat that has been boarded by the officials.

—truly answer all questions put to him in such examination, he shall incur a fine of $400.

I would point out first of all that the men concerned, who will be accused in these cases, will almost inevitably be Indians, because the bill is dealing with Indians who shoot or kill seals illegally. If they took ten seals in one day, which would be phenomenal, the total value would not exceed thirty or forty dollars; and for an offence involving the illegal shooting of forty dollars' worth of seals, these Indians will be liable to a fine of $400—that is, if they do not truly answer all questions under oath. Now, there is a criminal code in Canada and that code provides a certain penalty for perjury. That offence is dealt with by itself in the code and it is severe, and I cannot see why it is necessary to introduce into this act a part of the criminal code, setting it up independently of the code and putting it into operation.

Next it is proposed to insert the following as a new subsection (3) of section 11:

(3) Every person opposing any officer or person in the execution of his duty under this act or aiding or abetting any other person in such opposition is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine of $800 and to two years' imprisonment.

Section 4 of the bill as we passed it provided that under the circumstances here indicated the person contravening the regulation should be guilty of an offence against the act; and in section 11, as the bill passed this house, it was provided that every person guilty of an offence against the act or of a contravention of any regulation should be liable to a fine not exceeding $500 or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding six months; and that was upon summary conviction. It seems to me that what we provided in the bill originally was quite sufficient considering the essentially small value of the goods involved; but the other legislative body has taken the matter out of the category of summary convictions and made it an indictable offence, imposing the enormous penalty of $800 and two years' imprisonment. That, I submit, is unjust. It is unfair to impose such a heavy penalty for an offence involving so small a matter as thirty dollars' worth of skins. Surely the provision in the bill as we passed it, making the offence subject to summary conviction, was the most workable one in these outlying places. Now, however, it is proposed to make the offence indictable, and the penalty as severe as I have indicated. I submit that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) might consider the wisdom of objecting to that amendment on the ground that it is unnecessarily severe.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): There is only one section to which I should like to direct the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and that is the new section 13 which provides that the statutory limitations shall be three years. I submit that, having regard to the character of this legislation, twelve months would be ample time within which to institute proceedings. When we are dealing with a floating population, to have these matters stand over for as long as three years is sometimes, in my opinion, to do nothing but encourage what I once heard a learned judge describe as a species of blackmail, and I think three years may be a little long.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Is that a provision added by the senate?

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. It reads:

All actions for the recovery or enforcement of penalties or forfeitures imposed by this act shall be commenced within three years after the offence committed.

I submit that one year is ample, but I merely express that view to the minister. So far as the other sections are concerned, there is no doubt that what the senate has done is to endeavour to make this a code within itself, by adding thereto, instead of leaving to inference, the provisions of a statute, namely, that dealing with violations of the customs act; and notwithstanding what my hon. friend from Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has said, I always think it is desirable to have within the four corners of a statute itself all provisions that have to do with the institution of proceedings and the recovery of penalties rather than leave them open to uncertainty and doubt. I am inclined to think that the amendments made by the senate are an improvement in the legislation, but owing to the discussion that took place when the matter was before this chamber, and the indication by the minister that he wanted the matter treated in the way in which it was, we made the provisions of the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act applicable without specifically indicating, as the senate has now done, the sections in question.

I am at variance with the hon. member for Comox-Alberni as to the severity of the penalty in connection with interference with officers in the discharge of their duties. I suppose the hon. gentleman would expect me to differ from him anyway, but it is one of the general principles of our jurisprudence that we cannot afford too great protection to those into whose hands we entrust the enforcement of laws in view of the fact that very often they risk their lives in carrying them out. I have a consistent record of endeavouring to ensure that, and therefore I must be at variance with my hon. friend and favour the amendments made by the senate.

Mr. MICHAUD: The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) is right in stating that what the senate did in this bill was to include the provisions that were there before only by inference. Section 3 of the bill as it left this house read:

> Section five and all of the following sections, except sections ten and twenty-nine, of the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act, chapter forty-three of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, shall be deemed to apply, in so far as applicable, for all the purposes of this act, and shall have effect as if enacted herein.

The provisions of section 3 of the Customs and Fisheries Protection Act, and other sections referred to herein, have been included and have been made specifically part of this act. I believe this tends to make for greater clarity in administration, and especially is it better in view of the fact that the act is to be distributed in other countries.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point.

Mr. MICHAUD: Regarding the undue severity of the penalty, may I say that the senate committee has not informed us of its reasons for maintaining them as they were; but inasmuch as there is no actual change from what was enacted in this chamber, we have been disposed to approve of and to accept the suggestions of the senate.

Motion agreed to; amendments read the second time and concurred in.

[Mr. Bennett.]

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT

MEASURE TO ASSIST THE CONSTRUCTION OF HOUSES—PROVISIONS WITH RESPECT TO LOW RENTAL HOUSES AND MUNICIPAL TAXES

The house resumed from Monday, June 13, consideration in committee of Bill No. 145, to assist the construction of houses—Mr. Dunning—Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN: As I recollect it, we were considering section 4, subsection 2 (b).

On section 4—Advances.

Mr. BENNETT: Section 4 was permitted to stand for the purpose of enabling the minister to deal with paragraph (b) of subsection 2 of section 4.

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I do not believe we had finished consideration of the section. The section had not been passed.

Mr. BENNETT: No.

The CHAIRMAN: Paragraph (a) was passed and paragraph (b) was permitted to stand.

Mr. DUNNING: I gave some consideration to the suggestion made by the leader of the opposition that the 70 per cent minimum ought to be lowered—

Mr. BENNETT: No; take it out altogether.

Mr. DUNNING: Anyway, the effect would be the same. To take it out altogether would mean that no matter what percentage a prospective home owner might have, in the form of equity, the loan would nevertheless be eligible to come under part I of the National Housing Act. Of course, as I said the other day, the purpose behind the measure is more that of helping the man with a small equity to obtain his objective of owning his own home than that of merely reducing interest rates to those who have substantial equities. I am anxious that the amount of money put into this scheme by the dominion should go as far as possible towards that line of development.

Mr. BENNETT: But in my judgment paragraph (c), which mentions 25 per cent, covers that point. It states that the sum total of the two should not exceed 25 per cent.

Mr. DUNNING: The proportion advanced by the dominion, according to paragraph (c), is not to exceed 25 per cent of the total of the whole loan.

Mr. BENNETT: No. It states:

The advance made by the minister shall not exceed 25 per centum of the total advance made jointly by the minister and the lending institution.

Mr. DUNNING: It shall not exceed more than 25 per cent of the whole amount loaned. Frankly it is my view that lending institutions would tend to put on pressure for dominion housing loans in which the prospective borrower had considerable equity, and they would tend therefore to be reluctant to act for the benefit of those with the smaller equity. That is really what I fear, put in a nutshell. If the act does what we hope it will do, it will be much more effective as it applies to persons with smaller equities. That is the class it is designed to help.

Mr. BENNETT: All right. I find it difficult to follow the theory that we should provide not less than 70 per cent. However if the minister has made up his mind that that is the action to be taken, it would merely be wasting time to talk further about it.

Mr. DUNNING: I will say that since we last considered the bill my mind has been pretty full of other matters, and I have had opportunity on only one occasion to discuss with my officials the point raised by the right hon. gentleman. It may have greater importance than I now attach to it as a result of experience thus far gained under the Dominion Housing Act. I suggest that we let paragraph (b) stand, so that I may give detailed consideration to it, because I realize it has to do with a vital feature of the legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, it has.

Paragraph (b) stands.

Paragraphs (c) and (d) agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 2, paragraph (e).

Mr. DUPUIS: I did not know this bill would be discussed this afternoon. It had been my intention to go into the matter with the Minister of Finance, because some people fear that it would affect certain parts of the civil law of the province of Quebec. For instance, paragraph (e) reads as follows:

The loan shall be for such period and upon such terms as to payment of principal, interest and taxes by monthly instalments as the minister shall determine—

And so on. I believe there are other parts of the measure to the same effect. May I point out that according to the laws of the province of Quebec as contained in the civil code and other municipal legislation, municipal taxes, school taxes and church assessments are privileged, and are paid before a first mortgage or any other imposition. In view of the wording of the section I wonder if the people in the province of Quebec are not justified in the fear that when the act says the money loaned by either the minister or a lending corporation shall be secured by a first mortgage, such mortgage will be privileged over church assessments, and municipal and school taxes. I should like to ask that some clarification of this and other sections be made, so as to allay the fears of people in my native province.

Mr. DUNNING: Paragraph (e) is worded in exactly the same way as the corresponding section of the Dominion Housing Act under which we have been operating for more than two years. I may point out at once that there is no intention, nor would it be valid if there was, to set the mortgage ahead of taxes. That could not be. The subsection merely intends, and has been so administered in the past, to enable the mortgage agreement to be dealt with by means of monthly payments. In some provinces, and in some connections, it is desirable to have the arrangement for monthly repayment of the loan also include a monthly contribution to be applied on the taxes, and so far as I can learn we have had no trouble in any province in working out that phase of it.

Mr. BENNETT: It is purely a matter of contract.

Mr. DUNNING: It is purely a matter of contract between the lender and the individual borrower, and in no case do we pretend to set this mortgage ahead of the statutory charges created by provincial legislation. I can assure my hon. friend of that without question.

Mr. DUPUIS: I thank the minister for the explanation, though some may criticize it as not being sufficient. An explanation by a minister of the crown is not enforceable as the law itself, of course, but I perused the act when I received complaints about it from those interested in church assessments. They were told that the levies made for the building of churches, for instance, would come after the first mortgage, as indicated in this act. So far as I am concerned I feel sure that the federal government in the past, no matter which party was in power, never tried to override provincial legislation, but in this case some interested parties whose opinions I respect were afraid that what is mentioned here and in similar sections might be so construed as to permit such preference.

Personally I am ready to interpret the law as drafted in the light of the explanation of the minister.

Mr. BENNETT: I realize what the hon. member has in mind. He is thinking of the decisions of the privy council that a debt due the crown has priority over other debts; and because the mortgage is given to the crown, his majesty in the right of the dominion, and the lending company, someone has been raising with the friends of the hon. gentleman the question of the priority of the crown. That question could arise only under circumstances which the minister hopes never will prevail. I may say to the hon. gentleman that the question of priority never should arise, but apparently some of his friends have construed this as giving priority to the crown as against taxes assessed for church purposes under a provincial statute. That is quite clearly what he has in mind, but I do not think this section intends in any way to deal with that. It merely makes provision for the terms of repayment. Does the minister think it advisable to cling to the monthly payment, or might there not be a discretion with respect to quarterly payments?

Mr. DUNNING: There is a discretion now.

Mr. BENNETT: Is it clear that there is? I understand from something I heard, which I questioned, that some of the loans did not provide for monthly payments. Probably that is erroneous, a misunderstanding. It was under the farm loan act that provision was made for quarterly or half-yearly payments; this act in terms provided for monthly payments. I was wondering whether it might not be desirable to provide also for quarterly payments. I do agree with the minister that in connection with this type of loan monthly payments are much to be preferred.

Mr. DUNNING: One of the most satisfactory experiences of the past two years has been the manner in which the monthly payment method has come to be accepted by the interested parties. Even the lending institutions, which, as my right hon. friend knows, were strong objectors to the monthly payment system, are now practically unanimous converts to it, particularly in the low cost housing field.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what it was done for originally.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. The fact that the monthly payments, similar to rent, month by month are building up the equity of the owner in his own home is a good thing in practice, and I feel inclined to stick to it as a result of the experience we have had. If we once provide an alternative I am afraid there will be a constant leaning away from the sound principle, particularly in the case of wage earners, of repaying this money monthly in the same manner as they now pay rent. They have become accustomed to that in these thousands of cases, and I have not heard a complaint from any source regarding it for a number of months now.

On the other point mentioned by my hon. friend from Chambly-Rouville (Mr. Dupuis), my legal advice is that this section does not at all touch the point of setting the mortgage in these cases ahead of taxes.

Mr. DUPUIS: If the minister will allow me, it reads, "principal, interest and taxes." It does not say which has priority.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: That question could arise only on liquidation.

Mr. DUNNING: It could arise only on complete liquidation, of course. I would hesitate to put into the law anything providing that the crown in any sense yields in advance any rights it may ultimately have.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not necessary here.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not necessary to do so. It is necessary to give recognition in practice, as we do, to provincially-levied taxes that are within their constitutional field, and I understand that in Quebec the taxes for church assistance are just the same as any other taxes and have the same priority. Many loans have been made under this provision in the province of Quebec without any difficulty, and I am fairly sure that the apprehensions of those who communicated with my hon. friend are quite unfounded in that regard.

Mr. BENNETT: I want to make just one further observation. The minister was not in the house at the time, but when the provision for monthly payments was inserted in the previous bill the minister of finance of that time gave practically the same reasons that are now given as to why we concluded that monthly payments were the proper form of repayment. But conditions have improved a bit, and I wondered whether or not provision might be made for quarterly payments. Since the minister says that complaints in that regard have entirely disappeared, however, perhaps the proper course to pursue is to say that the experience has been such that there is no reason why there should be a change, so we will leave it at that.

I am satisfied that my hon. friend from Chambly-Rouville has in mind that what has been said as to the priority of the crown with respect to its debts must have some relation to this section, but clearly that is not so in any shape or form. That would come about only in the event of there being a sale of the property; then the question of priority might arise, but not otherwise. Is the minister quite sure that all the loans made have provided for monthly payments?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, absolutely; and we are in the fortunate position of having no losses to date. Those who studied the matter very closely from the standpoint of lending institutions attach a great deal of the credit for that condition to the working out of the monthly payment plan.

Mr. BENNETT: Some of the big loan companies in England which provided for monthly payments make the very same observation; they attribute their freedom from losses to the monthly payment plan.

Paragraph agreed to.

Section 4, subsection 2, paragraph (f).

Mr. BENNETT: Is that fixed by the terms of the contract? I see that it is in the old act. Should not the losses be borne in proportion to the advances made?

Mr. DUNNING: The old provision is that in the event of a loss being sustained in connection with a loan from whatever cause arising, the amount of the loss shall be allocated as follows—

Mr. BENNETT: That is the contract?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. It reads:

(a) If at the time the loss occurs the amount owing under the mortgage or hypothec for principal, interest, taxes, costs and other charges properly due on the mortgage account, is more than the amount advanced by the company two-thirds of the loss will be borne by His Majesty the King, represented as aforesaid, and one-third by the company;

(b) If at the time the loss occurs the amount so owing under the mortgage or hypothec is less than the amount advanced by the company two-thirds of the loss will be borne by the company and one-third by His Majesty the King, represented as aforesaid.

Mr. BENNETT: Then the state of the loan is the test?

Mr. DUNNING: The state of the loan is the test, and it is a standard form of agreement. Then follows paragraph (c), which deals with what happens in the event of sale of the mortgaged premises.

Mr. DUPUIS: Paragraph (f) reads as follows:

(f) except as provided by paragraph (g) of this subsection, any loss sustained in respect of any loan shall be borne by his majesty and the lending institution or local authority. . . .

If we go back to section 2, part I, the explanatory note (f) reads:

"Local authority" means any province, municipality . . .

Mr. DUNNING: Having authority to undertake a housing scheme.

Mr. DUPUIS: Yes. I do not see anything in the act which prohibits such action, but would the bill forbid the municipality or any local authority or lending company to sell such houses at any time after they are built, provided that certain conditions proposed by the minister have been complied with? I am interested to know that, having regard to the experience I had in municipal affairs some years ago. The committee will recall that we had federal legislation under which similar associations or companies built houses in municipalities and small towns and even in cities, and it was found to be a complete failure, a complete loss to the municipality. I have in mind municipalities which lost large amounts of money, over a million dollars. I do not want to compare municipalities with governments, but sometimes we find from experience that they are worse than the government as to their capacity to administer something that private individuals could administer. With a municipality administering houses in that way, the residents of the municipality generally believe that they are not bound to pay the rent, not bound to make repairs or pay for them. Sometimes they go further than that; they do not take care of the property at all, and the municipality generally speaking is in a very bad situation. So that unless there is some measure which forces the municipality to impose its city regulations upon the tenants, I do not believe it is a good thing. That is my personal view. That is why I am in some cases in favour of selling these properties to individuals. I believe it is a good policy to give facilities to municipalities to build these low cost houses, but at the same time I believe it would be good policy to facilitate the selling of these houses to reliable persons in the municipality.

Mr. DUNNING: In this part of the act the municipality comes into the situation only if it decides to assume itself the position of a lending institution. That is, the local authority becomes the lender, and as the lender it enters into an agreement with the minister in the same manner as any private lending institution would do. Then of course the local authority becomes just the same as any other lender having to put in a great deal of its own money. No local authority has yet availed itself of that privilege, and I gave some consideration in the redrafting of the bill to the question whether it would be desirable to leave in connection with part I the right to a municipality to become itself the lending institution. I thought, having regard to all the possibilities which might arise, that it was desirable to leave it in such a position. It has never occurred yet, but I can conceive of its occurring in places where the municipality exists for one industry, and the industry might desire that the municipality should become for that municipality only a lender under the terms of part I. We do not bar that, but of course if a municipality does become a lender under the terms of part I, it must comply with all the provisions which the minister must exact from private lending institutions.

Mr. DUPUIS: I am sorry, in this discussion I was quite ahead of the clauses. What I said should apply to part III.

Paragraph agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 2, paragraph (g).

Mr. BENNETT: I find it a little difficult to understand that we would incur a liability "not exceeding $600 per habitable room" in the case of a multiple family dwelling. Under the statute "multiple family dwelling" is to be defined by order in council. That leaves a very uncertain situation to be dealt with. We can pay losses not exceeding $4,000 in the case of a single family dwelling and $600 a room for multiple family dwellings; and what is a family dwelling and a multiple family dwelling is to be settled by the governor in council under regulations, if I remember aright, provided for in section 8.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, defined for the purpose of this part.

Mr. BENNETT: I should like a little explanation as to how these figures are arrived at. We are providing for losses; it is not a question of values. That would mean that the property they were contemplating building would be worth somewhere between $6,000 and $7,500, because it would be very bad business to contemplate a loss of as much as $4,000 in the other type of case. That is the only clause about which I have any difficulty. I quite understand the crown undertaking to assist, but we are going to assist up to a $4,000 loss.

Mr. DUNNING: No—loan, not loss.

Mr. BENNETT: Loss in respect of loan.

Mr. DUNNING: It is not loss; it is loans up to $4,000. That is where I could not follow my right hon. friend.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I first thought, but look at it:

—the minister shall pay losses sustained by the said lending institution . . . in respect of loans, not exceeding four thousand dollars. . . .

Mr. DUNNING: It is a question of the meaning. The meaning we intend to apply is that $4,000 is the limit of the loan. It is a question of draftsmanship.

Mr. McCANN: Take out the comma after "loans."

Mr. DUNNING: I do not pretend to be a master draftsman. The legal authorities went into this very carefully. Leaving out the intervening part between "losses" in the first line on page 4 down to the word "minister" in line 7, it would read:

The minister shall pay losses . . . up to certain amounts specified in a schedule of amounts fixed by the minister, graduated downwards in accordance with the size of the loan and graduated upwards in accordance with the percentage which the loan bears to the lending value.

It is a complicated thing to try to set out, I admit.

Mr. MASSEY: If the minister will accept a suggestion, why not say in line 3, "such loans not exceeding four thousand dollars."

Mr. BENNETT: That would be in accordance with the general meaning of the section.

Mr. DUNNING: It is the loans that are not to exceed four thousand dollars.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes, "such loans not exceeding four thousand dollars."

Mr. DUNNING: Or we could take the comma out.

Mr. BENNETT: Or put the word "such" in.

Mr. STIRLING: If you take the comma out, you do not need "such."

Mr. BENNETT: The senate added "such" in half a dozen cases the other day.

Mr. DUNNING: Let us say, "losses on loans which do not exceed four thousand dollars."

Mr. BENNETT: Quite, there is no doubt about that.

Mr DUNNING: Then, Mr. Chairman, we will put in the words after the word "loans," in line 3 of page 4 of the bill, "which do," and delete "ing" from "exceeding," so that it will read, "loans which do not exceed."

Mr. STIRLING: And again in the next line.

Mr. DUNNING: And delete the words "not exceeding" in line 4.

Mr. BENNETT: Should not "and" be "or," so that it would read "which do not exceed four thousand dollars in the case of a single family dwelling or six hundred dollars per habitable room in the case of a multiple family dwelling."

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I would ask the chairman to substitute "or" for "and" in line 4. Now, Mr. Chairman, if you would be good enough to read what you have.

The CHAIRMAN: It will read:

The minister shall pay losses sustained by the said lending institution or local authority in respect of loans which do not exceed four thousand dollars in the case of a single family dwelling or six hundred dollars per habitable room in the case of a multiple family dwelling.

Mr DUNNING: Right.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. HEAPS: In connection with the granting of these loans by private lending institutions I have one particular case that I think it desirable to bring before the committee. The following letter is from Montreal, dated June 13, 1938:

Two years ago I secured a loan under the Dominion Housing Act through the Sun Life Assurance Company, and built a house. My loan was granted in June and I went ahead and gave a contract and proceeded with the work. But when the document called the "deed of loan" was handed to me for my signature in August, I discovered in clause 26 that if I should not be able to pay or if I defaulted one monthly instalment, thirty days after it was due the lender (the Sun Life) becomes, ipso facto, the absolute owner of the property. This I consider very unfair. If I should meet with an accident or be sick, or for any other reason fail to make one monthly payment then I lose all the money I have put into the property, which in this case amounts to $4,300, the loan being $5,700. I took this matter up with the Deputy Minister of Finance at the time. He agreed that it was unfair but did not see what he could do about it.

In a case of this kind, where a man in fairly good circumstances has an equity of almost fifty per cent in the building, and through some misfortune is unable to make his payments for two or three months, if the owner of another part of the equity then forecloses it is most unfair that the borrower should not have ample opportunity of redeeming his property. I was wondering if, through regulation by the federal authorities, the owner of such a large equity in the property could be given reasonable opportunity of retaining at least his own equity in it.

Mr. DUNNING: That raises a most difficult question. We do not dot every "i" and cross every "t" in the contract as between the mortgagee and the mortgagor. The terms are, of course, made subject to the existing provincial laws in relation to mortgages. I have not in mind the clause to which my hon. friend refers, but I can assure him that although such a clause might be in the contract, no mortgagee such as one of our great life insurance companies desires to foreclose on property. They may have the power to do so under such a particular clause, but their method of doing business is certainly not to do so. I shall be very glad, however, to look into the case if my hon. friend will supply me with particulars. It is a delicate matter for the federal authority to attempt to prescribe mortgage conditions. Because of our interest contractually we shall have certain rights under this statute with respect to approval of the mortgage terms, but we cannot go very far, in exercising that right, from what the laws of the province provide with respect to it.

Mr. HEAPS: I can understand that in certain circumstances the mortgage companies might exercise very strict control. Where a person has a small equity in a property there may be some reason from the company's standpoint for strict supervision. But where a man has normally a fifty per cent equity—

Mr. DUNNING: That is why I should like to look into it.

Mr. HEAPS: I should be quite content to give the minister the details of the case so that he may look into it, in the hope that, when the regulations are made effective, in such a case the man who has the equity in the property will be given what I consider a reasonable protection.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend can, of course, see the difficulty. In drafting a contract to operate under this new law, in which the owner can put in as low as a ten per cent equity—that is how small his equity can be—obviously the rights of the mortgagee must be pretty strong with respect to default in the monthly payments, because the equity is so very small in relation to the amount advanced jointly by the lending institution and the government. But where there is a fifty per cent equity, I can see that the same provisions might not be necessary. I shall be glad to have it looked into.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. member will look into it, I think he will see that this provision is not applicable in any province other than Quebec. The old principle, "once a mortgage always a mortgage" is the foundation of our whole system of jurisprudence with respect to the foreclosure of the equity of redemption. But that does not apply to the province of Quebec. In our western country we used to provide that the mortgagor should, in the event of default, attorn to the mortgagee and become a tenant at a rental equivalent to the payment which was to be made. That still obtains, I think, in some provinces, although I believe some had it taken out. The one rule that the supreme court in two or three cases, notably that of Williams v. Box, which came from Manitoba, laid down, was "once a mortgage always a mortgage," and no contractual agreement or terms of any understanding between the parties could foreclose that equity of redemption on the question of its being subject to redemption on the part of the mortgagor at any time while the mortgagee held title to it. But in the province of Quebec the situation is entirely different. I believe the hon. member will find on investigation that, while that reads as a very drastic provision, in practice it will be impossible for the company to secure title to the property without taking appropriate proceedings to that end, and the mere declaration in the contract that failure to make or default in making the payments called for has the effect of vesting the property in the mortgagee is not to be taken as severely as it reads.

Mr. GRAY: It must be bound by provincial law.

Mr. BENNETT: That, I think, is why that provision appears in the contract to which reference has been made.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 2, paragraph (h).

Mr. BENNETT: This provision is subject to great abuse, I would point out to the minister, and probably will be abused. The small amount of twenty dollars is to be provided for the purpose of assisting the lending institutions, in addition to travelling expenses, I doubt whether it is wise to make a statement of that sort in a public statute. It is a very great encouragement of something which is not the purpose of the statute itself, especially that part of it which says:

> . . . shall not exceed twenty dollars for any one loan together with an allowance fixed by the minister for necessary travelling expenses based upon the distance from the nearest place from which the loan can be arranged and supervised by said lending institution.

That is one of the things which has caused more trouble in this country than anything else in connection with loans, the question of that—

Mr. DUNNING: —expense.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. That is a short word to cover it. I think the minister knows exactly what I refer to.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: It has been a serious drain upon private borrowers and private lenders, especially with respect to certain types of companies. To the borrower's amazement, when the loan is settled he finds that the costs of making the inspection and of travelling are out of all proportion to what he expected they would be. The allowance was too much. I doubt the wisdom of including this provision in the statute. The minister has concluded it is desirable to do so, but I think it would be better to say, even though it does permit of possible difficulties, that the minister may assess and name a sum in excess of twenty dollars which would include everything, not exceeding fifty dollars in any one case, or something of that sort. It is very desirable that the country should in these remote communities be able to make some contribution, but the number of miles an automobile can cover on such an inspection tour and the quantity of gasoline that may be consumed are almost beyond one's imagination. I suggest to the minister the desirability of considering it from that angle.

Mr. DUNNING: I must admit that this question of expenses has given me a great deal of concern, because I am certain that if we are to make the benefits of this measure available to communities remote from what may be called lending centres we must provide some way to assist in the expense of making the loan. During the last little while, by regulation under the old act, a contribution of ten dollars per loan has been offered with respect to certain remote districts, and the lending institutions have told me just what the leader of the opposition has been now saying with respect to that sort of thing. I wanted to advise parliament through this section that it was our intention to endeavour to work out contracts with lenders covering a whole community, let us say, the Gaspé peninsula, a place like Mont Laurier, Prince Rupert, Chapleau, and a number of others of which my deputy reminds me, and which are subjects of correspondence, where we cannot possibly get lenders to undertake the expense involved in carrying out the normal operations of inspection of the security which is offered while the house is being built. Of course the intention would be not to allow a mileage on one house in Mont Laurier or one house in Gaspé, but rather to work out an arrangement under which a lending institution undertaking to make so many loans in a remote area would be given a mileage allowance for automobile travel during the inspection of these loans. I admit at once that there will be quite a large executive responsibility in endeavouring to keep this property under control, but I honestly see no other way of making the facilities of the measure available to many communities in which it is needed and in which it would do very considerable good.

Mr. BENNETT: I suppose the minister has read what took place in another place in connection with the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act—the debate in the senate?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I read it, and I have heard it too.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister then, realizes why I am making the observation I do in respect to this section.

Mr. BARBER: I noticed that the official at present in British Columbia, while in Vancouver, met representatives of a community located some forty miles from that city, and gave them to understand that it would be necessary to have six contracts before they could undertake the work in that particular section. The committee returned with that understanding, that a particular lending institution required six contracts before they would undertake anything in that district.

Mr. DUNNING: That would be a typical case of a lending institution applying conditions to a district. With reference to the visit of Mr. Nicolls to British Columbia, he has been there for some time and since he went out these new conditions which we are considering have been evolved. He is not fully familiar with the form which they have now taken, and they might conceivably now affect the lending institution to which my hon. friend refers so far as that point is concerned. I do not regard it as unreasonable, however, for a lending institution to insist on a reasonable number of loans.

Mr. BENNETT: And one loan would not carry the load.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a matter of economy of operation, and I believe that this provision will enable us to do some constructive work along that line.

Mr. McNIVEN: Is it proposed to pay the twenty dollars only on condition that the loan is made?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. It is a loan.

Paragraph (h) agreed to.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Loans by lending institutions.

Mr. BENNETT: Only the words underlined are new.

Mr. HEAPS: This is a very important section of the bill and one which I hope will be made use of to a very large extent. I know that there are very many people who are anxious to take advantage of this provision to build small homes valued at between $2,500 and $3,000. At the present time there is a shortage throughout the country of that type of home for small families. One thing I was afraid of a year or two ago when we passed the housing act. During the course of the discussion then I spoke of the fear I had that the men engaged in selling the commodities necessary for the building of houses would increase their prices when there was a demand for their materials, and I believe it was so. After the passing of the act, when construction became a little brisker than usual, the cost of material went up in many instances, and I am afraid that unless there is some kind of check kept by those responsible for the administration of the present bill when it goes into effect we may again have an increase in the prices of the various commodities that go into the construction of houses. In that event the equity which a person may have of ten or fifteen per cent would be wiped out automatically by the increased cost of materials.

I wonder if the minister has in mind any means of preventing such an increase in the cost of commodities. We want to encourage people to put up decent homes at the prices contemplated in this particular section of the bill. I know the task is a very difficult one and it means that the minister may have to regulate, to some extent perhaps unofficially, the cost of building material. But in the announcement he made in the budget he has already given a considerable concession to the building industry in wiping out the sales tax amounting to eight per cent. I am wondering whether he has in mind now, in view of the statement he made when introducing the bill, that it was a challenge to the building industry, some means whereby the cost of building material will be kept from rising.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend knows how difficult that question is. Section 3 of this bill gives the minister power to make an investigation with respect to factors entering into the cost of construction and as to the feasibility of securing economies and increased efficiency. That provision is there to enable the minister to have machinery whereby he can investigate causes which might operate in increasing costs of material. My hon. friend must recognize of course, as we all do, that there are legitimate reasons for some increases in the prices of commodities, and there are, of course, price increases which we might regard as illegitimate. The minister is given authority under that section to find what the facts are in connection with such a situation, and then, of course, he will have available the machinery of law as it now exists, dependent upon what the cause was found to be. That is as far as I can go in answer to my hon. friend. I have spoken very plainly, both publicly in this house and privately to the construction industry, pointing out that there is one way for this whole program to be killed or to be deprived of its effectiveness, and that is for those engaged in it, no matter who they may be, capital or labour, to regard it as an opportunity for increasing the prices of the commodities they have to sell, irrespective of what those commodities may be. I believe that, and I can only assure my hon. friend that, regarding it as seriously as I do, everything that can be done to prevent anything of the sort he suggests will be done. I do not think I can be more specific than I have been in that regard.

Section agreed to.

Section 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Limit of time.

Mr. BENNETT: This section really permits the governor in council to repeal the act. It is a rather serious matter from that angle.

Mr. DUNNING: Not to repeal the act, if my right hon. friend will read it carefully.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the effect of it.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

[Mr. Heaps.]

Mr. BENNETT: Well, the governor in council may fix and determine a date on and after which no loans under this part may be made.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes; I see the point.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely that operates as a repeal of the act for that purpose. I think I can understand why the minister desires to have that power, but on the other hand I think he will agree that if ever the conditions become so serious as to warrant any such action being taken, the action will not be taken. That is, there will be no applications for loans. The officials would say that that is the very time that they would apply; I would say it is the very time they would not. But it is an extraordinary power.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: It appears in all these statutes in one form or another. The effect is to declare that we are going to grant $20,000,000, less what has already been loaned—because that is what section 6 means. It provides for advances and the payment of losses, and so on, of $20,000,000, less the advances made under the authority of the Dominion Housing Act, 1935. Under that act, about how many millions have been advanced?

Mr. DUNNING: Our advances amounted to $4,500,000 and total loans to $17,500,000.

Mr. BENNETT: So far as we are concerned, four and a half millions.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And the amount still available would be some fifteen and a half millions?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Or, if the same ratio were maintained, it would contemplate possible loans amounting to some $70,000,000. Four times seventeen would be sixty-eight and four times four and a half would be eighteen millions, so that roughly speaking, it contemplates seventy or seventy-five millions. This power to bring about the repeal of the statute with respect to loans has also a further difficulty, in that as the section now reads once it is done there is no power vested in the governor in council to renew it. That is the end of it.

Mr. DUNNING: The intention is to wait for parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, I thought so. I think that is an extraordinary power, but I can understand why it is being sought.

Mr. DUNNING: Reverting to the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Heaps) and speaking to the observations of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) I would call attention to the power involved in the section. It is an extraordinary power. I shall not discuss the reasons I know the leader of the opposition has in his mind which might make necessary the termination of the act. But it is important for the government to be able to say, in the event of inflated prices, "Gentlemen, we have power to stop making loans under this act, or to stop making loans of more than a certain amount per house." That is contained in section 7, and is one of the reasons why the government believes the house might be well advised to grant this power to the governor in council.

Mr. HEAPS: I think it is a very necessary power to have. I believe that at the present time there is price regulation on many of the commodities which go into house building. I think the prices of lumber and plumbing fixtures are regulated, and the prices of some of the other commodities which go into house building are pretty well monopolistic in character. The power the minister is assuming under the bill is a very desirable one, and may even act as a deterrent on many corporations which otherwise might increase the price of commodities if an opportunity presented itself.

Mr. MASSEY: Is there any limitation in the number of homes one person may build under this part of the bill? A person may wish to build a house for himself and houses for several of his children.

Mr. DUNNING: There is no limitation.

Mr. MASSEY: In other words the loan is relative to each house, and not to the individual?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: Could a speculator obtain loans for several houses?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, under this part he could, if he could arrange with the lending institution.

Mr. HEAPS: Any person who wishes to take a chance on building a home for resale may do so under this section of the bill?

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. MASSEY: If he wishes to rent the house?

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. MASSEY: That comes under part II of the bill.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: He does not come within the definitions contained in section 2.

Section agreed to.

On section 8, subsection 1—Regulations.

Mr. DUNNING: In connection with subsection 2 I have considered the suggestions by my right hon. friend with respect to publication in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister sees the reason for the suggestion? The section has the effect of law, therefore I think we should publish the whole in order that it may be available to those who desire to know about it. I am glad the minister has taken that action in respect to it.

Mr. MASSEY: In regard to houses that are to be built in accordance with the plans in the possession of the department and available to the would-be home owner, will the estimated cost of the house be taken from the plan, or from the location of the house? A house may be valued at $2,500 in Toronto but may not have the same value at some other point. The value might be lower.

Mr. DUNNING: The location will be the factor.

Mr. MASSEY: Not the plan itself.

Mr. DUNNING: The calculation of the cost must be made by applying to the specifications the costs prevalent in the district in which the house is being built.

Mr. MASSEY: In other words, contractors will tender for the house.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 8, subsection 2.

Mr. BENNETT: What did the minister do with the amendment to subsection 2?

Mr. DUNNING: There was no amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: But this is not sufficient. I thought the minister was moving an amendment.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Subsection 2 reads:

(2) All orders and regulations made hereunder shall have the same force and effect as if they had been included in this part and all such orders and regulations as are of general application, or abstracts thereof, shall be published in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: There are two limitations there. I think everything should be published.

Mr. DUNNING: It would make a tremendous volume.

Mr. BENNETT: That does not matter. If it were in this statute it would have to be made public, and as it has the force of a statute it therefore should be available in its entirety. The minister sees the point.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, I do; but if my right hon. friend will permit me to develop the difficulty, I should like to do so. I have used the word "abstracts." In the first instance the governor in council may by order or regulation determine the manner in which the cost of construction of a house shall be estimated, and by whom and in what manner the appraisal of the value of a house shall be made. That will be for the minister, and will in effect be a specification. And then we have paragraph 2 which states that the governor in council may prescribe sound standards of construction. Gazetting would be tremendously expensive.

Mr. BENNETT: Remember, this is law, as though passed by this parliament.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, and it was so under the old act. There was no suggestion under the old act that specifications and standards should be published in the Gazette. That would be going entirely too far.

Mr. BENNETT: It was not a provision in the old act.

Mr. DUNNING: No, general regulatory powers were given; and under those general regulatory powers all these things had to be done. Here we are setting them out in detail.

Mr. BENNETT: And you are going much farther. You say:

> All orders and regulations made hereunder shall have the same force and effect as if they had been included in this part—

That is, as though passed as a statute by this parliament.

Mr. DUNNING: Under the old act it is stated:

> The governor in council may make regulations for the purpose of determining what shall be included in the cost of construction and by whom and in what manner the appraisal of the value of a house shall be made, to require any department of the government of Canada to furnish to the minister advice and assistance upon his request, and otherwise for the efficient enforcement and operation of this act and for carrying out the provisions thereof according to their true intent and meaning.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Of course my right hon. friend would not contend that the regulations made under that general power did not have the effect and force of law. Of course they did.

Mr. BENNETT: They stood in an entirely different position as a matter of law; but that is a technical matter which need not be discussed.

Mr. DUNNING: I am anxious to meet my right hon. friend, but on the other hand I am anxious to avoid the necessity of publishing whole books in the Gazette especially to meet the interests of only a few individuals.

Mr. BENNETT: Of only a few individuals? I hope the minister realizes what we are doing is dealing with the exercise of executive power by a government, which is equivalent to the exercise of legislative power by parliament. That is a thing to keep in mind.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not recognize that.

Mr. BENNETT: We are substituting for the parliament of Canada the executive of government.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think that is so.

Mr. BENNETT: And therefore everything done by that executive is legislative, not administrative—and this is legislative and not administrative; and therefore every person in this country has a right to know what the laws of the country are. I want to make clear to the minister that this is not an effort to clog the Gazette.

Mr. DUNNING: I understand that.

Mr. BENNETT: It is an effort to make clear the distinction in the mind of every hon. member, and in the minds of people outside the house, between legislative power and administrative power. When this parliament clothes the executive with administrative power it is not a matter of importance to publish all the details, because they become known as acts of the government. When they exercise legislative powers, then that legislative act should by some means be known to the people.

Mr. DUNNING: I agree.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the story. I have tried so often to make the distinction clear. Sometimes I feel I have succeeded and at other times realize I have failed. But the distinction is clear. Both administrative and legislative powers spring from a grant of power by parliament to the executive. So long as the executive exercises its legislative power within the four corners of the jurisdiction conferred by parliament, it is intra vires. The moment it steps over the line it is invalid and ultra vires. Administratively that question does not arise at all.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I have endeavoured to make it clear.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my right hon. friend let me say a word so as to put the matter simply before the committee. He regards the act set out in section 8 as being legislative in character.

Mr. BENNETT: Some of them.

Mr. DUNNING: I regard them as administrative in character. Take the first one—

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say they were all legislative.

Mr. DUNNING: Take paragraphs (i) and (ii) of subsection 1, which have to do with the manner of construction and the prescribing of sound standards. Is there any good purpose to be served by publishing these in the Gazette? Are these specifications legislation, or are they an administrative effect of legislation? I take it that undoubtedly these would be considered administrative. With respect to paragraph (iii), which has to do with prescribing the information to be given by an applicant for a loan under this part, surely that is clearly administrative. We would not think of setting out in an act of parliament the information which should be given by an applicant.

Mr. BENNETT: Unfortunately we always used to do that very thing.

Mr. DUNNING: The next paragraph says:

(iv) determine the manner in which losses incurred in connection with loans made under this part shall be established.

That is an administrative matter. We have determined the principles which are to govern; we have surrounded the governor in council with controls in that regard, and within that limit we say there must be regulation. That, I take it, is an administrative act. When we come to the next paragraph I admit that it may be legislative:

(v) define, for the purposes of this part, the expressions "habitable room," "multiple family dwelling," and "single family dwelling."

I admit at once that here we come into the legislative field, and the only reason I am asking for power to define what these terms mean is because I find it quite impossible to come into this house to-day and define them with sufficient particularity to suit the conditions in all parts of Canada. The matter will have to be very carefully worked out. The sole difference between my right hon. friend and myself is not, as he puts it, that legislative powers extended to the governor in council should be made public in the Gazette. I agree entirely with that. The point of disagreement is that I do not regard any of the powers here extended, save the one I mentioned, as legislative powers at all, but look upon them purely as powers of administration.

Mr. BENNETT: Clearly there is an acute difference between the hon. gentleman and myself with respect to what is legislative and what is administrative. When we talk about the losses of this country in connection with this measure, surely that is not administrative. There is a principle laid down, which of course is legislation.

Mr. DUNNING: And it is in the bill.

Mr. BENNETT: Part of it is in the bill, but the clause provides:

(iv) determine the manner in which losses incurred in connection with loans made under this part shall be established;

I am not going to do more than to say this, and then I shall have concluded all I have to say, and shall be satisfied. This, with other legislation dealing with this subject matter, goes further than most legislation has gone in this country in conferring upon the governor in council—and you will note that I am saying nothing about the Prime Minister's fear of the governor in council in other days—power, authority and jurisdiction to an extent that is not usual. I have suggested that whenever the exercise of that power is legislative in character, it should be published in order that "he that runs may read," so that "wayfaring men, though fools, shall not err therein." That is the position. If the minister, with his knowledge of legislation, thinks subsection 2 is ample for that purpose, I have done my part in directing attention to the point. I feel that subsection 2 is not ample, in some respects, and I feel it my duty to direct attention to the fact that it is a negation of the theory propounded by the present government as to the powers to be exercised by the governor in council. I am glad that the minister at least has kept before him the distinction between what he conceives to be the exercise of legislative power and the exercise of administrative power. The book to which reference has been made so often, by the lord chief justice of England, was directed against the exercise of legislative power by the executive. It was not directed against the administrative power; for everyone knows that you cannot have laws if you undertake to set out in a statute all the details of administration. You must clothe with power the officials charged with responsibility, and the governor in council must name the persons to discharge that responsibility. But when you get into the legislative field you are dealing with another matter altogether, because this parliament is asked to confer upon a committee of parliament, namely the cabinet, power to legislate, which of course is the negation of Magna Charta itself, as one of my hon. friends from Toronto would say. It is the negation of it; but at the same time, if the minister thinks this is ample for his purpose, I have served mine by making the distinction abundantly clear.

When an executive exercises legislative power pursuant to authority given by parliament, this has been regarded as the beginning of autocracy, and it was the anathemas thundered against the late government by the present Prime Minister with respect to matters less important from a legislative standpoint that brought about so much discussion in this chamber. The smiling face of the Minister of National Defence is always there to remind me of the fact that at all times, in dealing with these matters, he would be ready to join in that well known psalm "I the sinner am," or probably, with respect to a matter of this kind, "I the chief sinner am."

Mr. STEVENS: I should like to direct the attention of the minister to one feature which I think should be considered. I found that a great many people who desired to take advantage of the act as it existed previously found great difficulty in ascertaining what they had to do, the nature of the thing and so on. In fact, many told me that they had endeavoured to find out from institutions such as insurance companies and so forth, which were more or less agents for the handling or administration of the act, and that those institutions were so vague in their knowledge of the matter that these people had just given up hope of getting any accurate information. This clause has to do with the terms, conditions and so on that will govern, and what the applicants must do or must know in order to determine whether they desire a loan or can comply with the terms. I think there is a danger, and I should like to point out one or two clauses and then indicate where that danger may be. Paragraph (ii) of subsection 1 provides for the prescribing of sound standards of construction. In the United States they have a bureau of standards, which publishes certain standards regarding cement, electrical equipment and the various branches of construction. These standards are established, fixed and definite, and are accepted and conformed to by the building industry. We have no such standards here.

Mr. BENNETT: They are, generally, part of the specifications.

Mr. STEVENS: Yes; but we have no such standards established here, although the national research council did have the matter in hand, I know, and did hope to establish such standards. I know there are certain standards set up within the industry itself, and the national research council had some part in that, but here we must have uniform standards for all, because you may prescribe standards in one part of the country and, if the governor in council chose to change that order in council a month later, you might have another standard. That is where the fine distinction comes in between legislation and administration. I think we should surround this legislation with the utmost safeguard, so there will be the least possible tendency to change it, and so that it may be made as perfect as possible before it is promulgated.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend let me deal with that point before he goes on to the next one? He has put his finger upon one great difficulty I found in attempting to administer the old housing act, particularly with respect to providing standard specifications. They were too difficult. First, there could not be a standard specification for the whole of Canada; that became obvious very early in the work we were doing. Second, there was that absence of real standards to which the hon. member refers. Towards the end of last year I directed the attention of the national research council to this problem, and as a result the national research council, I think, in January, summoned a meeting of all the elements which might be conceivably be concerned with it. I was present at the meeting, and the ground work was there laid for studies which would lead to accepted standards along basic lines such as those which my hon. friend has suggested. Of course it will not be a quick matter, and the grave problem of diverse climatic and other conditions in various parts of Canada does not make it easier; but I agree that we must attain something of the results which have been attained—although they are not by any means universally acclaimed in the United States—by the bureau of standards of that country in relation to the building industry there. For the present, however, we had to evolve specifications under the Dominion Housing Act; we had to do the best we could with the material at hand; we had to make the best decisions we could, in consultation with the construction industry, architects and others, for the various parts of Canada. And that has been done in our standard specifications as they now exist. I may tell my hon. friend what I believe he will be rather pleased to hear, namely, that in the correspondence I receive the attacks made on the specifications are always that they are too stiff; that a little lighter construction here and cheaper there would do as well. It is the usual contest between the technical men and the practical men as to what can be done. I try to avoid getting on either side, but to find the best from both, and we are making progress in that regard as a result of contacts which the housing division maintains with the construction industry.

With respect to people knowing about the law, it early became apparent from our experience with the act that generally speaking, people in those areas in which lending institutions were not prepared to lend, would not know much about it. It was for that reason that we evolved in pamphlet form publicity material descriptive of the whole scheme, of which pamphlets many thousands of copies have been distributed; they are going out all the time in response to requests which my hon. friend will appreciate come constantly to the department. But that has not overcome the difficulty of lending in the more remote districts. That we hope to overcome by other provisions.

Mr. STEVENS: Once the department arrives at a conclusion in regard to these various matters, it strikes me it would be wise—although I do not think the minister will agree with this—to publish it in the Gazette.

Mr. DUNNING: I should like to publish it in something which is more widely read.

Mr. STEVENS: But this occurs to me: Most lawyers, for instance, and institutions like insurance brokers' offices in the towns and cities, get the Gazette. Usually in a smaller town there is one person who carries on a general financial brokerage business. Once these matters were published in the Gazette and were in the hands of that type of citizen, particularly in the smaller communities, and also in the cities, the person desiring to borrow usually goes to such an agency for information, and it strikes me that if these were so published, there would be available what might be called an authoritative document which would convey the necessary information.

Then as to paragraph (iv), "to determine the manner in which losses incurred in connection with loans made under this part shall be established;" with all due deference to the minister's observations of a few moments ago, it seems to me that should be very definitely set forth in the most authentic way, and published in some official organ such as the Gazette.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, that would be, of course, under subsection 2 of section 8.

Mr. STEVENS: I am reading paragraph (iv).

Mr. DUNNING: What is described in paragraph (iv) would be published in the Gazette; that is the intention. It would be of general application and therefore would be published.

Mr. STEVENS: I understood the minister to say that down to paragraph (iv) inclusive would not be published.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no. As a matter of fact, I would endeavour to publish abstracts under paragraphs (i), (ii) and (iii) for the purpose just indicated by my hon. friend. But to publish in the Gazette the set of specifications applicable to British Columbia, or the prairies, and another set applicable to another part, seems to me wasteful. We might in the Gazette give notice that such specifications had been approved, and where they could be secured. But the regulations covering the establishment of losses would, of course, under subsection 2 have to be published in the Gazette and made available to everyone.

Mr. STIRLING: The minister referred just now to publications which had been prepared and had already gone out with regard to the previous act. Those, I take it, will all go by the board now?

Mr. DUNNING: Well, much of them will still be useful.

Mr. STIRLING: But they will have to be modified.

Mr. DUNNING: Revised.

Mr. STIRLING: Have such revised publications already been prepared and, if so, will they be made available promptly so that they may be in the hands of members of the house and others who desire to make use of the provisions of the new measure?

Mr. DUNNING: Instructions have already been given to proceed with the preparation, subject only to this, that they must not be finally settled until this measure passes parliament.

Mr. STIRLING: But they could be very rapidly finished.

Mr. DUNNING: The basic work is going on now. We shall have to wait until we see what our brethren in another place do before we finally decide. But as quickly as possible descriptive matter is being prepared.

Mr. STIRLING: Certainly the sending out would have to await the royal assent.

Mr. DUNNING: Even the printing.

Mr. STIRLING: Will the minister see that hon. members of the house are furnished with copies of all of them?

Mr. DUNNING: We can do that.

Mr. BENNETT: That seems to me to be an admirable idea. They have to be printed anyway.

Mr. DUNNING: Literature is always sent in any case, but I shall make a special note to see that hon. members get this material.

Mr. McNIVEN: Strict adherence to these regulations has been a difficulty in the past. If they are to be rigidly adhered to and made uniform throughout Canada, this is going to limit lending in various parts of the dominion. For instance, certain municipalities have a building department, building by-laws and fixed specifications. Where these specifications do not agree with those of the department, there is conflict.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the trouble.

Mr. McNIVEN: For example, in Regina they require for a house a nine inch cement wall. The department's specifications require a ten inch cement wall. It is argued that the extra inch does not cost any more. They have not succeeded in proving it to me, but the department does take that point of view. Contractors and home builders say it increases the cost of construction.

Mr. BENNETT: Of course it does.

Mr. McNIVEN: Another point, which I admit is debatable, is that the department's regulations absolutely prohibit the use of second-hand material. I can understand this in relation to lumber, but there are many houses for which second-hand material, such as siding, in good condition could be used at a substantial saving of cost, and second-hand bricks can be used for the cellar walls or the inside of a chimney, but this is absolutely prohibited by the regulations.

Mr. BENNETT: After the United States act came in, they tried to rush second-hand plumbing material into this country, because they had so much of it they did not know what to do with it.

Mr McNIVEN: In eastern Canada, with its snowfall, the eastern regulations direct that the ceiling joists be 2-inch by 6-inch or 2-inch by 8-inch lumber, and those directions have been adopted by the department. In the west, where our snowfall is not as heavy or as wet as it is in other parts of Canada, good building regulations permit the joists to be constructed of 2-inch by 4-inch lumber. Again, it is suggested that these regulations do not increase the cost, but actually they do increase it.

There is another difficulty. I do not know whether we have experienced it in western Canada or not, but I am informed that in Ontario the hydro-electric commission designates the type of wiring and the type of electrical fixtures that may be put in.

Mr. BENNETT: Before they will supply the current.

Mr. McNIVEN: Yes, and that is done in Saskatchewan by the power commission. I have had considerable correspondence from wholesale firms in Toronto stating that materials approved by the American Fire Underwriters Association will not be approved by the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission for use in construction in this province.

Mr. BENNETT: They have had trouble over radios on that account.

Mr. McNIVEN: I am not familiar with that, but I am told that plugs and switches, approved by the Ontario Hydro-Electric Power Commission are available at a cost of twenty cents each, while similar articles, approved by the American Fire Underwriters Association can be purchased in quantities in the United States, brought in here duty paid, and sold for seven cents each, but the Ontario Hydro-Electric Commission will not approve this imported equipment.

Mr. DUNNING: We cannot do anything about that.

Mr. STEVENS: Oh, yes.

Mr. McNIVEN: I give these as illustrations of how the rigidity of the regulations may restrict the application of the act and in some degree defeat the intention the minister has in putting this legislation through. I hope that a strictly uniform specification will not be laid down applicable to the whole of Canada, but that variations will be permitted in accordance with good building practice in different parts of this country.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend could have had the privilege of sitting in, as I had, with all the different interests, municipal and otherwise, in the national research council office, I am sure he would agree that it is one of the most difficult tasks possible to secure the kind of agreement which would bring together the different interests even in those areas where conditions are reasonably identical. The disputations waged hot and violent as to what was proper even in the same area; they are still going on, and I am not criticizing those who are taking part in them, but I do doubt the possibility of us getting anywhere in this committee in attempting to define the specifications.

I should like to correct the hon. member for Regina (Mr. McNiven) in one particular, when he said that no second-hand material may be used. I have our specifications in my hand, and they provide that the face brick shall be new bricks, in good shape and condition, but that the backing bricks may be second-hand stock if they are hard burned and complete. My hon. friend did not suggest second-hand brick for the front, did he?

Mr. McNIVEN: No.

Mr. DUNNING: So he was in error in saying that no second-hand material was permitted. I doubt if I can discuss with any degree of assistance to the committee what should and should not be permitted in the way of second-hand materials.

Mr. BENNETT: Second-hand plumbing should not be permitted. After the housing act came into force, the Americans tried to flood our market with second-hand plumbing.

Mr. STEVENS: Electrical equipment is also a red hot and very difficult subject.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. Hydro is supreme in Ontario.

Mr. STEVENS: But that is not the only difficulty. We tried some years ago to establish through the research council a standard for Canada; we came into conflict with hydro, and a compromise was arrived at. But the point in the matter referred to by the hon. member for Regina is that the underwriters association in fixing rates for fire insurance had adopted, and I think they still do to a large extent, the United States standards fixed in Chicago by the underwriters bureau of standards, or whatever they call it. The result is that some equipment of British or Canadian manufacture is not approved by the Chicago laboratories. That applies to switches and many other articles. There has been a conflict of opinion and of interest. I think it would be very difficult in the specifications under this bill to deal with a subject of that kind, but unquestionably it is desirable that there should be established an official standard for Canada by federal authority under the national research council. My opinion is that the dispute is quite capable of being ironed out between Ontario and the national research council. As a matter of fact, I know that four years ago there was an understanding and a compromise arrived at.

Mr. DUNNING: Which satisfied neither party.

Mr. STEVENS: That is quite true, but I still believe the matter could be ironed out. The main difficulty was with the fire underwriters association and their demanding a certificate under the Chicago laboratory standards.

Mr. DUNNING: We have that in mind.

Subsection agreed to.

Section 8 agreed to.

Sections 9 and 10 agreed to.

On section 11—Coming into force of part I.

Mr. MASSEY: When does the minister think there is a possibility of this measure coming into force?

Mr. DUNNING: I left it in this way instead of having it come into force on assent, because it was desirable to get into touch with the lending institutions at present under contract under the old housing act, and to work out the new types of contract which this part I will involve. We expect to commence that work on Monday. We got a little ahead of the game in assuming that parliament would enact this legislation, but we wanted to be well ahead with preparations, and we thought it advisable to leave the coming into force subject to proclamation. In the meantime the existing contracts continue and loans are being made under the old act.

Mr. MASSEY: Has the consent of the provincial legislatures to be obtained in order that part I may become effective?

Mr. DUNNING: No consent of the province is required for anything in part I.

Mr. MASSEY: In other words, as soon as this measure is proclaimed as being in force, it is automatically in force without any reference to provincial legislatures whatsoever.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 12—Cost of construction of houses built under a low-rental housing project.

Paragraphs (a) to (f) inclusive agreed to.

On section 12, paragraph (g)—"Local housing authority."

Mr. MASSEY: Perhaps we went a little rapidly for a moment. Paragraph (e) reads:

"house" includes any single house or dwelling, duplex or apartment house, providing housing accommodation built in accordance with a low-rental housing project.

Does that include garages in connection with a large block of flats or something of that sort?

Mr. DUNNING: As will be seen later, it may include incidental commercial space in connection with an apartment development, and that would, of course, include a garage.

Mr. MASSEY: Many of these apartment developments, as the minister quite properly calls them, have rather large service buildings, such as a heating unit, which is placed in the centre of a large block, perhaps in a U-shape or L-shape, and a garage for the use of the tenants, and in some instances the cost of these outbuildings may be twenty per cent of the cost of the whole building. That could be included as a "house."

Mr. DUNNING: Of course one must remember that this part of the bill is for low-rental housing for people who cannot afford to pay an economic rent for a house.

Mr. MASSEY: True.

Mr. DUNNING: The reason for making provision for incidental commercial space is in order to enable the project to attain that objective. I rather doubt whether we should approve garages for people who cannot afford to pay an economic rent. When the state is subsidizing the rent that people are paying, I doubt very much if we should make provision for a garage also. My hon. friend might consider that point.

Mr. MASSEY: I was thinking more particularly of buildings in connection with an apartment house, where flats are let at a low rent, it may be to a single individual who wishes to live very modestly, and who owns a car. He is prepared to move into that apartment house and rent a flat. I am thinking of similar projects elsewhere.

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think one need worry about garages in connection with the kind of people we desire to have come into this scheme.

Mr. MASSEY: The minister and I are thinking of two different things. My mind goes to projects I have seen in other countries, where there are small flats which contain, perhaps, two rooms let at a very low rental, but which are exceedingly comfortable and are used by people of fair means.

Mr. DUNNING: But they are not state-subsidized in the manner we are contemplating here.

Mr. MASSEY: Some are. Some Swedish ones are. The "H.S.B.," which has built more houses than any other company in Europe, is state-subsidized, at least guaranteed by the state, and all its blocks of flats have outbuildings of one sort or another, which are part of the block. Then, if there are to be stores and properties of that kind—

Mr. DUNNING: "Incidental commercial space."

Mr. MASSEY: That is what the minister means by "commercial space"? That comes within part II of the bill?

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): What brought the minister to the idea of an income five times the rental? Is the rental of the average workman in Canada not about fourteen per cent rather than twenty per cent? Did the minister fix the price arbitrarily?

Mr. DUNNING: It was a question of finding a fair means of measurement, and after taking into account all the bases of economic rent elsewhere, the experience which has developed elsewhere in regard to the schemes, and such information as is available to us in that regard from our own bureau of statistics, we reached the conclusion that five times is about right. If you take a particular case and apply it to a family as one knows a family, I think it will be apparent that the standard is about as close as we can come to accurate measurement relative to the decision we shall have to make as to when it is appropriate for the state to subsidize. That really is the point: At what point is it appropriate for the state to subsidize? We say in this part that in principle it is appropriate for the state to subsidize only when the economic rent is more than one-fifth of the family income.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister explain—I have been out of the house, and perhaps the question has been asked already—whether it will be possible to have this low-rental system in force in places where there is what one might call a settlement of anything up to five or six hundred people, not incorporated?

Mr. DUNNING: It would be very difficult to assume that such a community could comply with the essential economic conditions demanded; that is, to provide a scheme large enough to enable the resultant economies, both in construction and in management of the project after it is completed, to make possible a low-rental project in a small village, for instance, or in an unincorporated area. I can hardly conceive of that being possible.

Mr. REID: There are districts I know of in British Columbia—I have one in particular in mind, the one I live in—that are developing to a very considerable extent. This particular one is just outside the limits of New Westminster. It is a rural municipality. There are also in the municipality three health resorts, which are also developing; people are going there and putting up houses, living there the whole year round. I think such settlements should be considered. I was going to mention that under paragraph (k). I would ask the minister to consider the matter further.

Mr. DUNNING: It would be possible, of course, under the "limited-dividend housing corporation" as defined in paragraph (f), provided you could persuade the limited-dividend corporation to undertake what was inherent in the size of the project and the distribution of it. But I should like hon. members again to remember that part II is intended to provide low-rental housing for people who in the nature of things are not in circumstances which would warrant them in becoming home owners, that is, people of very low income; and it is presumed that the state therefore will help, that the province will help in certain eventualities. If the municipality is the authority set up, the province must help by way of its guarantee and the municipality must help by way of maximum tax provision. What we have in mind as developing under this scheme principally is large-scale projects of flats. We hope that in the area surrounding Montreal something of that sort will occur through the operation of the limited-dividend corporation. In one or two other places it may very well develop by action of the municipality. But it will be for the purpose of dealing with the poorest people, the people of the lowest incomes, because it definitely involves the principle of state subsidies for those people who are unable to pay economic rents. We must keep that in mind as the basis of the whole scheme. To imagine that under part II we can go out into summer resorts and places like that and do such things seems to me questionable, although certainly they will be eligible if they can comply with the conditions. There is no doubt at all that to get down to the rental standards contemplated by part II it will be necessary to have large-scale projects, a very considerable number of units, and the most economic construction.

Mr. NEILL: I quite agree with the minister that the scheme will have to be on a substantial scale if low prices are to be obtained. Still, the bill does provide presumably for the scheme to be applied generally, and one might conceive of a settlement with one thousand inhabitants not incorporated, where there might be need for ten small tenements or small, low-rental houses. As far as I can judge from the bill, it does not seem possible to apply it to such settlements because it is provided that the municipality must give certain guarantees in connection with taxation, and there does not appear to be any provision for anything of that sort in an unorganized territory under provincial jurisdiction. I do not think it is possible to meet such a situation.

Mr. DUNNING: There is a unique situation in British Columbia. To whom could the limited dividend corporation give an option in such a case, in British Columbia?

Mr. BENNETT: Only to the provincial government.

Mr. NEILL: And then the provincial government would be responsible.

Mr. ESLING: Would the minister consider the possibility of the purpose of this bill being facilitated by the persuasive measures with industrial concerns? No matter what inducements are offered, there are many communities that feel they are being discriminated against, and yet it would not be sound business for any financial institution to engage in operations in such places. It seems to me, however, that where there are substantial industries which are not in the red—they must have reserves if their businesses are to be carried on on a proper basis—they might be persuaded to undertake construction of houses for their employees, which would do away with a lot of red tape and obligations and responsibilities. In such a case the firm would build a house and deduct from the employee's pay cheque each month such a sum of money as might be agreed upon so that he could carry on for the rest of the month.

Perhaps I might be forgiven for citing the operations that are going on at Trail. That company's first thought is the convenience of the employees, because they are convinced that this is the first step towards efficiency, and for that purpose they have let a contract for the construction of 240 houses. They have selected a desirable location midway between Trail and Rossland, and these 240 houses are now under construction. Each will have concrete basement, a furnace, four rooms and a modern bathroom on the first floor, and the second floor will be so arranged that it can be finished by the employee himself at his own convenience. The construction of these houses is substantial, and the cost is at the very minimum, far lower than the employee himself could build a house by his own contract. These houses are for the use of employees only and are sold only to employees. The employee can pick out his location and purchase his house at the minimum cost. The cost will range between $2,200 and $2,300. An employee is permitted in the first place to rent at such a figure as covers the rent and five per cent interest and amortization; at the end of the year, if he thinks he would like to own the house, the rent he has paid for that year will apply on the purchase, and he will carry on his payments, which are deducted from his cheque each month. There are few complications and very little of the intricacy inevitable in small communities.

As regards advertising in the Gazette, in my opinion anyone who wants to hide information instead of giving it to the public should choose the Gazette. I had occasion to inquire as to the circulation of the Gazette last year, and I was informed that they were distributing 1,053 copies throughout the dominion. Many of these copies go to members and very few to lawyers. I should like to know, therefore, what particular use there is in advertising in the Gazette.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not a matter of advertising; these are statutes of Canada.

Mr. ESLING: A little while ago we were discussing the question of information and the way in which the public might learn what was going on and what the regulations were. If we approach the matter properly, when the minister has completed all such information as he chooses to give the public, the best medium, it seems to me, would be the local newspapers, and inquiries could be made at a central point. It would be of advantage and would save a great deal of trouble, time and expense, if some of the larger industries would take up these low-rental housing projects on the same principle as I have indicated.

Mr. DUNNING: There is nothing to prevent a corporation, such as the type of corporation to which my hon. friend has referred, from operating under part I of this act, as in fact some of them have operated under the old housing act. I believe it is generally known—I am not giving away anybody's secret—that in the town of Comeau Bay there was a housing development so arranged by one of the lending institutions, and guaranteed by the industrial corporation developing the property. A similar development is possible elsewhere. In the case most familiar to my hon. friend, the industrial concern has preferred to develop its own housing scheme, under its own control, instead of having anything to do with a lending institution. But it is competent for any such corporation to make arrangements with lending institutions under part I.

With respect to part II, which deals with low-rental housing, there would be nothing to prevent any industrial corporation from becoming itself a limited dividend corporation under the terms of that part for the purpose of supplying low rental houses to its own employees, provided it is prepared to accept the responsibilities imposed upon it by that part. While part II does impose provincial government responsibility where the authority is municipal, no provincial government responsibility is involved where the housing authority is a limited dividend corporation, so that it is possible, even in provinces where the provincial government cannot see their way clear to comply with the conditions with respect to municipalities undertaking low rental housing schemes under part II, that in such provinces there may be, as I am reasonably sure there will be, instances where the limited dividend corporation method can be followed.

Mr. MASSEY: In order to be consistent, paragraph (g) will have to be amended. If we turn back to paragraph (f) of section 2, part I, we find that we made the paragraph to read in this way:

(f) "local authority" means any province, municipality, society, association, corporation or commission—

And so on. I believe the words "or commission" should be added in paragraph (g).

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. I wonder if it should be done. The committee will understand that this is a different case.

Mr. MASSEY: But both refer to the local housing authorities.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes, it might be by way of commission. I believe the words "or commission" should be added after the word "corporation" in paragraph (g).

Mr. ROGERS: I move:

That in paragraph (g) the word "or" be deleted where it occurs between the words "association" and "corporation," and that after the word "corporation" be added the words "or commission."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. NEILL: Would the minister look into this aspect of the matter so as to make this part of the bill apply to unorganized territories? It seems to be clear that a limited dividend housing corporation must give an option to the municipality concerned. If there is no municipality, who will take its place?

Mr. DUNNING: We shall deal with that when we get to the conditions. I would rather amend the conditions than amend the definition.

Mr. McNIVEN: In view of the possibility of municipalities becoming local housing authorities, I was glad indeed to hear the minister and the hon. member for Kootenay West enlarge upon the possibility of corporations undertaking building schemes for their own employees. The experience of the Consolidated Mining & Smelting Company in connection with workers' houses in Trail, British Columbia, is beyond the experimental stage, and has proven a boon to their employees. The experience of the Imperial Oil Company and other corporations in Regina along similar lines has proven most beneficial to employees and I suggest might well be undertaken by other industrial corporations in various parts of Canada.

A difficulty I foresee in a municipality becoming a local housing authority is found in a provision in the law of the western provinces, and one which, I believe, is found in the law of Ontario, that a municipality borrowing money for any municipal purpose whatsoever can do so only by by-law submitted to the burgesses, and carried by a two-thirds majority. That means that the class which it is intended this measure shall benefit would be excluded from voting on the by-law. Only a property owner would have a right to express himself.

Mr. DUNNING: Unless provincial legislation is changed.

Mr. McNIVEN: For this building season in any event it would be necessary under the present law to submit a by-law to the burgesses. In some centres at least the burgesses are vitally interested in raising rather than lowering property rentals. It is anticipated there would be some difficulty in attaining the necessary assent under the existing law.

Mr. McIVOR: Perhaps I have been acting prematurely, but because of the shortage of houses in Fort William I have written a company in that city, enclosing a copy of the bill, and asking them to go into the housing business. If I have acted ahead of time, it can be corrected.

Sections 13 and 14 agreed to.

On section 15, paragraph (a)—Conditions of contract.

Mr. MASSEY: I should like to ask a general question on the sections we have covered so rapidly. When the minister introduced the resolution he discussed briefly the possibility of a municipality purchasing land outside its own then boundaries. It was indicated that the taxes they would receive as a result of the purchase of that land would be in addition to the taxes they had heretofore received. There was a question as to the possibility of the municipality foregoing taxes on land for the first three years. I understand that under this arrangement 100 per cent of the taxes are to be paid for the first year, 50 per cent for the second, and 25 per cent for the third.

Mr. DUNNING: No; the hon. member is talking about part III of the bill, which has no relation to this part at all.

Mr. MASSEY: Yes. I thought we were coming to that, and I was endeavouring to anticipate discussion of the matter. As we were going so fast, I thought I would draw it to attention now so that some of us could catch up to the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: I am wondering if the provision in paragraph (a) is a wise one. Should not the municipality be the certifying authority? The paragraph refers to "other designated official." It seems to me it must be the municipality itself.

Mr. DUNNING: If we are to attain our objective, there must be some certification.

Mr. BENNETT: One authority is set up by law; it is the municipality itself.

Mr. DUNNING:

Unless the head of the department of welfare or other designated official of the municipality concerned. . . .

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly. Why should it not be the municipality? It seems to me that would be logical.

Mr. DUNNING: "Department of welfare" was a general term. In the case of a limited dividend corporation operating a housing unit would it be well to leave the statute in such condition that the vote of a municipal council could decide whether a particular family had or had not an income which would bar them from the benefits of the measure?

Mr. BENNETT: But it seems to be a matter of fact. It is a question of fact, not a question of votes. I am afraid my hon. friend hears so much dealing with them that he forgets it is a question of fact.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a question of fact, but a kind of question of fact with which the relief administration have the greatest difficulty, because incomes of the type of people being dealt with are very often at least partly of a more or less casual character.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree.

Mr. DUNNING: The object of having one official designated was to relieve the limited dividend housing corporation of being placed in the position of having people certified by a vote of a municipal council to be eligible, with all the difficulties that would involve.

Mr. BENNETT: If it involves that, this statute must be a complete failure. Nobody ever thought you were going to have votes about this, because it is a matter of fact.

Mr. DUNNING: It is, and should be. So are relief questions turning upon exactly the same point, the income of the family.

Mr. BENNETT: In this case, if the rent is $15, the man must have an income of $75 a month.

Mr. DUNNING: He must not have more than that.

Mr. BENNETT: It must be $75.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. BENNETT: It must not exceed that. It must be up to $75; I will put it that way in order to make it clear. This statute means that a man must have an income not exceeding $75 a month in order to be eligible under this part. I do not believe anyone thinks for a moment that you are going to require a vote of the municipal council in order to determine whether or not that man has an income not in excess of $75 a month. That is not what I had in mind. There must be some designated official. Here you have provided for a department of welfare or some designated official of the municipality. In many municipalities I do not think there is an official who has charge of such a department; that is the point.

Mr. DUNNING: That is the reason for the alternative.

Mr. BENNETT: It should be definitely an official of the municipality; then let the municipality and the government determine which official it shall be. It may be that it will be the department of public welfare, the department of public relations or something else. We should not tie them down to that; let it be an official of the municipality, and the arrangement can be made between the two governing bodies. I think the minister caught my point at first, but certainly he does not have it now. I say the moment you undertake to designate one you impinge upon the value of the words which provide that it shall be any designated official. Leave the whole matter open; let it provide that there shall be a designated official of the municipality concerned, and you will get over your difficulty.

Mr. MALLETTE: Does it not mean an official designated by the municipality?

Mr. DUNNING: Quite, and agreed to by us.

Mr. BENNETT: You have signified one authority, the department of public welfare. Some of the municipalities do not have any such department. I think you should make your term broad enough to cover everything, and say, "unless a designated official of the municipality concerned certifies that there is not a demand for such unit."

Mr. DUNNING: That is a very important certification that is given. This official, or somebody, must say there is not a sufficient demand from families with low incomes, and therefore these dwellings may be rented to families with higher incomes.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the very thing we want to do away with.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite so, and that is why we should have some say in connection with the designated officials.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite. The paragraph provides that the annual rental shall not be more than one-fifth of the estimated total income of the family, unless a designated official of the municipality concerned certifies that there is not a demand for such housing accommodation. I hope that will be changed to provide that this official must be agreed upon by the government and the municipality, because the moment you talk about a department of public welfare you are going to get into trouble, because some municipalities do not have such departments. Very often these are in charge of—

Mr. McNIVEN: Committees.

Mr. BENNETT: That is it exactly.

Mr. McNIVEN: The department of welfare in most instances is in charge of a committee.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no objection to having it read "a designated official of the municipality concerned," which leaves it subject to agreement as to who should be designated.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly.

Mr. DUNNING: I have no objection to striking out the words "the head of the department of welfare or other" and inserting the word "a" to make it read "a designated official of the municipality concerned."

Mr. ROGERS: I so move.

Mr. BENNETT: I quite get the point the minister has in mind, but it does seem desirable to put it in such general terms as will cover all cases. If you do it otherwise you will have conflict at once, because sometimes the heads of these departments change frequently. One man may take the chair for a week or a month, and then the next man will take it.

Mr. DUNNING: If we say "a designated official," we see to it in the agreement that an official is designated, because this is one of the ways in which the scheme could be abused if we did not have the proper safeguard.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): That does not necessarily imply acceptance by the minister.

Mr. DUNNING: Quite. The ruling section is "each contract with a local housing authority shall provide," and under that we shall be agreeing to the designation.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

On section 15 paragraph (b):

Mr. McNIVEN: Is it intended that the cost of insuring these properties should be included?

Mr. DUNNING: That cost comes under management expenses.

Mr. MASSEY: If the total income of a family were say $25 a week, and then one of the younger boys got a job at $10 a week, what would that do to the rent?

Mr. DUNNING: It would not do anything to the rent.

Mr. MASSEY: It would not do anything?

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. MASSEY: It would put the family out; that is all.

Mr. DUNNING: It is a question of the terms of the lease as to how frequently a review of the family income will be required. It does not do anything to the rent, but it does put them out if their income is above the maximum specified. That would be a matter to be worked out, as to whether the leases should be annual or semi-annual, as the case may be. I am sure nothing would please my hon. friend better than to find that numbers of families were compelled to move out of these low-rental projects because they had become too prosperous to qualify for occupancy.

Mr. BENNETT: Where can they go?

Mr. DUNNING: If a family becomes too prosperous to qualify under part II, they should be sufficiently prosperous to qualify under part I and build their own houses.

Mr. BENNETT: But it will take time, and there should be some real balance with respect to it.

Mr. DUNNING: Certainly it will have to be arranged that they will not be put out on a week's notice or anything like that.

Mr. MASSEY: There is a great uncertainty here. Suppose you have a man and his wife with a boy of fourteen and a girl of twelve, with both the children in school. A year or so later the boy leaves school and gets a job; three years later the girls does the same thing. That means the family must move out.

Mr. DUNNING: That is why we made provision with respect to the terms of leasing and did not make any provision with regard to ejection. Perhaps we can leave it at this point for the present.

PRIVATE BILLS

SECOND READINGS

Bill No. 155, for the relief of Stella Maud Lash Dawes.—Mr. Lawson.

Bill No. 157, for the relief of Harry Roth.—Mr. Jacobs.

CRIMINAL CODE

PROVISION AGAINST REFUSAL TO EMPLOY OR DISMISSAL FOR MEMBERSHIP IN TRADE UNIONS

The house resumed from Tuesday, May 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Woodsworth for the second reading of Bill No. 4, to amend the criminal code.

Mr. PAUL MARTIN (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I believe this bill is of sufficient importance to deserve a more extended discussion than possibly the temper of the house at this moment will permit. No one who has taken part in this debate has as yet expressed any disagreement with the principle involved. Certainly the slightest knowledge of the character of the present economy of the world must suggest that workers should have the right to organize in the same measure as employers. Keeping in mind the experience of older countries, particularly the United Kingdom where the labour movement grew up at first under a cloud of suppression and later under the shadow of respectability, one would hope to have the progress of trade unions generally in this country proceed along similar lines.

Before expressing my view on the merits of the bill and in order that I may not appear to be giving expression to something merely for the purposes of the moment, I should like to quote from a speech I made in a radio series along with the hon. member for St. Lawrence-St. George (Mr. Cahan) and others dealing with this general problem. I do this in order that the hon. gentleman who is sponsoring this bill may not suggest that I am supporting the principle of the bill to-night after having taken a contrary stand at an earlier date. I stated my views long before this bill was introduced in this chamber. I am quoting my own words not because they are of special significance, but because they indicate clearly my own views before the bill was introduced. I said:

It is not enough for a man to be able to think freely. This would be indeed a one-sided liberty, which would not be freedom at all. A man must be free to associate with his fellowmen for joint action in realms where there is a community of interest. The difficulty arises, not so much with the denial of this right of association, as with the measure of control which the state is entitled to use over voluntary associations; and this raises one of the most difficult problems of political science.

And further:

Liberty must reside within the context of this restrictive basis, but this restriction itself must be defined.

I ask the hon. member who is sponsoring this bill to follow particularly what I am going to read. Perhaps very few members will subscribe to it, but it represents my view and indicates how I thought then and still think about these matters. I quote:

A government is not justified in suppressing an association, the mere beliefs of which are subversive of the existing order. The occasion for governmental interference must be when the association has moved to action unmistakably in an attempt to bring about an overthrow of the estalished order.

I can go the whole way with the hon. gentleman in the expression of a belief in the principle of freedom of association as applied to workers and to all other groups within the state. I think it would be unfortunate if the hon. member were to suggest that because of the observations of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), the government had expressed a view contrary to the principle of this bill. The Minister of Labour indicated clearly that he believed in the principle of the bill. He did not object to it except on one ground that must be obvious to all. He said that the law officers of the crown having determined that this was not within the constitutional powers of this government, it would be a matter almost of political immorality if we passed something so clearly outside our authority. The Minister of Labour made a statement a year ago, to which he referred in his remarks during this debate. I think that statement bears repetition to-night. The Minister of Labour was speaking on behalf of the government, and his statement indicates the temper of the administration with respect to this whole matter. He said:

It is necessary to state in the clearest terms that the right of association is a civil right, long established by law and usage. It was affirmed with special reference to Canada by an order in council of July 11, 1918 (P.C. 1743). It was proclaimed explicitly in the Treaty of Versailles at the close of the world war. To deny the right of workmen to combine in any lawful organization they desire for the promotion of their common welfare is an open invitation to extremists to preach the futility of collective bargaining as an alternative to direct action. The right of association for legitimate purposes should be respected in the national interest and labour should not be denied the means of organizing for collective bargaining. The right of employers to organize for all lawful purposes is not questioned in any quarter. Employers are not entitled in the same breath to protest against governmental regulation of industry and to deny to labour its right to resort to legitimate measures of self-help through voluntary association.

That is a very strong declaration. I think it was the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr Stevens) who stated that the order in council passed shortly after the war was merely a pious declaration. I suppose the same thing could be said with regard to this statement. The reason they may have merely the effect of pious declarations is that the matter concerned does not come within the constitutional powers of this parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: Have we not the right to make anything we please a crime?

Mr. MARTIN: I think the right hon. gentleman is right. As he knows much better than I, we have the right to make a crime of matters that are essentially criminal in character.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Who made the decision?

Mr. MARTIN: The courts have decided. The judicial committee has decided.

Mr. STEVENS: Not that.

Mr. MARTIN: That in respect of matters which come within the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces we cannot in the assumption of criminal jurisdiction deal with matters that come under section 92 of the British North America Act.

Mr. BENNETT: We cannot use that as a device to occupy the field.

Mr. MARTIN: At the moment this assumption of authority is being exercised by the provinces. In Nova Scotia we have the Nova Scotia Trade Unions Act, 1937. In British Columbia we have the Industrial Conciliation and Arbitration Act. In Manitoba we have the Strikes and Lock-outs Prevention Act, 1937. In Quebec we have the Fair Wages Act, and we have acts that were recently passed in Saskatchewan and New Brunswick. I quite agree that in some respects these acts lack the necessary teeth to deal with the problem. I would say that, certainly with regard to at least three provincial acts, but that does not, one way or the other, affect the problem.

I submit, and I put this to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr Woodsworth), that the law officers of the crown having decided that this matter comes under the caption of property and civil rights it would not be justifiable for this or any other government or any parliament to act contrary to that advice There may be methods of determining whether or not that advice is correct, but in so far as the measure now stands before the house there is, I submit, no other course open to us.

In addition, I would suggest this, that in respect of the servants of the dominion or in respect of labour in those parts of Canada not coming within the organized provinces we have the power to enact legislation covering them, and having in mind that legislative competence I would, speaking for myself, agree to the application of this bill to them. I do not want the hon. gentleman to misconstrue what I have been saying, and I am sure he will not. While to some this bill may seem extravagant in its extent, it is nevertheless a bill which in our day deserves support in principle. I believe that if it were constitutionally possible it should be made a crime, as my hon. friend suggests, in the case of an attempt to prevent the proper organization by labour to obtain its legitimate rights. Representing as I do a constituency where labour is to be found in great numbers, I appreciate that point more perhaps than anyone else. I was going to make a personal reference, but I leave that out.

I suggest to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that even if we had the power of passing this bill—and assuming the power I would agree that we should pass it—that is not in the long run going to be the effective way of protecting the rights of workers through organizations and the like. The Minister of Justice referred to the tradition in England. I wish we had the same tradition in this country, and then the events that took place in this province in the course of the last year would not have been possible. I agree with all that. I agree that it was wise for the hon. gentleman to bring forward this method of trying to have this house assert in no uncertain manner its views, and because of that I am taking part in this discussion, but I suggest to him, as one who knows the tradition in the common law countries, as one who knows conditions in respect of the handling of this matter in other places, that the effective way has never been the use of coercion, and that method will never be a guarantee in itself.

Reference was made in this house in the admirable statement by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) to the position in Sweden. Of course, there you have altogether a different problem, just as in the United States you have under the Wagner Act an altogether different situation, in so far as the question of jurisdiction is concerned.

If any hon. member suggests, and I think it has been suggested in this debate, that the Minister of Justice takes his stand because he happens to come from a province where there seem to be restrictions which, speaking for myself, I certainly do not countenance, I submit that the Minister of Justice long before this measure was introduced into this house did give expression to the proper method of bringing about the realization of the rights of labour. That expression of his could be given in England because it is so often thought that French-Canadians themselves do not appreciate the full import of the words "liberty" and "freedom" and all that they mean. Let me quote from a speech made by the Minister of Justice, speaking at a communist gathering in Montreal, where he was opposed to the use of force as a means of coercing the communists, and what he said there might equally in reverse order be applied to this whole problem. He said:

> (Translation) If we would secure for ourselves political as well as economic security, if we wish to repulse successfully the onsets of the enemies of order, we must depend less on the criminal code, on the police force and the gaols, and more on personal dignity, on individual efforts and on cooperation, which make up the substance and the soul of a free people. Guns and hand grenades are of no avail against those who preach violence, be the reasons good or bad. With an enlightened mind, we must accept necessary changes and unavoidable reforms, if we would take from the enemies of order the weapons provided them because of certain errors and abuses.

Mr. POOLE: I should like to direct a question, if I may, to the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin). It seems that his objection was that we did not have the power in this parliament to deal with the matter. I wonder why the hon. gentleman differentiates between the subject now under discussion and unemployment insurance, speaking of which some days ago he said, in substance, that if we did not have the power to put it into effect we should assume the power.

Mr. MARTIN: Quite.

Mr. POOLE: Then why should we not assume the power in this case when it is for the protection of labour?

Mr. MARTIN: The cases, if the hon. gentleman will permit me, are not at all analogous. What I said with regard to unemployment insurance was based on the assumption that we have the right of amending the constitution without going through all the stages that the hon. gentleman contemplates. But with respect to the matter before us, property and civil rights, under which certainly the doctrine of contract must come, are specifically given by the British North America Act to the provinces. That is the difficulty. It is unfortunate that our dual jurisdiction should in respect of great national problems such as this always be in the way. I have said in this house that unemployment is a national problem, and I think this problem should properly be dealt with as a national one, but unfortunately I was not born in 1867 and had nothing to do with framing the British North America Act.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I confess I was not able to follow the right hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in the observations he made a few days ago based upon the report made by his officials that this proposed act now in the form of a bill is ultra vires of this parliament in its entirety.

I followed the speech made by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) this evening, and I could not help thinking of one of his illustrations. He said that he had a few weeks ago declared that man's belief was one thing but that unless he expressed it in overt acts he saw no reason to complain. He reversed the process in the speech we listened to this evening, and while his apology for the administration was admirable, the only way in which I think there can be an expression of an overt act would be by voting for the measure; for there can be added to it without any difficulty a provision that it shall not come into force until proclaimed, and in the meantime it could be referred to the courts to determine its validity.

I think the right hon. Minister of Justice will agree with me that in two paragraphs of this bill we are not dealing with property and civil rights at all, that what we are dealing with is intimidation and conspiracy. In the paragraph to which I refer, paragraph (b), we are dealing with the offence of intimidation. We are dealing with an offence against the body politic on the part of those who may be in a position to enforce their views by threats, intimidation or otherwise, preventing that which arises out of property and civil rights, namely a contract being made effective. No one would question the right of the provinces to control matters of property and civil rights. No one has questioned the right of the provinces to deal with matters of contract. But it does not follow that because that is so, this parliament in the exercise of its jurisdiction over criminal law may not express itself in the strongest possible terms as to those who interfere with freedom of contract and the making of it. It is with respect to this that my difficulty arises.

This legislation in the last two paragraphs deals only with matters in which by force, by intimidation, by threats—the character of the threats and the extent of the intimidation are not the issue—an effort is made on the part of one person to prevent another person from exercising a civil right. The civil right is, as indicated by the last speaker, the right to belong to a union or to an association, the right to do as a man pleases with respect to the matter of collective bargaining. If the other person said, "You shall not exercise that civil right," and stops there, well and good; but if by intimidation, by threats, by the power and authority and force of his position he says "'Thou shalt not' exercise your civil rights," that is a matter of criminal law; that establishes our right to exercise our jurisdiction with respect to it, which we are doing every day. All one needs to do is to read the criminal code and note its provisions with respect to mischief and matters of that kind, with which I shall not trouble the house to-night. That does not conflict at all with the right of the provinces to deal as they please with matters of contract, of property, of civil rights. But where a man says, "' Thou shalt not' use your property or exercise your civil rights," and he uses towards you intimidation or force or threats to see that you do not exercise your rights, that is an offence; that is within the criminal law, and solely within the jurisdiction of this parliament. It is that offence at which this bill strikes.

I am now dealing with the two paragraphs at the end of the bill. Look at the next paragraph. Is it or is it not a criminal offence if a man "conspires, combines, agrees or arranges with any other employer or his agent" to do any of these things? Is it wrong, as a matter of law, to conspire to do an illegal act? Well, the criminal law is clear on that point. There may be a conspiracy which is a combination to do a lawful thing. Against that the law does not strike. But when there is an agreement between parties to do an unlawful thing the criminal law interposes. And what have you here? You have here intimidation, threats to deprive a person of what the hon. member for Essex East so well described as the exercise of a civil right —freedom of association, freedom of speech. I was reading a book the other day, The Voice of England with respect to Freedom. Starting away back a thousand years ago, and along down through all the centuries, the voice of England has been the voice of freedom. Here we have a combination or association which is permitted by law, and we see, in the last paragraph to which I am directing attention, that if you combine and agree to do an unlawful act, namely prevent a man from belonging to an association or trade union, you are liable to the criminal law of the country. Have we not jurisdiction there?

There remains one other matter, and that is the first paragraph. You can read that in a sense which is consonant with the views expressed by the minister, but I do not so read it. The first paragraph deals with refusal to employ or the dismissal from employment of any person for the reason that he has exercised his freedom of choice by belonging to a union which is formed for the purpose of advancing in a lawful manner the interest of the workmen. If it is a penalty for a breach of contract, then of course I have no difficulty in agreeing with the minister. But it is not a penalty for a breach of contract, because that is covered by a provincial statute; that penalty sounds in damages, as many acts provide. This bill goes further. It does not, as I read it, contemplate the question of contract or property and civil rights in that sense at all. It merely says that if a man refuses to employ another, or dismisses him from his employment because he has exercised his freedom of choice by associating himself with a particular trade union, that is such a deprivation of a civil right, the great right of freedom or association, as to incur the penalties of the criminal law, and not a pecuniary result sounding in damages. That, I think, is the distinction between the provincial statutes and this bill. Of course I agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Essex East, reflecting in that respect the mind and almost the speech of the Minister of Justice. We should not openly pass laws which, in the opinion of those responsible for their promulgation, are ineffective and invalid. On the other hand, if we have what I conceive to be the strongest reason in the world for believing a statute to be valid, we should place it on the statute books and ask that it be referred to the court so that its validity may be determined. That is the method prescribed by law for that purpose. I am sure the minister will remember the very strong words used by the late Edward Blake as to the desirability of that course being followed in dealing with a matter of this kind.

I believe the bill to be valid. I believe it to be within the legislative jurisdiction of this parliament. I believe it makes it an adequate and proper offence for a person to interfere with any man exercising his freedom of choice and his right of association, provided always that it is exercised—in the language of the bill itself—"in a lawful manner." By those words we should, I feel, all be bound—"in a lawful manner," consonant with the laws of the country, with its institutions, with everything they imply. I support the bill.

Mr. THOMAS REID (New Westminster): I rise to endeavour, if I can, to correct an impression which I believe was left during the time that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) spoke, and again to-night when the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) spoke in connection with the measure at present before the house. I judge from the remarks of the two hon. gentlemen who spoke on this matter, and particularly from what was said by the Minister of Labour, referring to the old country in comparison with Canada, that Great Britain is one country to be followed because in regard to labour legislation they have not placed a great deal of it on the statute books. The Minister of Labour suggested that we in Canada would perhaps do well if we followed the same line as Great Britain. Well, as one who in early youth came from there, and had belonged and still belongs to a trade union, I can tell the Minister of Labour this: The reason there is little on the statute books of Great Britain with regard to labour or trade union legislation is that for many long years labour and the working people had no representation in the British House of Commons. In the early days of the fight for trades unions, members of the House of Commons comprised in large measure land owners, steel mill owners and coal mine owners. The history of the trade union movement in Great Britain is one which I think should be told to the world. The fight put up in the early days by the working people of the old land for trade union legislation was a very tragic one indeed; it was one of bloodshed, starvation, intimidation, trial, and in many instances, flight from their homes to other lands. I believe that other countries have benefited to some extent in consequence of what the workers did.

I am all for the principle of this bill, and I intend to vote for it, though it may not be within the purview of the dominion government; and I do so not only because I represent a considerable section of labour in the constituency of New Westminster, but also because I have vivid recollections of the early days of that struggle for trade unionism when this very principle was being advocated in the old land. We in this country have a good deal of reason to be grateful for the fight that was made in those early days in Great Britain, and I should like to see this legislation put into effect in every province in Canada. We are, or should be, heading in that direction. We may not reach the goal immediately, but we shall utimately come to the point where all the provinces will give absolute freedom to labour to organize.

Mr. DANIEL McIVOR (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to speak on this bill, and I have no notes—perhaps you will say, "Thank goodness"—so I shall have to think on my feet. This is not a government bill; but I know something of the tasks of the toiler; I know something of his struggle. When I came out of university in my first year the only job I could get was wheeling bricks at fifteen cents an hour, and the third day after I had been at that job my hands were in such a state that I could not hold on to a baseball as well as I did to-night. I know something of the struggles of the labourers in Winnipeg in those early days. They comprised English, Scotch, Irish, Icelandic and Swedish, and I was one of them. I cast my lot in with them. I can say that they were as fine a group of men as ever struck this great Canada of ours and there are hundreds of them to-day who are not wheeling bricks. Of course, I admit that I did not have to stay at that very long because the contractor, who was going into big business just then, thought I might assist him in his office work and take charge of the labourers.

When I hear that some members of this house hold their breath when a preacher comes around, I can tell them that I have heard language which would put them to shame, because I have heard men who could swear even scientifically. I was an officer of the first labour union in the city of Winnipeg, and we wondered why it was that we should have to work for fifteen cents an hour when bricklayers were getting forty-five cents. Some of us were green, of course, but none of us were yellow. As I think of those men and the struggle they had to make for their rights, I can recall how they used to sober up a little and keep their cheques in order that they might be able to pay their board and keep their wives and families in difficult times. In those days I formed habits and trains of thought which I have not changed. I take second place to no man in this house in my interest in the toiler, and I will take no part in anything that will cast reflection on the honest toiler. I may tell the house parenthetically that if we had more employers of labour like an hon. minister who comes from some place near Fort William, it would be better for the country, because when the depression came he did not say to his office hands and his workers, "I have no more contracts; take a rest for a while". What he did tell his office hands and his workers was this, "Employ yourselves as best you can; your cheques will come just the same". No wonder I stand behind the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). When he did not have to, he treated the honest toiler in a generous way. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I know something of the struggles of the working man, and I know why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) has brought in this bill. Some of our employers of labour do not know how to treat the honest toiler; they do not give him fair play: I have known employers who would organize themselves into an association and then refuse to let their workers organize.

I belong to a party in this house as progressive as any in the dominion, and when we get a free fling, as, thank goodness, we get it in caucus, though I must not tell tales out of school, I can tell you it is the finest thing I have ever struck. We are not muzzled, and you will never hear the crack of the whip, as some people think. But, like other hon. members, I feel that I am free to vote just as I please, and I am going to vote for this bill if somebody does not talk it out. Having said that, therefore, I shall now sit down, thanking you, Mr. Speaker, and the house.

Mr. VINCENT DUPUIS (Chambly-Rouville): Coming from the province of Quebec, where our first magistrate is so scrupulous about provincial autonomy, I think it right to do my share in seeing that this House of Commons does not override his very important point with regard to rights in that province. As everyone knows, Hon. Mr. Duplessis in some circumstances is protesting against some federal legislation, because he is convinced that we are overriding the autonomy of the province of Quebec. And in some other cases he claimed otherwise. I shall not enter into the question of the constitutionality of this bill because that was covered pretty well by previous speakers, the distinguished Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), and on the other side, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) who is sponsoring the bill. But as far as I can compare this legislation with some legislation which has been overruled and found ultra vires, I do not see any difference at all. We must admit that we are in such a situation to-day that we have to accept the constitution passed in 1867, and we have to deal with it according to the interpretation given by the highest court of this country, the privy council. If that is true, what is the use of this house spending time, and what is more important, spending money, to pass legislation which after great expense for fees may be declared ultra vires of this parliament. And, mind you, I am a lawyer; I am speaking against my own interest; it might be that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would be inclined to choose me as his attorney in that case. But I try to take a higher view than my personal interests, and consider the interest of this country first. I believe it is our duty as legislators to prevent this bill from becoming law, because we know beforehand that the result would be its submission to the supreme court and then to the privy council. And I for one do not want that.

If we compare this bill with legislation which has been enacted in the province of Quebec lately, Bills Nos. 19 and 20, I think the present administration of Quebec have dealt with this matter and the purpose aimed at by this bill now before us. I am firmly convinced that the legislation which has been passed by the Quebec legislature is entirely wrong, if I compare it with the alleged request of the labour men in that province. Nevertheless I believe the premier of Quebec is right in claiming that in the situation in which we find ourselves to-day, due to the British North America Act, the right to legislate in such matters belongs to the province. I am sure the premier of Quebec is wrong when he refuses to consent to this parliament dealing with this social legislation. I am convinced that so long as some provinces refuse to this parliament the right to legislate in social matters, the result will be against the interest of our provinces. I know perfectly well, and hon. members will agree, that if we are left in that unfavourable situation as regards social legislation—take, for instance, the question of unemployment insurance, if one province decides to pass a law to establish unemployment insurance and other provinces refuse to do it—the consequence is clear. The people engaged in such industries which fall under that law will move from the province which refuses to pass the law into some province which has passed the law. On the other hand capitalists who have invested money in such industries will leave the province which has passed the law and go to a province which has refused to pass the law. It is easy to see that so long as the provinces refuse to agree to transfer their right and allow the federal parliament in common understanding for the best interests of the citizens of this country to enact this social legislation, no good result will be attained.

So far as the principle of Bill No. 4 is concerned, I might be ready to agree with it. Of those in this house who are in favour of justice, who want to see the citizens of this free country have their share of sunshine, who are against oppression, the hon. member for Chambly-Rouville is one. But the duty to see that there is a sure right for employees to enjoy free association, and that employers should not do anything to molest or prevent their employees from associating for their common good, is the duty of the province. What is the use of our passing such legislation as this when we know perfectly well it is ultra vires? As to this, however, I am ready to respect the views of those who differ with me, who have at their head the right hon. leader of the opposition. But, as I say, we are in a free country, and I think the majority of those who know something about law in Canada will admit that it is useless for this parliament to pass such legislation. I do not see why the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre brought in the legislation, since I am sure he has studied the judgments of the supreme court and the privy council in regard to similar legislation. He knows perfectly well—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I object to a statement of that kind. I object to the hon. member virtually saying that I brought in this bill knowing it was ultra vires. I object to being charged with anything of that kind.

Mr. DUPUIS: I know perfectly well that there was no improper motive in the mind of the hon. member; I admit that readily, so he need not protest. I know he is sincere, but I have seen many sincere people who have made mistakes. I am told that the road to hell is supposed to be paved with good intentions.

[Mr. Dupuis.]

We cannot agree with the hon. member though we appreciate his sincerity. It may take a great deal of good will to admit all these things, but it is absolutely the custom of the House of Commons to believe in the sincerity of those who compose this assembly of legislators. But if, on the one hand, we are ready to admit the sincerity and good intentions of members of this house, I am sure, on the other, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will also admit that we on this side are sincere in endeavouring to prevent this bill from becoming law, and that our only endeavour is to see that the citizens of this country do not have to pay any more taxes than they are paying at the moment. If this bill could be considered constitutional; if it had a chance to be put into operation all over this country, you would not hear me speaking now, except to help the bill pass as soon as possible. That, however, is not the case. If this bill becomes law, it will be contested; it will be brought before the tribunals of this country and before the privy council, and it will be declared ultra vires.

We do not want that. I have seen a good deal of legislation since I have been in the House of Commons. For nearly ten years now I have followed the discussions in this house, and in that time I have had the pleasure of listening to many good speakers. Just to show that on this side of the house we are sufficiently broad-minded to admit the truth even though it may please our opponents, I may confess that if there is one thing in the world I like it is to hear speakers like the right hon. leader of the opposition and many of his followers, because they are parliamentarians of long experience. Sometimes they are a little sophistic, but we are glad to listen to them. This we admit frankly, and that is not only so with reference to hon. members opposite. I hope I may not be taxed with possessing too much pride if I say that at times I have noticed good speakers and good legislation on my side of the chamber. Nevertheless, admitting all these things, it is my duty to protest against this legislation, for the reasons I have given. You have only to read this bill, Mr. Speaker, with your knowledge of the jurisdiction of this parliament, to conclude that it is entirely ultra vires. We are not only legislators in this house; I believe we are also—

An hon. MEMBER: Statesmen.

Mr. DUPUIS: No; I would not claim to be a statesman, though I hope to be some day. I think everyone will agree that in addition to being legislators we are the highest tribunal in this country. Why should we pass legislation like this, which will be disputed and brought before the courts, when it is possible for us as legislators and judges to decide on its legality right away and declare it ultra vires? I believe that when I conclude, Mr. Speaker, you will rise and make a declaration to that effect. That will satisfy me, and particularly will it please the premier of Quebec, who is so scrupulous about the autonomy of that province.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would direct the attention of hon. members of the house to the fact that if the hon. member speaks now, he will close the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Nine o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Marketing services—Live stock and poultry—further amount required, $7,040.

Mr. LEADER: The hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) had quite a lot to say when this item was last before the committee. I cannot vouch for the accuracy of his statements, but because of his experience as a member of this house and as a minister having charge of the very department to which he referred, I think his words should receive some attention from the committee. He stated that some of the packing institutions have been making monkeys out of the officers of the department. I have sometimes thought the members of parliament have been treated in almost the same way. Since I entered this house I have come to the conclusion that members have not a great deal to say about the legislation and regulations that are passed. Those matters are mostly settled in the departments. This is irksome to me. I have always prided myself on being able to take my own part. When I was elected to this house I figured I could do more than my share in the house. I considered what I was fitted for, and I decided that perhaps I could so something for the live stock industry of this country.

Let me say that I have received nothing but the utmost courtesy from the officials of the Department of Agriculture. Any time I wanted information I always got it if it was within their power to give it to me. I believe enough evidence has been presented in the last few years to warrant the minister in asking for an investigation into the live stock industry. My conclusion is that we should have a better system than we have at the present time. I am not suggesting the appointment of a roving, meandering royal commission, but I contend that at the very first of the session next year—it is too late to do anything this year—a select committee should be appointed to deal with this matter. In the meantime hon. members can obtain all the information possible in order that they will be able to deal intelligently and expeditiously with this question. We have had too many royal commissions. Nine times out of ten, when a royal commission is appointed, it is appointed to evade responsibility. I come from a farming district and farming is the only business with which I am conversant. I feel I should have some responsibiilty in investigating a question of this kind. I could make a number of suggestions, but I shall be satisfied with making just one. We might very well consider the selling of live stock by means of auctions as they do in the old country. I believe that is worth considering as a new method of marketing our cattle in the stock-yards.

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture): I quite appreciate what the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) has had to say with regard to the necessity of an inquiry being made into the methods of handling live stock in Canada. However, I may say that it is the intention of the department as at present organized to carry on that kind of investigation continuously. I agree with much of what the hon. member has said with regard to meandering investigations being more or less a means of shifting responsibility on certain occasions. It was for that reason that in reorganizing the department we set up a marketing branch which would be continuously in contact with all the activities of the stock-yards and marketing in general. I am hopeful that with the completion of the reorganization we shall be able, in the year that is ahead of us, to carry on an investigation that will be effective at all times throughout the year.

I think we can accomplish more by that method than by the appointment of a committee. However, I have no objection to a committee being appointed. It could be appointed whether or not I objected, because that is the right of the house. If a committee is appointed, the department will be ready to cooperate in every way possible. However, I repeat that this work can be done more effectively by the officials who are continuously in touch with the activities of the stock-yards and the packing plants. I think I can say to the hon. member that such an investigation will be carried on continuously throughout the year.

Mr. LEADER: I do not believe the live stock men of this country will be satisfied with the form of investigation to which the minister has referred. I know there are serious objections to the methods being used at the present time, and there is an increasing demand that some investigation should be made into these matters. The department of agriculture of Manitoba conducted an investigation into these matters this winter. I do not know the results of their findings, but they must have discovered something. We could use that. In the meantime, we could use this United States trade agreement. All this evidence would be available for this committee next year. I am firmly convinced that this is the proper way to carry on the investigation, and there is no doubt that an investigation is needed. I know there are hon. members coming from rural constituencies who are just aching to take a more prominent part in the work of parliament.

Mr. McDONALD (Souris): For some time I have thought there was something radically wrong with the marketing of live stock. When I was discussing this matter with a farmer he told me that the main trouble to-day is the fact that there are no drovers going up and down the country making competitive bids for live stock. The reason for that is that there is no competition at the big markets such as Toronto and Winnipeg. In the old days the drovers used to run up and down the country and try to buy direct from the farmer, and when the farmer did not get what he thought was the right price he did not have to sell; but to-day he has to send his cattle to Toronto or Winnipeg and sell them on a commission basis, and as was suggested by the hon. member for Kootenay East he has simply to take what is left, which is sometimes extremely little. I have known cases where there was nothing left. Certainly the farmer cannot continue to market his products on that basis and make money.

It is quite true that advice is being given by men who are watching the operations of the big markets and trying to advise the farmer. Over the radio on certain days you will hear these men advising the farmers to ship a certain kind of stock to market. I have known farmers who listened to that advice and then went to the best drover they knew and told him to come to their farm and pick up the stock needed for that kind of market, but they found, after they had shipped their cattle, it was the same old story.

When cattle are disposed of, the meat is sold. It is different from selling grain. There is no sample market. The farmer has to take just what he can get for his cattle. I profess I do not know how to cure the situation; I know it would be difficult, because all the small abattoirs have gone out of business. The law of supply and demand is working fairly well at the present time, but we have known times in the last seven or eight years when the farmer got hardly anything for his products, and that is not good for any business. I feel sure that the minister would be well advised to look into the marketing of live stock, and if something can be done I hope it will be done.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I suggest to the minister that he refer this matter to the tariff board? I have listened to a great many speeches and read considerable evidence on this matter, and I confess that I have been somewhat bewildered by the views which have been expressed pro and con. It is a matter of vital importance to the farmers of this country. I find, on investigation, there is jurisdiction for the tariff board to deal with this question, and I therefore suggest that the minister ask the tariff board, which is there for the purpose of dealing with matters of this kind, to ascertain the exact facts and make a report which will enable us to understand the situation, if there be any further doubt about it. It is contended that the operations of one firm have brought about certain results. Whether or not that is so is a question of fact. That can be ascertained by the tariff board, which has the powers of inquiry and investigation, and I suggest that if the government would refer the question to the tariff board it might be exceedingly useful. But if we undertake, as the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) suggests, to deal with the matter by a committee of this house, we shall inevitably have certain difficulties which I can foresee. There will always be difficulties in dealing with it by some body other than a body of a judicial nature. The body is there; the jurisdiction is there; the tariff board is there. If the minister would take the appropriate steps to have the facts ascertained by the board, I think it might be useful alike to himself, to the government, to the great farming body of this country that is so vitally interested, and to the packers themselves.

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Chairman, I shall be pleased to take into consideration the suggestion made by the right hon. leader of the opposition. I should like to have an opportunity of looking into the possibilities of whether that type of inquiry would serve a useful purpose. At the same time I should like to emphasize what I said a moment ago, that with the reorganization of the department as we have it now there will be facilities to make a much more careful inquiry into the whole matter, and not only an inquiry, because I think there is much more required to be done. Regulation and direction are necessary in connection with the whole matter.

There is the view that methods of marketing is partly responsible for some of the criticisms. The system of marketing is passing through a transitional stage on account of the fact that the trucking of live stock has become quite general throughout Canada; indeed, in all countries it is becoming a general practice, and whenever there is such a decided change in the methods of transporting any product as there has been in respect to live stock we are bound to require new regulations and to have new conditions set up for the marketing of that particular product. I think there can be no group of men in Canada better qualified to report on a matter of that kind than the inspectors who have been dealing with it over a long term of years. They must be experts in connection with the business itself; otherwise they are not competent to fill the positions they hold.

Mr. BENNETT: But is it not a fact that their long association has created a certain attitude of mind?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not found that. The men are new to me. It is only two and a half years since I first became associated with them, and I have found them very fair in their treatment of the whole matter and that they have much the same view as those who are making the complaints. The methods that might be followed are not yet sufficiently apparent because of the newness of the present methods of handling live stock, and those studying the matter have not yet crystallized fully the changes that might be made into regulations to meet the new situation.

Mr. BENNETT: To what extent is it different from what has hitherto prevailed?

Mr. GARDINER: A man comes in with a truckload of live stock; he goes to the stock-yard, looks around and sees what is happening there. He makes up his mind whether the price is satisfactory to him, and, if not, he drives over and sells his stock to the packing plant. It was not so simple when the live stock all came in by trainload and the cars were unloaded at the stock-yards. The packer then had to go to the stock-yards and look for his live stock in any considerable volume. But to-day perhaps more than fifty per cent of the stock are being taken directly to the packing plant without going to the stock-yard at all. New regulations will have to be evolved. The two major factors involved are the commission men in the stock-yards and the large packers operating their own plants.

Mr. BENNETT: It is alleged that the packers operate together and have a common price.

Mr. GARDINER: On the other hand, it is alleged that the truckers themselves are at the moment one of the most disturbing factors in the whole trade. These things have all to be worked out and methods of marketing adjusted to the new conditions. Again I say I think it requires more than just a board sitting for a few weeks to inquire into the matter. It requires men who have been closely associated with the inspection of the yards and of the packing plants, watching what is going on day by day, and finally working out plans to deal with the situation as it develops.

Mr. BENNETT: How are you going to deal with the contention that there is no competition, which I gather is one of the main difficulties?

Mr. GARDINER: There is considerable competition. There were some figures quoted two days ago with regard to the activities of certain companies which would lead one to believe that perhaps one company handles the greater part of the business. The percentages of bacon exports contributed by the various packers for the period January 1 to April 30, 1938, are as follow:

	Per cent
Canada Packers	29·05
Swift	22·04
Burns	13·83
Thirteen other concerns	35·08

I would judge that, when they are as near as that in the proportions they supply to the export trade, there is some competition in purchasing as among those companies. That represents sixteen different companies. The three larger ones, of course, handle the greater proportion, but all the others are in competition with them in buying hogs. There probably would be more competition if there were a hundred concerns, but I do not know that this country could support so many.

Mr. STEVENS: Would the minister give similar figures for the two preceding years?

Mr. GARDINER: I have not them here. I am informed though, that this is fairly representative of that period of time.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): That covers export figures only?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: There has been a variation in percentages, but they have been one, two and three, in that order, for some time.

Mr. GARDINER: I would judge so.

Mr. BENNETT: To my certain knowledge that is so as regards those three.

Item agreed to.

Special—To provide for feed and fodder relief in the dried-out areas and to provide for direct relief in the dried-out areas for the months of April, May and June, 1938, $2,000,000.

Mr. PERLEY: In the latter end of March—I believe it was on March 31—we were discussing items Nos. 469 and 470, which amounted to over $20,000,000. The minister was anxious to get them through before the end of the fiscal year. A number of questions were asked, because details were wanted, and the minister promised that on some further item in the estimates, on a later occasion, he would supply those details. I do not propose to ask the minister for a great many particulars to-night. I am not objecting at all to the amount of this vote, because I believe it is required to finish up the relief work and to carry on certain projects with respect to rehabilitation. I refer as well to items Nos. 479 and 480. I think we should have certain details. There has been some criticism with respect to the way in which relief has been carried out generally. I want to state again distinctly to-night that I am not in favour of the way in which it has been administered. I believe it should have been handled by a commission, non-political, non-partisan and independent, specially set up for the purpose. The system which was adopted lends itself to certain criticism. Unquestionably there have been abuses, and various complaints have been made. We have a great deal of evidence of misconduct on the part of the inspectors and officials administering this relief.

When we were discussing this item, I think it was on May 25, the leader of the opposition asked for a number of details with respect to the importation of grains.

Mr. GARDINER: I have the answers for all those.

Mr. PERLEY: I am just referring to the fact that we were quite in order in asking the other night for that information. While I was out west during the recent provincial campaign, I was approached by certain parties. They gave me evidence, which I believe is quite authentic, that some of the inspectors misconducted themselves in the way in which they inspected grain and in the way in which they secured feed and fodder. I have here a list, provided by the minister, of the number of inspectors, their fields of operation, their salaries and their expense accounts. When that return was brought down I had letters written to me by several parties complaining of the action of those inspectors. I have under my hand what I consider is authentic and reliable information to the effect that a certain inspector, G. Andrews, of Craven, Saskatchewan, was sent to Manitoba and to Minnesota, and it is alleged that his brother went down also to Manitoba, that a young farmer in that district went down with a baler, and that they worked together. It is alleged that one of the Andrews secured straw from the farmers, straw which was a gift, and that it was baled and sold to the government. The Andrews brothers conduct, I understand, a garage business in the town of Craven. They may have some land. As I say, it is alleged that they secured this straw and sold it to the government. It is alleged also that one of the Andrews brothers got five cars, free freight, and sold the greater part.

I would not expect the minister to have at hand to-night all the information with respect to this one inspector, who, I may say, is one of many against whom charges have been made. What I suggest is that the minister should have an investigation made into the operations and the conduct of some of these inspectors; that this investigation should be made by a commission or in some way which will enable the evidence to be taken under oath, and that if there has been misconduct of that kind, which may be described as fraud and graft, the minister in order to protect himself should investigate it. I should like to know the amount of straw and hay inspected by G. Andrews, whether either Tom Andrews or G. Andrews sold straw to the government, the amounts, the prices, where the straw was purchased, and other details.

I would also ask if all the feed and fodder which were secured prior to the item covered by the vote we are now considering—we go back to items Nos. 469 and 470—have been paid for. A little later, when we receive this information, we may ask for a few more details. There is a great deal of information for which we should have asked had we been considering these estimates back in March; but three months have passed; the greater part of this material has been distributed, and, appreciating that three months afterwards is rather late, I do not propose to hold up the vote for any length of time.

Mr. GARDINER: I have the information which was asked for by the leader of the opposition and which has been referred to by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle:

1. What quantity of hay and fodder did we import into Canada from the United States?
Answer: Approximately 111,000 tons.

2. What price per ton did we pay for it?
Answer: Some 4,300 tons were purchased at a laid down cost which did not exceed $16 per ton; the balance was purchased at prices ranging from $8.50 per ton to $5.50 per ton, depending on grade and source of supply.

3. What number of bushels of oats and other grains did we import from the United States?
Answer: 936,000 bushels of oats.

4. What number of bushels of wheat did we import from the United States?
Answer: None.

5. What were the prices paid per bushel for oats and wheat?
Answer: Oats were purchased from 46 cents to 47½ cents per bushel of 34 pounds, Canadian measure. This price included duty of 9 cents per bushel, excise tax of 3 per cent and freight to the Canadian boundary. No wheat was purchased.

6. What was the cost of transport from the United States to Canada paid on feed and fodder?
Answer: Fodder, $817,531.84 from point of origin; grain, $51,074.61 from boundary.

7. What customs duty was paid on grains imported from the United States?
Answer: 9 cents per bushel on oats.

8. What amount of all hay and grain remains unpaid for?
Answer: Fodder, $44,894.12; grain, $109,342.80.

9. How much was paid to each of the railway companies, Canadian Pacific and Canadian National?
Answer: Canadian Pacific, $1,950,454.10; Canadian National, $867,615.53.

10. From what source were feed and fodder obtained for the months April, May and June?
Answer: There was no winter feeding program in effect during that time.

It might be well to read this note:

Re No. 10—seeding supplies of grain and fodder came from the same source as the winter feed requirements.

That is, much of the feed was purchased during the winter months and was charged eventually by the government to the seed account, and the payments were arranged through the bank loans that were covered by guarantee here.

11. How many applications were made by farmers to ship their stock to winter feeding grounds and how many permits were granted?
Answer: There were a total of 2,193 applications received and 2,083 approved. There were 1,359 freight certificates issued covering the movement of 1,828 carloads of stock.

Those are the answers to the questions which were asked the other day. With regard to the matter of Andrews, who was one of the inspectors, George Andrews was the inspector, and Tom Andrews is alleged to have been purchasing feed in Manitoba to be sold in Saskatchewan. I can only say that complaints were made with regard to the activities of one Andrews. These complaints were made by a certain dealer in the town of Assiniboia, who had been purchasing feed, both hay and straw, from Manitoba for distribution in Saskatchewan, and he did purchase some feed from Andrews. He complained to the department, thinking that the individual from whom he purchased the feed was the same man who was inspector for the department. I had the matter investigated, and I found that it was the brother who was selling feed from Manitoba and who was operating from the town of Manitou in that province. But George Andrews was acting as inspector for the government in the state of Minnesota in connection with supplies to be shipped in to be given to farmers in the drought area of Saskatchewan. As far as I could ascertain there was no relationship between the two brothers so far as any activities associated with this government were concerned. I am not certain that the two brothers were not working together prior to the time one was appointed by the government to carry on certain inspection work in the state of Minnesota, but the inspector had no connection whatever with the activities of his brother with respect to either feed or fodder sold in Saskatchewan.

As regards costs of inspection, we had in our employ thirty-six men whose duty it was to grade hay. These were employed at $125 a month, and the total cost to the government in the way of salaries has been $22,828.98 to March 31. The cost of keeping these men in the field has been $44,251.14. That makes a total cost of hay grading of $67,080.12. These men have graded 398,737 tons of fodder, which works out at seventeen cents a ton for grading hay. That is the actual cost. I may say that there were some criticisms in connection with the activities of these inspectors. I heard some of them during the time I was in Saskatchewan, but I did not hear any criticisms that could be taken very seriously. One criticism for example, which was made on a number of occasions, and made without full knowledge, was that one of these inspectors was attending gatherings of a concern with which she was associated—this happened to be a lady inspector. She was visiting the homes of people on relief and was paid $125 a month, and the criticism was that she was attending the functions of a certain lodge of which she happens to be the president, the president for this whole continent, which indicates a type of woman who in all probability would do this kind of work properly. I wish to say to hon. members who were making that criticism in the Saskatchewan election, that every time this lady was away from her duties she had leave of absence and was away without pay. The criticism is, therefore, not in accordance with the facts. It is possible that the return brought down in the house may have lent itself to that type of criticism, because the answer is that R. E. Gleiser of Estevan, Saskatchewan, received $125 monthly, her expense account being $1,425.58, and that the length of time she had been employed had been twelve months. That is to say, the period over which her employment extended was twelve months, but she had leave of absence occasionally, whenever she was away from her duties, and she was away without pay.

Mr. PERLEY: What amount of straw was purchased from Tom Andrews? The minister states that Andrews was gathering straw, or that straw was given to the government; that the government paid for the baling and that the baled straw was shipped.

Mr. GARDINER: The fodder into which investigation was made was not supplied to the government at all. The fodder regarding which we made those investigations as a result of complaints was sold to a dealer in the town of Assiniboia by Mr. Andrews, but it had no connection with the government's activities. A great deal of feed and fodder has been sold in Saskatchewan to those who could not secure it but were in a position to buy it. The complaint that came to us with regard to the condition of the fodder supplied by Mr. Andrews related to fodder with which we had nothing to do. It was sold by Andrews to an individual in Saskatchewan, and we simply indicated to that individual when he complained that if he had any claim against Andrews he would have to proceed in the courts in the ordinary way.

[Mr. Gardiner.]

Mr. PERLEY: Did they buy any straw or hay from Tom Andrews?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to say; it was all bought by the government of Saskatchewan.

Mr. PERLEY: Could the minister give us any details with resepct to the five cars shipped into Craven by Tom Andrews? He was entitled to freight on only two cars. If he had been a farmer—of course I believe he has some land—

Mr. GARDINER: Tom Andrews lives at Craven. I do not know whether he had any hay or straw shipped to Craven, but I assume that, like many others in that district, he was short of feed and fodder, because practically every farmer in the Craven district was short.

Mr. QUELCH: Why is the government providing for relief in the dried-out areas only to the end of June? If the farmer is not in a position to support himself in June, I cannot see how he will be any better off in July and August, because there will be no return from the crops in that time.

Mr. GARDINER: I can only say we hope that furnishing relief in the drought area will come to an end some time, and the time for it to come to an end is when there is a crop in sight. What we have been doing in the drought area for a number of years is guaranteeing to pay the accounts of farmers in places of business throughout the drought area. The system under which this kind of thing is done is that vouchers are issued through the municipality, those vouchers are taken by the merchants in the towns as cash, and they are finally cashed with the government. This works out that the merchant is running a credit of from sixty to ninety days, with payment of his accounts assured. We have been doing that for a number of years, during the whole drought period. We think, when the time comes that we again have crops, or crops are in sight, business should be carried on throughout that area as it was in normal times. We are hopeful that this year, by July in any case, we can be fairly sure that we are going to have a crop generally over that area. And as soon as that is assured we think the government should get out of the business of supplying relief in that area. I think that would be the wish of the house and of the country in general.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): With reference to the lady inspector to whom the minister referred, what is the amount of salary she has received, and for what period of time?

Mr. GARDINER: I have only the rate per month; I have not the exact time she served the department. This is the second year she has been employed; on each occasion when she has been away from her duties she has had leave of absence, and that, I judge, takes in probably two or three months a year; maybe more.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The sessional paper from which the minister quoted refers to her having been occupied for twelve months of that year, which looks as though she has been paid for every month of the twelve, although it does not say so.

Mr. GARDINER: That simply means that the period of her employment during that year was twelve months. If she was given leave of absence from her duties, it was without pay. But we did not lay her off every time she went away and reappoint her when she came back.

Mr. DOUGLAS: Was she giving full time while she was employed at $125 a month and expenses?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes, she would be giving practically full time. There might be some days when she was giving twenty hours and other days when she was giving only five or six. The duties she was engaged in were of this type. Complaints would come about the bedding people had in a certain community; she would go there and inspect the homes, whether in winter or in summer, and converse with the mother in the home, find out what the condition was and report that to the office. In other cases we would have reports that people were getting more supplies than they ought; she would again go to the home and investigate. Miss Gleiser is the type of woman who drives her own car, who can look after herself in any line of business as well as any man, and because she is of that type we gave her this job, asked her to do it. She will drive long hours; she will work in the winter just as diligently as any man, drive her car in as bad weather as any man; and I think she did the work efficiently.

Mr. COLDWELL: Are we to understand from the reply to the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) that relief in the drought area will not be cut off until the crop is definitely assured, whether that be the 1st, the 15th or the end of July?

Mr. GARDINER: Similar provision was made last year. Provision was made for direct relief and feed and fodder. But by June 19 we were assured that there was not going to be a crop; an order in council was immediately passed extending the period, and it was twice extended following that, running through to March 31 of this year. If the same condition were to develop again, the same thing would be done. But we are already past the period at which we knew, last year, there was going to be a crop failure, and the promise at present is for as good a crop as we have had in the west in an average year.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): The reason I asked whether that lady gave full time is this. I know the lady in question and her capacity for hard work, but I understand she was at the same time operating a creamery. In spite of one's capacity for hard work, it is difficult to operate a creamery and carry on duties for the government at the same time. It seems to me that in selecting people for this work it should be possible to find people who are not otherwise engaged and who could give their full time and full attention. I am not saying the lady neglected her work; I have no reason to do so. If the minister is satisfied, it is he who was hiring her. But it seems to me that in employing people for this work, especially in these times when so many are out of work, it should hardly be necessary to employ one who is handling an enterprising business, as she was.

Mr GARDINER: I know she has operated a creamery for the past ten or fifteen years, and is also the head official of one of the largest women's organizations on this continent, which would suggest that she can take care of at least one or two jobs. But I think it will be found that as far as the operation of the creamery during the last year is concerned, she has had persons employed to run the creamery; she has not been running it herself during the greater part of the last two years. But the main reason she was employed in this work was that we desired to have one woman inspecting the homes where this relief was being dealt out. I think any hon. member will realize that when it comes to inspecting bedding and clothing and children when complaints come in, a woman can do that much better than a man. I repeat that I do not know of any other woman in Saskatchewan who was prepared and also had the experience enabling her to face the hardships involved in doing that kind of work under the climatic conditions prevailing in Saskatchewan. If there is anyone else, I should be pleased to have her name suggested, but personally I do not know of anyone. For that reason we employed Miss Gleiser to do the work.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): What price was charged to the farmers for the oats they received? The minister said the price at the border was forty-seven cents.

Mr. GARDINER: They were not charged anything for them; the oats were given to them free. This government paid the cost.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Did not the farmers sign notes for certain amounts?

Mr GARDINER: I assume the hon. member is speaking of the oats that were bought for feed and general purposes. These were given to the farmers in the drought areas.

Mr. QUELCH: In Alberta?

Mr. GARDINER: In Alberta as well as Saskatchewan. Anyone who was able to pay purchased them from the government.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): At what price?

Mr. GARDINER: The price charged would be the price stated here, less nine cents in those cases. I do not know how much was sold. A request was made to have the duty on oats removed; but it is as broad as it is long; the government was paying the whole bill, so the duty was paid at the boundary and went into the treasury of Canada. Then, when we charged it back to the province, whether it was Alberta or Saskatchewan, we charged it less the nine cents, which means that the nine cents came into the treasury but was not charged up to the province, so the province really got the oats less the amount of the duty, and was in a position to sell the oats to the farmers on that basis.

Mr. PERLEY: That was in the one hundred per cent areas only?

Mr. GARDINER: That would apply to any area where the government handled it; but if an individual imported the oats himself, he had to pay the duty.

Mr. PERLEY: In the marginal areas, where the municipalities distributed the feed and fodder, they were charged the duty?

Mr. GARDINER: I would doubt very much if any of the United States oats were brought in by the municipalities. Wherever there were any distributed, I would think the provincial government provided them to the municipalities at the rate I have mentioned; but I think most of the oats distributed by municipalities direct would be purchased either in Manitoba or Alberta.

Mr. PERLEY: In answer to question No. 8, concerning the amount of hay and grain which remained unpaid for, the minister replied: For fodder, $44,894.12; for grain, $109,-342.80. Will those amounts be paid out of this vote?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, they might be paid out of this vote. This is to cover any distribution that was made between April 1 and July 1. It is just possible that portions of these amounts may come out of this vote, or they may come out of the vote we passed earlier.

Mr. PERLEY: Question No. 11 refers to applications to ship live stock to winter feeding quarters. I might just remind the committee that when we were discussing the previous item, before these estimates were brought down, I suggested that certain compensation should be given the farmers for the losses they had sustained in connection with horses shipped to winter feeding grounds. On that occasion the minister did not give me very much encouragement. However, during the Saskatchewan campaign the question of compensation was taken up by certain inspectors who went around and took claims from different farmers. Individual settlements were supposed to be made; in any case the claims were received, and the farmers were told they would be given attention.

In that connection all I want to say is that I had made the suggestion before even the minister went west; but if the government are proposing to give compensation, they should have announced that general policy so that those who had sustained losses would have been able to make claims at the proper time. I objected very much to the inspectors going the rounds, visiting farmers, asking them if they had lost any horses, if all their horses had been returned or, if not, how many had not been brought back, and then taking claims and practically assuring these men that they would be compensated. While I was speaking at one meeting I mentioned that I had suggested that compensation should be paid. One farmer held up his hand and said, "I got mine to-day."

Mr. GARDINER: Perhaps I may shorten the discussion if I tell my hon. friend that this is the first time I have ever heard of it. The matter has never been referred to us, and if any compensation is being paid that is being done by the provincial government. I did not even hear about it when I was out there.

Mr. PERLEY: Apparently there are a few things the minister did not hear about, then, because one farmer said he had made his claim that day after an inspector had visited him.

Mr. GARDINER: If the province desired to do that, it is quite all right, but that has nothing to do with us.

Mr. PERLEY: Will any part of this or any other vote of the federal government be used to pay any part of that compensation? Surely the responsibility is on this government as well as the provincial government, since the rules and regulations governing these shipments were approved by this government.

Mr. GARDINER: I would suggest that I should wait until the submission is made, if it is to be made, and then give consideration to all the facts. To date there has been no submission to us at all, nor have we been asked any questions about it. If the provincial government are undertaking to do it, I assume they are doing it on their own responsibility.

Mr. HAYHURST: Is it proposed to apportion this amount according to the area of dried-out land in Alberta and Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: No; it is not apportioned according to the area within Saskatchewan or Alberta; if it is used, it will be used in accordance with the needs of any areas in either province. No doubt part of it will be used. Whether or not it will be all used is something I have not sufficient information as yet to be able to say.

Mr. QUELCH: There is another situation I have in mind in regard to relief. I have in mind the area around Berry Creek, for example. Originally there was about one farmer for every half section in that district, and they were chiefly engaged in grain farming. Then, owing to continued drought, a large number moved out; that area was taken over by the special areas board, and five sections of land were apportioned to each farmer remaining. They were allowed to carry something like three head of stock per quarter section. Last year, owing to the shortage of feed, this government passed regulations under which in order to get feed they had to cut down their stock to three or four head per family. Those people now have very little land in grain, so that even if there is a good crop this year they will not benefit. All they have to depend upon are a few head of stock. I should like to know what provision will be made for them. Would it be possible for a loan of some kind to be given them to allow them to increase their stock? It has not been thought desirable that the land should be cultivated, because it is very light and will only blow away. They have been encouraged to go into stock, but at the present time they have only a few head, and will not be able to make a living for themselves and their families.

Mr. GARDINER: The area around Hanna was one in connection with which we had considerable discussion during last winter. I think on an earlier occasion I explained to the house one of the reasons for all that discussion. We had made a survey of Alberta and had satisfied ourselves that there were at least forty-two municipalities in that province in connection with which we could assume one hundred per cent responsibility last winter. Representatives of the government of Alberta came to Ottawa to interview us regarding the matter. We made our suggestion to them as to what we thought ought to be done; but they suggested that a considerably larger number of municipalities, I think somewhere in the neighbourhood of sixty or sixty-five should be taken in. We did not agree with that and we compromised finally on fifty-two. The condition was that we were to take in some of the municipalities surrounding Hanna, particularly north of that town, some west and some east. There was always a difference of opinion between us as to whether some of those should come in. Most of our difficulty arose in that area. We afterwards found that some people kept more cattle than were covered by the regulations. They did it believing they had sufficient feed to carry those cattle through the winter. There was a very heavy snowfall during last winter at which time some of these people found they were not able to keep the number of stock for which they thought they had sufficient feed. I understand they made an arrangement with the provincial government, and the government here made a loan to the provincial government with which to carry through an arrangement by which feed was given to the farmers in that particular area. We are now in position to say that the greater part of the cattle that are necessary in that area were carried through; at least we heard no more complaints in the matter. I do not know that any necessities exist beyond what have been taken care of. The necessities did exist over the whole area from Alberta right through to the Manitoba boundary in Saskatchewan. Because of the discussion that has taken place, I think I should place on the record the figures with regard to the number of persons to whom feed and fodder was supplied in the two provinces.

The particulars are as follows:

It will be noted that there were 69,635 relief recipients in Saskatchewan and 4,311 in Alberta. I believe these figures give a fair idea of the necessities of the two provinces. It must be understood that the dominion was giving assistance in the two provinces because of drought. Assistance was not given under these expenditures because of the necessities for unemployment relief. The lack of feed and fodder would indicate that drought was responsible for the difficulties facing these farmers. Perhaps I should define just what is covered by dominion area and provincial area. Dominion area is that area in which the drought was so bad that the federal government decided to assume one hundred per cent responsibility. The provincial area is still in the drought area. People are inclined to designate the area which we were taking care of as the drought area and not consider the other as being in that category, but the provincial area was also part of the drought area. It will be noted that we have no figures for Alberta covering the number of live stock fed.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the number of townships in the dominion area and the number in the provincial area?

Mr. GARDINER: The dominion area covered 170 municipalities in Saskatchewan and fifty-two municipalities in Alberta. The provincial area covered all the remainder of the province in which assistance would be required.

Mr. BENNETT: Of any kind?

Mr. GARDINER: Of any kind.

Mr. BENNETT: Other than unemployment?

Mr. GARDINER: Due to drought, the lack of feed and fodder. It will be noted that there are no figures given for rye and corn in connection with Alberta and for shorts in connection with Saskatchewan.

Mr. BENNETT: That statement covers feed and fodder. What about human food purchased by the dominion government? I hesitate to ask the minister to read it; it might be put on Hansard so far as I am concerned.

Mr. GARDINER: I have a similar statement here dealing with food.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister say what items it covers so that I shall know if it covers what I am concerned about?

Mr. GARDINER: It covers direct relief —food, fuel, clothing and, where necessary, shelter. It is all lumped in the one group; the items are not separated. But the figures are given separately for rural and urban areas. The statement also shows the expenditure on cheese, dried beans, fish, apples and vegetables. The total purchases of these commodities are given, and the statement also shows the expenditure on the reestablishment of settlers. The statement follows:

Mr. BENNETT: I think it must be apparent to anyone who has followed this discussion with any degree of care that we have here a problem of considerable magnitude. We have the dominion government exercising jurisdiction over a large area, and we have Saskatchewan—Alberta seems to have had a very small area affected—exercising jurisdiction over what has been called the provincial area. That creates at once a conflict of interest. It must be apparent to anyone who has received correspondence that the whole problem of relief in Saskatchewan has been very much complicated by reason of the fact that the dominion government is administering relief on its own responsibility in a given area, and the province is administering it in another area. We did suggest, and I still suggest, that this matter, if it is to be continued, should be dealt with only by a commission.

Mr. GARDINER: May I just interject that the administration is carried on by the province over the whole area. The dominion is not administering relief anywhere.

Mr. BENNETT: I should have put it in this way. The dominion acquires the food, feed, fodder and supplies in a given area, and the province does it in another area.

Mr. GARDINER: No.

Mr. BENNETT: The dominion bought direct.

Mr. GARDINER: We bought cheese and beans and food of that type direct and distributed it to the whole area that was covered by the one hundred per cent federal responsibility.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the point I was making. We purchased cheese, dried beans, fish, apples and vegetables. The dominion government went out and purchased these supplies. We then transported them to Saskatchewan and distributed them, as the minister says, over given areas. On the other hand, we had the province dealing with the situation in the manner indicated by the minister. I submit that in both cases we were dealing with the same taxpayers' money. I submit further—and I do not think this can be questioned—that we have exercised no effective control over the province in connection with this money. That is, while the accounts are audited, there is nothing that prevents the most reckless extravagance on the part of the province because, as the minister very properly says: "The province did this, not the dominion." My contention as to the necessity for a commission was predicated entirely upon that fact.

I have received innumerable letters; but in view of the fact that it is said that the people have approved this method, I am not going to take the time to argue the matter. It may be said that at the election forty-six per cent of the electors expressed themselves as being in favour of this method. The Saskatoon Phoenix-Star wrote an editorial in which it very properly pointed out that the protest vote in Saskatchewan was larger than the vote the government secured. The editor called it that—"the protest vote"—and he gave the causes for it. It may be said, and is said, "Why waste time talking about this? Saskatchewan has given its verdict; the government is returned, and that is the end of it." We will say that under our democracy that is the end of it, and that we must accept it, except to do one thing. I think the minister will agree with me that when one collecting body, namely, the parliament of Canada, is responsible for the acquisition of the revenue, and another taxing power is spending it, a very difficult situation arises. When we were in office the present Prime Minister spent a very great deal of time in reading from learned treatises upon that point, and pointing out how injurious it was to the body politic that it should be continued. We, however, did not discontinue it for reasons that at that moment seemed good. But we did believe that in Saskatchewan, having regard to the very serious character of the situation there, a commission could do the best work possible. The minister disagrees with that. He made that perfectly clear as soon as he came into office because he dispensed with the services of the commission, as he pointed out in this house. Assuming that he is right as to that, I do submit and I wish to put it on Hansard as a matter of record, in the light of all the complaints, that the matter should be dealt with by a commission.

The minister says that some of the complaints are ill-founded. I believe that may be so, but I shall give just one illustration. It is of a blacksmith who was kept so very busy that he was working fifteen hours a day to get his work done; yet he was receiving relief in that community, and he continued to receive relief. The minister very properly says to me: "I have nothing to do with that, Mr. Bennett, because that matter is dealt with by the province of Saskatchewan, and they assure me that everything is being properly done." But I ask, have we any right to take the money which has been raised by this parliament, and which was referred to yesterday by the minister as being a very large sum indeed, then place it in the hands of other people for expenditure and exercise over it only that control which is involved in being certain that the audit is correct—that the goods are as shown on the invoices, and that there is evidence of delivery of the goods to the amount for which payment is sought? I think not.

I hope, indeed I do more than that, I agree with the very earnest hope expressed by the minister that we shall not have to do this again. But who knows? I do not; for last year when I was west there was promise of a crop, and then a month later there was no promise of a crop. I think there is promise of a better crop this year. I have not been there this spring, but that is what I have been told. We all earnestly hope that there will be a crop. But assume there is not; we have again the responsibility. I urge upon the minister the necessity of considering whether it is not our duty to the people of Canada to set up to deal with this matter some tribunal that will obviate our having to say that this is not in our jurisdiction; and, e converso, for the provinces to say that it is not in theirs. All the money comes from here.

It must be remembered that Saskatchewan has been enabled to carry on its business by reason of the fact that we have provided it with funds. Saskatchewan has not defaulted on its bonds and the insurance companies and investors have received their interest because we have provided the province with the money with which to pay the interest. In Alberta we did not do that, and only one half of the interest on the bonds is covered by the coupons paid. These are facts. I suggest that the time has come when we should consider the possibility of having to face this situation again, and if we have to face it we should realize that we are making a rather heavy call upon the taxpayers of this country, to put up millions of dollars for three purposes: (1) unemployment relief, which in Saskatchewan is less, having regard to its agricultural population, than it might otherwise be; (2) relief for drought conditions; and (3) general governmental purposes. Those three make a very large call upon the resources of this dominion. They are subdivided with respect to (2) into very well marked divisions. In one of them we exercise complete and sole control; in the other the provinces exercise complete and sole control.

There should be some body set up—I care not what it may be called—that will be responsible for the administration; for the point to keep in mind is that the government of Saskatchewan is not raising this money by taxation; what it is doing is disposing of the money of Canada which is appropriated by this parliament to them for the purpose—broadly—of relief. Under those circumstances, as the Prime Minister used to point out with great clarity, you cannot expect the same measure of care to be exercised in the disposition of money thus acquired as would be exercised were it to arise from the taxation of the people themselves by the distributing power. I make this suggestion to the minister in the light of what he has pointed out a moment ago, namely that we still have to pay large sums of money. As far as I can see, even if Saskatchewan has a crop we cannot for some time be entirely relieved of responsibility. Is that not correct?

Mr. GARDINER: Well, it should not run very far beyond the first of July.

Mr. BENNETT: I am very glad to hear the minister say that.

Mr. GARDINER: That is, if the crop is in sight.

Mr. BENNETT: I must say I am very glad to hear the minister say that, because I feared they were so denuded of everything after these many years of drought that until there could be a realization in money, we would have to continue to make contributions to enable them to live, because of lack of purchasing power of any kind, or of credit.

Mr. GARDINER: We shall have to continue it to some of them.

Mr. BENNETT: These will be matters largely controlled by the provinces, not by us. I take it that this will be so. The minister will therefore, I think, see the force of what I suggest, namely the desirability of our devising a plan or scheme which will enable us to exercise more effective control, not necessarily administrative so far as distribution is concerned, but with respect to possible abuses in connection with it which are bound to arise where you have any body distributing money or supplies or food or fodder or shelter or clothing, where the responsibility for raising the money is not upon the taxpayers of the province affected. In view of the fact that the electors of Saskatchewan, at least to the extent of forty-six per cent of the population, which under the conditions that prevail constitutes the return of the administration of the day with a minority of the votes, have expressed themselves as being entirely satisfied with the manner in which the distribution of relief has taken place, that must be accepted as an answer—not a bad answer—to any complaint which may be made. But I think it is time that we should carefully and calmly review the situation and, now that the election is past, free from animosities and bitternesses which may have arisen, determine whether or not it is possible to contemplate, with respect to relief, not in Saskatchewan only but in any of the provinces where the federal power is finding the money, that there should be an administration which can effect a closer relationship between the expenditure of money and the results obtained from that expenditure.

Mr. GARDINER: There are only one or two remarks I should like to make. I would not like the impression to remain that, in cases such as that recited, of the blacksmith who was very busy and drawing relief all the time, we take no responsibility. Wherever a case of that kind was reported to us, we insisted on an investigation and, where the facts were found to warrant it, a prosecution.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, but we are not the people to whom reports would be made.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. GARDINER: Of course we had inspectors out who were checking this work in all parts of the province.

Mr. McNIVEN: Is it not a fact that there have been quite a number of prosecutions?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; there have been quite a number of prosecutions. I do not know whether in this case there has been a prosecution.

Mr. BENNETT: There has not been yet.

Mr. GARDINER: There have been cases, and there will be others in which prosecutions are made. But we do take responsibility in that matter.

One other comment I should like to make is that in so far as we have been able to investigate the whole matter of the administrative cost of relief over the whole area, we have found that the closer to the individuals concerned the administration of relief has been handled, the lower the cost has been. The places where we have been able to check indicate that clearly. Take, for example, in Saskatchewan the L.I.D. areas. The municipal department has the same control over the whole area as a municipal council has over a municipality.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, the local improvement districts.

Mr. GARDINER: Districts that have not been organized into municipalities, and where the municipal department carries on the activities just as though it were a municipal council. Where the provincial department have been doing that work, at a greater distance from the individuals concerned, the costs have been higher than they have been in the districts where the municipalities have done it.

Mr. BENNETT: Ah, but generally speaking these are unsettled districts.

Mr. GARDINER: Not in the sense in which the right hon. gentleman speaks. You can find a municipality alongside a local improvement district. They have not been organized because they are a little less thickly populated, but one of the chief reasons is that in recent years the people of those areas have found it less costly to operate in that way than to form those areas into municipalities. But when it comes to distributing relief it has been found less costly to have the municipal council do it than even to have an official of the provincial department do it. I think it would be less costly still to have the municipality do it than to have it done by an official of this government, because of the great distance we are away from the activities in which we are interested.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes. Of course we could not do it.

Mr. GARDINER: We can judge only from the experiences we have had, and that has been our experience.

Some reference was made to the fact that the bond interest has been paid in Saskatchewan largely because of assistance from this government, and that the bond interest in Alberta was not paid because they had not received assistance. I should not like the impression to go out that the reason the bond interest in Alberta was not paid was that they had not received assistance. As a matter of fact, they made a definite decision that they would pay only half the interest whether they received assistance or not. That decision was made without reference to this government, and they have had a great deal of assistance since making that decision. But Saskatchewan never so decided. They said that they would pay the interest if possible, and they have continued to do so.

With regard to the suggestion that the people have voted and that there has been an expression of opinion, which has been a protest expression, I would point out that the protest was much smaller in the area we have been discussing, that is, the area where the dominion government have provided funds and the administration has been carried on by the province, than it was in the other area where there was perhaps less necessity for assistance to be given. I wanted to make that comment because it has a bearing on the question.

Mr. PERLEY: What is the percentage cost of distribution?

Mr. GARDINER: I am not in a position to give the cost of distribution. Does the hon. member mean the cost of administration?

Mr. PERLEY: Yes.

Mr. GARDINER: That has been paid by the province, and we have not assisted in that at all. We have, therefore, no accounting of that.

Mr. PERLEY: If there were any way of arriving at it, the minister would see that the cost, so far as the public is concerned, is greater under the present system than under the relief commission. Under the relief commission it was in the neighbourhood of 2½ per cent. As I remember, the matter was discussed on different occasions, and it was proved, we thought conclusively, that the cost under the relief commission was much lower than it has been under this system. I endorse what the leader of the opposition has said. If we have to continue this, we should have a commission set up, because the present system has lent itself to a multiplicity of inspectors being appointed. Any members who happened to be in Saskatchewan during the campaign know that inspectors were very numerous. In fact, in one constituency in the northern part they were so numerous that it was thought the inspectors should wear a white ribbon in the lapel of their coat so that they would not be asking one another to vote Liberal.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That was reported to have happened in the Wolseley district.

Mr. PERLEY: It happened in my hon. friend's district. They were numerous there.

Item agreed to.

To provide assistance to the provinces for resettlement, $365,000.

Mr. BENNETT: A short explanation will be all that is necessary.

Mr. GARDINER: This amount provides for the continuation of a service that has been given for a number of years in New Brunswick, British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan. The settlers who were moved north in the western provinces or moved into some of the newer areas in New Brunswick under the scheme started in 1932 came under a three-way provision whereby the municipality provided one-third, the province one-third, and the dominion one-third. There has been some difficulty in having them established, and we have been providing an amount on a fifty-fifty basis.

Mr. BENNETT: What has been the net result of it? I know what it was prior to three years ago, but what is the general position now?

Mr. GARDINER: The net result is that by spending this money to assist in breaking up land a great number of these people have been taken off relief and made self-sustaining.

Mr. BENNETT: What is the number? I should like to have it on the record.

Mr. GARDINER: I have the Saskatchewan figures here:

1. Total expenditures.
Answer: $346,415.59 to December 31, 1937.
2. Total number of families assisted in one or more ways.
Answer: 3,018.

3. Number of families given each kind of assistance listed on Schedule A.

Answer:

Horses, oxen and harness	644
Milk cows, brood sows and poultry	483
Freight on live stock and settlers effects	135
Breaking	451
Moving settlers and dependents—
Families	276
Dependents	1,104
Building and fencing materials	2,029
Miscellaneous hardware	495
Farm implements, machinery and repairs	1,933

4. Total expenditure on each kind of assistance.

Answer:

Work stock	$102,116 88
Milk cows, brood sows, poultry	8,363 78
Freight on live stock and effects	6,353 04
Feed and petroleum for breaking	1,368 24
Feed for winter maintenance	119 79
Moving settlers and dependents	1,326 04
Building and fencing materials	26,296 81
Implements and repairs	87,922 67
Miscellaneous hardware supplies	981 50
Clearing and breaking land	59,916 04
Construction of drains	51,650 80
Total	$346,415 59

5. Number of acres of land cleared.
Answer: 33,227 acres.

6. Number of acres of land broken.
Answer: 28,597 acres.

7. Quantities and values of main materials and supplies issued such as timber, other building materials, fertilizer, seed, feed and fodder, farm implements and machinery (value only), miscellaneous hardware and small tools (value only).

Answer:
Lumber, approximately 750,000 feet.
Shingles, approximately 3 million.
Other building material, approximately $5,000.
Seed—nil.
Feed and fodder—$119.79.
For other items see answer to question 4.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister say that the results indicated fair success in the movement of these people in these provinces? I am rather curious about the matter because it was regarded as a very undesirable thing to do; but it was urgently pressed, as the minister will remember, by some people, and I notice that several thousand were moved in Saskatchewan. I do not think there were many in New Brunswick or British Columbia. Would the minister say that in his opinion the results suggest that the effort has been fairly worth while?

Mr. GARDINER: As I remember, there were between 7,000 and 8,000 of these families moved in Saskatchewan; after they had been there for three or four years the greater number of them were still on relief, and the relief was costing more than it did where they had been brought from.

Mr. BENNETT: Some of them wanted to go back.

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; some of them did go back. But since this policy has been in operation, the tendency is for them to become established and get off relief. I think an answer to a question here will give an idea of the extent to which that is true: Number of settlers receiving assistance this year who were also assisted in one previous year, 1,424; number who were assisted in two previous years, nil; number assisted in three or more previous years, nil.

Mr. BENNETT: That is rather good.

Mr. GARDINER: The percentage of settlers receiving assistance in 1937 who may be expected to be self-sustaining in 1938 is about 30 per cent. They figure that in about three years they will work them all off.

Mr. BROOKS: How much of that money was expended in the different provinces?

Mr. GARDINER: The figures are:

Amounts available:
New Brunswick	$ 50,000
Saskatchewan	160,000
Alberta	75,000
British Columbia	15,000
Amounts expended:
New Brunswick	$ 17,909
Saskatchewan	160,000
Alberta	6,472
British Columbia	6,142

Saskatchewan is the only province which spent the amount that was made available.

Mr. BROOKS: Was that amount of $17,000 in New Brunswick for the relief of British settlers expended on the same basis as the money expended in Saskatchewan?

Mr. GARDINER: It was spent on the same basis, under a similar agreement; I think it was in almost identical terms.

Mr. QUELCH: I have received several complaints regarding free freight being cut off on March 31. This is under an agreement between the dominion and provincial governments and the railways. The farmers complain that it is difficult to get their effects into the towns by that date on account of the condition of the roads. Last year around March 31 there was a blizzard raging, and several farmers were not able to get their effects loaded on that date, and so were refused the cheap rate.

Mr. GARDINER: We have had some complaints about matters of that kind, but that is because our agreements run out on March 31. We have always been able to make arrangements with the railways to carry on.

Mr. QUELCH: And you will agree to carry them on?

Item agreed to.

Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act and water storage, $3,500,000.

Mr. PERLEY: The minister stated the other evening it would be under this item that he would give some information in respect to the community pastures and the amount of stock in each.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister will not be able to finish this item to-night. He will probably save himself and the committee a little effort if he rises now.

Mr. GARDINER: Unless there is considerable information required, I can give the list of pastures and perhaps let it go at that. Would it suit the purpose if I have this printed in Hansard?

Mr. BENNETT: It would give us an opportunity to read it, without the minister having to read it.

Mr. GARDINER: The statement is as follows:

Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act
List of Community Pastures Completed to March 31, 1938

Name—Headquarters	Acreage	Potential carrying capacity	Construction cost
Coalfields—Bienfait	6,500	200	$ 6,062 83

Total	175,900	6,280-7,100	$150,400 42

Mr. BENNETT: It is in connection with this matter that I wish to discuss with the minister some questions arising out of the work which has been undertaken. The act was passed in 1935 just before the late government left office. At that time it was not contemplated that it would involve expenditure of such large sums. At the moment it is placing in the hands of the minister the direction of the expenditure of practically $3,500,000. Last year we spent substantial sums, and without seeing the details there are certain matters which I should like to discuss but cannot. One of them has to do not with the pastures but with the question of damming streams and creating pools in various parts of the west. I do not recall the exact word; I think they manufactured a word that describes it—

Mr. GARDINER: Dug-outs.

Mr. BENNETT: Will that be covered by the information which is supplied.

Mr. GARDINER: Not by this table, but I have the information.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister would also produce that so that we may have it on Hansard for Monday. It will expedite the passage of his estimates, because that will enable us to speak about one of the projects which I think can fairly be discussed. The minister might tell us the present method of operation.

Mr. GARDINER: It would be impossible to give a list of the dug-outs, where they are located; that is, there are hundreds of them, but I can give the numbers.

Mr. BENNETT: Is there any way of giving the location without too much trouble? It is that phase I was going to discuss.

Mr. GARDINER: This map will give some idea. Every dot there is a dug-out.

Mr. BENNETT: Ever since I saw red last evening it has been difficult to see at that distance.

Mr. GARDINER: I am sending the map over to my right hon. friend.

Mr. QUELCH: There is certain information I should like to have in regard to the Bartman dam. Will that be handed down? I should like to know how much was paid to the Poole Construction Company last fall or up to date on the building of the Bartman dam, and who was responsible for rebuilding it? Is the company responsible, or the government? The dam was washed out this spring.

Mr. GARDINER: The Bartman dam is on East Berry creek in Alberta. There was storage for irrigation of approximately 700 acres of land in order to ensure a supply of winter feed. It was an earth dam with outlet pipe and spillway channel, estimated cost $25,000. Tenders were invited from the following:

E. O'Connor, Medicine Hat;
Poole Construction Co., Ltd., Edmonton;
J. Millar, Western Construction Co., Edmonton;
Special Municipal Areas Board, Edmonton;
W. B. Ramsay, Regina;
Gibbs Brothers, Lumsden, Saskatchewan;
Kearns & Mamoser, Shaunavon, Saskatchewan.

Tenders were received from the following only:

Special municipal areas board, $19,155.60;
Poole Construction Co., $19,332.50.

Mr. BENNETT: Was that for just one dam?

Mr. GARDINER: Yes; the estimated cost was $25,000. The amount paid to the contractor in connection with the construction of this project, covering work done for the months of October and November, totals $10,237,132. The balance due on contract will have to be paid during the fiscal year 1938-39. It is not all paid.

Mr. QUELCH: Are they going to rebuild? The dam was washed out this spring because the spillway was not completed. I was wondering if they were responsible for the reconstruction of the dam.

Mr. GARDINER: They will not be responsible for the rebuilding of it without any further payment. I telegraphed to Regina to get the facts with regard to the present position, and have them in a telegram dated June 15. The full report is in the mail, on the way east, but the telegram reads:

Not possible to complete dam before freeze-up. Dam thirty-four feet high. On account of powder dry earth impossible to make dam completely watertight. In March contractor instructed to cut emergency spillway on wing of dam to avoid break. This and every other precaution taken to avoid break. Because of exceptionally heavy snow fall in Berry creek drainage basin greatest spring floods that have ever occurred poured into reservoir. Earth fill settled sufficient for water to over top dam washing out gap one hundred and fifteen feet long including sluice gate structure. Estimated total for complete dam forty thousand cubic yards. Estimated amount washed out approximately ten thousand cubic yards.

In other words, approximately one-quarter of the dam was washed out.

Mr. QUELCH: Are they responsible for rebuilding it?

Mr. GARDINER: I think not. Probably we shall have to call for tenders for rebuilding it.

Mr. QUELCH: Will that be done this year?

Mr. GARDINER: We expect to have it done this year.

Mr. QUELCH: I believe this dam will serve a very useful purpose, but will it not be possible to build one or two storage dams above it? That dam will not hold enough water to irrigate the whole area down below in the event of a very dry year. If we had one or two storage dams above that, no doubt we would be able to get enough water to carry through a dry year, which is the rule in that area. It is unusual to have the amount of water they had this spring.

Mr. GARDINER: I am not able to say whether provision should be made for another dam above that one. So far as I know, at the moment there is no survey in connection with one.

Mr. BENNETT: Looking at the dams that are located on the sheet of paper—

Mr. GARDINER: Those are dug-outs.

Mr. BENNETT: Then looking at those dug-outs located on the sheet of paper which the minister sent over to me, I would say it would be somewhat difficult to escape a duck pond in any part of that area, if you could attach importance to them in that sense.

Progress reported.

MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES

BIRTHDAY GREETINGS TO HON. T. A. CRERAR

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): To-day one of our number (Mr. Crerar) has attained another birthday. Full of years and honours he has just come into the chamber from reading the messages of congratulation that have come to him from all parts of the world, on the fact that to-day he has attained the age of sixty-two. I know he will not regard it as a favour that I should indicate the number of his years; but if he continues to stagger like Atlas under the load he bears, of a department that contains all the mines, resources, parks, forests and Indians, to say nothing of the undetermined question as to whether or not the Eskimos are Indians, it is quite clear that we cannot expect to celebrate more than twenty-five more such anniversaries.

With the hon. gentleman at all times are the best wishes and the good will of all those who have been privileged to be associated with him. He holds very erroneous opinions with great tenacity; and he holds, not with tenacity but with very great ease, the friendship and good will of many people in various parts of this country who are not unmindful of the fact that while oil and water do not mix, it is fitting that the sole representative in this chamber of the union government should, on this, his birthday, sit side by side with his right hon. friend the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). I wish the hon. minister well.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): I desire to join very heartily with my right hon. friend in expressing congratulations to the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). I am sorry he is getting older. He is getting to be an old man, I understand; in point of fact he is three months older than I am. In regard to the remembrance of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), I think it is true that the Minister of Mines and Resources made a mistake during his lifetime, but I must pay him a tribute.

Mr. BENNETT: He has atoned for it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I remember when he was Minister of Agriculture in that union government, facing us poor fellows who were on the other side; I remember having to deliver a speech, which I made as strong as possible, against that nefarious government. The man who was smiling and beaming, facing me at the time I made my speech, was the then Minister of Agriculture; he was lost in his surroundings.

Mr. BENNETT: Coming events cast their shadows before.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): So I am pleased indeed to pay him this tribute. He has a fine heart and a sound mind, and he is never very long in his mistakes; he always recovers from them.

Mr. BENNETT: That is why we have such hope for him.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): On behalf of the members on this side, I thank the right hon. gentleman for this generous tribute to my colleague.

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Chairman, I observe that the clock is almost on the stroke of eleven, but certainly I cannot let this occasion pass without expressing to my friend—as I hope I may describe the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition—

Mr. BENNETT: I am honoured.

Mr. CRERAR: —and to my colleague the Minister of Justice my thanks for their appreciative words. I think I have known the leader of the opposition for a greater number of years than I have known even the Minister of Justice.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes; I was on the platform with the hon. gentleman for the union government, although I was not a candidate.

Mr. CRERAR: If my right hon. friend will search his memory a little more closely, I think he will find that he was not on the platform with me in 1917, but at any rate we were fighting on the same side at that time.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; I was on the platform with the hon. gentleman at Calgary.

Mr. CRERAR: The Minister of Justice has alluded to my earlier appearance in this house, and to the speech he made on one occasion. I was really so enamoured of the very pleasant personality of the minister, even when he was in opposition, that I could not resist smiling across the gangway at him.

I do wish to express my thanks to the members of the house who are still here at this late hour for the very kind way in which they have received the altogether too generous felicitations of my colleague and the right hon. leader of the opposition. Sixty-two years is getting well along in the allotted span, but I hope I may have still a few years of useful service before me. During the next year or two, at any rate, which will constitute the term of this parliament, I hope I may have an opportunity to acquire wisdom from both the leader of the opposition and the Minister of Justice.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Monday, June 20, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

Second report of the special committee on electoral matters.—Mr. Bothwell.

UNEMPLOYMENT

MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT TO DISCUSS MATTER OF URGENT PUBLIC IMPORTANCE—VANCOUVER SITUATION

On the order for motions:

Mr. J. S WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask leave to move the adjournment of the house to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the serious situation existing in Vancouver as a result of the eviction of single unemployed men from the post office, and in order at once to stop disturbances.

And leave having been granted:

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, the situation in Vancouver is so serious that we have no other course than to bring it to the attention of the house and of the government. On various occasions a number on this side of the house have endeavoured to call attention to the situation which was gradually becoming more dangerous in Vancouver owing to the occupancy of the art gallery and the post office by single unemployed men. I bring forward this resolution not to advocate greater police action, but on the other hand once more to attempt to get the government to take action in a critical situation— constructive action, not the action that has recently been taken by the police.

It is not necessary for me to spend any length of time in bringing to the attention of the house the causes of the trouble of yesterday. A number of these men had been in the camps. They came back to Vancouver and could find no work. In desperation they took possession of the lower floor of the art gallery and of the post office, and there for a month have been bivouacked. Strangely enough, it would seem that they have received on the whole the support of the citizens of Vancouver.

Action has been urged by us along the line of providing work. The leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) took occasion to urge that the post office should be vacated. But the government offered no alternative place to which the men could go. As I see the matter, the men took the only means available to them of calling attention to their plight. They did not resort to arms; they did not resort to force. They simply attempted to bring their condition to the attention of the provincial and the federal governments. This government offered them one alternative and one only, namely, that they should be returned to their places of origin. As we have pointed out again and again, the majority of these men cannot very well establish residence anywhere. They belong to the great army of unemployed transients. They may be employed one year or one month in Winnipeg, the next in northern Ontario, the next in Vancouver. They are men of a class which has been called upon to do rough pioneer work all over this country. And they are not fools by any means. They know perfectly well that they cannot establish residence, and if they are returned from Vancouver to Winnipeg or Toronto or Montreal they will not be in one whit better position than they are in Vancouver to-day. So the only alternative so far as we can gather which the government offered them was of no value.

We have pointed out here again and again that if this kind of thing were allowed to go on, there would be some occasion when some incident would force trouble. In this particular case it seems that the authorities did not wait for the men to riot, but themselves took forcible action and used tear gas bombs and clubs for the purpose of evicting them from the post office. According to the press, the orders came from Ottawa; apparently there was some request from the premier of British Columbia.

I should like to ask the government very frankly, what choice had these men? They could not be sent to their places of origin. They could only go out in the streets. They did not resort to force of arms. They simply took a rather spectacular way of bringing their plight to the attention of the public. It is unfortunate, of course, that in their flight, after having been evicted, they smashed windows in a number of stores and caused, according to the press, thousands of dollars' worth of damage. The report which I had stated that these men were gas-crazed as a result of the gas attack. I do not know whether the gas used brings on craziness of that kind, but I can well imagine that if most of us were treated in that fashion we would be willing blindly to hit at almost anything that showed itself; I think that would be the natural reaction. After all, these men are not criminals—the house should be reminded of that—but poor fellows out of work, deprived of the opportunity of making a living. I am sorry, as we all are, that windows were broken. I am glad to know that when, in the afternoon, they congregated before the police cells, wiser counsels prevailed. One of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation members of the legislature there urged that they should disperse, and I believe that was done. But no one will be able to control the feelings of resentment which have been stirred up by such an unwarranted act on the part of the government.

An hon. MEMBER: On a Sunday.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not care whether it was on Sunday or any other day; it was an unwarranted act whenever it was done.

It may be said that these men are led by agitators. I have not been, and other hon. members have not been, at the coast in recent weeks. I cannot speak as to the particular men who are heading them, but I would say this, that if there had been no leaders I could well wish that there had been, and I give all honour to the men among them who took positions of leadership in an extremely difficult situation of that kind. I suppose we shall have the old bogey raised that these men were communists or something of that kind. This situation has nothing to do with communism. It is the result of unemployment. And if there is nobody else to take the lead I hope that men will be raised up who will do so.

The irony of the whole situation is that the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself was away over the week-end celebrating his grandfather's revolution. My grandfather was on the other side in that revolt, but I do not hold it against William Lyon Mackenzie that he agitated against the intolerable conditions which, as I think we all now believe, existed at that time. But I ask the right hon. the Prime Minister whether he thinks his grandfather was justified in resorting to arms.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): He did not sit in a post office.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No; sitting in a post office is a peaceable thing, and William Lyon Mackenzie resorted to arms. His grandson the Prime Minister spends the week-end in lauding the action which his grandfather took, and yet his government here is using violence against men who themselves have used no violence and are simply protesting against intolerable conditions. I could not but think that this very well illustrates the aptness of those words of James Russell Lowell in The Present Crisis:

> 'Tis as easy to be heroes as to sit the idle slaves
> Of a legendary virtue carved upon our fathers' graves,
> Worshippers of light ancestral make the present light a crime;—
> The trouble is:
>
> We see dimly in the present what is small and what is great,
> Slow of faith, how weak an arm may turn the iron helm of fate.

I will not read all the poem, but I would commend to every hon. member, if he does not know them, these verses, which are great in sentiment, whether or not they are regarded as the greatest among poems:

> They have rights who dare maintain them; we are traitors to our sires,
> Smothering in their holy ashes freedom's new-lit altar-fires;
> Shall we make their creed our jailor? Shall we, in our haste to slay,
> From the tombs of the old prophets steal the funeral lamps away
> To light up the martyr-fagots round the prophets of to-day?
> New occasions teach new duties: time makes ancient good uncouth;
> They must upward still, and onward, who would keep abreast of truth;
> Lo, before us gleam her camp-fires! we ourselves must pilgrims be,
> Launch our Mayflower, and steer boldly through the desperate winter sea,
> Nor attempt the future's portal with the past's blood-rusted key.

If there was anything in the career of William Lyon Mackenzie which deserves commendation to-day, much greater is the commendation which we should give to these unemployed men who have the courage to stand out and let the public know the plight of themselves and their fellows.

Somebody behind me suggested that this police action was taken on Sunday. I am afraid I am not a sabbatarian. I do not care much whether it was done on Sunday or another day, but I am concerned in the question whether it is all in keeping with the real spirit of Christianity. I have been quoting Lowell. I could not but think of yet another of his poems, called A Parable, the words of which were instilled into me in my childhood:

> Said Christ our Lord, "I will go and see > How the men, my brethren, believe in me,"
> He passed not again through the gate of birth,
> But made himself known to the children of earth.
> He wandered about and everywhere:
>
> With carpets of gold the ground they spread
> Wherever the Son of Man should tread,
> And in palace-chambers lofty and rare
> They lodged him, and served him with kingly fare.

And so on, and so on.

But still, wherever his steps they led,
The Lord in sorrow bent down his head,
And from under the heavy foundation-stones,
The son of Mary heard bitter groans.

And in church, and palace, and judgment-hall,
He marked great fissures that rent the wall,
And opened wider and yet more wide
As the living foundation heaved and sighed.

I pass over the next stanzas:

Then Christ sought out an artisan,
A low-browed, stunted, haggard man,
And a motherless girl, whose fingers thin
Pushed from her faintly want and sin.

These set he in the midst of them,
And as they drew back their garment-hem,
For fear of defilement, "Lo, here," said he,
"The images ye have made of me!"

We have had these thousands of poor unemployed men, not merely in Vancouver, but in every one of our great industrial centres, and the policy of this government, acquiesced in by its supporters, is degrading them. Then when in desperation they take some overt action, in the name of justice we rise and say that some repressive measure must be taken.

The Prime Minister has the audacity to say that the government "has shown patience and forbearance." Patience and forbearance! The only patience and forbearance they have shown is to do the natural and easy thing—that is, to do nothing. What about the patience and forbearance of these men who for the last month have been lying on newspapers in a public building, sending out some of their number to beg as did the old time friars, from door to door. Begging for charity—do you think these men like to live on charity? Not a bit of it. They want work and wages, but under present conditions they cannot have work and wages.

The fact I wish to emphasize is that notwithstanding the action of yesterday the problem remains still the same. It is true that the men are out of the art gallery and the post office, but the problem remains still the same. I suppose the Prime Minister or the Minister of Justice will tell us how bad these men are and offer some excuse for government policy. I remember very well a few years ago when the then Minister of Justice got up and told me that the penitentiaries were fine; he read reports from his officials that stated there was nothing much wrong. He made out a lot of our charges to be very foolish. And that was not very long ago. I do not refer to the present Minister of Justice but his predecessor. And now there comes a report which fully substantiates the serious reports of the prisoners and others whom we had quoted. I suppose that now, after these months and years have gone by, something will be done; but why should not something have been done then? Why should we be tied by a bureaucratic practice that tends always to give official reports priority over anything else?

The fact is that the present dominion government recognized responsibility towards the men, because some months ago they provided work projects that gave the men a few months' work. Then when spring came the men were turned off. I admit that under normal conditions it is probable that the men could have found work in the spring, because normally work opens in the spring. But notwithstanding the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), I submit that for the great majority of the workers in the country times are anything but prosperous, and though there may have been more work than a year ago there are still large numbers without work; and for those without work the situation is as serious as it ever was. It may be that the curve is rising and more profits are being made. On the other hand, for these unemployed men the position is stationary; they cannot sink much lower than they are to-day.

The government, I assert, recognized its responsibility and provided work for them and then suddenly turned them off, washed their hands of the responsibility and left the problem to be dealt with by the city of Vancouver. I suggest very seriously to the government that even at this stage the least they can do for these men is to provide them with shelter and food until such time as work can be found for them. That is the least that can be done for the men. A number of them found shelter in a public building and a number received food through the generosity of the citizens of Vancouver. Let me repeat that the least that this government can do is to provide for these men shelter and food until such time as work can be given them. Unless the government does that, I would feel like warning the government that we have not yet seen the most serious troubles that may occur on the west coast. I suppose the Minister of Justice, who is muttering something to himself, will presently get up and accuse me of inciting to trouble.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes; it is an invitation to trouble.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: All right; let the minister talk. If that is the best reply he can give, he is free to make it. But let me point out that again and again, we in this corner have urged the government to take action, warning them, not threatening them, that the situation was such that unless they took action something of this kind was inevitable. They refused to do anything and I suppose that with one hundred of a majority they can continue to refuse to do anything. But I want to warn them again that the problem is precisely the same as it was yesterday morning; in fact it is worse, because the men are beginning to realize that the government cares precious little about them—which is the most serious thing that can take place.

Talk about developing anarchy! It is not a group of agitators that are bringing us to anarchy; it is the action, or rather the inaction of the government in not providing for the real needs of the people. I suppose the government can congratulate itself, in that high and lofty manner, upon the fact that the majesty of the law has been vindicated. Yes; let them have whatever consolation they can get out of that. Great is the law! But I submit, Mr. Speaker, that we are beginning to understand in this country more and more that there is one law for the rich and another law for the poor; or, if you like to put it another way, that justice shows one face towards the rich and another face towards the poor.

It happened that over this week-end, in preparation for the budget debate, I was reading the evidence given before the royal commission on the textile industry. I want to say now, in all seriousness, that that discloses a shameful, sickening story of heartless exploitation, of wholesale robbery by men prominent in the public life of Canada. Inordinate greed, bare-faced lying, and criminal fraud characterize the careers of this gang of high-class crooks. I say that seriously. And yet this gang of high-class crooks shelter within the structure of our tariff arrangements.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: We were told by the Minister of Finance in his speech on Thursday that he does not propose to do anything about this situation this year, that tariff changes are to be put off. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that until there is penitentiary punishment for some of the men who, according to the evidence, have been defrauding the government—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —there is not much use—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member is getting away from the subject of the motion before the house, which has to do with the situation in Vancouver.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will conclude in a moment or so. I say that the action of the government with regard to this textile business has been very dilatory. This matter has been going on for years. The actual reports have been in the possession of the government for one year and no action has been taken.

Mr. DUNNING: That is entirely wrong.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Let the Minister of Finance say what action has been taken.

Mr. DUNNING: They are in the courts now; that is the position.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: They may be in the courts, but I should like to know what action has been taken.

Mr. SPEAKER: I shall have to ask the hon. member to confine himself within the scope of his motion, which refers to the situation in Vancouver.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: My point is that this precipitate action in connection with the Vancouver unemployed will make the people of Canada realize that justice is not being handed out these days with an even hand. Where there has been a much more serious infringement of justice, little or no action has been taken. These unfortunate unemployed are guilty only of the misdemeanour of trespass; they have been guilty only of the most petty crime. They were told to get out of these public buildings, and when they refused to do so, they were clubbed and gassed. All this has happened at a time when other people much more guilty are being treated with the greatest leniency.

If this kind of thing is to continue in Canada it will mean the undermining of what we have called free government. It will mean the undermining of real democracy. When I was a child I was instructed that justice was blindfolded in order that she might act with impartiality, but after some years in this house I have come to believe that justice is blindfolded in order that she may not recognize the realities of the situation.

I shall not go into any further details as to what took place in Vancouver. I feel justified in taking the action I have taken to-day. I wish I could have spoken more strongly a month ago. I have known something of the lives of men of this class over the last thirty years. There may be individual rascals among them, and we shall probably hear of them, but on the whole this group of men have made an enormous contribution to the welfare of this country. Most of these men are unemployed through no fault of their own. Even the smashing of windows is not as serious as the official policy of smashing of the morale of these men. Unless the government now steps in to help them, the way will be left open for further disturbances and indeed, as I have said, for the undermining of democracy itself.

Right Hon. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as the minister in control of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police I think it is my duty to give to the house an official report of the events of yesterday which have been the cause of the denunciation to-day by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). The hon. member says that the step taken by these unfortunate unemployed was spectacular, but that they could take no other. I believe they were ill advised in taking the action they did. My hon. friend says that the government did not wait for the men to riot. I am amazed that he should think that occupation of the public property of Canada should be allowed to continue until riots occurred.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: What about the alternative I proposed?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I listened attentively to my hon. friend. I heard his strong and violent words, but he failed utterly to suggest any solution of this problem.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Work and wages.

Mr. MacINNIS: What did you offer in 1935?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I expected that. If the government has been open to attack, it has been because of the leniency shown. It has been attacked for taking that attitude, not only in this house but elsewhere, and particularly in Vancouver. The post office at Vancouver has been occupied in this way by hundreds of men for the last four or five weeks. They were allowed to occupy this public building without interference on the part of the authorities. The government has been criticized for allowing that sort of thing to continue. I can remember such a kindly and estimable and moderate gentleman as the hon. member for Yale (Mr. Stirling) only the other day commencing his remarks with the question, "Is this Canada?" The government has been blamed for having allowed this state of affairs to continue, and causing the population of the city of Vancouver to suffer because of this invasion.

What possible solution of the difficulty could be hoped for by this invasion of the post office building? It was only because the government was warned that there was great danger of contagion in Vancouver that steps were taken. I ask any hon. member of this house if there was not a responsibility that had to be assumed by the government. This had to be done and it was done in the most careful way. I should like to read a telegram that was sent by the acting Postmaster General (Mr. Euler) to the municipal authorities of Vancouver on June 17. It reads:

> In view of the protracted illegal occupation of the post office in Vancouver which is represented as an increasing nuisance to those who make proper use of this building and as a menace through possible contagion to the health of the occupants and to others I am authorized by the dominion government to ask the appropriate authorities of the city of Vancouver to take such steps as they deem necessary to have this federal building vacated by those who are occupying it as trespassers. The dominion government in common with provincial and civic authorities have shown patience and forbearance in dealing with this situation. We have been anxious by such an attitude to avoid the possibility of any untoward incident. We had hoped that the passage of a little time would make apparent to the persons involved the error of proceeding as they have. As such unfortunately has not proved to be the case we feel that the existing situation should not be permitted longer to continue.

Instructions were sent and given that the men were to be very careful to select the best time possible in order to avoid trouble and to carry out their task in such a way as to avoid as much as possible destruction of property and injury to persons. The report I have received from the authorities, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police as well as the civic authorities of Vancouver, is that it was impossible to do what was done in a more careful and at the same time equally effective manner. The other day the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) said that Colonel Foster, chief of the Vancouver police, was a cool-headed man, a splendid officer, and that Vancouver was fortunate in having him at the head of the force. Colonel Foster was in charge of those operations, because what was done yesterday was in charge of the civic authorities; the Royal Canadian Mounted Police only gave such assistance as was necessary in order to bring about the evacuation of the post office. The mounted police are now in charge of the Vancouver post office and will see that the building is kept free for its public and official use.

The report I have from Major Hill, the officer commanding the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at Vancouver, is that the operation was carried out with the least possible injury to persons and damage to property, and that there was the closest cooperation between the two forces. My hon. friend may speak of the use of gas, but anyone who knows anything about a matter of this kind realizes that this is the most humane way to carry out an operation of this kind. Otherwise these men would have had to be evicted by means of force, and certainly there would have been more injuries than resulted through the use of gas to compel them to leave the building. It is unfortunate that some people were injured; my information is that two members of the city police and two of the unemployed had to receive hospital treatment. The others who were hurt suffered only slight injury which did not require hospital treatment. If an operation of this kind was necessary I do not think there was any possibility of its being carried out with less trouble and less injury to those who took part. Of course, I repeat, I am sorry, as all the members of the government and of the house generally are sorry, that injury should have been suffered by anybody as a result of what took place yesterday. My hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) is wrong when he thinks he has a monopoly on humanitarianism.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I did not suggest that at all in any way. I would suggest, though, that the government has the facilities for doing things, and we have not

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Well, my hon. friend always springs up when somebody talks about him, but for a man who is so strong for the freedom of speech he seems little inclined to let those who differ with him express their views unmolested. However, I say the members on this and all sides of the house are quite as sympathetic to human troubles and miseries as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, though they may not be as violent and bitter in their denunciations and may not think that others are callous and forgetful of what is due their fellow men. In this instance the police have done their duty, as they had to do it, in the most humane way, in a way that could not be avoided. So far as the part played by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police is concerned, I stand by that body which, as usual, has been faithful to its traditions. Canada as a whole will not have to be ashamed of anything that has been done by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in reference to this incident.

I do not desire to discuss the question of unemployment; my hon. friend the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) will do so. In spite of the fact that the words are so unpleasant to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, however, I do desire to say that the reign of the law must continue in this country, that peace and order must prevail. If there be spectacular deeds, as my hon. friend calls them, which are provided for by the criminal law, whether they constitute trespass or any other offence against the whole of the people of Canada, it is the duty of the government, in spite of the bitter words of my hon. friend, to see that the law shall prevail, and so long as I have anything to do with this government, the law shall prevail.

Mr. BENNETT: If I may ask the right hon. gentleman a question, do his reports indicate that these men in the post office asked to be arrested and offered to go quietly if arrested.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The report indicates:

> At five a.m. postmaster addressed the occupants informing them dominion government had instructed that they were to leave the building and advising them to do so in orderly manner, and giving them twenty minutes to pack up their effects and leave. At five twenty-five it was evident that men would not leave voluntarily. I—

That is, the officer in command of the mounted police.

> —then addressed the men, "You have already heard the request of the postmaster Vancouver, and as you are taking no steps to leave you will be allowed another ten minutes after which you will be forcibly ejected." At five thirty-five I informed them that unless they started to leave gas would be used forthwith. After short interval gas was used. Simultaneously the men commenced to break plate glass windows both sides of building and large part of interior glass screens—

And so on.

Mr. BENNETT: Nothing about arresting men?

Mr. LANDERYOU: Did the men offer to go out peaceably?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I am not so advised by the report.

Miss AGNES C. MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, I believe every hon. member sympathizes with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) in his obviously unhappy position. His speech shows how unhappy he was. I am sure that as a kind man he is sorry to be the minister to be required to make the speech.

One wonders about the Sunday coup—or whatever the word may be. We remember that Mr. Hitler always struts his stuff on Sunday. It seems to me a strange day in which to evict men from a post office. Would it be because very few people are down town on a Sunday? There are not many witnesses to such a performance; or—

An hon. MEMBER: Less would be likely to get hurt.

Miss MACPHAIL: —was it to save lives of people who would be coming for their mail on some other day? I do not go quite as far as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) in thinking that it is as good to do a thing on Sunday as on any other day. I think it is not a happy performance any day of the week, but certainly Sunday was quite the worst day. It did put the men very much at the mercy of the authorities.

I do not believe any of us think that people should go into public buildings and stay there, if it is possible for them to do anything else. But if we could not get work or relief, I wonder what we would do? We might just sit here—at least it is comfortable. That is the position. Those men could not get work or relief. What had they to do? They did the least destructive thing I can think of. I am not defending them for staying in possession, but I am saying it was a very tiresome thing to do, and I would have hated to have to do it. I hate waiting any place for a long time, and certainly they had to wait a long time. But it was not a very destructive thing to do. They stayed on and on, hoping I suppose, and really believing, that something would be done for them.

When I think of the number of people who are killed each year on our highways and the need we have for foot-paths along those highways, I do not think it would have been difficult to secure jobs for those men. We could send squads of painters out to paint farm buildings in Ontario. It will take a lot of paint, but the sooner it is done the less it will take. We could have unemployed people tear down old buildings obstructing the landscape, buildings which are anything but beautiful. It is not difficult to think up things the men could do. I do think we could have done something, and I must support the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, exactly, when he says that the position is just what it was. We still have men in Vancouver. They still have no work. They are still not on relief, and they still have to establish residence. The windows have been broken and the tear gas bombs have exploded—I do not know how expensive they are—but whatever there is in the destruction of windows and in the bursting of bombs, we have lost that much. Certainly there is a lot of bad feeling, and the problem is exactly as it was before. As a matter of fact, I should not say that, it is not exactly as it was before, it is a good deal worse.

I have been handed a booklet, and I must say it is appropriate to read it at this moment. This is a speech, which I almost hate to quote, made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) on the night of the election, October 14, 1935. It is the concluding paragraph which I think should be read. I am sorry the Minister of Justice had to pinch hit for him to-day, because anyone who voices such lofty and beautiful sentiments surely could have found work for not so many men. This is the conclusion of the paragraph headed "The task of Liberalism to-day":

In the new era which dawns to-day, the struggle for the rights of the people will, in the realm of economic liberty and security, be carried on as never before.

Mr. HEAPS: That is right; it is.

Miss MACPHAIL: This is interesting:

Poverty and adversity, want and misery, are the enemies which Liberalism will seek to banish from our land.

Here was the opportunity.

They have lain in wait—

I suppose he means poverty and adversity, want and misery.

—at the gate of every Canadian home during the past five years, and their menacing mien has served to destroy the souls, as well as the minds and bodies, of an ever increasing number of men, women and children in our land.

And this:

We take up at once, as our supreme task, the endeavour to end poverty in the midst of plenty, starvation and unnecessary suffering in a land of abundance, discontent and distress in a country more blessed by Providence than any other on the face of the globe, and to gain for individual lives, and for the nation as a whole, that "health and peace and sweet content" which is the rightful heritage of all.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does the hon. member not think conditions have very materially improved in this country since those statements were made?

Miss MACPHAIL: Not for the men in Vancouver post office.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: But generally for the unemployed throughout Canada they have very greatly improved.

Mr. BENNETT: In the rest of the world.

Miss MACPHAIL: There has been an improvement, but it has not been very great. For the unemployed people the improvement does not matter at all. If we have managed to do better for many, ought we not to go much farther for the sake of that last few thousand who have been in the post office and, of all places, in the art gallery of Vancouver?

I do not intend to say anything further, but I thought that this gem ought to be made known to the House of Commons. It is very beautiful, quite as beautiful as the poetry read by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I thought we ought to have these words brought home to us again, and I do feel that in view of them the Prime Minister should—well, carry on from there.

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, those who are familiar with conditions in the city of Vancouver with respect to unemployed single men will find very little comfort in the rather lame explanation of the action taken yesterday, offered this afternoon by the right hon. the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). As I listened to the words of the Minister of Justice I remembered that only the other day I read his famous speech made in June 1917, when he defended some of his fellow citizens, spoke about their rights and liberties, and the manner in which those rights and liberties should be protected. He quoted this famous passage from Burke:

> Let the Commons in parliament assembled be one and the same thing with the commons at large. The distinctions that are made to separate us are unnatural and wicked contrivances. Let us identify, let us incorporate ourselves with the people.

It seems to me he is taking an attitude to-day far removed from the position he so eloquently and passionately defended in 1917.

From information reaching me over the wires it would seem that the citizens of Vancouver are most profoundly disturbed at the outcome of the unfortunate episode of yesterday. The tragedy lies not only in the fact that there was some disorder in the city, and that some thirty-six persons are in the hospital, numerous other individuals under medical treatment, and some twenty-two men in gaol, but in the fact that the policy of terrorism employed by the government was so unnecessary. For a whole month this problem has been before parliament and the government, as for a whole month these men have been in the Vancouver post office. During that month, not once but on six or seven different occasions members on the opposition benches have brought the situation clearly before the government, and of all the suggestions made and alternatives proposed the government selected the most terrible, the most brutal, the most costly—the direct use of police force with tear gas and police clubs. There had been no revolt against constituted authority. There had been no serious disorder until the police moved into the post office; and may I point out that it was the Royal Canadian Mounted Police who went into the post office. Yet the law moved with all its might and force as if these unemployed men were brigands and rebels and not just men without work and in hopeless circumstances.

The tragedy lies in the fact that this police action might have been averted by definite planning, and that as a result of the action taken by the police, not only have bitterness and discontent been accentuated to an extreme and alarming degree, but faith has been destroyed in constituted authority.

What do you think is the opinion of the three or four thousand young people interested in the situation—because, after all, there are more than the seven hundred odd men in the post office and the two hundred and fifty in the art gallery who are concerned over these consequences. There are many young people who are directly interested in this problem, and who have now less confidence in our democratic institutions because of what has taken place in Vancouver. I tell the Minister of Justice that you cannot possibly make good citizens by the use of the police baton, and whatever guilt there may be over this situation rests, in my opinion, upon hon. gentlemen who sit on the treasury benches. After a month of inaction during which no attempt was made to settle the difficulties of these unemployed, they move to club them down as criminals, men whose only crime was that they were hungry and that they had in a very inconvenient way dared to organize and publicly make known their plight. I tell the minister that nothing more provocative of disorder and resistance to constituted authority than the policy pursued by hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches, who to-day so vigorously condemn the action of men who were trapped by economic conditions.

Understanding the situation as I do, and because of remarks I have heard in the corridors of this building let me say that these men were not recruited from the underworld nor from the communist party of Canada. They are average young men from average Canadian homes, and it is the understanding of that aspect of the situation that resulted in the remarkable display of sympathy and support for them on the part of the people of Vancouver. For what reason did the women of Vancouver organize and raise in excess of $6,000 during the last month in order to feed these men while they were in occupation of the post office? Because the average mother said: "But for the grace of God there goes my boy." Because there are many anxious parents whose boys under present economic conditions have severed home ties and are roaming the country in a hopeless nomadic existence.

The newspaper to-day carries many interesting items, and I was impressed by the reports appearing on the first and second pages of to-day's paper, as was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. We have two columns describing the situation at Vancouver, and another column describing how Earl Baldwin appealed to the youth of the empire to be true to democracy. On the next page we have the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) absent over the week-end while he paid homage to his illustrious grandfather. How can the Prime Minister expect the youth of to-day to place faith in democracy and in the policies enunciated by him when he discloses such glaring inconsistency by paying homage to those who fought the battles of the oppressed in days gone by, while at the very moment he was speaking he was aware that the order had gone forth that the oppressed of to-day should be clubbed down in the city of Vancouver?

These events, Mr. Speaker, have occurred in Vancouver Centre, represented in this house by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). Many of us remember vividly when the minister was frantically and desperately struggling to get the last two hundred votes he required to win a seat in this house and a place in the government. We remember the lavish promises he made to the unemployed, to the ex-service men and those in economic distress. I was struck by his remark the other night when in eloquent language he spoke of the achievements of the Liberal government in regard to solving unemployment problems; and he thundered a pledge across the floor of this house that he and the members of the government would continue to fight the battles of the people—yes, fight their battles. The minister has aeroplanes at his command. For a month he has been aware of this serious situation, so disturbing to the minds of the citizens in his own constituency. He could easily have been excused from his parliamentary duties and have flown to Vancouver to deal with a situation so serious. But what attempt has he made to deal with this distressing situation? Let him answer. What answer will he give to his constituents when this matter will be discussed in the future? Why did he not take some action or give some evidence of action being taken to spare his constituents in Vancouver Centre this most unsettling disturbance?

But of all considerations in this situation I think the one that has caused most disappointment has been the attitude of the hon. Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers). I feel —and I have a high regard for him personally—that in this matter he has led us down a garden path. We have brought the situation to his attention on numerous occasions in this house with all the vigour at our command. He has assured us that the situation was well in hand. He has assured us that these men would be offered employment on the same basis as it was offered to all other people in Canada, that there would be no discrimination against them. He knew very well that these men were denied relief anywhere, either in British Columbia or any other province, that the edict had gone forth—no more relief for single unemployed fit men. He knew, or he could have easily determined, whether work was available or not available; for he commands the facilities of the Employment Service of Canada and has accurate information of employment opportunities not only in British Columbia but at all points in Canada. He has given this house no indication as to whether work was available. Knowing that these men had been cut off relief he simply said to them: You must disperse; you must trust to luck in securing casual employment.

But during this past month employment opportunities have been decreasing. The huge pulp and paper plants at Port Alice and Port Mellon had closed down. The Powell River and Ocean Falls pulp and paper plants were working only half time, and subsidiary operations were gradually slackening. He knew that several thousand loggers were being released from the logging camps and were walking the streets of Vancouver. Even with all the facilities at his command he was unable to answer where work was available for these men. How much greater the difficulty of the individual single unemployed man, making an effort to secure employment. Time after time, with monotonous repetition, and almost by rote the Minister of Labour would make the statements he advanced with regard to the situation: They will get the same chance as other men will get. His attitude may be summed up in the old saying—"Root hog or die." That in effect was his answer to these men. He was in effect saying to them: Starve or accept semi-starvation in a nomadic existence. For the only avenues leading to employment open to these men is to ride the rods or hitch-hike their way back and forth across the country seeking some form of transient, and very unsatisfactory employment.

I would ask the Minister of Labour to-day what action was taken by the high-priced representative that the last month he has had in Vancouver, Mr. Humphrey Mitchell. He receives a salary of $500 a month, and is given the impressive title of officer in charge of labour transference. In my opinion, if anyone is to be judged a criminal in this situation, it is that gentleman for his incompetence in face of the situation. He has done nothing in the matter except send in expense accounts from the leading hotel in Vancouver. His attitude, and this goes back to the days of the Dundurn camp, has been to regard the unemployed as so many cattle. I think the attention of the house should be directed to the incompetence of this particular individual, and the minister held responsible for his inaction, for his attitude, which has led to the impression in Vancouver that these men are blacklisted and outlawed, and that, even if they had dispersed a week ago, by general agreement between the federal and provincial authorities they would be denied access to any work which may offer under the projects that are now being promoted.

Mr. ROGERS: If my hon. friend will permit me: has he anything to substantiate that statement?

Mr. MacNEIL: No direct evidence in substantiation of it, except my knowledge of this gentleman's temperament and general attitude towards this problem.

Mr. ROGERS: Has my hon. friend any quotation attributed to him?

Mr. MacNEIL: That has been the tenor of personal communications directed to me by gentlemen interested in the situation and who are extremely dissatisfied with the attitude taken by this gentleman and by his incompetence in face of the situation. As I said before, with one competent man in charge and able to direct a policy of conciliation, having a little understanding of the human elements involved, this problem could have been dissipated overnight. I would say that this man is more of a criminal than any of the men who are now incarcerated in the Vancouver police station. When I think of the situation of these men, now blacklisted and branded as criminals, it seems ironic that at this session we should be considering the reform of our penal institutions as a result of the recommendations of a royal commission. Here is a situation, largely created by the policies of the government, which can only result and will inevitably result in filling our penal institutions with men who, if directed along other paths, would prove worthy citizens of this country. The tragedy of the whole situation is that maybe within a few short months we shall call on these very young men to risk their lives and limbs for the defence of a country which denies them any place except in gaol.

Hon. H. H. STEVENS (Kootenay East): The occasion of this discussion is a motion to adjourn the house to discuss a matter of grave national and public importance. The issue will not be determined to-day unless we hear from the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) some definite policy to take care of the situation, not only in the city of Vancouver, critical as it is for the moment, but as it obtains in other places under similar circumstances so far as the men are concerned, although with less acuteness than in Vancouver.

On May 23, exactly four weeks ago to-day, when discussing this very matter, I said to the minister that as a matter of fact we are training these men to demonstrate. Enlarging upon that I pointed out that in delaying, in not facing the issue, in failing even to appear to be getting at the roots of the problem, we were inviting demonstration. I then went on to indicate that on several previous occasions, following a demonstration, action had been taken, and what I urged then was that we should at that stage—and the men had then been in the post office for some time—face the issue and at least minimize the tendency to establish the force and value of demonstration in matters of this kind. Four weeks have passed. Nothing was done until yesterday, when the men were forcibly ejected from the post office. The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), in his explanation of the government's position, said that the government had been extremely patient, that their course had been marked with forbearance, and he said also, "but the majesty of the law must be upheld." The law was the same four and five weeks ago as it is to-day. It was the same law and the same violation. If there was a violation of the law yesterday which called for federal action to uphold "the majesty of the law," the same demand was present five weeks ago. The majesty of the law is upheld when, a breach of the law having occurred, the peace officers of the country swiftly deal with the situation. That is the way to uphold the majesty of the law. Had action been taken then, it might have been taken on the ground that the men were committing a violation of the law. But things were allowed to drift. One week, two weeks; three. four, five weeks passed. The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) and other hon. members, not weekly but two or three times a week, brought the matter to the attention of the government. Nothing was done. When it came to the ejection of these men yesterday, of course force had to be used. Of course the police will be blamed. But the police are not to blame. They did their duty, and I imagine it was a duty distasteful to them. Those who are to blame are the hon. gentlemen sitting on the treasury benches, and no one else. The unfortunate situation to-day in this house is that in discussing this matter we can only reproach the government for inaction and ineptitude; that, of course, enlists their followers in their defence, and the result in all probability will be a very empty discussion. That is, as I say, unfortunate, but there is a duty resting on members of this house; I believe it rests upon all hon. members on all sides. An incident such as this makes it imperative that we face the facts definitely and plainly.

I should like to remind the house of the genesis of this thing. It did not begin four or five weeks ago. As I pointed out on May 23, it started last July. These men almost rioted then. I saw them outside my office window, standing in the pouring rain in the autumn days, standing there from early morning until late at night.

Mr. ROGERS: Two years ago?

Mr. STEVENS: No, last year. I talked to dozens of them. These young fellows went out on the streets with their little tin cans, and people going by would put in ten cents or a quarter. In that way they got sufficient to buy food. But that was disallowed, and some three hundred of them —my hon. friend from Vancouver North will correct me if I overstate the number— were arrested and sent to prison for various terms. It was not until the matter became acute, because of that, that the camps were opened up. The minister arranged for these men to go into the camps. They were there all winter. The government had the opportunity to know all about them—their history, their names, their places of origin, and so forth. If it was intended when spring came to tell these men that they must go back to their places of origin, ordinary common sense dictated that the proper officials should have taken a few of these men at a time, talked to them personally, offered to pay their way back, and sent them off in an orderly manner. But that was not done. The camps were closed and the men were turned loose, not all in one day, but over a very short period of time. Then, when they were turned out of the camps, when they were wandering about with nothing to do and nowhere to go, they were told, forsooth, that those who had no bona fide residence in British Columbia would have their passages paid back to their places of origin. They know, I know, anybody who has given any thought to the subject knows, that very few of these men dare to go back to their places of origin in the expectation of getting assistance, for the simple reason that having been away they have lost their domicile. Some of them have been away for three or four years, and many of them are and have been transients for years. Here, for instance, is a man who was born, let us say, in Oshawa. He goes to northern Ontario and works in the mines, or the woods, or some other place, and he loses his job. He drifts to the prairies and gets work for a few months and loses that job through shutting down and the vagaries of employment in those days. Finally he winds up in British Columbia. Well, where is his domicile? Is Oshawa going to take the responsibility for him? Certainly not; and the minister knows it very well. If these men had been moved back in large numbers to their so-called places of origin they would have been met with the same stony stare they received elsewhere, and so they were turned loose in Vancouver.

We are not dealing with pieces of machinery or something of that kind; we are dealing with human lives, with men, most of whom have some element of self-respect —at least they had; some of them have not much now, I am afraid. But they did have self-respect, and I know from personal conversation with these men that the vast majority of them merely ask for an opportunity to work. I will grant you that there are always to be found in bodies of men some who are unworthy of very much attention. What the percentage is, one cannot say exactly, but I venture to say that the vast majority of these men, eighty or ninety per cent of them, merely ask for an opportunity to work. That is all they ask. But now they are turned loose in Vancouver and nothing is done. The provincial government says it is not responsible; the dominion government says it is not responsible. But what are the men to do in the meantime? They walked into the post office and another building and took possession. I confess that at the time I thought this was an extraordinary action and I was shocked. The Minister of Justice says that no one had any alternative to offer. I will tell him what I thought should have been done at once—and by the way for a period of forty-eight hours some five hundred of them occupied a hotel as well. I suggest that the moment that crisis arose there should have been no quibbling about jurisdiction but they should have been taken either to the old horse show building, or to some vacant buildings in the exhibition ground, which could easily have been obtained, or to the drill hall—there is one close to the post office, a few blocks away—or to some other public building and given shelter and food for the time being while the two governments wrestled with the question of responsibility. That is what should have been done, and if it had been done there would have been no trouble.

But the minister adopted a policy which he thought was indicative of the strong man. He was going to close the camps on the first of May; he made it known definitely and he said, "This will solve the problem. These men must get out now and get busy for themselves." Well, time was, prior to the great depression, or rather I should say prior to the change in industrial methods in the last fifteen or twenty years, when these men could have found work here and there throughout the country. I went through a period of hard times in British Columbia forty-five years ago when I first went there, and I know that there was a period in the nineties when the real ultimate poverty of the whole country was worse than it is to-day. But there was never a time when men could not get something to do; they might only get their board for it, but they got something. There was seldom any necessity for a man to be destitute, and those that were destitute could be, and were, taken care of by the community. But what has happened in the last ten, fifteen or twenty years? No one knows better than the minister, because it is a part of the new economics of the time. By the introduction of new machinery whole industries have been upset and in some instances tens of thousands of men have been thrown out of work in one industry. Great bodies of men have been turned loose in the country, not only in Canada but in the United States and other parts of the world as well. In other words there is a new economic condition to which we have not yet adjusted ourselves. We are only in the process of readjustment. Now, if we recognize that, then it follows as night follows day that during that process of readjustment the government of the country must take a certain responsibility which would not be necessary under the old regime; and I hope that with the adjustments that some of us believe can be made, as the years go by, these temporary responsibilities will disappear. But they are here, and they were certainly very much present when these men were turned out of the camps on the first of May or thereabouts.

The issue is not going to be determined simply by the government listening to this debate and the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Labour saying their little say and thinking that that ends it. That does not end it. When these men were rejected from the post office yesterday, eight thousand people gathered in the Powell street grounds, and of that gathering a large number, estimated at eight hundred, marched to the police station, inflamed by a sense of hopelessness, a sense of injustice, a sense of the incompetence of leadership in governments in the country. I say that with that sense of hopelessness in their hearts they marched to the police station, and it was only by the advice of some in whom they trusted that they did not indulge in another riot there.

I am the last member of this house to condone rioting for one moment, but I know human nature and I know something about men in mobs. I know that you cannot expect to find a large number of men gathered together, suffering from a sense of injustice and the knowledge of grievances, without there being danger of violence. It is just as natural as anything else to the human race. It is one of the unpleasant facts of life, and the duty of responsible government is to foresee these things, to anticipate and avoid them, to see that they do not happen, instead of waiting until they do happen or having to exercise force as was done yesterday. I can see that the police were compelled to carry out their instructions, but as I said a moment ago if the law was violated yesterday it was violated five weeks ago, and that is where the government deserves censure for its delay in taking action in the matter.

The Minister of Justice says the government have been upbraided because they have been so lenient. I suggest that if those who addressed the government in this gentle chiding manner had spoken their minds they would have said that their criticism was because of the government's ineptitude and not because of its leniency. There is no element of leniency or of kindness in allowing men to remain in these buildings for five weeks and at the end ejecting them by force. The problem should have been faced at the first. Leniency then becomes finally an offence on the part of the government rather than something to be complimented upon. The government is not to be commended because of its patience and forbearance; rather at this time the government should be, if not inspired at least forced into some action by members on all sides of the house—some action that will grapple with the problem in a real way. I simply say this to the government: The issue is not settled with the close of this debate. These men are there, and as the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) said a moment ago—he and I and others are so advised—over one thousand loggers have been thrown out of work on the Pacific coast during the past few weeks. I do not know whether the minister knows just the type of men that these loggers are. Let me say to him that they are the most daring and the finest men in the world. They are a magnificent type of worker. Knowing human nature as I do, I look with some apprehension upon the possible effect on these men of the disturbances that have occurred and which we have been discussing. The time has long passed when action should be taken, and I say to the government that the responsibility for the trouble that may occur and for what has taken place lies clearly at their door.

Mr. J. C. LANDERYOU (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, gas bombs, beatings, the forbearance of the exercise of force by the government or the sympathies of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) will not solve the unemployment problem. It is unfortunate that we cannot solve this problem by exercising the power of disallowance. An hon. member suggests to me that we should disallow the unemployed. I agree with what was said by Mr. Campbell, the Minister of Public Works in the government of Ontario. He said:

> People by hundreds of thousands are out of work. The truth is that restriction of currency and credit is throttling business. Can you find me an economist from Halifax to Vancouver who will say that things are right with us? Yet when anyone speaks out and says that something should be done about it, about the best these critics can do is to descend to personalities and chorus "crackpot" at him.

It would appear that the government are attempting to hide behind the constitution. They claim that the provincial government and the municipality must accept responsibility in this matter. The closest cooperation existed among the provincial police, the civic police and the federal police in evicting these men from the public buildings they occupied. If we could obtain the same sort of cooperation among this government, the municipality and the provincial government to provide these men with work, to arrive at some solution of the problem of the lack of purchasing power, then we would have no more difficulties like this. We know that the city of Vancouver is not financially able to offer a solution to this unemployment situation. We know that the provinces are not financially able to carry out their constitutional responsibilities in this regard. The government headed by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) recognized in 1930 that unemployment was a national problem, and a special session was called to deal with the matter. It is true the right hon. gentleman was unable to solve the problem, and he perished in the attempt. In 1935 the leader of the present Liberal government promised a number of things. In answer to a remark made by the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Miss Macphail) the right hon. gentleman stated that generally conditions had improved in Canada. I should like to say to the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that the conditions with relation to the unemployed have not generally improved.

An hon. MEMBER: Certainly they have.

Mr. LANDERYOU: A Liberal member says, "Certainly they have." If you consider the cutting of relief grants by the federal government an improvement, if you call the cutting of relief scales when the cost of living is going up an improvement, then I agree with the hon. member. I am told that unemployment has increased every month of this year. The fact of the matter is that this government has not solved the problem. There has been a general increase in export trade since the period 1930 to 1935, when the members of the Conservative party occupied the treasury benches. There is no question that there has been a general improvement in external trade, but that has not been due to any policy pursued by the Liberal government. That improvement was in line with the general improvement in world conditions and prices. At the same time there has been a tremendous increase in the amount of taxes taken out of the pockets of the citizens of Canada—from $326,000,000 in 1933 to $500,000,000 odd in 1937. Whatever prosperity may have been created is being taken away from the people in the form of increased taxes.

Mr. WOOD: But they have the money with which to pay their taxes.

Mr. LANDERYOU: That does not help them very much. The situation in Vancouver was created by a number of men who were unable to find work and who were forced to take definite action to draw the attention of the government and the people of Canada to their plight. They are willing and anxious to work, and yet the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) has not offered them work in any shape or form. Why is it that 11,000,000 people cannot adequately provide themselves with sufficient food, clothing and shelter when they occupy a country capable of providing for the needs of 100,000,000 or 150,000,000 people? Surely there is something that this government can do. They were going to take over the issue of money and credit in terms of public need. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) says that we have complete control over the monetary policy of this country. Why should we not exercise that control? Why should we not issue the money and credit to meet the needs, not only of the hundreds of men in Vancouver but the hundreds of thousands of unemployed throughout Canada?

It may be out of order to discuss matters of money at this time, but I should like to point out that these men are suffering from one thing only, the lack of purchasing power. I ask the government to fulfil their promises made to the people of Canada in 1935, namely, that they would abolish poverty in the midst of plenty by properly controlling the issue of money and credit. Now that these men have been evicted from public buildings their condition is possibly worse than it was before. I do hope the Minister of Labour can do something constructive for them. Give them work. If you cannot give them work, take care of their needs as far as food, clothing and shelter are concerned until you can provide work for them.

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, this is an occasion on which we might derive satisfaction from saying to the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) and the government, "We told you so." However, there would be no satisfaction in making that statement, even though what we told the Minister of Labour has come to pass. Only a man who was totally oblivious to what has occurred under similar circumstances in the past five years could have assumed that the situation in Vancouver would be settled without trouble of the kind that occurred yesterday. From this corner we have continued to press the Minister of Labour to act. We have taken the position that a conciliatory attitude by the government would easily overcome the existing difficulties: It was not a question of whether the action taken by the men was right or wrong. Similar action under one set of circumstances may be right, and under another, may be wrong. The point is that these men were justified in taking almost any action whatsoever because of the condition in which they found themselves.

Almost exactly three years ago we were faced with this same problem. Men left the city of Vancouver by boarding freight trains with the intention of coming to Ottawa to lay their grievances before the government. On various occasions at that time we tried to bring the matter to the attention of the government by a motion similar to the one moved to-day. We were unsuccessful, the government taking the position that it was not a matter of urgent public importance. However, on July 1, 1935, a riot took place in the city of Regina. The following day we moved a motion similar to the one under consideration to-day and obtained an opportunity to state our case. I have before me Hansard for that date, from which I should like to quote very briefly. At page 4130 of Hansard for 1935 the following statement was made by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) who was then leader of the opposition:

> It was easy for the Prime Minister to arrange for the house to be moved into supply to-day, and it would have been equally easy to have adopted the same course on the other occasions. I believe the Speaker was reflecting the attitude of mind of my right hon. friend at the time when he gave his decision that the matter was not of urgent public importance. Certainly those of us who supported the motion believed it was a matter of urgent public importance, and that unless some action were taken by the government of a conciliatory character it was almost inevitable that sooner or later something in the nature of a tragedy would be the outcome of the situation of these men moving in large numbers east, regardless of what their particular views on social questions may be.

I only wish that political parties could be as wise when they are governments as when they are in opposition. Here the Prime Minister was advocating the same course that this group and other members from British Columbia have been trying to impress upon the Minister of Labour and the government, that this was a situation that could be met by a conciliatory attitude on the part of the government, if only they would realize that the men had a just grievance. To-day, when I knew this matter was coming up, I looked up the debates of 1935. I find a wire that was sent to the present leader of the opposition,—prime minister of that day, signed by James G. Gardiner, who at that time I believe was premier of the province of Saskatchewan:

> I have to-day wired Premier Bennett as follows: "Yesterday morning men indicated to your representative Mr. Burgess their willingness to disband the march and return to the points from which they came. They repeated this to Mr. Burgess and representatives of the police at 2.30. Your representatives refused to have provincial representation at that meeting. The men met us at five o'clock stating that since your representatives had refused to consider this the provincial government take responsibility for disbanding men to their original camps or homes and supply them with food in the interval. While we were considering this matter police raided public meeting to arrest leaders, precipitating a riot. Men at present in buildings at fair grounds completely surrounded by police who permit no one to enter and men to leave only in twos. Police intention to force these men to Lumsden camp or starving them into submission.

That is the very action this government is taking. The men went into the post office and the government were going to starve them into submission; but unfortunately for the government the people of Vancouver would not allow these men to starve. Then Mr. Gardiner went on:

This will end in a worse riot than last night. These men should be fed where they are and immediately disbanded and sent back to camps and homes as they request without any attempt to force them into Lumsden and this should be done within next two hours. This government has a responsibility toward its citizens to provide them with ordinary protection against this imported trouble. We would ask you to immediately withdraw orders issued affecting the liberty of individuals within this province and affecting the law and order of this province. You might assume that we are as much concerned about law and order in this country as you can be and deal with the elected representatives of this province regarding matters concerning our people instead of through an appointed political representative.

And this government is dealing through another political representative in the city of Vancouver.

We are asking you if you are going to feed these men within the next two hours and are asking you to instruct us within two hours what plans are to be made for their disbandment.

Now, these men having been driven out of the art gallery and post office, I am asking the government what provision is being made to feed them. Will the Minister of Labour tell this house if the government have a policy or a program to take care of these men in the meantime? It must be remembered that they do not cease to be a menace to the city of Vancouver once they are removed from the post office. They are at large in the city; they are without means to support themselves. Consequently as human beings they have to find food and shelter wherever it can be found. I repeat that before this debate closes the Minister of Labour should give the house an undertaking that these men will be fed until some attempt has been made to provide them with work.

In an interview given the press this morning the Prime Minister said the governments—meaning the provincial government, the federal government and the civic government—had been very patient; but as I see it I do not think there is any great credit due them for patience in this instance. There is no credit due the members of these governments because they are not at all in uncomfortable circumstances. They are well fed, possibly too well fed. They are well clothed. They have nice homes to go to. They have a certain amount of security, at least until the next election, so I do not see that they have been put to any very great discomfort. But here were men who for years have been deprived of all hope, of all opportunity to live as normal men should live.

The Minister of Justice regretted that there was any injury to the men in removing them from the post office. Let me say here that the physical injury to these men does not amount to anything. Physical injuries can be healed; nature will repair the hurt. The injury that has been done these men is cumulative, an injury to their mental and psychological make-up. It is an injury to the spirit, which will leave its scar on these men as long as they live. The longer we keep them in the position they are in to-day, the greater the injury to them and the greater our difficulties are going to be.

Again, the men in the art gallery offered to submit to peaceful arrest. According to the press when the men were informed by Chief Foster of the city of Vancouver, who I am told, and as stated by the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), has acted with every consideration during the troublesome period, that the police were going to use tear gas to drive them out, they offered to submit to peaceful arrest so that they might be taken to the police station. But to do that the government would have had to feed them, and as the crime was not serious enough they would not do that.

What solution has the Minister of Labour for the difficulty confronting not only these men but the people of the city of Vancouver? Where do we go from here? Where are those men going to eat to-morrow? Where are they going to find shelter? Where are they going to find the things which are necessary to enable them to become ordinary, normal citizens of Vancouver and of this dominion? Unless the Minister of Labour has some answer to those questions, let me tell him and the house that we have not heard the last of the trouble which took place in Vancouver in the early hours of Sunday morning.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I should like to add my word of protest to those which have already been spoken against the action taken by the government. I think the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) made an admirable defence, and particularly when he really had a defenceless case.

He told us of the kindness of our police force. He told us what a great body of men they were, and said that the police asked the men to move. But he did not say that the police had bombs in their possession when they went to make the request. They took with them weapons of persuasion—and I am not referring to the tongue. They took clubs and bombs. A few days ago hon. members on this side of the house warned the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) as to what would happen. We said this would be a second Regina.

And so we find force politics in Canada. We have no right to criticize the Hitlers and Mussolinis while we masquerade under the name of democracy, because we are not as honest. That is why. I suppose just before the next election these men will be employed, because then they would be of use to some political party in casting their ballots. Politics has become a game of strategy, a shuffle for political advantage, a philosophy of opportunism, and a scramble to protect vested interests. The sooner we get down to those fundamental truths, and the sooner we understand what is happening in this country, the sooner people will remove obstacles in the way of security.

What do these men want? What crimes have they committed? They are the casualties resulting from the failure of this and previous governments to deal with facts. Industry has abdicated, and now takes no responsibility for employees or unemployed. And every year as the industrial machine speeds up and export markets contract more men will seek the protection of governments that they may live. When the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) said there were two laws in this country, he was not stating an untruth. That has been proved on innumerable occasions. First, let us compare the treatment of the Home Owners Security Act passed in Alberta with that accorded the padlock law of Quebec, and we find another failure of the government, so far as democracy is concerned.

We speak of democracy, that ideal which we never attained. The seed of dissension is sown in the country through governments refusing to accept responsibility. The men are turned out of industry, because industry does not want them. Those men are thrown on the market and some must go begging. Then one hon. member on the government side asks: What constructive suggestion do you make? They look towards us. Let them ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) who said, "When we are elected we will manufacture $500,000,000 of new money." That is the gentleman who now sits on the ministerial benches. Then, the Prime Minister, speaking in 1935, said, "We will issue credit in terms of public need."

Will hon. members of the house ever know the purpose of an economic system? Will they ever learn that we produce goods so that people may use them, and so that we may bring security to the human family? Do we realize that the greatest asset of a nation is the youth of that nation?

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I think I must call the hon. member's attention to the fact that the motion before the house has to do with the situation in Vancouver.

Mr. POOLE: And I am dealing with it. This is quite relevant, I assure you, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. member is getting away from the subject.

Mr. POOLE: I am dealing with the Vancouver situation, and the position in which the men out there are placed, through the attitude taken by this government, and through the change in industrial relations.

In Canada there has developed a growing despair in the hearts of unemployed men. If the depression was two years old one might understand it, but the fact is it is a condition which has continued over eight long years. Still nothing is done. The question which occurred to me to-day was this: Why were not the men ejected from the public building in Vancouver prior to the Saskatchewan elections? Why wait until eleven days after the elections?

An hon. MEMBER: That does not hurt.

Mr. POOLE: It should hurt, if it does not. In answer to my colleague an hon. member stated a moment ago that the people have more money to-day and that there is greater prosperity. That is not so. The fact is that the standard of living in Canada has been reduced. The increase in taxation has resulted in a reduced standard of living especially among unemployed married people.

This struggle is not new; it is the age-long struggle of the masses for security. Years ago the argument was used that the population was too great for the amount of goods they could produce. The excuse in this enlightened day, in the year 1938, is that the country now has so much wealth but the unemployed cannot have any part of it because they have no money. The only terms upon which they can exist is to have written across their shoulders with shame the fact that they are public charges. Right across this land in the last two years there have been attacks in the press, on many occasions, to discredit those men who, after all, are only the forerunners of thousands more who must follow. These men were seeking work. This government has the power to provide it. These men represent wealth; they have the ability to produce. But what do we find? The iron heel of a distorted democracy is the answer to their pleas. You tell me conditions have changed for the better in this country? I say, yes they have, as shown by a rise of 17 per cent in profits for industry, but they have not changed for the better for the masses of our people who are disinherited. The time has come in this country when every section of the house should forget politics and deal with this all important national problem of getting our youth back to work. The youth of the nation is the greatest asset we have. But I suppose if we mention that, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) will tell us: We have no money. Mr. Speaker, we do not need to borrow it. Money is not the all important thing. It can be manufactured. These men who were in the post office and are in gaol to-day could be released and put to work at good wages within twenty-four hours, and they would be helping to build up this country and once again take their part in society as Canadians.

I was struck by the statement of the Minister of Justice when he spoke of patience and forbearance, and I added in my notes—patience, forbearance, with a club. I often wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether these riots that occur from time to time in this country are not the signposts to that greater evil, civil war, because conditions, bad as they are, are getting increasingly worse as time goes on. The same protest against poverty has already driven the nations of Europe into civil war, and we are sowing the seeds of a civil war in Canada for to-morrow.

As I listened to the prayers that were read from the Speaker's chair to-day in both English and French, and in particular that sentence: "Thy will be done in earth, as it is in heaven," I wondered if our legislative activities here could ever be said to reflect what goes on in heaven. If the Lord were Prime Minister here, I am quite sure that he would not have ordered those men to be ejected, gassed and clubbed. I think the first thing he would do would be to see that they received of the abundance which he has provided for the human family. That, Mr. Speaker, is the job of this government.

There always seems to be a disposition to bury this problem, to put these unemployed masses into some remote spot, so that there will be no more mental anguish for the government. The greater the numbers of the unemployed grow, the greater the governmental impotence to deal with this national question. We talk all around the problem, but we will not deal with the kernel of the problem.

When some people speak of the unemployed, they speak as though apologies should be made for them, as if they were less respectable because they are unemployed. But the men who were evicted from those government premises in Vancouver are just as respectable as any man in this house. They have just as much right to live, and just as much right to opportunity as any man in this house. They have just as much right to occupy that public building as anyone here, because it is public property, and I do not know of a better place they could go when they had no place to sleep. I am reminded once again of the saying of the Man of Galilee: "The foxes have holes, and birds of the air have nests; but the Son of Man hath not where to lay His head." That has been the story of the human family, and possibly there was some justification in the days of scarcity.

I have asked these questions of the government on innumerable occasions: Are we short of anything in this country? Have we the natural resources? Have we the ability to produce more? If we have not enough, then the first thing to do is to place these men at work, and your poverty and riots are all over. But if we have enough, there is no logical reason why they cannot have sufficient for their needs. But unfortunately we are still genuflecting before the god of gold, placed high on a pedestal. Here you have the government of Canada, with a solution in their hands and the power to solve this problem. They masquerade as wise and just men, and at the same time abandon the unemployed to their fate. When the unemployed ask for bread, we turn out a squad of policemen with riot guns, bombs and so forth. As the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) said a few moments ago, in a few months' time we shall perhaps be giving these men a new suit of clothes, the first they have had in eight years, a khaki suit perhaps, and saying to them: Go and fight for Canada. It reminds me of an unemployed man with a blanket on his back, who asked me if I had the price of a meal. I took him to supper with me and tried to find out his philosophy and his ideas. I discussed with him the defence estimates, which were then before the house, and he asked me if I thought there was going to be a war. I said, "Things look pretty bad, but I do not know." He said, "I do not know what I would fight for. All I have is a blanket, and if anyone wants that more than I do, he can have it." That was all of Canada that he had.

We can discuss unemployment for hours, but I do not think much good comes from any discussion from this side of the house. Governments seem to be set in their ways and to take the attitude: No matter what should come from the other side of the house, it is not going to be accepted; nobody is going to tell us what to do. If there is ever written down in the pages of our future history a story of riots and civil war, and widespread poverty, let us keep in mind one thing, that it was the fault of mortal man. The immortal Man has provided everything, but man did not have the intestinal fortitude or the courage to use those things which God provided in such abundance. I have often thought it might be a good thing if we could organize the churches throughout this country to bring pressure to bear on this government or any government that fails to deal with this problem. Police action such as we have heard of in Vancouver, and the police action which took place at Regina, are stimulants to chaos. They stimulate the hatreds of the disinherited members of society, which will eventually lead to bloody conflict between the haves and the have-nots.

You gentlemen on the government benches have it in your power to make this country the best in the world. You have it in your power to bring about a security never before known. You have in your hands the destiny of what might well be the most glorious nation this world has ever known. You have it in your hands to give a lead to a confused world, and members on this side of the house, irrespective of their politics, are prepared to jump in any time and do all they can to help you solve this problem. But we shall not do it until such time as we break down the barricades which exist in politics, until we realize that if a man has a suggestion which is worth anything it should be accepted irrespective of the part of the house in which he may sit. In a national crisis of this kind, with thousands of our citizens facing poverty and insecurity, with thousands of children being born, almost as it were, on the bread line; with the hopes of thousands of our citizens blasted, with life just a disillusion, surely this is the time when all hon. members should get together, discuss this problem, find a solution and apply it.

Mrs. MARTHA LOUISE BLACK (Yukon): Like the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), I never see a young man walking the streets, begging, but I say, "There, but for the grace of God, goes my boy." I have felt keenly this sit-down strike in Vancouver; I have kept thoroughly posted regarding it from members of the government and from friends in Vancouver, and I have wondered just what would be the outcome. It is a matter of absolute indifference to me what promises the politicians made in 1930. It is a matter of absolute indifference to me what promises the politicians made in 1935. But it is not a matter of indifference to me what we in this house are going to do to-day for the good of our country. Law and order must prevail. There is no doubt at all about that. But we have been taught that we can temper justice with mercy. No matter what efforts or what suggestions the government put forth to help these unemployed, notwithstanding the crime that they have committed —for they did commit a crime when they occupied federal buildings—no matter what the government will propose in order to help them, I would certainly support that government to the best of my ability, in the house and out of it.

This is a time for us to consider not so much party as men. We have a very difficult, a very peculiar situation confronting us. Thousands are out of employment. It is not a question of whether they are taking part in a sit-down strike, or whether they belong to this party or that; the question is, What are we going to do to help make those men worthy citizens, not of British Columbia or of Saskatchewan or Ontario, but of Canada? If the time should come when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) needs men, he will take them from all over Canada, irrespective of provinces; he is not going to ask what is their place of birth, their home or their residence. Two-thirds of these young men have no homes. They have left their families; they have drifted, as other hon. members have said, from place to place, from the coast on the east to the coast on the west. They cannot go back to the widowed mother who is trying to take care of other children; they cannot possibly go back to their homes, under other circumstances. We must do something for those men. There is no territory and no province in the matter of unemployment; it is a problem of vital interest to everyone.

I have felt the utmost pity for and sympathy with the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers).

I believe that he has honestly tried to do his best. We do not always agree. I have not felt that invariably he has done what others might well have done. However, for eight years the governments—we, you and I, men and women all over this country—have been building roads to perdition for our young people. We have been helping them on this downward path. Now, I say, it is time we built a better road. It is time we gave these men work and ceased to plead that we have not the money; for if this building, which cost many millions of dollars, were burned down to-day, there would be plenty of millions available to rebuild it. On occasions of great stress and emergency the money is always to be found.

As I said before, it is a matter of perfect indifference to me what this or some other government promised. It is a matter of indifference to me what comments are made by newspapers on the other side of the line, how bitterly they criticize our Canada. It is impossible to pick up a paper published on the other side without reading of rape, murder, arson and kidnapping; but if we, a puny ten millions, have a paltry sit-down strike, others criticize us. Let them begin at home. Let us begin at home. From the bottom of my heart I as a mother plead with the government to try to find work for the unemployed, not merely in British Columbia or somewhere in the east, but throughout Canada, in the spirit in which we speak of her when we say:

> The wholesome sea is at her gates,
> Her gates both east and west.

Let us see to it that while we enforce justice, law and order, we also enforce help for the under-dog. No one can uphold those who disobey the law; but let us from now on give those men work, so that they will have no cause to disobey the law, and will become a source of pride to us and to our country.

Mr. DAVID SPENCE (Parkdale): I regret very much to have to sit in the house and listen to so many bitter speeches and bitter attacks as have been made this afternoon. It is unfortunate that some hon. members do not refrain from making statements which may incite the people of Vancouver and cause more trouble to those who are out of employment and to those who are responsible for maintaining order and good government in that city.

This trouble did not come on hurriedly. It has been growing for some years. I am not, by a long shot, coming to the rescue of the government; nor do I exonerate my hon. friends to my left, who were probably as much to blame as anyone else for the situation two or three years ago. We then had the camps—single men unemployment camps, I think they were called—which were established by the Hon. Donald Sutherland, the then Minister of Militia. Agitators got into those camps and created a lot of trouble. Hon. members to my left no doubt incited the men in those camps and made them more dissatisfied than they would otherwise have been; then my friends of the government succumbed, because their wish-bone was where their back-bone should have been; they had not any back-bone, and in deference to the wishes of the group to my left they closed the camps, and so brought about the conditions we have to-day.

I think all hon. members must recognize that the Hon. Donald Sutherland was a man of ability in carrying on the work of his department, a man with a big heart, whose only thought was to do something in the interest of young men who were unemployed. In those camps they were well fed, well clothed, and got plenty of exercise. The trouble began through agitation in the camps. That is what has brought about this trouble to-day. If the government had not shut down those camps, they would have had a place to put these unemployed men and keep them away from difficulty and trouble. I agree with the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) that the time when they took possession of the post office and the other building was the time when they should nave been removed immediately and put in the army or some other suitable place where they could be taken care of. That is what should be done with them to-day. I do not condone the action of the men in going into the post office building because they had no right to do so, but the government showed weakness in failing to deal with the matter five weeks ago. I regret very much what happened in Vancouver yesterday. I think it was most unfortunate.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Poole) suggested a few minutes ago that action to take care of the men could be financed without money. An idea came to me while he was speaking. It seems to me that a plan to take all the inmates out of the gaols and put them to work without cost to the country would be a good thing for the Conservative party to adopt as one of the planks of its platform at the coming convention, because any government that did that would have no difficulty in being elected. If you took everybody out of gaol and put them to work in the way my hon. friend suggested, you would be sure to be elected.

I hope the government will take action with respect to this grave situation in Vancouver. I realize the government's position, and I think they realize it themselves and are sorry that they did not act long ago. They should certainly have taken definite steps to deal with the situation in the last four or five weeks. However, both governments and business men get into difficulties once in a while, and while sometimes there is bitter criticism and harsh words are spoken, there is no doubt about it that the want of good judgment is responsible for a great deal of our troubles. Governments do not see a vision of the future any more than the business world does, and that is what we lack to-day both in business and in governments. Any one should have foreseen the difficulty. Any one should have known that the moment the camps were abandoned in British Columbia trouble would develop. The camps were established for a purpose, and they served that purpose well. Everything was getting along splendidly until there began to be agitation in the camps, and I must say that some of the speeches made by my good friends in this house helped to keep the men agitated in Vancouver, so that finally, under this spineless government, the men there became victims of the policy that closed down the camps.

Hon. NORMAN McL. ROGERS (Minister of Labour): On the whole, the discussion has proceeded, as the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Spence) has remarked, without harsh or bitter words. Certainly it is better so, and in what I propose to say in regard to the situation in Vancouver I shall not depart from this even tenor of debate.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth), who moved the motion, is not in his seat, but doubtless he will be here before six o'clock. I wish he were here because in his opening remarks he made some references to the situation which I do not think are borne out by the facts. He stated the men came back from the camps, could find no work, and in desperation occupied the post office. This was described as an attempt to bring their position to the attention of the provincial and federal governments. I believe the house will remember that these men who have been in Vancouver during the last few weeks were employed through the winter months in the forestry conservation camps. As a matter of fact, many of them had as much employment in these camps as a number of other people in this country have employment in seasonal industry; that is to say, they did not go to Vancouver in a destitute condition. In the second place it should also be understood, without imputing motives at all, that there was a definitely organized movement by these men, while they were still in these forestry camps, to return to Vancouver in order that by a mass demonstration they might bring about either a reopening of the forestry camps or the adoption of some special works projects which would be made available to them. I have made that statement previously in this house and I believe it is fully borne out by the facts as we know them. I simply place these factors of the situation before hon. members in order that we may understand first that these men came from winter employment to Vancouver; that they were not destitute when they arrived in Vancouver, and that their situation was not desperate enough to induce them to occupy the post office and the art gallery in the manner in which they did.

Mr. COLDWELL: On the average, how much did they have coming to them in deferred payments?

Mr. ROGERS: As I have pointed out before, the deferred pay vouchers amounted to $4 a week, and the amount that would be coming to any individual man would depend upon the number of weeks he had been in the camps. The deferred pay vouchers expired on May 14. I believe I have given that information to the house already.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): And what was the maximum number of weeks in which they could work?

Mr. ROGERS: To my knowledge, the majority of the men worked about two months in the forestry conservation camps. They were paid thirty cents an hour, and they paid seventy-five cents a day for board while in the camps. On May 17 Mr. Pearson, minister of labour for British Columbia, made a public statement in these terms:

> During the winter season of 1937-38 the provincial government in cooperation with the dominion government, have provided relief through our forest development plan to 1,800 single homeless men who were recent arrivals from other provinces and in the province before November 1, 1937.
>
> We believe that during the summer months it is possible for these single men who are our own residents to find sufficient work to provide for themselves during the summer and in many cases also during the winter, but the added burden of the accumulation from other provinces makes it difficult for our own residents to get the work that is available.
>
> The province of British Columbia does not intend to make provincial forest development projects available to those from outside the province next winter, nor to provide any other form of assistance for them.
> We feel that it is desirable that the 1,800 men who have been supported in this province during the past winter in forest development projects should return to the province from which they came as rapidly as possible.

In order to make this possible the provincial government will assist those men to return to the province of previous residence, and it is requested that these men make application to 581 Homer street, Vancouver, for such assistance.

Mr. BENNETT: They were not supported solely by the province.

Mr. ROGERS: The camps? No; the dominion contributed.

Mr. BENNETT: As a matter of fact we made a contribution. I am referring to what the minister read just now.

Mr. ROGERS: We did contribute fifty per cent of the cost of these forestry conservation camps, and we did so to meet a peculiar situation, namely, a flow of transients from the prairies to British Columbia during the winter months. Hon. members who are familiar with the climate of British Columbia can readily understand why the movement should be in that direction in the winter months. The farm employment plan which dealt with single, homeless men in the prairie provinces was not applicable in British Columbia, and, therefore, that province asked us as a dominion government to cooperate with them in providing these special forestry conservation projects for single, homeless men in the winter months. It was not an innovation to close these camps at the end of the winter season. That course had been followed in the previous year without any untoward incident. Actually the farm employment plan in the prairie provinces was terminated at the same time, and advance notice was given of the intention of the governments concerned to bring this plan to an end at the end of April of this year.

The statement has been made that the majority of the men concerned in the Vancouver incident were non-residents. The report of Mr. Pearson of May 17 states that there were 1,800 non-resident transients in the forestry conservation camps during the winter months. The actual number at the closing of the camps is known. As I remember, it was close to 1,500, and we know that over 800 of the deferred pay vouchers were cashed outside British Columbia. That would leave a total of somewhere in the neighbourhood of 700 non-residents who were in Vancouver at the time the post office was occupied originally.

Just a few days ago the youth council of the city of Vancouver made a survey of the men who were actually in occupation of the art gallery and the post office in order to determine how many were non-residents and how many were single, unemployed men properly resident in British Columbia. Following that survey, which was made public, Mr. Pearson made the following statement:

Statement of youth council confirmed views of government in regard to its stand on sit down strike in Vancouver. Strike started with sixteen hundred transients participating and now according to the youth council survey there are only one hundred of the originals. Thus fifteen hundred transients have left and have apparently found the means of livelihood.

Some members of this house may have seen the report of the survey being conducted by the youth council. It showed clearly that of those who took part in the demonstrations in the art gallery and the post office not more than 100 could be described as non-resident.

Mr. DOUGLAS (Weyburn): Is the minister basing his statement entirely on the survey that was made?

Mr. ROGERS: That is the only information we have as to those who were in occupation of the art gallery and the post office. The government has no reason to believe that the facts are not as stated, nor do I have any reason to assume that the youth council would have any motive in stating the facts other than correctly.

Why is it that this house should now be discussing this matter upon the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that we should give our attention to a question of urgent public importance? What has altered the situation is the fact that on Sunday morning the men who were in occupation of the art gallery and post office were asked to vacate these buildings. Having refused to do so, they were evicted by the city police. At the post office the city police had the cooperation of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. What is the proximate cause of the riot that occurred in Vancouver? The proximate cause surely is this, that these men who were asked to withdraw peaceably, and who were given thirty minutes to do so, declined to comply with that request, made in one case by the postmaster and in the other by the secretary of the board of trustees of the art gallery. Had they complied with that request; had they taken advantage of the time given, there would have been no riots; no injuries would have been suffered by policemen and men, and there would have been no destruction of private property. What did occur was the result of the fact that when asked to leave these buildings the men refused to do so.

Had those men complied with that request which was made after great patience and forbearance so far as the maintenance of law and order was concerned, would their position have been any different from that of other groups of unemployed in cities and towns right across this dominion? I put that directly to members of this house. Had these men accepted the advice given, they would have been in precisely the same position as other groups of unemployed in other towns and cities with respect to available employment. They would not have suffered discrimination.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Does the minister think that would have helped very much?

Mr. ROGERS: Perhaps my hon. friend will permit me to finish. I am not aware that I interrupted him in his rather vehement discourse this afternoon. A short while ago I met a delegation of unemployed from the city of Charlottetown, at the other extremity of this dominion. It so happens that the little province of Prince Edward Island has suffered from rather exceptional weather conditions during the past year. To-day there is a greater number of unemployed in Charlottetown than they have had at any time in the past ten years. So they appealed to us. This delegation from Charlottetown was composed of men some of whom were unemployed themselves. They put their case before us, and I told them, as my predecessors have told similar delegations in times past, that the government had made certain appropriations for relief and for public works and that within those appropriations we would do what we could to meet the situation in the city of Charlottetown. Those men set out certain projects which they thought would help particularly to meet the situation, and they left their information with me. It has been found possible to proceed with some of those, but it will not be possible to proceed with others.

The point I wish to make is this: Those men made their proposals and then accepted the decision that the government was prepared to do certain things, but was not prepared to carry out all their requests. They went back to Charlottetown and made their report to the unemployed of that city. The unemployed of that city did not occupy the post office or any other public building. They recognized the fact that any government with a sense of its responsibilities can do much in certain directions, but cannot, and least of all under dictation, provide special works projects for special groups of people in special districts in this dominion. I suggest that in effect that was the purpose of this organized demonstration in Vancouver.

You will find nothing in the correspondence exchanged between the Minister of Labour and the head of the unemployed committee which could by any stretch of the imagination be described as provocative. From the beginning I have been willing to concede that these men were honestly desirous of obtaining work. I pointed out to Mr. Matts of the unemployed committee that these men could not expect and need not expect that this government would provide special works projects for this particular group of people. I believe that position was sound then and I believe it is no less sound now. Despite the fact that these men, under ill advice, have chosen illegal methods to bring their plight to the attention of the government, there has been no desire on the part of the government to discriminate against them. At the present time these men stand on the same footing as other unemployed in British Columbia or in other provinces to which they may have gone. Surely it cannot be argued for a moment that we should provide special works projects for a group of men who have adopted the methods these men have adopted and decline to provide special works projects for the unemployed of Charlottetown and other places who have gone about their business in an entirely proper and legal way.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. ROGERS: If I might continue, I do not feel that this discussion ought to be prolonged. As I said at the beginning, I think it is fortunate that this matter has been discussed in temperate language and that there has been no resort to harsh and bitter words. Looking to the future, I can only say that we, with the other governments concerned, will do what lies in our power to see that employment is made available to these men on the same terms as it is made available to others who are in the same position. More cannot be said; and less, I think, cannot justly be said.

As a matter of fact, only a few days ago Premier Pattullo gave a full statement, which appeared in the Vancouver papers, of the public work that will be available in British Columbia during the coming summer. Some two weeks before that, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) made a statement with regard to special work which would be conducted through federal contributions. The total amount of public works in British Columbia in the way of highway construction will be in the neighbourhood of two and a half million dollars, quite apart from other public expenditures which will be made by various departments of government; nor does that at all cover such work as may be made available through private enterprise. Some have said here to-day it is not reasonable to expect that any work will be made available through the expansion of private enterprise. Our figures show that there were 15,000 placements made through the employment service in British Columbia last year, which surely suggests that in the course of the summer months opportunities for employment are made available from time to time. And I am convinced it is far from the truth to say that you can judge as to the employment possibilities in British Columbia or any other province only by a recital of the public works which are either actually under construction or in contemplation. In this country we have never depended upon public works as the sole means of providing employment, and I think it is a mistake to base any of our discussions upon such an assumption. Public works have their place in an employment policy, and we have tried to give them their proper place. As a government we have continued to do what we could to expand employment opportunities in British Columbia and elsewhere.

These men who unfortunately, under wrong advice, took part in this demonstration in Vancouver which had such an unhappy ending should think carefully before they lend themselves to this means of bringing their position before governments. I have every sympathy for their position; so has every member of this house, irrespective of party; but I do suggest that it is not proper for one group of unemployed in one section of the country to take the position that they will occupy public buildings until given special works projects in that section of the country. No government, I submit, whatever its character might be, could accept dictation of that kind. Before I close, however, I should like to make it equally clear that despite what has happened this government will not lend itself to any discrimination against these men. What I said two weeks ago I repeat with equal force now. These men will be upon the same footing as others in similar groups of unemployed, either in British Columbia or in other provinces.

Mr. STEVENS: If the minister will now permit a question, where would a single, destitute, unemployed non-resident in Vancouver secure a meal to-day?

Mr. ROGERS: Well, I should like to point out that when the original offer was made to the non-residents by Mr. Pearson, it was made clear to them that they would be provided not only with transportation to the point of origin but also with meals until they reached their destination. There was nothing to prevent these non-residents from accepting this offer of transportation. As a matter of fact, according to our figures, the number of non-residents has been reduced from about 1,500 to somewhere in the neighbourhood of 100.

Mr. BENNETT: Might I ask whether or not any provision has been made for food and shelter for these men to-day and to-night?

Mr. ROGERS: On that point I understand that some special provision was made for them following what took place yesterday morning. I have no definite advice as to what has been done subsequently.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister has no advice on that?

Mr. ROGERS: I have no advice at the present time. I would point out, however, that as in former years the dominion government makes a general grant in aid to the provinces for relief purposes. We do not restrict in any way the use that may be made of the grant in aid for the provision of relief; that has always been left entirely to the province concerned.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon my mind goes back three years, to the time when into the city of Regina there came a group of young men, also from British Columbia. I remember how gentlemen now sitting on the opposite side of the house then took an attitude somewhat different from that taken by hon. gentlemen sitting on that side of the house this afternoon, and I listened with a great deal of interest to the defence of the government policy offered by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers).

May I deal with just one or two things the Minister of Labour said. He told us that the men were employed during the winter months and that they had certain vouchers coming to them which should have enabled them to maintain themselves for a considerable time. That, at least, is the inference I took from his remarks. Apparently they worked for eight weeks, and there was a deferred payment of $4 a week. That would amount to a maximum of $32, with which not only to provide food and shelter but to buy clothing to maintain themselves until they could get a problematical job. I say, "a problematical job" because, as has been shown in the house this afternoon and on other occasions recently, in British Columbia men are being laid off instead of taken on, and the situation in that regard becomes more serious every day.

We also have the question of whether these men are from within or without that province, and we are told that a survey by the youth council showed that seventy-five per cent of these men were residents of British Columbia. At this point may I just interject a question as to why the minister has relied upon a survey made by the youth council when there was an officer of his department in Vancouver and when, if my recollection is correct, it was suggested some days ago from this corner of the house that this officer or other officers of the department should make an official survey of unemployed young men in Vancouver. Why should we have quoted to us figures that are unofficial when we might have had before us this afternoon an official statement?

We are told that it is not an innovation to close the winter camps, because they were closed last year and the men were sent out to look for jobs themselves. That is quite true, but the condition last year was entirely different from the condition that exists this year. Last year there was employment; this year men are being laid off, and unemployment in British Columbia is increasing. That explains the difference in conditions, and why the men found it necessary to bring their case as forcibly as possible, without doing violence, before the government and the people of Canada generally. We are told that the men were asked to vacate the premises and refused to do so. We have not been told that they were offered any real alternative. They were not offered food; they were not offered shelter elsewhere. I would not at any time encourage a trespass; but after all if a trespass is going to be committed, I would say that the place to trespass would be upon public property rather than the property of private citizens and individuals. These buildings were public institutions, and therefore to that extent the men showed a considerable amount of judgment in occupying what was public property. We are told they were evicted by the city police, in cooperation with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. That point has been emphasized this afternoon. I wonder if it is not a similar situation to that which existed in Regina in 1935 when, more or less unwillingly, the city police were compelled to take the first step in the regrettable riot which occurred on the market square. If my information is correct, the mounted police officers were in reality directing the operation, and the city chief of police was more or less acting under instruction from the federal authorities. If that be so, I think we should know about it.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The hon. member is absolutely misinformed.

Mr. COLDWELL: I am glad to know I have been misinformed. But the defence by the city police of Regina in 1935 was exactly as I have stated it, and I wondered if the same condition might exist in Vancouver at the present time. The hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil) suggests to me that the mounted police cleared the post office.

Mr. BENNETT: The minister said that.

Mr. COLDWELL: The mounted police cleared the post office, and issued an ultimatum. I drew the inference I have indicated, one which I believe the minister will agree was perhaps justified, but I am glad to have his denial.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): No; it was under the direction of the chief of the city police. The mounted police went into the post office at the request of and to help the city police.

Mr. COLDWELL: Nevertheless, it was, I take it, as a result of the decision of the dominion government that the buildings were to be cleared.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I have read the telegram which was addressed to the mayor of Vancouver.

Mr. BENNETT: By the acting Postmaster General.

Mr. COLDWELL: We are told that had the men complied there would have been no riot, no injury and no destruction of property. But would there have been any shelter? Would there have been any food? Would any work have been provided by the government for these men? I think these are important questions.

We are told that they could have done what other young men in other parts of Canada are doing. When I came back from Saskatchewan the other day I travelled over the Canadian National road. It is probable that other hon. members who were in Saskatchewan may have travelled over the same route, and if they did they would have noticed little jungles at stations all along the way where little groups of men were congregated trying to cook their food over improvised fires. Is that the sort of thing to which the government would sentence our young men, day in and day out, week in and week out?

I say the time has come when we must view the situation as something more than a passing phase. As the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) said this afternoon, the technological improvements made in industry in the last few years have created an entirely new situation, one which must be grappled with. It seems to me that in allowing the condition to drift, the government is simply inviting trouble for itself and for the entire dominion. Any one who knows me must know that I have no use for violence. Whenever I have had the opportunity I have endeavoured to advise means of protest which were other than provocative of violence. One of the members of the group to which I belong was responsible, so I am informed, for preventing a far more serious situation from developing at Vancouver yesterday. That has been our point of view. Consequently, when we bring these matters to the attention of the house we do so in the interests of peace, order and good government.

We have heard about a difference in the attitude of men from Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island. I do not know anything about those men, but I do know that conditions in New Brunswick are none too good. There has been no relief for a considerable time. However, if the people in New Brunswick are prepared to accept conditions such as no respectable Canadian ought to accept, then of course that is the business of the people of New Brunswick. And if the people in other parts of Canada—

Mr. MICHAUD: Charlottetown is in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. COLDWELL: I was referring to both maritime provinces. If people in other parts of Canada are not prepared to accept such conditions, then I say it is their right and privilege to protest. There might be difference of opinion as to the methods of protest that should be adopted. But when men are desperate, when they are hungry or when they are homeless they will do things they would not otherwise do.

The minister told us that the men from Charlottetown went about their business. What business? The only thing I could think of when he used that term was that they went about the business of starving to death.

Miss MACPHAIL: And not bothering the minister.

Mr. COLDWELL: And, as the hon. member for Grey-Bruce points out, not bothering the minister or the government.

Surely the time has come when something must be done for men of this kind who are to be found all across Canada. As has been said many times this afternoon, the problem is not solved simply by shelving this debate. It is with us to-day, as it was with us yesterday. It will be with us to-morrow, and it will increase as days go by. A short time ago the statement was made that hon. members in this corner of the house were responsible for the disaffection in 1935. I know, of course, that is not a statement of fact. Actually the reverse is the case, and we are anxious to cooperate with the government in any and every way, and in every possible manner in order to bring about conditions whereby these disturbances will not occur periodically throughout the dominion.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. COLDWELL: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we of the group with which I am associated were asked what alternatives we had to offer. For three years now we, in common with other members of the house, have been bringing to the attention of parliament this grave problem of unemployment. Always we have tried to make constructive proposals, and now towards the end of the third session of this parliament all that the government seems to have done is to have achieved a near approach to a balanced budget, and tear gas bombs for the unemployed at Vancouver. May I say that in my opinion along that path lies revolution, and that is not the alternative which we suggest. Our alternative is to recognize that within the present economic system with its technological dislocation, and so on, there is no cure; but that pending the changes which must come, work and wages must be provided by governments for our unemployed, and more particularly perhaps for our young people. The national employment commission warned the government, and its chairman, Mr. Purvis, stated, as reported in the Montreal Gazette of January 12, 1937:

> Sometimes it is assumed that the good times for which we look so hopefully will automatically take care of all dangers inherent in the relief and unemployment situations. The commission does not believe this to be the case.

Nor, may I add, will one good crop or two good crops in the west cure the disease. It is time we realized it is a disease, and a disease of the present economic system. Unless we take steps to cure it, it is, I believe, the cancer that will destroy the system and perhaps even civilization itself. Obviously only employment will cure unemployment, and I submit, everywhere in this country there is work to be done.

This afternoon I spoke of my recent trip to Saskatchewan and what I saw upon my return over the Canadian National railway.

I went west over the Canadian Pacific railway, and I could not help noticing, as we passed through western Ontario and along the shores of the great lakes, the miles and miles of half-completed trans-Canada highway. The completion of that highway alone would mean work, plenty of work, and wages too. If, Mr. Speaker, you had travelled, as I did, over the Saskatchewan roads, you would have realized that there was a great deal of work to be done in that province, as well as in the other provinces. Quite recently, a few Sundays ago, I was on a train coming out of Montreal. We struck an automobile, and a priest and his driver were killed. I noted that during the same week the press of this city reported three fatal automobile accidents at level crossings quite near to the city of Montreal; yet I remember that the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) before the election of 1935 spoke of the dangers of level crossings and the necessity of eliminating them, and incidentally he spoke of their elimination as one of the possibilities of finding employment for those persons then unemployed. I say, too, that in the elimination of level crossings there is work to be done, work that would provide wages for many unemployed. Reforestation, afforestation, drought control—

Mr. SPEAKER: I would draw the attention of the hon. member to the fact that the motion now under discussion deals "with the serious situation existing in Vancouver as a result of the eviction of single unemployed men from the post office, and at once to stop disturbances." I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks as closely as possible to the subject.

Mr. COLDWELL: May I draw the attention of Your Honour to the fact that in the debate before the supper recess we were asked what alternatives we had to suggest to relieve the unemployment situation among transients at Vancouver, and I am endeavouring to show that there are alternatives to tear gas bombs and so on, by pointing out that there is much work with wages to be done in the Dominion of Canada. But if your honour considers that I am out of order, I shall confine my remarks more specifically to the Vancouver situation.

In regard to the unemployed at Vancouver it should be said that in order that they may provide themselves with food, clothing and shelter they require money, and it has been said also that public works projects cannot be financed either in British Columbia or elsewhere because we cannot finance them. I would point this out, that there is a tremendous waste to-day in the investment of money—exaggerated speculation, bad investments, uncontrolled investment, the putting of money into unproductive and speculative channels and so on. Thus I believe, if the government would parallel the recent announcement that it would nationalize the Bank of Canada in order to give greater control of currency and credit, with an announcement that it would establish a national investment board, money could be found to provide for many work and wages programs.

Retirement of the aged from industry, provision for minimum wages and shorter hours are other alternatives that might be suggested. But again I would ask of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers): What are these transients who have been treated in this manner in the city of Vancouver to do at the present time? Where to-day can a single unemployed man or woman get a meal, a bed, or necessary clothing? What are the single unemployed residents of the city of Vancouver itself to do? These are questions to which the house is entitled to an answer at the present time, and I submit that we have had no answer, and that before this debate ends the government should give parliament the assurance that unemployment conditions at the coast and elsewhere will be met at once.

We were asked what alternatives we had. I have submitted some which we have brought to the attention of this house from time to time since we assembled in February, 1936; but, after all, it is not our function to suggest a program or a policy to the government, for the government now in power promised in 1935 to cure, or at least to alleviate, unemployment so that it would not be the great problem it is to-day. The government accepted office upon the conditions which the government itself laid down to the people of Canada. The government has the power to fulfil its promises; for no other government in Canadian history ever had the following which this government has in this House of Commons. We have told the house from time to time what we advise. That is all we can do.

Again I ask. What does the government propose to do? Out of office the present Prime Minister was loud in his expressions of horror at the condition that then existed, a condition which is closely paralleled by the condition at Vancouver and in other parts of Canada to-day and only this afternoon the Prime Minister expressed satisfaction over an improvement in conditions. But for whom have conditions improved? Not for the thousands of young men who ride the rods all across Canada; not for the thousands of young men and young women who are leaving our schools and our colleges every year without any prospects in life; not for the masses of the people because unemployment and insecurity haunt this whole land from coast to coast. Our young people, thousands of them, are idle. They cannot establish homes or lead decent, normal lives, and I submit that tear gas bombs are no answer to this question.

And so, Mr. Speaker, before I sit down I should like again to ask the Minister of Labour what he proposes to do in regard to these conditions. We have not heard; we have not been informed. All that we have been told is that these young men can do the same thing as other young people are doing throughout this dominion. Having in some degree at least answered the question which government spokesmen asked of this little group to-day, I ask the government: What is your alternative?

Mr. H. C. GREEN (Vancouver South): It is regrettable that there was so little of hope in the statement made this afternoon by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers), and no indication whatever that the government is facing this situation. I do not know what will happen if the government continues its ostrich-like policy of burying its head in the sand whenever trouble of this kind looms on the horizon. The British Columbia government deserves, it seems to me, just as much censure as the dominion government. It too has failed utterly to face the problem. To-day we find in the Ottawa papers this report from Victoria:

> Honourable George Pearson, Minister of Labour, refused to meet a delegation of Vancouver unemployed who came here to-day.

That is no way to tackle the problem. One reason why the government here is falling down is that it is trying to settle the problem by remote control. Ottawa is three thousand miles away from Vancouver. It is true that this government has a representative in Vancouver, but his efforts appear to have been worthless. Some weeks ago I suggested that the Minister of Labour should go to Vancouver and personally take charge of the situation there before it became impossible, but no move was made. It is just like a colonel trying to fight his battalion without ever having a look at the front line. The place of the federal Minister of Labour is at the present time in Vancouver, and the sooner he gets there the faster this problem will be solved. His absence is a continuation of the policy which apparently has been adopted by this government. I believe only one front-bench minister has been in British Columbia since the election three years ago.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

That was the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). They have all been too busy.

Mr. REID: And the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud).

Mr. GREEN: I said "front-bench minister." They have all been too busy or too indifferent to bother going to the coast province, whose problems are so different from those of the other provinces of Canada.

Mr. ROGERS: As a back-bench minister I might perhaps say that I was in British Columbia.

Mr. GREEN: If the front-bench ministers will not go, I suppose that the back-bench ministers will have to do.

Mr. HOWE: I might say that I have been there four or five times in the last year.

Mr. GREEN: In the course of his remarks this afternoon the minister said that the cause of yesterday's trouble was that the men had refused to leave the building peaceably when requested to do so. But the trouble goes far deeper than that. The real cause of this trouble in Vancouver at the present time is the failure of the dominion government to face the problem of the single transient unemployed, which centres in Vancouver. Each spring and each fall these single unemployed, who have no home attachments drift out to Vancouver. It is the end of the two great railway lines. The weather is milder than it is in the east, not so cold in the winter and not so hot in the summer—fortunately. The government forestry camps in British Columbia are closed each spring. There is not the opportunity for the men from those camps to get work in the forest industries of our province, such as there is for men on the farms to carry on with farm work during the summer. The problem is in Vancouver, not in Charlottetown, and it has been in Vancouver year after year. This is no new thing. Plainly it is the responsibility of the dominion government, not of the citizens of Vancouver. In that city, according to another press dispatch, ten thousand people congregated this morning at the Canadian Pacific Railway docks to see this delegation of one hundred off to Victoria to interview the provincial minister of labour. You have no idea of the effect that has on the citizens of Vancouver and on the business of the city, of the effect that the fact of these hundreds of men being parked in the public buildings has had in lowering the morale of the whole of our citizenry. It has affected seriously the business of Vancouver; it has ruined the summer so far as that great city is concerned; tourist business has been very badly hurt; business in all other lines is suffering. There is no reason why the citizens of Vancouver or any other city should have to pay the shot because of the failure of governments to tackle this problem of the single transient unemployed.

Time and again during the last two months we have pointed out to the government that there was going to be trouble and have advocated steps which could be taken to stop it. The only thing we have had from this government was the statement by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) this afternoon that the government is very sorry that this has happened. I believe that before they are through with their term of office they will be sorry for many more of their sins of omission, of which this is one of the worst. The question is, What can be done now? These men are still in Vancouver. There is no possibility whatever of their being placed in industry, no possibility of their getting work for themselves. But public works projects are being undertaken in British Columbia, and several million dollars are to be spent. Also training is to be given in forestry and in placer mining. I suggest to the minister that all these unemployed men who are eligible for employment on public works, or for the training, should be registered forthwith; a record should be got of the men who can be put on these projects, and an assurance should be given that they will be placed in the next few days. There is no reason why some step of that kind cannot be taken. It may be that there will have to be further public works; but I suggest that the solution of the problem lies along that line, and that there should be included among the men eligible for this work the transients who were in British Columbia camps all winter. The minister will correct me if I am wrong, but I understand that if a man was in British Columbia before November 1 of last year he was eligible for the forest camps during the winter. Is that correct?

Mr. ROGERS: That is correct.

Mr. GREEN: I suggest that men of that group should be given a chance to work in British Columbia this summer. Two years ago the government worked out a plan whereby thousands of young men found employment on the railway lines doing maintenance work. Why could not something of that kind be set up this year? The provinces are not responsible for these transients; they are the problem of the dominion, and sooner or later the dominion will have to evolve some scheme for dealing with them. For the transients as a whole, whom we have all seen riding the rods and living in these jungles across Canada which have been referred to this afternoon, this government should provide some sort of training, in forestry, in mining, in agriculture or in fishing. The main point is that the single transient unemployed man is the problem of the dominion, and this problem must be faced without any further delay.

Mr. A. W. NEILL (Comox-Alberni): It is, I know, difficult to approach the consideration of this subject without either giving it a partisan aspect or being accused of doing so. But before I make any criticism of the situation I wish to dissociate myself entirely from the language used by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth). He was thoroughly in his element along the line he pursued. He had not got into his stride before he brought in the textile industry, which is at least somewhat remote from the subject we are discussing. A policy of attack, yes; a policy of tearing down, yes; but of building up we heard nothing. And that is not calculated to bring about what at least should be the ambition of all of us, namely, a peaceful settlement of this dreadful situation, which is a reproach to our city of Vancouver and to the province as well as to our dominion. As the hon. member who preceded me has said, it is highly calculated to do both the city and the province a great deal of harm in many ways.

Speaking on this subject some weeks ago, the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) indicated that with the men working in the forestry conservation camps in the winter time and those taken care of by the farm placement plan there were some 5,000 men engaged in British Columbia, and that at the end of April or running on towards the middle of May they were more or less turned loose. As reported at page 3131 of Hansard he quoted the minister of labour of British Columbia as having said that, of that number, some 1,800 men were non-residents, outsiders, and that the province would undertake to take care of the remainder if they could get rid of the 1,800. Well, that was the initial error, or at any rate one of them. The minister was not informed of the situation when he made that statement, I am referring to the minister of labour of British Columbia. Apparently he is unaware of the change in conditions. A year ago his statement would have been true and the arrangement would have worked satisfactorily. But the conditions have changed, and changed materially. A good many of the logging camps have closed, and even the camps that have not closed are affected by the low demand for their products, the result being that they are working on short time with abbreviated crews.

In the town of Port Alice in my constituency and in the town of Woodfibre in the constituency of the hon. member for Vancouver North (Mr. MacNeil), both paper mills, manufacturing either pulp or paper, have entirely shut down and are unable to state when they anticipate opening up again. These two little towns involve 700 men who are thrown out of employment. Multiply that by four and you have nearly three thousand men, women and children in the shadow of relief, and these are only two instances. In the city of Powell River, represented by the hon. member for Vancouver North, the mills are not entirely closed down but have very considerably curtailed their output, and that has had its bearing upon my own district. It is the custom for them every year to let contracts for small logging outfits in the northern portion of the district I represent. They allot them a certain quantity and that provides a summer's work. When Powell River runs half time they do not want these other logs because they have enough in their own storage ponds, and this means that another lot of men are thrown out of employment. Some of these men have their homes in my district; but many of them come from Vancouver, and that is why I have an interest in the matter. It is therefore not possible, as the minister of labour of British Columbia said, to employ 5,000 extra men. That is one conspicuous mistake.

Again, there was hope of sending the men to the prairies; but the governments there, both provincial and municipal, said emphatically that they did not want the men and would not take them. The men naturally asked what was the use of trying to go there seeing that they would only be turned loose and asked to move in some other direction. Speaking on May 23 on this subject, I suggested to the government that there was a major job waiting for these men to do, work which they could well perform, in the building of a road on the west coast of Vancouver at a place between Hesquiat and Estevan Point. It is essential that a road be built there to afford facilities to get supplies to the wireless station, lighthouse and direction finding station. We have been fooling along for a number of years spending two or three thousand dollars every year and getting nowhere, whereas if we spent $30,000 and built a good road using relief labour we would be giving the men employment and, more than that, we would save the annual maintenance, because the maintenance of a road so constructed would be slight. As it is, we are patching the road here and there, patching up work that we did years ago. The construction of such a road as I suggest would have been work which these men, trained in the bush, would have been well fitted to perform.

We have heard a good deal about the character of these men. The term "red" has been used, but I suggest that they cannot be dismissed with a single condemnation of that kind. I notice that whenever any strike is successful it has invariably the sympathy of the local people, and where the local people are not in sympathy it is always a failure. I think it can be fairly said, at any rate those who read the press and who know the conditions will agree, that the people of Vancouver are sympathetic to these men. So far as the word "red" is concerned, I had an experience forty years ago which I cannot forget. I, too, was like these men in that same city and I did not know where my next meal was coming from. I knew what it was to be hungry. There was not relief nor were there any government supplies. What I wanted to mention, however, in connection with that experience, is the fact which I noted then, that the morale of the men deteriorated very rapidly. We did not use the word "morale" then; we spoke of the character of the men, and undoubtedly it deteriorated. I saw it in myself and in my chums. We had to eat to live, and even though we were striving zealously to get jobs, and odd jobs were secured from time to time, we got to the stage where we were almost afraid of getting a job, and we did not want to work. The less intelligent men might have become hoboes or petty thieves, and the more intelligent ones might have gone into some form of confidence game. I was seriously contemplating going into a scheme for smuggling Chinamen into the United States—a profitable occupation, with $500 a head profit and five years in the penitentiary if we were caught. We did not know the word "red" in those days; but if there had been any leadership there of any kind, that said, "We will show you the way out of this trouble," I certainly would have turned in that direction and so would my friends.

It is suggested that these men resorted to the action they did in order to force attention to their condition. Yes; and half the trouble in consequence is a matter of face saving on the part of both dominion and provincial governments and perhaps to some extent also on the part of the leadership of the men. The Minister of Labour said that in the winter months there was a conspiracy of which he had information. I have no doubt he knew what he was talking about. If there was not a conspiracy—that is going too far—there was at least a prearrangement that these men would be advised to get together in Vancouver when they were turned out of the camps, and so force the attention of the government to the situation with a view to getting the camps continued or to having work of some kind provided. And what was the conspiracy? One would expect to hear talk of Lenin's proposals and of taking from the rich and giving to the poor. But what, as a matter of fact, have these men asked for? So far as I can make out, all that they have demanded has been work. They said that they would be perfectly satisfied to get work, and they asked for the opening of a camp where they would work for a very small wage. It hardly looks, then, as if their sole motive were initiated by Moscow, when all they are asking for is the reopening of the labour camps.

And how was the situation handled? I do not think it was handled in the best way. The government positively encouraged, or any rate tacitly permitted it. In fact, more than that, they accepted it. They allowed food to go in and men to come out; they allowed for gangs to go out for baths, and arranged for baths. They went so far as to give them a sort of semi-valet service because they had their clothes fumigated. That is another mistake, because it constituted tacit approval.

I suggest that the proper way to do would have been to turn the men out at once; say to them, "You say you want to call attention to a grievance; well, you have called attention to it, and it will be investigated, on the good faith of the men who are sent to address you. But we will discuss no terms with revolutionists. Had a strong stand been taken, I think the men would have appreciated it. A committee could have been appointed, consisting of so many of these men, so many prominent citizens of Vancouver and so many government officials; let them sit down and discuss the subject. But apparently no attempt was made to come to an understanding. Let them agree on what I would call undeniable facts. For instance, the government said, "You can get lots of work on the prairies; go back there." But the men said, "We cannot get work there." The committee would then say, "There are two clear statements. We suggest it is up to the men to accept work that is offered them, and it is up to the government to state where they can find work"; not a mere statement that they will have their fare paid to Regina, whereupon the men will say, "What are we going to do when we get there?" and the government merely say, "Well, you will find out when you get there." Then, the government having achieved the proper amount of face saving, a camp could have been opened. It will come to that anyway, and it does not make much difference in cost whether they are military or work camps. There would have been much less damage done either to the reputation of the government or to the shop windows of Vancouver than has taken place under the present system. The cost of opening that camp would have been small compared with the damage already done, and the situation is not eased one particle. I would tell these men, and tell them plainly, what was to be done; working men will stand to be told plain home truths; I have done it and received their approval.

Tell them that this is only a temporary arrangement. It seems to be at present largely a provincial issue, because if the Minister of Labour is correct, they are nearly all British Columbia residents now, although I think he is not quite right there; I think some of his figures did not take account of the fact that some men left and went back again. At any rate, if they are mostly our own residents, it is up to the provincial government, or the dominion government, to find work for them on the prairies or elsewhere. If there were a call for twenty teamsters, I would have twenty volunteers called up, and if twenty were not forthcoming I could conscript twenty whose occupations had been put down as such, and take them off relief. The bulk of the men would approve of that; they would not stand for shirkers, because their own interests are at stake. Or it could be done by provinces; say to Alberta: "We have fifty of your idle men. Will you provide for them and we will ship them to you, or will you pay for their work here?" I think one of the provinces did make such a suggestion, that they would be willing to pay for maintenance in a camp in British Columbia. If the logging business or the paper industry picks up, as we all hope it will, there will be more employment along those lines, and it is wonderful how a slight increase in business will make the difference between too many men and too few. This may be called a mere dream of mine, but I think it is a practical and immediate solution; much more practical than talking about economic determinism, which is something I have never been able to understand and which I do not think is of any help in the present situation.

I have listened to the hon. members from Vancouver and vicinity talking about this matter at intervals for weeks now; they all spoke moderately and appropriately, and what did they get? They got just nowhere; they got language, beautiful language, and nothing but language. I suppose I shall be called a rebel in saying this; but I am afraid if I had been one of that group or had a following on that side of the house, I should have been sorely tempted to follow the action of that great Liberal, I think it was Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in 1896, who said: "Not one more estimate shall pass until so-and-so happens." And on that occasion the matter in question was much less important than that before us to-night. If any considerable group on this side had said, "We will not pass another item in the estimates until this matter is settled," it would have been better for everyone. But surely such an attitude should not be necessary in these modern and supposedly enlightened days. The traditional policy of the Liberal party surely is still their policy—freedom of speech and protection and uplift of the masses. This is a great opportunity to carry out those principles. All that stands in the way is a little question of dignity; we have said this and we will not back down or give way one iota until they get out. Yes, we admit they were wrong; I think the men themselves will admit they were ten times wrong in the action they took. But there is a lurking suspicion that if they had not done something wrong, they would not have got any attention.

Let us put this matter above party political advantage. We are always appointing special committees. Let us suppose a committee of this house were appointed to-morrow, so many from the government side, so many from the Conservative party. I would put all the Vancouver members on it, but I would leave the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) off because he would make trouble in the Garden of Eden. But the various members from Vancouver who represent different parties and have shown a reasonable spirit should be on it; let that body get together, and I think they could speedily draw up a program which would bring this bitter matter to an end and do credit to every member and every party in this house.

Mr. A. G. SLAGHT (Parry Sound): The hon. member who last addressed us (Mr. Neill) very properly commented upon the immoderate language to which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Woodsworth) saw fit to treat the house in his presentation of his motion to-day. What is this all about? The hon. member to whom I last referred said that these men were not guilty of any crime. His next sentence was that the only crime they were guilty of is trespass. He has endeavoured throughout to make heroes of these unfortunate men who through misguided leadership decided, as he puts it, to make a spectacular showing by breaking their country's laws. Do not let us forget that. Do not let us set up any false heroism; do not let us forget that these men have been guilty of taking over the property of His Majesty the King; and while I do not know enough about them to style them communists, I do know enough about the principles of communism to know that two things to which Stalin and communism are definitely opposed are constituted law and order. This is shown in taking forcible possession of public property and in denying art any place in society.

That leadership caused these men by mob rule to take forcible possession of the king's property, a post office, which has special significance under British law. It is a place where his majesty's mails are housed, where important communications pass back and forth. It is a place where the British flag flies at the masthead. The ill advisers of these unfortunate men led them to take forcible possession of his majesty's post office where the British flag ought to fly. It is all very well to say, "We must give them credit for their moderation in not beginning to break the windows in the post office." But the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre knows very well that the basic principle behind the policy these men adopted was mob rule and crowd psychology. In other words, they ganged up in order to take possession of one of his majesty's public buildings. What would the hon. gentleman think if a dozen or twenty men came along and said, "We are coming in here to sit down, to eat and sleep and perfume your place as we please." Suppose they came into his home or his garage or his stable, if he has one; what would he think of that, to bring it close to home in that way?

We know that in the country to the south we were treated to practically a year of sit-down strikes, and we know the battle the republic had to deal with them. We know what happened when they endeavoured to invade the province of Ontario, and these advisers of the unfortunate men in Vancouver are nothing more or less than sit-down strikers. The policy of the sit-down strikers is, "By our numbers we will change right into might. You dare not come near us." That was the defiance which was thrown out to Canada in Vancouver. The hon. gentleman, whose language I think I am not unfair in styling as incendiary and immoderate, called some of these men rascals, or said he expected some of them in the post office crowd were rascals.

To my mind the worst rascals in connection with this unfortunate situation were not in the post office out there at all.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. SLAGHT: My young and hon. friend steps to the centre, though I am not looking at him particularly. We cannot serve Canada by dealing with this situation, if I may say so, as some of my hon. friends have done. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), with his usual moderation, decried the lawbreaking and the fact that these men had entered upon a policy of might makes right by forcibly taking possession of the king's building. Some other hon. members took the same stand, but will the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre contemplate this? In Halifax, Saint John, Montreal, Toronto, Parry Sound—my own district—Winnipeg, Edmonton and all through Canada there are young, unemployed men who are just as worthy citizens as these gentlemen in Vancouver. There are veterans throughout this country who have carried and are carrying to-day greater burdens than those of these young men in whose behalf my hon. friend is so loud of voice. Are we to say to these men across Canada, "Gang up." Get some leaders who will advise you to take possession of the king's property." Are we to set an example, by mock sympathy for these men in their lawbreaking, which will invite the unemployed men throughout Canada to take possession of the post offices from coast to coast? That is what the philosophy of the hon. gentleman amounts to. Let him think well before he repeats that type of philosophy to the Canadian people.

I venture to think, as the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill) has said—though I have not been in the house as long as the hon. member—that in this immoderate talk we heard to-day the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is perhaps running true to form. I believe the hon. member for Comox-Alberni used that expression. The people of Canada have gradually diminished the number that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has had the honour to lead until now he is here with but seven members, as I count them, out of two hundred and forty-five. Let me say to him that if he had been more constructive in his policy; if he had been less ready to tear down and, as I am informed—I shall be corrected by him if I am wrong—if before I came to this house he had not enunciated the principle that he did not desire to have the responsibility of leading a government in Canada—

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Mr. Speaker, I object to that statement, which is utterly false. Further, I object to a personal attack on me and to your honour permitting such an attack when the matter under discussion concerns the situation in Vancouver. I would not object if I could be given a chance to reply.

Mr. SLAGHT: I accept the hon. gentleman's statement that he did not indicate that he preferred to remain a critic rather than form a government in this country. I was under the impression that I had read that statement, but I fully accept his denial. But let me say that his attitude has been along that line. It has been one of tearing down. It reminds me of the destruction of the post office building in Ottawa, where day by day the men on the top used their drills to dislodge great pieces of stone and then watched with gusto while they landed a hundred feet below and smashed into atoms. We shall never make a great Canada if we have an admiration for the tearing down principle. If the hon. gentleman had enunciated a single cure or remedy for what he so glibly condemned, I might respect his address.

Let me say to the hon. member that in this country we need other things than a cavilling and political condemnation of men who are dealing with a difficult situation. We have been condemned because we did not start soon enough. To that extent, and that extent only, I agree with the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens). It would have been better had our friends taken what might have been regarded as a sterner, crueler course and ejected these men within the first twenty-four hours after they broke the law, if only as an example to the rest of Canada. Then we suffer condemnation by the hon. member because these men were allowed to stay there; because they were given every opportunity to become lawful instead of lawless citizens and because for thirty days the government tolerated that sort of thing. For that reason we are castigated again. Oh, let him think what he is doing. Let him think of the many unemployed men in the other cities of Canada, even though unemployment has been greatly reduced under this government. Are we to take from the pockets of the taxpayers, from the poor men who are struggling along in this country working twice as hard as before, their few dollars, shovel them out to Vancouver and put them into the pockets of these men who are idle? I do say there ought to be more toleration; there ought to be less political claptrap when an opportunity comes to play upon the sympathies and hearts of the people.

Mr. MacINNIS: Too bad you were not here between 1930 and 1935.

Mr. SLAGHT: I was not fortunate enough to be here then, though my hon. friend was. That is a period upon which we look back in retrospect in different ways. But let me say that I do deplore speeches which attack a government which is doing the best it can with a difficult situation. On the one hand it is attacked for not moving fast enough; on the other it is attacked for not telling law-breakers, mob rulers and men who have been guilty of taking over a building flying his majesty's flag, that they should be mushed over and sympathized with; while at the same time there was not a single constructive suggestion from the hon. gentleman who is so bitter, vitriolic and vituperative.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I am glad indeed to have the privilege of following an hon. gentleman who has talked so much sense in regard to the offering of constructive suggestions. Once more, if it is your honour's will that I should be allowed to do so and still be considered in order, I want to speak very frankly, straightforwardly without criticism or cavil to the members of this house, to tell them that as far as I have been able to see, with my limited human intelligence, they will never solve the unemployment problem until they change the system under which we live. Hon. members will notice the attention we get when we offer a constructive suggestion.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): That is not a constructive suggestion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: You do not even wait for it to be shown to be constructive. The hon. member has just returned from doing the best he could to destroy the only constructive proposals we know in Canada.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would the hon. member permit a question? Would he tell us what his friends said in Alberta—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): —when the unemployed came to interview them?

Mr. POOLE: Who brought them down?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I just wished to try to show how much real sincerity there was in all those fine words. In the first place, there is no use in talking about the problem confronting us in Vancouver unless we have some suggestion to offer for the solution of that problem. It has been said that all the men want is to get work and wages. In all the devices which the intelligence of man has thus far contrived, is there to be found any set of principles through which, if applied in Canada, these men could be given work and wages? If there is, then let us devote our attention to a discussion of those principles.

I was much pleased with the suggestion of the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Neill). I am almost sure that the finest suggestion made thus far in the debate was made by that hon. member. I believe it was the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) who in his first speech this year suggested there must be enough intelligence and enough ideas in the house to solve our problems, if we all got together. This is the first time I have heard a re-echo of that fine suggestion.

The days through which we are passing present to Canada perhaps one of the first of the tragic effects of the break-down of the present system. I have quoted on former occasions some words which I believe will ring down through the generations, words of R. F. Irvine, Professor of Economics at Sydney university, Australia. For twenty-five years this man has been a professor of orthodox economics. Writing in 1933 in an article under the heading "Afterthoughts," he used the following words:

> I believe the principles put forward by C. H. Douglas are not only sound but that they provide the only practical way of escape from the tragic fate which otherwise awaits the whole of western civilization.

If this man had been an ordinary farmer, an ordinary tradesman or an ordinary school teacher, his words might not have been very important. But he is a professor of orthodox economics and for twenty-five years has been in one of the greatest universities in the British Empire. It was he who solemnly made those remarks. I believe they constitute a warning to this house. Out in Vancouver are manifestations of the tragic fate which otherwise awaits the whole of western civilization. That is the condition which will develop if we let that situation grow throughout the country, as I fear it will grow.

Much has been said about the other unemployed men who are quietly suffering. Either they are doing something about their lot, or they are simply suffering into the complete destruction of their bodies and souls. Let that condition continue, and we shall have a tragic fate all over this country; there is no doubt about that.

Before saying what I had intended to say, as my humble contribution to the debate, may I quote something which I believe will command the respect of hon. members of the Liberal party. I quote from page 103 of that fine book, Industry and Humanity, written in 1918 by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King):

> Man, not nature, is now in control. The problem of the possible production of all but unlimited wealth is already solved. Growth in human intelligence has wrought this achievement. Surely human intelligence may be relied upon to see that the problem of distribution, to which the production of wealth is a necessary preliminary, will also find an equitable solution.

If mankind is really in control, why is he not rendering impossible such conditions as those which now exist in Vancouver? I now read these fine words from page 130:

> Money and credit are sometimes spoken of as capital. They are such, not of themselves, however, but in virtue of what their possession commands; they indicate power of control because exchangeable for desirable commodities or services. So far as the actual processes of production go, money is a matter of figures in books, and insignia and figures on metal and paper.

The other day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) told us that he was unable to accept new economics. Our contention ever since coming to this house has been that money is figures in books. The justification for money is goods and services in the country.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would point out to the hon. member that we are discussing a motion having reference to the situation in Vancouver, which has arisen as a result of the eviction of men from the post office. I must ask the hon. member as far as possible to confine himself to the subject matter of the motion under discussion.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I thank you, Mr. Speaker. I conceive we shall never solve a problem of this kind until we have money, and with that in mind I was discussing money. I believe the solution lies right there. For the benefit of the Minister of Finance I shall quote a passage by the Professor of Economics of the university of Chicago.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. member that there will be other opportunities to discuss questions of finance. I suggest that at the present time the hon. member should confine his remarks to the question before the house, namely a motion with respect to the situation in Vancouver which has arisen as a result of the eviction of men from public buildings in that city.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I ask if it is permissible to offer a solution? Is it in order to offer a solution to the present difficulty?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Several hon. members have been condemned for offering nothing constructive, and I am wondering how one can offer anything constructive without offering a solution. However, I shall yield to your ruling your honour, as I wish to keep my remarks entirely in order.

I do wish to offer something constructive, and I must say there is nothing constructive which can be offered, or which will in any way be a solution of the difficulty, which does not go to the root of the cause which produced the problem. The root of the difficulty is money, beyond any question. If it is contrary to the rules of the house for me to quote what I had intended to quote to-night, I shall on another occasion read the extracts which, because of their bearing upon this problem, are of great importance. I would ask hon. members to notice the following observations with respect to the matter I wish to discuss:

> It will at once make loans to private business and advance credit to the public improvements corporation for a program of public works designed to put virtually all of the unemployed to work. The primary purpose of the proposal is, indeed, to make available to society the necessary monetary purchasing power for the unemployed to work on much-needed projects such as housing, civic amenities, health, education, cultural activities, etc.

My own restricted intelligence leads me to the conclusion that one could hardly discuss anything which has a more direct bearing upon this problem.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would my hon. friend guarantee that to be correct?

Mr. BLACKMORE: Would the hon. member like to come across and read the book, or shall I send it over to him by a page?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): Would my hon. friend say that it is correct and that it has been tried elsewhere?

Mr. BLACKMORE: I assume the hon. member knows how to read. He can come across and see the book.

The evidence is, Mr. Speaker, that the members across the floor do not want a solution; they do not want anything constructive. Therefore I am going to close what I have to say simply by pointing out that by changing to a system which is known to man today, known by hundreds of thousands of men, they can remove this blight which is threatening to destroy this people, and only by the adoption of some such plan as I have suggested to the house can it be done.

I am going to recall two fine statements made by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers).

One of them was this: "We will do what lies in our power." We suggest nothing but what lies in the government's power. There is control of Canada to-day by a government with a majority so great that it can do anything it chooses. If it cannot, then it would probably be quite in order for it to tell us why it cannot. If this country cannot govern itself, it is well that we should know it. If this parliament cannot govern this country, it is well that we should know it. If the present government with the majority it possesses cannot control this parliament, it is well that we should know it. If it can control this parliament, and this parliament can govern this country, and if this country can really govern itself, then it lies within the power of the government to-day to adopt the principles which I suggest. I contend they are the only solution.

The Minister of Labour also said this, as I remember it: "We will continue to do what we can to expand employment in British Columbia and elsewhere." Well, Mr. Speaker, all that the people of the Dominion of Canada request of the Minister of Labour and his colleagues is that they will do what they can. They need do no more.

I have no more to say. I shall not say anything unkind; I have not said anything unkind. All I shall do is to reiterate that the time has come for a show-down; the time has come for results, and the results will not be results of which this country can be anything but ashamed unless they give every man and every woman in this country at least a chance to make a living, a chance to get a job. Having said that, I just want to recall once more the words of R. F. Irvine. They are words to bear in mind. They are difficult words to laugh off.

> I believe the principles put forward by C. H. Douglas are not only sound but that they provide the only practical way of escape from the tragic fate which otherwise awaits the whole of western civilization.

I commend to the Minister of Labour and to those who are charged with the responsibility of conducting this country through these trying years the application of the principles of Major C. H. Douglas.

Motion withdrawn.

SEEDS ACT AMENDMENT

CHANGES IN WORDING CONSEQUENT UPON REORGANIZATION OF DEPARTMENT

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 158, to amend the Seeds Act, 1937.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. GARDINER: Mr. Speaker, this is just a consequential bill based upon the reorganization that has taken place in the department. It is to change some of the names of the officials.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

DAIRY INDUSTRY ACT AMENDMENT

CHANGES IN WORDING CONSEQUENT UPON REORGANIZATION OF DEPARTMENT

Hon. J. G. GARDINER (Minister of Agriculture) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 159, to amend the Dairy Industry Act.

Mr. STEVENS: Explain.

Mr. GARDINER: The purpose of this bill is just the same as in the other case, the Seeds Act amendment.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale):

1. Has the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation paid bonuses and/or commissions to some of its executives during the past year?

2. If so, to whom, on what dates, and in what amounts were such bonuses and/or commissions paid?

Mr. HOWE: The following information has been supplied by the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation:

1. Yes.

2. November 1, 1937: R. T. Bowman, $150; E. W. Jackson, $150; Rupert Lucas, $150; E. A. Weir, $150; Lt.-Col. R. P. Landry, $100; Miss H. Ball, $50; total, $750.

May 31, 1938: Lt.-Col. R. P. Landry, $250; J. A. Dupont, $250; total $500; grand total, $1,250.

BALLANTYNE AND LAPOINTE PIERS, VANCOUVER

Mr. GREEN:

1. Are the Ballantyne and Lapointe piers in Vancouver harbour operated by the national harbours board or by private interests?

2. If the latter, by what persons or corporations are they being operated, and under what agreement or agreements?

3. Was the equipment on these piers for stevedoring purposes sold or leased, and if so, to what persons or corporations, and upon what terms?

4. If these piers are no longer operated by national harbours board, what change has been made in the personnel of employees on the piers by the private interests operating them?

Mr. HOWE:

1. By national harbours board.

2. Answered by No. 1.

3. Sold to Empire Stevedoring Co. Ltd., for $17,838 cash.

4. Answered by No. 1.

NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR

Mr. FONTAINE:

What will be the total cost of Canada's participation in the world's fair at New York, 1939?

Mr. EULER: It is impossible at the present time to know what the ultimate cost will be. The main estimates for this year contain an item of $75,000 and an additional sum of $90,000 has been placed in the supplementary estimates.

MACRORIE, SASK., POST OFFICE MAIL CONTRACT

Mr. COLDWELL:

1. What remuneration is paid for the carrying of mail in the village of Macrorie, Saskatchewan?

2. What rent is paid for the post office premises at Macrorie, Saskatchewan?

Mr. EULER:

1. $156 per annum for conveyance of mails between Macrorie post office and railway station.

2. The rent paid by the postmaster for the post office premises is not known. The postmaster receives a rent allowance of $125 a year from the department.

ALCOVE, QUE., RAILWAY CROSSINGS

Mr. LEDUC:

1. Did the board of railway commissioners order the elimination of two railway crossings at Alcove, Wright county, province of Quebec?

2. If so, what was the cost of such work?

3. Were tenders called with respect to the above work?

4. If so, what were the names of the tenderers, and to whom was the contract awarded?

5. What amount, if any, did the dominion government contribute in connection with this work?

Mr. HOWE:

1. The board of railway commissioners authorized the department of roads for the province of Quebec to construct a road diversion eliminating the existing crossing north of the village of Alcove.

2. The cost of the work was $77,870.33.

3. No information.

4. No information.

5. Order of the board No. 53403, dated September 3, 1936, provided a grant of $22,216 towards the cost of this diversion. The account has been submitted, but has not been paid as the crossing has not been closed, as provided in the board's order.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD—RATES AND CHARGES

Mr. STEVENS:

1. What changes, if any, have been made in rates since by-law "C" Top wharfage tariff was published by the national harbours board, giving the particulars of each change?

2. Were such changes, if any, published in the Canada Gazette? If not, why were they not so published?

3. Has the tariff of rates and charges of the national harbours board, effective April 14, 1938, been amended? If so, in what respect?

4. Were such changes or amendments published in the Canada Gazette?

NATIONAL HABROURS BOARD—VANCOUVER GRAIN ELEVATORS

Mr. GREEN:

1. Are any of the grain elevators in Vancouver harbour owned by national harbours board under lease to private interests?

2. If so, to what persons or corporations, and what are the terms and conditions of the respective leases?

3. Has there been any reduction in rent or other concession made in respect of any elevator lease, and if so, what were such concessions, and to whom were they made?

4. Has there been any increase in the rent charged for elevator No. 3 because of the construction thereon of a warehouse, and if so, what was the amount of such increase, and does such increase pay interest and sinking fund covering the cost of construction of such warehouse?

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD—F. W. RIDDELL'S TRIP TO NEW YORK

Mr. STEVENS:

For a statement showing the expenses of F. W. Riddell, executive secretary of the national harbours board committee on a trip to New York during the month of May, together with a statement setting forth the instructions given Mr. Riddell in connection with the business of his trip and the names of the firms and individuals with whom he discussed Canadian public business; and also a copy of his report to the Minister of Transport or a statement of the substance of the said verbal report.

Mr. HOWE: Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of this motion is, of course, out of order, in that among other things it asks for a supposed verbal report from one of my senior officials to myself to be brought down. However, I have no objection to the motion passing with the reservations that private documents will not be brought down, privileged documents will not be brought down, and documents that are not in the public interest to produce will not be produced.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT—LONG DISTANCE TELEPHONE CALLS

Mr. STEVENS:

For a statement giving the dates of all long distance telephone calls between the Minister of Transport or any official attached to the said office and New York; and showing the number of calls and to whom directed; and also the total amounts paid in long distance telephone calls charges during the month of May, 1938.

Mr. HOWE: The same reservations.

NATIONAL HARBOURS BOARD—LONG DISTANCE TELEPHONE CALLS

Mr. STEVENS:

For a statement giving the dates of all long distance telephone calls between the national harbours board or any official or member of the national harbours board and New York; and showing the number of calls and to whom directed; and the total amounts paid in long distance telephone calls charges during the month of May, 1938.

Mr. HOWE: The same reservations.

BRITISH COLUMBIA UNEMPLOYMENT SITUATION

Mr. MacINNIS:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports and other documents passing between the Minister of Labour and any officer or employee of the Department of Labour of the Dominion of Canada and any person in the province of British Columbia, dated from April 15, 1938, to date, having reference to the unemployed situation in that province as it affects the single unemployed presently occupying the Vancouver post office and the Vancouver art gallery.

Mr. ROGERS: I am quite prepared to accept the motion, subject to the usual reservations regarding communications between the minister and officers of the department.

QUEBEC GRAIN ELEVATOR CHARGES

Mr. STEVENS:

For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents passing between the Minister of Trade and Commerce or any official of his office, or the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce or any official of the Trade and Commerce department and the board of grain commissioners for Canada or any of its members or officials during the month of May, 1938, and having reference to amendments or changes in the tariff of charges at Quebec grain elevators.

[Mr. Howe.]

Mr. EULER: May I say to my hon. friend that there are no such documents as are called for under this motion.

Mr. STEVENS: I fully expected it.

Mr. SPEAKER: Dropped.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEDNESDAY EVENING SITTINGS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That on Wednesday the 22nd of June, 1938, and all subsequent Wednesdays until the end of the session, the sittings shall in every respect be under the same rules provided for other days.

Motion agreed to.

POSTPONEMENT TO TUESDAY, JUNE 21, OF BUDGET DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. E. LAWSON (York South): In view of the lateness of the hour, would the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the government consider a request that the order of the budget debate be not called at this time? I am not desirous of making two bites at a cherry. I would rather start to-morrow.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think the request of my hon. friend is wholly reasonable, and I am sure that the members of the house generally would not wish to see him embarrassed by being obliged to proceed at this hour after the discussion we have had all day. If it is agreeable, we might have the house go into committee of supply and take up some of the estimates of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner).

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Why not take legislation?

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): I can get my material in on housing. It will take a few minutes.

TARIFF BOARD

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF REPORTS ON REFERENCES FROM THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance): The other day the hon. member for Danforth (Mr. Harris) asked me regarding reports of the tariff board. I should like to say that no reports have been received from the tariff board. In the event that they are received they will be duly tabled in parliament in accordance with the provisions of the Tariff Board Act. In view of what I said in the budget respecting tariff changes, I think it will be understood why I did not press for the submission of tariff board reports.

BANK OF CANADA

ACQUISITION BY THE GOVERNMENT OF SHARES NOW IN HANDS OF THE PUBLIC

Hon. CHARLES A. DUNNING (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Bank of Canada Act inter alia to provide for the redemption by the Bank of Canada of the 100,000 class "A" shares of the Bank of Canada of the par value of $50 each at the price of $59.20 per share and accrued dividends; to reduce the capital of the Bank of Canada from $10,100,000 to $5,000,000 divided into 100,000 shares of $50 each; and to authorize the Minister of Finance for the purposes of such redemption and reduction of capital to surrender to the Bank of Canada 102,000 class "B" shares of the Bank of Canada of the par value of $50 each, of which 2,000 shares shall be cancelled and 100,000 shares shall be exchanged for 100,000 new shares of $50 each to be issued by the Bank of Canada to the Minister of Finance and to pay to the Bank of Canada the additional amount necessary to pay the difference between the purchase price of the shares to be redeemed (excluding any amount paid by way of dividend) and their par value.

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Mr. DUNNING: I have not my material here on this resolution, but I am familiar and I think the house is familiar with the object of it. The object is to precede the introduction of a bill authorizing the government to acquire by way of purchase all of the outstanding privately owned shares of the Bank of Canada and to convert the bank thereby into a wholly government owned as well as government controlled institution. The reason the government advances for this step is that during the past year it has become quite evident that there is to be not merely political controversy with respect to monetary policy generally, which of course is permissible and desirable, but political controversy relating to the constitution of the Bank of Canada, which is the chief instrument through which this parliament exercises its control over monetary policy in the country. The government is of opinion, after watching developments during the past two years, that it is highly undesirable and very much against the national interest that there should be continued political controversy with respect to the constitution of the bank itself. It is for that reason that, in addition to maintaining the control which the government now has through a substantial majority on the board of directors, the government should acquire the whole of the ownership of the shares of the bank. This has been suggested on more than one occasion by members on all sides of the house, and the government hopes that it will dispose once and for all of political discussion relating to the constitution of the bank itself.

There is, of course, no intention nor any hope that it will dispose of political discussion regarding the use which shall be made from time to time of this instrument of national control of monetary policy. I should say in this regard, however, that it is not the intention of the government by the introduction of this measure to make the Bank of Canada merely a department of government. If the central bank of a country is to serve the high purpose for which it is created, it must be manned by men who not only are expert in monetary, economic and financial matters, but also have a sufficient independence of judgment to be able at all times to talk on equal terms to the government of the day with respect to the matters which come under the jurisdiction of the bank in the ordinary course of business. It is not the intention that by this resolution the Bank of Canada should become in any way a political arm of government. That, indeed, would be fatal to the successful operation of the control of monetary policy and credit in this country.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that is all I can say at the moment, not having before me my material with respect to the matter, as to the intention of the government from the standpoint of policy in introducing this change.

As the Prime Minister announced some weeks ago, the price to be paid for the shares is the average price at which sales have been effected of the shares of the bank from the first of January this year to the date when be made the announcement in this house as to the policy of the government. The bill itself will deal with the details of the transfer, and I think that is all that I need say at this stage in order to secure the introduction of the bill.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have been listening to what the minister has said, and I am in hearty sympathy with the purpose of the resolution, but I find it difficult to understand what has occurred in the last twelve months that has led this government to make this almost complete change in a policy which was adopted no doubt after careful deliberation. Can the minister give us further information on that point?

Mr. DUNNING: I do not think I can go further than I have gone. It was quite evident to the government during the last two years that the constitution of the bank was becoming and would likely continue to be a matter of political controversy. Doubt has been and is being cast upon the control of the bank by the government through a majority of the board of directors. This doubt it is proposed to remove altogether by purchasing the privately owned stock entirely, so that the people of Canada may know beyond peradventure that the whole of their national central bank is owned by the government of Canada. That is the object. I believe it to be distinctly to the national advantage that there should not be continual political discussion regarding the constitution of the bank, but that discussion should be confined to the manner in which parliament decides that control shall be exercised through the instrument which we have in the central bank. I cannot add to that.

Mr. BENNETT: I fancy that in the records of our parliament in recent years one would find it much more difficult to reconcile the speeches of the Minister of Finance in 1936 with this resolution than to find consistency on almost anything else with which we have had to deal. The only method by which we could make this a properly controlled bank was to have it controlled through the directorate, and the only means whereby that could be effected was to secure a larger number of directors than those originally suggested in the resolution. That was only a short time ago, and I venture to say that there has been less discussion publicly of the Bank of Canada in the last eighteen months than at any other time in its history. In the last twelve months there has been practically none at all. During 1935 there was a great deal of discussion on this subject initiated to a considerable extent by those now on the treasury benches, but in recent months there has been very little discussion about it. The public generally accepted the statement of the Minister of Finance that the method adopted, namely, of creating $5,100,000 worth of new stock and issuing it to the government was the most effective way to secure control.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend himself discussed it only this session on the address.

Mr. BENNETT: I certainly did.

Mr. DUNNING: The constitution of the bank.

Mr. BENNETT: No. As regards the question of the constitution of the bank, I pointed out that to increase the capital stock to $10,000,000 was wholly unnecessary, and this proves the soundness of that contention.

Mr. DUNNING: The right hon. gentleman went further than that.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, for reasons that are quite apparent. But there was no statement of policy indicated by any member of the government until very recently, and to say that the discussions which took place in the public press, which were limited in number, and otherwise, during this period, have brought about this result is certainly very strange and is not the cause which contributed to the change on the part of the administration. I can put it that way, at any rate.

There are those who favour the principles that have been enunciated so strongly by many members in this house, some of them supporting the government, and some opposed to it. There have been many expressions of opinion to the effect that this is the first step towards the accomplishment of the purpose they have in mind, and that it is only a matter of time now until the next step is taken. I do not think there is any doubt about that being the general view of many of those members, that the next step is that we shall have the issue of large sums of money, currency, supported adequately, of course, by the gold reserve on the basis of twenty-five per cent; because the gold reserve of the country would warrant a much larger issue of paper money than is now outstanding. The view is that it is proposed at a not distant date to utilize the machinery of the gold reserve for that purpose.

It was only a few short months ago that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) made statements of that kind and sought public support on that ground. The hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) very strongly urged that, and the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) put forward his views with singular clearness and vigour. These, of course, in the budget speech of the Minister of Finance met with a good deal of criticism. In fact, his characterization of the condition of mind of those who made any of these proposals brought, I observed, a blush to the face of the Minister of National Defence, his colleague, who sat behind him; for it was clear that to class that hon. gentleman in the category which was described by the Minister of Finance was a very cruel thing indeed, when one considers the value that was attached to the views of the Minister of National Defence in the days when those views were being put forward from place to place in this dominion.

I cannot think that the explanation given is adequate, and while I would not for a moment doubt that some explanation had to be made, it is difficult to think that one of the astuteness of the Minister of Finance would put forward this measure in 1938 as an adequate reason for doing something which in 1936 he was urged to do but would not do. I am bound to say that I should like to reserve discussion until we see the bill—some sections of it at any rate—and in view of the fact that the minister has not his papers with him, I shall not now discuss in detail matters which would necessitate his reference to them. I have had inquiries made, however, with respect to prices, at least on the Toronto stock exchange. So far as I can find, the highest price ever paid for Bank of Canada shares for less than board lots was $60. The lowest price was $53.

Mr. DUNNING: Not since the beginning of this year.

Mr. BENNETT: Since the beginning of this year I can find no trace of a board lot sale, which is ten shares, selling for $59.20. But doubtless the minister will be satisfied on that point. I did have a check made with respect to sales, because I thought the price was a little high. There was a sale of fifty shares at $59.50 on May 2 last. It is the only sale of a board lot that I can see this year for $59.50.

Mr. DUNNING: Sales are very few.

Mr. BENNETT: I agree that sales are very few, and sales in board lots of ten shares are fewer still. But there were sales of twenty-five shares, of 143 shares, and of forty-six shares on three several days in 1936. This year there was a sale of twenty in April, fifty in May, 113 on one day in June, and sales of twenty-three, sixteen, fifty, twenty-six, sixty-seven and eighty, and the prices at which they sold were all the way from $54 to $59.50. The odd lot prices were a little higher, because that meant less than ten share lots.

Mr. DUNNING: Perhaps my right hon. friend will permit me to say that the instructions I gave for arriving at a price were to take all the actual sales both in Montreal and in Toronto and average the prices paid between January 1 and the date on which the Prime Minister made the announcement. That calculation was made. Of course I rely on my officers.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes; it is only a question of arithmetic.

Mr. DUNNING: Of arithmetic and facts. I think they have secured all the information, and I shall have it here when the bill is presented.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not going to discuss at greater length the inconsistencies that are apparent. I pointed out in 1935, before the bank was in operation, the reasons that induced me—I suppose most hon. members think improperly—to come to the conclusion that to establish the bank in the manner now provided would lend itself to such a claim for patronage that it would be impossible to make it function as I believed it should. And the idea was abandoned. Then the government added $5,100,000 worth of shares, which gave the government effective control. There will have to be amendments made to the act, it is clear; for the board of directors must vanish; there will no longer be any board because there will be no shareholders.

Mr. DUNNING: There may be directors without shareholders.

Mr. BENNETT: There can be directors named by the government, but without interest in the bank. The Bank of England is not that type of bank; any hon. member of this house can buy shares in the Bank of England. My recollection is they only pay an eight per cent dividend, and of course the yield is much less. But if there are directors hereafter of the Bank of Canada, they must be appointed merely by a political administration, not elected by the people. Obviously, should a government led by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) take office, without further difficulty he would be able at once to give expression to his views as to the conduct of the bank, whereas, as matters now stand, he would at least have to obtain the sanction of parliament to enable him to do so. With this legislation what I suggest would be possible; the minister shakes his head, but a few moments ago he said that this is the supreme credit determining factor in the life of this country. If that is so, then all that is necessary to do is to change the administration, have a government that desires to give effect to the views which have been so frequently expressed in this house, and you will have your Bank of Canada functioning as has been suggested.

Mr. DUNNING: My right hon. friend said, without consulting parliament.

Mr. BENNETT: Without further consultation of parliament.

Mr. DUNNING: If my right hon. friend will await the bill, he will see that what he suggests is not quite correct.

Mr. BENNETT: But the minister said in his opening speech that this is the organ of government—without being a department of government—that determines credit. If that is so as it stands to-day, and we now substitute directors named by order in council, an order in council can also behead and send them to the wilderness. It then becomes a political bank, which is the one thing one did endeavour to prevent. I am bound to say I appreciate the point of this bank being publicly owned. There was nothing said this afternoon or at any other time which was not presented to us; some of my colleagues at that time held very strong opinions, the matter was canvassed from every angle to try to arrive at a reasonable and fair understanding of the whole problem. The experience of other countries with central banks, some privately owned, some half owned by the public, some with a majority owned by the nation and some wholly owned by the public, as, for example, the Bank of England, was examined. After mature consideration, having regard to the pressure which was everywhere apparent, the conclusion that I have indicated was arrived at.

I have no view one way or the other as far as the general principle is concerned. I approached the problem of the creation of a central bank as a bank in which the stock would be owned by the nation; I abandoned it for reasons which I found it difficult to agree to in my own mind but from which I saw no escape, and ultimately my colleagues and I all agreed that this was the only way to prevent it from becoming a political bank. The history of some European countries with a publicly owned institution has been most distressing. I would hesitate to think that history could ever be repeated in this country. But stripped of everything, this bank now becomes a political bank; the directors are named by the government of the day. From that standpoint it is purely political.

Mr. EULER: Is that not the case now? The government name the majority.

Mr. BENNETT: They name the majority, as the minister has said, but it will be recalled that up to the present the public have had the power to elect some of the board.

Mr. EULER: Only a minority.

Mr. BENNETT: Even though it be a minority, that is the voice of the public. That was the argument presented, from which I found it difficult to get away. The power to create is the power to destroy. The power to appoint is the power to dismiss. Under different circumstances, with the hon. member for Lethbridge in control, you would have an order in council passed dismissing the directors and substituting another board.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. EULER: But he could do it now, under the present constitution of the bank.

Mr. BENNETT: But there are limitations that protect the situation to a great extent. There is a political power subject to the influence of the minority directors. Now there is to be no minority. I am merely presenting that point to the committee; I am not urging one way or the other, except to point out the effect it had on my mind. I am bound to say the effect is less powerful considering that the bank is already established. It was far more difficult when an endeavour was being made to establish the bank.

Mr. EULER: I think my right hon. friend in a speech from the throne rather intimated that he had changed his mind with regard to the matters that moved him not to have a publicly owned bank in the first place.

Mr. BENNETT: No; what I said was that I had been in favour of a publicly owned bank and had given the reasons. My mind had been unable to follow that conviction. Then I pointed out the question of capital. It is there in the record to be read.

Mr. DUNNING: I cannot find it. I understood my right hon. friend to say he had it in mind to change the situation when the bank was established.

Mr. BENNETT: No, not quite that. What I endeavoured to say was that I was not wedded to the opposite idea. I said it in this chamber and said it publicly. I said it when the bill was introduced, and I gave the reasons why we took the steps we did. I say still that is exactly the state of mind I was in at the time, and those are the reasons why the steps that were taken were taken.

But the government having decided to do this, naturally a great deal depends on the bill itself. The minister has said, quite correctly, that if this is to become a department of government, the usefulness of the Bank of Canada is largely gone. On the other hand, if it is to be an arm of government, its value still remains. There is a very great difference between being an arm of government and merely a department of government, and the distinction between the two will determine the value of this institution. Frankly I was amazed when the statement was made by the Prime Minister; for I think it has been generally considered that the bank has functioned fairly well; there has been an acceptance of it by the public generally as being useful, and to no inconsiderable extent it has justified the expectations of its friends. In one matter it undoubtedly had a great advantage over most such institutions, because it assumed the entire responsibility for our note issue.

Having assumed responsibility for our note issue, it always had in its exchequer three per cent on the outstanding note liability when it was taken over, and that gave it a revenue which enabled it, of course, to have a profit at once. That is the position, and that liability with respect to the note issue, transferred from the country to the bank, was made the subject matter of considerable criticism, because after that it took over the gold reserve, and thus it was said that a private institution had control of the gold reserve. That was remedied two years ago, and if the Minister of Finance will read his speech of that time he will see that he endeavoured to make me, and I think other members of the house, believe that this was the best possible method to effect the best and highest possible purpose in the best possible world.

Mr. DUNNING: I believed so then and I believe so still; but I believe it is much more important that the national bank should have general national acceptance than that my opinion should be sustained.

Mr. BENNETT: If the hon. gentleman believes it still, we have the amazing spectacle of his asking us to accept something which he himself thinks is second only to that which he did two years ago.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Is my right hon. friend reading his own speeches of yesteryear?

Mr. BENNETT: Frequently; and I rejoice in their consistency. What delights me most—and I must say the delight is very great—is to listen to hon. gentlemen opposite making the speeches which I made some years ago in answer to the speeches which they then made. It is always delightful to think they should do so, and I realize that the cumulative effect of experience, time and responsibility has brought about such admiration for those speeches, which used to be referred to in such terms of condemnation.

That is all I desire to say with respect to this matter at the moment, because I am going to deal with the question when the bill is before us. Obviously it must contain terms dealing with the question of the directorate and allied matters; for unless it does we shall have provision for the election of directors by shareholders that are no longer existent, because there is to be but one shareholder now, the Minister of Finance. I notice that the resolution does not deal with that; obviously there is no necessity for it, but it does not deal with the consequential amendments that will be necessary. It provides for the redemption of the shares, but it does not provide for the amendment of the act. I read into the resolution, however, that necessarily the bill will provide for amendments, it being unnecessary in the resolution to deal with other than the financial side of it.

Mr. DUNNING: With respect to my remark of a few moments ago I desire just to say that personally I hold the view that what was done here two years ago represents the best form of control of a national bank. I say that still. I am somewhat in the same position as my right hon. friend, who earlier this session said he found that he had to set up the bank in the way he did in order to prevent the evils of party patronage from entering into the constitution and staffing of the original organization. That is what I understood him to say.

Mr. BENNETT: I said patronage; I said it before the banking and commerce committee, when the bill was being considered.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes. Earlier this session the right hon. gentleman went on to say—and if I misinterpret him I know he will correct me, since I have not the exact words before me—he had in mind changing that once the bank was established.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, no; not quite that.

Mr. DUNNING: What was said, of course, can be looked up; it was a lengthy debate, and as yet I have not found it. My point is this, however, that to my mind it is more important that the people of Canada should be agreed that they have a national bank; much more important that they should cease controversy regarding its constitution, than it is that my beliefs as to the best constitution of a bank should be sustained. The government is hoping by this legislation to quiet any discussion or any divergence of view regarding the constitution of the bank and to confine discussion to what shall be done with the instrument, and I entirely approve what the right hon. gentleman has said with regard to the bank being an arm of government but not a department of government. It is of the greatest importance that the men who are operating this arm of government should be in the highest degree independent in the exercise of their judgment in the job of work they have to do. The general broad policy of the bank of course must be in harmony with the desires of a majority of this parliament. If it is not, then the government of the day, with the aid of its majority, can come to parliament and propose and carry through such changes in the legislation as, in the view of the majority, may be desirable at the time; and to that extent what my right hon. friend said with respect to a government led by the hon. member for Lethbridge of course would be true. One would expect that if the people of Canada sent to this parliament a majority of members who believed in the theories of the hon. member for Lethbridge and his followers, that majority would so amend this legislation as to bring it into line with those theories. That is democracy.

The machinery which this bill proposes to set up does not make rapid transition easy, it is true, because in the bill we are providing that the directors are to be appointed for a period of, speaking from memory, three years; but there would be nothing to prevent a government possessing a majority in this parliament from coming to parliament and amending even that provision of the law. There is no doubt about it; by this action, and indeed by the action we took in 1936, we do take the very great responsibility of initiating, as an arm of government, a national institution for the control of credit and currency under aegis of this parliament. We did that in 1936, and this does not change the fact in the slightest degree. It does endeavour to quiet controversy as to whether or not that was effectively done in 1936. I am of opinion that it was. Personally I believe it was done in a better way than the method provided by this bill; but I do believe it is much more desirable that my fellow countrymen should be satisfied with the constitution of a national bank than it is that my particular ideas should prevail as to the manner in which national control should be made effective.

That is why, as clearly as I can express it, I am explaining the introduction of the resolution now before the committee. I have no apologies to make, because I believe that by the control of currency and credit through this arm of government we are assuming a responsibility in this parliament in connection with which we must build up a tradition of non-partisan administration. My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition expressed his fears in regard to partisanship entering into appointments by a bank which was controlled by the government. Of course that danger exists, and it can be obviated only by high-minded men in the seat of government refusing to permit that to be done. For my part I say here in this house what I have said to scores of correspondents who have written me with respect to positions in the Bank of Canada: "I have nothing whatever to do with appointments to the Bank of Canada. Under the law the management is responsible for such appointments. Communicate with the proper officials of the bank in the same manner that you would with respect to obtaining a position in any other business institution." There is nothing to compel a Minister of Finance to do that; but I am endeavouring, as I believe my right hon. friend was sincerely endeavouring, to follow that line in relation to the bank. The only hope we can have is that men will continue to follow it until such a tradition of non-interference in matters of that kind is built up that it will be difficult for anybody to break it, a tradition which in fact would enable a management of the bank properly to repudiate such interference, and successfully appeal to this parliament against it. That is all we can hope for along that line. I can only give the personal pledge that, so far as I am concerned, there will be absolutely no interference of that kind.

[Mr. Dunning.]

Mr. McGEER: May I say as a member of that proud group classed as monetary reformers, that we welcome the concession made by the Minister of Finance to-night in conceding that in money matters even the Minister of Finance, the Bank of Canada and the government of the nation should bow to the will of the people. I am amused at the concern expressed by the leader of the opposition as to whether or not the establishment of complete public ownership is going to make the Bank of Canada an effective arm of government. That was an issue I thought was very clearly and definitely settled during the campaign of 1935.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not think this was going to make it an effective arm of government.

Mr. McGEER: I understood the right hon. gentleman to say that he was afraid it might make it that.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the hon. member's hearing is better than that.

Mr. McGEER: I must confess that I did not hear the right hon. gentleman very well, although on several occasions I asked him to speak up. Certainly I have no desire to misquote him.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. I said I hoped the effect of the legislation would be to make the bank an arm of government, and I agreed with what the minister had said and hoped that it would not become a department of government.

Mr. McGEER: To guarantee that the bank would have no chance of becoming a department of government, in 1934 the present leader of the opposition enacted the Bank of Canada Act which established the bank as a purely private institution, free from the control of the government. And the issue which came up during the discussion of the Bank of Canada measure made very clear the distinction between the Conservative and Liberal policies on that all-Canadian public matter.

For instance, at that time the Hon. J. L. Ralston was Liberal financial critic, and in dealing with that very point he said:

> The control of credit and currency is the biggest and most important public utility in the activities of the nation. There are certain things which should be under public ownership or public control, and the first and most important of these is the institution, the Bank of Canada, which controls, which guides and which directs the whole economic life of the nation.

There was no question as to the stand of the Hon. Mr. Ralston on that occasion. It was in direct conflict with the policy of private ownership which the government of that day had established. The then leader of the opposition, the Prime Minister of to-day (Mr. Mackenzie King) supported that conclusion with these statements:

> Once a nation parts with its currency and credit, it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury once in control will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government, and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of the sovereignty of parliament is idle and futile.

These declarations by the Hon. Mr. Ralston and the then right hon. the leader of the opposition were, first, that the control of currency and credit should be recognized as a public utility service, under the direct control of the government and, second, that it was a duty of the government, not a duty of private monopoly, to control the issue of currency and credit to be issued in terms of public need, not of private gain.

I am satisfied that this is a step towards the fulfilment of those promises, which were the promises upon which some of us won our elections, and which indicated that the policy of the Liberal party was that if returned to office it would establish our parliament as a Canadian democratic institution which would be superior to the private money system.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGEER: I am glad to hear the leader of the opposition say "Hear, hear."

Mr. BENNETT: I did not say that. It was said by the Minister of Finance. He is somewhat more Tory than I, so I think it is quite all right.

Mr. McGEER: I am free to confess that for a little time that was so. And I never dreamed it would be my misfortune to sit in a Canadian House of Commons and see the leader of the opposition, a Conservative, more Liberal than some of the Liberals who were sitting on the treasury benches.

Mr. DUNNING: You haven't yet.

Mr. McGEER: But this action on the part of the minister leads me to believe that he is beginning to see the light, and that democracy, if it is to rule, must be superior to the private money system.

Mr. DUNNING: I always said so. The hon. member could not quote a word of mine to the contrary effect said anywhere at any time.

Mr. McGEER: What I want to say to the Minister of Finance is this, that the other day when I heard him deal with monetary reform I was wondering if he had in mind some of the statements made by the present Prime Minister, the head of the Liberal party, in the house in 1933 and 1934.

Mr. BENNETT: It was his colleague, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie).

Mr. McGEER: Does he remember what the Minister of National Defence had declared, as a financial reformer, in the Vancouver campaign during the election of 1935? The Minister of Finance was not in the house when that great debate took place. So far as I know, he was not in the heat of the campaign of 1935. Possibly monetary reform has not become an issue down in Prince Edward Island, the little province by the sea, which he represents in the house, and which is a long way away from the rigid, virile and active reformer group which first sent him to Ottawa.

I would say to the Minister of Finance that the great issue is this: Is the question of the control of the issue of currency and finance going to be advanced by this extensive use of Canadian moneys which are going to be used to purchase back at a profit a part of the concession which was made to the private money system by the Conservative government in 1934?

Later on, on the second reading of the bill I hope to expose the details of the concession as the most iniquitous concession passed or approved by a Canadian parliament since confederation. I am quite aware of the declaration that the Bank of Canada has control over the issue of currency and credit, and I shall deal with that issue to-night. To make the matter clear, I wish to make the statement, first, and then prove it, that under the present practice neither the government of Canada nor the Bank of Canada exercises a single bit of control over the volume or currency or credit that is placed in circulation by the country through the chartered banks, who are the only ones that can put currency and credit into circulation.

To deal with that subject, I want first to take some statements made to the house by the Minister of Finance, which are in accord with the public statements made by the governor of the Bank of Canada to the people of Canada. The address of March 8, delivered by the present Minister of Finance, is now in circulation as an address on monetary policy. At page 1 of that pamphlet his words are as follows:

> Parliament has set up an institution, now controlled by the government, charged with the specific duty of regulating the volume of currency and credit in the best interests of the economic life of the nation.

That is a broad statement. It indicates that through the Bank of Canada we are serving the economic life of the nation by controlling and regulating the issue of currency.

Again on page 4 that declaration is amplified by this statement:

> Recognizing that the regulation of the country's credit and currency was so vital a sovereign function that it could not be left in the control of a private institution, this government in 1936 amended the Bank of Canada Act to give the dominion government effective control over the bank by majority ownership of the capital stock and majority control of the board of directors.

Effective control over the Bank of Canada does not necessarily mean effective control over the chartered banks, which are responsible for the issue of currency and credit.

Mr. BENNETT: They are not solely responsible for currency.

Mr. McGEER: No, but the thing that we issue to-day as a medium of exchange for both government and people is not Bank of Canada bills for out-of-pocket transactions, but as the leader of the opposition knows, bank deposits, controlled by cheques. That is what our banks are using to-day to purchase government interest-bearing bonds, and I want to deal with that a little later.

At the end of that statement the right hon. leader of the opposition is quoted as stating, "No wonder you laugh," and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) replied, "I cheer." I am quite satisfied of this, that there are many of us on this side of the house and elsewhere throughout the dominion who would gladly swell the chorus of cheers of the Minister of Justice if we believed, as he believes, that through the machinery presently existing, the Bank of Canada, we were in control of the currency and credit of the nation. But I for one do not see any reason to cheer yet, even with the complete ownership of all the stock of the Bank of Canada, although I think that is a step in the right direction. I want to give my reasons for that, and I hope my remarks will not be taken in a sense other than that I wish to contribute to the fulfilment of the great promises which were made to the people of Canada by the Liberal party, upon which I believe they were elected, and through which I believe we can find a way to make a better, greater, bigger and happier Dominion of Canada.

In showing how the alleged public control of currency and credit is operated in the best interests of the economic life of the nation, the Minister of Finance gave this considered explanation:

> The Bank of Canada exercises its control over the chartered banks by operating on the cash reserves of the banking system, either by conducting so-called open market operations or by altering its rediscount rate, or by both.

And then he added:

> These are the major weapons which the central bank may use in carrying out its primary function of controlling the volume of credit and currency in use in the country.

Those are the two major weapons, and I propose to bring to the attention of the committee that neither one of those weapons is available as a medium of the exercise of one bit of power either by government or by the Bank of Canada.

During the course of his address the following interesting exchange took place between the Minister of Finance and the right hon. leader of the opposition:

> Mr. Dunning: The second well known mechanism by which the central bank exercises control is the deliberate raising or lowering of its rediscount rate. High rates, of course, tend to contract business enterprise, and low rates tend towards expansion.
>
> Mr. Bennett: But there are no rediscounts in Canada.
> Mr. Dunning: The rediscount rate is in effect; I shall come to that in a moment.

But the Minister of Finance never did deal in that address with the issue which the leader of the opposition raised, namely, that although we have a rediscount rate there are no rediscounts in Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: There was only one since we were established as a bank.

Mr. McGEER: The right hon. gentleman knows just as well as I do that the rediscount rate went out when England set up a managed currency system, and that was all abandoned.

We are told in this house that it is one of the major weapons through which we have fulfilled the promises that were made by our governments in 1935, and upon which we were elected, to create a new condition for the circulation of currency and credit to serve the economic life of this nation. I wonder if the Prime Minister, the members of the government and the members of this house are aware that our chartered banks are not borrowers and do not borrow legal tender cash from the Bank of Canada. Consequently the rate of interest fixed by the bank, that is the rediscount rate, has no bearing on the credit policy of our Canadian chartered banks. The reason why our chartered banks do not borrow Bank of Canada bills is that the Bank of Canada by purchasing gold and other securities has supplied the chartered banks with more Bank of Canada bills free of any interest charge or other charge whatever than they need to hold as legal reserves to support the bank deposits they have on issue. As a matter of fact, under section 59, subsection 4 of our Bank Act, our chartered banks are now privileged to take a five dollar Bank of Canada bill and to exchange on the security of that five dollars, $100 of bank deposits written into the bank's books by a mere stroke of the pen, for either a one hundred dollar treasury bill or a one hundred dollar interest-bearing bond. That was the concession which was made to the chartered banks by the government of 1934, and they are not missing the opportunity; for to-day they hold $1,155,000,000 of such securities, an increase of $471,000,000 since that great concession was made when the Bank Act was amended to reduce gold reserves to twenty-five per cent and to reduce cash reserves to five per cent. To-day the chartered banks of Canada—

Mr. DUNNING: Would my hon. friend please distinguish between the chartered banks and the national bank?

Mr. McGEER: I say the chartered banks hold legal tender currency, which they own outright, for which they pay nothing, which they have secured freer than they used to secure the right to print their own currency, because the cost of printing them is now borne by the Bank of Canada, to a total, according to the May report of the Bank of Canada, of $247,000,000, $199,000,000 of which is on deposit with the bank and the balance is held in the bankers' tills. That is over and above the $102,000,000 which the Bank of Canada has on issue and in circulation with the public. What does that mean? Without borrowing a single dollar from the Bank of Canada, the chartered banks can secure $2,800,000,000 of bank deposits, and with their surplus reserves, which are to-day idle and unemployed, they can increase those bank deposits to $4,800,000,000. How preposterous then to say that the bank rate policy, which includes a change in the rediscount rate, is one of the major weapons by which we control, through the Bank of Canada, the issue of currency and credit in this nation, when that part of the bank rate policy has no operation upon the existing deposits or upon the $2,000,000,000 of deposits which our chartered banks may use! I want to say this: I cannot blame the Minister of Finance for that technical explanation, but I am satisfied that somebody in his department was responsible for it.

Mr. DUNNING: Will my hon. friend permit one question?

Mr. McGEER: Yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Under the existing conditions, whether in this country or in the United States or in Great Britain, how does he propose to make any rediscount rate effective? The other weapon is the one which is and must be used under existing conditions, in all countries. I regret that I did not follow up the interruption on that occasion made by the leader of the opposition. I intended to say then just what I am saying now, that the conditions which create that tremendous volume of available credit in all three of these great countries have for the time being rendered any rediscount rate an ineffective weapon, and the other weapon is the one which is used by all three systems of central banking.

Mr. McGEER: I should like to deal with that phase, because that is quite true, but the explanation is very superficial which comes in the form of a question to me. I am not dealing with how this thing should be done; I am dealing with the statement made to the house that this was one of the major weapons by which it is being done now in Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: No; I did not say that.

Mr. McGEER: Well, of course I cannot afford a disagreement, but the speech on the address of the Minister of Finance is on record.

Mr. DUNNING: Yes.

Mr. McGEER: And while I may be wrong, I am free to confess that was the honest interpretation which I took out of that statement. I understood it was made to the house to indicate to all hon. members that there was effective control over the currency and credit issue at this time in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. DUNNING: I believe there is.

Mr. McGEER: Well then, it cannot be through the bank rate. It must be, then, through the other major weapon, open market operations.

Mr. DUNNING: That is it.

Mr. McGEER: The Minister of Finance agrees to that proposition. Now I want to show the committee that the open market operation is even more innocuous and less a factor in the control over currency and credit issue than is the bank rate policy. Let me point out that the Bank of Canada has issued through the open market operation, that is in the open purchase of gold and other securities, a sufficient amount of Bank of Canada bills to give the chartered banks $103,000,000 outright, which they own outright in excess of the reserves required for the bank deposits they have on record. The Minister of Finance went on to deal with that. But before I proceed to deal with the open market operation, I want to draw the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that one of the results of the open market operation has been to give the chartered banks, free of charge, a sufficient amount of Bank of Canada cash to release them from the controlling influence of any change in the rediscount rate by the Bank of Canada. The result of this is that one of the major weapons which the Bank of Canada employs, according to the statement of the Minister of Finance, namely the change in the rediscount rate, to regulate the volume of currency and credit in use in the country, is destroyed by one branch of the open market operation, namely the purchasing of securities on the open market with Bank of Canada bills.

If the rediscount picture is out of the picture, let us deal with this open market operation. Let us for the purpose of practical illustration assume that the Bank of Canada went into the market and bought $10,000,000 worth of securities and that the $10,000,000 were put into circulation as we were told by the Minister of Finance, though unfortunately, no matter from whom the purchase is made, the money would find its way into the chartered banks' tills. What would the chartered banks do with that $10,000,000? Would they, as he suggests, increase their bank deposits by making new purchases and new loans to the value of $100,000,000? They would not do any such thing. They would do exactly what they are doing now; they would increase their reserves of $103,000,000 by $10,000,000, and the amount of currency and credit in circulation in the country would not be affected by a single dollar. Of course my hon. friend says, "Oh, but the banks would be very foolish to have $10,000,000 of Bank of Canada bills that they could use as reserves of bank deposits of ten times that amount, without using them." But what I want to point out to this committee is that they are already doing that very thing, according to the May report, with $103,000,000. To talk about controlling the issue of currency and credit, in the face of that fact, by either the rediscount rate or the purchase of securities, is to state something that the facts of the Bank of Canada report disclose is contrary to actual banking practice in the Dominion of Canada to-day.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, that is awful.

Mr. McGEER: My hon. friend shakes his head. Well, I may be wrong.

Mr. DUNNING: I gave figures.

Mr. McGEER: But what I am placing before the committee is an argument based on facts, not on theories.

Mr. DUNNING: I gave figures of the expansion.

Mr. McGEER: Oh, yes, but that did not have anything to do with expansion, surplus Bank of Canada reserves.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, yes, it did.

Mr. McGEER: What I say is this, that to-day the Bank of Canada has idle, unemployed and being hoarded on deposit with the Bank of Canada, $103,000,000. Yet we are told that another issue of $10,000,000 will affect the volume of currency and credit not available for loans but in circulation serving the economic life of the nation. It cannot serve it while it is being hoarded by our chartered banks.

Mr. DUNNING: They get no interest, you know.

Mr. McGEER: They do not even pay for the printing of the bills. Yet my hon. friend says that they do not pay any interest. I have been a little suspicious that we as a Liberal party and as a nation have been suffering from the very monetary policy which the people of Canada overwhelmingly repudiated in 1935. The rediscount rate is out; the open market operation by buying is out; let us see what would happen if—did the minister speak?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman has certainly disposed of it. He says it is out.

Mr. McGEER: I never hope to convince the Minister of National Revenue, but I am submitting that the facts I have offered to the committee should, to one of ordinary intelligence, indicate that they are valid. It may be that this is not the idea of the Minister of National Revenue, and he has just as much right to his opinions as I have to mine. But I want to say to him, with due deference to his present position of authority, that I have given this problem a great many more hours of thought and study than he has given it.

Let me now deal with the other factor. We are told that if the Bank of Canada went on the market to sell securities—what would happen? The assumption is that the Bank of Canada, by selling securities, would have payments for them in its own legal tender cash, namely Bank of Canada bills. Therefore there would be withdrawn from circulation, first, the Bank of Canada reserves that are in excess of reserves legally required to support existing deposits amounting to $103,000,000. But what would be the result if the Bank of Canada continued to sell securities after those reserves were exhausted? Then the Bank of Canada would have to take from the chartered banks the amounts required legally to sustain existing bank deposits. That would compel the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks to withdraw loans now in circulation. What would be the result of that? It would be disastrously to precipitate the present recession into a major depression. If I am right on the figures as I have interpreted them, which I have taken from the Bank of Canada report, this elaborate control that the Minister of Finance so clearly outlined to us means nothing under the rediscount rate, means nothing under the sale of securities, and only means that there is left to the Bank of Canada power to precipitate a disastrous and appalling, not recession, but depression of the worst kind.

Mr. DUNNING: To control overexpansion, the power is there.

Mr. McGEER: Well, I cannot agree with that, because I suggest that the facts do not support it. You could withdraw, of course; there is no doubt about that. One of the great lessons in monetary reform, which the Macmillan committee taught the British parliament and upon which the British parliament has acted, was that the rediscount rate, the bank rate policy, was only effective in precipitating a depression and not effective in restoring prosperity or maintaining stability. What has been abandoned in England since the British Empire currency policy of 1933 was adopted—and we adopted it in this house—the rediscount rate and the open market policy, is recognized as being a minor, inferior and ineffective method of control; and direct control by the government is recognized as the only policy available. It is quite true that they have not taken over the Bank of England, quite true that they have not taken over the chartered banks. But I listened to the present Prime Minister of England and to the governor of the Bank of England, and I heard the governor of the Bank of England declare:

> We are glad as bankers, and I speak for the Bank of England and for the bankers of England, for the measure of freedom which we enjoy in this country. We shall exercise that freedom in the only proper way that we can, and that is in support of the government; and if the government through the proper channels will make known to us its policies and what they wish us to do in augmenting those policies, we will in good will and loyalty comply with those requests, as though we were compelled so to do.

There is not a policy of legal domination; but I am satisfied that if the banks of England failed to cooperate with the government in the prosecution of its policies, nationalization would follow without delay, because I am sure that to-day in England neither the House of Commons nor—whatever may have been its constitution in the past—the House of Lords is controlled by the gold mongers and debt dealers of Lombard street. They have made the monetary system in England the servant of the British government and the British people, and the bankers in acquiescing are now finding that government directed policy and a new reconstructive program, with cooperation between the banks and the government, are infinitely better, even for the banks, than the more restricted policy of their own design.

The Macmillan report, if it is read correctly, was a major report looking to international trade recovery through international cooperation. But if international recovery and cooperation did not come, then it looked to government spending and government control, with a managed currency system. They said that it was not possible or indeed practical to regard our monetary system as an automatic system grinding out the right result by the operation of some well-worn rules of thumb. We were told by the Minister of Finance that the major weapons of the central bank to control the volume of credit and currency in the country are the rediscount rate and the open market operations. Well, the automatic system, whereby the chartered banks were supposed to create and issue, and circulate or withdraw bank deposit money according to changes in the volume of Bank of Canada bills issued, was abandoned. They found it would not work, and the automatic system gave way to what is now recognized—the Minister of Finance himself admitted it—as a managed paper standard in which the value of the currency is not maintained and stabilized by convertibility into gold but is maintained by management on a basis of supplying the demand which the progress of the nation asserts.

Mr. DUNNING: Which is exactly what we are doing to-day.

Mr. McGEER: Then why is this nation embarrassed for want of money in every department of government?

Mr. DUNNING: It is not.

Mr. McGEER: Yes, in the provincial governments and municipalities as well. Why have a confiscatory taxation system? Why can we not build highways to serve the tourist trade? Why can we not get on with the rehabilitation of the railways? "No money" is the cry everywhere.

Mr. DUNNING: My hon. friend quotes England. Will he tell us what England is doing with respect to that matter? He quotes England one minute and then comes back to me.

Mr. McGEER: Let me tell the Minister of Finance this. During the last five years England has spent $5,000,000,000 on battleships and guns, and in addition to that huge expenditure she carries her line of communication from the heart of the empire down through the Atlantic, past Gibraltar, through the Mediterranean into Palestine and Egypt and into almost every part of Europe, on through the Red sea and across India to her great base at Singapore and on to Australia and New Zealand.

Mr. DUNNING: That is not answering my question.

Mr. McGEER: She is carrying that load of responsibility and carrying it successfully. Well, then, let me ask the Minister of Finance this question: If England can invest $5,000,000,000 in battleships and guns which can never return a dollar of profit, why cannot we invest a few hundred millions to put unemployed Canadians to work building highways which will return the greatest profit in any department of trade that we can develop? The Minister of Finance says that I quote what England has done. Well, England pays the entire bill for unemployment relief. England pays the entire cost of health insurance and much of the health service.

An hon. MEMBER: By taxation.

[Mr. McGeer.]

Mr. McGEER: Not by taxation. She balanced her budget this year by borrowing over $623,000,000. The situation in England is much different from ours. England must import food; she must import the means of shelter; she must import materials for industry; she must import materials for armaments; she must buy her gold abroad. In Canada we produce all these things, far in excess of our own needs, with an exportable surplus that gave us a favourable balance of trade of $627,000,000 according to the budget speech.

Mr. DUNNING: No, no.

Mr. McGEER: How much was it?

Mr. DUNNING: Balance of payments.

Mr. McGEER: Well, I think that included tourist trade and physical trade and sale of gold, making up $627,000,000. But whether it was balance of payments or balance of trade does not make much difference; it was a gross international trade, gross revenue bigger than our total national expenditure. Yet England, facing an unfavourable trade balance, an unfavourable balance of payments—

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. McGEER: Well very close to it, a very small margin. My figures show that at the present time she is suffering an actual unfavourable balance. If England can do what she is doing under a managed currency system, why cannot we, in our more favourable position, do more than we are doing? The reason I am presenting these facts is in the hope that the government, having the present major weapon, may see its way clear to establish, not the mere ownership of the Bank of Canada, but such public ownership as will make it possible for that bank as an independently controlled arm of government, free as far as possible from partisanship, to be an effective instrument in maintaining effective circulation in the country.

I have said that the management of bank rate policy, that is both bank rate and open market operations, is recognized as obsolete in Great Britain. That was confirmed in the March, 1938, letter of the Royal Bank of Canada, which states:

> The Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, chairman of the Midland bank, pointed out that between 1925 and 1931 there were sixteen changes in the bank rate, but that in the last five and a half years the rate had remained stable at two per cent. Since the rate no longer constitutes the chief instrument of control this comparison may not have great significance. Mr. McKenna added that "Under monetary control bank deposits rose from £1,800,000,000 in 1931 to nearly £2,300,000,000 in 1937." Mr. McKenna also added "A few years ago the very conception of a purely managed currency was something new. In the light of our present knowledge a managed currency can no longer be regarded as a mere temporary makeshift while the gold standard is in abeyance.

Dealing with another phase of the inadequacy of bank rate policy, which includes open market operations, the Macmillan committee report says, in section 221, page 98.

For consider how bank rate policy works out in such a case. Its efficacy depends in the first instance on reducing the profits of business men. When in the effort to minimize this result, output and employment are contracted, it depends on decreasing the amount of business profits and increasing unemployment up to whatever figure is necessary to cause business men either to decrease their costs by additional economies or to insist on, and their workers to accept, a reduction of wages. But public opinion does not easily acquiesce in such a process. And the reduction, if and when effected, will fall unequally and unfairly on those sections of the community who are least protected by contract, least able to defend themselves, and often least able to afford the sacrifice.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. McGEER: The Minister of Finance says, "Hear, hear," but we were told that that was one of the major weapons of control by which we regulate the volume of credit and currency in the country. As I have pointed out, that is the only power you have under your present system of control. I commend that section to hon. members to read for themselves; they ought to be able to read it as well as myself. The section goes on:

Moreover, those who are in charge of our monetary system will, naturally and excusably, be reluctant to carry through so ruthless a policy to its proper conclusion, with the result that we may continue for a long period in a depressed condition with severe losses and severe unemployment and yet with not enough of both to compel by force majeure the necessary readjustments of incomes.

Moreover, once such a condition of depression has become firmly established, a policy of dear money will no longer be necessary to ensure its continuance for it will contain within itself the seed of its own perpetuation.

What was the alternative suggestion as to the control that should be exercised? If hon. members will go through the report, they will find at page 136, section 316, this statement:

The decline of new enterprise has reacted adversely on profit and prices, and the low level of profits and prices stands in the way of new enterprise.

It is for that reason that some of us think that in the domestic field it may be necessary to invoke governmental enterprise to break the vicious circle.

What is the governmental enterprise that has been invoked in England? Expenditure on social services, a great program of aid to housing, a new program of swelling national defences, a vast program of aid in the rehabilitation of industry, and a thousand channels, even including cooperation with the governments of Canada and New Zealand to subsidize a Pacific ocean service; in all these ways, not by one or two things such as a housing program or a little contribution to municipalities, but in a hundred ways the government has taken control of the monetary system and is putting consumers' buying power into circulation not merely in the form of aid to those in need but as a means of sustaining the economic blood stream of industry and commerce of the capitalistic system that the government of England is charged to sustain, as we as a Liberal party are charged to sustain the industry and commerce of a capitalistic Canada. I say to the government and to hon. members that if we fail to fulfil that sovereign obligation of government, we shall have failed our country at a time when England, after years of experience, has shown the way.

I do not want to be critical. I quite appreciate that in a house consisting of 245 members no man can make any contribution who does not command some respect from his fellow members. I do not want to speak as a crank or one who thinks there is efficacy only in more spending of money. I have no faith whatever in the theories of the social credit party, because I am convinced that the operation of that program would do infinitely more social harm than economic good. In 1934 the Liberal party in this house declared that the control, issue and circulation of the currency and credit of this nation were the most conspicuous and sacred responsibility of government, and that in the exercise of that control the government alone could demonstrate that parliament was sovereign. I believe this parliament is taking a great step forward in the economic history of this nation. The ownership of the Bank of Canada is only a step; the establishment of a policy that will fulfil the terms of that ownership is the next step; but there is no retreating from that step once it is taken. This is the first step in the emancipation of Canadian democracy from the slavery of orthodox finance, a system that has given us the experience of seeing every contribution of science to progress stalemated and set back by what? By a constant increase in our mountain of unpayable, interest-bearing debt.

No man in parliament, no government, no responsible authority should ever disdain the experiences of history. I am free to confess that in monetary history there are many pages which indicate that the greatest caution must be exercised in the management of a currency to serve a nation. But we are not starting blindly when we follow the lead of England; and by now, after seven years of depression, with riots in our peaceful cities because men claim, whether rightly or wrongly, that they have a desire to go to work, we should know what we are doing. We have jobs in Nova Scotia crying to be done. Why, the highways down in that province, Mr. Chairman, are not built for the cars we are driving to-day, capable of eighty miles an hour. They are built for the horse and buggy or the model T Ford. We have even worse roads in British Columbia. It does not matter where you go in this dominion; there is no national highway system, and that is one of the things in which you can invest successfully. No method of increasing the volume of international revenue offers greater opportunities than the development of a real highway system in the Dominion of Canada. I wonder if we are not amazed to see the premier of my own province going to Washington in connection with the construction of a highway through to Alaska. What will he get with which to build that highway? He will get printing-press dollars, printed by the United States government, that are not backed by any gold reserve; because neither bank deposits nor the printing press currency of the United States can now be converted into gold in that country.

It is all very well to go back to the old story "Why, that would be inflation." On the second reading of this bill I hope to place before the house the results of the inflation established as a possibility on the part of the chartered banks, but I do commend to the Prime Minister and his government serious and fair consideration of my statement to-night that the major weapons of control, by which we were told the government through the Bank of Canada would regulate the volume of currency and credit in the interests of the economic life of the nation, are not effective; because I am satisfied that the majority of the members of the government will not permit that statement to go unchallenged, if my conclusions, from the facts I have analysed to-night, are justified and correct.

Mr. LANDERYOU: I have listened with a great deal of interest to the splendid address delivered by the hon. gentleman who has just spoken. He states that he has no faith in social credit, but I find it difficult to see any difference between the proposals he has given the committee and the principles enunciated by social credit. With him we ask the government to fulfil their pre-election promises. We believe that the ownership of the Bank of Canada, though a step in the right direction, is not sufficient. We listened to the Minister of Finance tell us that the government had established complete control of the issue of money and credit, and we expected that the policy of the bank would be such that money and credit would be issued in terms of public need.

To give a simple illustration of what I mean by issuing credit in terms of public need, I say to the minister that we can and do produce in Canada hundreds of thousands of gallons of milk, more milk than we can possibly consume in this country. On the other hand, throughout the land there are thousands of little children who, these hot summer days, want an ice-cream cone; but because they have not that little round disc that we call a nickel, that has very little actual money value as far as the metal in it is concerned, they cannot have that cone. All we ask is that the children of this country be allowed to have the nickels that are necessary to purchase the ice-cream that we can produce in such large quantities.

As another illustration, I might point to the number of people in this land and in the United States who own motor cars and who desire to visit different parts of this country. They would do so if our highways were greatly improved. There are thousands and thousands of men willing to work on the highways; there are great deposits from which we can manufacture the cement required, and there are plenty of gravel and sand pits available. There is no shortage of material; the only thing we lack is the money or credit with which to pay these men for their contribution towards the development of Canadian highways.

I could cite illustration after illustration to show that the needs of the people of Canada are not being satisfied; with regard to health and education; the needs of municipalities in connection with providing services to the people; the needs of the provincial governments in connection with social services, and so on. We believe that the government should advise the experts, who, the minister says, will staff the bank, so to regulate our monetary system that it will actually reflect our collective ability to produce goods and services in this country.

As reported at page 3903 of Hansard the Minister of Finance is reported to have said:

> There are some, of course, who appear to believe that the government should not pay interest at all or, indeed—

Mr. DUNNING: May I respectfully call the attention of the chair to the fact that the hon. member is now entering upon the budget debate. He is now quoting from my budget speech. Under the rules of the house that speech would come before the house in the budget debate, and I submit the hon. member cannot anticipate that debate on this discussion.

The CHAIRMAN: In my opinion the point of order is well taken.

Mr. LANDERYOU: Then I shall not read it. I simply wished to refer to the statement of monetary policy, and the reference made by the minister to monetary reform in general.

Mr. DUNNING: There will be plenty of opportunity in the debate on the budget.

Mr. BENNETT: So far as the point of order is concerned, there is no reason why he should not read it at this time.

Mr. LANDERYOU: The minister's remarks with respect to monetary reformers was to the effect that he was not going to issue money and credit debt free. He was not going to use the Bank of Canada, or any facilities he might have, to create money to be used to lower the debts of Canada.

Some time ago I asked the government if they had any plan which, if pursued, would pay off Canada's national debt in a period of twenty years, thirty years, or fifty years. The minister answered that it was a matter of government policy, and that he would not answer the question. But that question must be answered. It is a hoary fallacy to believe that we can borrow ourselves out of debt, or tax ourselves to prosperity. The municipal debts of this country are rising at a tremendous rate. Over $1,400,000,000 is owed by the municipalities. The provincial debt is increasing at an alarming rate, and has now reached a total of over $1,700,000,000; the national debt of Canada is over $3,000,000,000, and that amount has been added to in the last fiscal year. In the past we have financed through this debt creating system. The only prosperity we have ever enjoyed in Canada has been during a period when the greatest volume of private and public debt was amassed, and at a time when municipal, provincial and federal governments were spending large sums of money. Under that debt creating system we have a period of prosperity; but once that credit is restricted, and once we have reached the saturation point so far as borrowing is concerned, we have arrived at a critical situation.

To-day many municipalities are bankrupt, and many provincial governments are facing bankruptcy. The federal government claims to have complete control over the issue of money and credit, and I suggest that it provide municipal and provincial governments with debt free money, or at least make provision for lowering private and public debts. We are going to watch with a great deal of interest the policy pursued by the experts who will be staffing the Bank of Canada. Once more I will say that this is a step in the right direction, and we are pleased the government has seen fit to take over the complete ownership of the Bank of Canada. We now await the fulfilment of the promises made by the Liberal party. There might be a difference of opinion as to the methods to be adopted. The suggestions by the social credit group might not be accepted by the Liberal party; but there can be no difference of opinion on the fact that the purchasing power of the people must be raised if we are going to be able to raise the standard of living.

Mr. DUNNING: Would the hon. member be good enough to permit me to introduce the bill to-night. I should like to do so, unless someone else wishes to speak. Hon. members will have ample opportunity to discuss the bill, and the hon. member's right to speak would be preserved until that occasion.

Mr. LANDERYOU: It is almost eleven o'clock. I shall defer any further remarks until the bill is introduced.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Dunning thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 160, to amend the Bank of Canada Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

Tuesday, June 21, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS

CHARGES RESPECTING REMOVAL OF STONE AT KINGSTON TO PROPERTY OF A. E. STANSBURY

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): As I promised the other evening during the discussion on the estimates of the Department of Labour, I desire to table copy of report under date May 26, 1937, of Major H. Stethem, Royal Canadian Dragoons, to the staff adjutant, Royal Military College, in regard to the removal of stone; also, dealing with the same subject, copy of night letter, dated June 15, 1938, from commandant, Royal Military College, to Major R. C. V. Bessonette; copy of night letter, dated June 16, 1938, from Major R. C. V. Bessonette to the commandant, Royal Military College, showing that permission was given to remove the stone in question.

REFERENCES BY MR. BENNETT TO STATEMENTS REPORTED TO HAVE BEEN MADE BY MR. MCNIVEN—QUESTION OF PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): A few days ago the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McNiven) questioned the accuracy of some reports to which reference had been made during the course of debates which took place in his absence. I was not in the chamber when he began his explanation, but I promised that I would produce the documents. I find that under the rules I have no right to produce the papers in view of the fact that the hon. member has denied the accuracy of the report a part of which I referred to. I shall therefore have much pleasure in showing the press reports privately to the hon. member. But I desire to make this statement in view of what took place before I came into the chamber.

THE BUDGET

DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Thursday, June 16, consideration of the motion of Hon. Charles A. Dunning (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means.

Hon. J. EARL LAWSON (York South): Mr. Speaker, one would indeed be insensible of feeling were he not moved by the applause which has just greeted him from all sides of the house as he rises in his first attempt in the role of so-called financial critic of the government. I do most sincerely appreciate the generosity and the expression of goodwill of hon. members of this house.

It was with mixed feelings of gratitude and disappointment that I listened to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) deliver his budget the other day: gratitude to find that the minister had become converted to so many Conservative doctrines and policies, with which I will deal later, and disappointment to find no provision in that budget to give relief to the hard-pressed taxpayer of this country. The minister's diction was perfect, his articulation modulated, and I admired the agility of mind with which he could take a given set of facts and weave them into an argument to explain the prevailing conditions in this country, when in fact those very facts demonstrated clearly the shortcomings of this government to meet the needs of the people.

I do, however, congratulate the Minister of Finance on bringing down a budget at all. Most of us read in our school books the story of the Spartan boy who stood with stoical face while a wolf concealed beneath his clothes gnawed at his vitals. So long has the delivery of the budget been delayed this year that the business community has become very fearful that the wolf of the laissez-faire policy of this government had consumed the vitals of the government and that we would not have a budget at all. Every year preceding the delivery of the budget there is, for a few weeks, a slackening in business and industry because of the uncertainty of business men and industrialists as to the conditions under which they will have to carry on their business for the ensuing year by reason of tariff or taxation changes. This year that uncertainty has been emphasized and continued until it has grown into a major factor in the slowing-up processes of recovery which were going on in this country while the government was pursuing the mirage of a consummated trade agreement. Later on I shall have something to say with respect to the government's trade agreements.

The minister's explanation of the business decline in Canada during the past eight months or a year, with its consequent result of declining income, must have seemed naive to some of the Liberal members of this house. In order to convey to the country the idea that the policies of this government had saved the dominion from a recession to the same extent as that experienced by other countries, the Minister of Finance made this statement as reported at page 3893 of Hansard:

> In the last four months of 1937, our nearest neighbour experienced a decline in business activity more drastic than that which followed the collapse of 1929. World production, trade and prices have also declined but less rapidly than in the United States.

Then further on:

In December a moderate decline set in and by April—

That is, of 1938.

—the index of the physical volume of business in Canada was about 9 per cent below that for April, 1937.

I advanced that argument in this house in 1934 when the Conservative party was the government and the Liberal party was the opposition. It was in the budget debate. I compared the drop in the trade of the world and of the United States with Canada, having regard to the peak year 1929, and the year for which we then had statistics, 1933, and comparing the year 1929 with the year 1933 I pointed out to the house that whereas world trade had dropped 68 per cent, and whereas the trade of the United States had dropped 65 per cent, the trade of Canada under the then Conservative government had dropped only 62 per cent. That argument was derisively received by the members of the then Liberal opposition, and one need only read the pages of Hansard to ascertain their criticism of it. Well, what is sauce for the goose is sauce for the gander. If the fact that Canada's business activities have maintained a higher level than those of the United States or the world during 1938 is attributable to the policies of the government in power in this country, then a similar condition which prevailed at the depth of the depression must be credited to the former Conservative government.

It was indeed a consolation to have the Minister of Finance at least converted to the views expressed by the Conservatives some years ago, but I should like to point out that if the policy of a government with respect to internal and domestic problems can make the country more resistant to world forces and conditions, then obviously trade agreements such as that made by Canada with the United States are not helpful in maintaining business activity and employment at a maximum level in Canada. The Liberal policy as advocated in the election of 1935 and as advocated by the Liberals when they were in opposition in this house from 1930 to 1935 was trade agreements and more trade agreements. According to the Liberals, our problems of unemployment and excessive taxation could all be solved if we but went out and made trade agreements, throwing open our domestic market to the different countries of the world. How well I remember the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) standing in his place in this house and condemning the then Conservative government for its alleged policy of economic nationalism. He told us not once but time and time again that our policy of economic nationalism would never solve the problems of Canada and that they would only be solved by trade agreements with the different countries of the world and with the United States in particular. Apparently the Minister of Finance has learned that in times of depression trade agreements are but as aspen reeds. I again quote his words from the budget speech which he delivered last Thursday, as reported at page 3894 of Hansard:

Export trade is the chief medium through which changes in economic conditions in other countries affect the Canadian economy. Up to August last business conditions throughout most of the world had been improving and the world price level had been rising.

Therefore I say that Canada's progress upward from the depths of the depression is attributable to the general advance in business conditions throughout the world and to the raising of the world price level. If further evidence be required, I quote again from the budget speech of the Minister of Finance at page 3897 of this year's Hansard:

All who have listened to this recital of the facts in connection with recent developments in our foreign trade will, I am sure, be impressed with how vulnerable our economy is to the impact of external influences, and there may also be some who will question the wisdom of any substantial reliance upon foreign trade. There is no doubt about the high degree of vulnerability in our position.

So we have the Minister of Finance admitting that if we are to seek primarily to trade our products with foreign countries rather than fabricate and consume them at home we shall be dependent upon conditions in those foreign countries for the maintenance of our internal economy and of our own standard of living. Surely that is heresy to the doctrines of Liberalism.

The Conservative party has never advocated that we in this land should be economic nationalists, but we have advocated that to the extent that it is possible to consume in our own domestic market the things which we can produce economically, that domestic market should be protected, and every producer and every manufacturer in Canada should have an equal opportunity to sell his products in his own home market. To the extent that we produce more than we can consume, Conservatives have advocated the negotiation of trade agreements whereby we might accept products of other countries which we cannot produce economically in exchange for the surplus of our own products. Thus it will be seen that the Conservative policy lessens to the greatest extent the degree of vulnerability resulting from economic conditions in foreign lands, and provides, having regard to world conditions, a maximum of employment for Canadian workers in Canadian factories fabricating Canadian products, and a maximum price in our own markets for our own natural products.

The minister stated that the Canadian economy was not showing any weakness which required corrective processes during 1937. He based the statement on the fact that the rate of decrease in employment was not as rapid as the rate of decrease in the physical volume of business. He said, as recorded at page 3898 of Hansard:

In each of the last two years I have had to refer to the failure of employment to keep pace with the striking gains in business activity and to point out that this was a condition usually met with in the early stages of recovery from business depression. I am therefore pleased to be able to report that during 1937 the increase in the volume of employment was for the first time since 1929 more rapid than the rise in industrial production, and also that since the downward trend in business began last December employment has declined less rapidly than other business indices.

That condition does not reflect strength in the Canadian economy. Increase in employment always trails increase in business activity, and likewise decrease in employment always trails decrease in business activity. If the Canadian domestic market has a given consumption, the moment the goods of the Canadian manufacturer begin to be displaced in that market he does not immediately discharge his employees or some of them. He first endeavours to compete by increased production without increased cost of production, or alternatively he still hangs on producing goods for a while in the hope that the recession is only temporary. That is the reason why we did not feel the impact of the trade agreement made by this government with the United States in 1936. It was not until it got into full swing in 1937 that it began to affect our employment and our Canadian economy.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. LAWSON: My friends may laugh, but I will give some figures in a moment. When United States manufactured goods were first given greater opportunities in our domestic market our industrialists endeavoured to meet that competition. The lapse of some months having proven that they could not meet the competition, you have had for the last eight months or a year a constant slowing up of employment in industry, and that slowing up will continue and be accelerated as the operation of the Canada-United States trade agreement becomes more effective. Already you have had a slowing up, as the minister pointed out the other day, the index of employment in this country on October 1, 1937, being 119·6 and on May 1, 1938, 111·5.

The foregoing leads me to a discussion of the trade agreements made by this government. The Minister of Finance has endeavoured to establish the paternity of this government for the empire trade agreements. Again I quote his words, as found on page 3925 of Hansard:

Since the present administration came into office, Canada has been a contracting party to the two most comprehensive trade agreements that have been concluded since the great war. Our agreement with the United States in 1935 and our agreement with the United Kingdom in 1937 resulted in the reduction of effective duties on a wide range of Canadian imports. They also secured the enlargement and consolidation of marketing opportunities for Canadian exports in the two biggest import markets of the world, which in the last calendar year took between them about eighty per cent of Canada's total exports.

Mr. DUNNING: It sounds pretty good.

Mr. LAWSON: It does sound good. But I propose for a few minutes to consider these two trade agreements, not as to their collective results, but as to the results which have flowed from each.

I have previously stated that the trade agreement made by this government with the United States is contributing to unemployment in this country. Now let me consider the figures in connection with the United States trade agreement. My recollection is that the trade agreement came into effect on January 1, 1936, and was adopted in this house in May of that year. Well, I take the exports from Canada to the United States, excluding gold, for the year ended March 31, 1937, and I find that they aggregate $364,354,990. Our exports to the United States for the next succeeding year, ended March 31, 1938, amounted to $343,250,669, a decrease of $21,104,321. Now let us look at our imports from the United States. For the year ended March 31, 1937, these imports amounted to $393,720,662. For the next succeeding year, ended March 31, 1938, they amounted to $487,328,980, or an increase of $93,608,318. In other words, while our exports to the United States decreased by $21,000,000 odd, our imports during the same period from the same country increased by $93,000,000 odd. If hon. members care to examine the book from which I obtained my figures, namely "The Trade of Canada, April, 1938," as issued by our own bureau of statistics, they will find an almost unbroken record for the last year, of our imports from the United States increasing month after month. No wonder this government is struggling to make a new trade agreement with the United States to avoid the complete destruction of the Canadian market as a result of the last agreement they made with that country.

Now for a few moments let us turn to the empire trade agreements. I was unable to obtain from the bureau of statistics a compilation of figures for exactly the same period of time as those relating to the United States, but I got them to within a month of it. So the figures I am about to give end with the month of April in each year instead of the month of March. Our imports from the British Empire during the twelve months ended April, 1937, amounted to $201,539,570. and our imports for the next succeeding twelve months, ended April, 1938, amounted to $231,208,159. In other words during that year our imports increased by $29,668,589. Now let us look at our domestic exports to the British Empire. For the twelve months ended April, 1937, our domestic exports amounted to $502,290,701. For the twelve months ended April, 1938, they were $519,659,942, showing an increase in our domestic exports to the British Empire of $13,369,241. In other words, while our exports to the United States under the Canada-United States trade agreement decreased by $21,000,000 odd, our exports to the British empire increased by $13,000,000 odd. When one contrasts the benefit of the empire trade agreements to Canada with the detriment of the United States trade agreement, is it any wonder the Minister of Finance on behalf of the government refers to the empire trade agreement as "our agreement with the United Kingdom in 1937"?

The empire trade agreements were made originally by a Conservative government under the leadership of the present leader of the official opposition (Mr. Bennett), in 1932, for a period of five years. They were renewed by this Liberal government in 1937, without any substantial or material change in a single principle.

Mr. BENNETT: Having voted against them in 1932.

Mr. LAWSON: The minister says "our agreement with the United Kingdom in 1937." Shall I ever forget the attitude of the Liberal party in this house and this country at the time of the negotiation of the empire trade agreements? Do you remember how the Liberals derisively upbraided the present leader of the official opposition and referred to "blasting a way into the markets of the world"? Do you recall how the leader of the official opposition was accused then of driving a hard bargain, of lacking in patriotism because he asked from empire countries a quid pro quo for concessions in our tariff? Shall I ever forget that in the final analysis every member of the Liberal party but one rose to his feet in this house and voted against the empire trade agreements? And now the Minister of Finance boasts of "our trade agreement with the United Kingdom in 1937."

A few moments ago I mentioned the criticism levelled against the leader of the official opposition because he had bargained with the United Kingdom and British commonwealth countries in connection with the trade agreements. As I sat in my seat last Thursday and listened to the words of the Minister of Finance I could hardly believe my ears, for this is what he said, at page 3925 of Hansard:

> —"Canada cannot give to-day and bargain to-morrow." It is even more true, Mr. Speaker, in the world as it is to-day that unilateral tariff reductions will not get the wider export markets which our products need and which the government is securing for them.

Surely this is complete conversion to Conservative doctrines and Conservative policies. The pages of Hansard are replete with declarations by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier that the policy of the Liberal party so far as empire countries are concerned is to make unilateral reductions in tariff and trust to the other commonwealth nations granting us corresponding benefits in their markets. How often have I sat in this house and listened to the present Prime Minister rail against the bargaining policy of the leader of the official opposition and the Conservative party; yet in this budget the official spokesman for the Liberal party says, "Canada cannot give to-day and bargain to-morrow." What? Desertion of unilateral tariff reductions? This is more heresy to Liberal doctrines and Liberal policies. It seems to me I have a recollection of a budget brought down by the same Minister of Finance in this house in 1930. My recollection is that Canada gave unilateral reductions in her tariff in favour of the United States, and this very same minister valiantly defended that action.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. member is mistaken; it was the United Kingdom.

Mr. LAWSON: The Minister of Finance says "no."

Mr. DUNNING: It was the United Kingdom, not the United States.

Mr. LAWSON: I think I understated it a little bit, because in addition to giving them to the United Kingdom this country did give unilateral tariff reductions which applied not merely to the United States but to all countries. Can I for a moment forget cast-iron pipe and cut flowers? I heard that so often in the house I know it was a unilateral tariff reduction.

Long before I had personally met the Minister of Finance or had come under the influence of his urbane personality I had heard of him by reputation. I had heard of him as the great free trade Lochinvar who was coming out of the west to teach us of the east the economic doctrine of free trade, which was to sever all our chains of bondage to tariffs and bargaining trade agreements. Oh well, I suppose we of the Conservative party should be happy that the virtue of the Conservative policy has at last converted the Minister of Finance to a declaration that "Canada cannot give to-day and bargain to-morrow."

The minister told us when he came to the question of interest rates that the burden of interest upon the Canadian people had been reduced gradually by voluntary conversion operations resulting last year in a decrease of $5,592,000 in the amount of interest payable by the Canadian people. And he pointed out that by this method, as contrasted with an arbitrary cut in interest rates of 22½ per cent in Australia, Canada had benefited. The minister pointed out that the average rate of interest on Australian outstanding debt was decreased, by the arbitrary method adopted by them, to the extent of 25·1 per cent, while Canada's average interest rate, by reason of the voluntary method adopted by us, had been decreased by 29·1 per cent. In other words, the method of voluntary conversion and refunding was much more beneficial than the arbitrary method in relieving the taxpayer.

Again may I point out that this government is merely carrying out the policy inaugurated by the Conservative party, when we were in office prior to 1935. It was no easy task in those days for the former Conservative government to resist pressure from opposition members in the house, because we were in dark days of depression. The pressure brought to adopt the policy of arbitrarily cutting interest rates was very heavy. But let us not forget that it was a Conservative government which steadfastly refused to subscribe to a policy of repudiation, and to-day the people of Canada are reaping the benefit of that stand.

Let me for a moment or two turn to the tariff changes. The budget contains none.

[Mr. Lawson.]

At page 3925 of Hansard the minister is reported as follows:

> For reasons which I believe will commend themselves to the house, I am not proposing any amendments to the customs tariff in the present budget resolutions.

I do not know whether the reasons for the failure to make tariff changes will commend themselves to the house, but I am pretty confident the reasons will not commend themselves to the people of Saskatchewan. I am confident the people of Saskatchewan will now come to the same conclusion as that to which many hon. members had previously come, that despite the injury which might be done to Canadian business by delay in bringing down the budget, this budget with no tariff changes in it would not be received until after the electors in Saskatchewan had gone to the polls.

I am sure the reasons will commend themselves to the hon. Liberal member for Brantford City (Mr. Macdonald) and to the hon. Liberal member for Renfrew South (Mr. McCann), in view of the speeches they made in the house in favour of the maintenance of the tariff on agricultural implements and cream separators. But I wonder if the reasons will commend themselves to the hon. Liberal member for Lake Centre (Mr. Johnston) who, in advocating reduction in the tariff on agricultural implements, is reported as follows at page 1243 of this year's Hansard:

> Serious consideration should be given to the matter of removing all duties on the general line of farm implements.

I am wondering if the reasons will commend themselves to the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) who, speaking with respect to the tariff on agricultural implements, is reported to have said the following at page 2403 of this year's Hansard:

> The present tariff of 7½ per cent is the lowest on record, if excise taxes and some other imposts put on through the regulations of the revenue department are not taken into account. But in the face of this reduction in the tariff we find the implement companies increasing their prices in 1936, and again in 1938. To me this looks like a challenge to the parliament of Canada. What are we going to do about it?

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance answers, "For reasons which will commend themselves to this house,"—nothing. And again, the same hon. member for Portage la Prairie is reported in these words at page 2416 of Hansard:

> We maintain that there is a great difference between the two old political parties on the tariff. The Conservatives stand for high protection, and the Liberals for low tariff; if there is no difference between a low tariff and a high tariff we should know it, and the way to find out is to strip these companies who have defied parliament of all tariff protection, and let them stand on their own feet.

To the hon. member for Portage la Prairie this budget will be an awakening. Those of us who are on the Conservative side realized years ago that the Liberal party when out of power preached freer trade in western Canada and tariffs in eastern Canada, but that when in power it nibbled at the tariff a little bit here and a little bit there, with respect to certain industries, thus unbalancing the whole protective structure of the country.

I wonder if the reasons will commend themselves to the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) and the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver). The hon. member for Halton is reported at page 2611 of this year's Hansard as follows:

As to the 7½ per cent duty on implements—

He was referring to agricultural implements.

—I would be quite content that it should be referred to the tariff board for hearing, but I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the evidence would abundantly justify the entire removal of the duty.

Will the reasons commend themselves to the hon. Liberal member for Macdonald (Mr. Weir) who said, as recorded at page 2571 of this year's Hansard:

And lastly, because of the monopolistic character of the industry, and also because the tariff is being belittled as a price-governing factor, the government should remove the duty and thus allow the freest competition possible so far as prices are concerned.

I wonder if the reasons will commend themselves to the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Winkler) or to the hon. member for Dauphin Mr. Ward). The latter member is reported on page 2636 as having said with reference to the Minister of Finance:

I hope he will wipe out the duties on farm implements, and also on cream separators. I hope he will go a long, long way—as far as he has ever gone before—in reduction of tariffs.

What disillusionment there has been for the hon. member for Dauphin, and what a blight to his hopes!

Mr. FRASER: They will still vote for the budget.

Mr. LAWSON: Those are the truest words that ever were spoken. That interjection by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser) proves completely the point I made a few moments ago as to what they preach in the west and what they preach in the east. The hon. member interjects, "They will vote for the budget." Of course they will.

I cannot leave this subject without asking if the reasons will commend themselves to the hon. Liberal member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), the former Minister of Agriculture in the Liberal government. He said, as is reported on page 2667 of Hansard:

I should judge from the speech of the Minister of Agriculture, however, that the interpretation thereof is that the government is considering the matter very carefully—

They were dealing with agricultural implements.

—and is evidently on the point of some important decision with respect to it.

Well, we have the important decision—do nothing. Is it any wonder that the electorate of this country is deceived when the former Liberal Minister of Agriculture cannot interpret clearly the words and policies of the present Liberal Minister of Agriculture?

No record in this matter would be complete without reference to the hon. Liberal member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker). That pleasing and voluble gentleman has just returned to this house from his crusade in Saskatchewan on behalf of the provincial Liberal party.

An hon. MEMBER: Successful.

Mr. LAWSON: Yes, it was successful. I am ready to give him credit for that if you will just bide your time. The hon. gentleman returned with a fresh laurel wreath upon his brow. He made a plea to this Liberal government in connection with the tariff on agricultural implements. Let me read what is reported on page 2674 of Hansard of this year. He said:

I beseech the house to pass this report. I suggest that the government go further and take the duty off agricultural implements. They should then watch things very closely, and if prices do not come down at least to a figure comparable to prices in 1932,—

Mark you, that was when a Conservative government was in power.

—when costs were lower, other decisive action should be taken to see that justice is done to that fundamental industry which is now so depressed in this country, the farming industry.

I am afraid my hon. friend will have to doff his new laurel wreath, hie him back to the province of Saskatchewan and use all his eloquence and persuasion this summer to convince the electors of that province of the soundness of the commendable reasons of the Minister of Finance for not reducing the tariff on agricultural implements.

This budget is outstanding, not for what it contains, but for what it does not contain. No provision of any kind is made therein for the domestic policy, discussed by the Minister of Finance, which will create for Canada an internal economy capable of resisting in a large measure the shock and impact of financial and economic conditions in other countries. It was at least gratifying to learn from the budget that the Minister of Finance realized that it was necessary to have a policy in respect to internal problems. I quote him again, as reported on page 3897 of Hansard:

> A fundamental fact that in this modern world no nation can live unto itself alone does not lessen, indeed it reinforces, the necessity for Canada to devote its maximum energies to the solution of its own internal problems. Concentration upon its domestic problems is the primary duty of any nation.

Fine sounding words and a pious declaration! What has this government done about it? The government has been in office three years. It has brought down three budgets. We are now at the end of the third session of this parliament, and what, I ask, has this government done to meet its primary duty of solving our domestic problems? The answer is—nothing, except a belated housing scheme brought down within the last three weeks, combined with an exemption from sales tax, provided in the budget, on the major commodities used in the building industry and even this scheme with respect to housing cannot become effective until the legislatures in the different provinces have met.

If I were to ask the women of this country, particularly the married women who have the responsibilities of a family, what they most desired in this life, I am confident that after mature consideration they would answer —security. They want security for the home; security for the job of the husband; security for a continuation of income into the home when the husband is out of employment; security for their children as to the possibility of profitable employment on attaining a working age. Surely that is a domestic problem which should be the primary duty of any government. What has this government done about it? Nothing.

If I were to ask the youth of this land what was their primary desire in life, I am confident that, after mature deliberation, they would answer—a chance, or an opportunity. They want a chance at a job; a chance to earn a living; a chance to marry; a chance to have a home; a chance for advancement in the social strata as a reward for merit. Surely the solution of that domestic problem is the primary duty of any government. What has this government done about solving that problem? Absolutely nothing, except a very limited youth training project.

If I were to ask the farmers of this country what they most desire, I am confident they would answer—a steady market with a reasonable price level. Obviously you cannot give them a steady market with a reasonable price level by trade agreements, because then you are affected always by the conditions in foreign lands. The present operation and effect of the trade agreement made by this government with the United States conclusively proves the instability of a foreign market so far as maintaining prices in Canada is concerned. Foreign markets are all very well for our surplus products, but let the farmers of this country never forget that the finest market they will ever have, with the steadiest level of prices, is the hungry mouths of the city workers and factory toilers in this country, provided they have the pay envelopes from which to purchase farm products. What has the present government done to obtain for the farmer a steady market and a reasonable price level? Just nothing.

Supporters of the government will say to me—I am surprised that they have not already done so—"Well, what do you propose should be done to fulfil the primary duty of the government to the nation to solve its domestic problems?" I frankly admit that at this time and on this occasion, with a great Conservative convention to be held within two weeks which is to determine the policy of the Conservative party, I am not at liberty to enunciate a policy on behalf of the people of the Conservative party. But this I do say: if you are to give security to the women and the workers in this land, if you are to give an opportunity to youth, if you are to give a reasonably stable market with reasonably consistent prices to farmers, you must wipe out the growing spirit of provincialism and sectionalism in this country and you must obtain a maximum of cooperation between the provincial governments and this dominion government and a unity of purpose of the Canadian people.

During the campaign of 1935 I heard a great deal about the cooperation that this government was to obtain between the provincial governments and the dominion government if the Liberal party were returned to power. Need I quote the speeches of the present Prime Minister when he went about this country and said to the people, "You have a Liberal government in power in all the provinces but one, and if you elect a Liberal government to power in the dominion you will then have governments with common ideals and common policies; you will get a maximum of cooperation; we shall be able to sit around a table in conference and agree and find a solution of your problems." Well, were they able to obtain cooperation? Were they able to obtain an agreement for the necessary amendment to the British North America Act, which amendment could have preserved every minority right in this country and yet have allowed a national law for unemployment insurance, for minimum wages and for maximum hours of labour? They were not. Have they have been able to get cooperation from the Liberal government of Nova Scotia to facilitate the marketing of coal mined in that province, in the thickly populated centres of Ontario and Quebec? They have not.

An hon. MEMBER: They have.

Mr. LAWSON: No, they have not, if the hon. member will permit me. You have not changed the statutes one whit since you came into office. Has this government been able to get cooperation with the Liberal government of the great industrial and agricultural province from which I come, the province of Ontario? So estranged is the government of that province from the government of the dominion that the Liberal premier of Ontario publicly declares that he is no longer a Mackenzie King Liberal. No, if cooperation is essential to the performance of the primary duty of any government to solve the country's domestic problems, it will never be accomplished by this government.

Now, in concluding, let us consider for a few minutes the financial aspect of this budget. Canada is labouring under a terrific burden of debt and taxation. If we add together the taxation imposed upon our people by the dominion, by provinces, by municipalities, by school boards and other taxing bodies, the figures which result are astronomical. I saw recently in some publication—I cannot vouch for the accuracy of the figures, but I believe they are correct—that out of a national per capita income of $347 a year in Canada the taxation by governmental bodies was $97 per capita. That means that 28 per cent of the per capita earnings of the Canadian people are paid in taxes each year. True it is that this dominion government cannot control the taxation of other taxing bodies, but surely this government can set an example and give encouragement to other taxing bodies by some effort at making tax reductions of its own.

One of the fourteen pledges of the present Prime Minister to the electorate in his campaign speeches of 1935 was that there would be retrenchment in public expenditure, a reduction of the principal of the public debt, and a reduction in taxation. What has the government done about it? Let us look at the record as shown by this budget.

According to the figures given us by the Minister of Finance, the total revenue collected by this government in the last fiscal year is the largest ever collected by any government in this country in the same period of time. I want to compare the figures at the end of the fiscal year, March 31, 1938, with those at the end of the fiscal year, March 31, 1936. I pick 1936, Mr. Speaker, because this government was elected to power in October, 1935, and took office in November.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): October.

Mr. LAWSON: Was it October or November, 1935?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): October 23, 1935.

Mr. LAWSON: I do not think that they can be held accountable for any collection of taxes for the remainder of that fiscal year.

The total revenue collected by this government for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1938, was $516,692,000. Now let me take the corresponding figure for the last year in which the Conservative government was in office. The total revenue collected for the year ended March 31, 1936, was $372,596,000. The government collected last year in taxes—I should not have said, in taxes, but in revenue—

Mr. DUNNING: That is better.

Mr. LAWSON: —$144,096,000 more than the Conservative government in its last fiscal year of office, ended March 31, 1936. And the government tell us, according to this budget, that this year they will spend the vast sum of $530,000,000.

I gave the revenue from all sources. Let me now give the revenue from taxes collected by this government, and I take the same period of time. The revenue received by this government from taxes upon the people for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1938, was $448,652,000; the revenue collected from taxes for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1936, was $317,312,000. If you subtract one from the other you obtain the result that this government collected in taxes from the people for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1938, the sum of $131,340,000 more than was collected for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1936.

An hon. MEMBER: It means an increase in business.

Mr. LAWSON: I do not want to interfere with the continuity of my speech or I would answer the hon. member right now.

Not only has the government collected more taxes but it has spent more money. I wish to read a few figures, and to be fair I will omit from them all capital expenditures, all expenditures upon unemployment and agricultural relief. I find that the government spent in controllable expenditure for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1938, $410,954,000 and that the ordinary expenditure, controllable, for the year ended March 31, 1936, was $372,539,000. If you subtract one from the other you obtain the result that this government has increased controllable expenditure during the last fiscal year by $38,415,000; and yet in 1935 one of the fourteen points in the platform of the present Prime Minister was retrenchment in expenditures, reduction of the public debt, and reduction in taxation. Under this government, therefore, the people must struggle along with an ever-increasing burden of taxation.

And now I will answer my hon. friend who said that these increased taxes came from increasing business. Another promise in the Prime Minister's fourteen point program was reduction in the sales tax. In his campaign speeches the Prime Minister decried the fact that the sales tax had once been one per cent and that in 1935 it was six per cent, and he pledged his party, if it were returned to power, to decrease the sales tax. His exact words were that he would cut or drastically reduce the sales tax. Well, he fulfilled that pledge by increasing the sales tax the very first session his government was in power, increasing it from six per cent to eight per cent; and at eight per cent it still remains.

With a view to giving impetus to the building industry this budget exempts from the sales tax some of the principal products used in the construction of houses. That should prove a benefit to a part of the construction industry and I sincerely hope it will. But I will put this question to the Minister of Finance: If the abolition of the sales tax in respect of materials going into the building industry will give an impetus to the building industry, is it not obvious that a reduction in the sales tax would be a boon to industry in general? But it would be more than that. It would be a boon to every citizen in this land, because it would increase his purchasing power. Every time a man buys a dollar's worth of boots or clothing, or any other articles, food or necessities, more than eight cents of that dollar goes to this government in taxes because of the pyramiding of the sales tax.

I well recall how the Conservative government was condemned for imposing a sugar tax upon the people because it was said that it was a burden upon the poor. What has this government done about it? After three years of Liberal government, three budgets and three sessions, we still have the burden of the sugar tax upon the poor. I cannot refrain from reminding the house that during the campaign of 1935 the Conservative government was upbraided from every platform for having put on an excise tax of three per cent. But after three years of this Liberal government, three sessions and three budgets, we still have the excise tax of three per cent. I can, however, hold out a hope to the Canadian people; I can hold out to the Canadian taxpayer the hope that this government, being compelled in the ordinary course of events to account to the electorate in 1939 and again to seek their votes, will reduce many of these burdens in the expectation of being able once more to delude the electorate with promises of a happy future.

As I pointed out a few moments ago, this government collected from the people of Canada in the last fiscal year $131,340,000 more in taxes than the Conservative government collected in its last year of office. This government has the doubtful honour of being the greatest tax collector in all the history of Canada since confederation. They are distinguished for the combination of a laissez-faire, do-nothing policy and the extraction from the people of Canada of the largest amount of taxes ever collected. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I move:

That all the words after "that" in the said motion be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"This house regrets that the financial proposals submitted by the Minister of Finance for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1939, fail to make adequate provision for reduction of the excessive burden of taxation now borne by the Canadian people.

Mr. R. J. DEACHMAN (Huron North): I desire to extend to my hon. friend the member for York South (Mr. Lawson) my congratulations on the speech which he has just delivered. He has followed the admirable tradition of the Conservative party which ever since confederation has presented its views with ability and steadfastness to the people of Canada. I am not quite certain whether a Conservative party needs a Liberal party, but I am absolutely positive that a Liberal party needs a Conservative party. I have always held to that point of view. And now I congratulate them again upon their having another convention in order to reorganize their party and do something better than they have done in the past. Years ago, as the date of a Conservative convention approached, I wrote an article in which I expressed my hopes for the prosperity of the Conservative party. I want to give the house to-day the first paragraph of that article, because history has a tendency to repeat itself, and the words I then wrote need only one change, the substitution of Ottawa for Winnipeg as the place of the convention:

Not for worlds would I attempt to call the dead to life for vain purposes. A Conservative party has a place in Canada. Breeching is needed in a set of harness as well as tugs—a fish line has a sinker as well as a cork. Lloyd George remarked not long ago that every man has a little House of Lords in his own mind. So long as Conservative instincts survive there will be need for a Conservative party. We cannot have joy without sorrow, the lilt of laughter without a background of tears, or pleasure without pain. When Conservatism dies Liberalism may prepare its own epitaph. All good Liberals should pray for the success of the Winnipeg convention. Liberalism in Canada needs a Conservative party. It needs something on which it may sharpen its weapons —better far that Liberals should be temporarily submerged in an open fight, with sword in hand and visor down, than that it should pass out in the inglorious occupation of twiddling its thumbs.

Having listened to our distinguished friend this afternoon, I would say there can be no possibility of death by that route. We have in the Conservative party one leader at least who stands by the old traditions. His attitude to-day was perfect. It was the same remedy as was offered in 1878; it was 1930 repeated over again; it was emphasis piled on emphasis to suggest that what this country needs is more conservatism, more high tariffs, reliance upon our home market, development of our home industry, and nothing else.

The hon. member spoke of our vulnerability, from the trade standpoint, our danger from outside nations. He thought invulnerability would be secured if we piled our tariffs high enough. I wonder if he happens to recall the existence of a nation called the United States of America. It is a near neighbour of ours, and is sometimes quoted in Conservative literature. Does he recall the fact, which I think I have mentioned once before in this house, that in the campaign of 1930 the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) in one of his great efforts referred to the progress of the United States, and said: We see her now marching forward to the tune of America first; and then a few short months later the only tune heard across the line was: Brother, can you spare a dime? I wonder if he recalls that when the depression came, the United States of America was the first to face the crash. We passed through a period of depression, moved upward in the scale towards a greater measure of prosperity, and then there came another recession or depression. Who led in that downward march? Again the United States of America. It had placed its reliance upon tariffs; it had built for invulnerability and made itself the most vulnerable nation in the world. I wonder whether, looking over the map of Europe to-day, he will recall that the peoples with the highest tariffs are the peoples who are now under despotisms—a natural and obvious route, inescapable, because the removal of tariffs raises the standard of living, and when the standard of living sinks below a certain level there is a tendency to revolt and to try something else. So some of the greatest protectionist nations, frequently pointed to in the past as among those which had made the most progress under protection, now stand, as Germany and Italy, unable to carry on a democratic government, facing difficulty and creating a strong disturbing influence in the world.

The hon. member referred to the development of home industry, his main argument for protection, I propose to cite the income of the Dominion of Canada at the present time; and no matter what has happened, the income seems to be doing fairly well. In 1930 the total income of the Dominion of Canada was 5,173 millions of dollars. In that year the Liberals of Canada went out of office because the income was not large enough. The Conservative party came in, and the income dropped to a low level of 3,193 millions of dollars in 1933. When I hear a speech such as that delivered by my hon. friend this afternoon I wonder why in those solemn years he did not call upon his gods to arrest the decline of two billion dollars in income in those three years. If a high tariff means something, why did the tariff not work? I wonder what was the reason. Yet I got a suggestion of a possible answer from my hon. friend this afternoon. He told us that it took some time for the reduction in tariffs against the United States to work an injury to the people of Canada. At the same time he thought it took three or four or five years before the new gospel of high and higher protection, the Conservative doctrine, would relieve the situation which then existed. Well, in 1935 there was a change of government. The income that year was 4,094 millions of dollars. I have these figures from the bureau of statistics to-day. It went up in 1937 to 4,870 millions, an increase in the national income between 1935 and 1937 of 776 million dollars. I am not anxious to claim the credit for the Liberal government for all of that increase. I believe in making the statement as fair as possible. I have a suspicion that in this house, on rare occasions, both parties claim credit for things for which they were not wholly responsible. But when I have shown the decline of income under the Conservative policy of high protection, and the increase under a Liberal administration, at least you cannot logically decide that it would be the part of wisdom to have a higher tariff than we have. We have done better since reductions have been made, relatively small as, in my humble judgment, these reduction have been; I am also going to suggest later that they ought to have been greater.

Now my hon. friend says that we need a steady market, and that that market can be built up at home. What you need, he says, is the hungry mouths of the workers in the factories to provide the market. But the trouble is that under Conservative administration the mouths were too hungry and the difficulty was to satisfy the hungry by giving employment. We have changed and improved that since we have adopted a different policy, and have once more started on the upgrade.

My hon. friend referred to the position of the farmer. I am particularly interested in this subject, and I want to point out precisely what has happened. I should like my Conservative friends, if they are in the house now, to listen to these facts, which record the actual transposition which has taken place between 1930 and 1937. In 1930 it took 106 units of farm products to buy a dollar's worth of manufactured goods. Then the Conservative party came into power. The following year it took 132 units. They were not doing too badly for the manufacturers, were they? In 1933 it took 144 units, the next year 137 units and in 1935 it took 124 units. When the Liberals came into office it took 114 units; in 1936 it took 106 units; and in 1937 farm products and manufactured products were back upon a basis of parity of exchange. You could take 100 units of farm products and exchange them for 100 units of manufactured products. Yet my hon. friend from York South suggests that the sober, thoughtful farmers of the Dominion of Canada, looking at these facts and considering not only their own interests but the interests of the nation, should crawl back under the banner of Conservatism under which they lost their income and were reduced to lower levels than at any previous time in the history of Canada.

Then my hon. friend suggested that there had been an increase in expenditure during the last year and that we had taxed the people of Canada more than we did previously. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is the old story; with business expanding more revenue was collected. I suggest that you look back once more at the position of the farmer; when he was paying 144 units of farm products for 100 units of manufactured products he was not in a position to buy a very large volume of goods in the open markets of this country. But without any change whatever in taxation a point of equality was reached as between manufactured and farm products, and what followed? The farmer was able to buy more manufactured goods; there was more employment in the cities. The farmers, having a larger available sum with which to buy products in the markets of the world, purchased them, so that revenues from the tariff, from the sales tax and from all other impositions steadily moved upward. More revenue was collected because of the greater capacity of the people to buy goods, yet you have the challenge thrown out by the Conservative financial critic to-day that we increased the taxes on the Canadian people. In point of fact the prosperity of the Canadian people increased under a more Liberal policy than had existed previously, and with that increase in wealth came greater capacity to pay and therefore larger revenues. Well, I see no hope for anything so far as my hon. friend is concerned. He has nothing to suggest. In his opinion it is simply the old, old story of higher and higher peaks of taxation, more and more tariffs and relatively less revenue.

Now, passing from my hon. friend from York South, I want to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) upon at least one thing in his budget, a feature which under his administration has been greatly developed. In this connection I do not desire to withhold credit from some of the Conservative financial leaders as well; but this year, as last year, my hon. friend presented a budget that was very simple, very clear and very direct. It is quite possible for any ordinary man to understand it, and I only wish every province in Canada and, indeed, every financial institution would adopt a similarly clear method of presenting their stories so that the man on the street, the man in parliament, the leader of thought and opinion, would be able to get a clear understanding of the financial situation. Then there would be less lax thinking. Not many years ago I heard three cabinet ministers state the amount of the debt of the Dominion of Canada, and each gave a different figure. If it is possible for men trained as they were to give different figures in regard to a simple matter of that kind, what about the ordinary man who has only an occasional opportunity to read these things and who therefore lacks the training that would enable him to understand them?

I want also to congratulate the Dominion of Canada, because I think the budget speech revealed the amazing capacity of the dominion to come back after such disasters as those through which we have passed. I wonder what any man standing here in 1914, when we had an export trade of $455,000,000, would have thought if it had been suggested that within four years our export trade would rise to over $1,500,000,000? I wonder what he would have thought if someone had said that within that time we would send five hundred thousand men to the field of battle. Yet after the war, after a peace that was worse than war and after fiscal policies which were worse than the peace, we have survived and in 1938 have an export trade of over a billion dollars. Sometimes we are too much in the habit of speaking of our export trade in terms of dollars. If we consider the physical volume we find that between the depths of the depression in 1933 and 1937, which is the last year for which I have the physical volume of business, there has been an increase of 47 per cent in the export trade of the dominion. And this was accomplished in a period during which drought interfered with the development of our export markets. From the standpoint of bushels our wheat exports declined approximately 58 per cent. From the standpoint of dollars the difference between the average for the periods 1926-29 and 1935-38, in our exports of grain and flour, amounts to almost $300,000,000 a year. A country which can face losses and disasters such as these, at least part of which arose from no fault of its own, and can do it after it has suffered restrictive tariffs such as were imposed in the five years which followed 1930, must be a nation of striking force, a nation of which we may well be proud. It has shown the ability to suffer those setbacks and come back in a way that probably no other nation in the world could come back. Confucius, the great Chinese philosopher, once remarked that man's greatness is shown not in never falling but in rising every time he falls. I think the same might be said of a country. A nation shows its capacity by its ability to come back, by its resiliency, by its power to recover, and in that regard Canada stands out as a leader among the nations of the world.

These things are matters of encouragement, but there is always a serpent or two in the garden of Eden. The return to normal production has not given us the volume of employment which might be desired. There is no question whatever but that there is maldistribution of income in Canada. In part that is due to the destruction of our agricultural production by drought and also to the wide spread which I quoted a few moments ago as between agricultural and manufactured products. I want to give the figures, because I think this is something the house ought to consider; and I do not give them in any partisan sense. I deplore the tendency to place party above everything, and to try to create the impression that Conservatives or Liberals alone are perfect. There is a problem here which is too big for that, and I ask hon. members if possible to separate the political from the economic aspect, and to listen for a moment to what has happened in Canada, to that which represents the problem of the people of Canada. And whether it be Tory, Grit, C.C.F. or Social Credit, unless you reach the bottom of this problem you still leave the future of Canada in a position which to say the least is insecure indeed.

The year 1926 is generally considered the base year in Canadian statistics. I should like to place on record the money income in that year in different sections of Canadian industry, and then to place opposite it the real income. Because the money income expresses only the amount of dollars received, whereas the real income represents the amount of actual purchasing power which the people in different forms of employment receive for their work.

In the period 1931-35 the total wages in manufacturing industries was 16·8 per cent less than in the year 1926. But because of the difference in the cost of living the real wage, or the purchasing power of wages paid in Canadian industry, in the average year of 1931-35 period, was 2·3 per cent more than it was in 1926. Per capita money wages fell 9·7 per cent, whereas in real wages they were up 8·9 per cent. The share of capital—and by that I mean the amount left after deductions for salaries, wages and raw material—the sum out of which it had to pay interest, overhead and profit was 11·2 per cent below the 1926 level, in terms of money income, but was 9·5 per cent more in terms of real income.

I should like to point out that in those three, namely total wages paid, per capita wages and the share which went to capital in Canadian industry, there was a decline in money income, but an increase in real income during the period of the depression, as compared with the year 1926.

Now let me give the other side of the story. While those people were prospering there were some others who were not doing so well. I submit this fact, that you cannot have one-half of the people slaves and the other half free. I mean you cannot have one-half of the Canadian people cared for in a period of depression, while leaving the other half to chance. Raw materials declined in money value. This item represents raw materials used in Canadian industry, and therefore includes a certain percentage of imported products. Those who were selling raw materials got 32 per cent less money for them, and in real value received 17 per cent less than in 1926.

The share received by agriculture was 49 per cent below the amount received in 1926, but the real income in agriculture fell by 36 per cent. Railway earnings, expressed in terms of money income, dropped 38 per cent, and in real income 23·6 per cent. Railway wages and salaries were 30·5 per cent lower, but expressed in terms of real income were 14·8 per cent lower. The per capita income received by the railway workers declined 6·3 per cent in money income, but was increased 15·4 per cent in purchasing power.

The problem I place before the house is a simple one. What are we going to do with the problem embodied in this small statement of facts? Is the House of Commons going to say, "All is for the best in the best of all possible worlds," when we find that during the five years of depression the burden fell upon the basic producer, and the farmer? So far as industry was concerned, the burden fell upon the railways, and that is the reason for our railway problem to-day.

That was the condition, while certain other classes in the community received fair recompense for the services they rendered. I have no panacea for these problems, but I do say that the House of Commons ought to consider them. I venture the further suggestion that if we are going to maintain the tariffs of to-day, which are lower than the tariffs of 1935, we will have to face the problem in an intensified form in the years which are to come, and the challenge made then will be keener than the challenge made to-day. We still have hopes. We who hold the view that the Liberal party will go forward with the expansion of markets, the reduction of tariffs, the idea of equality of opportunity for the different classes in the dominion and an enlarged opportunity for youth—as my distinguished friend would put it—we still have hopes!

It is sometimes said that in connection with these matters I am somewhat extreme—that is the word. I like to hear that. Well, I will venture to prove that I am not extreme. I want to show to the house not only that I am not extreme but that there are a few hon. members, on both sides perhaps, who in these matters are extreme, if there is any possibility of defining that term. For years, as many hon. members know, I appeared before the tariff board representing the Consumers' League. I asked for reductions in tariff, but never once in that period did I ever ask for a reduction in tariff below the wage content of the product produced.

Taking the census of industry for 1936 we find that total wages paid out in Canadian manufacturing industry represented 14·6 per cent of the value of the products produced. Salaries constituted 5·7 per cent. The average rate on dutiable imports into this country in 1936 was 26·7 per cent. If imports come from foreign countries outside the British Empire they are subject to a 3 per cent excise tax, and that 3 per cent is applied to the duty paid value. Therefore one has to add 3·8 per cent to the 26·7 per cent. Then we have the sales tax, and the sales tax must be applied on the duty, because the tax upon a duty is an added duty. Adding these we find a total of 32·8 per cent representing the average tariff in Canada on dutiable goods. In those goods we have a wage content of 14·6 per cent. Am I extreme when I say a tariff rate of more than twice the value of the wage content in the product, and one which represents more than 50 per cent in excess of the entire wages and salaries, is too high a tariff for Canada, and something which calls for a sharp reduction?

Let me put this before you in another way. You have a factory in which you are manufacturing goods. You produce one million dollars' worth of goods in a year. Your wage bill is less than $150,000. If you import the products which are manufactured in that factory, under a Liberal government you would pay 32·8 per cent or $328,000. Is it enough? Well, I venture to suggest that it is substantially lower than it was under the Conservative government, but to me that is scant consolation. It is substantially higher than it was under the former Liberal government. I believe as Liberals that we should do something to get back to the days when we had a measure of freedom and when trade was not restricted as it is to-day.

Let us apply this to textiles. In 1930 the average rate on dutiable textiles from the United Kingdom was 20·3 per cent, leaving out the sales tax, excise tax and all those other things. In 1935 it was 29·3 per cent and in 1937, the average rate was 26·1 per cent. That is a reduction of a little over three per cent from the top level of 1935. The average rate on dutiable goods from foreign countries was 28·9 per cent in 1930, 36·6 per cent in 1935 and 34·8 per cent in 1937. I submit that those rates are too high and that something ought to be done about them. I am not an extremist when I point out these things to the house. I am a Liberal and I am simply calling attention to rates which are too high. Unless these rates are remedied they will not only destroy the industry of the dominion but will bring about a tragedy almost as great, the destruction of liberalism itself.

Here are some other rates which I am sure will be interesting to some of my hon. friends. I have taken the average rates on art silk from four countries, and it will delight the hearts of Conservatives to know that these are countries with which we have favourable balances of trade. Here is the way we have used them in the last few years. The average rate on art silk imported from Belgium, China, Italy and Japan is 103 per cent, not including excise tax, sales tax and other taxes. Am I an extremist when I point out these things? I contend that I am only a rationalist trying to argue what is sound and reasonable in a world which has gone tariff mad. But I have substantial support for my argument. I should like to quote one or two distinguished gentlemen. Sir Arthur Salter, in his book entitled World Trade and its Future, makes the following statement which has particular reference to the difficulty which we face in Canada to-day:

> Always, as the negotiations proceeded, one felt that the dominant consideration in the mind of each national representative was not a conception of his nation's interests as a whole, mistaken or not, but a calculation of pressures to which the national government would be subjected by organized interests in the respective parliaments.

In other words, we are not suffering to-day from these extreme tariffs because the leaders of thought and opinion want them. We are not suffering because the people of the Dominion of Canada or the people of the world want them—they do not. We are suffering because of the pressure brought to bear by definite groups upon the parliaments of almost every country in the world. These groups, pressing their will persistently and steadfastly, deny to the people of the world the opportunity to come into the inheritance which is theirs. Sir Arthur goes on to say:

> Consequently the net result of the Genoa resolutions was rather to endorse and consolidate a system of trade barriers which everyone, looking at it as a whole, recognized to be injurious to world recovery, and those passages in them which recommended reductions remained as merely pious hopes without practical effect. And in general this was the experience of other conferences of this period, though a few organized at Geneva for more modest and specialized purposes secured the removal of some of the least defensible forms of trade obstruction.

I come now to the argument made by another distinguished gentleman. I quote from the report of the imperial economic conference of 1932. At that conference the present right hon. leader of the opposition had this to say:

> When we reach an agreement—

He was referring to the empire agreements.

> —by which our products pass more freely from one empire country to another, we drive clear channels through the stagnant pools dammed up by the world upheaval, and naturally we will carry past the boundaries of the empire and to its benefit, establish once more again throughout the world that commerce which is its very life blood.

I heard the hon. member for York South tell us that what we needed was a more or less self-contained economy, one in which we could be free from contact with the outside world. We were to be made invulnerable, but we have the leader of the Conservative party, the Prime Minister of that time, telling the assembled delegates that the way of escape was not by restriction, but by breaking down these barriers and restoring a larger measure of freedom of trade within the countries.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to state that the hon. member's time has elapsed.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER: It must be with the unanimous consent of the house.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I come now to another point. I only want to show the unity of thought that exists among men of different political beliefs and diversified thought. First I quoted the words of Sir Arthur Salter. Then I quoted my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition. I should like now to quote the right hon. Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King). At the special session of 1930 he moved the following resolution:

> This house regrets that the government has seen fit at a special session called to deal only with unemployment to propose great increases in customs taxation on a wide range of commodities under circumstances which prevent this house and the country from securing adequate information regarding the proposals and prevent proper parliamentary discussion of them.
> In the opinion of this house the tremendous increases in taxation proposed will not end unemployment,—

They did not.

> —but will inevitably increase the cost of living—

They did not increase the cost of living very materially, but they increased it above what it would have been if greater freedom of trade had been given to us. I continue:

> —and will also increase the cost of production in the primary industries, agriculture, fishing, mining and lumbering, thus making it more difficult for Canadian producers in these industries to meet world competition in marketing their products.

I have quoted the attitude of certain leaders of thought in the Dominion of Canada and elsewhere. I find myself in exact agreement with their views. Why should I be regarded as an extremist when I say that we should do these things? Why should anyone say that I am an extremist when I accept the policy which these men accept? Why should I be called an extremist for thinking as does every leader of thought, not only in the dominion but throughout the world? These are important things and things which should be considered very carefully in the present disturbed condition of the world.

I want to turn to one other matter. At the present time the members of the government are faced with a difficulty. They are trying to do something which beyond question ought to be done. They are trying to break down the barriers of trade. I confess that I do not hold with the convictions which the Minister of Finance has expressed in regard to unilateral tariff reductions. I hold to another view. I believe that tariff reductions aside from treaties should be made. It depends, of course, on the way that they are carried out. We are confronted with great difficulties in that regard. But if it can be successfully done, and if this proposed agreement becomes a broad measure, leading to a wide reduction among these nations and carrying through to others by means of the most favoured nation treaties—if that is accomplished, beyond doubt it will be the greatest economic event of the present century. I do not think there is a doubt that it can be done, and if this government will bring it about, then indeed the Minister of Finance will have accomplished something which is an important Canadian event and an important world event.

We have reached a stage in world history when, I venture to suggest, no longer can any country in the world have a high standard of living and at the same time maintain a high tariff. I will give one example. Take a country like Baffin Land, whose population consists entirely of Eskimos, producing nothing but sealskins and blubber. They can have a comfortable standard of living, within their own conception of a standard of living, consisting of sealskins and blubber. They may have a national policy and vote for blubber and protection. But if they want to enlarge their standard of living they must market the products which they produce—exchange them for the products of other countries. I move from Baffin Land to Saskatchewan. The main products of that province are cattle and wheat. The people cannot live upon a high standard on cattle and wheat alone, so if they are to increase their standard of living they must provide a measure of freedom of exchange; they must have an opportunity to exchange the products they produce for the products which other people produce. Exactly the same state of things, in varied measure, exists so far as the people of Ontario or the maritimes or British Columbia or any other province are concerned. If you would increase your standard of living you must have greater freedom of trade.

What does an increase in the standard of living mean? It means only one thing—the maintenance of high wages or a greater purchasing power; and when you restrict your trade by tariffs you are in fact voting for nothing else than a reduction in your real wages.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I am reluctant to interfere with an interesting speech, but I think it is a very early stage in the debate to establish the principle of unduly extending, beyond the conclusion of the point being made by your honour, the time allotted to the hon. member speaking.

Mr. SPEAKER: I myself raised the point a few minutes ago, but all hon. members seemed anxious to hear the hon. member for Huron North speak somewhat longer, and that is why I allowed him to proceed. As a rule, hon. members should speak no longer than forty minutes.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Question.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I must say I regret that the hon. member did not conclude his speech in this debate. It was the latter part of his speech in which, I think, many of us were particularly interested.

I would join with those who have congratulated the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) upon the manner of his presentation of the budget, the comprehensive survey which he has made. Congratulations should also be extended to the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson), who made an excellent criticism of the minister's speech. And of course we always listen with a great deal of interest when the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) explains his views on tariff and financial matters.

In the budget speech and in the budget there was one particular thing which stood out very clearly, namely, that a vast proportion of our revenue is raised by taxes which bear heavily on the great masses of the people. We find, for example, that by way of customs import duties we collected $93,456,000; from the sales tax, $138,054,000, and from excise duties, $52,037,000, a total of $283,547,000. If, in addition, taxes on manufacturers' importations are added—and they ought to be because they are passed on to the consumers—we must add another $42,765,000, making a grand total of $326,312,000. Now, break this down, as the minister did in his budget speech, on a percentage basis, and we find that customs duties account for 17·62 per cent of the revenue; sales tax, for 26·03 per cent; excise tax, for 9·81 per cent, making a total of 53·46 per cent for those items. If, as I contend we should, we add the manufacturers' importations, another 8·06 per cent, we have a total of 61·52 per cent of the entire revenue from import duties, sales tax and excise, an enormous percentage taken directly from the consuming masses of this country. It should be pointed out that these items together account for nearly $30 a head for every man, woman and child in Canada. When we remember that members of the Liberal party in this house from time to time have criticized and taunted our social credit friends because they have not carried out their promises, let us also remember that the Liberal party has not carried out its promises by reducing these important items which bear so heavily upon the masses of the people. Calculated on the basis of a family of five persons, it means that approximately $150 a year or $12.50 a month per family is collected in these hidden taxes, to say nothing of the exactions which are permitted by the operations of a tariff. That in itself would account for more than $25 per month per family, an amount of which we have heard so much in the house during this session.

All we get in the budget besides the exemption from sales tax of building materials is an exemption from sales tax of food for fur-bearing animals, repairs for fishermen's boats, harness and harness parts, and gopher poison. The fox farmer gets his feed, the fisherman get his tar, and the prairie gopher gets his poison free of all sales tax. That is about all we have in the budget for these particular classes. What a commentary, I may add, on the budget of 1938!

The minister said that almost half of our total imports come into Canada free of duty. But when we examine that statement we find that these are mainly raw materials or partly manufactured articles for manufacturing industries. Then, of course, we find included the $100 exemption for tourists returning to this country. May I say here, because I wanted to say it earlier in the session, that when the department interprets the word "included" as "contained" in relation to that exemption, in my opinion they are misinterpreting the will of parliament.

After the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsley) had argued, in a discussion which occurred quite early in the session, that articles brought into this country must be "contained" in the baggage of the tourist, I looked into the matter and found that the resolution of parliament used the words, "included in the baggage", which, it will readily be seen, is a very different matter.

As I listened to the first half of the minister's speech I realized that it was an apology for the announcement which was to follow, the announcement of a policy of doing nothing; this conclusion was irresistible. My mind went back to those days when I listened to the Minister of Finance as a crusader for something approaching universal free trade.

Mr. DUNNING: He still is.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then it is very carefully concealed in this budget.

Mr. DUNNING: Universal free trade would be an admirable thing.

Mr. COLDWELL: But in those days, I would point out, it was not only universal free trade, because in common with many of us in western Canada, the hon. gentleman was preaching free trade as an economic and social philosophy.

Mr. DUNNING: Not for Canada alone, never.

Mr. COLDWELL: Then I greatly misunderstood the minister, as many thousands did.

Mr. DUNNING: The hon. gentleman certainly did. He cannot quote a single speech of that kind emanating from me.

Mr. COLDWELL: That was the interpretation we placed upon the minister's speeches in those days. If not the Minister of Finance, then to the left of him sits the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar). I remember repeating many of the arguments he used in the elections in the old days in the province of Saskatchewan from the platforms of the Progressive party of which he was at that time the leader.

Mr. CRERAR: Is that an argument for free trade?

Mr. COLDWELL: No; but I remember the arguments which were used by the minister at that time in favour of free trade.

Mr. CRERAR: As a matter of fact my hon. friend, in many admirable speeches he made then, never argued for free trade.

Mr. COLDWELL: I repeated many of the arguments of the minister, and I thought at that time I was arguing for free trade, but I find that I was probably in error. And of course I can remember the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell), who was regarded as a convinced free trader in those days. Yet to-day we have the Minister of Finance repeating with even greater emphasis what he said last year.

Mr. DUNNING: Two years ago.

Mr. COLDWELL: I quote:

> It is even more true, in the world to-day, that unilateral tariff reductions will not get the wider export markets which our products need and which the government is securing for them.

How, then, does this policy differ from that of the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), who declared in 1930 that he would make the tariff work for Canada? He merely put the same thought more dramatically when he said, "I will blast my way into the markets of the world." The Minister of Finance went on to say:

> The United States is not prepared to reduce its tariffs except by way of trade agreements, and the United Kingdom is now pursuing a similar policy.

Then he concludes that unilateral action by Canada is out of the question and that bilateral trade agreements form the policy of the government.

Mr. DUNNING: What would my hon. friend suggest should be done when two customers who take eighty per cent of all we have still definitely have that policy?

Mr. COLDWELL: That was also true in 1930.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, yes.

Mr. DUNNING: Britain was free trade in 1930.

Mr. COLDWELL: Britain was free trade in 1930 only to a certain extent.

Mr. DUNNING: Entirely.

Mr. COLDWELL: And she was rapidly going in the direction of a very low tariff, because the British tariff to-day is not comparable with the high tariff which we have in Canada at the present time.

Mr. STEWART: And she was taking our products.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. I am reminded that she was taking our products. But the point I make is this: How does this policy differ from the brick-for-brick policy which I am sure I heard the Minister of Finance denounce in western Canada some years ago.

Mr. DUNNING: Hear, hear.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, to-day we are told that we cannot take off a brick unless the United States takes off a brick; and if on the other hand the United States puts a brick on we, too, by the same argument, should put a brick on. That would be a bilateral agreement to the fullest extent.

Mr. DUNNING: You are saying that, not I.

Mr. ROWE (Dufferin-Simcoe): That would be a countervailing duty.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes. I think, however, the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) covered that point very well to-day. But where are all the Liberals who told the Canadian people of the wicked exactions that were taken through the tariff by the textile industry, the agricultural implement industry and other industries throughout Canada? Where, now, are the threats that were made a few weeks ago in this house by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and by others to the farm implement industry? That was before the Saskatchewan election, and those speeches, may I say, were widely circulated during that election. I have on my desk before me the manifesto of the premier of Saskatchewan in which he makes this statement regarding farm implements:

> With the object of reducing the retail price, the government will continue to press upon the federal government the necessity of removing all tariff duties on farm implements. Should such action fail to bring about reasonable reduction the government will further press the federal government to take the necessary action to control the prices of such implements.

There we have a Liberal government in the prairie provinces within the last two weeks promising to use its influence, not for bilateral trade agreements, but for unilateral action, the removal of all tariffs from the farm implement industry. An hon. member suggests that he did not have enough influence. Well, statements of this description at any rate secured for the Liberal party in that province a goodly number of votes, and that, I think, is one factor which is undermining our democratic institutions at the present time. Political parties seek office on specific promises, and then, when they have achieved office, forget all about the definite pledges they have made.

The minister says that unilateral action cannot be taken. Such a statement is as old as the tariff controversy itself. As a matter of fact, the assertion that free trade depends upon its mutuality has always been the favourite argument of high protectionists. Give us universal free trade, they have always said, and we shall always be in complete accord with it. Protectionists have always argued that mutuality must be the key-note of free trade. Every book that I have read on the philosophy of free trade makes that particular point quite clear. I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite assert that countries which tax our exports to them not only injure us but injure world trade generally. I have heard them further say that every tariff wall is a wall not only against income but against outgo. That has been the argument used by our free traders throughout Canada, and indeed throughout the world—I was going to say, from time immemorial, but that would not be correct—for a century, ever since Cobden and Bright went on the war-path in favour of free trade in Great Britain.

Now a Liberal Minister of Finance says that tariff reductions will not get the wider export markets which our products need.

Mr. DUNNING: No. The hon. member has left out a word, the word "unilateral."

Mr. COLDWELL: I am sorry; it was not intentional. Unilateral tariff reductions will not get the wider export markets which our products need. There we have a statement which has been made by every protectionist philosopher who has written a book on tariffs and protection. That is the reason why I said at the very outset that there seemed to be a considerable change in the outlook of the Minister of Finance from the days when I used to vote for him, incidentally, in Saskatchewan.

Mr. DUNNING: Only very incidentally.

Mr. COLDWELL: Oh, I have done it.

An hon. MEMBER: And you do not regret it.

Mr. COLDWELL: No, I do not regret it. How many Liberals in this house actually believe in the Liberal platform and are prepared to practise what that platform preaches? I should like to find out, and I think the country generally would like to find out. I therefore propose to move an amendment to the amendment, in which I have incorporated the Liberal tariff platform. I move, seconded by Mr. Douglas (Weyburn):

That the amendment be further amended by adding the following thereto:

That this house further regrets that the proposals submitted by the Minister of Finance on June 16 disregard the pledges of the Liberal party to the Canadian people contained in its platform of 1919 and subsequent years, which declared, among other things, that the best interests of Canada demand that substantial reductions of the burdens of customs taxation be made with a view to the accomplishing of two purposes of the highest importance: first, diminishing the very high cost of living which presses so severely on the masses of the people; second, reducing the costs of the instruments of production in the industries based on the natural resources of the dominion, the vigorous development of which is essential to the progress of our country.

That to these ends, wheat, wheat flour and all the products of wheat, the principal articles of food, farm implements and machinery and repair parts thereof, rough and dressed lumber, gasoline, illuminating, lubricating and fuel oils, etc., nets, net twines and fishermen's equipment, cements and fertilizers, should be free from customs duties as well as the raw material entering into the same.

These are not my words; they are the words of the Liberal party which has been in office for fourteen years since those promises were placed in their platform and program. I want to see whether I can find out, and the country, I believe, wants to know and ought to be able to know, just how many persons in this house agree with that platform. I say quite frankly that I agree with the proposals contained in that platform. If it is not the policy of the Liberal party, whose government this is, then let the Liberal party cease to divide the people upon an issue which they themselves have largely made an unreal issue in Canada; because wherever you go on the prairies even to-day the speeches of the times to which I have referred still carry weight, still have an effect, and you will find that instead of discussing other economic issues many of our farmers and people on the prairies discuss the merits of the tariff proposals of the Liberal party and consistently vote for that party because they believe that those proposals are a part of the tariff policy of that party.

Mr. MARTIN: The hon. gentleman did the same thing to-day.

Mr. COLDWELL: Well, I do not know that I did. But the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) will have an opportunity of pointing that out a little later.

In other words, if there is a Liberal in this house who believes in his party's official tariff program, I contend he should vote for the subamendment which I have just moved.

Just over two years ago I made the statement in this house that in my judgment the tariff controversy in Canada was largely out of date owing to the fact that such promises as this had not been implemented. And I listened with a good deal of interest to the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Motherwell) this session stating that in his opinion all we had succeeded in doing in the years that have gone by is to create a great deal of hard feeling and to divide the people. The purpose of my amendment is to test the opinion of the house regarding that policy.

If the Liberal party and the Liberal government of this country will not give an opportunity to the constituents whom I represent in this house to go into the open markets of the world to buy as well as to sell there, then again, using the words of the hon. member for Melville, we must expect some compensating adjustments. If the farmers of the west and other parts of Canada are forced to buy in what is after all a highly protected market, then they have the right to expect that the product which they produce shall be protected, so that they may receive an adequate return for their labour, or in other words, that their products, as in New Zealand, shall receive a proper minimum price which will enable the producers to buy within this protected market in which they have to operate. One or other of these two things it seems to me is a matter of simple justice: either that our producers should be permitted to buy in the open market, if they have to sell there, or that they should be guaranteed their price level, as the manufacturers and other groups are guaranteed a price level by the tariff to-day.

There are many other aspects of the budget which one might discuss. I was of course interested in what the minister had to say regarding the financial outlook of the government. That, however, can be discussed under the Bank of Canada bill which is now before the house, and if I may do so I would here express a great deal of pleasure that the government have seen fit to bring in a bill to nationalize the Bank of Canada.

An hon. MEMBER: At last.

Mr. COLDWELL: At last. The group with which I am associated has consistently urged this in the house ever since 1921. I should like to see the government go beyond that and exercise greater control over the chartered banks; indeed I should like to see the chartered banks also made public institutions.

The hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) made a very interesting comparison in the opening part of his speech. He stated that the average real wage of those employed in 1935 was higher than the average real wage of those employed in 1926. He then went on to show that the earnings of capital also increased during the same period, but that the returns to the farmers greatly decreased. That statement regarding our farmers of course is quite correct. On the other hand let us bear this in mind, that the hon. member for Huron North was taking all the farmers collectively, but he was in reality, as I understand, taking only that portion of labour which was employed. Those of us who remember the evidence given before the implements committee, for example, will recollect that the farm implement companies stated that they first dismissed their lower paid and casual employees and endeavoured to retain their permanent employees and officials. Naturally these men received higher wages and salaries, while a number of the other casual employees were forced to go on relief and had no wages. So if you take labour in the mass, I think you will find that it suffered tremendously during the depression. The farmer, of course, and particularly the western farmer, suffered more than anyone else during that period of depression. Capital, however, was represented by substantially the same people who controlled it prior to the depression. There may have been changes here and there; but in the main it was the same group, and it seems to me that in reality that group alone received an increased return during those years of depression. So, if we want to get the picture presented by the hon. member for Huron North clearly in our minds, we must take these factors into consideration.

I do not want to make my speech more lengthy, but I should like to close with the thought with which I began. It is this, that the picture presented by the Minister of Finance in the budget clearly indicates that the revenue of this country is largely derived from the great masses of the people. The hon. member for York South spoke of the sales tax and the increase in the revenues from that source since this government took office. There was the enormous sum of $138,000,000 largely taken out of the pockets of the common people of this country by means of that tax. Then there is the sugar tax, which bears heavily on every home in this country. According to these figures, as I have said, the revenue of the country to a very large degree has been derived from the masses of the people.

I should like to see the government consider other ways and means of obtaining necessary revenues. For example, out of our natural resources are extracted huge volumes of wealth by corporations some of which are largely owned by people who do not reside in Canada. At the moment I am thinking of International Nickel, with profits last year in excess of $53,000,000. I am thinking of Consolidated Smelters which last year, out of the resources of this country, made a profit of some $16,000,000 and placed in reserve $3,000,000 to meet profits this year. Then it paid a dividend of $2.50 on the original $5 share. Someone will say that these shares are worth more than $5 to-day. They are not really worth more than $5. That was their original value; but in the open market, by speculation, such shares may be boosted up to $20, $30, $40, $50 or $100.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister does not agree; nevertheless that is a statement of fact.

Mr. DUNNING: Not in relation to the companies of which my hon. friend is speaking.

Mr. COLDWELL: My point is that apart from those considerations enormous profits are being made out of the resources of this country, and the time has come when we ought to look to these resources to provide revenue not for private corporations but for the Dominion of Canada. The present budget is brought down following a year of comparative prosperity; I say "comparative prosperity" for certain groups. There is every evidence of a recession. As the minister intimated, or at least implied, if war industries ceased and the demand for certain Canadian products disappeared, we would find ourselves in a very difficult position.

Mr. DUNNING: No.

Mr. COLDWELL: The minister says he did not imply that. In the course of his speech he stated that our position was not good in every respect.

Mr. DUNNING: If my hon. friend will permit me, I emphasized that the danger of war, which produced a demand for certain commodities, also reduced the demand for other commodities which depended upon peace and prosperity in the countries which bought our goods. The inference is that if the demand for war materials ceased, then conditions of peace and prosperity would bring about a demand for much more of our other commodities. I am sorry if I did not convey that clearly, because that is what was in my mind in what I had to say.

Mr. COLDWELL: That was not the impression that I got, and moreover I do not think the minister ought to be so optimistic. I am of the opinion that even if to-morrow the world should reach an agreement regarding disarmament, the tremendous burden of debt created by rearmament would largely nullify the gain that we would make, at least for a considerable time to come. Therefore I say we should be looking to the future and trying to find ways and means of increasing the revenue of the country without adding to the burdens of the common people.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, anyone listening to the minister's superb delivery of his budget speech and to the contents of that speech, remembering at the same time that the cry of the suffering is going up throughout the land from coast to coast, could not possibly escape the thought that the minister is a confirmed optimist. He can dress up a gloomy situation to make it look attractive and beautiful better than anyone to whom I have ever listened.

Mr. DUNNING: You can do pretty well yourself.

Mr. BLACKMORE: I appreciate the minister's compliment. After having said that I congratulate the minister upon having thus performed, I must say there are some things about the budget which are not quite so attractive. In the first place I believe everyone must grant that this is a rich man's budget. It depends upon taxation and borrowing. Taxation and borrowing both tend to work in the interests of the rich man and to the disadvantage of the poor. There is, moreover, no new source of money. This both permits and obliges the banking system of Canada to go on creating all of the nation's money. This budget, therefore, is a betrayal of the Canadian people. It betrays the aged, the middle-aged, the youth and the infant in arms. The budget speech either repudiates or qualifies the Liberal party's promises of monetary reform made in 1935 and in previous years.

I turn to page 3902 of this year's Hansard, and I read these words:

> There are some, of course, who appear to believe that the government should not pay interest at all or, indeed, should issue debt free money to finance its expenditures or to retire its interest bearing debt or to do both of these things. It is incredible that this hoary fallacy should persist after so many historical demonstrations of its devastating possibilities.

I shall stop for a moment to talk about hoary fallacies. To certain types of mentality everything that has not yet been done is an impossibility. How the minister, with his natural optimism, can be of that mentality surpasses my understanding to comprehend. Iron was never successfully used for ships and was consequently an impossibility until iron was used for ships. A perusal of the debates in the British House of Commons while they were considering the advisability of introducing iron for the building of ships reminds one strangely of some of the things we hear in this House of Commons when we suggest a change of monetary policy. For example, in the British house one man is reported to have said: "Iron for ships, forsooth! Why not stone for ships, then?"—a question which manifested a great deal of intelligence in that man.

Vaccination for the prevention of disease was apparently an impossibility until it was done. Alchemy, by which one substance was to be changed into another, was for centuries laughed at. It was considered impossible. Ben Jonsen even wrote a play called The Alchemist, in which the credulity of his fellows was laughed off the stage. But, behold! To-day we have learned how to change one substance into another. We now have synthetic rayon, rubber, dyes and nitrates. Who knows how much farther we shall go before the wonderful possibilities of this world are exploited? The dream of horseless carriages was a favourite source of amusement to some people, until all of a sudden an age developed in which horseless carriages became a reality.

Merely to look upon our proposals as a hoary fallacy does not reflect altogether to the advantage of the author of those words. We hear quite frequently urged against our contention the question: Has it been tried out? It has never been tried out. National money has never yet been tried out—not even by that king to whom the hon. member referred—in accompaniment with the dividend and the just price. Consequently social credit has never been tried out. And consequently, to certain types of mentality in the house, it is foredoomed to failure, and not worthy of a trial.

May I ask whether or not mine sweepers were a success before they were tried out? Were gas masks a success before they were tried out? If in the defence of London against air attacks they had waited until someone had tried out the devices to be used, I assume London would have been in as bad a position of utterly impotent helplessness as we are to-day in our financial affairs, a position the weakness of which future years will abundantly show.

To proceed with the minister's words:

> Perhaps I underestimated the insidious appeal of a program which promises to make something out of nothing, although I must say that for no one more than for a Minister of Finance should such a program have seductive charm.

Perhaps the word "seductive" was wisely chosen, but I doubt it.

Those who are arguing against social credit persist in saying you cannot have something for nothing. Social credit does not propose something for nothing. It never did, and it does not to-day. Not long ago the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) made a remark about something for nothing. In a few moments I shall comment on the matter; but before going into detail I feel moved to ask hon. members this question: Did any of you ever do anything to repay Shakespeare for writing his plays, or did you get them for nothing? Did you ever do anything in payment for Titian's and Raphael's works? Did you ever do anything in payment for Beethoven's and Mozart's works? People may laugh about this; but after they have thought the matter over long enough they will realize that passed down to this generation have been remarkable inventions, to the enjoyment of which the people of this generation are entitled just as much as we recognize they are entitled to the full enjoyment of the works of Shakespeare, Milton, Raphael and Beethoven. The less any one says in opposition to what I have said, before he has taken time to think, the better off he will be. We will ask anyone if he can devise a means whereby the inventions which have gone into the manufacture of the great machines we have to-day, and which unquestionably, to the extent to which we draw upon our inheritance, belong in some measure to everybody in the community, shall be paid for by those who use and enjoy them in the future. Let us ask anyone and everyone if he can say how we can enable the people to draw dividends from this part of their heritage of the past. I have never mentioned this before, but it is an exceedingly important matter. It is not saying that we want something for nothing; all we are asking for is a right. The minister goes on to say:

> How much easier my task would be if I could draw on the accumulated savings of the Canadian people without paying interest thereon—

May I point out to the minister that this is a completely erroneous notion of social credit. There is no desire to draw upon the accumulated savings of the people of Canada. It may look impossible to the person who has not studied the theory, but I say now that no one will be worse off. Everyone will be better off. That may seem impossible; nevertheless it is so. Many of these other things which I have mentioned seemed impossible, but they were carried out. The minister continued:

> —if indirectly I could do the same thing by issuing credit against our natural wealth, that is, against the resources of farm and forest and mine and factory now owned by the Canadian people as individuals and not by the dominion government.

Here the minister has a right idea of social credit. He says that he cannot draw credit against the resources which are not owned by the dominion government, but let me tell him that for many generations our banking institutions have been doing that very thing to their own profit and to the disadvantage of the people who own those resources.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. BLACKMORE: That may be questioned now, but I do not think it will be questioned when I have finished. The minister continues:

I am sometimes criticized because I do not accept the so-called "new economics" which is in fact centuries old.

I do not question that it is centuries old, but many of the finest things in this world are centuries old. The minister continues:

It dates back to that monarch—

I shall not read further from the minister's eloquent speech, but I should like to say a word or two about that monarch whom he does not name. He must be left as an uncertainty, an abstraction.

I should like to refer now to the admirable speech made last night by the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer). In my opinion it was one of the most courageous and effective speeches ever delivered in this house. As the days go on I believe the honour which is due to the hon. member for having delivered that speech under these circumstances will increase. I should like to quote briefly from page 4063 of Hansard:

As a matter of fact, under section 59, subsection 4 of our Bank Act, our chartered banks are now privileged to take a five dollar Bank of Canada bill and to exchange on the security of that five dollars, $100 of bank deposits written into the bank's books by a mere stroke of the pen, for either a one hundred dollar treasury bill or a one hundred dollar interest-bearing bond.

While we are talking about getting something for nothing, I should like to direct attention to that achievement of the banks as being a most astonishing example of getting something for nothing. What was it that enabled the country to use those $95 of deposits as money? It was the resoures of the Dominion of Canada which the minister has said you could not draw upon in issuing credit. There may be two notions about the matter, but I believe I could make out an extremely strong case from my standpoint if I had the time, which I have not. The hon. member continues:

That was the concession which was made to the chartered banks of the government of 1934, and they are not missing the opportunity; for to-day they hold $1,155,000,000 of such securities, an increase of $471,000,000 since that great concession was made when the Bank Act was amended to reduce gold reserves to twenty-five per cent and to reduce cash reserves to five per cent.

And again:

I say the chartered banks hold legal tender currency, which they own outright, for which they pay nothing, which they have secured freer than they used to secure the right to print their own currency, because the cost of printing them is now borne by the Bank of Canada, to a total, according to the May report of the Bank of Canada, of $247,000,000, $199,000,000 of which is on deposit with the bank and the balance is held in the bankers' tills.

The right hon. leader of the opposition was a party to the creation of the agreement under which the banks gained that power, and yet he rose in his place in this house and stated that it is impossible to get something for nothing. If the banks could do that without bringing about that inflation which the minister fears so intensely; if the money which they created was good, why could not the government have created that money just as well? If the government gave to the bank in return for $100, $95 of which was made up of figures in a book, an interest bearing bond, is there any reason why the government could not have kept that money or bond in the government treasury and issued credit against the bond? Would that credit not have been just as sound as that created by the banker? Under those circumstances it could have been debt free, and I can safely challenge any attempt to prove the contrary.

Mr. DUNNING: It is nearing six o'clock. I did not want to interrupt the hon. member while he was speaking, but I should like to direct attention to the peculiar position in which we find ourselves. Constant reference is being made to a previous debate of this session as well as to a matter which is before the house in the form of a bill to amend the Bank of Canada Act. I would refer you, Mr. Speaker, to standing order 41, citation 293 (a), which states in part:

—that a member, while speaking, must not:
(a) refer to any debate of the same session on any question not then under discussion.

We are now in the midst of the budget debate. If it is right to debate Bank of Canada matters on this occasion, then, when the bill comes before the house in its subsequent stages, we shall be liable to be debarred from discussing that matter. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you be good enough to consider that point. I do not want to stop my hon. friend from discussing these matters because there will be ample opportunity during the debate on a specific bill, but I thought it better to raise this point now rather than to allow a number of speeches to go on.

Mr. BLACKMORE: May I have time to complete one more sentence before six o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house.

Mr. BLACKMORE: This money which was used to buy Canadian bonds or other Canadian securities could have been used just as well to buy Canadian gold. In that case the gold would have been obtained by the banks for nothing, except the risk. The risk which they would take would be backed up by the resources of the people of the Dominion of Canada, which resources the banks do not own. Now I ask: Who is getting something for nothing?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

MILITIA ACT AMENDMENT

SANCTION BY PARLIAMENT OF PLACING OF MILITIA ON ACTIVE SERVICE BEYOND CANADA

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North) moved the second reading of Bill No. 84, to amend the Militia Act.

He said: This bill has been standing on the order paper for some time. I had hoped that its appearance on the order paper would in itself have been sufficient to direct attention to the necessity of revising an act the language of which is not only antiquated but obsolete in the light of present day circumstances. I would not have proceeded with this bill had I secured any indication that the government contemplated appropriate action in this matter.

In entering upon a discussion of the subject, I am not unmindful of the warning note sounded by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), during the debate on foreign policy, that members of this house should exercise reasonable caution in discussing issues of this kind. Nevertheless, I cannot overlook the fact, to which our attention was directed by the Prime Minister himself, that the trend of international affairs may at any time involve Canada in a very grave crisis. I cannot overlook the fact that in this act we have what are virtually the articles of war for Canada. We have in it the authority under which Canada may mobilize its man power; we have herein the authority under which Canada may participate in an external war. I say I cannot overlook these facts; but I submit that it would be folly verging upon the criminal to face the risks of the impending crisis without clearly defining and frankly discussing, in relation to our present constitutional status, the authority under which we engage in war.

I wish to make it quite clear at the outset that I am not attempting to discuss or propose changes in commonwealth relations. I am not attempting to discuss or suggest any alteration or change in the status of the crown with regard to dominion affairs. I had before me, in drafting the proposed bill, the Balfour formula of 1926, wherein it is declared that:

> . . . Great Britain and the dominions . . . are autonomous communities within the British empire, equal in status, in no way subordinate one to another in any aspect of their domestic or external affairs, though united by a common allegiance to the crown, and freely associated as members of the British commonwealth of nations.

I suggest nothing more than that which has already been proposed by the Prime Minister in the assurances he has given to this house and in the speeches he has made at successive imperial conferences, wherein he has said repeatedly that we have no commitments either to maintain neutrality or to engage in a war in the event that the British Empire should be involved in conflict, and that parliament will in the light of the then existing circumstances determine these issues. I have that clearly in mind, and if the bill is examined it will be found that it goes not a step beyond the policy already enunciated by the Prime Minister. I ask simply this, in discussing a matter of purely domestic policy, that there be now written into the statute those assurances which have been given the people of Canada by the Prime Minister; that the language should be clear and explicit with regard to our position in respect of fateful decisions. I ask that we give reality to his statement; that at least we take one step, a step which may easily be taken at this time, to give actual content to some of the assurances made by the Prime Minister.

I may also point out that what I propose is entirely consistent with British practice, and I hope that my friends who adhere to the British-front policy will not suspect me of any attempt to undermine that policy at this time or to suggest separation or secession from the empire. I propose nothing beyond the now recognized status of the dominion within the British Commonwealth of Nations. That which I propose in these bills is entirely consistent with British practice.

May I remind hon. members that the British Army Act, which in 1937 was entitled, "An act to provide, during twelve months for the discipline and regulation of the army and the air force", is an act which is re-enacted each year. The parliament at Westminster must meet and must re-enact each year an act providing not only for the establishment of the armed forces of the United Kingdom but also for the discipline of those forces within the United Kingdom and His Majesty's dominions beyond the seas, and it deals in every particular with the control of those forces. Each year that step is taken in addition to the voting of supply for the maintenance of the military, naval and air establishments in Great Britain. I have here excerpts from the Army (Annual) Act of 1937. In the first paragraph of the preamble this is what is found:

> Whereas the raising or keeping of a standing army within the United Kingdom in time of peace, unless it be with the consent of parliament, is against law . . .

There is, of course, a definite reason for the British practice in this regard, dating back to the days of the Restoration. In 1803 the statutory articles of war were incorporated in the army act. Those who are students of military law will easily trace back the development of this practice. I am quoting now from the authoritative Manual of Military Law, which states:

> The Army Act has of itself no force, but requires to be brought into operation annually by another act of parliament, (generally known as the Army (Annual) Act), thus securing the constitutional principle of the control of parliament over the discipline requisite for the government of the army. These annual acts afford opportunities of amending the Army Act, of which considerable use has been made.

Dealing with this matter, the British people have made it clear for definite reasons that the prerogatives of the crown in this respect shall be limited and shall be subject to the control of parliament. All I ask in this bill and in the companion bill is that we be definitely assured now, by statutory enactment of the control of parliament over three matters: the command of our armed forces, the imposition upon the Canadian people of compulsory military service, and the participation of Canadian forces in external war. You will notice that I recognize the necessity of the executive being completely unhampered and free to make prompt decisions and to act decisively and instantly with regard to emergencies requiring us to repel invasion. I ask that parliament have definite authority to deal with the command of the forces in the first instance, with the imposition of compulsory military service on the Canadian people, and as regards the participation of our forces in overseas war. That is all I ask—definite statutory authority providing for parliamentary control in a manner consonant with the parliamentary control exercized in the United Kingdom over the military forces of that kingdom.

Three questions arise in this regard. The first is, who shall exercise command over the armed forces of the dominion? The act at present reads:

> The command in chief of the militia is declared to continue and be vested in the king, and shall be exercised and administered by His Majesty or by the governor general as his representative.

I ask that this be amended in dealing with the exercise of command to include the words "administered by the governor general acting by and with the advice of the king's privy council for Canada." I know many will immediately argue that under the Interpretation Act the term "governor general" is held to mean the governor in council. I am well aware that section 23 of the Interpretation Act provides:

> When the governor general is authorized to do any act by proclamation, such proclamation is understood to be a proclamation issued under an order of the governor in council; but it shall not be necessary that it be mentioned in the proclamation that it is issued under such order.

But in the definition section of the Interpretation Act we have:

> "Governor," "governor of Canada," or "governor general" means the governor general for the time being of Canada, or other chief executive officer or administrator for the time being carrying on the government of Canada on behalf and in the name of the sovereign, by whatever title he is designated.

Section 7 reads:

> "Governor in council," or "governor general in council" means the governor general in Canada, or person administering the government of Canada for the time being, acting by and with the advice of, or by and with the advice and consent of, or in conjunction with the king's privy council for Canada.

There would appear to be two distinctly separate functions performed by His Excellency the Governor General. That may seem to be of minor consequence, but I think I should direct to this problem the attention of those who are more familiar with constitutional law than I am. I am at a complete loss to understand our position with regard to this matter, particularly as there is written into the Militia Act a section that makes the Army Act of Great Britain applicable to Canada. In section 69 of the Militia Act it is provided:

> The Army Act for the time being in force in Great Britain, the king's regulations, and all other laws applicable to His Majesty's troops in Canada and not inconsistent with this act or the regulations made hereunder, shall have force and effect as if they had been enacted by the parliament of Canada for the government of the militia.

I cannot reconcile this section, as drafted in 1904, with our position under the Statute of Westminster wherein it is provided:

No act of parliament of the United Kingdom passed after the commencement of this act shall extend or be deemed to extend to a dominion as part of the law of that dominion unless it is expressly declared in that act that that dominion has requested, and consented to, the enactment thereof.

I cannot find in the Army Act of Great Britain as it stands at the present time any express declaration that the Dominion of Canada has requested or consented to the application of that act to Canada. It is an interesting point that the fact that section 69 still appears and is in force in Canada is tantamount to a request and consent of the dominion that, in certain respects at least, the Army Act of Great Britain shall now be applicable to the armed forces of this dominion.

In dealing with these three questions which I bring to the attention of the house, it is perhaps well to consider the history of the Militia Act. No one is more familiar with that history than the right hon. gentleman who now holds the portfolio of Justice (Mr. Lapointe). On more than one occasion he has expounded and dealt in detail with the history of the act. At no time did he do so more thoroughly than in June, 1917, when he took issue with the leader of the house at that time in regard to the interpretation of the sections to which I am now directing the attention of the house. The act, as was pointed out by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) a few weeks ago, was introduced in 1868, shortly after confederation, by Sir George Cartier, under circumstances vastly different from those which obtain to-day. At that time, dealing with the command or exercise of authority with respect to the armed forces of the dominion, he drafted the section to read:

As provided by the fifteenth section of the British North America Act, 1867, the command-in-chief of the land and naval militia, and of all the naval and military forces of and in Canada, is vested in the queen, and shall be exercised and administered by Her Majesty, personally, or by the governor as her representative.

The act reads:

The militia shall consist of all the male inhabitants of Canada of the age of eighteen years and upward, and under sixty—not exempted or disqualified by law, and being British subjects by birth or naturalization; but Her Majesty may require all the male inhabitants of the dominion, capable of bearing arms, to serve in case of a levee en masse.

Section 5 divides all the male inhabitants of Canada into four distinct classes for the purposes of service. That was compulsory military service. The criticism of the bill, as I read the debates of 1868, was on the ground that the bill destroyed the volunteer system. The Minister of Justice will agree with me, I believe, that Sir George Cartier at that time felt it necessary under the circumstances then existing to impose some form of compulsory military service. As a matter of fact that form was modeled upon the French system then in vogue. The chief opposition to the bill, as one would gather from the debates of that day, was that it destroyed the volunteer system. and I submit that authority of compulsory military service still exists in the present Militia Act, as I shall endeavour to show in the course of my remarks.

Let us consider the circumstances. The war of 1812 was still within the memory of many then living. The government of Canada had suffered and had to deal with disturbances on the border, the St. Alban's raid and the Fenian disturbances, and the Canadian people were, as it was expressed in the debates, fearful of an invasion of combined Russian and American forces. They therefore felt it necessary at that time to have compulsory military service. Sir George Cartier said he hoped to provide forty thousand trained men per annum until ultimately Canada would have an army of trained men numbering seven hundred thousand capable of defending the shores of Canada. It was also stipulated in the act of 1868 that:

Her Majesty may call out the militia or any part thereof for actual service, either within or without the dominion, at any time, whenever it appears advisable so to do by reason of war, invasion or insurrection, or danger of any of them; and the militiamen, when so called out for active service, shall continue to serve for at least one year from the date of their being called out for actual service, if required so to do, or for any longer period which Her Majesty may appoint.

It goes on to provide that, when faced with sudden emergency, her majesty may appoint in command of the Canadian forces an officer of the regular British army. That may have been admirable legislation at the time, and I am merely drawing attention to the reasons which existed for it. In 1883 several acts dealing with the armed forces of the dominion were consolidated. The next important change occurred in 1904, in the Militia Act introduced by Sir Frederick Borden. The sections with which the amending bills deal were introduced in their present form—

Mr. BENNETT: The act of 1868 was repealed.

Mr. MacNEIL: Yes. As the leader of the opposition points out, they repealed the acts of 1868 and 1883, and introduced an entirely new bill, and the present sections 64 and 69, as they now stand, were then incorporated in the statute as drafted by Sir Frederick Borden. I think it is important to note the intentions of Sir Frederick Borden with regard to these matters, and on this point I wish to quote the words of the present Minister of Justice speaking on Bill No. 75 in the House of Commons in June, 1917, as reported at page 2520 of Hansard. He said:

Until a few days ago, I do not think that anybody who has studied the constitutional history of Canada ever expressed the opinion that her militia could be sent overseas by virtue of that act. The debates that took place in 1868 showed that there was no intention to change the principle or the meaning of the section I am discussing. In considering the words "either within or without the dominion" in a subsection we must not forget that Canada at that time included only the four provinces, Ontario, Quebec, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and it was important that the authorities should be empowered to send the militia outside of the area of those four provinces to protect and defend the British territory which forms to-day the other provinces of the dominion.

I come now to the Militia Act of 1904.

That is the act to which I am now referring, which is in force to-day.

Surely this act did not change or modify the principles which I have enunciated. The language of the section was made clearer by the insertion of the words "for the defence thereof."

The minister is referring to the section dealing with active service, which now reads:

The governor in council may place the militia, or any part thereof, on active service anywhere in Canada and also beyond Canada for the defence thereof at any time when it appears advisable so to do by reason of emergency.

The present Minister of Justice continued:

The right hon. Prime Minister quoted a few words from a speech by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, then Minister of Justice. He took good care, it seems to me, not to cite the language of the father of the act, the man responsible for the legislation, and who knows best what was the intention and aim of the bill. Here is the language used by Sir Frederick Borden, then Minister of Militia:

"Mr. Maclean: I would ask the minister if it is not the case that under the old section of the law as it now stands the militia of Canada could be used for the defence of the empire and sent out of this country for that purpose? But under the proposed law that is strictly prohibited.

"Sir Frederick Borden: No. I am advised, and was advised at the time of the South African trouble, for instance, that under the law we could not do that.

"Sir Sam Hughes: Could not do what?

"Sir Frederick Borden: That we could not send the militia to South Africa for service; under the law we were not able to do so. The present law has changed, as I say, in conformity with that view, and in sympathy with the idea which, as I said, controls the militia of mother countries and the militia of every one of the colonies of the empire, where you will find precisely the same clause."

On August 1, 1904, in committee, he said:

"Sir Frederick Borden: . . . The troops we sent to South Africa were not sent under the militia law at all. They were sent under a special arrangement; they went as volunteers. The same thing could be done at any time. It certainly would not be done under the militia act, either as it was or as we propose to make it, because there is no essential difference. Notwithstanding the fact that my hon. friend from Colchester questions my possession of common sense, I still believe that the act as we propose it is essentially the same in that respect as it was before, the object being to make clear the actual intention."

He said further:

"The very fundamental idea of a militia force always has been, and is now, home defence."

I am sure my hon. friend would not pretend to say that under the law as it is to-day the government could send a corps of the militia upon foreign service.

The Minister of Justice clearly indicated that to be the intention of the men who drafted the present Militia Act.

I wish now to turn for a moment to what actually occurred in 1914. I have the various sessional papers, including the orders in council passed prior to the assembling of parliament on August 18, 1914, and the various dispatches exchanged between His Royal Highness the then Governor General and the British government.

On August 1 this dispatch was sent from the Governor General to the Secretary of State for the Colonies:

My advisers while expressing their most earnest hope that peaceful solution of existing international difficulties may be achieved and their strong desire to cooperate in every possible way for that purpose wish me to convey to His Majesty's government the firm assurance that if unhappily war should ensue the Canadian people will be united in a common resolve to put forth every effort and to make every sacrifice necessary to ensure the integrity and maintain the honour of our empire.

On August 1 this message was sent from the governor general to the Secretary of State for the Colonies:

In view of the impending danger of war involving the empire my advisers are anxiously considering the most effective means of rendering every possible aid and they will welcome any suggestions and advice which imperial naval and military authorities may deem it expedient to offer. They are confident that a considerable force would be available for service abroad. A question has been mooted respecting the status of any Canadian force serving abroad as under section 69 of Canadian Militia Act the active militia can only be placed on active service beyond Canada for the defence thereof. It has been suggested that regiments might enlist as imperial troops for stated period, Canadian government undertaking to make all necessary financial provision for their equipment, pay and maintenance. This proposal has not yet been maturely considered here and my advisers would be glad to have views of imperial government thereon.

The Secretary of State for the Colonies to the governor general, August 4, 1914:

Though there seems to be no immediate necessity for any request on our part for an expeditionary force from Canada, I think in view of their generous offer your ministers would be wise to take all legislative and other steps by which they would be enabled without delay to provide such a force in case it should be required later.

From the governor general to the Secretary of State for the Colonies on August 5, 1914:

My government being desirous of putting beyond doubt status of Canadian volunteers, request that His Majesty may be pleased to issue an order bringing these volunteers under sections 175 and 176 of the army act.

From the Secretary of State for the Colonies to the governor general, dated August 6, 1914:

With reference to my telegram of August 4, His Majesty's government gratefully accept offer of your ministers to send expeditionary force to this country and would be glad if it could be despatched as soon as possible. Suggested composition follows.

Again on August 8 from the Secretary of State for the Colonies to the governor general:

Referring to my telegram sixth August army council state that a certain proportion of army troops will be required in addition to force mentioned. You will be furnished later on with suggested numbers.

I might go on and read numerous other messages. I refer to order in council P.C. 2067 dated August 6, 1914, which I think is important for the purpose of this discussion:

The committee of the privy council have had before them a report, dated August 6, 1914, from the Minister of Militia and Defence, representing, in view of the state of war now existing between the United Kingdom, and the dominions, colonies and dependencies of the British Empire on the one side, and Germany on the other side, creating a menace to the wellbeing and integrity of the empire, and having regard to the duty of the Dominion of Canada as one of those dominions to provide for its own defence and to assist in maintaining the integrity and honour of the empire, that it is desirable to mobilize militia units of the various arms of the service of such effective strength as may from time to time be determined by Your Royal Highness in Council, such units to be composed of officers and men who are willing to volunteer for overseas service under the British crown; to organize and equip them for war and to make and perfect all arrangements necessary to enable them to enlist and be enrolled for service under His Majesty's Government, should that government so desire.

The minister recommends, in order that this purpose may be carried out, that Your Royal Highness authorize the raising and equipment of such units of such effective strength as aforesaid, the concentrating of them at some point to be selected by the Minister of Militia, with Your Royal Highness's approval, and to make and perfect all arrangements necessary to enable them to enlist and be enrolled for service under His Majesty's government should that government so desire, upon such terms of engagement and for such service as may be deemed advisable.

I could go on and read the various documents on record, but I think I have read enough to show that on every essential point Canada was committed, prior to the assembling of parliament, to participation in external war. I could read the War Measures Act introduced in the house on August 19, 1914, which merely gave blanket ratification to those steps which committed Canada irrevocably at that time to participation in overseas war without the consent of parliament. That was determined under the authority of the statute which I now desire to amend. That statute is still in force. The historic precedent exists. Canada was committed to war without the consent of parliament, and that authority may again be invoked without the consent of parliament. I wish to make it clear that I am not criticising the action of those men who faced terrific responsibility under the most trying circumstances in 1914; I merely point to the facts as they exist. Surely we may profit to some degree from that experience, and if the assurance of the Prime Minister that parliament will now decide, under the constitutional status which we have attained, by reason very largely of Canada's sacrifices in the great war, means anything at this time, surely there can be no objection to the amendments which I propose to the Militia Act. If there is any failure to amend that act, the suspicion must lie in the minds of many that it is the intention again to invoke its authority in the same manner as in 1914.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): If my friend would permit me, for the purpose of information, is there anything in any of the orders in council he is mentioning indicating that those orders were adopted under the authority of the Militia Act?

Mr. MacNEIL: That is just the point. There are included in the sessional papers numerous orders in council referring to specific sections in the Militia Act, and the Naval Service Act. I shall show that the order in council was passed under the authority of the Naval Service Act ratifying the purchase of submarines and placing them at the disposal of his majesty's government.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): The Militia Act was mentioned in the orders in council, was it?

Mr. MacNEIL: Yes, in dealing with the formation of an expeditionary force, order in council P.C. 280, and particularly P.C. 2068 dated August 6, 1914, the concluding paragraph of which reads:

Whereas in view of the state of war existing between the United Kingdom and the dominions, colonies and dependencies of the empire on the one side, and Germany on the other side; and in view of the fact that thereby the Dominion of Canada is liable to invasion and other assaults of a hostile nature, such an emergency has arisen as calls for the placing of the militia on "active service."

Therefore His Royal Highness the governor general in council, under the authority of section sixty-nine of the Militia Act, is hereby pleased to order that such corps or parts of the militia as may from time to time, with the approval of the governor general in council, be named or designated in general orders published in the Canada Gazette, be placed on active service in Canada.

A subsequent order in council provided for the dispatch of the Canadian overseas expeditionary force.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): May I ask my hon. friend to quote again the order in council with reference to the overseas expeditionary force?

Mr. MacNEIL: It is dated August 10, 1914:

The committee of the privy council, on the recommendation of the Minister of Militia and Defence, advise that authority be granted for the Canadian overseas expeditionary force to be composed in accordance with the accompanying table.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): In that order in council there is no reference to the Militia Act.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: That last reference applies simply to the composition of the expeditionary force, does it not? Is it not still obligatory for parliament to give its approval before any forces can be sent overseas?

Mr. MacNEIL: My reading of these various orders in council is that this authority was granted prior to the assembling of parliament.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Only for mobilizing them in Canada. There is no provision in the Militia Act for sending them out of Canada before parliament is summoned.

Mr. MacNEIL: Is it not clear from the order in council I read a moment ago and the dispatches that were exchanged, that an offer was made to send an overseas force and the offer was accepted? Then comes order in council P.C. 2067, which provides:

—such units to be composed of officers and men who are willing to volunteer for overseas service under the British crown; to organize and equip them for war and to make and perfect all arrangements necessary to enable them to enlist and be enrolled for service under His Majesty's government—

The first message on August 1 stated that they intended to send an expeditionary force, and I think the inference may be drawn that at that time they were doubtful as to the interpretation of section 69 and suggested a device by which the Army Act might be made applicable to Canada. I have further sessional papers which indicate very clearly that these sections of the Army Act were invoked in order that there might be ample authority for the dispatch of an overseas expeditionary force.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Does not the act provide that parliament must come together within fifteen days after an attempt to mobilize, and under the law as it stands would not parliament still have to give its consent before any forces could be sent out of the country?

Mr. MacNEIL: That is the law as it stands. There is an order in council here providing that parliament shall be summoned within fifteen days, and it was so summoned on August 18, 1914. But, as I pointed out, the War Measures Act introduced by the Minister of Justice of that time gave blanket ratification to those steps already taken by the executive, committing Canada irrevocably to the dispatch of an overseas expeditionary force, and I can find nothing in the debates of the special session of August, 1914, that does more than is set out in the War Measures Act, which states:

2. All acts and things done or omitted to be done prior to the passing of this act and on or after the 1st day of August, A.D. 1914, by or under the authority of or ratified by,—

(a) His Majesty the king in council;

(b) any minister or officer of His Majesty's imperial government;
(c) the governor in council;
(d) any minister or officer of the government of Canada;
(e) any other authority or person;

which, had they been done or omitted after the passing of this act, would have been authorized by this act or by orders or regulations hereunder, shall be deemed to have been done or omitted under the authority of this act, and are hereby declared to have been lawfully done or omitted.

4. The issue of a proclamation by His Majesty, or under the authority of the governor in council shall be conclusive evidence that war, invasion, or insurrection, real or apprehended, exists and has existed for any period of time therein stated, and of its continuance, until by the issue of a further proclamation it is declared that the war, invasion or insurrection no longer exists.

5. It is hereby declared that war has continuously existed since the fourth day of August, 1914, and shall be deemed to exist until the governor in council by proclamation published in The Gazette declares that it no longer exists—

Now I wish to turn to the situation which arose in respect to the Military Service Act of 1917. In the preamble of that act the sections to which I referred are definitely quoted as indicating the necessity for the Military Service Act. Section 41 and section 69 of the Militia Act are quoted, and the justification for the Military Service Act, as the Minister of Justice will remember quite clearly, was that such authority had existed previously in the Militia Act. It was argued by the late Sir Robert Borden, by his Minister of Justice and by various supporters of the government at that time that from 1914 to 1917 authority had existed and could have been invoked under the Militia Act not only for the dispatch of an overseas expeditionary force but, if they had so desired, for the imposition of compulsory military service on the people of Canada; and, as I say, the justification for the Military Service Act of 1917 was that it was more desirable to have the method of selective draft rather than the system of balloting which is now in the act; for I contend that the compulsory military service feature is still contained in this act. As I stated a moment ago, all male inhabitants of Canada are still liable for military service and may be summoned to the colours by order of the governor general in case of a leveé en masse; and for the purpose of enrolment even in peace time the male inhabitants of Canada at present are divided into four classes and may be required to serve for a stated period. Of course that is obsolete in practice; but it is still in the act and that authority may be invoked if it should be so desired. I am not suggesting for a moment that the right hon. Prime Minister has the faintest desire to do so; but the language of the statute is obsolete in the light of the assurance of the Prime Minister and the present constitutional status of the dominion.

May I also point out that in the debate to which I refer it was quite apparent that there was a wide divergence of opinion, and I commend the debates of 1914 as well as those of June, 1917, to all members of this house for careful study at this time. As I say, the Prime Minister of the day, Sir Robert Borden; his Minister of Justice, and many other eloquent and able gentlemen argued that the authority existed in the Militia Act. They quoted the opinion of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick who, in dealing with the interpretation of these sections, particularly section 69, said:

The governor in council may send the militia of Canada out of Canada at any time when deemed necessary for the defence of Canada. If, in the opinion of the governor general in council it should be necessary, because of a war going on in India, to send militia out there for the defence of Canada, they may, in the exercise of their discretion, do it, because they are the sole judges of what is necessary to be done in the defence of Canada.

Then he went on to say:

But we do not think it advisable that that power should be absolutely and unrestrictedly in the hands of the governor in council. We think it advisable that the period during which they may exercise that power should be restricted and that parliament should be called together and be consulted at the earliest opportunity. Parliament must be summoned in fifteen days and then the whole matter will be in the hands of the people's representatives.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): But the opinion of Sir Charles Fitzpatrick was contrary to that of Sir Frederick Borden, who was the father of the act in 1904, was it not?

Mr. MacNEIL: That is true.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): What is my hon. friend's own opinion about it?

Mr. MacNEIL: I merely point to the ambiguity and remind the Minister of Justice that at that time he argued passionately and eloquently for the interpretation which might follow the intention of Sir Frederick Borden when he drafted the statute of 1904. But may I point out to the right hon. gentleman that his opinion, in which he was supported by his leader, the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, by the Hon. Mr. Oliver, the Hon. Mr. Lemieux and others, all of whom argued very emphatically for that interpretation, was overruled; and the interpretation prevailed at that time that under these sections of the Militia Act the executive, without reference to parliament except within the fifteen day period—

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): I could not say that the other opinion prevailed, because the act was replaced by a special new act for the purposes of the then war.

Mr. MacNEIL: The Militia Act was not repealed; the Military Service Act of 1917 substituted the selective draft for the balloting procedure necessary now to bring militia units up to the required establishment.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): Yes; but compulsory service during the war was carried on under the Military Service Act of 1917, entirely without regard to the old act.

Mr. MacNEIL: I am pointing out that the leaders of the political parties at that time—and I am not saying whether they were right or wrong, nor am I trying to revive discussion of the conscription issue—were divided in their opinions on this question. There were differences between able constitutional lawyers at that time, who were faced with tremendous responsibilities. Sir Wilfrid Laurier took direct issue, as he said, with the opinion of Sir Robert Borden on this very matter. The government of the day acted on the interpretation given by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, a former Minister of Justice and later Chief Justice of Canada. The sections of the Militia Act now under discussion are quoted in the preamble of the Military Service Act. I mention this incident to show that serious ambiguity exists, and I fail to understand why the Minister of Justice, having found himself in that position in 1917, has failed to amend the act as it stands to-day, so as to make the position clear that parliament has definite control over decisions as to compulsory military service and as to dispatch of troops beyond the frontiers of Canada.

Let me refer to one other point. Speaking of the advisability of frankness in discussion prior to the event, in May, 1918, there was serious disaffection in Canada, and that disaffection was brought to a head by the descent upon Ottawa of a delegation of four thousand farmers. They submitted through the present hon. member for Outremont (Mr. Vien), who was in the house at that time, a most remarkable document, from which I wish to quote briefly. It indicates the results which follow arbitrary executive action without reference to parliament, and the results which follow a failure to bring these matters under frank discussion. At page 2551 a remarkable document was read into Hansard as submitted by representatives of the agricultural community. I quote in part:

> Will the house permit us to speak more plainly what is in our minds? We have never believed that the conditions produced by the war demanded flagrant departures from the honoured processes of law enjoined by the constitution while parliament is in session or is near assembling. We believe that reliance upon parliament, instead of upon arbitrary authority, most effectively honours the guarantees of freedom which are embedded in the constitution. One considerable departure from sound practice may be accepted, but repetitions of it may be exceedingly dangerous, especially under such circumstances as now beset the state.
> Twelve days before the meeting of parliament in January, 1916, the authorized Canadian army was doubled from 250,000 to 500,000 men. No British army had ever been doubled without recourse to parliament. That it was done in Canada caused students of British history to inquire whether anything had occurred to warrant such a disregard of parliament. Though this House of Commons has inherited some of the consequences of such an innovation, we desire to confine our respectful remonstrances to more recent events.

It goes on to speak of riots in Quebec, unhappy circumstances through the agricultural communities, and the effect of the order in council endorsed by parliament which virtually swept aside the provisions of the Military Service Act of 1917. In view of the history of the Militia Act, the setting in which it was originally drafted, and in view of its inadequacy between 1914 and 1918, and the doubt which existed as to its exact interpretation, and as to the authority of the executive with regard to decisions of vital consequence, surely I am within my rights in urging the government to accept the amendments I have proposed.

It is intelligent and wise to act prior to the event. I say it is better far to face these decisions to-night, even though there may be sharp disagreement on some matters, than in face of grave emergency to have strife and dissension and disputes, such as I have referred to to-night in the quotations I have brought to the attention of the house. I say the Prime Minister might very well accept the amendment and keep faith with the youth of Canada whose lives are at stake, and who may be commandeered by the executive without reference to parliament under the terms of the Militia Act as it stands on the statute books of Canada to-day.

Mr. R. A. PELLETIER (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the measure with some hesitation, because it does indeed involve a highly technical constitutional question and one which perhaps might better be left to the consideration of legal authorities.

Nevertheless I have long felt that our position concerning this particular matter has never been clear and explicit enough, and it is my view that the measure now before the house would make the act clear and explicit beyond the shadow of a doubt.

I also keep in mind the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) when he told us to be very careful about what we had to say concerning foreign policies. Nevertheless I believe that because of the existing situation certain principles should always be kept in mind, and in that connection I am reminded of the expressions of Sir Edward Grey, otherwise known as Viscount Grey of Fallodon, a former Secretary of the Foreign office during at least part of the great war. Referring to the situation at that time he said:

> Every country had been piling up armaments and perfecting preparations for war. The object in each case had been security. The effect had been precisely the contrary of what was intended and desired. Instead of a sense of security there had been produced a sense of fear, which was yearly increasing. Europe was afraid of the German army. Germans encouraged in themselves and in others the belief that the German army was invincible.

I pause to point out that he was referring to conditions then existing. Perhaps the situation to-day is not similar. But the conclusion which he drew from his thoughts at that time are just as true to-day as they were then.

> Such was the general condition of Europe; preparations for war had produced fear, and fear predisposes to violence and catastrophe.

So, keeping that principle in mind, I feel it is simply supporting the stand taken by the Prime Minister that our position should be made clear in respect to our attitude concerning this particular question. For example, it was for that reason that on March 16, 1938, I tried to introduce a bill which would have had the effect of repealing the Military Service Act of 1917. Hon. members will recall the discussion which took place at that time when the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) assured us that the act was dead. As a matter of fact he said it was a "dead horse", and other similar references were made to the act at that time.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): And that was true.

Mr. PELLETIER: The purpose I had in trying to introduce the bill was to attempt to make our position in Canada as clear and explicit as we possibly could. No one can deny that since we are a part of the British Empire we must face our responsibilities in that connection. It is true the Prime Minister has assured us on many occasions that the people of Canada would be consulted, through parliament, if any action of that kind were taken. Yet when we notice the events taking place around us to-day we cannot help pointing with wonder at the words of Sir Thomas Inskip, Coordination of Defence Minister, who spoke in the British parliament just before midnight on May 31 of this year. The press report is as follows:

> James Ede, Labour, said last night that from Sir Thomas' statement it was clear the government had "legislative machinery" for conscription ready to be used as soon as war should break out.
>
> "I have said so as plainly as I could," the minister replied.

He went on to say:

> With the experience of 1914, the government departments concerned have given a great deal of consideration over a number of years to the best use of man power in an emergency.
>
> There is certain to be, in the event of war, a competent authority who will allocate, according to the age and capacity of each individual person, a suitable position for that person to occupy.
>
> But nobody would escape from the obligation which would be placed upon him in those circumstances by choosing a position, possibly one which he might think more attractive for himself, in peace time.
> If anybody elects to join one or the other of the many services asking for recruits at the present time, he will do so with full realization that he will not thereby be exempt from any obligation which parliament may impose upon him in time of war.

That is the declaration of Sir Thomas Inskip in the British parliament. I feel it was said simply because the present world situation, although it has quieted somewhat within recent weeks, is felt to be serious in Great Britain, and certain measures are being taken so that all things might be in readiness in the event of an outbreak of war.

Because of what the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) has said, I feel that every member of this house should support this measure, particularly the hon. members from the province of Quebec and elsewhere who have always felt they should be consulted before any such action was taken by the parliament of Canada. I should like to quote from the speech of the Prime Minister as follows:

> "What I have said and quoted—"
>
> I am still quoting what I said at Geneva two years ago.
> "—does not mean that in no circumstances would the Canadian people be prepared to share in an action against an aggressor; there have been no absolute commitments either for or against participation in war or other forms of force. It does mean that any decision on the part of Canada to participate in war will have to be taken by the parliament or people of Canada in the light of all existing circumstances; circumstances of the day as they exist in Canada, as well as in the areas involved."

In order to bring about that happy condition, I consider that the present Militia Act should be amended. Section 4 of the Militia Act reads:

The command in chief of the militia is declared to continue and be vested in the king, and shall be exercised and administered by His Majesty or by the governor general as his representative.

It does not say the governor general in council, nor does it refer in any other way to the parliament of Canada. There may be other limitations, but that is the language of that particular statute. In order to determine our exact position, we should know what are the powers of the governor general and who is the governor general of Canada. I hold in my hand the statutes of Canada, 1930, second session, and I should like to read from the prefix thereof relating to the letters patent constituting the office of the governor general of Canada. This reads:

Letters patent under the great seal of the realm, constituting the office of Governor General and Commander in Chief of the Dominion of Canada. Dated 23rd, March, 1931.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): Would my hon. friend read section 15 of the British North America Act in conjunction with that?

Mr. PELLETIER: I am coming to that. I just wanted to make it clear how the governor general was appointed, and in a few minutes I shall refer to the powers of the governor general as set out in the British North America Act. I quote:

Office of Governor General and Commander in Chief constituted.

We do hereby constitute, order, and declare that there shall be a Governor General and Commander in Chief in and over our Dominion of Canada (hereinafter called our said dominion), and appointments to the said office shall be made by commission under our sign manual and signet.

I wanted this to be placed upon the record during the course of my remarks to show definitely how the appointment of the governor general is made. Section 15 of the British North America Act reads:

The command in chief of the land and naval militia, and of all naval and military forces, of and in Canada, is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the queen.

It does not state that it is vested in the governor general in council. Executive power is outlined under sections 9 and 10 of the British North America Act, which read:

9. The executive government and authority of and over Canada is hereby declared to continue and be vested in the queen.

10. The provisions of this act referring to the governor general extend and apply to the governor general for the time being of Canada, or other the chief executive officer or administrator for the time being carrying on the government of Canada on behalf and in the name of the queen, by whatever title he is designated.

There is some reason for those of us who are not well versed in legal matters to believe that there may be room for disagreement in connection with the status of Canadians at the present time. In my opinion the present bill will serve to a large degree to clear up the situation. It will also serve to bring into effect the declarations made by the right hon. Prime Minister, that the people of Canada should be consulted in case of war. I could go on and refer to the fear which is in the hearts of so many people at the present time as to the outbreak of war. We realize the serious situation which exists in Europe, and we fear that our ties with other countries may involve us in war. I am not at the moment discussing our relationship to the British Empire or to Great Britain, but I do believe that as a part of the British Empire we must of necessity assume the responsibilities which exist at the present time and which must be faced. The words to be added by this bill to section 4 of the act are:

—acting by and with the advice of the king's privy council for Canada.

The other amendments proposed by the bill are along the same lines.

I intend to support this bill, and I want to make my position quite clear. I well remember during the election campaign of 1935 when I was asked many times to state my position in connection with war. In every instance I always replied I believed that in case Canada was invaded, every Canadian should be willing to give to the very last of anything that he possessed, even his life, in order to defend the country that he loved and the family that he had raised, but before he was sent overseas to take part in any war beyond the borders of Canada he should be entitled to express his opinion as to whether or not the reasons for that war were such that he could support. I do not wish to discuss the propaganda which is usually carried on at such time and which has such an influence upon public opinion. The fundamental principle of democracy which is involved is not altered in any degree. The individual who may be called upon to give up his life elsewhere should have the right to say whether he is willing to do so. I believe everyone in Canada desires to have that great privilege.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Hon. Charles A. Dunning, Minister of Finance, that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Lawson.

Mr. J. H. BLACKMORE (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with the remainder of the contribution which I am endeavouring to make to the budget debate, I should like to say, in criticism of the budget, that as a westerner and a representative of an agricultural constituency I protest against the fact that no effort has been made to reduce the duties on and the prices of, farm machinery to the farmers, and that no provision has been made for the reduction of the sales tax. Both of these matters bear heavily upon the people in my constituency and throughout the west.

When the house took recess at six o'clock I was referring to the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) as reported on page 4067 of Hansard, to the effect that he did not approve social credit principles. From what the hon. member said with reference to the issuing of purchasing power, one is forced to the conclusion that there is not much difference between his idea as to where the money could come from and the idea of those who believe in the social credit movement. Inasmuch as the origin of new money is the first all-important matter rather than what you shall do with the money after you get it, I contend that he was hardly justified in making so sweeping a statement as is to be found in column two of the page to which I referred. However, his opinions are his; ours are ours; and he has a perfect right to say what he likes. There is apparently this difference between his idea concerning money and ours. He did not, so far as I was able to understand, lay down in his speech the principle that the new money should not cause debt. Our stand is that when new money is created there should not be any debt of the government for that money; if anyone owes anybody for that money, he should owe the government of the country for the money. To us it is an absurdity that the government of a country should owe anybody in the country for the money that government has with which to carry on, or for the money which is created within the country. It is the unchallengeable, sacred, sovereign right of the government of the country to create such money as it is necessary to create within the country.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard did not say anything about the just price. I think he would be in a difficult position in maintaining an objection to the just price. It has not been discussed to any great extent, but certainly a just price commends itself to any fair-minded person.

As to what shall be done with respect to the dividend, may I raise just one or two questions for the benefit of the hon. member and other hon. members in this chamber? He mentioned last night the great amount of money which the British government was expending to increase purchasing power by an impressive rearmament program. He mentioned rehousing and a great many other projects which are being carried on to distribute purchasing power among the people. Let me ask this question first: When the rearmament program ceases, how will the government proceed to get the money into circulation? That question must be answered. And when rehousing has gone forward to as great a degree as is considered advisable under the conditions, how will an amount of money similar to that which has been expended through rehousing be distributed among the people? The same question might be asked with respect to each of the projects proposed. Again, it must be borne in mind that when any project is set forth and effected within a country, there are but a limited number of the people of that country who are enabled to get employment in connection with that project. The result is that a great many people to whom the purchasing power should come are unable by any ordinary means to get that purchasing power into their hands. The all-important matter is to get the purchasing power into the hands of the consumers. The hon. member will be faced with the difficulty of getting around that objection unless he accepts the principle of the dividend.

Let me turn for a brief time to the question of money. The Minister of Finance, whether he intended to or not, gave the impression that attempts in the past to use money by a government have been failures.

Mr. DUNNING: Oh, no.

Mr. BLACKMORE: In this connection let me refer hon. members to an extremely fine book, published in 1930, called The Theory and Principles of Central Banking, by Doctor William A. Shaw, editor of the calendar of treasury records of His Majesty's public records office. He is the author of seven successful books on monetary topics. There can be very little doubt that this man is one of the world's most eminent authorities. On page 50 of that book, which is to be found in the library, appear these words:

> And thereupon the treasury offered to sell them currency notes at full face price without limit, and at the same time opened a currency note redemption fund for the purpose of retiring the issue as soon as the need for it was over.

What is being discussed here is the means which the British government used to overcome the financial crisis with the banks, which crisis arose when the war broke out and they had a panic. I go on with the quotation:

> To the treasury's surprise, the currency note quickly struck root, and proved itself completely acceptable, and gradually the treasury realized that the whole circulation of the country could be changed over to paper and the gold withdrawn. The changeover was accomplished with astonishing ease and speed by 1916. By the restrictions which were later placed on the movement of gold this currency note circulation became virtually inconvertible, though it was not declared so by law until 1925.

Thus far there seems to have been little difficulty in making this national currency work. I turn again to page 51 and read the following words:

> To this currency note circulation there was at first no limit fixed. It could fall or rise unhampered, according to the community's demand or need of it, and in the remaining years of the war and of the armistice period it bore the strain of increased prices and enormously increased production without friction or effort. For the first time in history the world had a sample of a truly automatic currency, issued only by the state, sold only at full face value, supplied or retired in complete accordance and response to the community's unfettered demand or need.

May I stop just for a minute to comment. It is one of the fundamental ideas of the social credit proposals that the money in circulation shall depend upon the needs of the people; in other words, that we should have economic democracy to the fullest degree. Consequently this monetary experience has a most important bearing upon the social credit contention. To continue the quotation:

> After ten years of illuminating experience this perfect, uncontrolled, and uncontrollable automatic currency system was thrown over, the automatic principle was surrendered, and our currency, although declared by law to be inconvertible paper, was placed (or was supposed to be placed) under the control of the Bank of England, and became once again sensitive (or was supposed to be made sensitive) to the vagaries of a fluctuating gold cover fund.

The indications from the words used there are that if that change had not been made, this inconvertible paper currency, issued by the state and by the state only, would have been a most outstanding success. On page 57 we read further:

> The historical survey agrees with pure theory in declaring that currency control is not and cannot be a function of a central bank, and that paper currency must be entirely automatic alike in its issue and its retirement, just as the previous metallic gold circulation had been, and therefore that the control of it lies in the community, not in the central bank.

May I point out, pausing for a moment, that the idea is economic democracy; that the community itself shall decide the amount of money which shall be in circulation. To continue the quotation:

> In this perfect form such paper is incapable of overissue and debasement, and is therefore proof against manipulation at the hands of a needy government. Therefore the guarantee which Europe is seeking against inflationism resides not in a central bank (which is no guarantee at all), but in an automatic currency.
> Such is the verdict which I deduce from this rapid survey of European banking and currency history of the last hundred years.

In the light of such expressions as that, in a book written by so eminent an authority, any man inside this house or out who undertakes to point the finger of scorn at the economic reformer, the advocate of money reform, is being reckless in an extremely high degree.

May I now deal for a few minutes with what has actually happened with respect to the growth of money in another country; I refer to the United States. The information which I am now going to put on Hansard is drawn from pages 66 to 68 of a book called Inflation, by Woodward and Rose, published in 1933. In those two pages will be found the following illuminating figures:

Year	Coin and currency per capita	Bank deposits per capita	Total circulating medium per capita
1834.. ..	$ 5 24	$ 7 11	$ 12 35
1860.. ..	9 76	9 85	19 61
1880.. ..	13 93	44 30	58 23
1900.. ..	17 10	111 57	128 67
1915.. ..	18 56	218 48	237 04
1930.. ..	29 76	485 57	515 33

Until 1860 there was very little difference between the amounts of coin and currency and bank deposits, but notice the tremendous jump in the use of bank deposits—figures in a book—in these later years. In 1930 the coin and currency was $29.76 per capita; bank deposits, $485.57 per capita, and the total circulation medium $515.33 per capita. The figures which are given on these two pages show the way in which bank deposits, created by the banks out of nothing, constituting nothing but figures in a book, came rapidly to be the money which was used by the country. The figures are extremely striking. The last figures I gave indicate that in the United States in 1930 there was only $29.76 of coin and bills, what we ordinarily call money, while there was $485.57 of bank deposits. There is a common fallacious notion among people that bank deposits are in some way coin and currency, but these figures show clearly that such is not the case; for as I have just said, and I repeat, in 1930 there was only $29.76 of coin and currency per capita in the United States, while bank deposits amounted to $485.57 per capita—figures in a book.

The question is, who created these deposits? The banks of the United States, working through a hundred years of time; and our contention is simply that the government should have created that money. The government and not the banks should have owned it.

Let me turn now to another quotation. These quotations may be rather uninteresting, but they are the best means I can find of convincing anyone who is open-minded and willing to be convinced. So far as the others are concerned, there is no use in bothering with them.

On page 181 of a book called Controlling Depressions, by Paul Douglas, professor of economics of Chicago university in 1935, we find these words:

> Finally, it may be asked why private interests should be allowed to obtain the wealth which comes from the creation of monetary purchasing power in the form of bank credit. As Carl Snyder has shown, production, if we take long periods of time, has increased at a rate of approximately three per cent a year compounded. Now if the private bankers only increase the quantity of credit in the same proportion they would gather to themselves a very large gain in wealth and power.

There, may I point out, is something for nothing, something that has been acquired by the bankers of the United States through all the history of banking in that country.

> This has most certainly been the case in the past. The volume of bank credit which has been built up from very small beginnings is now the property of the banking fraternity. By creating credit they have acquired a title to wealth and a claim upon the national income as real as if they had themselves built gigantic factories, railroads, utility plants, etc. Some idea of how much these sums amount to can be gained from the fact that if we were to take a credit total of thirty-three billion as our base, an increase of three per cent in this figure to match the secular increase in production would mean that in the very first year the private bankers would create one billion dollars in new credit. They would own this and would in fact increase their wealth by that much. As the total volume of credit rose, the absolute yearly additions would of course rise also. Thus, three per cent of fifty billion would amount to 1·5 billion a year. A large part of the fruits of progress, therefore, tend to be transferred to the private bankers because their ability to create the monetary counters enables them to claim title to the goods. It is, of course, true that this purchasing power is then loaned out. But interest is charged for the loans and these go not only to independent business men but also frequently, as the revelations of the last ten years have shown, to persons and syndicates closely identified with or controlled by the bankers themselves.

[Mr. Blackmore.]

There are other quotations from this book which I shall read. Although they are not interesting to listen to, they make interesting reading. On page 182 the author says:

> The bankers as individuals are not, of course, to be blamed for this creation of purchasing power. Under the prevailing rules of the game they have been given this power and they have acted both within their legal and their moral rights. But the question remains whether the rules themselves are best for society.

Social credit says that the rules are not best for society; that they should be changed, and that it is the responsibility of this government at this time to change the rules:

> Society has long since taken away from individuals the right to profit individually by privately coining money. Why should it surrender to private individuals and corporations the similar right to levy toll upon the public by permitting them to create purchasing power in the form of credit? Should not the profits of this essentially public function accrue to society as a whole rather than to those who have placed themselves at the vantage points of industry?

These are the words of Professor Paul H. Douglas, professor of economics of the university of Chicago. They sound like social credit, but here is an orthodox economist of the United States writing in this vein. In the light of the fact that so eminent a man makes such a contention, reckless indeed is he who has offensive things to say about monetary reformers. On the same page he writes:

> There has always been a considerable volume of opinion in favour of the complete nationalization of banking. In the past, its advocates have been regarded as money cranks hovering on the lunatic fringe of social reform. The sentiment in favour of such a policy has, however, been swelling rapidly in both Great Britain and the United States during this depression. In Great Britain, the Labour party has been putting such a proposal near the head of its program, and while no such strong political forces have as yet advanced similar demands in this country such developments do not seem as impossible in the future as they once did. The most cogent argument in favour of such complete nationalization which has been advanced in this country is that of Doctor John Bauer and Nathaniel Gold in their recent book, Permanent Prosperity and How to Obtain It.

There are other passages that follow immediately which any hon. member would find interesting. The finding of this outstanding author is that the government and the people should have the profit that comes from the creation of money.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that he has exhausted his time.

Mr. BLACKMORE: It may be interesting to know that I have half a minute left.

Mr. J. H. HARRIS (Danforth): We all fully realize the task of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in preparing the national budget; but he and other hon. members will understand, I am sure, that with all the good will and with the best wishes, we might be excused for leaving out the usual complimentary remarks, and take full advantage of the forty minutes allotted to us to discuss a subject matter which it took three hours to present to the house.

Mr. DUNNING: Not as bad as that—two and a quarter.

Mr. HARRIS: After listening to social credit, something about which most of us do not seem to know a great deal, perhaps hon. members will now listen to something about which they know or ought to know a great deal.

Canada is faced to-day with problems of great magnitude. First and foremost among them I place the fact that close to one million of her men, women and children find themselves leaning on the state for daily sustenance. The cost this year will be about $68,000,000. Another problem which is costing us a great deal of money is our railway problem; even as it was last year, the cost will be close to $42,000,000, if not more than that. We have an agricultural problem that is and will be with us for many years to come; young men and young women as they come to maturity find themselves drifting from the farm to the town. Sixty years ago twenty-two people were in the towns to seventy-eight on the farms. To-day in Ontario we find thirty-nine on the farm producing for the wants of sixty-one in the urban centres. Coming to the urban centres, we find one of the greatest problems is that of real estate taxation, which makes it difficult for our people, who are home loving people and like to own their own homes, to do so. These problems are the concern not only of members of this house but particularly of the ministers, and we should have some action from them. The greatest of all problems is the fact that so many of our people cannot find a vocation. True, the matter of sales tax was dealt with, a non-work-producing tax, and some degree of relief has been given. Still I say the greatest problem is that of our fellow citizens who cannot find a vocation.

The budget itself quite properly was divided into its five classifications; financial operations, trade, the balance sheet, the estimate of revenue and expenditure, and ways and means to meet that expenditure. But why was not equal weight given to each of these five divisions? Why was one hour spent on trade, one on accounts, information with regard to which we can get each and every month from the blue-books, and only half a page devoted to the forecast for the coming year and half a page on ways and means to meet that cost? Why was nothing of any consequence said—only 217 words—with regard to the railway problem which is exercising the minds of all Canada? To my mind this presentation, to put it as kindly as I can, is one of the greatest examples of inaction that I have seen during my term of sixteen years in this House of Commons. "Vote Liberal and get action." What empty words! Trade and Commerce took one hour. I think the time has come when perhaps the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler) might take charge of that portion, elaborate the picture for us, and sit in this house and answer, relieving the Minister of Finance of that part of the burden. But inasmuch as the Minister of Finance takes it on himself to talk to us for an hour on trade and commerce, perhaps I may be spared a few minutes.

Trade. Your Liberal god seems to be total trade. You think only in terms of total trade. There I draw the line of demarcation between the Liberal party and the Conservative party. You worship at the shrine of total trade; with us, trade, yes, trade wherever we can get it, expanding trade, but trade of a kind that will not take away from our citizens their handicrafts, their vocations. That is the kind of trade for which we stand. The Liberal party look to the south for more trade, and there they find people much the same as our people, their vocations the same as ours, their mode of living the same, their resources very much the same, the same kind of products and much the same geographical position. What is the result when you give concessions to a powerful nation like that? Each concession you give turns out in the long run to be detrimental to the best interests of our country. The action taken by them, particularly during the last two or three decades, we all know has resulted in stifling us and barring us from making real progress. The United States to my mind should receive a secondary consideration in regard to our trade. You have the spectacle of us sitting here for five months waiting for that nation to make up its mind whether or not it is going to enter into a trade agreement with us. That is another example of leaning on that country and not going ahead and functioning as a government, and presenting the budget in March, as it ought to have been presented. Let us go ahead and do the business of Canada, instead of sitting back and waiting five months for the powerful nation to the south of us to make up its mind what it is going to do. Let us carry on and show a stiff front to the rest of civilization, not letting ourselves remain in the category of an adjunct to the United States.

Then, following the same line of thought that total trade is the god, we have in the budget address a table, appearing on page 3896 of Hansard, setting out the imports from the United States, $393,000,000 in the fiscal year ended March 31, 1937, and exports to the United States, of $364,000,000 in the same year. They add the two together and say that is the total trade. But the total trade is not the real factor which affects the economy of this country; it is the balance of trade. Those figures should have been deducted, exports from imports, to show our unfavourable balance with the United States. In 1938 we see the total imports rising to $487,000,000 and exports shrinking by some $21,000,000. But they are added together and the total set before the people of Canada as an increase of $72,000,000. Had our exports to the United States been deducted from our imports from that country, it would have shown an unfavourable balance of $144,000,000. That is the factor which is seriously affecting our economy. That is the factor which should receive the attention of every sound thinking Canadian. That $144,000,000 unfavourable trade balance represents goods half of which could have been produced or made in Canada. Why give away $2,000,000 a week of Canada's home market, the products of our farms, gardens, orchards and factories? Why give away $1,000,000 a week in wages to purchase the products of United States farms and gardens and factories? I almost heard a tremble in the minister's voice when he handed out that little sop to the west by saying that during his term of office the free imports into this country have increased from one-third to one-half. So much was I interested that I looked to see what classes of goods these imports were. I found an increase in agricultural and vegetable products of a kind that we could produce in this country of $8,000,000 from 1936 to 1937. Analysing that figure I found that in the same year fresh vegetable imports of a kind that we can produce here increased from $4,180,000 to $5,140,000, or twenty-five per cent in one short year. Seeing that, I thought to myself again that the time has come when a party will have to be put in power whose goal is not only more trade, but trade of a kind which will not affect the natural production of our dominion.

With the permission of the house I should like to put the following tabulation on the record. The budget shows the trade of Canada with the United States on page 3896 of Hansard:

(Merchandise—all gold excluded.)

	Fiscal year ended March 31, 1937	Fiscal year ended March 31, 1938	Increase or decrease
Imports from the United States	$393,720,662	$487,328,980	+$93,608,318
Exports to the United States	364,354,990	343,250,669	— 21,104,321
Total trade with the United States	$758,075,652	$830,579,649	+$72,503,997

A clearer view of the position would be shown if we deducted our exports from the imports thus:

	Fiscal year ended March 31, 1937	Fiscal year ended March 31, 1938	Increase in unfavourable balance
Imports from the United States	$393,720,662	$487,328,980	$93,608,318
Exports to the United States	364,354,990	343,250,669	21,104,321
Unfavourable balance with the United States	$ 29,365,672	$144,078,321	$114,712,639

[Mr. Harris.]

In connection with mixed farming in Canada, particularly in Ontario and Quebec, when I noticed from the statistics that twelve million tons of canned beef came into this country last year, knowing that this represents thirty thousand cattle, I thought once more that the time had come when we should call a halt to importations of that kind. Can we not produce beef in Canada?

Turning to the other side of our national life, industry, and looking at the iron and steel industry, we find that imports increased from $114,000,000 in 1936 to $150,000,000 in 1937; yet in the report of the national employment commission it is stated that there were 99,157 men engaged in that trade in 1929, of whom 35,000 were walking the streets in 1936. Why, then, should we import an additional $40,000,000 worth of iron and its products, while so many of our own people found themselves on the streets looking for jobs? Take the schedule of all commodities entering Canada and divide it up, as the bureau of statistics does, into raw materials, semi-manufactured articles and fully manufactured articles, and what do we find has happened in the last four years? Our total imports have increased from $238,000,000 to $487,000,000, an increase of $249,000,000, or more than double.

I put this record on Hansard:

Imports into Canada from United States by Degree of Manufacture
(Fiscal Years, 1934-1938)

Fiscal years ended March 31	Total imports	Raw materials	Semi-manufactured	Fully manufactured	Fully manufactured
1934	$238,187,681	$ 90,360,530	$14,412,383	$133,414,768	56·0
1935	303,639,972	112,600,065	18,874,371	172,165,536	56·7
1936	319,479,594	109,674,022	20,463,892	189,341,680	59·3
1937	393,720,662	124,346,994	22,165,712	247,207,956	62·8
1938	487,307,907	144,065,465	25,390,779	317,851,663	65·2
4 year increase	$249,120,226	$ 50,704,935	$10,978,396	$184,436,895	9·2

The fully manufactured products, in every $100 of which there is contained $40 of workmanship and wages, showed an increase from $133,414,768 to $317,851,663, or a total increase of $184,436,895. Yet in his budget speech the Minister of Finance says that "Canada cannot give to-day and trade to-morrow." Within the last three or four years Canada has given more than $184,000,000 in this way alone; yet she wants to trade to-morrow. I say we ought to adhere to the policy that Canada cannot give to-day; and I am behind the minister in that policy. I would even follow him if he went one step further and said Canada should protect the opportunity for workmen in this country to fabricate the goods we need, even beyond the point of giving and even to the extent of protecting ourselves. The Conservative policy that brought about "our" great empire trade agreements—and I said "our" empire trade agreements—did that very thing; saw to it first that the products of our own artisans and farmers were protected against the inroads of materials of all kinds from other countries, and then we had something with which to make a deal; we had some opportunity to bargain.

Canada has been in this position on other occasions; we have been brought to this situation many times through the advent of Liberal governments, and each time they come to power it seems that more and more of the products of other countries come to our land, while we produce less and less of our own requirements. That happened in the seventies, and the situation was remedied by the national policy of the Conservative party. It happened again in 1890 and 1900, and then in 1911 Canada said, in no uncertain voice, "No more of that." It happened again after the depression of 1930. I say to the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) who seems to have forgotten that there was a depression, that it was not only the depression which was responsible for the extent to which Canada's economic position was affected in 1930. The tremendous importations into this country of goods of a kind that we could produce was also responsible for the difficulty in which we found ourselves. In spite of the fact that "do nothing to aggravate or provoke the United States" seems to be the attitude of our friends opposite, I say that what happened in days gone by is happening again to-day; and if we continue to slip as we have this year, to the extent of an unfavourable trade balance of $100,000,000, it will not be long before something will have to be done. If it is not done, the people of Canada again will call in the Conservative party to straighten matters out.

This weak, spineless attitude of not aggravating or provoking a nation so powerful as the United States is not enough for this strong Canadian race. We witnessed what happened when the Fordney-McCumber tariff, the Hawley-Smoot tariff and the various revenue bills were passed in the United States. We may wait for an election to make some change and bring in an agreement, but if I understand the temper of the Canadian people they do not feel disposed to wait as long as that.

With regard to the actions of the United States, in 1932, 1934, 1936 and on May 16, 1938, they passed revenue bills. Did we see Washington sitting back and waiting before passing these bills, for fear of provoking or aggravating the people of Canada? No; the fact is that they passed these bills without hesitation. It is quite true that in 1936 we had the United States-Canada agreement, and the president was given power which permitted some of the excise duties which they had imposed against our products to be cut in half. Let us take one example, however; let us look at what happened in regard to rough lumber. Did they hesitate to put $3 a thousand against rough lumber going into that country? They did not. It is quite true that when the agreement came down they cut that duty in half, but the fact is that a tax of $1.50 per thousand still exists in regard to that commodity. That is only one example. Then there is copper. In 1932 they placed a duty of four cents against copper not only in the raw state, but in all forms right down the line, and that was not changed when they came to make their agreement with us; that four cents still remains. I would ask my maritime friends from Nova Scotia and British Columbia, from the north Pacific and the north Atlantic, where fish oil is produced in greater quantities than in any other part of the civilized world: Was anything said about a duty of three cents a pound being imposed against Canadian fish oils in the 1934 United States revenue bill? There was not, and that excise duty still remains. They did not stop to wonder whether they were going to aggravate or provoke Canada when they put through that revenue bill.

In June, 1936, they saw fit to impose, not only against Canada but against the world, an excise duty of three cents on animal fats of all kinds. Did we do anything about that? We did not. That excise duty was imposed, and it had a double-barrelled effect. In the first instance it paralyzed that industry as far as Canada was concerned, and it backed up on the world market a billion pounds of vegetable oils which paralyzed the industry in England, Canada and elsewhere. Was anything done about it? It is true that a reference was made to our tariff board in December, 1936, but was that board asked to bring down its report? The Minister of Finance, the Minister of Agriculture and all hon. members of the house know that between December, 1936, and June, 1938, there was ample opportunity for a report to be brought down and for some action to be taken upon it.

Yet with these revenue bills which have affected the lumbering industry, the mining industry and the agricultural industry, and which also place two and a half cents a gallon against gasoline and half a cent a gallon against crude oil and fuel oil, which is produced in Canada and other countries, what do we find happening within the last two or three weeks in the same United States? We find that they again reaffirm the position they took with regard to the effective period for these import duties and taxes. They did not consult Canada particularly about these particular sections, and by proclamation, by public resolution No. 48 as of June 29, 1937, they were extended to June 30, 1939. They are extended to 1939 on four of our main lines of activity. Did they hold up their session of congress or their activities in Washington in order that they might have an opportunity of making a deal? No. Yet we sit here in a spineless, do nothing sort of way, draw our breath and draw our pay, while the affairs of Canada to my mind are not given straightforward business administration, regardless of where the chips may fall.

Taxation. We have listened to what you had to say about reduction of taxation during the election campaign and many times since. But the truth of the matter is that you have budgeted to extract more taxation from the Canadian people next year than you have for many years in the past. Where are you going to get this taxation? You still expect to find the sales tax either first or second in the group. The sales tax to my mind, Mr. Speaker, is far too high. It is too heavy on the Canadian people. It taxes from the baby in the cradle to the octogenarian in his casket. It catches them all. I am in accord with a small measure of sales taxation which would catch all the people, but I say that this eight per cent is too high. To my way of thinking it is iniquitously high.

Income tax. This is quite right and quite proper, and I am glad to see it where it is. But I think that it is high enough. Nevertheless, the form of taxation whicl. makes work—and it is work that we want in Canada to-day; my friends to the left say we need work and wages—is the taxation which will come into the treasury from the goods of other countries, if the goods of those countries must come here. If the goods do not come in, then give us a chance to produce our own requirements for our home market.

The orientation is all wrong. The sales tax should not be first and the income tax should not be second. Customs and excise revenues should take first place, and particularly in a country such as Canada which has such a strong neighbour to the south. The election budget will probably reduce that tax. Just before you go to an election perhaps you will bring the sales tax down. Yes, and my friends at the summer picnics this year will be saying, "We have brought down the sales tax on building materials." I can imagine them standing on a platform and saying, "This very platform on which I stand has had removed from it the eight per cent sales tax, and that has been done by the Liberal government." And those who exclaim from the housetops will also say, "Every article in this house has been benefited by the removal of the eight per cent sales tax.

Mr. Speaker, they will tell us about the great boon that sales tax removal on construction materials has been to the Canadian people. If that sales tax was a great hardship on the construction industry, then I say it is a great hardship on all other lines of work on which that particular tax takes its full toll. It is a non-work tax. It should be cut in half forthwith. And my suggestion is that in its place we place excise duties to the same amount against goods coming into Canada. That would tend to relieve the numbers on relief rolls, and give work to many workmen. Tariff by scientific arrangement, business administration and carrying out the fundamentals of tariff protection would make for more production, assist mixed farming, market gardening, the development of our natural products, and would not extract so much money from our people.

What do you do with the money when you get it? You spend a great deal of it right here. The cost of government is too high. Are we, as members of the House of Commons, functioning as we ought? Seriously, are we as members of the house doing the job of work which we undertook, when we were asking the franchise of our people, we were going to do? What have we done in the last five months? Perhaps we have enlarged the field of political patronage and meddled with the railways. Perhaps we have meddled in radio, public works and the civil service.

I am glad the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) is in his place in the house. He will remember a time sixteen years ago, when East York had a growing population which reached 100,000 people. He will very well recall that I represented 100,000 people at that time. I said I would represent the 100,000 people in the constituency of East York if you, Mr. Prime Minister would do the same for North York. Of course you could not do it there then, because you had to go outside the province of Ontario to find a seat. But I suggested that you also represent 100,000 people in the House of Commons so that we could cut the membership to one hundred, and so that we might function, go to work and do a proper job.

But no; we still have 245 members. And at the same time the Prime Minister will recall that I said I thought there were too many commissions working at that time. What I said then I repeat to-night. Why has it been necessary to add sixteen commissions in the last two or three years to carry out the work of government? Why cannot we as members of parliament carry on a good deal of that work? Why should it be costing $1,000,000 to $2,000,000 each and every year for commissions to do the job of work for the government, work which you and I and the rest of the members of the house feel that we should do? Commissions are set up politically; why not face that issue? We are as able as they are to do the work. If the commissions cannot be cut out; if the government cannot see its way clear to cut at least half of the commissions, then cut out half the number of members of parliament.

We have had the national employment commission, the wheat marketing commission, the textile commission, the lobster and smelt commission, the veterans' assistance commission, the radio commission, the Dominion-provincial relations commission and the penitentiary reform commission. There has been the suggestion to add another fifty cents to radio fees, and to enlarge the scope of the radio commission. Public opinion does not want an enlargement of the scope of the work they are doing. That is one point which should be given serious consideration. To my mind the fees' system should be cut out entirely. Then, we have the transport or railway commission, the tariff commission, the civil service commission, the board of grain commissioners, the national battlefields commission, the federal district commission, the international joint commission, the international boundaries commission and the national harbours commission.

No session of parliament seems to be complete unless we have some commissions appointed to do work which your people and my people think they sent us here to do. We must remember how, when the present Prime Minister sat on this opposition side of the house; he talked about government by commission. His favourite topic seemed to be that of government by commission, and on other occasions his favoured topic was government by order in council. On still other occasions he talked about governor general's warrants.

The distribution of work which would be effected and the amount of money which could be saved by taking work from commissions and giving it to the members would be very considerable. I shall not go into details, but it was interesting to note the answers to questions asked by the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Hyndman) with respect to the cost of commissions. I noted the answers given to the questions of my dear late friend, the late member for Waterloo South (Mr. Edwards), and the answers given to the questions of the hon. member for Grenville-Dundas (Mr. Casselman). The answer to those questions should receive the serious consideration of every hon. member, and particularly the government.

Throughout my remarks I have been trying to enunciate principles which would make for more work for our Canadian people. So, when I voice my views with respect to the railways, I have fixed firmly in my mind the idea that nothing should be done which would take railway men from their vocations. To my idea we do not go far enough when we speak of transportation. We speak only in terms of our nationally owned railways on the one hand the privately owned system on the other. When we go deeper into this problem we realize that we must consider the effect of the present trend to ride and carry freight on rubber. We must consider the cost of transporting freight and passengers over our highways as compared with the cost of maintaining our railways. I know this may be under provincial jurisdiction, but I charge the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) to give some consideration to the capital cost of our highway system. We should consider this matter in all the provinces. We must take into account the revenue received from gasoline taxes and motor licences, balance the highway budget and see what deficit we have. When we are considering our railway problem we must not forget these three things.

Our railway system has been refinanced and is still being refinanced. There is unemployed money, yes, but the deficits accumulate and we require more and more of this unemployed money with which to pay these deficits. The first responsibility of the management of this road should be to get a balanced budget. They should have the fullest cooperation of whatever government is in power in trying to achieve that end. We should not put out a budget containing a hundred or more items of expense, and then have the management imbued with the idea that their job is to spend all of the budget allotted to them. A business-like administration of the road would bring it into a better position, but at the same time the Canadian government and those charged with responsibility should see that it is not placed in an unfair position as compared with highway transportation by bus and truck.

Maturing obligations have to be met. I know the Minister of Finance would not be guilty of bragging of the great saving the Liberal party has made because of his ability to borrow money at such low rates of interest. However, let me say to those who sit about him that it is easy to raise money when so much money is unemployed. There is plenty of money available at low rates of interest. It is quite easy to make the statement that Canada has been saved millions of dollars by lower interest rates; but I ask hon. members this question: How much was that railway debt which has been refinanced worth before the name "Canada" was placed on the back of the bonds? In May of this year the Minister of Finance received authority to borrow another $200,000,000. There was one issue of $916,000 of the Rail and River Coal Company which previously paid five per cent. This was refinanced, with Canada's name on the bond, at a little over two per cent, and it may be contended that Canada has been saved three per cent in interest. When my Liberal friends feel inclined, on platforms throughout the country, to make this statement about interest being saved, let me say to them that no credit is due for the fact that this government has been able to borrow money at lower rates of interest. That is only the ordinary common business sense which was first shown in the administration of our affairs by the Conservative government and which has been followed by the present incumbent of the office of Minister of Finance.

The Liberal party is the great party that was going to make for unity in Canada. I can remember when their leaders one after another stood up in the Maple Leaf Gardens at Toronto and asked the people to vote Liberal and get unity. What empty words when considered in the light of what has happened since! Vote Liberal and get action! What empty words in the light of what has happened since! Who are these men of whom we make mention? They are the stand-patters, the free traders, the protectionists, the crack-pot financiers, the monetary reformers, the sound-money men; they are the men from whom the people of Canada expected to get some action. But we have had no action. All we have had is five months of do nothing.

This budget does not help our particular situation. The people of Canada have been greatly disappointed at what has happened during the last five months.

I agree with the hon. minister when he says that we need toleration in this country. I realize that we need goodwill. I opened my remarks along those lines, and I shall close them in the same way. We need co-operation; but, above all, Canada needs leadership and action from her public men in order to have that progress which is necessary to this most vigorous of units that civilization presently knows.

Mr. J. J. DUFFUS (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, in asking the indulgence of the house at this time, after listening to the speeches delivered to-day in the chamber, I am motivated by a compelling sense of duty to the government, to the people of the constituency which I have the honour to represent and of the Dominion of Canada in general. I realize fully that the budget affects fundamentally the very vitals of the social, industrial and economic life of this nation, and similarly, though perhaps to a lesser degree, that of the other great nations of the world. If I may judge from press reports and from personal observations, it is quite apparent that the budget has been exceptionally well received and likewise well sustained. It is a budget of a Minister of Finance who for two years has been trying to find a way out of an almost insurmountable economic muddle. Having regard to the crop failures of last year and the drought in western Canada with the resultant relief costs, and considering the reduced transportation revenue, he has admirably accomplished his task. As usual, the budget was presented with implicit confidence by a great statesman who has the courage of his convictions and the determination to keep faith with the people to whom he is responsible. At this time I wish to tender to my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) my sincere congratulations upon having done this house and the country, by the presentation to parliament of this his third budget, a service that is destined to be an historic triumph.

The minister always discusses economic questions with all that rare insight, vision, thoroughness and power of expression which have led the world to acclaim him as one of the foremost geniuses of his time on monetary topics. His tireless energy, his deep sincerity and his unflagging zeal on behalf of the people of Canada, whose interest he has faithfully endeavoured to serve, have won for him their confidence and their hearts to a degree hitherto not exceeded in this land. No words that I could use would exaggerate what I conceive to be the importance of this budget in relation to the economic structure of the Dominion of Canada. Beyond doubt, it involves Canada's most important problems, and its adoption will bring happiness and renewed confidence to the people of Canada. On account of the vast area of this dominion, it is extremely difficult to arrive at decisions and policies that will be wholly satisfactory to the people in the east, in the west and in the central portion. With our geographical complications it is impossible to please everyone, and unless we have the firm determination to adopt a policy of conciliation, it will mean the eventual disruption of the country.

I am fully aware that changes cannot be effected without disadvantage to some special interests. Governments cannot move far without incurring disfavour in some quarters. In framing a policy in the interests of our farmers, our industrialists, our workers and the great masses of the consuming public, it is only reasonable to assume that some will be adversely affected in certain respects.

However, I am convinced, in these difficult times, when it is the duty of everyone to make sacrifices on behalf of the Canadian citizens, that, when necessary, our industrialists will loyally cooperate with the Minister of Finance and with the tariff advisory board in adjusting their problems in a manner that will bring about satisfaction to a marked degree, especially since nearly every manufacturing concern in Canada has enjoyed two years of almost unprecedented prosperity, having last year contributed to the national wealth the largest amount since 1929. I am one who believes that due consideration should be given to our manufacturing industries to enable them to obtain reasonable profits, to pay fair wages to their employees and to make possible the establishing of satisfactory prices to the consuming public, and that commodity prices should be based always on a study and appreciation of the purchasing power of the masses in order that they may be able to maintain and enjoy a decent standard of living tc which they are justly entitled.

Let us not overlook the fact that for years our citizens have been burdened down with an almost intolerable load of taxation. We have administered relief to an extent which almost suggests that the time is fast approaching when we shall have to consider a relief program for the taxpayers of this country if a sit-down strike by them is to be averted. Permit me to say that there is a prudential limit to all spending policies and that the country cannot bear indefinitely an increasing burden. Every million dollars added to the huge debt of Canada overshadows and obscures the wonderful prospect of prosperity and happiness that this land once possessed. We must eliminate extravagance and waste. Municipal insolvency, provincial insolvency and federal insolvency are the triple perilous conditions which have already reached disheartening proportions. Only balanced budgets and a gradual decrease in debt and taxation will save our country from economic disaster. Governing bodies must continue, for years to come, to pare wherever possible and, indeed, even where it seems impossible, with consistent and wise judgment in economic requirements. It is most essential that a policy of pay-as-you-go and if you cannot pay don't go, be maintained. Unrestricted and reckless extravagance and continual balances on the wrong side of the ledger will lead to one thing and one thing only, namely economic disaster.

Present national circumstances demand the greatest concept of loyalty to the state. There should be a total absence of bitter criticism for party purposes. If ever there was a time when the politicians of Canada should forget party rivalry and bend their efforts to serve this country, that time is now. United action, supported by the strength and good will of all classes of people, is most essential to the national progress. Members of parliament and others should not forget but should realize always that governments have no source of income but from the people. There is a general feeling throughout the country that this government recognizes this fact and that it has a sincere desire to lessen the burdens of the taxpayers. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, the very high regard that this government has for its pledges, for the sanctity of its spoken and written word, as evidenced by the implementation of its obligations, and by its loyalty and devotion to all interests in Canada, is something of which this house might well be proud. No government hitherto in this country has so successfully and scientifically grappled with the problems confronting it. I think it can fairly be said that in the history of Canada no government has enjoyed more fully the confidence of the people.

The Minister of Finance has still a very difficult and trying task ahead of him, one that might well challenge even the biggest statesman. Let us assist him to accomplish it. Bitter criticism at this time cannot help. It may hinder. Whatever degree of wisdom may mark a minister's judgment can only be lessened by partisan nagging, squabbling and bitter criticism. Creating in the minds of the people loopholes of imperfection will get us nowhere, whereas working in a spirit of confidence and cooperation will greatly assist.

All citizens are shareholders in the business of Canada. The eyes of the nation are on her chosen representatives, who are being depended upon to safeguard her interests. We are Canada's board of directors. Let us hand to the Minister of Finance all the help that reasonable fair play and common sense can suggest in continuing his onerous labours. The feeling of the nation at the present time is against playing politics and putting petty obstacles in his way. There is a nation-wide demand that he be accorded every assistance, encouragement and a clear field in which to accomplish the success the country hopes he will achieve, namely, a gradual reduction in taxation and debt and a happy, prosperous and contented nation. If he succeeds—and I confidently believe he will—he may be well termed a superman.

Judicious economies are imperative during periods of economic storm and distress. Great progressive private corporations in many countries have shown no lack of courage in this regard, and they are seemingly emerging successfully, notwithstanding the great burden of taxation, increased as it has been by almost every unit of government. Cooperation by the various governments in the field of expenditure in order to eliminate overlapping and duplication would effect much needed economies. Adequate control and a gradual reduction of relief expenditure amounting approximately to $100,000,000 annually must be implemented on a satisfactory basis. Canadian relief recipients generally are praying to get off relief.

One of the foremost tasks ahead of us is the lessening of the economic strain existing in the various parts of the dominion. The adjustment of financial and constitutional relations between the provinces and the dominion is an immediate problem. The countries constituting the British Commonwealth of Nations have a definite responsibility to join with other nations in reducing all barriers to international trade. This government has put forth a concerted effort to broaden and to deepen the channels of trade, and in no instance has it caused an increase of duties against any country. This policy has contributed not only to the revival of trade but to the removal of international friction and conflict.

The United Kingdom trade agreement, which was presented to the dominion parliament in 1937, assured Canadian farm products a free entry into the British market. In 1935 the total trade of Canada was $1,389,000,000, and in 1936 it was $1,663,000,000. In 1937 it reached a total of $1,934,000,000, or an increase of 39 per cent over 1935. The favourable visible balance of trade for the calendar year 1937 enabled Canada for the first time since 1921 to regain her position as the fourth exporting nation of the world, the figures amounting to $1,125,000,000. I quote the words of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) as reported at page 24 of Hansard of this year:

> I should like to say how much I rejoice, as do those who are associated with me, in the gratifying progress of this country during the last twelve months.

The year 1937 in every respect was Canada's banner year of hog production. The average quality was better than ever before. The quantity was much larger than in any year except during the war. What is most important is that Canada has at the present time more firmly entrenched herself as the source of supply of bacon for the British market than at any previous time.

The United States provides a market for more than one-third of our exportable products, exclusive of gold and the tourist trade. Canada's business with the United States in 1935 amounted to $671,000,000 and in 1936, to $775,000,000; whereas in 1937 it reached the unparalleled sum of $961,000,000. Had the United States-Canada treaty been in effect during the past twenty-seven years, on the basis of the great increase in the trade of the dominion during the past year with that country, Canada might have doubled her population during that period. Anything like trade hostilities between two great neighbouring nations would be, and indeed has been, regrettable and mutually injurious. A policy of good will and of mutual understanding will continue to increase the trade between the two peoples who are both excellent customers, one of the other, and who can each profit by wise and discriminating exchange of business.

According to the statistics of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, 245,000 head of cattle were exported to the United States in 1937, as against 199,000 in 1935, an increase of 23·1 per cent in number and 58·8 per cent in value. The exports of dairy cattle to the United States in 1937, and in 1936 as well, were 7,000 head each year, but the value in 1937 was $425,000 as compared with $352,000 in 1936, or an increase of 7·8 per cent. Incidentally, from January 1 of this year to the end of April, 11,069 head of cattle weighing 700 pounds or over were shipped to the United Kingdom as compared with 688 head in the corresponding period of 1937.

Exports of hay to the United States in 1937 amounted to 144,000 tons valued at $1,069,000, whereas in 1936 shipments were 70,500 tons valued at only $540,000. These items are approximate.

I have here a table showing the comparative increase in exports to the United States in the years 1936 and 1937 which with the consent of the house I wish to place on Hansard.

Mr. SPEAKER: With the consent of the house the hon. member may place it on Hansard, but only the Minister of Finance has that privilege.

Mr. DUFFUS: The table is as follows:

	1936	1937
Animal and animal products	$ 44,000,000	$ 49,000,000
Wood products and paper	$143,000,000	$180,000,000
Iron and its products	$ 6,000,000	$ 7,000,000
Non-metallic minerals and their products	$ 15,000,000	$ 19,000,000
Non-ferrous metals and their products	$106,000,000	$155,000,000
Strawberries (lbs.)	690,000	1,399,000
Clover seeds (bus.)	147,000	239,000
Certified seed potatoes (bus.)	621,000	635,000
Beef cattle (head)	224,000	290,000
Poultry (head)	347,000	1,290,000
Cream (gallon)	35,000	110,000

The encouragement of tourist trade with the United States by every legitimate means is of national economic benefit. It is of inestimable value in strengthening and increasing the friendship that exists between the two great nations on the north American continent. Uncle Sam's tourist dollar is the thing that Canadians should make a bid for, and we could obtain these tourist dollars in increasing volume by courtesy, fair treatment and judicious advertising, which would mean an icrease in trade and the infusion of new money into the dominion. It therefore behooves us as good Canadians to hold out to them the hand of fellowship, to give them welcome and make them feel at home. Our visitors of to-day may be our neighbours of to-morrow. It is gratifying to know, according to the dominion bureau of statistics, that Canada's tourist trade last year amounted to $325,000,000 as compared with $255,000,000 in 1936. While I am unalterably opposed to the country going further into debt, money properly expended on the construction of additional highways and feeder roads for the expansion of tourist travel, to increase tourist and other revenues, would be one exception.

Canada is now one of the leading mining countries of the world. Minerals constitute one of the most important resources of the dominion. The progress is amazing, as shown by the 1937 output of $456,000,000, the largest production on record, and an increase of about 26·2 per cent over 1936. In the same year $17,000,000 was paid out in salaries and wages. Another remarkable feature is that in 1936 over $81,-113,000 was distributed in dividends. In 1937 the distribution of dividends increased to over $105,000,000, an increase of 29 per cent, all of which creates buying power for other commodities and thereby adding to employment. The budget provision of 1936 for the assistance of new mines, by which they were given three years to get under way before the corporation tax was collected, has been a substantial inducement to the establishment of new mines and mills. Something like sixty new Canadian gold mines have reached the mill stage under this legislation, and many more are progressing with confidence and increasing success. All this has been a great stimulus to Canadian gold production, which has been the country's mainstay during the depression period. Last year the output of precious metals reached a value of $143,000,000. Prospects are that this year this production will increase to over $160,000,000.

For years the government has taken consistent steps towards reducing the cost of the implements and instruments of production. Prices of farm products and manufactured goods were on a par in November, 1937, for the first time in many years. Emphatically we must not retard production, thereby increasing unemployment and affecting income and making progress impossible. Fundamentally industry is our way out. We have to depend in large measure upon the wealth which industry creates and the employment which it provides to bring prosperity to both our workers and employers. Business not only creates wealth and employment but distributes wealth; it is the only sound way in which wealth can be distributed. Industrial expansion causes an increase in the consumption of agricultural products; the greater the increase in industrial areas, the better will be the home market for these goods.

[Mr. Duffus.]

It is, however, conceivable, even admitting the increasing importance of secondary industry to this country, that we cannot cure the plight of agriculture through the medium of high tariffs. While it is most essential that we do nothing that would detrimentally affect industry, either large or small, it is just as important that we give increased and effective support and encouragement to those engaged in agriculture, for the obvious reason that farm incomes are inadequate. Agriculture and industry are complementary and interdependent. Each contributes to the other, and what helps or injures one helps or injures the other. But both are indispensable to the solution of our relief problem and that of railway debts and a balanced budget. Agriculture is the lifeblood of our Canadian railways. The public will gladly cooperate with any sound movement on the part of agriculture that is for the good of industry, knowing that prosperous rural communities are essential to the progress and prosperity of towns and cities.

There are two main objects in the work and service of the dominion Department of Agriculture, namely better agriculture and better marketing. Each is linked with the other. It is to this end that the services of the department are directed. It is comforting to know that the government proposes to give the farmers of Canada greater assistance in producing and marketing their products. For example, during the last two or three years the live stock branch has been responsible for the inauguration of some twenty-six organizations throughout Ontario which handle eggs and poultry on a basis of grades. This business is done at minimum cost. The farmer who brings his product to these organizations knows that he is going to be paid for it on a graded basis, and that the grade he gets at the grading station will be accepted in any market. It is estimated that this has resulted in an increase of three cents a dozen to the farmers who deliver eggs to these organizations, and a corresponding increase in other graded products.

In the interest of public welfare, referring specifically to public health, all governments have placed rather formidable obligations on the live stock and dairy farmer. To begin with, we notify him, then exhort him, and finally force him, indirectly at least, to have his herds tuberculin tested, and demand the destruction of diseased animals and subsequent reactors. It is true he receives some compensation, but not commensurate with the loss he sustains. Subsequently he was called upon to follow the same procedure in respect of Bang's disease, with the same expensive results; and we are now asking him to have his herds blood tested. While not disputing the necessity for this procedure in the interest of the consuming public, I believe the expense is beyond the farmer's ability to pay, and that he is entitled to greater consideration in this regard.

Furthermore, while admitting that governments are assisting farmers greatly in inspection, grading, etc., I submit that we should put forth a greater effort to provide still better facilities of a scientific kind during these critical and rapidly changing times. Improvements in live stock breeding, better and more economical feeding methods, the dissemination of information on more profitable marketing, are all present-day governmental responsibilities of vital importance to agriculture. Scientific research reveals that climatic and soil conditions make it necessary, in order to farm profitably, that the farmer be informed as to the best varieties of crops suitable for his particular locality and his potential market. Greater attention to and more expert information on soil management should not be overlooked, as well as such factors as rust and plant diseases which possibly can be successfully grappled with. Unless the soil contains the necessary plant food elements to produce profitable crops, agriculture will not continue to be attractive to the young people. All this should convince the government, notwithstanding the additional expense entailed, that the solution of these problems demands continuous and effective attention. Admitting and appreciating to the full all that this government has done towards the expansion of the marketing of agricultural products, as evidenced by the statistics I have submitted, I maintain that still greater expansion of markets is not only necessary but imperative. Improvement in quality, grading, packing and shipping facilities of all agricultural products, and the determination to guide them aright into the hands of the consumer, wherever he may be, is equally imperative, and a measure towards greater profit in Canada's basic industry.

In my concluding remarks on this all-important subject of agriculture I desire not only to recommend but to urge the Minister of Finance and the government to give consideration to a mesaure by means of which a farmer with ample security could borrow sufficient money at four per cent per annum to refund and consolidate his debts and purchase his immediate requirements. I cannot conceive of anything that would do more to stimulate the building trade, manufacturing, employment, transportation and national revenue as well as agriculture.

At this time I wish to make a few observations in regard to our new harbours board set-up. Speaking in this house on March 24, 1936, the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Church) said, as reported at page 1420 of Hansard for that year:

> I do not object to the principle of the bill; in fact, I believe if it had been introduced several years ago Canada would have been saved many millions of dollars—

It is interesting to note from the annual report of the national harbours board for the calendar year 1937 that substantial savings have been made, and that likewise there have been noteworthy increases in operating revenue. At page 7 of the report will be found the consolidated income statement for the years 1935, 1936, and 1937, which shows that since 1935 there has been an improvement in operating revenue of approximately $835,000, while there has been a decrease in operating and maintenance expenses of approximately $700,000, making a total betterment of $1,535,000 for the benefit of the taxpayers of Canada, which is a substantial saving. Prior to 1936 the annual salaries of the various commissioners aggregated no less than $73,000, and in addition they received automobile allowances amounting to $15,000, making a total of $88,000. The comparative figure under the present board is $30,000 for salaries with no automobile allowance, representing a saving of $58,000.

Further substantial economies are shown in the entertainment expenses of the commissioners and staff, which in 1935 were $18,000, as compared with $1,500 in 1937 a saving of $16,500 in this one item. The travelling expenses of commissioners and staff in 1935 amounted to $24,000, as compared with $7,000 in 1937. Other economies which should not be overlooked include the entire elimination of residence telephones, which formerly cost $2,200; a reduction in the cost of advertising and printing from $52,500 to $14,600; a reduction in donations and contributions from $24,000 in 1935 to nothing in 1937. These items aggregate $185,700. Since the total head office expenses in 1937 amounted to only $130,000, including engineering and central accounting services, it will be seen that the expenses of the board and its headquarters staff can now be met out of the savings I have enumerated, leaving a margin of $55,700 as well. These substantial savings of the new harbours board provide an outstanding example of the business administration of one item of one department of government, and if time permitted one could cite many similar economies representing the shrewd business methods inaugurated by the government in order to save the money of the taxpayers and at the same time improve administrative efficiency.

Mr. H. E. BRUNELLE (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasant duty to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) upon the exceptionally practical budget speech he recently delivered in this house. In the course of his speech the minister made reference to the unemployment question and showed that there had been some improvement in the general situation. Members of the opposition and of other groups in the house have referred extensively to the same question, but regardless of that fact I intend to confine my remarks to the question of unemployment and relief which for eight years has been, and for some years to come will be, a vital problem.

I need not say that every hon. member is anxious to rid the country of unemployment. It must be admitted, however, that the Canadian people did not know what relief was; that they did not want relief, and that they were above that humiliating position until 1930, when the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) and his followers, through pessimism and vain promises, simply invited the people to ask for relief. By doing so, the Conservative party officially established relief and unemployment as a more or less permanent institution. If one considers the utter failure of the Conservative party to carry out the promises made in 1930, one is justified in making the statement that this party has forfeited its right to interfere when the question of unemployment is being discussed.

Before going further, I should like to say that when the right hon. leader of the opposition recently stated in the house that another crisis was soon coming he did considerable harm to the country. On account of the high position which he occupies his statement was taken seriously throughout the length and breadth of Canada. Our producers at once became suspicious and in many instances adopted a stand-still policy, to the great detriment of our workmen. I have ascertained personally that the pessimistic and unwise declaration of the right hon. gentleman has done much harm to all classes of our people. Let us take it for granted that unemployment and relief constitute a plague. In this respect each member of the house is justified in saying that something must be or can be done, providing he can offer some practical suggestion. The problem of unemployment no longer should be used as a political football; there ought to be sincere cooperation between all political parties and all the provinces in a patriotic effort to save our country. Believe me, sir, it is in unemployment that communism, socialism and other such movements find their source and thrive, though I am glad to say that our unemployed are still of sound disposition.

There is no doubt that our conditions have improved since 1935, and the government and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) deserve our felicitations. The employment commission has done good work. The plan to train young people in various branches of industry is due to the initiative of our Minister of Labour, in spite of the fact that leaders of the Quebec government call it the Bilodeau-Rogers plan, as though that were its source.

The improved housing plan which is about to pass the house, whereby our citizens will be exempt from some municipal taxes and sales tax, is highly advantageous. The other project to advance money to municipalities for electric, gas and waterworks is a magnificent one. These projects will help to rid the large cities of their slums, and will improve business in general. Another practical and productive plan would be that of establishing more people on the land. For several years we have talked a great deal about the matter, but in reality the only back-to-the-land movement has been that of taking the normal number of dead people to the graveyard. I speak subject to correction, but it is my impression that about 54 per cent of our present population is urban and only 46 per cent rural. This is an abnormal condition in a country such as Canada, which is considered an agricultural country. Yet we know that many ex-farmers who are now living in the cities cannot find work. We know they will not be able to find work, as the work is not there to be had. We know that modern machinery will to a greater and greater extent take care of the work to be done.

I would say again to the Minister of Labour that one remedy for unemployment, among others, would be to locate good agricultural, unsettled and unimproved lands, and to open them for colonization. Such lands could be easily located. However, to make colonization attractive, I say each homestead should to some extent be improved at the expense of the government. This would be a self-liquidating expenditure, and would bring relief to the cities. To-day many people are sorry they left the farms. They would gladly return, but we must admit that such people are no longer fit to do that type of pioneering work which was done by our forefathers.

Let us pay our unemployed men to do the work of clearing and breaking the land, putting up decent houses and barns on each new farm. Those who would take these modestly improved farms would find them attractive and sufficiently remunerative to make them wish to remain on them. Grants and subsidies to homesteaders are not the best form of help, because they resemble relief. We must get rid of relief. Had we used only 50 per cent of the general relief expenditures since 1930 in so improving new lands, and thus creating new parishes and towns, undoubtedly Canada would have acquired a vast additional asset and the cities would have been relieved of a great burden. Let us do it now; better late than never. A colonization plan may be a provincial matter, so I suggest we invite provincial governments to cooperate. Some provincial governments talk so much about cooperation that they have no time left actually to cooperate.

Another measure for the relief of unemployment would be that of taking some steps to reopen those industrial plants which, on account of disastrous Tory policies, closed their doors between 1930 and 1935. There is one such closed plant in Cap de la Madeleine, the city in which I live. In that city is an industrious and thrifty population, the best in the country. They long for the reopening of the St. Maurice Paper company mill, which ceased to operate in 1932, when the then Prime Minister was blasting his way to the world markets. That mill still remains closed, while the premier of Quebec celebrates with great pomp the opening of a new paper mill at Comeau Bay. Again I say the provincial government has a certain control over and connection with such corporation. Let us again ask the provincial government to bend its energies not towards developing political quarrels and idle criticism, but upon finding work for the unemployed, permanent work, and not that which is temporary, unsteady and unproductive.

A further good and practical move would be to reform or to abolish the senate, and thus save money. Let us discard that useless and expensive chamber. Possibly it could be converted into an industrial, practical Canadian chamber of commerce, the functions of which would be to invite and to bring in new industries to our rich country, and to find ways and means of reopening the closed ones. I realize the question of unemployment is a serious and difficult one, but its solution is not beyond our powers. There must be union, harmony, cooperation and sincerity of purpose between the provinces and the central government.

Moved by a sense of narrow provincialism and by personal ambitions, some bombastic provincial heroes do not hesitate to set province against province and section against section, with the result that the very foundations of our confederation are presently shaken. The personal importance and actual weight of those destructive agents are not extraordinary, but the position they hold makes the condition much more serious. No matter what importance may be attached to the actual causes of discord, their effect upon Canadian unity may be tremendous. It is time that the serious people of all parties should rise against sectionalism. To treat with contempt the anti-national attitude of some provincial premiers is no longer advisable or wise, and I say that a mere passive attitude if prolonged may have serious consequences. Let us remember that there is not always a measure of proportion between cause and effect. Let us remember that the kick of an insignificant cow caused almost the entire destruction of the city of Chicago some years ago.

According to the British North America Act unemployment is a provincial matter. Unemployment insurance is in the same position. Let the provinces settle those questions. However, if they cannot do so, let them step out of the way and permit the federal government to act freely. It is a shame and a crime that the unemployed and the whole of the labouring class should be deprived of the benefits of unemployment insurance on account of the narrow-minded views of a couple of provincial premiers. Provincial autonomy means as much to me as to anyone, but the welfare of the whole country should be the supreme law. Real Canadians and real statesmen do see beyond provincial frontiers. Canadian workmen want unemployment insurance, and it is only fair that they should have it. Had we established such a system of insurance before the last depression, our unemployment difficulties would not be half as great as they are going to be.

It is time that the demands of our labouring classes were met in order that we may avoid labour troubles in the future. Our country will fare better when all classes of the community are organized and united and when their unions are equitably protected by law. Our farmers and our workmen should be united. The right kind of unions protected by the right kind of laws will go a long way to alleviate our unemployment troubles. I believe in labour unions, and I believe in the right of organized labour to declare strikes and to protect itself against strike-breakers. In brief, the workman's right to obtain redress by means of strikes should be respected and protected by all governments.

It is futile to pretend to make strikes legal and lawful and at the same time to permit someone to spoil the purposes of a strike. Whenever legitimate means have been taken by workmen to obtain redress, when sufficient time has been given to the employer to redress the wrongs, then and only then should a strike be allowed to proceed peacefully and effectively. I speak subject to correction, but I understand a New York state law makes it compulsory for workmen to submit their grievances to a board made up of representatives of the employees, the employer and the business men in the particular locality. Ample time is provided for in which to arrive at a compromise. This law might be copied in Canada. A strike is such a tremendously grave measure to be taken that all possible means should be used to avoid such action.

I know the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) and the Minister of Labour are giving particular attention to the rights of labour. The employers and the large corporations can always protect themselves, and our particular care should be for the workmen in order to help them to obtain their legitimate demands. I thought it fit to make a few remarks and offer some suggestions in connection with capital and its relations to labour. I feel that few other problems have the magnitude of this one and deserve as much study and attention. I feel proud to declare myself in sympathy with the least fortunate class of our people who need particularly to be organized and united in order to enjoy their natural rights and prerogatives.

On motion of Mr. Poole the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Dunning the house adjourned at 10.55 p.m.

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT—STATIONARY ENGINEERS AND FIREMEN

Mr. HYNDMAN:

1. (a) Do stationary engineers and firemen, in charge of boilers in the Public Works department, have to "sign the time clock" and remain on duty for the lunch hour? (b) if not, is there a relief substitute provided, as by law required for safety and to prevent accidents? (c) If remaining on duty, is there a monetary compensation for this time; or is time allowed in liew therefor?

2. (a) How many of these plants are over 200 horse-power? (b) How many are under 200 horse-power?

3. Is it proposed to add to the amount in the estimates to provide for additional stationary engineers and firemen?

Mr. CARDIN:

1. (a), (b), (c) Engineers and firemen sign the time clock and the staff, who work 8-hour shifts from 7.30 a.m. to 3.30 p.m., or from 8 a.m. to 4 p.m., remain on duty for the lunch hour, except in the larger buildings where engineers take one hour off for lunch and work up to 5 p.m. They are not replaced by other engineers for the lunch hour, and therefore no time is allowed. This does not include the central heating plant where there are a number of engineers and firemen continuously on duty.

2. (a) six, (b) eight.

3. No.

LOANS UNDER HOME IMPROVEMENT PLAN AND DOMINION HOUSING ACT

Mr. FONTAINE:

1. What amount was loaned up to March 31, 1938, under the federal home improvement plan: (a) in Canada; (b) in the province of Quebec; (c) in St. Hyacinthe-Bagot county; (d) in the city of St. Hyacinthe?

2. What amount was loaned up to March 31, 1938, under the Dominion Housing Act: (a) in Canada; (b) in the province of Quebec; (c) in St. Hyacinthe-Bagot county; (d) in the city of St. Hyacinthe?

Mr. DUNNING:

1. (a) $14,526,455.32.
   (b) 2,775,943.98.
   (c) 61,653.09.
   (d) 56,453.09.

2. (a) 15,022,659.00.
   (b) 4,782,552.00.
   (c) Nil.
   (d) Nil.

MELITA, MAN., POST OFFICE

Mr. PERLEY:

What was the contract price and the total cost for building and equipment of the new post office building at Melita, Manitoba?

Mr. CARDIN: Contract price, $11,117. Total cost of building, including equipment, $16,653.53.

MAJOR JAMES HAHN

Mr. WOODSWORTH:

1. Was Major James Hahn appointed by the Canadian government to go to England in 1937 and 1938 to make a survey of munitions production for the purpose of advising the Canadian government?

2. If so, were his expenses paid by the Canadian government?
3. What were the terms of Major Hahn's employment?
4. At what date did Major Hahn cease to be employed by the Canadian government to advise on munitions and begin negotiating for production by him of Bren machine guns?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver):

1. No.

2, 3 and 4. Answered by 1.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

DOMINION PUBLIC BUILDINGS, NEW BRUNSWICK—COAL CONTRACTS

Mr. BROOKS:

1. (a) How many contracts have been awarded since January 1, 1938, for the supplying of coal to federal public buildings in the province of New Brunswick? (b) What are the names and locations of such buildings?
2. What tenders were received in each case, what were their amounts, and to whom were the contracts awarded?

MOTION FOR PAPERS

VALIDITY OF ALBERTA STATUTES—CORRESPONDENCE AND OTHER DOCUMENTS RESPECTING DISALLOWANCE

Mr. POOLE:

(a) For a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, passing between the government of the province of Alberta or any member thereof, and the federal government or any member thereof, regarding the disallowance of any Alberta acts during the year 1938; (b) for a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, communications and other documents from any persons, corporations, firms or banks, requesting or protesting the disallowance of any Alberta acts.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: This is a pretty large order. There is no objection whatever to bringing down any essential documents, but I would point out that this motion asks for a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams, communications and other documents from any persons, corporations, firms or banks, requesting or protesting the disallowance of any Alberta acts. There are a great many communications which have come in both to the Prime Minister's office and to the office of the Minister of Justice, and possibly to some other departments as well. Many of them are really in the nature of a repetition of certain form communications.

Mr. BENNETT: Circular letters.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Circular communications and letters of that kind. I really believe it would cost quite a sum to have all of these copied and it would also take a very considerable time before they could be copied. The first part of the motion asks for a copy of all correspondence, letters, telegrams and other documents, passing between the government of the province of Alberta or any member thereof, and the federal government or any member thereof, regarding the disallowance of any Alberta acts during the year 1938. That part of the order could be brought down in full; but as to the miscellaneous communications I would suggest to the mover of the resolution that he agree to allowing the departmental officials latitude to pick out what they regard as important and essential.

Mr. BENNETT: Might it not be well to do what was done on a previous occasion at the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman when he was in opposition, namely, merely to file a sheet of paper saying that letters somewhat similar to the attached, and many others, have been received, giving a list of the writers? Certainly it is a waste of public money to copy a stereotyped form of petition sent in by many people scattered over many sections of the country. If the Prime Minister would simply give the substance, that is all that would be necessary.

Mr. POOLE: I should like to give the suggestion some consideration and bring the matter to the attention of the Prime Minister on another occasion before the end of the session.

Motion stands.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 28 FOR SITTING OF JUNE 23

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister) moved:

That the provision of standing order 28, respecting the committee of ways and means, be suspended for the sitting of June the 23rd, 1938.

He said: Hon. members recognize that this is to permit the present budget debate to continue to-morrow. Otherwise the Speaker would leave the chair without question being put on Thursday, and this is to keep His Honour the Speaker in the chair.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I think the motion might have read, "until the conclusion of the debate." This is only for to-morrow; the debate may continue until the next day.

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: There is some objection to having a division come on Friday. I am afraid if we do not conclude the debate to-morrow, it will have to go over until next week.

Motion agreed to.

BREN MACHINE GUNS

INQUIRY AS TO MANUFACTURE IN CANADA AND BRITISH WAR OFFICE CONTRACTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): May I ask the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) if it is the intention of the department to make available equipment from the Quebec arsenal, the Valcartier camp, or the old Ross rifle factory for the manufacture of Bren machine guns by a private company; and if so, under what conditions?

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): My hon. friend will find that I have already answered the question, during the discussion on my estimates. Very briefly, some machinery which has been stored for the last twenty years is being utilized for the manufacture of Bren guns, and the estimated saving to the department, according to the officers, is $250,000. It is not being transferred to the ownership of a private corporation. The ownership remains in the government, two-thirds of the cost of the material being borne by this government and one-third of the cost being borne by the British war office.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): According to a dispatch which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press of June 20, the dominion government have given a contract to a Toronto firm to manufacture 7,000 of these new type machine guns. The British government has contracted with the same company, the John Inglis Company, for 5,000 of these guns, and four cars of machinery are already on the way from Valcartier to Toronto. The statement is made also that:

> The contract between the Canadian government and the John Inglis Company for manufacturing the 7,000 Bren guns was signed on behalf of the company by Major J. E. Hahn, an officer with a distinguished military record in the C.E.F. and now president of the Inglis company. According to official information, the cost plus 10 per cent profit basis provides that the 10 per cent is not to be figured on either sales tax or customs duties.

I should like to ask the Minister of National Defence, as it is asked both in the dispatch and in a long editorial in the Free Press of last Monday, how he reconciles this state of affairs with his statement across the floor of the house to me the other day when he said:

> With reference to any orders to be placed in Canada, we have no more information than is in possession of the hon. member who asked the question.

[Mr. Mackenzie King.]

Apparently there has been a joint arrangement between the British authorities and the Canadian authorities, together with a loan of certain machinery from Quebec. If that statement is correct, how does the minister reconcile this seemingly very careful arrangement, and the signing of the contract, with his statement to me that he knows nothing more about the matter than I do?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): If my hon. friend will look over the discussions which took place in committee of supply when my own estimates were under consideration, he will find that in response to the question of some hon. gentleman opposite, details were very carefully stated at that time. There was no cooperative contract; the contract with the war office was signed by the Toronto firm entirely separately from the contract with the Canadian government; but, as the result of two complementary contracts being signed, there will be a saving to this government of over one and a quarter million dollars.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I ask the minister how he reconciles his statement to me—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: —across the floor of the house, with the statements in this report?

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I want to assure my hon. friend that there was not the slightest intention to misrepresent the situation. In regard to the contract with the war office, this was declared to the house before he asked his question of me on the floor of the house, and details were given, as they were asked, in committee of supply. There was not the slightest intention to suppress nor was there a suppression of any information, in the slightest degree. I say now in regard to these contracts that there has never been a cooperative effort between the British war office and the government of Canada except in regard to the Bren gun, and the two contracts in that case have been separately negotiated.

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): What compensation is the Canadian government receiving from the Inglis company for the loan of the machinery, and what is the value of the machinery so loaned?

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I think that to answer that question it would be better to table the actual agreement with the company in question.

UNEMPLOYMENT

VANCOUVER SITUATION—INQUIRY AS TO PROVISION OF FOOD UNTIL EMPLOYMENT PROVIDED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. ANGUS MacINNIS (Vancouver East): I would like to ask the government in the absence of the Minister of Labour if their attention has been drawn to press reports of this morning that a number of unemployed are destitute in the city of Vancouver, and that they have announced that they will have to beg on the streets; also that the city officials have announced that if they do so they will be prosecuted; and, under the circumstances, has any arrangement been made to feed these men until work can be provided?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I may say that officials of the government are watching carefully the press reports which relate to the situation in Vancouver, and are cooperating, I understand, with the authorities there with respect to any situation which may develop. I cannot say what action the Minister of Labour may have taken. I have no doubt that he, like other members of the government, would be anxious to do anything he could toward improving the situation of these men at this time.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Tuesday, June 21, consideration of the motion of Hon. Charles A. Dunning (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Lawson, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to attempt to cover all the ground dealt with in the budget speech, which is after all quite voluminous. I have read the budget speech, and I think that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is to be complimented on the manner in which he delivered it to this house. I think also that the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson), who had the privilege of replying to the government yesterday, made a very fine speech. But as I look over the budget, once again I am struck by the fact that both parties represent the bulwark of traditions. There is nothing new to meet conditions that are new. It is more or less a resumé or history of our economic progress during the last year and the expression of a pious hope that in the future things will change for the better.

During the speech the minister touched on many things which are significant to every hon. member, especially in his references to trade. He said:

> In emphasizing as I have done certain uncontrollable forces which have been influencing our economy, I would not have you think that I neglect or minimize the importance of the domestic factors. The fundamental fact that in this modern world no nation can live unto itself alone does not lessen, indeed it reinforces, the necessity for Canada to devote its maximum energies to the solution of its own internal problems.

The question raised in that passage from the minister's speech is significant, because the trend of the world is toward economic nationalism. This is a truth that we must face. The present economy of Canada is based upon the premise that prosperity is dependent upon our external trade. Quite true, in the days of expansion through the years following the industrial revolution which began in 1742. The system which we know as capitalism has derived its strength from the fact that the world was not at that time industrialized. But later, and especially since the great war, we have seen industrialization in every nation of the world speeded up; the very conditions which brought about prosperity in the days that are gone, through the wages received by the great masses of the people, are no more, and the markets of the world are now contracted to such an extent that there is a lesser possibility of selling goods in the world market. The result is unemployment in every nation of the world, and Canada is no exception.

Later on in his address the Minister of Finance dealt with the question of increased production in this country. The greatest contributing factor to our internal prosperity in 1937 was the increase in production in terms of metals. Surely it must be evident by this time to every member of this parliament that this is not and could not be a basis for our future prosperity. We notice that the production of all the ingredients necessary for armaments has increased; the production of nickel, lead, copper and so on has increased. Now let us face facts for a moment. Let us suppose that this mad armament race should cease; that once again peace should prevail between China and Japan; that the warring factions in Spain should go back to the soil and turn their swords into ploughshares. What would be the result in this country? From an economic point of view it would be disastrous, because then there would not be the same demand for our production. The group in this corner has persistently emphasized this one important fact, that the only way to prosperity is by recognizing first of all that the best market a nation has is the home market. That is where our prosperity must begin and end. The old belief that prosperity lies in selling our goods to the nations of the world, and that the sale of those goods is the only instrument that can be used to feed our own people, no longer holds good; because as we go on, year after year, the industrial machine will speed up more and more. as a result men will be displaced from industry. But that is not the greatest tragedy. The greatest tragedy lies in the fact that the traditional governments of the world recognize that wages is the only sound and legitimate source of purchasing power. If that is true, and the markets of the world contract through each nation becoming more industrialized, there will be a lesser demand abroad for our goods and incidentally less employment.

What is the inevitable conclusion to which we must come? It is that the system of wages has broken down. I am quite sure if hon. members opposite have followed the trend of events in the country to the south this will be brought home to them more fully than in the case of our own country. Markets are contracting; the wage system has broken down; and our prosperity, such as it was, in the year 1937 was the result of conditions which we hope will not become permanent in world affairs, in other words preparation for war. I often think that if one half the effort which is put into the finding of new markets abroad were put into placing our internal market in order, this would be a prosperous country to-day.

Now I should like to say a few words with regard to the "hoary" fallacy referred to by the Minister of Finance. In his speech the minister said:

> The experience of several countries with expansionist policies during the last few years has proven that only a rise in the rate of new investment can provide a durable basis for an upswing in business activity. Attempts to stimulate consumption by government expenditure or by suddenly improving labour conditions have been tried on more than one occasion but in every case they have been found wanting.

That is a very important statement. For the moment we should keep in mind my argument in the first instance with regard to contracting markets. As industry speeds up at home; as labour is displaced by technological improvements, it must follow that the burden in the days ahead will fall more on governments if industry cannot absorb these men, and if we are not prepared to change our monetary system. I want to say to the Minister of Finance that we of this group do not believe in inflation, at least the kind of inflation to which the Minister of Finance has given expression on so many occasions. Nor do we believe in deflation. They are twin evils; deflation, when money becomes so dear that nobody can get it, or inflation of the type that makes money so cheap that it will buy nothing. It is the middle road we want to follow; in the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) himself, to issue credit in terms of public need. A little further on the minister dealt once again with the question of money. He said:

> There are some, of course, who appear to believe that the government should not pay interest at all or, indeed, should issue debt free money to finance its expenditures or to retire its interest bearing debt or to do both of these things.

Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I do not believe the social credit group in this house ever suggested repudiating our obligations. That has no part in our program. What we do need, however, is to place in the hands of the masses of the people of this country the means with which to meet their obligations, which is an entirely different matter.

Once again the Minister of Finance, making reference to the "hoary" policy as expounded by this little group, speaks of debt-free money. Here is the difference between the repudiation of obligations and debt-free money. We do not intend to repudiate any obligations, but we should bear in mind that in the last few years there has been one class of people who have been benefited through deflation. I am now referring to those who purchased bonds or debentures of the provinces and the dominion some years ago, during an inflationary period, when the price level was high. Contracts were then made between the purchaser and the seller. The result has been that over a period of years through deflation the debts of the provinces have increased. Social services have increased, and the cost has been laid on the provinces and municipalities. In terms of high interest rates we have placed a heavy burden upon small properties until the very homes of the people of Canada have been placed in jeopardy. One has only to review the rising mill rate since 1930 in the municipalities and cities of Canada to find out who is carrying the burden.

I should like to draw a parallel. We will suppose that I purchased bonds in 1928, when the price level was high, and that a friend of mine invested in real wealth, or, in other words, built a home.

Mr. BOTHWELL: Were Alberta bonds ever at a premium?

Mr. POOLE: I will deal with you in a minute. I am trying to draw a contrast. I was saying that we both invested, one in real wealth and the other in bonds. But when the depression deepened, when social services increased and the mill rate rose, the debt was placed upon the man who invested in real wealth. In hundreds of cases in Canada people have lost their equities in their homes. Why? It had to be done to pay fixed charges and to meet sacred contractual obligations. Now the price level is down, and the income derived from bonds during the deflationary period purchases more. There has been a hue and cry across Canada against tampering in any shape or form with these sacred obligations. Surely in view of what I have said, and in view of the burden which has been borne by the small property holders, the bondholders should have come forward and accepted at least some adjustment to relieve financial conditions in Canada. But that has not been done.

I now turn to the hon. member who asked the question about the province of Alberta. Let me say to him that we inherited a bankrupt province. The only terms upon which we could get relief from this government was to go into a loan council. At that time we did not think it was advisable to centralize authority with regard to future borrowings.

Mr. BOTHWELL: On that point, how can the hon. member say that Alberta is bankrupt when a board reports that the assets of the province are 230 billions as against a few millions of debt?

Mr. POOLE: I am referring to financial bankruptcy. A nation is never bankrupt unless it is desolate, unless its fertility vanishes or its natural resources disappear. That is the only time a nation can go bankrupt in the sense my hon. friend means. But we were financially bankrupt. There was no money in the treasury. So we were compelled to take this action, much against the inclination or the desire of the provincial government. In regard to the issuing of debt money, what exactly do we do when we borrow in Canada? Do we not borrow on the basis of the ability of the people of Canada some day to pay back? Do we not borrow on the basis of our natural and intellectual resources? Is that or is it not true? To-day we are borrowing through the banking system. And what do we borrow? We borrow the permission to produce more of that which we already have—real wealth. In my opinion the Minister of Finance has taken a step in the right direction. During the life of this parliament he has made a successful attempt to reduce the interest on our national debt. That is a credit to the present government, and a procedure I should like to see continued. But we will never have prosperity until we face the facts. The chief fact confronting us is that our financial system is totally inadequate to meet the present situation. It is true that we have reduced the interest rate, but it is equally true that we have increased our capital debt. How long can a nation continue, generation after generation, to place a chattel mortgage upon the distant future which generations yet unborn will have to carry?

I see no real or logical reason why we could not issue credit in terms of public need. I do not see why we cannot issue credit on the basis of our real wealth, in exactly the same manner as it is done by the banks. In that way we could place every ablebodied man to work in the creation of national assets. Highways must be built. Surely there is nothing to interfere with a real program of national development. I would hope that during the life of this parliament such development might take place. Unless, however, we take control of our monetary system, I can see no relief. The nationalization of the Bank of Canada is not taking control of the financial system. The most important question in connection with the bank would be this: What is the policy of the bank going to be?

When we say we are going to issue credit in terms of public need, to what need do we refer? Are we referring to loans which would be made available to industry? Do we not yet realize that we can pour money into industry and only aggravate the present depression? We know what has been tried in the United States of America. No; we must begin with the consumer. I am convinced any hon. member opposite who will study the questions of costs and prices will realize that the cost of production is one thing and that the retail price of goods is an entirely different thing. The difference between the total cost of production and the ultimate price of retail goods is widening, as the industrial machine speeds up, because it displaces certain payments which to-day go into costs in terms of wages and helped partially to liquidate prices.

The recent unfortunate defeat of our party in Saskatchewan does not cause me any discouragement, and I am sure in saying this I can speak for all members of my group. We feel, as have other men who have gone before and who have contributed to the progress of the human family, that we are on the right track. In my short life I have followed governments closely. Since the great war I have watched the governments in Great Britain struggling with national problems. I have followed closely the pump-priming policy of the president of the United States. I watched in Canada attempts during 1931 and 1932 to eliminate unemployment by a program of public works. But none of these things is sufficient in itself. They are only palliatives; they are patches on an already outworn garment. The fundamental thing to do—

Mr. DONNELLY: Aberhart!

Mr. POOLE: Never mind Aberhart.

Mr. DONNELLY: Follow his policy and put them all to work.

Mr. POOLE: If this government were more kindly disposed, and a little more in contact with the issues confronting Canada, it would realize that the best thing for it to do would be to overstep certain constitutional questions and give that eminent gentleman, Mr. Aberhart, an opportunity to carry out his policies in Alberta. When I hear hon. members call across the floor, and when I hear them criticize Alberta, I say to myself, "They are not afraid he will fail; they are afraid he is going to win." And we will.

Mr. DONNELLY: I saw him four years ago, and I knew very well he would not get anywhere.

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): I suppose he looked as good as the hon. member does at any rate.

Mr. POOLE: I am not going to argue with you, because—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to address the chair, and when referring to other hon. members to indicate their constituencies.

Mr. POOLE: I apologize, Mr. Speaker. Out of all argument as a rule comes more heat than light. I think hon. members of this group ought to be complimented on the stand they have taken in spite of all the opposition that has been voiced against them. The Liberal party is supposed to be progressive, but we see the Liberal government aligning themselves, either directly or indirectly, with the financial system and with those organizations which will break up the British Empire before they will give up their privileges. These are men who have no patriotism, men who recognize no national boundaries, men who produce nothing; they are men who make their money from the free instruments that this government has given to them.

I am seeking cooperation, and I do not think I should be ridiculed. I am seeking understanding, something which every hon. member of this house should seek. I ask the cooperation of hon. gentlemen opposite. We may smile to-day, but let me say to hon. gentlemen opposite that when I hear of riots occurring across this country, when I see evidence of the widespread poverty in this land of abundance, I come to the conclusion that these are birth pangs which will bring forth the revolutionary child which will grow to an aggressive maturity as the evidences of social injustices and economic insecurity become more apparent. We are generating forces which will destroy the last semblance of democracy. Let me say to hon. gentlemen opposite that the conditions which we have to-day in this country—

An hon. MEMBER: The drought.

Mr. POOLE: An hon. member says that these are due to the drought, but let me say that the conditions which prevail in this country, while they may be better than those that prevailed in Germany, are speedily reaching a point where democracy will be destroyed. Democracy can live only by the good results which it gives. When governments refuse to listen, when they just sit back and ridicule every proposal made to them, there is very little hope for a greater Canada.

My hon. friend says that this depression is a result of the drought. A few years ago the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) went over to London to attend an imperial conference. The proposal was made at that conference that since there was overproduction there should be a reduction in our wheat acreage. The hon. member states that our present condition is due to the drought. Let me tell him this: Should we have two crops similar to the one we had in 1928, and there is no greater demand for Canadian wheat than exists at the present time, we will soon have 400,000,000 bushels of wheat piled up in our elevators, and conditions then will be worse than they are to-day as a result of the drought. No doubt the drought is a contributing factor to our present condition, but we must not forget that the depression is world wide.

I am not blaming anyone in this country for our present condition, but I am critical of the government and of government members who ridicule every progressive thought out of existence. Remember that the truth of these things will prevail. For political reasons you may go on the hustings in Saskatchewan, backed with your great resources, and tell the people a story in order to get elected. Merely getting elected is not victory. Victory lies in the achievement. Victory means to achieve something. Victory means doing something that will bring security to your people. That is the business of this House of Commons. We should see that in this land of abundance, not one man, woman or child shall be deprived of the opportunity—

Mr. DONNELLY: Where do you get that abundance? We have not had a crop for nine years.

Mr. SPEAKER: If the hon. member desires to ask a question, he should first obtain the consent of the hon. member who is speaking.

Mr. DONNELLY: Where does the hon. member get the idea that there is abundance in this country, since we have had no crop for nine years.

Mr. POOLE: We have had a balance of trade of some $300,000,000. If we have not enough, why are there so many unemployed? Why do we put these men to work to produce more? There is the argument. What is your reply? We do not live by wheat alone. Have we not forestry and mineral resources, and everything we want?

Mr. DONNELLY: Not out there.

Mr. POOLE: Yes, we have. We have a greater abundance of these things than most nations of the world. I am quite convinced that no nation can prosper in the midst of misery and degradation. I hear hon. members state that there is work for all recipients of relief, but that is not true until you change your policy. The general condition of unemployment is there. So far this government have not been able to obliterate poverty. They will never obliterate poverty until they change the monetary system, until they issue credit in the terms of public need, as the Prime Minister put it. This will not be done until we understand the true nature of price. Rising prices are no criterion of future prosperity.

On every occasion when the Minister of Finance has been dealing with the monetary policy of this country he has turned to our group, as though replying to us, and has seemed to be a prophet of fear. He has told the house that there cannot be monetary reform without inflation. Of course that is not true. The monetary reform that we propose will bring down the price level as production goes up, not increase prices in order to make our dollar valueless. We would increase the value of our dollar in order to make more goods available to the people. We are convinced, and I believe the Liberal party will be in ten years or so, that man will never go to work in industry as he has in the past. Only a few short years ago in 1928 a total of 44,000 harvest workers went to western Canada to work in the harvest fields. Since that time thousands of combines and other pieces of farm machinery have been purchased to do away with the need of these workers, and incidentally to do away with their wages, the only instrument they have with which to purchase goods.

From time to time in this house we have heard expressed a fear of communism and fascism. We have been told of the high virtues of democracy. But let me say this, that the move will be either to the right or to the left. This country of only 11,000,000 people has been blessed by the Almighty. If we cannot put men to work building useful public projects, if we cannot give our people a hope for a better future so that they in turn can build homes, then I say that we are indeed bankrupt.

I said when I rose that I was not going to deal with the whole budget, because that is an impossibility in forty minutes; but I do want to emphasize the question of money, which was touched on by the Minister of Finance in the budget. The task of the minister will become more and more difficult as the years go by if he does not take control of the monetary system of this country in all its phases, not only the Bank of Canada but the chartered banks. It must be recognized that the consumer is the greatest factor in our whole economic structure; that monetary reform does not mean a rise in prices, but rather that increased production means a reduction in prices, and that in any equitable economic system in this or any other country you must in an age of abundance begin with the consumer to make up the difference between the cost of production and the ultimate price of goods on the retailers' shelves.

Mr. ARTHUR-J. LAPOINTE (Matapedia-Matane) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, in order not to delay the passing of the budget, I shall not make a long speech. I desire however to take this opportunity to offer a few observations which I conceive to be in the interest of the country.

It is the duty of public men to call the government's attention to abuses which may creep into its organizations without its knowledge. While refraining from destructive criticism, I believe that the time has come to offer certain observations concerning the administration of the Canadian National Railways, more particularly as regards the French-Canadian representation on their staff, many members of which, highly paid and arrogant, seem to be constantly defying public opinion.

Far be it from me, Mr. Speaker, to raise the racial cry. In these troublous times, a peaceful solution of our problems is essential. However, I am not one of those who believe that, for the sake of harmony, we should maintain a passive attitude in the face of injustice.

Under cover of a politically-independent commission, it is sought to surround with mystery the administration of our national railways. High officials receive salaries so exorbitant that it is considered undesirable to reveal them to the public, for fear of creating a scandal. A certain number of them have at their disposal luxurious private cars which are being repaired this year at a cost of many thousands of dollars, while, under the pretext of economy, poor subordinate employees are being laid off and deprived of the wage that allowed them to maintain their families.

I notice with regret that whenever economy has to be practised it is always at the expense of the small man. Why not begin by reducing the salaries of officials who are paid ten, twelve or fifteen thousand dollars a year, often for doing nothing? With the exception of a very few higher officials, no member of the Canadian National Railways' staff should receive more than $5,000 a year. These officials have got to the point of thinking that they own the railways. They say: We are managing the national railways; you, members of parliament, mind your own affairs. But when the time comes to vote, 30, 40 and even 50 millions of dollars to cover the deficit, it is we who vote the money and the people who pay it.

I do not wish to be unpleasant to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe), for whom I have the greatest esteem. I am aware of his devotion to duty and I know that he is doing his best. Moreover, he is simply applying rules that have been in force for many years. But, since the present system lends itself to numerous abuses, it should be changed and the people's representatives who, after all, are responsible for the administration of the country's affairs, should know what is going on in that field.

The possible amalgamation of our two great railway systems is being spoken of more than ever. I am absolutely opposed to such a plan, for it would lead to the creation of a powerful monopoly which would be disastrous to the Canadian people. I take this opportunity to call the attention of the house to the manner in which the people of the province of Quebec are being treated by the Canadian National Railways. It is a rather extraordinary thing that the stations situated between La Reine and Fitzpatrick and between Noranda and Taschereau, covering a distance of 411 miles, all in Quebec province, are under the jurisdiction of an Ontario superintendent. The same situation exists on the Gaspé coast and from Matapedia to Rivière du Loup, a stretch of 366 miles, where a New Brunswick superintendent is in charge.

Until a few years ago Matapedia was a divisional point for the Gaspé trains. Under the Conservative administration, again for alleged purposes of economy, but most unjustly for the province of Quebec, Matapedia was replaced as a divisional point by Campbellton, New Brunswick. Those who have heard the story know how interesting it is. As for me, I would call it revolting.

But that is not all. When in Quebec territory freight cars are in need of repairs, they are sent from as far as Lake St. John to Leaside, Ontario, or to Transcona, near Winnipeg, to undergo repair work which could be done just as well in the shops of the province of Quebec. The moving of these cars over such great distances involves an enormous expenditure and deprives the workers of Quebec of employment to which they are entitled.

I shall now say a word about the manner in which the French Canadians are treated by our national railway system. I hold in my hand a Canadian National Railways telephone directory for the Montreal region. It bears the title: Private Branch Automatic Exchange Telephone Directory, Canadian National Railways, Montreal, and the form number 6466. Looking over it, I understood more than ever the causes of the unrest and discontent that exist in the province of Quebec. I advise hon. members, for their edification, to read this directory which I hold at their disposal. They will then realize the standing of the French Canadians in the Canadian National Railways organization and will better understand our grievances. It is practically impossible for a French Canadian to obtain a copy of this directory; the officials seem to hide it well, for fear that, here again, the public might find out what is going on. It is clear, Mr. Speaker, that there exists within the Canadian National Railways an organization which is seeking to eliminate French Canadians from the posts to which they are entitled. I therefore consider it necessary to investigate this situation, which should not be allowed to continue. Our English speaking friends may be tired of hearing our often repeated complaints, but I wish to tell them that, if we were used a little more fairly, if we were not always kept in the background, we would not so often deem it our painful duty to discuss with such frequency a problem very disagreeable to us.

In order to show them the actual situation, I invite them to visit with me the province of Quebec where we will effect a little investigation. Let us first go to Montreal, and visit the shops, or the large offices of the Canadian National Railways on McGill street.

If my hon. friends pay a visit to the different branches,—Traffic, Finance, Accounting, Purchasing, Industry, Natural Resources, etc., —they will not find more than two French Canadians out of every twenty employees. They will also find that French Canadians have been almost ostracised from important positions and that high salaries never go to them. They will look in vain for bilingual signs, either on the walls or on the office doors. If they ask the elevator operator for information in French, they probably will receive the same answer as I got, a few weeks ago: "I do not understand." All that is going on in the greatest French centre of America.

I will then ask my hon. friends to travel to the eastern part of the province of Quebec. But, before we leave Bonaventure station, we will pay a short visit to the offices of the sleeping-car department. My hon. friends will no doubt be received as I was a few days ago when I spoke French to one of the employees: "Do you speak English"? said he. "If so, all right, because nobody here understands French."

We will then board the Ocean Limited, the night express, where further surprises await my hon. friends. In the sleeping-cars, they will try in vain to make themselves understood in the French language. After a night's rest, we will go to the dining-car. In any of the places between Rimouski and Matapedia, the stretch covered from 6 to 9 a.m., when the train passes through one of the most beautiful districts of the province of Quebec, which is also one of the most exclusively French, I defy them to find, among the eight employees on the staff of that car, a single one who can speak French. The end of our trip will be in Campbellton, New Brunswick. Over 50 per cent of the lines administered from that divisional point are in the province of Quebec. Of the 14 employees there, four only are French Canadians. The staff in the divisional office numbers 21, of whom only four are French Canadians. Forty-five men are employed in the roundhouse and seven only are French Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, it is all very well to speak of union and harmony between races. But, when one of the races which forms a third of the total population of this country must put up with the rebuffs and the humiliations which I have just described I am bound to confess that union and harmony are impossible. I will frankly ask the hon. members who represent Toronto constituencies in this chamber if the people of that city would submit for long to such a treatment. Although the situation has substantially improved since 1935 in many aspects, it is evident that French Canadians do not receive that measure of justice to which they are entitled.

It takes some courage to voice these truths, but I did it with the best intentions possible. I felt that it was my duty to call the attention of this house on the subject, because that situation is bound to have serious consequences, if no remedy is applied in the near future.

Mr. Speaker, the descendants of those who discovered our country, who opened it to civilization and kept it for the empire on certain occasions; the descendants of those who contributed to such a degree to make of Canada the beautiful and great country it is to-day, are entitled to fairer treatment. When they receive it, good will and harmony will exist between the two great races, which are essential factors of our social and economic progress.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise to support the sub-amendment of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell). I should like to call the attention of the house to certain facts brought to light by the royal commission on the textile industry which was appointed in January, 1936, and reported in January of this year. The commissioner, Mr. W. F. A. Turgeon said:

> . . . the advantage of protection is granted to these companies subject to certain conditions, which parliament should recognize and government should enforce.

And further:

> . . . the great value of the inquiry lies, not in this report . . . but in this material itself . . . in the factums prepared with great care and handed in by counsel for the commission. . . .

I propose to-day to follow quite closely the brief presented by Mr. J. C. McRuer, commission counsel, consisting of some 426 mimeographed pages. As far as possible I shall use the language of the brief.

In my speech on Monday on the Vancouver situation I referred to this record as a shameful, sickening story of heartless exploitation, of wholesale robbery by men prominent in the public life of Canada. Inordinate greed, barefaced lying and criminal fraud characterize the careers of this gang of high-class crooks. I suggested that these exploiters were sheltering within our tariff structure and compared the leniency with which they were treated with the harsh methods used in evicting the unemployed from the post office in Vancouver. The member for Parry Sound (Mr. Slaght) accused me of using immoderate language, of being bitter, vitriolic and vituperative. I should like to place before the house some of the facts and leave the facts to speak for themselves. These facts have been known to the government for over a year, but so far as I can learn, there has been no change in the situation. We have now another budget and we are told that we are to have no tariff changes.

Let me give some illustrations of how the situation affects this country and the people of the country. Mr. A. O. Dawson, president of Canadian Cottons, seems to be very tenderhearted as he refers to the widows and orphans. In fact, he bases his scheme for further protection against competition from Japan on the following grounds:

> . . . Because my own company is becoming hoary with age. A great many of the shares are now owned by widows and orphans. Some three or four years ago when we had to discontinue paying dividends it was simply heartbreaking to me to receive personal calls and letters from people who informed me that the withdrawal of our dividends brought them on the verge of starvation.

Now, what are the facts? Canadian Cottons has earned for the shareholders since 1892 a total of $24,560,804.50. Although the original investment cannot be determined with accuracy it was shown to have been not more than $3,930,130. Again, Mr. Dawson showed very great solicitude for the workers. He said—and I quote:

> Because of Japanese competition, our workers will be drawing starvation wages and the industry itself will be in extreme danger of annihilation.

These statements are absolutely unfounded. The company has an undistributed surplus available for shareholders of $5,782,067, of which $2,277,208.81 is a secret reserve, not even disclosed to the shareholders, and there is an additional $9,000,000 accumulated undisclosed surplus represented in fixed assets. In addition the company, having been given the legal opportunity of accumulating these reserves, has taken a secret and unfair advantage of the government by concealing its profits and failing to pay the required income tax.

It is hardly necessary for me to point out, as the brief does, that it is from the taxpayers and consumers of the country that a protected corporation receives its right to make special profits that it otherwise could not make. It is the right of those conferring these benefits to be furnished with accurate and honest information in regard to the benefits accruing to the recipients of the special privilege.

Let me turn to another well known person, Mr. B. Gordon, managing director of the Dominion Textile Company. He also shows a very great concern for what he calls "the true interests" of the employees. The secretary of the Syndicat Catholique du Textile de St. Gregoire wrote him asking for an opportunity to discuss with him the matter of wages paid at the mill. How did Mr. Gordon reply?

> We do not propose to discuss the affairs of this company with people like yourself. . . .

He went on:

> . . . fomenting discord. . . . As in the past, the management of this company will be conducted with their true interests at heart.

What are the "true interests" as revealed by wages paid?

> The share that the worker has had in the advantages of the protective tariff during this period is indicated by the average annual wage paid per individual. From the records available, the highest average was $277 per annum in 1888, and the lowest $224 in 1905.

Contrast those low wages with the dividends paid.

> The total of the dividends paid in the stock issued on the original investment of $500,000 from 1929 to 1936 amounted to $5,812,500. The total of the dividends paid on the stock issued on the original investment by members of the syndicate in 1905, between the years 1906 and 1936, inclusive, amounted to $14,837,500, or an average annual rate of 98·4 per cent per annum.

I do not think I need comment.

> In addition to the earnings that have been paid out in dividends, the common stock shareholders have a very large equity in the company. . . . The original investment of $500,000 made in 1905 has yielded a return of $14,837,500 in dividends and to-day has, according to the company's records, an additional present value of $14,671,105. This is after charging off to profits $22,943,471 for depreciation, and $12,492,186.92 to equipment and repairs. . . .

There appears to be a secret reserve of profit amounting to $17,265,728.17.

Is there any reason why the consumers of this country should continue to pay exorbitant rates for their goods; any reason why the wage earners in these industries should continue to be paid pitiably low wages, while the financiers make the enormous profits indicated by these figures? The brief says:

The evidence shows that in its relations with the public and its employees the leaders of this industry have maintained little regard for human relations. The laws of power appear to have dominated and directed the policy of the industry, rather than regard for justice.

The strife between capital and labour will continue with unremitting bitterness as long as employers seek legal advantages and special privileges from various governments of the dominion and arrogantly deny to their employees, on whose behalf these advantages are obtained, any share in or control over the direction of the policies under which the fruits of those advantages and privileges are distributed.

The employers are part of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, incorporated by act of parliament. The employers demand that competition be eliminated from abroad and assert the right to organize, to regulate and eliminate competition among themselves. At the same time they arbitrarily deny to their employees the right to organize in their own interest. And the government appears to quite acquiesce in that policy. When the government imposes a customs duty on an article imported into Canada it does more than tax the consumer of imported goods by indirect taxation. It gives to the Canadian manufacturer of similar goods a right to impose on the consumers of goods subject to customs duties a private tax for his own benefit. Viewed in this light, Canadian customs tariff laws are a governmental subsidy to Canadian industry.

Where a protected industry does no substantial export business, all capital created through the operation of the business, over and above a reasonable return to the investor on capital invested by him, has been contributed by the consumer and not by the investor. Protection of the industry cannot be justified for the purpose of providing a return to the investor on the ground that he is entitled to a return on capital employed in operations that has been created out of profits earned in excess of a reasonable return on the capital invested by him. It must always be remembered that a portion of that capital, and in many cases the greatest proportion of that capital, has been provided by the consumers of Canada and not by the investors.

I have been referring to one or two particular companies. Many other companies have followed the same course in regard to their capitalization. According to the brief:

The effect is that promoters of mergers and amalgamations have succeeded, by a process of recapitalization and refinancing, in getting into their hands a large amount of capital stock for which they have paid nothing, and the management of the companies is expected to produce a dividend on this stock. The government of the country is called upon to furnish tariff protection to enable the management to do so. The consumers and the employees have to bear the burden of the dividends.

I spoke the other day of the defrauding of the government, and I am going to quote now directly from the brief.

Canadian Cottons . . . was not only setting aside large concealed reserves, but was not disclosing to the proper authorities its true profits and was depriving the government of the taxes justly and legally due. It has in fact been shown that the officers of the company falsified the returns to the government in order to conceal the existence of the secret reserve, which between 1916 and 1936 reached a maximum of $2,506,128.18, and is admitted to be in 1936, $2,277,208.81.

I should like to ask the government if these taxes have been collected. The other day the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) said something about these companies being in the courts. He did not explain just what he meant, but I suppose there has been some reference to the exchequer court. I should like to ask very definitely that before we are through with this debate we be told what portion of these back taxes has been collected. And one further thing I should like to ask; whether or not the criminals have been punished.

Miss MACPHAIL: They do not punish criminals of that kind.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: The other day we had poor young fellows gassed and clubbed for trespassing on public property, but here are men high in the public life of this country who are able to deceive and defraud the government; and apparently though the facts have been in the hands of the government for over a year now, little action has been taken. In the brief there is the phrase "apparently they deliberately falsified"; again there are the words "misled and deceived the government"; and that the statement of Mr. Dawson, "is utterly without foundation." Let me read section 413 of the criminal code:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, being a director, manager, officer or member of any body corporate or any company with intent to defraud,

(b) makes, or concurs in making, any false entry, or omits or concurs in omitting to enter any material particular, in any book or account or other document—

It is all very well to send to the penitentiary men who may be guilty of some petty theft, but what about these men who are guilty of defrauding the government and violating the criminal code? Was I not right in saying the other day that in this country justice is not impartial; that we have one law for the rich and another for the poor? I want to quote a sentence from the brief in this connection:

It is submitted . . . that the law as defined by our statutes and interpreted in the English court of appeal has been transgressed.

I think the government is under an obligation to explain before this house rises what it proposes to do with regard to the very serious state of affairs that has been brought to light by the textile commission report, which has been placed in the hands of all hon. members. Let me quote again:

—Sir Charles Gordon, the president of the Dominion Textile Company, makes the statement to the shareholders: "While the company has an issue of preferred stock it is evident that the governments of one kind and another are the real preferred shareholders as their takings this year represent earnings of $42 per share on the company's preferred issue."

In making this statement to the public, indicating that the company is especially burdened with taxation, it, however, is not disclosed to the public that these taxes are all paid by the consumers. While, in fact, it is ordinary business practice for any corporation to pass on to the consumer its municipal taxes, this company passes on its income tax to the consumer.

I believe that statement is very much along the line of the statement made in this house the other day by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett).

Several years ago we had considerable publicity with regard to the danger in which our industries were being placed because of Japanese competition. This is what Mr. G. B. Gordon said:

—that the Japanese situation had resulted in an entire lack of orders for the mills at Sherbrooke and Valleyfield, and that it would be necessary to stop 600 looms at Sherbrooke and 500 at Valleyfield.

What does the brief state with regard to that? I quote:

It is submitted that the evidence is conclusive that there was no Japanese competition existing on the 15th of January, 1936, which would justify any reasonable business man in Mr. Gordon's position assuming that he would no longer be able to manufacture goods at Sherbrooke that could be sold, and that it was therefore necessary to close the mill indefinitely and throw approximately 500 employees out of employment, either to starve or to become objects of public charity.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

If this is a proper conclusion, then the real object in closing the mill is apparent. Owing to the condition of the stocks at Sherbrooke and the shortage of machinery at the print works, it was convenient for the company to close this particular mill at that time; in fact it had been convenient to curtail production for some days prior to the closing.

What are we to make of business men who call upon the government for special privileges on grounds that are absolutely without foundation? And what are we to say with regard to a government that continues to give special privileges to firms of this character? Let me quote again from the brief:

The evidence seems to be conclusive that the statements made in the letters written to members of the government by officers of Canadian Cottons Limited were unfounded, and, instead of the business of the mills being strangled, the evidence shows that while they were making threats of closing the mills, they were increasing the purchases of their raw materials.

Now I want to come to consider this matter of protection, which ever since most of us were children has been the main subject of our budget debates. Instead of quoting from some of our classical economists I want to quote from this brief, which deals with actual facts, with concrete situations. Here is something concerning Canada and the United States:

It will, therefore, be apparent that no customs duties were necessary to protect the Canadian manufacturer as between Canada and the United States of America in respect to cotton yarns at this time. It is, however, interesting to note from a study of exhibit 820 that while prices moved up in the United States of America, due to the adoption of higher rates of wages and shorter hours of labour, the prices in Canada moved up at the same time, the increase in 1933 being from $24 in April to $30 in July, with no corresponding increase in rates of wages or decrease in hours of labour; in fact the reverse occurred, that is, without any increase in hours of labour, the rates of wages were reduced by ten per cent in April, 1933.

And later:

In this instance the Canadian manufacturer received more than three times as much for manufacturing the yarn as did the American manufacturer.

We become so deadened by the incessant propaganda that has been carried on that we may fail to realize the import of statements of this kind. Anyone who goes across the boundary line to the United States and buys goods in that country and, upon his return, attempts to purchase the same goods in Canada, knows that we pay much more in this country. But we are told that we have to do that on patriotic grounds. We are told that we cannot compete, and that our manufacturers are under special handicaps. Yet, let me read this sentence again:

> In this instance the Canadian manufacturer received more than three times as much for manufacturing the yarn as did the American manufacturer.

As it is stated later on, this gives the benefit to the investors, and not to the worker.

Let us now look at the wages the workers have received:

> The protection given in 1930 amounted to 25 per cent more than the whole of the mill wages paid for the fabrication of the yarn.

Let us turn out the hundreds of thousands of employees in those factories. Let us pension them for life, at a good pension, and the country would be far better off than it is under existing arrangements. I should like to read that paragraph again:

> The protection given in 1930 amounted to 25 per cent more than the whole of the mill wages paid for the fabrication of the yarn.

And a little later:

> The Canadian manufacturer was taking advantage of the customs tariff duties to increase the profit to the manufacturer at the expense of the consumer, while giving no benefit of the increased protection to the workmen.

I know some workers do not understand that. Some hon. members will recall that one of these textile companies some years ago brought a whole trainload of workers here to protest against the effects of government policy. The men who came were no doubt real workers. I looked at their hands, and I talked to them. They were genuine employees. They had been told by those who controlled them that certain government policies were the cause of their troubles. They had been told that by their employers, but those employers were deceiving the workers. Again, and again, and again in election campaigns workers have been deceived by false statements of this kind. The brief gives evidence of this.

Look at the profits which have been made. Let us, for an example, consider the artificial silk division. I refer particularly to Canadian Celanese Limited, as an indication of depression prosperity:

> The company during these seven years, which embraced the period of Canada's greatest depression, earned in net profits more than the total amount of the cash invested in the company.

If our farmers on the prairies who have worked for years and years, who to-day have lost their all, whose farms are hopelessly mortgaged and their capital swept away, consider these facts, they will realize the great injustice they disclose. We hear many people in the east begrudging some little relief given to those people in western Canada. Yet we find that this company in seven years earned in net profits more than the total amount of the cash invested in the company.

Of course there are a few people outside the shareholders who do fairly well. In 1935, twenty-eight executives drew $294,458.79, the lowest of which was $5,050 and the highest $35,023.54. In the year 1935, seven persons drew $148,063.59 in salaries. In that year $72,280 was paid in salaries to directors of the company resident outside of Canada. The brief goes on to say:

> It will, therefore, be observed that out of the money paid by the consumer over the period of seven years, for every $33 that went to the wage earners, $28.20 went to the higher salaried employees or the investors.

I could take similar figures for the Dominion Textile Company and for other companies.

Let me now come to the question of the financing of these companies. The brief states:

> It cannot be contended that if an investment bears interest at an average rate of 20 per cent per annum continuously for thirty years that such a return is inadequate.

Surely that is putting it very mildly indeed! To continue from the brief:

> The result has been that on the above basis the consumers of Canada have paid in profits sufficient to pay back to all investors, i.e. bondholders, preferred and common stock holders the whole of their investment—pay all the interest on the bonds, the dividends on the preferred stock and dividends on the common stock at the rate of 20 per cent per annum on the money actually invested, to pay for the entire buildings, plant and machinery, and to give the company a fund available for outside investment amounting to $24,000,000, all in a period of thirty years.

This government is continuing the same policy, notwithstanding the fact that it went to the country on a policy of lower tariffs, as is indicated in our subamendment now before the house.

Let me now turn to one or two particular branches of these industries. I shall deal first with the woollen divisions, as wool is very important in Canada. I quote:

> It is not many industries that can show during the five years of the depression, over as large a cross section as dealt with on page 8, consistently higher earnings on capital invested in the business than for the five years immediately prior to the depression.

Or consider the knit grades division, in connection with which the following statement is made:

> For no capital investment in the company at all, the promoters of the syndicate that organized the company in 1906 have realized

$10,205,304. . . . The consumers, in effect, have purchased the entire plant, and presented it to the owners for nothing, and in addition have provided them with $3,000,000 net profit, and $1,904,949.14 for depreciation.

May I interrupt my remarks at this point to point out that apparently this is the kind of thing the government is proposing to do in connection with the matter which was brought before us at the beginning of to-day's sitting. In that instance we have a company organized with apparently little or no capital, one which is securing equipment from the government and to which, according to reports, the government proposes to give the necessary additional equipment. Then it would appear that on the orders the government give to that company it will guarantee that the company will receive cost plus ten per cent—the same old game all over again in connection with another department of our public life.

But I must return to textiles and give another illustration of the salaries paid by representative companies.

Mr. ISNOR: Would the hon. member give the name of the knit goods company to which he referred?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Penmans.

Mr. ISNOR: The hon. member made the statement that they paid $10,000,000 in so many years.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I can give my hon. friend the complete statement.

Mr. ISNOR: Just the net profits.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: For no capital investment in the company at all, the promoters of the syndicate that organized the company in 1906 have realized $10,205,304. That is given at page 230 of the McRuer brief.

Mr. ISNOR: Have you the net profits for the last four or five years?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I should like to finish this general argument. The hon. member will find all the information he seeks in the brief, which is available to everyone.

I was about to give examples of the salaries paid by some of the representative companies. Joseph Simpson and Sons Limited paid to one man, who appears to be only remotely connected with the management of the business, an annual salary of $31,000. That is at page 236. The executive salaries of this company for the last three years amount to over $90,000 per annum.

[Mr. Woodsworth.]

Let me deal for a moment with certain reprehensible practices. In connection with tax concessions I read this:

In addition to the tariff protection that the textile industry is receiving from the government of Canada, the individual companies engaged in the industry have with few if any exceptions received advantages over the ordinary taxpayers, from the municipal authorities where their respective mills are situated.

Then in connection with our own customs arrangements we find a little joker in the form of the clause "not made in Canada." The following statement appears on page 404 of the brief:

That either Mr. Hallam or Bruck Silk Mills deliberately attempted to deceive the department is quite apparent.

That is the way the department is fooled. Here is one other statement which takes us into the international aspect of this matter:

It appears that Mr. Watson considered that he was entitled to use a hearing before the tariff board held pursuant to a treaty obligation to suit his own purposes, rather than considering that he and the industry were obliged in all cases to make full and complete disclosure to this tribunal.

I could go on and deal with the effect of specific duties, but I shall give this short quotation only:

The net result is that in addition to the regular ad valorem duty of 25 per cent, a specific duty of four cents per pound, and the excise duty of three per cent, leviable in April, 1932, the Canadian manufacturer had an additional protection on the above items—

In connection with special appraisals, we find the following:

—by the simple process of the publication of this appraisers' bulletin, the customs duty, taken on an ad valorem basis, was increased from 38 per cent to 67 per cent on the articles affected by the bulletin without consulting parliament.

Mr. ILSLEY: When was the bulletin issued?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I have not the complete brief before me, but that statement is to be found on page 108 of the brief. In connection with costs of production I find the following:

It is submitted that the evidence shows that very few of the companies reporting to the commission keep such records as will enable them to state with reasonable accuracy what their cost of production is for any particular fabric.

There are other illustrations I could give showing the enormous amounts charged to operation for depreciation, repairs and betterments. It is stated that the Dominion Textile Company has had profits of about $1,000,000 per year since 1920, other than those disclosed in its public statements. I ask the government to explain why no action has been taken. This report has been in existence and available to the government for over a year.

Mr. ILSLEY: What does the hon. member mean by "no action"?

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Criminal action.

Mr. ILSLEY: Civil action has been taken.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I am talking about criminal action. The criminal code covers this matter, and I should like to know why its provisions have not been invoked.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time limit.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made some reference to the fact that the government has failed to take action against certain textile companies. I should like to take a few minutes of the time of the house to explain this matter.

The evidence given before the Turgeon commission revealed the fact that there were probably short payments under the Business Profits War Tax Act and the Income War Tax Act. The auditors of the income tax division went into the matter very carefully and spent several months investigating the situation. They came to the conclusion that eight textile companies had made short payments of business war profits and income taxes. The position taken by the income tax division was contested strenuously by the companies, who contended that they had paid all the taxes due to the crown. Under these conditions I think the hon. gentleman will realize that criminal proceedings were entirely inappropriate.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: I do not realize that at all.

Mr. COLDWELL: Is not the point that they issued false balance sheets? That is similar to the Lord Kylsant case in England.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Would the minister permit me to quote just one sentence?

Mr. SPEAKER: The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Ilsey) has the floor.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let the hon. member go ahead.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: Here is the quotation:

> —the law, as defined by our statutes and interpreted in the English court of appeal, has been transgressed.

It is section 413 of the criminal code that is applicable, which reads:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to seven years' imprisonment who, being a director, manager, officer or member of any body corporate or company with intent to defraud,
> (b) makes, or concurs in making, any false entry, or omits or concurs in omitting to enter any material particular, in any book or account or other document.

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. gentleman had brought this matter up during the discussion of my estimates, as a Liberal member did, I would have been in a position to go into the matter more fully. The respect in which the income tax division felt that the textile companies were short in the payment of their taxes was in connection with the undervaluation of inventory. Inventories are taken at the beginning and the end of each year, and the difference between the two inventories is material in deciding the profits made by the company during the year. If the inventory at the end of the year does not represent the true value of goods on hand, that is, if it is too low, then the profits of the company for that year would be less than they otherwise would be. The companies took the position that it was within the discretion of the directors to value their inventories at such prices as they thought fit, having regard to the conditions in the business world. They pointed out that there is no provision in either of these acts laying down the basis on which inventories are to be taken, nor is there any regulation for laying down the basis on which inventories should be taken. On the other hand, the income tax division took the position that in the accounting world at least the practice is that inventory be taken at cost or market, whichever is the lower, but that is not a statutory rule or a rule laid down by the regulations. However, we took the position that that is the practice that should have been followed all through the years beginning with 1916 or 1917, and down to the present time. When this dispute arose between the income tax division and the textile companies we thought that we were right, and apparently they thought they were right.

I said a moment ago that under conditions such as that, criminal action was inappropriate. That is, when there appears to be a difference of opinion as to the basis on which profits are made up, it is pretty difficult to expect a conviction if you lay an information and seek to establish your position in the criminal courts. Certainly you should take your proceedings first in the civil courts and find out whether your rule is right, and that is exactly what we did. We brought actions against eight of the textile companies for amounts totalling a little more than one million dollars, and those actions are now pending in the Exchequer Court of Canada. We are attempting to recover that amount. All these actions are being contested. The textile companies have interposed defences, but we are going to do the best we can to win the actions, and we hope to do so.

So when the hon. gentleman says, as I believe he did, that the government has taken no action, he is not representing the facts as they are. I was asked on my estimates what action had been taken with respect to these alleged underpayments of income tax by the textile companies—it was the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Cleaver) who asked the question—and I gave on the estimates the information I am now giving to the hon. gentleman. If, as my colleagues tell me—for I was not in the chamber myself—the hon. gentleman has accused the government of having taken no action against these companies, he is making a statement that is not warranted by the facts.

Mr. WOODSWORTH: No criminal action with regard to the deliberate falsification of accounts and misstatements, not only to the government but to the company shareholders.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. The hon. member cannot make a speech.

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. gentleman, if he will forgive my saying so, is getting a little bit out of his depth when he talks of an English case. There is no doubt that if there is a deliberate falsification of accounts it is criminal, but that is a thing that has to be established, and that will be determined in the civil actions we have taken. It would have been, I am convinced, absolutely useless and fruitless and futile to lay information against these companies under the conditions I have mentioned, and every lawyer in the house will agree with me.

Mr. A. B. HYNDMAN (Carleton): Mr. Speaker, before continuing the debate on the budget I should like to express my regret at the temporary illness of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), and I am sure I voice the feeling not only of my own party but of each and every group in the house when I say that we all hope it will be of a fleeting nature. I say that not because the hon. Minister of Finance is a resident in my constituency, but because I feel that the hon. gentleman is one of the best finance ministers that Canada has had in her whole history as a dominion. I put him in the same category with the late Right Hon. Mr. Fielding, the Right Hon. Sir Thomas White, and the present right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett). I was pleased yesterday when the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) told us that the Minister of Finance was becoming more Conservative. Perhaps the reason for that is that he has been a resident of Carleton county for the last two years, and if he lives there long enough I think he will go the whole way.

Coming now to conditions in this country I, Mr. Speaker, with the other doctors in this house, well know that we are at times called upon to treat infected wounds. We can treat them in two ways. Either we can scrape them out and clean up the infection, or we can apply soothing and healing ointments which will cover up the wounds but leave the infection buried in the tissues of the body. I feel that the proper course to take is to clean out the wound and remove the infection, and I believe the same treatment should have been applied during the past two or three years by this government to conditions in this country.

We have heard criticism of the budget from all sides; one hon. member has blamed high tariffs for present conditions; another hon. member has said they were due to low tariffs, and another member has placed the blame on high taxation. But in my humble opinion the reason for the distressing times we have in this dominion to-day is that there has been a lack of cooperation and a lack of action on the part of the government—a lack of the very thing which they so urgently advocated in the last election campaign. If we have a lack of mutual understanding or a lack of cooperation in Canada I believe it will deal a death blow to democracy, and in that connection I should like to quote from a speech delivered by Anthony Eden at the beginning of this year, when he said:

> We cannot expect to approach the organized production and national equipment of the autocratic states unless we can, by voluntary effort and close cooperation between all sections of the community, realize a measure of national unity comparable with that which they have reached by other methods.
> This is a time when every endeavour should be made to promote national unity, for it is only as a united nation that we can give of our best.

I should also like to give this quotation from a speech delivered this year by one of the outstanding clergymen in this dominion!

> If we do not stop the drift away from that unity which was born of confederation we are facing national disaster.

Let me give another quotation from an address in Toronto by one whom I consider the outstanding Canadian citizen in this country:

> Not since I have lived can I recall such a spirit of disunity and disharmony as we have now between the provinces and the dominion. To-day we find our federation is threatened with disunity. It is openly asserted one section is paying too much and another is getting too much. There is everything to make disharmony, disunion and jealousy.

I should also like to quote from an address delivered by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Euler). Speaking at Hamilton he had this to say:

> People entertain fear as to what might happen, and as a result enterprise is at a standstill. There is no reason why Canada should not be prosperous.

There was a meeting in this city not long ago of the advisory council of the National Liberal Federation of Canada, which passed a resolution declaring that we must defend national unity in our country. But I feel that we have anything but national unity in this country of ours at the present time. One need only refer to the premiers of two of the larger provinces to bear that out. The premier of Ontario, for example, referring to the relief program of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) described it as a head-line and a headache. He said: "I must confess I am not in the confidence of the government at Ottawa." And when the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations met in Quebec, what did the premier of that province say? The report was: "Quebec heads fail to reply to commission request."

In my opinion the government has not carried out one of its promises made in the last election. The promise was made that there would be action, but there has been no action in the last three years. In fact, going back to the years 1926, 1927 and 1928, I do not hesitate to say that if ever a government in this country had everything in its favour, it was the Liberal government that was in power in those years. And what did they do? They sat on the soft, cushioned seats of this house and allowed the dominion to drift into the greatest depression that has ever struck us; and although at that time they were warned of the lurking danger by the present leader of the opposition, it made no difference. They simply said that everything was all right. Again, at the beginning of this session this same outstanding Canadian citizen, the leader of the official opposition, warned the government of the danger signals, but still we got no action. But it may be said that these criticisms are from Conservative sources. Well, let me quote some statements made by members of the Liberal party itself. The hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) said, as reported at page 2439 of Hansard:

> I want something done to-day. I want some consideration of these problems in order that something may be accomplished in our own time. This is what I ask the house. This is what I know the country asks of us.

And then the Liberal member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) made this statement, as reported at page 2224 of Hansard:

> I had hoped that for the rest of the session we would be through with fiddling and would perhaps devote more time to the fire protection of our Canadian Rome which many of us think is burning. When responsible members of this or other legislative bodies waste their time in this sort of thing, irreparable damage is done to the institutions of democracy.

Another Liberal member, the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Turner) said, as reported at page 2068 of Hansard:

> There is at present right across the dominion a general feeling of unrest and insecurity, which seems to be growing . . .

And last but not least, we have this statement from the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) as reported at page 3109 of Hansard. He hopes that we will—> —do all we can to guide the Department of Finance out of that swamp of financial ignorance in which it seems to be lost.

This proves conclusively that the slogan, "Vote Liberal and get action" meant nothing, because we have had no action since this government has been in power in the last three years. We have had nothing more than a commission form of government. Let me put on Hansard again—it was given yesterday—a list of the commissions appointed by this government since they came into power. We have now a national employment commission; a wheat marketing commission; a textile commission; a commission on lobsters and smelts; a dominion-provincial relations commission; a penitentiaries commission; a war veterans' assistance commission; a radio commission; a transport or railway commission; a tariff commission; a civil service commission; a board of grain commissioners; a national battlefields commission; a federal district commission; an international boundaries commission; an international joint waterways commission; an international fisheries commission and a national harbours commission; and by this evening's press I see that we are to have another commission to administer penitentiaries.

What about the cost of these commissions? First of all, there was the textile commission, which cost the country $180,000. That commission was headed by Mr. Justice Turgeon, who also conducted another inquiry. Apparently the government ran out of Liberal judges because Mr. Justice Turgeon was placed at the head of two commissions. He was appointed two years ago to investigate the textile industry and only the other day did we receive the report. Then there was the grain marketing commission. That cost the country $114,000, and all they did was to go over to the old country, for the purpose of obtaining a market for grain, and when they came back they found there was no wheat to sell. Then there was the penitentiaries commission, which cost $90,000. They have brought in a report based on the evidence of convicts in the different penitentiaries, and they suggest that we should appoint another commission. The war veterans' assistance commission cost $326,000; the commission on coal, $23,000; the commission on lobster fishing, $4,000; and the national employment commission, $295,000. The dominion-provincial relations commission, from August 14 of last year to February 10 of this year had cost $68,000.

Looking at the answers put on Hansard to certain questions asked, I cannot understand how these commissioners spend the money and why there has not been some control by the government over some of these commissions. I find one commissioner with a living allowance of $233 a month, or $7.50 a day. He must have been starving himself according to some of the payments made to others. I find a lawyer with travelling expenses of $107.60. I suggest that, from the fees the lawyers received, their travelling expenses and living allowances, $107.60 is not very high compared with some of the other figures. I have investigated living expenses at the Chateau Laurier, and I find that I can get a really good room there with private bath for $6 a day. A good breakfast costs $1; a good lunch à la carte, $2; a good dinner, $3; and one can possibly get along, in the way of tips, on $2 a day. That means $14, and yet some of the commissioners are allowed $35 a day for living expenses. In other words, as far as I can see, they are putting $21 into their pockets. Yes; we find a commissioner getting $35 a day, and yet the Minister of Labour can allow these workmen in Vancouver who are on relief only 75 cents a day. We find that one lawyer who is a K.C. is paid at the rate of $200 a day, while his assistant who is not a K.C. gets $50. But what strikes me as very peculiar is the living expenses. One lawyer gets $200 a day, and it costs him just twice as much as his assistant to live, because he gets $20 a day for living expenses and his assistant receives $10. Why the difference? Is it on account of the "K.C.?" What does the "K" stand for? Does it stand for "Mackenzie King"?

The next commission is an interesting one. It has a chairman and two commissioners. I cannot understand why, if the chairman can live on $25 a day, and one of the commissioners can live on $15 a day, the other commissioner needs $35. Then we come to the two lawyers, two assistants. As I have remarked, the "K.C." must mean a tremendous lot, because each of the lawyers is paid at the rate of $150 a day, with travelling expenses.

I cannot understand these travelling expenses at all. Consider the case of another commission. The commissioner has a bill for travelling expenses of $17 a day: one lawyer receives in fees $27,000 odd; the other lawyer gets $32,000; but the living allowances to the lawyer in receipt of the lesser fee are $30 more than those to the other lawyer, and his travelling expenses are $476.19 more. Can anyone figure that out?

Here is another one. Travelling expenses are getting higher. For the life of me I cannot understand how these men travelled. Here is a commissioner who, according to this report, was travelling for thirty-nine days. For those thirty-nine days he received $2,825.69. That figures out at $72 a day for travelling expenses. If anyone can tell how he has been travelling, I should like to know. I have inquired at the railway station, and I understand that for about $72 to $75 I could go from here to British Columbia. It takes more than one day to go that far. Yet this commissioner is getting $72 a day for travelling expenses. One of the lawyers, a K.C., who got $200 a day, has travelling expenses of $983.69. His assistant was getting only $50 a day. Presumably he said to himself, "I must make it up in travelling expenses." because his travelling expenses amount to $1,231.72. These are things I cannot understand and should like to have explained.

The last commission I want to mention is the national employment commission. Its cost ran very high. In 1937 it cost this country $147,569.72, and in 1938 practically the same amount, namely, $147,925.94.

I wonder what the farmers in western and eastern Canada, the men and women who are out of employment, and the school teachers getting only $700 a year, think of all this.

An hon. MEMBER: Seven hundred dollars, where?

Mr. HYNDMAN: Out in the west, I believe. I wonder what the hundreds of college graduates who have graduated this year, the thousands of people on relief in Saskatchewan, and average honest Canadian citizens, think of all this. And then we talk of democracy and of trying to preserve it. It is this sort of thing which is driving people in this country into communism, socialism or fascism. I would not say I cannot blame them, but I do say we have to prove that democracy is better than communism and fascism, and we as a government are not doing it.

I want to refer to the votes in Saskatchewan in 1934 and in 1938. In 1934 the people of Saskatchewan voted for the Conservative and the Liberal parties to the extent of 75 per cent as against 25 per cent who voted for other parties. What was the vote in this last election? It was 58 per cent for the Liberal and Conservative parties and 42 per cent for the other parties. I leave that fact with the government.

In my opinion the government should be doing something more for agriculture, the basic industry of this country. On other occasions I have spoken in this chamber about the western farmer and I have been criticised. I want to make it absolutely clear that I am speaking as a private member and my observations are my own. Although this government has spent a tremendous amount of money on the provinces of the west—Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta—I do not criticise them for that. I criticise them for not helping the farmers in the rest of Canada. When I pick up the supplementary estimates and look at the amount of money this government is voting and expecting to spend on agriculture within this year, I find that, of the total sum of $6,742,059.71, $6,093,511 go to Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta and only $648,548.71 to the rest of Canada. I am not saying that the grant to the western provinces is not fair, but I contend that this government is not doing enough for farmers in other parts of the dominion. I suggest to the government that if there is a reshuffle in cabinet portfolios, let eastern Canada have a minister of agriculture, for a change. For the last three or four parliaments the ministers of agriculture have come from western Canada. Give us one for a change. Let western Canada have the Minister of National Defence instead.

An hon. MEMBER: The west has him.

Mr. HYNDMAN: Remember also that this amount of $648,000 includes marketing service, production service, experimental farms, and science services.

I advocate, on behalf of the farmers in eastern Canada, a minimum price for all farm products. Why should we not have a minimum price for our farm products just as the western farmers are guaranteed a minimum price for wheat? Give our farmers something to work on. I agree with the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Stevens) in his attack upon the packers of this country. In my opinion they have the farmers of eastern Canada right by the throat and they are controlling the price of farm products in the east. All one has to do is to stop and think for one moment of what happened to the prices of beef cattle and pork between last August and last November. Why was there a drop of $3 per 100 pounds in the price of beef? It was that the packers knew that the farmers had to sell their products because they required money to pay their taxes. The price of pork went down last fall, when the farmers had pork to sell; they could get only 7¼ cents a pound. What is the price of pork to-day? It is nearly 10¾ cents, now that the farmers have no pork to sell. The packers are controlling prices, and unless the government does something in this regard I am afraid the country is not going to get very far.

As I said before, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to criticise the help that has been given the west, but there is one point I think I should mention in which I feel the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the government are to blame. We all know that for the last two years the western provinces have been going through terrible times, and we in the east gathered together carload after carload of vegetables which we shipped for the relief of the west. But what happened to those vegetables when they reached there? The Liberal government and the Minister of Agriculture appointed a man to distribute them, and what did they pay him? He was paid at the rate of $6,000 a year, or $500 a month, to distribute those vegetables. He was not satisfied to do the work himself; he said he wanted some assistance, and the government turned around and appointed forty-five men to help him, at $125 a month and expenses.

An hon. MEMBER: Terrible.

Mr. HYNDMAN: Terrible is right, and if their expenses are anything like the expenses of the commissions I mentioned a moment ago, I guarantee that they are getting more than $125 a month.

Mr. EVANS: If I might ask the hon. member a question, was that all the work which was done by the gentlemen referred to by my hon. friend, the distribution of the fruit and vegetables?

Mr. McGREGOR: And even that was not done right.

Mr. HYNDMAN: Another burning question in Canada is the burden of taxation. I believe I am voicing the sentiment of every taxpayer of this country when I say that the cost of government is entirely too high. I should like to place on Hansard a record of the increase in the cost of government during a ten year period:

	Percentage of increase for year 1936-37 over year 1926-27 (10 years)
Agriculture	28·61
Debt service	46·15
Development of natural resources	31·20
Education	2·34
General government	12·08
Protection of persons and property	36·00
Public welfare	365·25
Recreation	18·31
Soldiers' pensions and care	22·17
Miscellaneous	119·08
	Percentage of decrease
Immigration and colonization	45·33
Post office	1·50
Transportation	4·28

Of course it must be remembered that the cost of public welfare includes the cost of direct relief. In the post office there is a decrease of 1·50 per cent, due, I maintain, to the poor salaries paid to the rural mail carriers. They could very well be paid a little more, in order to make up that difference of 1·50 per cent In 1926-27 the cost of government was $745,528,086. In 1936-37 the cost of government rose to $1,104,434,576, or an increase of 46·37 per cent, and a per capita increase of 27·24 per cent. During the same period, however, our increase in population was only 16·68 per cent. In 1927 we paid $137,410,345 in interest on our dominion debt, which took 30·30 per cent of our total revenue, whereas in 1912 the interest on our debt amounted to only $12,605,882, or 7·47 per cent of our revenue. I submit to this house, Mr. Speaker, that this cannot go on.

In discussing this matter of debt I am reminded very much of the battle of Waterloo, which was fought nearly a hundred years ago, I think in 1870—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. COLDWELL: 1815.

Mr. HYNDMAN: Very well, 1715.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. HYNDMAN: Well, it was fought, anyway. What I want to point out is that Great Britain, which won that war, is still paying interest on the cost of it; and I want to point out also that France, the loser, is still paying interest on the money she borrowed to conduct that war. Is that not wonderful finance, so sound and so sacred?

This year we are given a little relief in regard to the sales tax, and I commend the government for the action it has taken in that regard. I think the removal of the sales tax on building materials in particular will be of some help, but the government must see to it that there is not an increase in the prices of those materials from which the sales tax has been removed. They should see that what occurred when the housing scheme was brought in by this government two or three years ago does not occur again. What happened at that time? When that housing scheme was inaugurated, the price of materials went up 50 per cent. That is no good. Control must be exercised.

And, O my! Mr. Speaker, how the farmers of this country must appreciate the removal of this eight per cent sales tax from harness and gopher poison. I looked up the price of a set of heavy duty team harness complete, and find that it costs $59.38. Therefore the farmer is going to save eight per cent of $59.38, which amounts to $4.74. Since a set of harness usually lasts about seven years, he is going to be in pocket eighty cents a year. Is that not a wonderful thing that the Liberal government has done for the farmers of this country? But the sales tax is taken off gopher poison! Just think of it! The average farmer in western Canada, I understand, buys about $3 worth of gopher poison a year. Eight per cent of $3 is twenty-four cents, so under this wonderful budget he is going to save twenty-four cents a year. What wisdom the farmer showed a short time ago when he voted for the Liberal party!

Why did the government not take off the tax on medical supplies? For a number of years we have been paying the sales tax on those supplies, and the removal of it would have been more to the point. There is plenty of revenue from taxation, and yet the government talks about deficits. There should be no deficit. The federal deficit, so far as I can make out, is something like the surplus of the Hepburn government. When I look into the matter I find that in the past five years the revenues to this government have aggregated the stupendous sum of $1,748,811,000.

When we compare the revenues in the last two years of Conservative administration, at a time when conditions in this country were very bad, and when relief expenditures were high, with the revenues in the last two years of the Liberal administration, in a time when we are told conditions are so much improved, we have to stop and think. In the last two years the Liberal government have taken $835,203,000 in taxation from the people of Canada, while in the last two years of the Conservative administration that government received only $576,296,000 in revenues. In other words, the difference in revenues amounted to $258,907,000, and still the Liberal government have a deficit of $13,000,000. Can you, Mr. Speaker, figure that out? Why should they have a deficit? They should have no deficit at all. Why has there not been a greater reduction in the sales tax? I maintain the sales tax should be repealed at once, and .though it is possible the government might not be able to balance its budget, there is no need for a substitute; for the rebound in business would be much greater and more permanent than any effect resulting from the proposed expenditure of millions on relief work, or any other form of government aid.

The important point is that this invasion of the fundamental right and duty of the people to make and exchange products and services with one another should be removed at once. To penalize people by taxation is to fine them for doing their duty. When the sales tax is removed, trade will recover sharply; and then, with the increased revenue from other and more legitimate sources, the sales tax can be relegated to the limbo of discarded expedients, where it belongs.

Let us consider the tax sales of farms in Carleton county; and when I refer to Carleton county I am not referring to any mean county. I indicated earlier in the session the financial position of Carleton county. They are running their finances and looking after their affairs very well. I have before me a notification of the latest tax sale. We find that farms in Carleton county are being sold for taxes.

I shall speak only briefly about Canadian trade. Trade is of course a subject of great importance. I would particularly draw the attention of the government to the importance of the Ottawa trade agreements. I would point out to the government the importance of our trade agreement with the United Kingdom and the commonwealth of nations. Our exports to the United Kingdom and the commonwealth in 1937 amounted to $924,318,073, while to the United States they amounted to only $343,250,669.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. HYNDMAN: I should like to have about five minutes more.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: With the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go ahead.

Mr. HYNDMAN: May I thank you, sir, for the courtesy you have extended to me. I was pointing out that we sell a great deal more to the United Kingdom and the commonwealth of nations than we buy from them, while the reverse is the case with the United States. The United Kingdom and commonwealth markets are our lifeblood; let us protect them.

But there is another market to which I should like to draw attention, namely the home market. In my opinion the home market is the most important of all. Ninety per cent of our farm products are sold in our home market. Let us protect it so that our farmers may have a market in which they may sell their goods. Let us have a home market so that our people may have jobs.

Briefly I would suggest, as I said at the first, that we should have a work and wages program for our people, rather than one of relief. When I look at the large sums of money expended by the government in connection with different projects, I am amazed. I find that we have a decrease of $14,000 in the amount of money to be spent in the Department of Labour. In the Department of Public Works there is a decrease of $2,134,000; and in the Department of Pensions and National Health, a decrease of $573,000. In technical education the expenditures have been decreased by $27,000, and expenditures for mines are decreased by $477,000. I notice, however, that there have been increases in some of the departments. I claim the position should be reversed. For instance, there is an increase of $3,000 for the privy council.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I am afraid I cannot permit the hon. member to go farther.

Mr. ORVIS A. KENNEDY (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, first on behalf of my party may I express regret at the sudden illness of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) which has caused him to leave the chamber at this time. It is our earnest hope that he will soon be able to return to his seat in the chamber.

It is with a feeling of regret and heavy responsibility that I rise on this occasion to deliver my first address in the house. I am reminded at what cost I take my seat in the house, the cost of the loss of a personal friend and gentleman in the constituency of Edmonton East. I refer to the passing last January of Doctor W. S. Hall.

In this address I propose to direct the attention of the house to some of the questions which were of vital importance to the people of Edmonton, as evidenced in the election campaign, and also questions which I believe are of vital importance to people all across Canada.

I do not wish to be critical in bringing these questions before the house, except in so far as my constituency has been critical. I believe it is the duty of every member of parliament frankly to bring to the attention of the government the thoughts, wishes and requests of the members of his constituency. It is surprising to me, however, that one of the most important questions in the by-election was the age-old question of democracy. It is surprising to find that subject in an election campaign in 1938, after we have had seventy-one years of supposedly democratic government in Canada. This is not a question which has arisen in the last few months, but one which has been the subject of debates and speeches for many years past. It is a question of such importance that the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation recently thought it advisable to inaugurate a series of speeches entitled, Whither Democracy? Why should these discussions be necessary? Has democracy failed, or are the democratic institutions unable to adequately cope with the needs of our people to-day? Some people claim that democracy has failed. I think the answer is that democracy has not been given a fair trial, and that it is failing simply because governments either refuse or do not dare to modernize an obsolete economic system to meet modern needs.

In this connection let me quote from a radio address delivered a short time ago by one of Canada's leading citizens, the Hon. W. D. Herridge. I quote in part:

> Fair-minded people will agree that the economic situation in Canada is grave. And they will wonder why this should be so, in a country which has everything needed to build a standard of living higher than the world has ever known.
>
> The reason, I believe, is that Canadian democracy has failed. The people have a right to all this country is able to produce. That is the natural law. It is the job of democracy to enforce that law and bring prosperity to our people.
>
> Yet poverty and unemployment dominate our economic life. Old age is searching vainly for security. There seems to be no place for youth in this young country.

Further on in his address he continued:

> To have prosperity, we must distribute what we are able to produce. Increased purchasing power is the means required.
>
> Of course, the old economic system never can distribute what we are able to produce. For it was designed to work in conditions far different from those of to-day. It was designed to work in conditions of scarcity; in the days when there was not enough to go around. And it is not able effectively to work in conditions of potential plenty. The measure of its inefficiency is the difference between distribution upon the level of potential and actual production.
> Thus the system is manifestly obsolete. Until it is modernized we will have relatively little benefit from our vast natural wealth, though science has now endowed it with infinite capacity to serve us. Until the system is modernized, poverty and unemployment undoubtedly will increase.

Again I repeat I do not agree that democracy has failed, but I do believe that democracy has not been given a fair trial. These thoughts are concurred in by many, many people, and yet we find that this government that has had the greatest opportunity ever given to any government in Canada, is either unwilling or unable, because of some hidden power, to modernize this system. The Liberal party surely believe in democracy and realize that this outworn economic system is defeating the cause of democracy. Many Canadians had high hopes in 1935 when they heard the Prime Minister making statements such as this:

> Once a nation parts with the control of its currency and credit it matters not who makes the nation's laws. Usury, once in control, will wreck any nation. Until the control of the issue of currency and credit is restored to government and recognized as its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility, all talk of sovereignty of parliament and of democracy is idle and futile. . . . To regain for the nation what has thus been lost will continue to be the first objective of Liberal effort.

Before going further into the question of democracy let us examine for a moment what democracy means. One of the best definitions is, "the greatest common measure of desire." In other words, it is the desire of the greatest number of people. Let us make it still plainer. Democracy is the granting of results requested by the greatest number of people. Literally, democracy is governed by the results that people want. Therefore it is the duty of each and every government to endeavour as far as possible to find out the greatest common measure of desire or the results that the people want.

Undoubtedly the greatest thing that the people of Canada want to-day is personal security and the personal freedom to enjoy it. The people of Canada from coast to coast are debt ridden, poverty stricken and taxed to the limit of human endurance. Yet Canada is an extremely rich country and is able to produce all that is needed so that every man, woman and child can live in complete security and have real freedom or, to use other words, to provide the people of Canada with their just right to life, liberty and the pursuit of happiness. I should like to point out also that the opposite of democracy is tyranny. It is tyranny when people have imposed upon them the opposite things to those they want. I believe it is the duty of every hon. member, as well as of the government itself, to sit back every so often and take stock of the results that are being given to the people of Canada.

I believe every citizen who voted in 1935 voted for personal security and personal freedom. They asked that they might be relieved of the overbearing burden af taxation and debt, and yet we find that they are still living in poverty, which means insecurity and restricted freedom from the crushing burden of debt and taxation. We find that Canada, with possibly greater wealth in natural resources than the United States, yet with less than ten per cent of the population, is a country in which people are living in greater poverty and at a lower general standard. The resources are here; the means to turn them into what we want are here; human labour is available; nevertheless we starve in the midst of plenty, keeping unemployed those who could be producing the much wanted goods for the people of Canada. Surely these are not the conditions wanted by the Canadian people. It is the duty of every hon. member to demand insistently that these conditions be changed. If we are to have democracy in Canada we must bring to the people what they want, rather than what we think is good for them to have. That is the first step in the application of true democracy. In other words, we should find out the greatest common measure of desire among the people for a particular result, and then bring it to them.

Let us seek the points upon which we can act together, because what we need to-day is action and plenty of it. First, I think we shall all agree that the materials which we need to make the goods we want are already here in Canada in abundance, or they can be produced with the aid of machines and industry. There is absolutely no doubt of that. Then, I think we can all agree that the machines are our mechanical slaves. I often think of how the culture and civilization of ancient Greece and Rome were built up. They had slaves also in those days, but they were human slaves. Throughout the long struggle for democracy we have achieved religious, civil and political liberty, but we still have to achieve economic liberty. True democracy cannot exist without economic liberty.

I believe the second point upon which we can agree is that the machines are our slaves of to-day, the possession of which should bring us an ever increasing leisure for a life of vocation. I think we can agree on the third point, that the goods are undoubtedly here, actually or potentially. Since they are here in such abundance, it is manifest that there should be plenty for everybody. If we can agree on these points, there is obviously only one thing to do, that is, see that they are distributed. The Liberal party believe in this as it was one of the planks of their 1935 platform. Let me read:

> The Liberal party recognizes that the problem of distribution has become more important than that of production, and believes that personality is more sacred than property. It will devote itself to finding ways and means of effecting a fair and just distribution of wealth with increasing regard to human need, to the furtherance of social justice, and to the promotion of the common good.

Let me quote now from a speech delivered by the hon. Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) in Edmonton on March 5 last. He said:

> One of the planks of our platform was for the more equitable distribution of wealth. This plank emphasized the belief of Liberalism that personality is more sacred than property—that we must strive to find ways and means of effecting a fair and just distribution of wealth with increasing regard to human need and to the furtherance of social justice.
> This is, of course, a long range policy, not to be effected by a single act of parliament. But if we continue to remember the ideal of Liberalism in this regard we can and we will press on and on through various enactments and administrative acts so that equality of sacrifice will be assured.

The only difference that I can see between the speech delivered in 1938 and that delivered in 1935 is that the people of Canada were led to believe in 1935 that this was an immediate objective, whereas the 1938 statement is to the effect that this is a long range policy. What the people of Canada want is action and they want it now. In a true democratic state, if these are policies, results or points of action upon which we can all agree, then it is the duty of the government to take immediate steps to have them applied. The question of how this can be done will be raised, but I submit that again it is the duty of the government to find people who know, in other words, experts, to show them how. Surely it is not beyond the power of man to devise some means of distributing the vast wealth to the people to whom it rightfully belongs.

The question of money reform took a prominent part in the election of Edmonton East. One hon. gentleman who was supporting the Liberal candidate claimed that the Liberals had kept ninety per cent of their promises. He enumerated them, but failed to mention the one that had elected every Liberal—money reform. Even at this late date, three years later, it is again noticeable that money reform was not referred to in the speech from the throne and the budget. Surely it was not an idle boast; surely the Liberals were sincere when they made this promise to the people of Canada in 1935.

There is one other remarkable feature to which I should like to direct attention. The hon. Minister of National Defence claimed in Edmonton that the government had complete authority over the central bank; yet since that time it has been found necessary to purchase all the stock of this bank. Why is this necessary if they had complete control before? Let me quote again from the speech of the Minister of National Defence in Edmonton. After reading the preamble of the Bank of Canada Act, he said:

> That is the finest charter of financial liberty you ever had. The government has complete authority and complete responsibility under the terms of that set-up. I suggest that all we need is a few more reformers from western Canada like Jim MacKinnon and Bob Marshall, and we will get action under that authority.

This is a plain admission, Mr. Speaker, that we were not getting action under the authority we had before. Now that the government has complete ownership of the Bank of Canada, all it needs is to control completely its policy and to institute a measure of monetary reform. This is advocated not only by all progressive parties in Canada but by some of the strongest supporters in the government's own party, and to emphasize this point I wish to quote from an editorial in the Edmonton Bulletin of June 1, 1938. This paper was one of the strongest supporters of the Liberal candidate in the by-election last March. The editorial says in part:

> The Prime Minister has stated he will introduce legislation to completely nationalize the bank; a proceeding which would have no merit or purpose unless the bank is to be used as an instrument for the active administration of monetary policy for the purpose of creating and maintaining wholesome business and economic conditions.
> The bank purchase decision implies repudiation of the idea that monetary conditions are shaped by the "times," and acceptance of the principle that money and credit can be so managed as to shape the "times." It is to be assumed the purchase legislation will be followed promptly by measures to employ the bank in this way; which measures parliament will have to either approve or upset the government and force an appeal to the country.
>
> Parliament is therefore to be "put on the spot" on the subject of monetary reform. It is to be hoped the members will prove they were misjudged by Mr. Dunning and Mr. McGeer—and by a good many others—in assuming they had fallen into a stand-pat attitude on this issue—the one issue that offers them a chance to start the forces of rejuvenation and get the country out of the slump.

[Mr. Kennedy.]

The Edmonton Bulletin has consistently stood for money reform, and I agree with it that money and credit can shape the times. The system must be made for man, not man for the system.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, it is the urge of many people in all parties that the government take immediate steps to introduce a definite policy of raising the standard of living of every Canadian citizen in keeping with the development of our natural resources. The people have consistently asked for security and freedom. They want taxation reduced; they want debts to be dealt with equitably so that they will be relieved from this crushing burden; they want poverty abolished. These are results that can be accomplished with an aggressive policy of money reform.

May I say just a brief word on unemployment. I do not wish to go into detail, so I shall simply state that since the government claim that it is their right to control the purse-strings of this nation, they are the only ones who can introduce measures to alleviate the unemployment situation. Therefore the federal government should assume full and complete responsibility for the care of the unemployed.

In passing, may I say that as a young man myself I appreciate the efforts of the government in its youth training projects. I want however, to point out that you can train me or any other young man in Canada to be an expert in any line you choose, but if that young man has not a job he will not have the power to keep his home and family together round about him. Therefore the government must go one step further, and that is to occupationally establish our young people. I would also point out, while on the subject of youth training, that we have from Halifax to Vancouver one of the finest educational systems that could possibly be devised. We have efficient public schools, high schools, technical schools, colleges and universities—the best anywhere. The people of Canada—the fathers and mothers of our young people—by taxation are paying for these institutions, and yet we find that the only thing that is keeping their sons and daughters from attending these institutions, the only thing that is depriving them of the opportunity of an education in these institutions, for which their fathers and mothers are paying, is lack of purchasing power. Once again I suggest that this is an appropriate subject to be dealt with in the budget debate. I believe that we must change our obsolete economic system and modernize it to bring about the results for which the people of Canada are asking.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. KENNEDY: I should like to give, in some detail, figures in regard to the freight rate problem as it affects western Canada and particularly Alberta. It is a serious question with us, and you will find, Mr. Speaker, as I give the figures, that Alberta particularly has had a great handicap because of the freight rate situation.

It is a well-recognized principle in rate making that rates should not rise as rapidly as distance; this is the tapering principle. The average length of haul of commodities is much longer west of Port Arthur than east of Port Arthur. For example, in the case of grain the eastern haul is, on the average, 466 miles, while the western haul is 645 miles. Terminal and many other overhead charges are the same whether a ton moves 10 miles or 1,000 miles. Thus the longer the haul, the lower should the ton-mile rate be. That is, the overhead costs may be spread over a greater distance. Yet frequently we find that the western ton-mile rate is almost as high as or higher than in the east. For example, eastern grain moves an average of 466 miles and pays a rate of 60 cents per ton-mile, while western grain moves an average of 645 miles, or about 40 per cent more, and yet pays almost the same ton-mile rate. If the usual tapering principle were applied, the western rate would be 13·2 per cent lower than it is at present. Similarly, if the normal tapering principle were applied, lumber rates would be 31 per cent lower, and the rate on anthracite coal would be 52 per cent lower, and so on.

Railroad companies, to facilitate rate making, assign every one of the thousands of commodities offered for shipment to one of several classes, or a special commodity rate is assigned to a commodity. The latter is especially true for commodities of a bulky nature which cannot bear the higher class rates. However, in this connection a serious abuse has developed which affects adversely the Alberta consumer and distributor. For example, canned goods, when moving from Montreal to Alberta, are assigned to fifth class, and the rate is $1.98 per 100 pounds, while if the goods move to Vancouver, a special commodity rate of $1.50 per 100 pounds is assigned. This makes the Alberta rate 2·09 cents per ton-mile and the Vancouver rate 1·04 cents per ton-mile. Thus the Alberta rate is 100 per cent above the Vancouver rate. In the case of barbed wire, an important item in farm costs, shipments to Alberta go in fifth class and carry the rate of $1.98, while shipments to Vancouver carry a commodity rate of 75 cents. This means that the ton-mile rate to Edmonton or Calgary is 240 per cent higher than the Vancouver rate. This higher freight on wire costs the Alberta farmer $26.40 more to put a three-strand fence around a quarter section of land. Similarly baking powder, confectionery, dry goods, hardware and tools, boots and shoes, and paints and varnishes carry relatively low commodity rates to Vancouver but must be shipped on class rates to Alberta points.

I wish to present a few figures to show to what extent the people of Alberta are handicapped by freight rates. This is a comparison of Montreal to Edmonton rates with Montreal to Vancouver rates:

Commodity	Rate Montreal to Calgary and Edmonton	Rate Montreal to Vancouver	Excess rate Calgary and Edmonton over Vancouver	Excess per-centage
Ammonia in iron drums	$2.33½	$1.25	$1.08½	86·8
Calcium phosphate	2.34½	.75	1.59½	212·6
Carpets	4.53½	3.00	1.53½	51·5
Drugs, medicines and chemicals	4.53½	3.50	1.03½	29·5
Dry goods, cotton	4.53½	3.27	1.26½	38·7
Insulators	1.98	1.35	.63	46·6
Glass and glassware	1.98	1.35	.63	46·6
Glass, window	1.98	1.00	.98	98·0
Hardware and tools	1.98	1.25	.73	58·4
Angles, band, bar	1.98	1.00	.98	98·0
Lead, white or red, dry	1.98	.75	1.23	164·0
Lye, concentrated	1.98	1.00	.98	98·0
Oil, cottonseed	1.98	1.00	.98	98·0
Roofing and roofing material	1.98	1.25	.73	58·4
Boots and shoes	3.03½	2.00	1.03½	51·8
Bolts, clips, nuts, rivets, rods, nails, iron or steel	1.98	1.00	.98	98·0
Pipe cast-iron, pipe wrought iron, 12″ and under	1.98	.70	1.28	182·8
Sugar and syrup	1.98	1.00	.98	98·0
Twine, cordage under ⅛″	2.33½	1.30	1.03½	79·6
Wire fencing	1.98	1.25	.73	58·4
Barbed wire	1.98	.75	1.23	164·0

Wholesalers and jobbers, as well as the people of Alberta, suffer under this rate structure. Paints and varnishes can be shipped from Montreal to Vancouver and reshipped in less than carload lots, l.c.l., to Vernon, B.C., a distance of 3,200 miles, for $2.24 per 100 pounds, while to ship in carloads to Calgary and l.c.l to Vernon, a distance of only 2,589 miles, costs $2.97½. This is a difference in favour of Vancouver of $0.73½ per 100 pounds.

Flannelette blankets move to Vancouver in a cotton goods car at $1.75 per 100 pounds. The Edmonton rate is $4.53½ per 100 pounds. This tremendous difference is principally due to the fact that the railways will not include cotton blankets in a cotton goods car to Edmonton. If these blankets could be included in a fourth class cotton goods car, the rate would be $2.33½ and the discrimination would not be so great. The railways will accept these blankets in a fourth class car if the edges are not whipped. Unfortunately it is not practical to ship them in this shape, as the edges will fray. They cannot be shipped to Edmonton since no equipment is available. A rate structure that will allow a Vancouver wholesaler to bring blankets to Vancouver and reship local freight to Holden, a town sixty miles east of Edmonton, for 21½ cents per 100 pounds less than is charged for shipment direct to Edmonton does not seem reasonable. The rates are $1.75 Montreal to Vancouver, plus $2.57 local freight Vancouver to Holden in Alberta, and the Montreal to Edmonton rate is $4.53½. The same discrimination in favour of Vancouver applies in the case of other dry goods, hardware, tools, and barbed wire.

At the other end of the prairie region Winnipeg is in a favoured position. In some cases Winnipeg distributors can ship l.c.l beyond Edmonton at a lower rate than the combination of the carload rate from Montreal to Edmonton plus the local rate. Many commodities can be shipped in car lots to Winnipeg and reshipped local freight into Edmonton territory at a lower total freight charge than would be the case if they were shipped direct in cars to Edmonton and distributed from there.

It is suggested that a substantial reduction in the rates on grain and grain products from Alberta producing points to British Columbia would do much to facilitate the interchange of commodities between the two provinces, giving each an increased purchasing power for the products of the other. These two provinces geographically are ideally situated side by side, each producing entirely different products which are required by the other, but handicapped by a transportation cost between them which is relatively unfair to a federation of provinces.

To summarize briefly: Alberta, along with other western provinces, carries relatively a very large proportion of Canadian transportation cost, and in addition Alberta gets the shock both from the east and from the west. The old reasons of higher cost of construction and operation advanced by the board of railway commissioners for perpetuating this condition have been challenged from time to time. However, if Canada is to succeed as a nation, restraints of trade between the different portions must be removed, so that the products of the various parts may be freely interchanged, and if in the process the situation of the railways is too adversely affected, then the situation should be dealt with so that the burden shall be carried nationally and not disproportionately by various sections.

Another problem of vital interest to my constituency of Edmonton East is the coal situation. In or adjacent to the constituency of Edmonton East there are twenty-three mining companies in active operation, also the headquarters of many of the mines operating in the coal branches are in the city of Edmonton. One can readily realize how important a question this is to the people there.

However, rather than deal with any particular constituency I prefer to deal with the problem as it concerns Alberta as a whole. We all realize that the coal distribution is certainly far from satisfactory, and we would urge the government to look into the matter with a view to finding some means of making the distribution more equitable. Alberta alone has 14 per cent of the coal reserves of the world, 21 per cent of the coal reserves of the North American continent, 72 per cent of those of the British Empire, and 87 per cent of those of the Dominion of Canada. Yet we find the startling fact that, with all this coal in one province alone of Canada, Canada supplies only one per cent of the world's needs. Another startling fact we find is that, with all this coal, in 1936 exports decreased two per cent while imports increased 5·6 per cent. Upon a close examination of coal statistics in an effort to find where the difficulty lies, other startling facts are disclosed. Out of 28,000,000 tons of coal used last year in Canada, Canadian coal mines supplied only, in round figures, approximately 15,000,000 tons. Ontario brings in over 10,000,000 tons of coal from the United States of America. Surely a policy of Canadian goods in Canadian homes, or Canadian coal in Canadian engines and stoves, would be the proper policy for this country.

The question is not one of production. We could produce far more coal in Alberta at very little greater cost than is the case to-day. When we examine the figures as to the unemployed —and I should have liked the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) if he were present, to take particular notice of this fact —we find that last year we used a little over 5,000 miners underground in the mines of Alberta, but we have over 13,000 men holding miners' certificates. This means that approximately 8,000 miners were used in other industries, forcing other tradesmen on to unemployment, or that these miners were themselves being kept on relief. Another startling illustration is this, that the unemployed in Alberta in May totalled 8,771, approximately the same number that were kept out of work because we were not using coal from Alberta in Canadian homes.

Another clear illustration would be this. Ontario is sending about $100,000,000 into the United States each year to buy United States coal and bring it into this country. If we again compare figures, this is surprisingly close to the amount which the government at this time is trying to divert into a housing scheme in order to create employment. It is one case where money is going out which the government does not need to borrow in order to get; it is here, and it is being sent to the United States. If the government in some way or another could divert this flow of money amounting to about $100,000,000 from the United States into Canadian industry, this would do a great deal to stimulate employment in Canada. It is not that our coal is not as good as theirs. Alberta coal is every bit as good coal as one can buy anywhere in the world. The trouble is that we are not able to bring it to eastern Canada. I ask that the government check up on the question of subventions. We appreciate very much that the government are spending $2,250,000 in subventions in the Dominion of Canada, but we find that Alberta is getting only about $345,000. If we can get a larger subvention so that we can move Alberta coal to Ontario homes, this will stimulate business, I believe, all along the line.

Another suggestion which might be placed before the government is this. The order in council regarding subventions states that the subventions shall be provided by parliament year by year. If this grant could be stabilized in such a way that it could be applied continuously, so that we could have it for a period of seven or even five years; or, in other words, if the government could introduce a bill which would stabilize subventions to the coal industry for that period of time, we could interest coal miners in bringing the coal to the markets in Ontario. This would make it possible for the coal industry to establish warehouses at strategic points from which they could supply the Ontario market. This would have two advantages. It would make for greater employment, employment for men in these warehouses. It would also create the possibility of all-the-year-round work in Alberta mines and even in Canadian mines generally, to use a broader term. It would permit miners to mine in the slack season in the summer time and fill the warehouses, so that they would be prepared for the winter rush in the Ontario market, and would not crowd the domestic market in Alberta.

I am submitting these thoughts briefly to the government. I had hoped to take them up on the estimates of the Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar), but I am placing them on record in the budget debate so that he may look into them at this time.

Just to summarize what I have been saying in this speech: As a young man, I plead with the government to spare no effort in the interests of building a bigger and greater Canada. They have the means; we have the goods. I plead with them to spare no effort to build a bigger, better and saner Canada for the young people of future generations to live in.

Mr. C. J. VENIOT (Gloucester): At this stage of the session I would hardly venture to take part in the debate were it not for the fact during the last five months little or no mention has been made of an industry which is of vital importance to some 200,000 citizens of the maritime provinces whose very existence depends in one way or another on the fisheries. I do not intend my remarks as a criticism either of the present government or of any preceding government. I propose to point out facts as they exist, and hope to present a constructive suggestion.

Last year the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare (Mr. Pottier) gave this house a vivid picture of the distress of fishermen in the maritime provinces, showing how this industry, the fishing industry, had reached the brink of bankruptcy, and begged that something be done as rapidly as possible to relieve the distress and suffering of the fishermen. Year after year for the last fifteen years or so the same picture has been presented with but little variation in the colouring.

Reflection readily shows that the fundamenal causes of the recession of the fisheries are rooted deeper than the economic depression which we have witnessed during the past eight years. Indeed, several years before the depression great concern was felt over the fate of the fisheries, as witnessed by the various commissions which were appointed to look into the situation. No effective remedy has been found to remove the trouble.

It must first be recognized that in the past thirty years the fish consuming public has undergone a considerable transformation, has progressed from the century of dry and pickled cod to that of newer, more tasty, more appetizing methods of preparaing, processing, displaying and marketing fish. Tastes and markets for fish have followed the same evolution practically that changed highway transportation from the horse and buggy age to that of the speedy and luxurious automobile.

Unfortunately, the great majority of our fishermen have not kept pace with the trend of advancement, and many of their products lag behind like the two-wheeled gig of our forefathers. The gulf of St. Lawrence and Chaleur bay, which adjoin my riding, contain enormous quantities of many varieties of fish; but our fishermen lack the knowledge of modern catching and processing, have not the means to adapt themselves in the matter of equipment, and have not the leadership to guide them in the new fields of storage, distribution and marketing of fish. This lack of modern training and equipment is one of the major factors in the recession of the fisheries.

From this standpoint it might be interesting to establish a comparison between the modernization of agriculture in its various branches and the lagging behind of the fisheries; between the assistance and leadership given the farmer and the utter neglect in which the fisherman has been allowed to wallow.

The great majority of primary food stuffs are derived from two sources: the fisheries and the agricultural industry. Fish and other sea foods enter the group of primary food stuffs along with meat, eggs and poultry; dairy products, such as milk, cream, butter and cheese; fruits, vegetables and cereals. Both industries are equally concerned with production; preparing and processing; collection and storage; distribution and marketing; conservation and replenishment.

Since confederation everything has been done that could possibly be done by governing bodies for the assistance and advancement of the agricultural industry. It has been lavishly subsidized by both provincial and federal governments. The best possible of educational training and aid have been provided for the farmer through the following channels: First, agricultural schools, experimental farms, illustration stations, live stock branches in every province; second, graduates in all branches of agricultural science bringing the benefit of their trained knowledge to the farmer's very door, showing him the best and latest methods of sowing, cultivating and harvesting farm crops, teaching him the breeding, selection, raising, killing, curing and storage of live stock and poultry—and butter and cheese have been live issues in more than one election campaign; third, trained inspectors, graders, demonstrators, located at government expense in every province, visiting every district; fourth, the supplying of the best grades of seed, live stock and poultry; fifth, the storage of farm products, grain elevators, refrigeration plants and so forth; sixth, the distribution and marketing of agricultural products, wheat boards, trade commissions, special freight rates and what not. Agriculture has benefited in every way and has been practically revolutionized by modern machinery, tractors, seeders, cultivators, harvesters and milking machines, along with modern training and modern methods.

We rejoice over the fact that the farmer has had so many advantages and so much assistance; but equally we deplore the other fact, that the fisheries stagnate in spite of modern development elsewhere. In every phase of the industry until quite recently the fisherman has been left to his own private initiative, his own antiquated methods and his own miserable resources. He has had no swarm of graduate teachers to tell him the new and attractive methods of processing, curing and packing his products to render them more attractive to the prospective customer. Storage facilities for fish are but infinitesimal as compared with what they should be to take care of a product which is so highly perishable. Because of this lack, losses each year are tremendous. In one fishing district alone, eighteen months ago, during the smelt fishing season, there was a loss in one week of fifty tons of smelts and eight hundred barrels of tomcods, valued at approximately $6,000, on account of the fact that there were no proper freezing facilities available.

The great majority of fishermen have not the slightest experience in the marketing of their products. Their own endeavours along this line have been almost nil owing to their ignorance of trade fields and market requisites. For over half a century they have been the victims of fish trading companies which always had every possible advantage over them. In the county of Gloucester approximately three-quarters of the fishermen to-day have their properties, their boats and gear, passed over to the possession of these fish trading companies because of the stranglehold obtained upon them through book debts, loans, mortgages and bills of sale.

It may be noted in passing that every other industry in Canada has progressed. Agriculture, mining, lumbering, pulp and paper, manufacturing, all have advanced, some reaching the peaks of the mountains. For a period of twenty years, barring the depression period, the fisheries alone have regressed and slumped to depths perilously near the brink of extinction. While millions are spent each year for the advancement, development and rehabilitation of agriculture and for the education and protection of the farmer, the fisherman remains the outcast, the poor geezer who risks his life on the high seas, at the mercy of storm, wind and wreck, to become, when he returns to land, the victim of fish trading companies who extort his hard-earned products at ridiculous prices after having taken from him even the ramshackle cottage in which his family endeavours to carry on a miserable existence.

Some eight or nine years ago the fisheries were judged sufficiently important to be made a separate department, and were divorced from the Department of Marine. At that time we envisaged possibilities of the expansion of the fisheries department and of its providing some leadership in the development of the fisheries. Indeed, since that time some attempts have been made to break away from the previous objectives of the fisheries department, which were chiefly regulation, patrol and conservation. Recently laudable efforts have been made to assist by the establishment of experimental fisheries stations, the giving of occasional short courses in fish processing, the sending of the odd instructor to the fishermen, the organization of cooperative groups among the fishermen. Attempts have been made to find markets, and during the last two years grants in aid and loans have been made to the fishermen. But these efforts, praiseworthy as they are, cover but a small fraction of the assistance that is needed by the industry. The fishermen claim that something more radical is needed for the rehabilitation of the fisheries. As food producers their contention is that they are entitled to the same assistance, educational and otherwise, as that given the farmers.

Mr. BROOKS: If I may ask the hon. member a question, with the condition of the fishermen and fisheries in the maritime provinces such as the hon. gentleman has described, would he explain why advantage was not taken of the $500,000 voted last year for rehabilitation?

Mr. VENIOT: I think it would be easier for the head of the department to give that explanation. The submission of the fishermen is that the present set-up of the Department of Fisheries is not in tune with the trend of the times when compared with the Department of Agriculture. It is not abreast of the developments which have taken place in the fishing industry in other countries.

During the past few years it has been my privilege to discuss with men who are deeply interested in the fate of the fishermen the various problems which confront them. Invariably the conclusion of these discussions has been practically the same, namely that the first and foremost step to bring the fisheries back to their former condition would be the uplifting of the fisherman and a complete revamping of the Department of Fisheries, so as to give it a set-up comparable with that of the Department of Agriculture. From a department of regulation, patrol and conservation there is an urgent need as rapidly and as completely as possible to transform it into a department of leadership, education, initiative, expansion and development in its relation to the several fields already mentioned, namely production, collection and storage; preparation and processing; distribution and marketing of fish. Let us briefly consider these few items.

First, let us consider the production and catch of fish. There is something radically wrong with fish-catch when people who live in the neighbourhood of the baie des Chaleurs and the gulf of St. Lawrence must both summer and winter send to Halifax wholesale fish dealers for their supply of fresh fish. There is something wrong when the fur raisers in the northern section of New Brunswick must every week import from neighbouring provinces tons upon tons of fish to be employed as food for fur-raising animals. Too many of our fishermen are still using the antiquated hand-line method of catching cod, and too great a number are without means of procuring modern fishing gear to increase their catch of other kinds of fish. The economics of this unnatural situation deserves study and consideration.

Second, let us consider the collection and storage of fish. This item needs greater attention. Here also the entire picture needs transformation under experienced leadership, just as has been the case in the Department of Agriculture. Fish is one of the most perishable of protein foods. In order properly to preserve it in its fresh and edible state it is necessary, as soon as it is caught, that it be either processed immediately or subjected to some form of cold storage or freezing. Unfortunately a great number of our deep sea fishermen are not aware of this important fact and have not their boats equipped properly to store or to freeze their fish immediately, before it reaches shore. Only the large fish operators have boats equipped with these freezers or ice-boxes to take care of the fish in such a way as to render it suitable for further processing. The rest of our fishing fleet is obliged to subject its catch to some form of pickling, which renders it unfit for further delicate processing. In this condition steps should be taken either to provide some better system of collecting fish from the deep sea fishermen, or to give the fishermen the knowledge or facilities so that they may equip their boats to take care of their rapidly spoiling catch.

Third, let us consider the preparing and processing of fish. Leadership and education in cooperation with provincial governments, along lines similar to those adopted by the Department of Agriculture, are essential in the field of preparing and processing in new and attractive ways to make the product marketable and appetizing. Last year in my county a complete investigation of the fisheries situation was made, under the instruction of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Michaud), and the one outstanding fact derived from the investigation was the lack of knowledge of the great number of fishermen as to methods of processing fish. Tons and tons of fresh fish could be filleted, smoked, canned or otherwise prepared if our fishermen only had the knowledge how to do so. The same applies no doubt to the majority of fishermen in many other sections of the maritime provinces. In this connection it might be fitting to point out that since 1934 the government of Quebec realizing the necessity of educating its fishermen along the lower end of the gulf of St. Lawrence and on the Gaspé coast as to modern methods of processing and handling fish, has officially established in that district a school to be devoted exclusively to fishermen so that they may be taught all a fisherman need to know about the preparation of fish and the methods of handling it when caught, and before it is brought to shore, so that it may reach its destination in as fresh condition as possible.

Fourth, I should like to discuss the distribution of fish. Valuable experiments have been made by rail companies to discover the best methods of transmitting fish long distances for marketing purposes. But I suggest that one further step is important, namely the establishment, at strategic points from coast to coast, of a chain of cold storage plants to take care of adequate distribution. I do not imply that the government must construct and operate these cold storage plants, or go into the cold storage business. But we have here a need for leadership and initiative by a wide-awake and active Department of Fisheries which will create these distribution facilities.

The fifth point is that of marketing. It is hardly necessary to add that with a greater variety of fish products and with the creation of greater facilities for distribution and storage, a much wider field of markets can be attained. With proper leadership and direction there is no reason why Canadian markets for fish could not be doubled or trebled. How many hon. members from the central provinces ever have on their tables fresh fillets of cod or haddock, fresh mackerel or herring, smelts, or lobsters, oysters or clams? In spite of the present system of distribution one cannery in New Brunswick, which began operations on a small scale a few years ago, has succeeded in obtaining markets in over eighty countries. The individual small fisherman is not able to enter such fields, unless some leadership is given by governing bodies.

Mr. Speaker, these are but a few considerations of facts as they exist in the fisheries industry. I leave them for the reflection of hon. members on all sides of the house, regardless of political affiliation. I feel sure they will conclude that there is plenty of room for improvement in the fishing industry. This appeal for leadership and for constructive action and development in connection with the fisheries is made in the interests of 200,000 Canadian citizens from the maritime provinces, coupled with several hundreds of thousands of citizens in other parts of Canada who depend for their livelihood upon this very leadership which they themselves have not the power or the means to develop.

They do not want charity. They are asking for light and guidance in their own field of endeavour, for an opportunity to develop their natural talents and to follow their blood tendencies to live off the sea. My submission is that in next year's budget the government should begin to make provision for the gradual but complete transformation of the Department of Fisheries from a department of regulation, control and conservation to one of leadership, initiative, education, action, expansion and development of the fisheries, patterned on the development of the Department of Agriculture, as a first step towards rehabilitating what formerly was one of the richest industries in the maritime provinces, and in Canada as a whole.

Mr. J. S. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to my feet my good wishes go out to the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) with the hope that he will speedily completely recover from the sudden indisposition which took him from the house this afternoon.

For a very few years, too few I regret, we have enjoyed the benefits of a general upward trend in business, but we have not yet been able to seal to ourselves the practice of balancing the budget of the country. We cannot be absolutely certain that business conditions will continue their desirable upward trend in the near future. Therefore, we must admit that there is no secure progress in our national affairs.

We face an utterly staggering situation. Our purely federal obligations stand to-day in excess of $3,500,000,000 gross, or $3,100,000,000 net. Before we can address ourselves to the necessary work of our country we must spend every year not less than an approximate sum of $117,000,000. Last year this amount stood at $134,500,000. This amount is needed purely for interest on money borrowed for work and services already done, sometimes overdone and sometimes demanding to be done again. Hon. members will not disagree with me when I venture to assert that to-day we are paying interest on capital debt the original reason for which has been lost to the country and its economy by the natural wastage of the years. Had I any inclination to pass out of the field of discussion of our national finances, I could bring to argument the story of many railways, many canals, many power plants and many industries and undertakings, the capital structures of which are staggering under items for the purchase of buildings and equipment destroyed or cast off many years ago, while the interest goes on year after year satisfying no one but the receiver, and in essence not even him.

Bear in mind that there has been no reduction in our national debt, nor can there be under the most promising of present-day conditions. There has been no reduction during the past eight years, and the continuing increase has brought us as a nation to an intolerable position. We have added a total of approximately $900,000,000 to our burden of public debt. In 1867, in the days of confederation, the public debt of the new Canada then being formed stood at approximately $93,000,000. Seventy-two years have passed since that time, and during that period we have increased our debt fifty-seven times to a grand total of about $3,600,000,000. In that period we have only fifteen recorded years in which there was any reduction of debt. These reductions totalled slightly in excess of $319,000,000, leaving us with an addition to our confederation debt of about $3,300,000,000 gross, or $3,000,000,000 net. Do hon. members realize that there have been only fifteen profit making years in the seventy-two years since confederation? This means that in almost four years out of every five since that time we have complacently or compulsorily added to the debt structure of our country.

We do nothing at all about it. Reductions take place only when the budgeted accounts of the country disclose a satisfactory surplus. With that surplus the debts of the country are purchased and pro tanto reduced. But nothing is done to discover how we might whittle down our obligations and restore sanity to the economy of our people. It is not only in connection with the public debt of Canada that this has taken place. In every province and in every municipality the same obtains. We find the same condition existing in every country of the world where debts are privileged to accrete. Our debt is always increased by the surplus of our necessities, and the lean years eat up the depreciated revenue resources of our country. When the fat years come along they awake in us the urge to make up the leeway of our course, and we are quite satisfied to equate the growing needs of our growing country with the new financial resources of successful government. There can be little advantage in making of this speech a calamity howl, and I assure hon. members that such is not my intention. Still, I should complete the picture.

So far I have not considered the debts of the provincial governments which at the end of their 1936 fiscal years totalled over $1,700,000,000 for direct liabilities, less sinking funds. Neither have I considered the bonded indebtedness of the municipalities of all classes, which at the end of their 1934 fiscal years had reached the amazing total of $1,450,000,000, and these figures have since been climbing. What does it matter that these total exceed $6,250,000,000 net? Even then the tale is not told of the guarantees of interest, the guarantees of principal and such like. The thing which essentially matters is that we do nothing about it. The thing which eternally matters is that the wealthy men in our country know that they, more than wars and more than depressions, have produced this condition, but they are utterly helpless to bring sanity to its continuation.

It seems to be the accepted idea that a growing country can support a growing debt. While taxpayers protest and politicians grumble, never a voice is raised to declare that though everything else seems wrong there must be, there should be, there shall be a way out. Why should our public debt be considered as a snowball rolling down hill? Why should we complacently or in any other manner accept its growing size and assume that only when it reaches the valley of desolation will it melt? We have no justification for blaming the war or the war years for all our troubles? The war years numbered seven as far as this country's debts were concerned, but I have indicated a long series of fifty-seven years of unrelenting debits which were not all attributable to hard times. We are bound to admit that depression increases our public debt, while prosperity tends to give us confidence and encourages us in the enlargement of our public debt to meet our public needs. There is something very wrong with our economy and especially with our understanding of it. The facts I have marshalled are an advertisement of weakness which pleads for immediate action.

The world has learned to accumulate and to develop wealth in the functioning of the capitalist economy, or, I should say, the neo-capitalist economy. The world very early and very quickly learned to demand interest on money lent. This is a highly important corollary of our neo-capitalist economy, and in spite of its generally blighting, parasitic nature, it is invariably protected and sustained by the full strength of our law structure.

We must therefore deal with it as we find it. We must also deal with the general economic situation as we find it; for these are the products of our brains, and in justice to ourselves and to those who will follow us, we must eliminate from both and from all our social machinery excesses and abuses which are constantly attaching to their functioning, human nature being just what it is. None the less it is no platitude to say that no effort of any kind, industrial, commercial or social, escapes the frustration which interest slowly but without surcease fastens upon it. Debts tend everywhere to increase. Interest tends everywhere to become more throttling, and I want to draw the earnest attention of the house, indeed of all the world about us, to this amazing fact, that there exists no machinery anywhere by which in our economy we can arrest their juggernaut progress. The small cancellations afforded to successful citizens do not in historical survey provide any important solution of the situation, while the whole machinery of finance piles the interest of Pelion upon the debt of Ossa. There does not exist anywhere in the world to-day machinery to remove the pyramiding weight of both. Thus I assert that we move slowly and irresistibly to the collapse of our civilization without any intelligent effort being made to avert the catastrophe, and all this when we cry aloud for social security for our people and yearn for cultural opportunities for our spiritual development. In the present age we pay year by year for the debts of the past, not in reduction of them, but in order that we may keep them alive for the honour and glory of our good name and the dishonourable burdening of all those who may follow after us.

If I were asked to tell hon. members what I think of interest, I would unhesitatingly classify it as a cancer upon the body politic. Long nights have I spent in concentrating on a way by which it could be painlessly extracted from our modern system. As I thought long and earnestly, I came to realize that in the end it might prove to be the goad to drive us out of the economic complacency in which we find ourselves, a complacency which permits us with unctuous pride to point to the unheard-of achievements of our modern civilization, while at our feet the drool of the cretin and the pathetic gaze of the helpless starveling scarcely move us to flick the crumbs from the tables of our gluttonous feasts.

For a very few moments, and before I move forward to any suggestion I desire to make, there is before me a problem corollary to my whole subject, to which I must refer. I refer to the present position of gold in the polity of any country. I have no illusions about the folly of building up huge reserves of gold. For many years I have predicted its ultimate elimination from the business of the world. It has been withdrawn from the pockets of the world, and it would be crazy folly for anyone to attempt to put it back. Its economic use to-day is to function as a make-weight in balancing international accounting, and I am quite prepared to admit that it will function in this way for many years to come, if happily the world does not completely fall to pieces in the meantime. At any rate I think we can agree together that its function internationally will be the last present power of which it will be deprived. It will be recalled that in the early days of the great war the demand of Britain and her allies for food, equipment, and ammunition in unprecedented quantities created an alarming situation. Then it was that Sir George Paish took from the old country to Washington documents of security to a very considerable amount. These securities belonged to and had been collected from patriotic citizens, patriotic industries, and patriotic undertakings by the British government, and they represented investments of every possible kind which might prove acceptable to the government of the United States. They were lodged, shall I say, or deposited, or better still, hypothecated with that government, in order that a vast purchasing credit might be established in favour of Britain. It was to be a credit outside Britain, outside her normal commercial functionings—note that fact. This was done in the shortest possible space of time by British patriots. It was the first great historic effort of entrenched modern finance, by surrendering its forts, its guns, its immense stores of ammunition, to support in extremis the country of its patriotic owners and directors.

The release of these securities was not brought about until long after the war had ended, when Stanley Baldwin journeyed from London to Washington to acknowledge and commute the immense debt which had accumulated in the meantime.

Now our country, our Canada, is in extremis, tottering under a staggering load of debts, debts of capital, debts of interest, all borne by our little villages, our larger towns, our bigger cities, our provinces, and our Canadian selves. We must face these facts as they are to-day, and keen our brains, not our hearts, to discover a way out. Such a way out must not be lit by the flaming torches of revolution. It must not lead us into the cul-de-sac of renunciation, and surely as true Canadians it should not lead us into the wilderness of despair and frustration.

And facing the facts, Mr. Speaker, I say there is a way out, a way which passes by the very halls of finance, the very magazines of commerce, the very arenas of throbbing industry, and by the peaceful homes of our people. No unusual festival need mark our progress, and no unusual activity need herald our accomplishment.

If the wealthy patriots of Britain heard their country's call in 1914, then the wealthy patriots of Canada should hear their country's call to-day. They know how precarious is their hold on their so-called wealth. They know this more clearly than the millions of our people who have no such nether millstone around their necks. They know that the last twenty years have witnessed no new avenues of great wealth open up. They have felt the pace during the past thirty years as it constantly quickened. They have felt the point of saturation slowly approach. They know that sooner or later, and better sooner than later, they must accept the call to face their responsibility and do their part, or be wiped off the slate forever in withering fatuity. Let them and their companies and their associations collect such gilt-edged securities as our scrutinizing government will accept. Have all the documents of title discharged in blank. Let them offer them to Canada absolutely free of incidental or other charges, under letters of deposit or hypothecation for a fixed period of not less than ten years.

At the expiry of that time they shall be absolutely freed by Canada and returned. Let Canada accept the condition that all accruing and developing interests and dividends proper to the securities shall flow to the patriot owners as usual during the term of the hypothecation. Let this be done to a first total of not less than $200,000,000 of acceptable and accepted securities, and I assert that the first great creative step will have been taken by Canada to lift herself out of the slough of despond.

This amount of $200,000,000 is well within the compass of the patriotic citizens of our country, and while large enough to make a distinct impression in the new plan is small enough not to disturb the safe and fluidic operation of the economic forces of our country. But there must be no strings to the hypothecation. The results of the working of the plan will be to the advantage of the wealth of the country and its holders to-day as to those who unequally bear its yoke.

Of course, it may be argued that this plan will involve inflation, and I therefore anticipate such an argument now before the plan is advanced. Managed inflation cannot be questioned. The country's first requirements in currency or otherwise were not scientifically arrived at; they were discovered accidentally and estimated arbitrarily and every variation since must necessarily fall into the class of inflation or deflation, theoretically at least. When we fail to balance our budget it is by a theoretically inflationary process that we cover, and when we develop a surplus we theoretically deflate to balance. This means that during the fifty-seven years since confederation when we failed to balance the budget the amount of the deficits were covered by the theoretically inflationary process.

It is interesting to observe what balancing we had to do, and I quote the following in round figures to simplify aural acceptance, as in fact I have done all through my speech in view of the ease with which the detailed figures can be obtained by hon. members.

In the following stated years our deficits were as now quoted:

	In excess of
1914	$ 21,000,000
1915	113,000,000
1916	165,000,000
1917	264,000,000
1918	312,000,000
1919	382,000,000
1920	674,000,000
1921	92,000,000
1922	81,000,000
1923	31,000,000

The years 1924 to 1930 exhibit prosperous budgets with total deflationary figures of $276,000,000. Then we resume:

	In excess of
1931	$ 83,000,000
1932	114,000,000
1933	220,000,000
1934	133,000,000
1935	116,000,000
1936	159,000,000
1937	77,000,000
1938	13,000,000

To proceed: This huge trust hypothecation should be handled by the Bank of Canada without cost to the government of the country and, I believe, can be so handled with or without very slight modifications of its charter. These securities being deposited the Bank of Canada will advance to the debt-reduction trust the sum of $200,000,000 legal tender of Canada. With this sum of $200,000,000 the Bank of Canada will buy gold, buying first from Canada's mines, then from such foreign countries as will in the result benefit mutually with Canada in their trade relationships. This $200,000,000 gold the banks will use as a gold basis for the issuance of $400,000,000 legal tender of Canada. With this $400,000,000 the bank will now purchase, at the market value, a like amount of the national debt of the country. This corpus of debt will not be cancelled but will continue to pay to the trust interest during the term of hypothecation. Much of the debt pays high interest rates, but the average rate in 1936 over the whole burden was 3·937 per cent. For simple illustration I set it at 4 per cent.

Well, what have we? The Bank of Canada holds in a trust under letters of hypothecation the securities of its patriotic citizens to the extent of $200,000,000. It also holds gold to the extent of $200,000,000. As further security it also holds items of the national debt, $400,000,000, all bought in open market and returning an average interest of 4 per cent. Before we examine per contra let us bear in mind that the issuance of $400,000,000 against $200,000,000 gold is well within the safest practice of other countries and well within the provisions of the safest practice suggested by a technical group of the London economic conference, while it compares favourably at 50 per cent with Canada's percentage and with the Bank of England's recently developed 57·225 per cent. Well, the per contra items of the trust are: (1) the first issue of $200,000,000 against the hypothecated securities; (2) the second issue against the gold of legal tender to $400,000,000.

The first issue melts into the commercial processes of the country. Canada's mines get no more and no less than before the national debt reduction trust became a working factor. It is true the chartered banks may fall out of the transaction, though not necessarily; but in any case, little harm will be done because their business in this matter is largely per contra. The second issue of $400,000,000 will send a large sum of money foreign, but will with equal surety place a large sum of money in the investment field at home. If Canada is wise, she will seek this money again for such live issues as will develop true economic and industrial progress within her borders; for I am convinced that our economic and financial illnesses arise not from gluttonous financial ingestion into our body politic but from contractile constipation; and the condition of our people will respond with alacrity to the consistent removal of debts which have done their duty.

There is little doubt that the foreign investor will seek our securities with greater peace of mind as he views our new orientation in finance. And so we come to the march of events in the trust. The dominion government will continue to pay to the trust in the Bank of Canada the interest on the federal debt securities purchased. On the basis of an average 4 per cent per annum earning, the sum should yearly reach $16,000,000 or, in the ten year life of the trust, $160,000,000. If the moneys as received are revolved by investment in new or old loan issues, the total of interest accumulations should be not less than $166,000,000.

To ensure that the securities hypothecated can be released to the owners at the end of ten years, Canada should herself set aside a cash contribution yearly of $5,000,000 (which in turn could be revolved in investment). By the end of ten years nearly $220,000,000 would lie in the trust account and the original hypothecated securities be freed again to the patriotic holders.

After closing out the first operation under the debt reduction trust, the Bank of Canada will show: $400,000,000 national debt now to be cancelled; $200,000,000 gold at the trust opening price; $200,000,000 cash and new debt securities.

Of course all the figures are arbitrary. They are, however, used to outline a plan with facility, not to detail its operations.

The Bank of Canada functions to preserve the balance of expectations and commitments in the financial structure of the country. There is nothing here advanced which does not lie well within the scope of its daily work. The melting of the security holdings of the trust into the corpus of funds held by it as comptroller of the credit system of the country would be of its routine business, while its procedure will become self-evident and self-suggestive in operation.

And so we use the element of time to disintegrate continually that which credit is continually creating. This is the important thought by which this plan can be evaluated, and it is quite arresting; for finance is continually creating capital, anchoring it down to interest and doing nothing to disintegrate it.

It is very rarely in public and high finance that debts are paid by direct deflation. Let us observe, for explanation, a certain electric light and power company with a capital liability of $70,000,000 makes an annual profit of, say 14 per cent, or $9,100,000. A millionaire financier observes the brilliance of this company from afar, and with his friends deposits securities with the bank, secures a sufficiency of credit, and by buying a block of shares controls the company. He controls the answer when a question of sale arises. The capital of the new company is now greatly enlarged and the structure reorientated. The profits of $9,100,000 per annum, which will be carefully increased by monopolistic regulation, can now suffice to pay the usual 6 per cent cumulative preference dividend on a very large block of the capital, while the balance of the capital in no par value shares will provide the voting power for control and the residual profits for the ruthlessness, hardihood and acumen of the millionaire and his friends. The company now capitalized at $120,000,000 easily carries its full quantum of water and easily pays its preferred interest. But observe what has taken place:

(a) The chances of reduction of the selling price of the company's products to the community are removed in order that the larger burden of capital may be supported and the dividends maintained.

(b) The small investor all over the country whose primary thought is largest constant returns and safe perpetual investment is induced to carry without voting representation the capital which represents the basic strain of the industry.

(c) A public utility which should function to bring its services to the community at the lowest possible cost is saddled with a permanent debt structure in the name of capital in order that the rapacity of the money-maker might be appeased, and that, recovering his initial investment, he might move on to repeat elsewhere the trick which marks him out before all men as astuteness personified.

Let me say that this is a suppositional case, but it does bear a striking resemblance to what has already happened a far cry from here in our own country, and its salient features are so much like those which you all readily recognize as just around the corner.

In all this I am not blaming the financier. Only men of superior ruthlessness could conceive, develop and carry through such armchair, fireside, mint julep drinking, high finance wealth producing; and—this is an arresting fact—we need such men in Canada, more especially if they can be induced to apply themselves to the national rather than the personal problems of wealth production. This they should do for their own sake. This they should with equal zeal and sincerity do for the honour and credit of their country. This they should do to save the economic structure of the country—of the world—now in grave danger of tottering to its utter downfall in financial collapse. This they should do to bring social security to the socially insecure, and I mention this last because of its paramount importance and because none knows better than they that there is no justification for that insecurity and neither rhyme nor reason for keeping the healthy, unemployed employable alive by charity administered in niggardly and often cruel stupidity. All humanity is waiting for these citizens to develop a far-sighted policy which in the long run will develop greater opportunities for all and wipe out the selfish, unthinking greed of their past. I unhesitatingly blame successive governments because they have supinely permitted these wealth producers to do their work without let or hindrance and without perceiving the logical issues developing from their genius.

These governments have admitted the so-called creation of credit and interest bearing capital. They have never realized that it is equally important that it should be disintegrated; that to disintegrate the outworn structure of debts is as vitally necessary a part of the economic policy of the government as all the rest of its functions; that this studied disintegration, proceeding along with creation of capital, is now long, long overdue if we are to save the fabric of our civilization.

I am not here referring to the repayment of relatively small commercial and personal obligations, for these are in an entirely different field of endeavour; nor am I referring to the well meaning but really rather stupid and absurd system of sinking fund amortizations. I am most definitely referring to federal debts, provincial debts, city and municipal debts, the debts and outworn capital structure of utility companies, railroads and all human endeavours operating under capital or debt structures and taking toll from the people as a whole.

In or about 1910, in the then new municipality of South Vancouver, $100,000 was borrowed for twenty years at 5 per cent per annum for wooden sidewalks. Almost overnight the residents realized for the first time the pleasure of walking to their homes mud-free and dry-shod. Yet eighteen months afterwards, one and a half miles of wooden sidewalks on a main street of South Vancouver were torn up to make way for permanent concrete structures, and within eight years from the placement of the loan scarcely a wooden sidewalk was to be found in South Vancouver. Yet the people carried the burden without hope of relief.

Vancouver built Burrard bridge for $2,800,000 and borrowed for forty years at 5 per cent, so that the benefits of the bridge to-day impose on the people of the city a yearly charge of $140,000 for forty years ab initio, which amount will be part of the final total accounting for that bridge to a total of $8,400,000. The case is very little mitigated by the fact that all the money was not spent on the project, owing to delay in the construction of a certain small part of it; but the relation of figures to facts approximates the same stupid situation. In the same city of Vancouver there was a boys' juvenile detention home which had fallen into sad disrepair, so $5,000 was included in the loan structure—

Mr. SPEAKER: Order; I would draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that he has exhausted his time.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): Thank you, Mr. Speaker; I very much appreciate this. I thought I could finish in forty minutes.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret to inform the hon. member that he has exhausted his time to speak.

[Mr. J. S. Taylor.]

Mr. LIONEL CHEVRIER (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, I desire to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) upon his excellent exposé of the country's financial affairs. It is indeed gratifying to see that a deficit of $77,000,000 has been reduced this year to approximately $13,000,000, and notwithstanding the predictions of the minister I hope next year will see the balancing of this country's budget.

The year 1937, Mr. Speaker, will go down in the history of this country as Canada's year. It was a year of substantial and definite progress in every field of productive activity; and notwithstanding difficulties both internal and external, the country made rapid strides along the road to prosperity. Agriculture, in spite of the drought which reduced the harvest in the west, on the whole was more profitable, and the buying power of those engaged in agriculture was increased. Mining development and production reached a new high level during the year. The wood industries were active, and it is gratifying to note that the value of the tourist traffic to this country rose to the figure of $200,000,000, very nearly equalling the 1929 record. The external trade of the dominion reached heights which had not been heard of for many years, and which compared favourably with the peak year in this country, 1929. Much of our industrial and trade activity was due in part to rearmament in Great Britain and also to the reciprocal arrangement made with the United States which, until the last months of 1937, operated strongly in our favour.

These rapid strides along the road to prosperity and recovery were rather suddenly arrested, and the picture to which I have referred was changed overnight, as it were. Suddenly we found ourselves in the midst of a recession. Gradually our trade with the United States began to fall off. Our neighbours, who had been buying from us in large quantities, ceased to purchase the commodities which we were anxious to sell. The causes of this sudden cessation of purchasing are manifold. The fear of war; the accumulation of foreign capital in Canada and the United States; the disputes between capital and labour, and the concentration of wealth and power in the hands of a few, all contributed to the present situation. The recession in the United States began some time during the summer of 1937, and because of our intimate relations with our neighbour to the south, soon afterwards we began to feel the effects of that change. But let me say, sir, that this government took what I believe to be adequate and immediate steps to meet that oncoming recession. It at once brought down legislation providing for a works program. It caused to be passed the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act, by which $30,000,000 was made available to municipalities in this country for self-liquidating projects. It then brought forward for the consideration of this house the National Housing Act, which I believe will go a great distance in aiding this country towards recovery. This, sir, is truly a Liberal measure, and I believe it is by far the most important statute that has been brought down in this house by this or any other government looking to the solution of the problem of unemployment. By this measure municipalities, housing corporations and individuals will be able to borrow money in order to build low-cost homes. Then, in the budget resolutions, the minister removed the sales tax from building materials.

It is unfortunate that the proposed tripartite agreement between Canada, the United Kingdom and the United States should not have been completed in time to be included in the budget resolutions. It can be readily seen, however, that an agreement so far-reaching and so wide in effect could not be negotiated without a great deal of time and consideration. It is to be hoped, however, that the government will be able to conclude these negotiations before the year is out.

If I may, Mr. Speaker, I want to refer to another proposed agreement between Canada and the United States, having to do with the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway. The draft treaty, prepared at the instance of the United States government, was tabled in this house a short time ago. At this juncture, since the international commission has not been set up, I do not wish to declare myself either in favour of or against the proposal, but I should like to make a few brief observations in connection therewith.

The scheme of developing the St. Lawrence waterway is by no means a new one. As far back as I can remember it has been a topic of great interest in the community whence I come. Twenty-five years ago this question was debated and talked about a very great deal in and about the community of Cornwall. It was then said that some day the Long Sault rapids, which lie in the international rapids section, would be developed, and that they would generate electricity to such an extent that Cornwall and the surrounding country would, in time to come, be one of the greatest manufacturing centres in Canada. The hope was then expressed that we might have an entirely Canadian scheme, a scheme entirely within Canadian territory; and while that aspect is still possible so far as the navigation end of the problem is concerned, it is quite impossible as far as the power aspect is concerned, because the power lies in the international rapids section, and that power cannot be developed without the consent of our United States neighbours. Engineers now affirm that it would be impracticable and unsound to canalize the St. Lawrence for navigation purposes only, and of course as I said a moment ago the power could not be developed unless we obtained the permission or consent of the United States of America.

The project, which at one time seemed to be a far-away dream, to-day is closer to realization than ever before. In my humble opinion, it is only a question of time before this scheme will be an accomplished fact, and when it is completed it will have the effect of making the area which lies around the lower end of the international rapids section one of the greatest industrial centres of this country.

The proposed new treaty would provide a two thousand mile channel linking the heart of the continent of North America at the head of the great lakes, to the Atlantic ocean. It would further provide a twenty-seven foot waterway from lake Superior to the sea. At present the channel is approximately twenty-two feet deep from the head of the lakes to Kingston, fourteen feet deep from Kingston to Montreal and thirty-five feet deep from Montreal to the sea. The international section, which extends from Cornwall to Kingston, is 115 miles long, and the whole of the scheme has practically been completed, save that part which lies in the international section.

The canals in the vicinity of Cornwall are only fourteen feet in depth, and those in the vicinity of Montreal are somewhat deeper. Towards the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway system this country has already spent $220,000,000, and of this amount over half, namely $131,000,000, has been spent in the development of the Welland ship canal at the Niagara peninsula. That canal is from twenty-two to twenty-five feet in depth. We have spent $23,000,000 in deepening the canals from Cornwall to Kingston, and $27,000,000 in deepening those from Cornwall to Montreal.

The other aspect of the project, which is by far the more important, namely the power development, is one which deserves consideration. The estimated potential power capacity of the whole scheme is 6,500,000 horse power, and of this amount 2,200,000 horse power lies in the international section. The United States is very anxious to develop its share of that power, namely 1,100,000 horse power, at Cornwall, and proposes that both countries enter into an agreement to canalize the St. Lawrence river and at the same time develop the power. The scheme of course offers many advantages, but one has to admit some disadvantages as well.

As I said at the outset, it would be folly for me or for any other member of the house to give an opinion upon the scheme before the international joint commission referred to in the treaty has been set up, and before that commission has given us details, first, with respect to the cost of the scheme so far as Canada is concerned and, second, with respect to the territorial and legal rights of this country in the project, and third with respect to the apportionment of work in the international section.

The draft treaty is far from clear as to the amount of money which will be spent for Canadian materials and as to the amount of work which would be given to Canadian workmen. It strikes me that great care will have to be taken that in the international section, where the works are to be carried on, even though they may be carried on in United States territory, Canadians should be given an equal chance with Americans to sell their products and to offer their labour. Otherwise there might be very great opposition to the scheme, from a Canadian standpoint.

So far as the treaty of 1932 is concerned, there is another point I would like to bring to the attention of the house, namely, that this treaty—and the plans so indicate—changes the location of the present canal and places it entirely within United States territory. That from an engineering standpoint is, I understand, to be the proper place in which it should be. However, I warn the international joint commission, when it is set up, that great care will have to be taken with reference to the location of this canal, because the canal has always been in Canadian territory. It has been used by Americans, and Canadians as well, in Canadian territory, and in my humble opinion it would be a serious matter to displace it unless some very sound reason existed therefor.

With the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway there is intimately connected the agricultural life of this country, because if the scheme is completed, unquestionably agriculture stands to benefit. There is, too, another element which enters into the picture, namely, the fact that the development of power will again bring into the urban centres large numbers of people from the farms. This country will have to decide whether it has not gone too far industrially, and whether it would not be better to assist municipalities to get their citizens or their ratepayers back on the farm, rather than to develop large blocks of power which will create new industries and bring large numbers of people from the country to urban centres. I leave this subject without saying more. I was anxious to make these observations which, I feel, are well taken, and which are perhaps premature. I was anxious to make them because this is a project of vast importance, and one which, were it to be completed, would affect the whole economic structure of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, we are living in very difficult times. In the last quarter of a century many events have come to pass, and many phenomena have occurred. The turmoil of war, the fall of governments through revolutions, the advent of totalitarian states and dictatorships—all of these things have contributed towards the fall of the old order. These phenomena, unexpected as they were, have taken place in a very short period of time. Old boundary lines have been wiped out. Powerful dynasties have fallen, and empires have been divided up among nations. New governments have arisen, and new states have been set up. We in this country have not escaped the influence of these new ideas and new tendencies. And while we are many miles away from dictatorships and totalitarianism, we have within our country elements which would set up these forms of government.

The ability of democratic and parliamentary institutions to survive depends primarily upon whether or not economic depressions can be overcome within the limits of these institutions. Under dictatorships people will endure conditions which, if they existed under parliamentary or democratic institutions, would ensure the overthrow of such institutions in a very short time.

The year 1937 marked just twenty years since the advent of the first totalitarian state in Russia, through the October revolution. The most distinctive feature developed by that totalitarian state unquestionably has been the terror. This of course applies in part to the other totalitarian states, such as Germany and Italy. Terror is the only instrument sufficiently powerful to enable the attainment of the goal of totality. The best known feature of terrorism in Russia has been the periodic hearing of mass trials. Inevitably the crime with which the accused is charged is treason, and very often the form varies, from blowing up bridges to plotting military intervention. The evidence offered consists almost exclusively of the incriminating confessions of the accused.

There has never been a case on record of a man failing to admit the crime with which he was accused. It is clear that the trials were never held for the purpose of deciding the guilt or innocence of prisoners. Clearly they were public demonstrations intended to create definite impressions upon the minds of the people. If there had been failure to increase coal production; if there had been severe food shortages; or, again, if peasant insurrections were about to take place, then a mass trial was likely to be staged. The first object of the mass trial was to strike fear into the hearts of all those who might be harbouring disloyal intentions; the second was to divert public opinion from public misfortune, and the third was to create the opinion that effective action had been taken to prevent the recurrence of the undesirable event or development.

The form of totalitarianism in Germany is very similar to that which exists in Russia. There is not a great deal of difference between bolshevism on the one hand and national socialism on the other. The tendency in Germany is to eradicate from the minds and hearts of the people the very essence of religion. Conditions in Italy are perhaps not as bad, but the dictator there possesses the same powers and he can make use of the terror if he wills.

I point to these conditions simply to show that while conditions in Canada may be difficult, they do not begin to compare with those that exist under totalitarian governments. The only way in which we can keep these new and false and untried ideas from our own country will be by a more equitable distribution of wealth, by bettering the conditions of the masses, of those who suffer and those who toil, and by bringing down legislation similar to that which was brought down in this house in the last month or so. By doing this, we shall prove to the Canadian people that peace, order and happiness can still be found within parliamentary and democratic institutions.

Mr. H. A. McKENZIE (Lambton-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate with a good deal of temerity, knowing as I do that I am speaking in the presence of many old parliamentarians who have been in this house for many years and who have served their constituents faithfully and well and have contributed much to the progress of the country. However, I shall try to be brief in my remarks. I have taken up very little of the time of the house, keeping in mind what the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) said during the first session of this parliament, that if members of the House of Commons studied their problems more and talked less we would make much better progress. If each of the 245 members talked as often and as long as some do, this session would last not for four or five months but for four or five years.

There is nothing that has a greater effect on the life, prosperity and progress of Canada than the budget, and the present budget is no exception to the rule. I am sorry the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is not in his seat to-night, and I am sure it is the wish of every hon. member that he have a speedy recovery and be soon restored to health. I wish to congratulate him upon the clear and comprehensive manner in which he presented the budget. It has inspired us with new confidence and hope, and it showed us the great grasp he has of the economic problems that confront our country. However, one of the great hindrances to recovery is our immense public debt with its resulting tax burden that rests particularly heavily on our farmers and other primary producers.

My constituency of Lambton-Kent, formerly Lambton East, has the distinction of being one of the few counties or municipalities in this dominion with no debenture debt. Long ago we adopted the policy of balancing our budget and living within our income. If other municipalities had done the same, they would not be in the financial difficulties in which they find themselves to-day. As Canada is largely an agricultural country, the problems of the farmer are to our minds the most important questions before the Canadian people to-day. Their problems are important in more ways than one, considering the fact that nearly fifty per cent of the population of Canada reside either in rural parts or in small incorporated villages directly dependent upon the prosperity of the farmer. Thirty per cent of Canadian production is agricultural. It forms the basis of our export trade and is the lifeblood of our railways. In brief, the commercial and industrial existence of our country depends upon the primary producers. Unless the prosperity of the nation is reflected on the man who tills the soil, we cannot consider we have solved the problem of making Canada a land of prosperous, happy and contented people.

As long as the capitalistic system holds out; as long as the motive for doing business is the profit motive, we shall never be economically sound unless the profits of the primary producers are much greater than they are to-day. But I do not believe that we shall ever see a full measure of happiness in this or any other country until the great masses of the people receive a greater share of the wealth. I know the terror of the workingman's life. It is not so much the hourly wage; it is not so much the number of hours in a day that must be worked, the discouraging feature is the fact that a man has to live in constant uncertainty as to continuous employment. If the workingman were assured of fifty-two weeks of employment in every year, we would have a much more contented labour. Steady employment would give labour a greater buying power and thus provide a better home market.

That is all very good, but I am afraid we have the cart before the horse. Once a farmer is able to step into the buying market, much of our unemployment will take care of itself. We all know that the farmer is the greatest buyer we have of a large variety of goods. He needs manufactured goods in enormous quantities; he requires the services of hundreds of hired men and women, but he must have the necessary money or purchasing power. The removal of the sales tax on building materials will be of special significance to the farmer and will bring fresh hope to him. Any one who drives through our rural districts must be impressed with the need of farm building repairs. If there is any one in Canada who deserves a better home and modern improvements, it is the farmer. I believe he will take advantage of this budget to the extent that his resources will permit. The removal of the tax on harness and harness parts will also help.

Unemployment insurance has little to offer to the producers in Canada's great natural industries, such as fisheries and agriculture, for they will be taxed along with the wage earners to provide the state's contribution to the unemployment fund. Minimum hours of labour are unlikely to be adopted by the farmers. With the high cost of manufactured goods and the comparatively low price he receives for his products, the farmer must work even longer hours. In 1920 a total of 110 bushels of wheat would buy a binder; at the present time it would take almost 400 bushels to purchase a similar machine. In order to produce this amount of wheat he would have to work, not eight hours a day, but eight hours in the forenoon and eight hours in the afternoon. Agriculture must be elevated to a place where the farmer will have faith and confidence in his calling as a means of livelihood. It seems to me that the people of this country are altogether too ready to forget the basic importance of this industry, and the result is that the farmer is underpaid for his time and labour. We must remedy this by raising the scale of wages of those who work the land to a point in keeping with other classes, so that the rewards of capital invested in agriculture will compare favourably with the returns from other forms of investment.

I should like to say a word here for the sugar-beet farmers in my riding. These farmers have been growing sugar beets successfully since 1902, when the first factory was built at Wallaceburg. This industry produces around fifteen or twenty per cent of the total sugar consumed in Canada. The total acreage planted last year was around 50,000 acres with a total production of over 120,000,000 pounds of sugar valued at over $5,000,000. Almost thirty per cent of this acreage was taken care of by individual farmers and their families, and the rest was handled by contract labour. In the troublesome times during the last few years the farmer has been among the first to adjust himself to changed conditions, but the beet farmer has found it difficult to make things pay with sugar selling at $4.30 retail without the sales tax. The wholesale list price at Montreal is $3.90, and the refiners pay a field price of $5.50 per ton for beets. With normal prices and conditions this industry has possibilities. If Canada produced fifty per cent of her own consumption of sugar, we would require 20,000 workers, apart from office employees, and there would be distributed annually about $20,000,000. This would take care of many of our unemployed. I urge the government to help this industry by removing all or at least half the sales tax on beet sugar. The government tax of one cent per pound on sugar means a tax of approximately $30 per acre, which is much more than the farmer makes.

In this connection I might say that the economic life of this country is comparatively simple. Our primary industries produce, and the rest of us live by exchanging our goods and services for the products of the primary producer. I am not overlooking the importance of the home market, but we must not forget that in order to consume the wheat which we can produce in a normal year we would require a population of 30,000,000 or more people. The same might be said in regard to beef and hogs.

We have great natural resources, and I wonder if our immigration laws are not too strict. For the fiscal year ending last March our total immigration was 15,645. Of that number only 2,264 came from the British isles, 5,113 from the United States of America, and 4,464 from other parts of the world. Included in that number were 1,300 farmers and 339 of the labouring class.

In the southern part of my riding, where they specialize in certain types of farming such as the growing of sugar beets, tobacco, corn, onions and tomatoes, there is usually a distinct shortage of the right type of farm labour, and I would suggest that a selective and less restrictive immigration policy be adopted. This class of immigrant not only enhances farm values but actually creates more work, and they are consumers as well.

Walter C. Cain, deputy minister of lands and forests for Ontario, in answer to a query recently by the Rowell commission, reported that in northern Ontario there were approximately 6,000,000 acres of accessible land capable of agricultural development, but he did not see the likelihood of any rapid development taking place unless immigration bars were lowered. Consequently, if we doubled our population, our market problem would be easier.

I am not going to take up the time of the house regarding the great burden of debt, but it is interesting to note that in 1878, when Sir John A. Macdonald succeeded the Hon. Alexander Mackenzie as premier, the total expenditure of the federal government for all purposes was a little over $30,000,000 a year. Likewise, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier was in office in 1896, the total expenditure was $44,000,000. Now we are budgeting for an expenditure of over $500,000,000 a year.

In connection with government expenditures, I am informed that seventy-five per cent or the dominion's share of the old age pensions is $28,653,000, and the total cost under the Department of Pensions and National Health for the last fiscal year, including the cost of administration and hospitalization, is $55,570,945, or $11,000,000 more than the total expenditure for all purposes forty-three years ago. Mr. Speaker, these are stupendous figures, and the money must all come out of the taxpayers of this dominion. I am not finding fault with this expenditure but just wish to show some of our added costs.

My plea is that the government in all trade treaties and legislation should do everything possible to find markets, and profitable markets, for the primary products of Canada.

Next to that, cattle raising is probably the most important section of the agricultural industry in this country, and our system of marketing beef cattle is definitely bad. In the packing plants at Toronto and elsewhere there is little or no competition among the buyers, with the result that with a fairly large supply of cattle the buyers set their own price and the farmers can take it or leave it. In this way the farmers are annually deprived of thousands of dollars to which they are justly entitled. I am advocating that parliament establish a select standing committee of this house to inquire into the cattle marketing problem, and to study ways and means of providing the British market with a steady supply of beef so that the producers will receive a square deal and the best prices obtainable.

We should not forget that the whole structure of our economic system rests upon the shoulders of those who till the soil or otherwise begin the process of using the natural wealth of our primary industries for the benefit of humanity. Let us beware lest we place on the shoulders of those who support our economic life a burden beyond their ability to bear.

However, our recovery in Canada since 1929 far outruns that of the United States. A chart recently published by the national industrial conference board of the United States, a non-political organization, and considered most reliable, shows that the downward trend from 1929 to 1933 almost paralleled the industrial decline in both countries, and the per capita debt of both countries was reduced by about five per cent; but since that period and to the end of 1937 industrial production has increased in Canada 4·8 per cent and declined in the United States 24·4 per cent. Employment in Canada, exclusive of agriculture, has increased 5·2 per cent but in the United States is down 6 per cent. While Canada's per capita debt has increased 22 per cent, that of the United States has increased 102 per cent, so that we are in much better shape than our neighbours to the south.

The government's decision to take over the Bank of Canada is meeting with general approval throughout the dominion. This step will undoubtedly strengthen parliament's control of national credit. The need of some reform of our present monetary system is apparent to many, and though many theories as to how this can best be brought about are in evidence to-day, it is certain that we cannot continue borrowing money to pay our debts and that a halt must be called in that direction.

Trade negotiations between the British Commonwealth of Nations and the United States are meeting with many difficulties, but we are in hopes that they will be successfully completed at an early date. The general feeling is that trade treaties of this type are greatly to be desired at this time, so that we may develop a united front against the inroads of economic nationalism; and, of course, reciprocal trade pacts are fair to all parties and are conducive to prosperity and increased foreign trade alike. However, the success of such agreements is dependent upon the closest cooperation of government, producers, and business organizations in general.

Surrounded as we are by dictatorships, our only hope is in cherishing democratic ideals; and now these principles seem to be confined to the English-speaking peoples. Our first duty is to the bulwark of democracy, the British Empire. In Canada, the forces for disintegration are stronger than they have been for fifty years, with a possibility of the country breaking up into a number of sovereign states. Until this tendency is arrested and until Canada can achieve the solidarity at which confederation aimed, we cannot hope for national prosperity and progress.

Let me conclude by saying that if Canada is to continue to make progress, it must be as a united nation. We Canadians have the greatest heritage in the world, and we must think in terms, not of what is in the best interests of this section or that section, but of what is in the best interests of Canada as a whole—and not only nationally, but internationally. So I call on my fellow members to forget party politics and work together in order that this most desired goal may be attained.

Mr. JOSEPH H. LECLERC (Shefford) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, as I am rising to address this house for the first time since I was elected, permit me to offer the remark that I now better understand the meaning of the word parliament as applied to this legislative assembly. No other term could so well convey to the people of this country that an enormous quantity of idle words are spoken in this chamber, contrary to the custom of commercial, financial and industrial establishments, which are none the worse for that, seeing that they provide the government with its major sources of revenue.

Mr. Speaker, permit me to say further that, had I the parliamentary experience essential to preside over the deliberations of this house, I would not accept that honour without securing reforms which would enable me to apply closure to the saviours of the country who would make each session last more than twelve months a year, if every hon. member were to abuse his privileges as much as they do. I dare say, Mr. Speaker, that the government bills would not be less effective were they passed more rapidly, so that sessions could be shortened by half, thus saving several hundred thousands of dollars of the public funds.

My remarks are not in the nature of criticisms against those representatives of the people who, without abusing their privileges, state the legitimate claims of their constituents. I am now in a better position to appreciate the heavy burden resting on the shoulders of statesmen, and I cannot entertain any doubt regarding the devotion to duty and the sincerity of purpose of the majority of the distinguished public men who, in turn, assume power in our country.

Owing to its geographical situation, and to the diversity of interests of the different provinces from one ocean to the other, Canada is perhaps one of the most difficult countries to govern. We have not only the fishermen's problems on the Atlantic coast and the miners' problems in the Yukon territory, but also the intermediate problems of the different provinces. Some of them are industrialized and they want a legitimate protection for their industries so that they may be in a position to pay reasonable wages to workers whose health is rapidly declining in plants so extremely mechanized. The agricultural provinces of western Canada, having but few industries, advocate the lowering or the abolition of protective tariffs.

I realize, sir, what tact, what judgment and what experience are necessary to conciliate those divergent interests and consolidate national unity.

I have not the least idea of criticizing those hon. members who put all their talent to the service of the people whom they represent in this house. We see, for instance, members from the Atlantic coast emulating members from the Pacific coast in order to call the attention of the government to the miserable condition of the fishermen. Every session, from beginning to end, members from western Canada spend their energy defending the cause of the wheat producers who, having known a great prosperity, now find themselves in a difficult situation, although they get the lion's share in the distribution of the favours granted by this house.

A foreigner, having read our Hansard for a number of years, would be under the impression that wheat producing is our only major agricultural industry, and the only one having suffered in recent years.

As the number of hon. members who are interested in dairying is limited, we are apt to forget how that industry has developed in every province of Canada.

I wish to devote this, my first speech in this house, to the dairy industry which is the most important in my constituency and in my province, and which is seldom discussed in this house, but which is nevertheless the greatest and most important agricultural industry in Canada. In order to show its importance, sir, let me quote a few figures. Although prices have been abnormally low for a long time, the annual value of its products during the last six or seven years still averaged the imposing figure of 200 million odd dollars.

The progress of the dairy industry has been going on steadily in every province of Canada. The number of farmers interested in that industry is 318,000, and 50,000 persons are employed in allied industries. If we add together the heads of families and their dependents working in all branches of that industry, we find that they represent nearly 17 per cent of the total population of the country. This is a very large proportion, possibly the largest, employed in a single industry in Canada.

There has been no decrease in the number of workers in the dairy industry during the last few years of economic depression. This is conclusive proof that this industry is the most stable in Canada, even though it does not receive the full consideration it deserves.

Notwithstanding the increase in prices for farm products during the last two years, for butter and cheese particularly, bringing new hope to the farmers, one cannot overlook the serious trouble the latter experienced from 1931 to 1935, when butter dropped as low as 15 and 16 cents a pound, the lowest level reached in more than fifty years, so much so that in certain sections of the country it was used as a lubricant.

The government of the time did not even think of fixing a minimum price for this product, though they were doing it for wheat and other grain. It was no doubt because no representations were being made on behalf of the dairy industry that such discrimination took place where one class benefited at the expense of another.

Mr. Speaker, in spite of the improved prices for dairy products, the total income of an able farmer is no higher than the annual wage of any factory worker.

Here is a summary of the income that may be derived from a good farm in the eastern townships, a farm where 20 cows can be kept. On the basis of the prevailing prices for the last two years, the average annual income from a cow is approximately $30, which means that the total income derived from the herd is only $600 a year. If we add to that another amount of $600 which a farmer can obtain from the sale of other farm products such as pork, beef, eggs, maple syrup, and so on, we have his gross income. Let us consider what the farmer has to pay for feed, fertilizer and so on, and what he has to pay for municipal and school taxes, insurance, maintenance of farm buildings, interest, and for the purchase of new farm machinery, the cost of all this being entirely out of proportion with the price he obtains for his farm products. It can thus be seen, Mr. Speaker, that he cannot make both ends meet, and that his farm cannot be successfully operated.

Besides, we must not forget that, in order to earn such a small income, the farmer, as well as his wife and children, must toil from sunrise to sunset every day of the week, including Sunday, for the forty-hour week and minimum salaries are unknown on the farm.

In farming communities, needy farmers are dealt with by municipal authorities with less consideration than is given to city indigents. In this connection, I may mention the fact that a farmer was forced to sell his herd of ten milk cows in order to pay for the hospital care of a member of his family.

Mr. Speaker, the plight of farmers is one of the most serious social problems of our times. Therein lies the true reason why people give up farming, considering that all members of the community have a right to entertain common aspirations. Can country people be prevented from yearning after simple comforts, and from being dazzled by their friends from the city who display an artificial luxury which is often bought on instalments. Some of them can see no future for themselves or for their children in farming. Many young country people look for work in the cities, where they replace old men who will eventually have to be cared for by the State.

Mr. Speaker, I do not think I overstated the plight of a great number of our farmers. In my opinion, it is useless to try to improve through artificial means, the diets which prevail in towns, if we fail to create normal life conditions for the tillers of the soil. We would even be doing a service to city workmen in putting a stop to that unceasing migration of families and young people from rural districts, through which the number of those who compete with city workmen is constantly growing.

Mr. Speaker, I fully grasp the difficulties which governments must face. They cannot subsidize all industries without falling into the excesses of socialism. However, I have never heard any good reason for fixing a minimum price for wheat, or for subsidizing production of that cereal in preference to any other branch of agriculture. We have had a commission to regulate the price of wheat, we have a permanent tariff board to protect the legitimate interests of industry. All those commissions have undoubtedly been useful but, in the economic machinery of this country, there are other branches of the farming industry which need assistance, especially the dairy industry. Whenever minimum prices are again set for wheat, we must demand the same consideration for the dairy industry.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring to the attention of this house a new problem which faces the dairy industry. I refer to the vegetable oils imported into Canada for the last few years, coconut, cottonseed, palm, and peanut oils. These oils are refined and made comestible; a large quantity is employed in the production of shortening, salad oils, etc. The inedible oils are used in the manufacture of soap, paint, varnish, lubricants, etc. It is obvious that shortening is displacing to a certain extent the natural lard of Canada even among the farming people. Statistics show that the production of lard is on the decrease in Canada on account of the fact that bacon pork does not give as much lard as the fat pork produced in the past. In the last few years we have heard a good deal of recrimination on account of the importation of vegetable oils. It is rather difficult to estimate exactly the harm done to the dairy industry by those importations because the statistics show that the consumption of butter for 1937 increased by 10,000,000 pounds over that of 1936, and by 100,000,000 pounds over that of 1925. This new problem must not be overlooked if we want to prevent the refined product of foreign countries, highly advertised by the large packing companies, to jeopardize the future of our dairy industry.

Mr. Speaker, one of the farmer's most serious problems is undoubtedly the disequilibrium between the prices of agricultural products and those of manufactured goods. Certainly, I am in favour of social laws ensuring reasonable wages and a reasonable standard of living to the factory worker. But, unfortunately, the farmer now feels the incidence of such laws, having no reasonable wage assured to him, nor a minimum price fixed for his products. Born on a farm, I am acquainted with the work and drudgery of a farmer's life. Having carried on dairy farming all my life, I am perhaps in a better position than others to know the difficulties and sacrifices which the farmers have had to undergo for several years past.

I pay respectful homage to the organizations of courageous farm women of my constituency and my province. They are to be admired for their helpful cooperation and the moral encouragement they are giving to agricultural undertakings. I should be sorry if I failed to mention the clubs of young farmers of my constituency, for which I entertain great hopes. By their practical studies they are becoming, I am convinced, model farmers who will, in their respective centres, contribute to the spreading of the best methods of farming which will ensure the prosperity of our rural districts.

As to the advantages of cooperation, I take pleasure in quoting a few paragraphs of the collective pastoral letter of the bishops of the province of Quebec on the rural problem in relation to the social doctrine of the church and on the dangers which threaten our rural population.

Shall we first venture to state that rural life remains the normal condition of the masses? In a century when all kinds of attractions and needs have, in most countries, uprooted the rural populations to concentrate them in the cities, we should not, it would seem, seek to return to their fields so many improvised townsmen, nor even retain on the land those who are still there. Doubtless, and we readily admit it, rural life can no longer be conceived with the same remoteness and hardships which it formerly offered to the peasants who are entitled as much as anybody else to the benefits of modern science and invention. The fact nevertheless remains that, in spite of the development of manufacturing processes, the fundamental industry will always consist in drawing from the land the daily bread of mankind.

We could at this point paint a happy picture of rural life and describe all its advantages for the individual, the family and society. But, it must be admitted, this happpiness is not common; unless we succeed in placing rural economy on a more stable basis, it will probably vanish altogether. The products which the farmer offers for sale do not bring prices equal to those of the products of industry. And the economic recovery which is gradually manifesting itself in the wages paid to industrial workers is not so apparent in the domain of farming.

The years of depression, from the effects of which the rural districts are recovering more slowly than the cities, have brought about a general distaste for farm work—more particularly among the youth of the country who are more and more attracted by other occupations, seemingly more remunerative, in factories, mines and lumber camps. Tired of the daily complaints of their parents who have difficulty in making ends meet, these young men from the country seek elsewhere employment which they consider more remunerative.

Other causes, however, have accentuated this distaste. A more or less conscious opinion exists among most people that farming is an occupation to which one should resign oneself only as a last resort; that with a modicum of schooling, one should hasten to leave the plough, and that, in order to progress in life, one should settle in the village at least, if not in the city, however lowly the work to be found there. On the other hand, many city people, especially among those whose prosperity is of recent date, are fond of displaying in the village of their birth a sham and superficial luxury and using patronizing airs towards the intimidated countryman.

Cooperative societies protect their members against their own temptations and against the unfair competition of others. Therefore, one of the most pressing things to teach to the farmer is the pecuniary profit he will derive, in addition to peace of conscience, from co-operating with his fellow-farmers instead of working in an underhand way. In fact, the isolated family is exposed to routine methods of farming and is unable to defend itself easily against costly middlemen in the purchase of farm implements and other requirements.

Mr. Speaker, I am glad to bring my full support to these wise teachings.

It was established during the inquiry on the prices of farm implements that the marketing and distribution of farm implements increase the selling price to the farmers by 25 to 40 per cent. Then why not buy and sell through cooperative organizations? Such organizations would have not hundreds, but thousands of members. I am convinced that they would tend greatly to eliminate the middleman in the selling of farm products and the buying of farm implements.

Mr. Speaker, I was glad to hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) say that he is establishing machinery for better advertising of our farm products in the United Kingdom. I personally noticed that New Zealand keeps its products well to the fore in the London markets. In fact, what strikes you most in London is the words "New Zealand butter—New Zealand cheese—" in large letters on the busses.

Therefore, I congratulate the Minister of Agriculture for his publicity campaign in regard to our products. I urge the house to give serious consideration to my remarks. To bring prosperity back to agriculture is to give their purchasing power back to the farmers, and it is the safest way to solve Canada's economic and agricultural problem.

Mr. Speaker, before concluding may I quote the following words from Honore Mercier:

> Agriculture, specially in the province of Quebec, is at the basis of public prosperity. Rivers and streams could be turned from their course, artificial works could, for a time, give satisfactory results, but it would be foolish to rely for the future on any other basis than that which agriculture offers us.

Mr. L. D. TREMBLAY (Dorchester): Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to take part in this debate, but inspiration came to me this afternoon while listening to my hon. friend from Matapedia-Matane (Mr. Lapointe). I congratulate him warmly for having raised certain matters worthy of consideration and for having pointed out certain anomalies, to say the least, in the administration of the Canadian National Railways. These anomalies will no doubt be attended to by the minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). I took note of the statement of my hon. friend from Matapedia-Matane. I do not know if I have his exact words, but here it is as I took it:

> It is a rather extraordinary thing that the stations situated between La Reine and Fitzpatrick and between Noranda and Taschereau, covering a distance of 411 miles, all in Quebec province, are under the jurisdiction of an Ontario superintendent.

The hon. member also pointed out this other anomaly:

> The same situation exists on the Gaspé Coast and from Matapedia to Rivière du Loup, a stretch of 366 miles, where a New Brunswick superintendent is in charge.

I do not know if that is evidence of bad faith. Such a situation would at least call for an explanation. As to freight cars going from Lake St. John to the neighbouring province or, worse still, to Western Canada, for repairs, whereas such work could be done in the province of Quebec, it seems to me that we have grounds for complaint, and I say once again that my hon. friend from Matapedia-Matane deserves congratulations for having called the attention of the house to those matters.

My hon. friend also spoke against the amalgamation of our two railways, and he has my complete approval.

He certainly voiced public sentiment in the Province of Quebec when he stated that we opposed amalgamation of the two Canadian systems.

I have carefully read the evidence given in this connection by Mr. Hungerford and I believe that we must inevitably come to the same conclusion after considering the reasons he offers against an amalgamation of the two railways. Prospects of substantial economies through the unification of our two railways were dangled before our eyes, but the evidence given by Mr. Hungerford shows, I believe, that this is but a bait. With your permission, I would like to quote a few extracts from the report. He states, for instance:

> To sum up my position with regard to the asserted economies from unification or amalgamation, it is my judgment that they are largely unrealizable. Railway savings purchased at the expense of the development of Canada and of a wide disturbance in the already disturbed labour and material markets of the country would be too dearly obtained. The country instead of being better off would be worse off. Yet it is only to the extent that a program of drastic reduction in expenses could be achieved that the country would be warranted in inviting the perils of monopoly and of the great difficulties which I foresee in the type of management of the joint enterprise which is now proposed.

And a little farther on in the report, Mr. Hungerford states that savings could be realized through cooperation, willingly given or enforced, and his suggestions, as I see them, are practical ones. He suggests, among other things:

Most of the economies which are realizable in a practical sense, in that they relate to economies which can really be made effective without unduly impairing the public interest, will be found upon examination to be obtainable under the principle of cooperation and the country need not incur all of the unknown perils of unification in order to obtain these economies.

I am satisfied that he is perfectly correct. Of course, if one takes a different viewpoint, if those who favour a monopoly of railways in this country give consideration only to eventual profits or dividends, I can readily understand their zeal in promoting unification of the two railway systems. But as far as we are concerned, representing as we do the interests of the people and intending to fulfill our duty, we are overwhelmingly opposed to unification.

A distinguished newspaperman from Quebec city, who does not always share our views, but who holds good ones often enough, Mr. Eugène L'Heureux, of L'Action Catholique, made the following statement in an editorial dated June 17:

The Hungerford plan seems to us sounder, broader and in closer harmony with the real interests of Canada than the other.

The other is the plan put forward by the promoters of unification or, in other words, of monopoly.

We would be mistaken in taking the view that this railway problem is merely a budget matter. The railways are not built for their own benefit, but for that of the nation. Such is the reason why we cannot properly appreciate their financial statement save in the light of their contribution not only to the economic but also to the general progress of the country. If we must shoulder a twenty-five million annual railway deficit, still if they make the development of the country possible as well as that of every section of it, then we may find compensation for it many times over.

In the new settlements, for instance, the railways generally do not earn enough to cover their operating expenses. But shall it be said that just because the railways have a deficit in those settlements, settlers and new settlements must be deprived of the advantages of a railway? Such is not my opinion. That is a viewpoint which the promoters of amalgamation do not take into account at all, but which we must remember nevertheless.

There is another point raised by Mr. Hungerford in his report, and we understand better why the Canadian National Railways have been suffering such large deficits. Let us take the period from 1927 to 1930. Mr. Hungerford has this to say about that period:

[Mr. Tremblay.]

The Canadian National Railways, from the onset of the depression in the fall of 1929 until the middle of 1930, pursued a policy of maintaining at work on the property all its staff for which legitimate employment could be found, rather than taking the drastic step of wholesale dismissals, closing down of shops, etc. This policy, whether well-founded or not, was publicly announced and supported in parliament.

And I say that parliament was perfectly justified in doing so and that it was simply discharging its duty. As regards this railway problem, the possible income or profits of the railway at the end of the year is not the only thing to be considered. Had we considered the question otherwise, what real economies could we have realized? Thousands of men would have been added to those already unemployed, and this house would have been called upon to vote large sums of money to assist those discharged by the Canadian National Railways.

That is the reason why I am definitely opposed to unification or monopoly. I would leave it to Mr. Hungerford whose statement was commented upon by a Quebec newspaper. He says:

I maintain that monopoly is no inducement to good management. I believe it involves a risk of demoralization in the business, a loss of initiative and enthusiasm, a lack of sympathetic understanding between the officers and the staff, between the management and the public.

Moreover, I am not in favour of a railway monopoly in Canada. I sincerely believe that it would be highly detrimental to the public and that it would be contrary to the course we intended to follow when we established the Canadian railways, which aimed at developing new districts impossible of access until those lines were built up.

I will not labour the point but I wanted to say to the house that any scheme of unification or monopolization is one that should be seriously examined.

I come to the conclusion, as Mr. Hungerford states, that if we were to set up a commission composed of a representative of the Canadian National Railways, a representative of the Canadian Pacific Railway and a representative of the government cooperating with a view to improving services in the various parts of the country and to eliminating duplication in some others, we could effect large savings without any prejudice to the people of Canada.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is another question on which I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe). I have here the official report of the Royal Commission on Anthracite Coal and I read it from beginning to end. For some time now I have requested the National Harbours Board to try to utilize the space called "public wharf" in the Quebec harbour. Last year, a certain space was put at the disposal of the public for coal importations but, as it was a public place to which anyone had access, it was clear that the period of time in which it could be used was limited. The National Harbours Board issued a regulation dealing with the use of this public wharf and it was no surprise to me that they set a time limit of three weeks in case others might claim the same privileges. I brought to the attention of the National Harbours Board the fact that the regulation under which that public wharf could be used during that period would freeze-out all possible competitors of the coal monopoly in Quebec. Thus was removed in Quebec all serious competition against the trust of the Webster group which is described as such by the Tory report. Limiting to three weeks the period of time during which a coal importer could use this public wharf would have the effect of eliminating all competition.

The Minister of Transport had to answer a few questions I asked him about the use of that public wharf. I had anticipated the situation and I hope that action will be taken with a view to remedying it. The National Harbours Board has already received communications wherein the request is made that responsible organizations, financially sound, be permitted to organize for the importation of coal, which they are not allowed to do at the present time. For instance, who would care, with this regulation allowing the wharf to be used for three weeks only, to incur the cost of setting up machinery for unloading and handling coal? They have to use the machinery of their competitors, the powerful Webster concern operating under the name of St. Lawrence Stevedoring Company.

The commissioner appointed by the honourable the Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) had this to say about the St. Lawrence Stevedoring Company, as shown on page 79 of his report:

> Your commission believes it is justified in calling special attention to the profits of the St. Lawrence Stevedoring Company. This company has practically no commercial risks; it does not buy or sell coal; it merely unloads, prepares and delivers coal for the companies of the Webster group and, in addition, unloads or transhipps coal and small quantities of other commodities for other occasional customers.

And I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to take notice of the following statement made by the Commissioner:

> The St. Lawrence Stevedoring Company has outstanding $200,000 of fully paid capital stock; its permanent assets are valued at $146,000; its accounts receivable (due almost entirely from the British Coal Corporation)—

As every one knows, that means again the Webster group.

> —are $470,000, its cash on hand $60,000. In the three years 1933, 1934 and 1935, its net profits were $360,000, $391,000 and $250,000; a total of over $1,000,000, or an average of 167 per cent per annum on its paid-up capital stock. In other words, the rates it charges its own associated companies are grossly out of proportion to its cost of operation and the responsibility it assumes.

To that company the Webster group's competitors will have to apply as regards the handling of the coal imported by them. Should they ever dare to compete with that all powerful group, I feel sure that, under such unfavourable conditions, they would not remain long in business.

I wished to bring these matters to the attention of the house. Knowing as I do the ability and patriotism of the Minister of Transport, whom I greatly esteem and trust, I am convinced that he will give to my remarks his most sympathetic consideration. I wish to thank him in advance and I hope that before long we, in Quebec, will be afforded an opportunity of witnessing genuine competition in the importation of fuel.

I could quote another paragraph from Mr. Tory's report,—paragraph 21, on page 117:

> Retailers' gross margins have also generally declined since 1930. In the city of Ottawa, however, the retailers' margins are much higher than in Quebec, Montreal or Toronto. In Quebec city, where the Canadian Import Company has a complete monopoly of the wholesale trade, the wholesale price is $1 higher than in Montreal, while the margin for the retail dealer is exceedingly narrow.

The report of this royal commission should be read by every one. It should be circulated, in order that the public may be made aware of the methods used by their exploiters. The word is not too strong. Every page of this report reveals the coal trust's desire constantly to extend its tentacles and to make exorbitant profits. I ask the minister to take the measures required to give Quebec the benefit of competition in the matter of fuel.

I wish to add a word of appreciation of the general policies enunciated in the budget speech. The general situation is extremely encouraging and we have reason not only to feel proud of the present government, but also to view the future with the greatest optimism.

Mr. H. B. McKINNON (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to congratulate the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) upon the financial showing for the fiscal year 1937-38, the deficit of $13,775,000 being substantially less than the minister had thought it safe to predict a year ago, and also substantially less than when we headed into the depression eight years ago. The remarkable thing about this financial showing is that it comes at a period when world economic conditions are receding and also at a time when Canada has been hard hit through having a series of droughts in the western wheat fields.

As the member for Kenora-Rainy River, which district is the bottle-neck through which western grain moving to the east must pass, I am much gratified over the present prospect of a western crop this year. With both transcontinental rail lines passing through the riding, the railroad industry is of great importance to the district. The people of the district will rejoice with the farmers of the west over crop prospects for three reasons: First, as a relief to the farmers themselves after a series of heart-breaking experiences; second, because of the general improvement that will follow throughout Canada from a more prosperous west and, third, because of the improvement in the railroad industry and what this will mean to the employees.

In his budget speech the Minister of Finance drew a sharp distinction between pump priming and government assistance to the building construction industry, where such assistance is aimed at stimulating private endeavour. This distinction is a most proper one. The steps which the government is proposing to parliament in the form of advancing money for municipal works construction, the broadening of the scheme of loans for private housing construction and greater assistance to low rental housing schemes are all in the proper direction. I would suggest that dominion participation in these schemes be such that in addition to careful administration of the dominion end of these projects the operation of the various acts be thoroughly and constantly watched and studied so that each year the federal government may be advised what further steps should be taken, what additional measures should be applied and what changes should be made in order that parliament may be asked to pass such further legislation or amendments to existing legislation as are needed better to stimulate construction.

Though admittedly the volume of employment is better throughout Canada than a year ago, and considerably better than two or three years ago, it so happens that Kenora-Rainy River is one of the few ridings in which conditions are not as good as they were last year. It would seem that this riding is affected by the condition of every one of the industries which have experienced recessions as compared with a year ago. Because of the western crop situation, railroading and flour milling in the district are depressed. Conditions in the United States have had an adverse effect upon the lumbering and pulp and paper industries. There are no opportunities for alternative employment in northwestern Ontario such as exist in other districts. This district has only a few industries, and in bad times it must rely on governmental assistance, though of course in good times this is not the case.

With reference to the general subject of employment, may I say I feel that such a step as the creation of the national employment commission was a move in the right direction. My only criticism is that there should be such a body, possibly in a different form, more or less permanent in character in order constantly to study Canada's employment needs and problems. The Minister of Labour (Mr. Rogers) promised the appointment of a committee to carry on some of the work begun by the national employment commission. I express the hope that this matter will receive early attention and that the government will set up some competent board of permanent advisers to consider the all-important matter of employment.

I heartily approve the policy of the government in continuing the Canadian National Railways as a separate enterprise. It is quite true that the railway deficit is serious, but that is the price we must pay for the undue optimism of years ago in connection with railways and also because of our great distances. This deficit, which should be reduced when conditions warrant, would have to be paid in some form or another by the people of Canada regardless of what shift there may occur in the management of the railways.

The budget contains an exemption from income tax of lump sum payments into pension schemes by employers. This is a step in the right direction. Employers and employees should receive every encouragement to build up pension funds for the protection of the employees, along similar lines to the civil service pension fund. In this way employees will be taken care of in old age, they will be able to maintain their self-respect and they will not become public charges. The government might very well watch this pension scheme business in order to discover whether there is not some other way in which employers and employees can be encouraged to enter into such scheme.

As with pensions, so with the lifting of the sales tax on building materials. This should be quite a help to the workers through giving assistance to the building industry. I suggest a constant study of building and construction in order to devise ways and means of aiding that basic industry. This principle of easy taxes to encourage building should receive particular attention.

If the experience of the last several years has taught us anything, it has taught us the need of unemployment insurance. Prolonged unemployment and heavy relief costs without a dollar saved to meet the situation at its beginning should prove the need of some such provision as unemployment insurance if we are going to care properly for our population. I realize that the scope of the dominion is limited in this field, but the scheme should be national in order to be effective. I hope the dominion government will pursue to a conclusion the present policy of seeking provincial agreement to a dominion scheme. In no event should the utmost necessity be lost from sight. Should the negotiations with the provinces not yield a final conclusion within a reasonable time, then the dominion government should canvass the situation thoroughly in order to discover what alternative course might be adopted by the parliament of Canada to ensure a national scheme. As a first step toward unemployment insurance the dominion government might see what could be done about taking over the public employment offices. These would be needed for the insurance scheme, and in any event any scheme to grapple with employment would require a good system of employment exchanges under the sole control of the dominion.

I feel that if a few of these schemes were put into effect, they would go a long way toward taking care of the situation that will no doubt arise in the future. If we build up a sound unemployment scheme, I am sure that when the next depression strikes us we shall not find ourselves in the same difficulty as that in which we have been during the last eight years. I hope the government may see its way clear during this session of parliament to implement some of the recommendations I have made.

On motion of Mr. Marsh the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.57 p.m.

Thursday, June 23, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

QUESTIONS

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

BLISSVILLE, N.B., AIRPORT

Mr. BROOKS:

1. What amount of money has been appropriated for the development of the Blissville airport, New Brunswick, for the year 1938-39?
2. Is this work being done as a relief project under the Department of Labour?
3. What are the names of engineers and foremen in charge of the work?
4. Who is responsible for the employment and dismissal of the men, and what is the rate of wages paid the different employees?
5. What machinery, such as trucks and tractors, is being used, and by whom is it furnished?

Mr. HOWE:

1. $40,000.
2. No.
3. Mr. E. C. Percy, district airway engineer, Moncton district, engineer in charge of work.
Cornelius Hageman, foreman in charge of work.
4. Mr. E. C. Percy, district airway engineer, Moncton. Standard rates as per the fair wage schedule established by the Department of Labour for the district are paid.
5. All machinery in use is the property of the Department of Transport, including: 3 caterpillar tractors; 2 Adams leaning wheel graders; 1 Brush-breaker plough; 1 road ripper; 5 Baker-Maney wheeled scrapers; 2 hydraulic scoops.

J. J. BOWLEN—NATURALIZATION

Mr. POOLE:

1. Did one J. J. Bowlen, of Calgary, Alberta, obtain naturalization papers as a British subject?
2. If so, on what date were such naturalization papers granted?
3. On what date was application made for said naturalization papers?
4. Before whom was such application made?
5. Who recommended the granting of naturalization papers to the said J. J. Bowlen?

Mr. RINFRET:

1. Certificate No. 6069, series D, in the name of John James Bowlen issued to him.
2. Certificate issued March 21st, 1938.
3. Application for this certificate made by applicant under date 17th March, 1938
4. Based upon birth in Cardigan, King's County, Prince Edward Island, Canada, 20th July, 1876, and readmission to British nationality before His Honour Judge Warburton, a Judge of the County Court, at Charlottetown, Prince Edward Island, in or about 1904. Under the statute relating to naturalization in force in 1904, all naturalizations were effected directly by the court and not by the issue of a certificate from a government department. The application states that certificate was lost and that doubts had arisen in consequence. Therefore application was for a certificate under section 6 and, in accordance with that section, was made directly to the department.

5. Application submitted to department in ordinary course; and granted by Secretary of State.

VANCOUVER-YUKON AIR MAIL SERVICE

Mr. MacINNIS:

1. Has the government given a contract for an air mail service between Vancouver and the Yukon by way of Fort St. John and White Horse?
2. If so, to whom has the contract been given?
3. What was the date of the signing of the contract?

Mr. EULER:

1. Yes.
2. "Ginger" Coote Airways Limited, of Vancouver, B.C.
3. Contract not yet executed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE—APPROVAL BY PROVINCES

Mr. NEILL:

1. Which of the provinces have indicated their willingness to agree to the proposed change in the British North America Act to allow unemployment insurance to come under dominion jurisdiction?
2. Which of them have indicated objections, and for what reasons?
3. Which of the provinces have indicated approval of the draft measure to provide for unemployment insurance submitted to them by the Government?
4. Which of them withheld consent, and for what reasons in each case?
5. Will the government lay on the table the draft bill mentioned above, for the information of the house?

Mr. ROGERS:

1. Six of the provinces, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island, Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan and British Columbia.

2. The provinces of Alberta, New Brunswick and Quebec have not been willing to agree to an amendment.

The premier of Alberta stated in a letter dated March 15, last that he intended to submit the proposals to the legislature. No official communication regarding the attitude taken by the legislature of Alberta has been received, but the press has reported that the legislature adopted a resolution which declared:

"That the introduction of an unemployment insurance scheme does not require an amendment to the B.N.A. Act. This sovereign legislature of Alberta cannot agree to any amendment of the B.N.A. Act until the present unsatisfactory constitutional situation in the dominion has been cleared up to the complete satisfaction of all provinces."

The government of New Brunswick has forwarded a copy of a resolution adopted by the legislature on April 14th, which, after drawing attention to the relation of the dominion government's proposal to the investigations of the royal commission on dominion-provincial relations, continued in these terms:

"Be it therefore resolved that in the opinion of this house the government of this province should respectfully urge upon the government of Canada the advisability of deferring further consideration of the said proposal until the report of the said commissioners is available, when the whole field of social services and any re-allocation of legislative powers in respect thereof may be given fuller study and consideration in the light of the findings and recommendations of the said commissioners."

The premier of Quebec has, thus far, not acknowledged the draft amendment which was communicated to him on January 20, 1938.

3. The government did not submit a draft measure to provide for unemployment insurance to the provinces. What was submitted to the provinces was a draft of the proposed amendment to the British North America Act to give the dominion the necessary jurisdiction.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. To lay on the table a bill which the government knew in advance to be ultra vires would not be in conformity with the government's view of sound constitutional practice. To publish a draft, which would not even be a bill, would appear to be open to even more serious misconstruction. The government feel that, before attempting to proceed with specific detailed proposals for legislation, it is essential that the necessary legislative jurisdiction should be vested in parliament.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS

LEEDS COUNTY, ONT., PUBLIC WORKS

Mr. STEWART:

1. What amount was contributed by the Dominion of Canada under agreement with the province of Ontario, dated September 10, 1936, toward the cost of: (a) project No. 76, Brockville West, grading and culverts, 4 miles; (b) project No. 111, Delta to Phillipsville, grading and culverts, 3·67 miles?
2. What other contributions have been made by the Dominion of Canada to any works carried on by the province of Ontario, in the county of Leeds, in the years 1936 and 1937?
3. Has the Dominion of Canada agreed to make contributions to any works in said county during the year 1938, and, if such agreement has been made, what are the particulars of such undertakings and the estimated amount of such contributions?

DOMINION COAL COMPANY—BONUSES AND SUBVENTIONS ON COAL AND COKE

Mr. BROOKS:

1. What amount of money has been paid the Dominion Coal Company for shipments of coal on different railways in Nova Scotia under the Maritime Freight Rates Act for the years 1935, 1936, 1937, and 1938 to date?

2. What amount of money has been paid the Dominion Coal Company for shipments of coal on different railways in New Brunswick under the Maritime Freight Rates Act for the years 1935, 1936, 1937, and 1938 to date?

3. What bonuses have been paid the Dominion Coal Company for the manufacture of coke for the above period?

PENITENTIARIES

INCORPORATION OF COMMISSION FOR ADMINISTRATION, CONTROL AND MANAGEMENT—AMENDMENT OF EXISTING ACTS

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister—for the Minister of Justice) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to incorporate a commission with power under the Minister of Justice to administer, control and manage the penitentiaries; to provide for salaries of the commissioners and assistant commissioners and to amend and consolidate the Penitentiaries Act and amending acts and repeal the same.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the favourable consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

OPERATIONS OF SPY RING

INQUIRY WITH RESPECT TO REPORTED ESPIONAGE IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. VICTOR QUELCH (Acadia): I should like to address a question to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie). In view of statements appearing in the Toronto Daily Star of June 22 and the Montreal Gazette of June 23, is it true that the minister has definite information to the effect that the German spy ring which has been operating in the United States has extended its operations to Montreal; also that the minister has knowledge of the identity of one of these spies? If these statements by the press are correct, what action is being taken by the minister?

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): As the question asked by the hon. member deals with matters concerning the secret service, it will be obvious to him, for reasons which he will appreciate, that I am not in a position, in the public interest, to make any definite reply to his question. But I can assure the hon. member that the public interest is being safeguarded.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

VALIDITY OF ALBERTA STATUTES—CORRESPONDENCE AND OTHER DOCUMENTS RESPECTING DISALLOWANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. POOLE (Red Deer): In regard to a motion standing in my name on the order paper, it is quite satisfactory to me if the names are given and a resume of petition tabled as suggested by the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): My hon. friend is referring to a motion for papers which will come up on another day. I think I understand what he has in mind.

Mr. POOLE: It is the one which was mentioned yesterday.

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER LEGISLATION—MORNING SITTINGS

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) whether or not he has any statement to make to the house with respect to the business during the remainder of the session.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): I think the house now has before it on the order paper an indication of all the government measures that will be brought to the attention of hon. members before prorogation. There is one measure that relates to Canadian National Railways securities; there may be one or two other more or less formal matters, but I am unable at the moment to think of anything of importance that is likely to be added to the measures already known.

I have asked the clerk to place in the votes and proceedings notice of morning sittings to begin on Tuesday morning next. I am advising the house of this at the moment as I have thought were we to begin morning sittings next week it might be possible to bring the proceedings of the house to a close before July 1. The government however is, of course, entirely in the hands of hon. members in regard to the number and length of sittings of the house.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

PROPOSED LAY-OFF OF SHOP EMPLOYEES AT FORT ROUGE AND TRANSCONA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): In common I suppose with many other members of the house I have received communications in connection with the withdrawal from employment of a considerable number of Canadian National Railway employees at Fort Rouge and Transcona. I desire to ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) whether he would not take this matter up with the railway authorities to ascertain whether, in view of present crop prospects, it might be possible to find useful work for these employees until such time as the requirements of the service demand that they be employed on full time.

Hon. C. D. HOWE (Minister of Transport): This is a continuation of the same subject brought up some two or three months ago of unemployment of railway shop men. At that time it was decided that the situation would be met by a reduction of hours. However, all the shop unions met in convention at Vancouver and decided in favour of a continuous forty hour week instead of a reduction in hours. This of course means a reduction in staff. This is a matter entirely between the management and the union. Every possibility is being explored of putting additional work in the shop to justify added employment; nevertheless the management feel that under the agreement with the union they are bound to abide by the decision of the union, now that such decision has been arrived at with all the facts of the situation immediately before them.

THE BUDGET

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON THE ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE

The house resumed from Wednesday, June 22, consideration of the motion of Hon. Charles A. Dunning (Minister of Finance) that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to go into committee of ways and means, and the proposed amendment thereto of Mr. Lawson, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. C. H. CAHAN (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, in resuming the debate on the budget I may be permitted to express my sincere regret that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) is temporarily absent, and to express the hope that he will soon be able to resume the duties of his office. This incident indicates the stress and strain which is imposed not only upon members of the government but upon the leader of the opposition and other members by the political and economic conditions under which our parliamentary labours are conducted at the present time.

On the whole one must commend the budget speech of the Minister of Finance as a clear presentation of statistical facts relating to domestic economic conditions and to Canada's economic relations with the United Kingdom and the United States; but we may differ as to several of the conclusions to be drawn from a careful consideration of these statistics.

The paramount value and importance to Canada of sheltered markets in the United Kingdom are made clearly apparent by the trade returns cited by the minister. For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1937, our exports to the United Kingdom were $406,825,443 and our imports $129,507,885 in value. For the fiscal year ended March 31, 1938, our exports to the United Kingdom were $407,797,610 and our imports $144,978,493. Our aggregate export and import trade with the United Kingdom in the two years ended March 31, 1937, and March 31, 1938, were:

Exports	$814,623,053
Imports	274,486,387
Excess of Canada's exports	$540,136,666

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I would ask hon. members to keep as silent as possible, in accordance with the rules of the house. It is very difficult to hear the hon. member who has the floor.

Mr. CAHAN: Surely a profitable trade with the United Kingdom to that extent should not be sacrificed by reason of any emotional or hysterical appeals for the improvement of our political relations with the neighbouring republic, as a basis for the establishment of peace throughout the world.

During the same two years, exclusive of gold, Canada's export and import trade with the United States was as follows:

Exports	$707,605,659
Imports	881,049,642
Excess of Canada's imports	$173,433,983

So in those two years, exclusive of gold, our trade with the United States showed a balance in favour of that country amounting to $173,433,983, as compared with a balance in favour of Canada in its dealings with the United Kingdom, for the same two years, of $540,136,666.

The existing trade agreement between Canada and the United States came into force on January 1, 1936. For the preceding calendar year 1935 the average ad valorem rate imposed on dutiable imports was 41·5 per cent in the United States, and from that high tariff level—the highest in the United States for decades, under the Hawley-Smoot tariff—the president of the United States proceeded to negotiate bilateral reductions in tariff rates under the conditions prescribed by the United States congress; first, that no commodity subject to customs duty would be placed on the United States free list; second, that no rate of duty would be reduced more than one-half; and third, that the term of the agreement should be limited to three years.

The ad valorem rate of customs duty in Canada on dutiable imports in 1935 was only 27·4 per cent, so that in reducing the tariffs of the two countries percentage for percentage the United States ad valorem rate could be reduced to 20·8 per cent while the same reduction in Canada would leave an average ad valorem rate of only 6·6 per cent. So the president of the United States, from the beginning of these negotiations, has held the whip hand.

In the calendar year 1935, exclusive of gold, out of our total exports to the United States of $358,569,735 there were commodities to the value of $35,723,003 on which the United States customs duties were reduced under schedule II of the trade agreement which came into force on January 1, 1936. In the calendar year 1936, under the reductions made in the United States tariff, by schedule II of the existing trade agreement, these same commodities increased in volume in 1936 to $59,281,878, and in 1937 to $64,582,851, showing in two years, in respect of the commodities upon which specific reductions were made by schedule II of the trade agreement with the United States, a net increase of $28,859,858.

In the same two years, our total exports of commodities to the United States, on which no specific change was made in the United States tariff under schedule II of the trade agreement, increased from $312,846,003, in 1935, to $395,130,685, in 1937, an increase in two years of $82,284,682, thus showing conclusively that our exports of commodities to the United States, on which there was no specific change of duty, increased by $82,000,000, while the volume of our exports of commodities, on which the United States tariff was reduced under schedule II of the trade agreement, increased in the same two years by only $28,000,000. In other words, Canada fared more than twice as well in respect of exports on which there was no specific change in the United States customs duties than we did in respect of the volume of commodities on which reductions were made under schedule II of the trade agreement.

Canada's annual exports to the United States of commodities on which reductions in duty were made under schedule II of the trade agreement, increased by $28,800,000, while the United States exports to Canada of commodities on which Canadian duties were reduced under schedule I of the trade agreement increased from $29,132,174 to $69,274,933, an increase of $40,142,759 in favour of the United States.

Taking the trade returns of Canada with the United States for the months of January, February and March of this present calendar year, 1938, we find from the finance minister's statement that Canada's total exports of merchandise to the United States were only $61,600,600, while our imports from the United States for the same three months period were $106,400,000, showing a trade balance adverse to Canada of $44,800,000 for the period referred to.

I commend the words of the finance minister, though they indicate a reversal of policy on the part of the Liberal party, that "Canada cannot give to-day and bargain to-morrow." And he added:

> It is even more true, Mr. Speaker, in the world as it is to-day, that unilateral tariff reductions will not get the wider export markets which our products need.

We must not overlook the fact that there are bilateral trade agreements which are based on commensurate reciprocal concessions, and then there are trade agreements which are bilateral in form only, but the terms of which indicate merely the generosity of one contracting party in conceding tariff reductions without receiving compensatory advantages. The existing trade agreement with the United States is, in my opinion, of the latter kind, and I sincerely trust that all its adverse features may not be renewed.

In two years we obtained by our trade with the United Kingdom a credit balance of $540,000,000, while our trade with the United States showed a debit or adverse balance of $173,400,000, which we covered by our exports of gold.

Moreover—

> Says the finance minister, dealing with particular commodities—
> —examination of exports of individual commodities to the British market for the last fiscal year as a whole shows such striking increases as 17 per cent in the case of bacon and hams, 33 per cent in the case of coarse grains, 86 per cent in the case of tobacco leaf, 49 per cent in the case of fresh and canned fruits and 27 per cent in the case of iron and steel products.

The existing trade relations between the United Kingdom and the United States are not less unsatisfactory to the government of the United Kingdom.

It is stated in the Foreign Commerce Year Book for 1937, an official publication of the United States Department of Commerce, and the last to which I have had access, that the United Kingdom imported from the United States in

1934	$413,001,000
1935	429,015,000
1936	463,785,000
Three years' imports	$1,305,801,000

I have not access to the statistics for 1937. On the other hand the United States imported from the United Kingdom, of United Kingdom products:

1934	$ 88,546,000
1935	112,222,000
1936	137,341,000
Three years' imports	$338,109,000

The excess of imports into the United Kingdom from the United States, over exports from the United Kingdom to the United States, for three years, was $967,692,000. I have not had access to the figures for the year 1937.

I commend to the attention of this government, the words of Hon. Oliver Stanley, president of the board of trade in England, as reported in the parliamentary debates of the House of Commons at Westminster on May 24 last, while dealing with the adverse balance in British trade for the first four months of this year. I quote:

The striking point which hon. members may not realize is that the whole increased adverse balance of trade in the first four months is covered by the increased adverse balance of trade of the United States.

Thus showing that the figures which I quoted up to the end of 1936 have not improved.

The increase in the adverse balance in all countries is £17,000,000. In the United States it is £22,000,000. With all British countries our balance has improved by £3,000,000 and with other foreign countries by nearly £2,000,000. It is true that this increase in the United States is due to certain fortuitous circumstances, such as a good American wheat crop and a bad Canadian one, and the increase of our imports of iron and steel to which I have already referred. But facts and figures of this kind need watching and must be taken into account in the negotiations now proceeding with the United States.

Mr. Stanley proceeds:

The whole question of the balance of trade leads naturally to another matter in which the board of trade is particularly interested and with which I desire to deal briefly. That is the question of trade agreements. By far the most important question arising in that connection is that of the negotiations which are now proceeding with the United States. Those negotiations have been protracted. Our mission has been there since last February. Hon. members will recollect however that, under the American procedure, in connection with trade negotiation, provision is made for public hearings sometimes very prolonged and those were not concluded until, I think, some time in April. Any discussion between two great commercial countries like these must raise complicated and difficult problems and negotiations must necessarily be long.

I quote this long statement as it has some bearing upon the Canadian negotiations.

Mr. Stanley proceeds:

I have already told the committee of the great importance which I attach to a successful outcome of these negotiations. What I mean by a successful outcome—and only such an outcome will bring the least benefit either to us or to America or to the world—is a genuine trade treaty for a fair expansion of trade on the part of both countries. Nothing is to be gained by some kind of political treaty, and the United States and ourselves approach this matter from a purely economic angle. Nor do I think anything is to be gained by either side making anything in the nature of a unilateral gesture. The treaty when it comes, must be a treaty which can stand on its own legs, which is fair to both countries and which leads to a fair expansion of trade between the two countries.

I am sure every one would wish to make it plain to countries abroad that, great as may be our desire to give them, as far as is compatible with fairness to our own manufacturers, access to this great consuming market, to a large extent the amount of that access must depend not only on us but on them. Unless they are willing to give us access to their market as we give them access to ours, eventually ours must disappear.

We cannot any longer afford to make unilateral gestures in trade matters just as gestures of goodwill. International trade is vital to this country to-day, and under any agreement or any trade treaties with other countries, we must be assured of equal terms and fair play for our goods. It is a very difficult world in which to do business to-day. It is a very difficult world in which to negotiate. There are not many parts of the world now where you do not find some form of closed economy, whether it is subsidy, license or control, the effect of which may be suddenly to upset any treay and even to upset the course of ordinary commercial relations.

I commend Mr. Stanley's words to the finance minister and government of this country in the hope that they may influence the policy and conduct of this government in their pending negotiations with the United States.

I think I recall former addresses of the Prime Minister and also, if my memory is trustworthy, addresses of the finance minister, which suggested and even advocated that Canada should make unilateral tariff concessions to some other countries, in the hope and expectation that, following our example of unsophisticated generosity, they would reciprocate by also making commensurate tariff concessions to Canada; but that hope and that expectation have proved utterly futile. I am pleased that the government is now reverting to a more realistic tariff policy which they were previously disposed to condemn.

I trust that the government may no longer be deluded by the hallucination which the United States secretary of state has sought to create in the minds of members of this government, that by giving to the United States a large share of our existing markets in the United Kingdom and by increasing the neighbouring republic's share of our Canadian domestic markets, we will be promoting the peace of the world. We are all anxious to maintain the peace throughout the world, but it is folly to suggest that we should seek to attain peace by bankrupting our own industry and forcing our workmen and workwomen into the ranks of the unemployed, or that we should open our domestic markets to the products of industrial activities and industrial employment in the United States of America, all for the purpose of inducing the neighbouring republic to pursue the paths of peace.

It is satisfactory to note that the secretary of the British board of trade sees very clearly that nothing is to be gained by seeking to effect any kind of political treaty with the United States by making economic concessions to that country. There are those in this country, and even in this government, who are apparently persuaded that the political support and cooperation of the United States in international affairs may best be obtained by the grant of trade concession in the markets of the British commonwealth. That, it seems to me, is an utterly vain hope. Bribes, however insidiously and persistently presented, never procure permanent personal or political support.

The finance minister affirms that the national interest of this country is bound up inseparably with free and stable international trading conditions. I would have preferred that he should have said, fair and stable trading conditions, but, unfortunately, the existing conditions of our trade with the United States are neither fair nor stable. They will never, in my opinion, prove to be fair or stable so long as the United States maintains its Hawley-Smoot tariff, which is probably the highest of any modern state, for the purposes of influencing or, I might more accurately say, intimidating, other countries, in the hope of forcing them to make tariff and trade concessions to the United States, although the United States congress has by statute precluded the president of the United States from making similar and coextensive concessions to any British country in the trade negotiations now pending. The United Kingdom and Canada, as the trade statistics disclose, have both opened their domestic markets to the United States to an extent which no other country has done, while the United States has precluded both the United Kingdom and Canada from entering the United States market on equal terms or to a similar extent.

The finance minister asserts that the cooperation of the United Kingdom and Canada with the United States in the field of trade will prove to be a political fact of world importance, but, unfortunately, the United States has never learned the obvious lesson that cooperation implies the working together of at least two parties to the same end; and since the close of the great war there has been no evidence that the congress and the people of the United States desire to reach with British countries such unanimity of purpose, either in political or in economic matters. I sincerely trust that the government of this country will not be induced either by intimidation, or by irritating and protracted delays in the pending negotiations, to make such tariff concessions to the United States as will still further retard much needed developments in the industrial life of this country.

Since our trade agreements for reciprocal tariff concessions within the empire were concluded at the imperial economic conference which was held at Ottawa in July and August, 1932, successive governments of the United States have persistently sought to impair, if not to frustrate, the interimperial trade agreements which were consummated at that conference. Moreover, in the trade negotiations which were recently carried on at Washington, it is clear from the reports that have reached us that the government of the United States has persistently sought, as the price of any trade concessions on the part of the United States, either to the United Kingdom or to Canada, to restrict the existing markets for Canadian products in the United Kingdom, and to increase the market for United States products in Canada. I sincerely hope and pray that the efforts of Washington in that direction, which are, in a large part, selfish and self-seeking, may not be wholly successful.

Lasting trade agreements with either the United States and the United Kingdom or between the United States and Canada must necessarily be based upon tariff concessions by the United States which will ensure, for the future, well-balanced trade between each of these two British countries and the United States of America.

In closing, I wish to commend the statement of the finance minister that:

It is of little use to prime the pump of business enterprise with government expenditure, if, at the same time, we dry up the springs of private initiative which feed the well.

I was brought up in a country village, where almost every family depended upon its pump for one of the chief necessities of life. Pump priming was occasionally resorted to when the fittings of the pump commenced to loosen and to dry up. No efforts at pump priming ever increased the capacity of the well. The pump priming to which the finance minister referred should never be resorted to except possibly as a temporary expedient, but in any case its necessity clearly indicates the drying up of our industrial activities and the need for such remedial measures as will foster and encourage domestic industry.

Therefore I again heartily commend the following words of the finance minister:

If, therefore, the answers to the questions as to whether plants are to be built or extended, new houses are to be erected, and industry is going to expand or to stagnate, depend upon the decisions of tens of thousands of individuals who are free agents and not regimented sheep, it follows that governments must pursue policies which create confidence rather than fear and uncertainty, and which give leadership and guidance and encouragement rather than stifle initiative and paralyze new enterprise.

Therefore I am fully persuaded that if this government should maintain a stable monetary policy and adopt and pursue such stable trade and tariff policies as will create and maintain the confidence of the thousands of our people who are engaged in industry, then and then only will industry, and especially the manufacturing industry, so renew and extend its domestic activities as to solve for our time the problem of unemployment that now grievously perplexes not only the members of this parliament, but also the great majority of the Canadian people.

Hon. W. R. MOTHERWELL (Melville): Mr. Speaker, every time it is my privilege to address this assembly in the budget debate I am filled with gratitude that long down through the ages someone has handed down to me the right to speak of the grievances of the oppressed in any part of Canada, and more particularly in my own constituency. I have also the further privilege of speaking favourably of the worthy budget recently brought down by a worthy man, a noble man who dares to do the right, but who is temporarily laid aside for a well-earned rest to resume, we all hope, his duties in this chamber in the course of a few days.

I am not going to carry on very long but I think I should say a word or two now lest I forget, about the two piffling amendments. One was well meant—I would not say anything unkind of the gentleman who is the financial critic of the opposition (Mr. Lawson)—but oh dear, how unlike the rugged, intrepid character of his present leader in this house, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett)!

In passing I should like to say a word or two about the other amendment. Who will dare at this time to interfere with the buoyant revenues that we have available for taking care of the requirements of Canada? Does anyone think we could dispense with any of those revenues in safety at a time when the war clouds are hovering over us? Nothing but a piece of trickery was at the bottom of this subamendment. Do you think it will deceive anybody but the mover himself? It will not deceive me or my constituents or any sensible man in Canada. I despise such things on the part of men who pretend to be able to handle the affairs of Canada better than either of the old two parties. I hope I shall have a few minutes later on to deal further with the subamendment.

Now I come to another matter that I shall have to put on my glasses for. I hope I shall not need my auricular decorations but I have them on. I rather like interruptions, and I have a pair of ears beside me that will lend themselves to me to-day so that Hansard will not be full of interjections that I did not hear anything about. I do not think hon. gentlemen will do that, but it is well to be forearmed because I have had it done to me many a time.

In my morning paper, and you may be astonished when I tell you it is the Journal, I find the following extract, headed "Unable to say how many branch banks to close":

It is "impossible to say at this stage" how many bank branches are likely to close in Alberta, Sydney H. Logan, president of the Canadian Bank of Commerce, said to-day in commenting on yesterday's Calgary announcement that five branches will close within the next month.

"We will have to close more of them if we find the losses are too heavy. There are some small points out in the west where there is little business and the taxes make it impossible for such branches to pay."

Mr. Logan consulted records to show that of 221 branches 41 made profits and 180 were operated at an actual loss.

Well, I do not want hon. members to think what I am going to say is a brief for Mr. Aberhart. Heaven forbid that I should read a brief for that mistaken gentleman, but it is a brief against the president of the Bank of Commerce or any other bank at this critical time adding fuel to the flames in our western province of Alberta by closing branch banks, no matter how desirable it may be economically to do so. It would be most untimely at this time; and who is going to say what will happen if it is done? The Bank of Commerce closed a branch bank in my home village last Christmas, and if similar arbitrary methods are employed, I am going to show this chamber what is now proposed to be done in Alberta. Go out into Alberta, forsooth, and start closing banks! An outrageously arbitrary act such as that of Mr. Logan in my riding and in my own village extended to Alberta at this critical time would be a regrettable incident the results of which no man can foretell. I hope there is some means in the hands of the government of restraining or at any rate guiding or controlling Mr. Logan, but I understand there is not.

Before I go further with this matter I should like to read a summary of the correspondence between myself and the same Mr. Logan—the most pinheaded, antediluvian bank president on the face of the earth, that I know of. I should also mention before I go any further that, because he would not give us a hearing, I told him "I will make you hear us on the floor of the House of Commons," and that is what I am endeavouring to do now.

Here is a summary of the correspondence. First, my own letter and my last to Mr. Logan:

January 15th, 1938.

S. H. Logan, Esq.,
President,
Canadian Bank of Commerce,
Toronto.

Dear Mr. Logan:

Yours of January 8th has been received, and I was glad to note that at least on one important point we have arrived at the same conclusion. In speaking of the last few years' excessive drought here, you say:

"We regard this, as you do, as temporary and expect that the district will return to its former productiveness."

What a contrast that statement is to that which you made in your letter of December 23rd, when discussing the same theme, as follows:

"The fact is that conditions have been changing greatly for the last ten or more years all over the west, and Abernethy is no exception. Volume and income have been decreasing for causes which seem to be permanent."

And then he followed that by saying that it is only "temporary." Well, Mr. Logan is certainly a lightning-change artist on manufacturing alibis.

This is only one more example of the rapidity with which you can change and vary your excuses for closing our bank here.

As several of our lettergrams and letters have passed each other in transit it occurred to me that a resumé of the whole disappointing occurrence might prove both interesting and constitute a consecutive record of the major facts of the case.

On December 15th, 1937, all patrons of the branch Bank of Commerce at Abernethy received the following letter from the manager thereof, with such variations in wording as individual cases necessitated:

"We regret to have to inform you that it has been decided to close our office at Abernethy on the 31st instant,"

That is December, 1937.

". . . as our experience has shown that the volume of business offering in the district is not sufficient to warrant our remaining.

Unless we hear from you to the contrary in the meantime your account will be transferred to the Balcarres branch of the Royal Bank of Canada on the 31st instant.

Interest will continue on savings accounts without interruption.

We wish to take this opportunity to thank you for the business you have entrusted to us in the past.

Yours truly,

Manager."

That is, the local manager of the bank at Abernethy.

Although I am talking specifically about this branch, my information is that there are scores—I will not say hundreds, but there are many—similarly situated and, I understand, dealt with in the same arbitrary manner, throughout Canada.

Thus it will be seen that after doing a real good business at Abernethy since 1905 till the world depression and drought struck us and even a fair business afterwards, as crops continued wonderfully good, except in 1931 and 1937, when the major crop, wheat, was anything but a failure, as per figures already supplied you, we are to be ruthlessly deprived of our own bank with not as much notice given of your intentions as the most humble monthly labourer is entitled to before dismissal.

This real "bolt from the blue" resulted in a hurry-up telephone call being sent out over the ten rural lines converging on this point, announcing a meeting would be held the same evening to consider possible action to be taken to avert if possible, such hasty and unwarranted action, by remote control, as if your patrons had no more right to be heard in their own behalf than so many inanimate chattels.

The meeting was well attended by a stunned and increasingly indignant people. A petition was drafted addressed to yourself and largely signed, praying that no further action be taken looking towards closing our bank until patrons thereof had an opportunity to be heard and show cause why such drastic action should not be taken, at least until all the facts bearing on the situation were disclosed. Realizing that a reply to this petition could not be expected inside a week or possibly more, a committee of ten was named to interview your superintendent at Regina on Friday of the same week, as that was felt to be the proper course to pursue even though he (the superintendent), might have little, if any, say in the matter whatever. Which indeed proved to be the case as it did with ourselves afterwards.

Our interview with your Regina superintendent was quite frank and I would say satisfactory as far as it went, but it was quite apparent from the outset that the place to seek redress was higher up, as we had anticipated by addressing the before mentioned petition to you.

I addressed all these communications to Mr. Logan as did the local committee also.

Among other things we discussed with your Regina superintendent was the heavy overhead cost of operating the Abernethy branch, due partly to the capital cost of a much larger building than was necessary and the maintenance of a seemingly expensive staff. It was also pointed out to your superintendent that so far as collecting old paper was concerned, your then branch manager was a dandy, but so far as holding many old and valuable farm customers was concerned, he was a dud, owing to his haughty and high-hatting attitude towards them generally.

I pointed out to your superintendent that his manager at Abernethy was really a round peg in a square hole, inasmuch as he might make an excellent city banker, his total lack of rural instincts or sympathies was bound sooner or later to help to put any small village rural bank more or less on the decline by driving away good customers altogether, while others went elsewhere for their loans.

Between December 16th and 29th several further lettergrams and letters were exchanged in which, to support your determination to close your Abernethy branch, you stressed first, that the volume of income so decreased in recent years that there was no alternative to closing. To this I replied, in effect, that if every institution and business whose volume of business and income had shrunk were to be on fifteen days' notice closed up and deserted, there would not be much of anything left open and running.

I dilated on that in my original letter, but I want to emphasize it as much as possible. What would have been left running if every activity which showed declining revenues had been closed out? This parliament would have been out; the railways, the churches, all the best institutions of our land, our foreign missions included, would have been shut down and out. And yet this was the specious pretext made by this gentleman banker.

I followed this up with the actual shipments of wheat from this point as per railway figures for the years 1934-35-36; being 390,000, 250,000 and 354,000 respectively.

While 1937, the worst year we have ever had, the shipments of wheat thus far were about 120,000 with an estimated 20,000 yet to ship, and also 20 carloads of live stock. To this you came back with the unhappy plea that it was not the drought or yield or grade so much as the question of area—ours being too small in your estimation to support a bank.

Well, even a layman would know that it is the volume of business rather than the size of the area which would be the determining factor. But this banking expert puts up an excuse that a third rate clerk would be ashamed to put up to try to satisfy us.

Surely, Mr. Logan, you do not expect anyone to accept that paltry excuse, especially as I showed you in one of my letters that our area had really remained permanent in that any little that had been lost by grain deliveries at Gillespie, most of which went through Abernethy branch bank, was more than made up by the accounts of the two rural municipalities, Abernethy and Tullymet.

Your faithful superintendent at Regina seemed to have acquired a premonition about this time that you needed some support on the theory that it was the area rather than the density of production and population that counted, as under date of December 28 he wrote me, from which letter I quote the following, wherein he intended to show that the area was over-banked:

"The Royal Bank of Canada having branches at Balcarres and Lemberg, while Indian Head cuts directly into the territory from the south."

That was the biggest whopper of them all.

This statement that "Indian Head banks cut directly into our territory from the south" is pure fiction. Prior to the construction of the Brandon-Bulyea-Regina branch line railway the farmers around where Lemberg now is and north thereof, also Abernethy and Balcarres and north thereof, practically did all their marketing and banking at Wolseley, Sintaluta and Indian Head respectively, but when banks were established at Abernethy and Balcarres in 1905 it cut so directly into Sintaluta and Indian Head banking area that the bank at Sintaluta was closed and the three banks at Indian Head were reduced to one, with the deep Qu'Appelle valley as a distinct boundary between them, thus lessening the bank competition from the south, instead of increasing it as alleged.

If this gentleman could get away with this kind of dope, well he deserves to; but as long as I have my voice and my general health to back it up he is going to hear from me. Talk about dictators; you do not have to go to Italy or Germany for them, we have them right here in Toronto—and not Toronto particularly; we have them right here in Canada.

But why dwell upon all these—many of them petty and fictitious—alibis for closing down our bank when the real reason is given in your favour of December 28, in which, after reciting a number of other minor reasons why banks were being closed in the west and east also, you state as follows:

"In this present instance Abernethy was interlocked with other points, the Royal Bank and ourselves having arranged saw-offs involving nine places in all where a similar condition existed."

He must have thought that I was easy, when our bank was valued not on the business that was being done but as a trade-off for something else. Who could not be a banker if such qualifications as this went at par?

After all this pretence at reviewing and reconsidering the pending fate of our branch bank you now admit that it was all prearranged with the Royal that Abernethy was to be one of the victims of an admitted deal in which merit on our part made us all the more valuable as a pawn in your "saw-off" dickerings with the Royal.

I have nothing in the world against the Royal bank—

In fact I have nothing against any bank, but I have a lot against this loganberry banker who to our sad misfortune and mischance has apparently been raised to the high eminence of president of a great bank, the Canadian Bank of Commerce. I do not know much about banking; they have always treated me well, but I know this guy from the ground up.

—indeed I have had very satisfactory business dealings with it for many years, but to be bargained off to it or any other bank on a miserable fifteen day notice smacks altogether too much of the old massa and slave days of yore for a free people to accept with quiescent complacency.

Well, I am not going to accept it. Any man born of Irish parentage on one side and Yorkshire on the other and who carries a Scotch name cannot be held quiet under such diabolical treatment as we have received from that bank president. Though the heavens fall I shall have my say. It is coming to me, not by privilege but by right. I gave them notice last New Years that it would come, and it has been fermenting here within every day since, waiting patiently to be let out, and out she comes now. There is more correspondence yet:

The always doubtful practice of "saw-offs" in dealing with election protests was quite common up to twenty-five or thirty years ago, but largely frowned down upon in more recent days. But with the Bank of Commerce at least saw-offs seem to be yet quite the right thing in determining which bank is to be continued and which closed, and with the same cavalier disregard for their patrons' interests as if they had been so many cattle.

Perhaps it shows disrespect to the cattle in making such a comparison.

At the beginning of this protest we did think that if we succeeded in presenting our case fully and had sufficient time to do it in, our branch bank with a business record behind it for thirty-two years which we have good reason to believe few village banks excelled, might yet be saved. But when we read your "saw-off" letter, we then knew what we had formerly only suspected, that our good old bank had not the chance of a corpse on the dissecting table.

Merit does not figure in it at all. Did you ever hear of such a condition of things? Did you ever think that would or could happen in Canada? I did not; and when I awoke to the fact that it was there as a stern reality the Irish and the Scotch and the English in me rose to the highest pitch in my life—and they have had some rises. Now I am giving vent to my feelings, Mr. Speaker, at your pleasure. I had better hurry up, or the forty-minute time limit will be called on me. I wonder how many minutes I have left. Who is the timekeeper in this parliament anyway?

May I conclude by drawing your attention to your several references to our and my interview with your Regina superintendent. The reason we urged so strongly that either he or a responsible bank inspector should visit Abernethy was to meet your various customers at that point who had taken their bank accounts elsewhere, at some inconvenience to themselves, rather than meet your local manager personally and go through the non-diplomatic and repelling experiences to which hitherto they had been subjected. And these customers are some of our very best farmers in good circumstances, whom we desired your Regina representative to meet and size up for himself. But ye would not.

Yours truly,

W. R. Motherwell.

Well, there it is; and on inquiry I find that there is no official redress available and that the government has no power to act. I find that I have eleven minutes left. Heaven be praised; I feel like a new man, with all my garments on. But I am interrupting myself; I am full of appreciation of the kindness that has been bestowed upon me from all sides. I have a little more to say, but my few notes have taken wings elsewhere. I understand that there is no redress that can be accorded by the government or the parliament of Canada; in other words, this is a huge monopolistic banking institution—a free lance—to do as it pleases as above set forth. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I am going to address myself to the Canadian Bankers' Association. I want them to call off their dogs, to call off their autocratic presidents from entering Alberta at this untimely time. For fifty-six years I have been living in my farm home, building up the little village adjoining, and this is the sort of treatment I get from on high—not from on high; from below, from the depths of hades. Why should a man have his whole life-work interfered with by a ruthless bank outsider who knows nothing and apparently cares less about the rural areas of the country? Is it any wonder I am furious and indignant? And then there is no redress. I am addressing myself to you, Mr. Speaker, and through you to the bankers' association. There are many noble, fine, christian men—not like this man—at the head of our banking affairs, and I feel that if they are appealed to they will see that some remedial action is taken. I am going to see that they get copies of this Hansard, I am going to see that it is sent to them, and I am going to depend upon them to correct this growing evil all over Canada. Is that not democracy? The Lord be praised for those who went before, who have given me this privilege of free speech on behalf of the oppressed.

I have only one further word to say, Mr. Speaker, to those who have listened to me so patiently. If the banks will not correct this situation, what am I going to do? There is a great flexibility about our parliamentary system. I can remember when we had no law governing our grain trade; in that case the difficulty now is that we have a law but it is so difficult to get it carried out honestly. That, however, should not deter us from having a bank law and setting up a board of bank commissioners. Oh, that would be thought terrible. I suggested that to one or two in Ottawa, and I thought they were going to take a cat-fit. Why not? We have boards controlling almost all other institutions, and, in the light of the letter I read, who needs such control more than at least some of these banks? I am going to suggest to the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister, and all the government, that they take into careful consideration the desirability of having a board of bank commissioners, so that when a bronco banker like this one breaks out, a snub twitch or a lariat can be put upon him. Do you think Canadians should have to submit to such tyranny? I do not. I would be ashamed to think that Canada had degenerated to that extent. Freedom? Yes, there is a lot of nonsense spoken about it, but here is a real case where freedom has been usurped and authority flouted, almost equal to the case of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association with regard to farm implements.

That brings up another matter to which I should like to refer, since I have three or four minutes left, and it concerns the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who is a very capable representative of that constituency. I only wish his capabilities could be turned to better purposes than pin-pricking annoyances such as this subamendment to the Tory amendment, which itself did not mean a thing. Neither the amendment nor the subamendment is worth enough paper to light a kitchen fire with, though if there is any choice between them the subamendment seems to be the worse. The hon. member wants to give away all the tariffs that we inherited, which at the time of the Dunning budget of 1930 we had down to the lowest point since confederation. He wants to give away all those remaining high tariffs which the present government inherited in 1930 with nothing in return from the United States. I want to use those tariffs as the basis of an agreement with the United States, in order to get something valuable in return in the form of more markets for Canadian products. That is the point. Is the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) not a good-natured fellow? A leader in agriculture wants to give away this chance. He says, "I do not want anything in return." Oh, Lord forgive him; he knows not what he says. How could he, when he would say that? Perhaps he thinks that would be a crackerjack campaign issue to carry around. Well, I will see that it is not. I will spike it if possible before it gets out of the shell.

I think I have two or three minutes more, but perhaps Mr. Speaker will turn a blind eye to the clock this time. Speaking of shells: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar is so anxious about agriculture and so anxious for immediate reform that he cannot wait a few months for one of the most wonderful proposals about to come out of its shell. I remember the early days, and the old reciprocity treaty of '54-'66. Why should I not be friendly towards everything that will promote trade between us and our southern neighbour—and much more so, the prospective trade agreement now pending between the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada, these three great democracies? But Mr. Rosetown-Biggar wants to give it all away for the purpose of doing a little pin-pricking at the Minister of Finance. Ah, my dear young man, it will rebound on you, just the way the Saskatchewan musketeers drove the Aberhart invasion back into the lairs and kennels of the foothill country, and to the land of the breezy Bow. That is what we will do with the next invader. That is the way we will handle the C.C.F. at the first opportunity.

But this is not banking. I think I might very well terminate my speech right now. I could prolong it, but I am perspiring freely this hot day, and I want to retire to my drawing room and wardrobe.

Mr. J. EMILE FERRON (Berthier-Maskinonge): Mr. Speaker, with your permission I shall begin my remarks by paying a tribute to the whole population of the constituency of Berthier-Maskinongé, whose representative I have the honour to be in this house. I feel proud of those people, most of whom are farmers and workmen, and I take pleasure in honouring them. I rise on their behalf in order to express their appreciation of the Liberal government's achievements, and to make what they believe to be timely suggestions.

To be sure, in my constituency we are perhaps unable to juggle with figures as cleverly as the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson), but we do know that it is much better to strive after a balanced budget than to show huge deficits, as happened under the former government. We are no outstanding mathematicians, but we consider that we are not indulging in any whim when we prefer a deficit of a few million dollars to those of hundreds of millions which our critics have brought about and experienced.

Our knowledge of economics is still quite deficient; but we feel justified in stating that, on the whole, conditions have improved in every field af activity. Statistics show that unemployment has decreased to a certain extent in our country and, what is more comforting, confidence and hope are everywhere more noticeable. There is more confidence on the part of the farmer who acknowledges the goodwill which the government has shown towards him since they took power, in lowering to 7½ per cent the duty on farm implements which formerly stood at 25 per cent. He feels more confident, as I say, because he knows that the different trade agreements which were negotiated have made it easier for him to sell most of his products; for instance, butter, which was selling for 22·8 cents a pound in 1933 and 24·7 cents in 1935, rose to 28·1 cents in 1937 and to 35·3 cents in February last.

Again, there is more hope among workmen who, in 1935 through the policies of our opponents, were under the threat of being discharged by the owners of the factories that employed them, for those factories would have to be closed, they said, if our party came into power. This we did, but those same factories are still in operation and giving employment to our workmen. In the case of the textile industry—a case in which the town where I come from is especially interested—it is now obvious, as a result of the inquiry which was held in connection with those companies, that they were not affected as they claimed to have been by our policy, but that they could pay better salaries to their employees.

The salary of men employed in lumbering and log driving operations has been raised because the market for forest products is now better than it was in 1935. Therefore we take pleasure in congratulating for that achievement, both the hon. the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) and the government of which he is a member.

After those congratulatory words, I am unfortunately constrained, Mr. Speaker, to make a few remarks and suggestions which might seem to border on criticism—which is not to my liking—but I am in duty bound to make them.

I will certainly support the budget on which we will soon be called upon to vote, but I should do it much more willingly if the millions of dollars intended for my province as a contribution towards the relief of the unemployed and needy were, in future, used more fairly than they have been in the past.

In 1936, and again last year, I had the opportunity of seeing the results of works done on the basis of cooperation. I am referring to projects 78A and 78B carried out in Louiseville, and to the Sainte-Geneviève road, between Berthier and Pointe-du-Lac. I did all I could to urge upon the authorities the principle of letting municipal councils choose workmen among the more needy of the locality, so that justice might be given to all, liberals as well as conservatives. Not only was my request turned down, but, on projects 78A and 78B there were foremen, or representatives of theirs, who did not hesitate to say to good unemployed labourers who wanted work in order to buy food: "You are not yet good enough tories to be given work here." The choice of workmen was made by political organizers, and I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the only thing about which they made no mistake was the political persuasion of the applicants. In spite of my protests, cases of political patronage and of glaring injustice have followed one another.

On the highway between Berthier and Pointe-du-Lac there have been injustices just about similar. In conection with that project, the Board of Railway Commissioners did something which, in my opinion, should not pass unnoticed. They found it expedient—I do not know for what purpose—to provide in conjunction with the Canadian Pacific Railway and out of moneys appropriated for the elimination of railway crossings, over $400,000—that is nearly one half of the value of such work—after which they applied their unemployment relief conditions to about one third only of the project. As a result, almost all along that road, people in wretched circumstances were ignored so that employment could be given to political friends of the Quebec government. I ask again whether the Board of Railway Commissioners acted in good faith in that matter. If so, let me suggest that they are easily deceived.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, how much more willing would I be to vote these millions if, at least one half of that money was to be used a little more fairly.

As regards our old men and women, our unfortunate blind people and our youths, the vote of thousands and thousands of dollars will soon be sanctioned, so that their life conditions may be improved. I must say, that if, in this respect, the Quebec authorities deal with other parts of the province as they are dealing with my constituency, we may again expect numerous cases of abuse. There again, equal and fair treatment is unknown. After having discussed the subject with the hon. the Minister of Finance, I realize how difficult it is for the federal government to interfere with such matters, but I wish to know if, after a thorough inquiry, such facts should not be brought to the attention, perhaps none too heedful, of the authorities in my province.

Mr. Speaker, dealing now with another subject, I wish to draw the attention of the hon. the acting Postmaster General (Mr. Euler) upon the rural mail carriers and to request his support on their behalf. I know that he is quite sympathetic to them and I hope that before long a reasonable and uniform salary will be paid to them, in spite of the difficulties which such action may involve.

Before I conclude, may I say a word about unemployment which, although less acute, is still existent. No class of the population has suffered more from the depression than the plucky labourers of our villages and small towns, where direct relief is unknown and cannot reasonably exist.

I have always been and still am of the opinion that governments should direct towards the land their efforts to end this sad state of affairs. Would it not be advisable gradually to reduce the grants for direct relief and transfer the difference to agriculture? But, let us not forget to begin by the beginning. We should in the first place seek to retain on the land those who are still there. We should strive to inculcate in the youth of the country the love of the soil, and the best way would be, in my humble opinion, to make grants for the encouragement of farm accounting. When books of account are kept in every farm house, the farmer's son will come to realize that farming is not what he had thought it was. He will be able to compare his income with the wages of labourers and factory-workers, with the salaries of store and bank clerks, and he will certainly find that farming is preferable to these other occupations.

Such a result, however, will not be obtained by conferences and fine speeches. It will never be attained if, in the home, the child hears farming referred to only in words of disdain, and if means are not taken to make him find out for himself the truth of what I am advancing. He must be made to realize that the professional man without clients, the unsuccessful merchant, the unemployed workman may have to go without food, but that the soil of our country never withholds the means of subsistence from those who till it properly.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, let us direct our efforts towards the land. Let us seek to retain on the farm those who are there now, and their children. Let us try to return to the land those who have thoughtlessly left it, and the desired equilibrium will soon be restored. Let us not look for happiness in the newer and easier doctrines. God has said: "Thou shalt earn thy bread by the sweat of thy brow," and also: "Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself."

Let us rather return to the old doctrines which are and will ever remain true. If we always preach them and practise them, happiness will assuredly return to every Canadian home.

Mr. C. E. JOHNSTON (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes that I have at my disposal on this occasion, I must say that I view this budget with a great deal of disappointment. I looked through the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in the hope of finding something that would be of benefit to the common people, but I was not successful. As I scanned the pages I could not help but think that it was nothing but a big man's budget. Those who control finance in these days may well applaud the Minister of Finance on the efficient work he has done in bringing down this budget. It is a bankers' and financiers' budget, and they might well say to him: Well done, thou good and faithful servant.

In the past it has been the practice to refer to matters of tariff and foregn trade, but these things are not noticeable in the budget this year. However, they have been brought forward by many hon. members who have taken part in this debate. It has been contended that increased foreign trade would alleviate our present condition and put our unemployed young men back to work, but that is the one thing it has failed to do. We have tried that off and on since 1867, but we find ourselves to-day in our present unfortunate position. As I look through the budget I find that there is not one solitary thing that will increase the purchasing power of the best customers we have, those who live in Canada. I was in hopes of finding at least some little reference to some of the promises made by the government during the last election. They said they would endeavour to cope with unemployment by means of increased public works. This should be done without increasing our national debt, as that is too tremendous at the present time.

There was not one thing in the budget which would tend to increase home consumption. I have mentioned before, and I mention it again, that our best market is the home market. Until we realize that, until we do something that will increase home consumption and thus take care of our unemployment, we will find serious conditions arising from time to time. I remember saying a year ago that things were getting worse and that unless something was done there would be a great deal of discontent in Canada. I have no hesitancy in saying now that things are getting to such a state that if something is not done it will not be long before the number of riots will increase tremendously. The situation must be changed and I think it is the duty of this government with its overwhelming majority to see that that is done.

As I said a moment ago, this is a big man's budget. It leaves the common people absolutely nothing to which to look forward. In his speech the minister estimated the total taxation revenue for the country this year, these figures being found on page 3924 of this year's Hansard. The total taxable revenue is $436,950,000, made up as follows:

Customs duties	$ 82,000,000
Excise duties	51,000,000
Income tax	138,000,000
Sales tax	125,000,000
Manufacturers', stamp, importation and other special taxes	39,000,000
Banks and insurance companies	1,950,000
	$436,950,000

Practically every dollar of that revenue will be obtained from the common people. They pay the customs duties and the sales tax. They pay the excise duty, because that is added by the manufacturer to the cost to the consumer. They pay a large part of the income tax. The estimated grand total revenue is put at $501,700,000. Such a statement should not be applauded; it should be looked at with a great deal of dissatisfaction. We expect to get that much revenue this year, and yet the deficit is put at $13,775,000. That means that we are going into debt that much more. There is another thing that should be mentioned because we heard so much about it a few years ago. It was said that conditions were going to be so much better and the Liberals were going to make it their earnest endeavour to bring about that state of affairs. When we compare the budget of last year with the one of this year we realize that there is something like $62,538,000 more to be collected. It is not very consoling when you realize that that increased amount will have to be taken from the people in the form of taxation. It will mean a lower standard of living, and the people are certainly not going to be content when they see their standard of living being lowered year after year.

We see the results of this all over the country. We saw it in Vancouver and in Winnipeg, and it is evident in Ontario. A thousand men have been laid off in the Canadian National Railway shops in central Ontario. If nothing is done, these men will be organizing themselves into unemployed strikers. We will find the same thing spreading over the whole country. These men will be forced to organize and when they are organized they probably will be able to obtain some results. That is what will happen if we keep on in this slipshod manner. The main and supplementary estimates this year call for total expenditures of $524,600,000. This amount, which included the expected deficit of $13,775,000, will either have to be collected from the people or borrowed. If we borrow the money, then we must pay interest. Our national debt at the present time is over $3,500,000,000. I intended to bring down with me figures showing the increase in the national debt from the year 1912, but I am sorry I have not them with me at the moment. The gross debt in 1912, as I recall it, was something like $483,232,000, and on that we paid roughly $12,605,000 of interest. Out of every dollar of revenue collected there was about 7·7 cents required to pay interest on the debt. In 1936-37 the debt had increased to something like $3,542,000,000 with a total amount of interest of $137,410,000 and we had to pay for interest 30·30 cents out of every dollar of revenue collected. That is a tremendous amount to pay for interest. There must be some end to this ever increasing debt. In order to raise the necessary money we had either to borrow directly from the banks or to float loans. I had intended to bring down figures on that this afternoon, but speaking from memory, the cost of these loan flotations ran into millions and millions of dollars every year. Included in the expenses of the flotations were travelling expenses, bank fees, solicitors' fees, brokerage fees and many things of that nature. This is something which the government should take into consideration, and which they promised to take into consideration in the election campaign of 1935.

I noticed when the budget speech was being delivered that there was a great deal of applause from the Liberal benches when it was stated that interest rates had been slightly reduced. It is quite true that they have been reduced, and the government deserves commendation and encouragement in that respect. In that connection I want to read from page 3902 of Hansard, where the Minister of Finance said, speaking of the interest rate on the debt:

> On the other hand the average rate of Canada's debt outstanding as at March 31, 1931, was 4·98 per cent, and to-day the corresponding rate is 3·53 per cent, a decrease in the case of Canada of 29·1 per cent.

That is very commendable, and as I say, the minister's statement brought a great deal of applause from the Liberal benches. That is one thing that should be carried further, and I should like to make this point: If the rate of 4·98 per cent was too high and we were able to lower it to 3·53 per cent, why not lower it still more? True, 3·53 per cent is better than a higher rate, but the evil is only lessened in a small degree. I think we should recognize that fact and be consistent in our thinking and reduce interest rates, as we in this group have advocated on every occasion, or eliminate interest entirely; because there is no logical reason for borrowing money and paying interest on it. Rather, as was said by the Prime Minister in his election speeches, we should issue money in terms of public need.

At page 3903 of Hansard the Minister of Finance makes a statement in which he ridicules the contention of the social crediters that debt free money should be issued. He said:

> There are some, of course, who appear to believe that the government should not pay interest at all or, indeed, should issue debt free money to finance its expenditures or to retire its interest-bearing debt, or to do both of these things. It is incredible that this hoary fallacy should persist after so many historical demonstrations of its devastating possibilities.

The Liberals thought it was all right to reduce the rate of interest on the debt from 4·98 to 3·53 per cent, and yet the Minister of Finance condemns those who advocate issuing debt free money.

Mr. DUFFUS: Did he use the words "social credit"?

Mr. JOHNSTON (Bow River): No, but there was no doubt to whom he was referring, because he looked straight over here and said that for the last two or three years this fight had been going on. Listen to this and we will see if there is any doubt about it:

> The government is of opinion, after watching developments during the past two years, that it is highly undesirable and very much against the national interest that there should be continued political controversy with respect to the constitution of the bank itself. It is for that reason that, in addition to maintaining the control which the government now has through a substantial majority on the board of directors, the government should acquire the whole of the ownership of the shares of the bank. This has been suggested on more than one occasion by members on all sides of the house, and the government hopes that it will dispose once and for all of political discussion relating to the constitution of the bank itself.

Political discussions! I am afraid the political discussions will not be stopped merely by the nationalization of the bank. While that is very commendable, and I have no bone of contention to pick with the minister in that respect, the mere nationalization of the bank will not do what the voters intended should be done when they voted the Liberals into power. It was not only the nationalization of the bank that they asked. What they asked for was the issuance of currency and credit in terms of public need, and as the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. McGeer) said the other day, everyone expected that that was to be done, not by borrowing, but by issuing our own money and credit. But that has not been done. This party has consistently stood fast by the principle of nationalization of the bank if nationalization was necessary. We have supported that and have no dissatisfaction with that proposal at all. We think that if it was necessary it was the proper thing to do. But we contend that mere ownership is nothing, that unless the bank is controlled and directed by parliament then all talk of democracy is idle and futile. These words were never more true than when they were spoken by the Prime Minister himself. The Prime Minister listened, I think, very intently to the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard speaking in this house the other day, and acquired a great deal of knowledge he never had before in regard to banking. It is not only the Bank of Canada we have to watch, but the chartered banks. They are the ones who control the issue of money. They are the ones who are responsible to a great degree for the poverty that exists in this country. These conditions are not due to any lack on the part of the producers, manufacturing, or agricultural, because we have an abundance. Those are responsible who sit in control of finance, and who are now very highly lauding the budget that was presented this year. They are the ones who are responsible, and they should be made to answer directly to parliament.

The unemployed, when they read the budget will find small consolation. They will realize that this government intends to do little for them. Certainly the thousand men who were laid off the other day from the Canadian National shops will not, when they read the budget, find in it a great deal to be proud of. The men in Vancouver, in Victoria, in Winnipeg, and those who were in Calgary not so long ago, will find nothing whatever to look forward to, but everything to their detriment, when they read over this budget. Some of them get a small relief allowance, part of which we immediately take back from them in the form of a sales tax, increased to eight per cent, on everything they buy with the proceeds of that allowance. If they buy sugar they have to pay an added tax; on almost anything which they buy they have to pay excise tax or custom duty or sales tax or some other kind of tax. In that way their standard of living is being continually lowered. I think this is a matter to which we should give the most serious consideration. Now is the time to do it; we should not wait until there is a recurrence of what has just happened in Vancouver.

I am astonished that the government has not given more attention than it has to the situation of these unemployed young men. The other day I received a letter regarding a young fellow who, married two years ago, had steady work and just managed to get by until a few months ago. His mother wrote to me and asked, "What is he going to do? He is out of work." I personally know this man; he is as fine a man as I have ever met, a personal friend of mine. Yet he is going to be in the class of those unemployed men who are now striking. Can you blame them? All they are asking for is a chance to work at a decent wage. I do not suggest that strikes or relief riots or any action of that kind will get them what they desire, but I say that we down here are the ones to blame, we are the ones who should shoulder the responsibility, and if we would do what the Liberal party said they would do, issue money in terms of public need, one of our greatest difficulties would be overcome.

I believe that when the farmers review the budget they, too, will not have very much ground for satisfaction. It is true that they have been granted a little reduction on gopher poison, but all the gophers were poisoned before the budget came down this year, so they have not much to look forward to in that respect; and next year probably the tariff will be changed. Then there is a reduction on harness. But in the west harness is becoming obsolete; the farmers are using tractors, but there is no reduction in the duty on tractors or on farm implements. This is one of the matters to which a great deal of consideration should have been given. We had a committee sitting here for I do not know how long, investigating the prices of farm machinery. They brought in a very good report, yet nothing has been done.

On the whole the budget is a great disappointment to thousands upon thousands of the Canadian people. So far as I can see, the only ones who will benefit from it directly or indirectly are those who are in control of finance, those who are continuously making huge profits, running into millions of dollars each year, out of interest rates. I notice that the interest rate was cut. I also noticed in the return—I am sorry I have not it here—that every year without exception the amount of money we pay to the bondholders on our funded and unfunded debt has increased. It is all right to lower the interest rate as we have done. But on the other hand our national debt has increased so that we have to pay more money by way of interest each year. That is a thing which must stop. When people cheer the reduction in interest rates they do not know what they are doing. If they look more carefully at the return which was brought down in this house they will find that they are paying more money out of revenue in interest than was ever paid before, because our national debt is going up faster and higher than the interest rate is being lowered.

I do not intend to take much time, because I know the house is anxious to get through with this debate. When the Bank of Canada bill comes down I should like to see a great many changes made in it, so that the common people of this country will be given a chance, so that the young men and women who are depending upon work for wages will have a decent chance of a livelihood, that they will have a Canada of which they may well be proud. Although the budget has not provided for it, there can well be provided in the Bank of Canada bill what the Liberals promised, namely, the issuance of credit and currency in terms of public need.

Mr. THOMAS FARQUHAR (Algoma East): I wish to make a few observations which have come to me as I have sat in this house and listened to the debates for the past three years.

As this is the first time I have risen to speak in the house, may I, Mr. Speaker, impose on your good nature to the extent of saying a few words in regard to the constituency of Algoma East, which I have the honour to represent.

First, let me say that I live on Manitoulin Island,—the island of one hundred lakes, the largest island in fresh water, one of the beauty spots of the province of Ontario, which is fast becoming one of the most attractive tourist resorts in Canada. Manitoulin Island, however, though one hundred miles long, is a very small part of the constituency of Algoma East.

To give you some idea of the size of the constituency of Algoma East, let me say it covers an area of 17,700 square miles, and is as large as all of the following constituencies combined—you will note in making this comparison I have left out all the larger centres and have confined my comparison very largely to rural constituencies:

Glengarry	Russell
Haldimand	Simcoe East
Halton	Simcoe North
Hastings South	Stormont
Huron North	Waterloo North
Huron-Perth	Waterloo South
Kent	Welland
Lambton West	Wellington North
Lincoln	Wellington South
Middlesex East	Wentworth
Middlesex West	York East
Norfolk	York West
Northumberland	York South
Ontario	York North
Oxford	Brant
Peterborough West	Durham
Prescott	Elgin
Prince Edward-Lennox

All of these thirty-five constituencies could be comfortably placed within the boundaries of Algoma East constituency.

I am sure, when you fully realize and appreciate the amount of work involved in keeping in touch with and looking after the needs of my constituents, you will agree with me that in fairness to my constituents, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Howe) should supply me with an aeroplane. Nevertheless, if I were asked to-day what part of my constituency I would be prepared to give up when the next redistribution bill comes down, I would find it very difficult to decide.

I think a great deal of my constituents. I have much reason to think a great deal of them. Let me tell you what they did for me in the election of 1935. Algoma East has always been very closely contested—Liberals in one term, Conservatives in the next; no member was allowed to represent it very long at any time. In the election of 1935 I had three opposition candidates—Conservative, Cooperative Commonwealth Federation and Reconstructionist—each and all of whom lost their deposits. I had a substantial majority over all three combined. I was sorry to see my opponents lose their deposits. They are splendid fellows. Since the election two of them have joined the Liberal party, and we are expecting that the third will be working with us before the next election. I am not telling this to try to give the impression that I am popular in my riding, not at all; I am doing it to indicate that Algoma East to-day is decidedly Liberal. The reason for this of course is that they appreciate what has been accomplished by the present administration and have confidence in them.

When I hear hon. members making the statement that the present government has done nothing, all I can say is that they have no regard for the truth. I am not going to try to enumerate the accomplishments of the present government; I do not think it is necessary. I just wish to say there has never been a government in Canada that has reduced the tariffs so much in the same length of time, as the present government, nor has there ever been a government that has brought about so many trade agreements and treaties with a view to opening up markets for our products. While the government have not gone as far in the way of reducing tariffs as I should like to see it go, still we must agree that it is on the right road and going in the right direction. It is true that we on this side of the house do not always agree on questions of this kind; therefore hon. members opposite have said that as a party we are not united. But I point out that that is one of the privileges we enjoy in being Liberals; we are allowed to do our own thinking and give expression to our own thoughts. In this connection I quote the statement made by the Prime Minister, speaking to a group of newly-elected members, of whom I was one. He said: Your first duty is to be true to yourself, true to your own convictions. That is Liberalism. Of course we differ among ourselves; it is through honest differences of opinion that we arrive at sound conclusions.

A good deal has been said in this house and outside of it in regard to the spread of communism and fascism in Canada, and what we should do to prevent it. There is only one way in which the spread of such organizations as these can be prevented, and that is the way pointed out by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe), speaking in this house last year. He said: We must remove the cause. What is the cause of the spread of these movements in Canada? To my mind there are two principal causes. One is the poisonous literature that is being manufactured in this house from day to day, false statements made by hon. members and broadcast throughout the dominion, the free postage privilege being used for this purpose. Anyone who reads Hansard from day to day must agree that most of the criticisms made in this house are destructive and a very small percentage indeed constructive. This is doing more to poison the minds of the Canadian people and create a feeling of dissatisfaction and discontent than anything else that has happened in Canada. It is causing men to lose faith in a democratic form of government. Fair-minded members of this house resent the detestable and cheap method of political propaganda which some hon. members of the opposition continue to carry on from time to time, for no other reason than to create a feeling of suspicion and hatred. Any hon. member who allows himself to descend to this low level of destructive criticism is to my mind an enemy to the cause of democracy.

The other cause of the spread of these movements in Canada is the determination of the capitalistic classes to continue to enjoy their high dividends and excessive profits at the cost of the sacrifice of the great masses of the people who work on the farms and in the factories and who are to-day having such a struggle for existence. I know we have a class of people who are not anxious to work, who say that the world owes them a living; this class however is comparatively small, and it is not the class to which I refer and at whose expense the capitalistic classes enjoy their high dividends and large profits. I refer to the great army of honest toilers, struggling under serious disadvantages and making great sacrifices for those dependent on them, denied the advantages, many of them, of a proper education, and robbed of many of the necessities of life, while others live in luxury and enjoy the wealth which the toilers have produced. This has been proven by many investigations which have been made during the past number of years. If ever a dictatorship form of government should come to Canada, the moneyed interests carrying on under this system of greed and selfishness would be one of the direct and principal causes of its coming. There are no truer words than those of Burns, who said:

> Man's inhumanity to man
> Makes countless thousands mourn.

I have been very much interested in the discussions in this house from time to time with respect to farm problems. One thing on which I am sure we all agree is the fact that we cannot have prosperity in Canada unless the farming industry, the basic industry of Canada, is placed on a profitable basis. We must admit that it is far from that to-day. I have heard many suggestions in this house as to what would help the farmers, such as reduced tariffs, reduced taxes, reduced transportation rates, freer access to the markets of other countries, and so on. These will help, but to my mind neither any one of them in itself nor all combined will solve the farm problem. The farm problem will never be solved so long as farmers continue to work under their present system. Farmers must learn to do their own business, and not depend on others who are virtually conducting the farming business to-day, not for the benefit of the farmer but for their own benefit and profit. Why should not farmers own their cheese factories, their creameries, dairies, cold storage and packing plants, abattoirs? The farming industry will never be on a profitable basis as long as private interests control the sale of farm products. This must be removed from the control of private interests and a system of cooperative buying and selling adopted, a system which is working so satisfactorily in such countries as Denmark and Sweden. This cooperative system was not easily brought about, but followed a long and continuous struggle with the moneyed interests who fought so hard to prevent the farmers from getting together in a cooperative movement. This has been the history of every country where the farmers have undertaken to organize for the purpose of working cooperatively in any branch of the farming industry. In this regard Canada has been no exception, and our Canadian farmers, in undertaking cooperative organization work, must be prepared for a long, continuous struggle; for it will take some years to bring about this cooperative farm movement unless the government will come to their assistance, which I am hoping it will see the necessity of doing. If the farmers of countries such as I have mentioned can make a success of the cooperative farm movement, as they have, surely there is no reason why the intelligent farmers of Canada cannot make a success of it. I am thoroughly convinced that there is no way in which the government can be of more assistance in helping solve farm problems than to encourage the farmer with financial assistance so that he may become properly established in a cooperative marketing system. Either that, or the government should take over all the plants handling farm products and operate them in the interests of the farmer.

When the control of the marketing of farm products is taken out of the hands of private interests and operated in the interests of the farmer, then, and only then, will we have a satisfied and contented farm population in Canada. Then we will have something to attract the young and rising generation to the farms instead of crowding into the cities, as they are doing to-day, and our farm problems and to a very great extent our city relief problems will be solved.

Mr. S. J. FURNISS (Muskoka-Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I desire to add my felicitations to those already extended to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) upon the presentation of his third budget in this parliament. I have a great deal of admiration for the minister, and a great deal of sympathy as well. There is scarcely a member of this house who at some time or another does not pull at the minister's purse-strings; yet at the same time many of us complain bitterly about the taxes we help to create. I also admire the patience of the minister, which sometimes must be severely tested in carrying out his difficult task. I hope he will soon achieve his aim, which ought to be the aim of every Minister of Finance in the country; that is, a balanced budget.

In rising for the first time to take part in a budget debate, Mr. Speaker, I do so not so much to discuss the budget as to avail myself of the opportunity that is afforded hon. members to express their views regarding problems peculiar to the constituencies which they represent. The riding of Muskoka-Ontario, which I have the honour to represent, is predominantly rural. Therefore I wish first to say something in the interests of those engaged in agriculture, as one of them sees the situation.

Unemployment is still our great and immediate concern; but behind this question is the problem of agriculture, about which in my humble opinion too little is said in this house. Notwithstanding the various suggestions and theories that are offered in order to provide work for all, I believe the problem of unemployment will remain with us until there is some more equal distribution of our population; until such time as our people can be induced to return to the land and remain where there is plenty of room for all. This depends upon the prosperity of agriculture in relation to the prosperity of other industries of our country. Moreover, agriculture is the basic industry of Canada, and unless that basic industry is prosperous and on an equal footing, neither can other industries enjoy prosperity. Money is put into circulation from year to year in return for the new wealth that is produced from year to year from our forests, our mines, our fisheries and, most important of all, our agricultural resources. I say our agricultural resources are most important of all because the products are more diversified, and those engaged in agriculture form the largest producing class in Canada. Much, then, depends upon the prosperity of agriculture. If the farmer has good crops and fair prices, he has money to spend and buys freely of the things he needs; not only for his household requirements, as is the case with the industrial worker, but in connection with the equipment he needs for his farming operations, because every farm is a separate producing unit. His money is thus continually in circulation. The merchant or dealer sells the goods; the manufacturer and urban worker supply them, and thus in a properly balanced population we have general prosperity. If, on the other hand crops are poor, or, worse, if prices are such that the farmer receives little and at times next to nothing for his products, then he has little to spend, and the stream of prosperity is dried up at its very source.

Let us take a look at the situation in Canada to-day. What do we see? We behold a country—I was going to say the spectacle of a country, because to my mind it is a spectacle—vast in extent, richly endowed with natural resources of all kinds, capable of supporting a population of forty million or more in comfort or plenty, yet possessing a population of only between ten and eleven million people, which includes nearly a million who apparently are not needed in our economic system, who are a burden on the country. If we were cooped up in a country about half the size of Ontario, we would be clamouring for more land, as some of the nations of Europe are doing to-day; yet here we are with an abundance of land, and for reasons which I hope to make clear our people cannot be persuaded to stay upon it.

It may be interesting here to note the trend of population in Canada since confederation, some seventy years ago. I do not wish to burden my remarks with figures to any extent, but a reference to the statistics in this respect is necessary. In 1871, when the first census was taken, the rural population of Canada was 2,966,914 and the urban population, 722,343. In 1901, thirty years later, the rural population was 3,357,093, while the urban population was 2,014,222, showing an increase of only 390,179 in the rural population, while the urban population had increased by 1,291,879. When the last census was taken, in 1931—again thirty years later—the rural population was 4,804,728 and the urban population was 5,572,058, showing a further increase in the rural population of only 1,447,635, while the increase in the urban population amounted to 3,557,836. In other words, out of every one hundred people at confederation eighty lived in the country and twenty in the towns. This has gradually changed, at a fairly even rate during the various census periods, until in 1931 out of every one hundred people in Canada only forty-six lived in the rural districts and fifty-four lived in the urban centres.

In referring to this matter in a speech on the report of the farm implements committee as reported at page 2678 of Hansard, the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) had this to say:—

So long as you had in Canada a population the major part of which was rural, you had a situation which was not very difficult to deal with. But to-day we have a population the major part of which is to be found in cities and towns. That has created for all governments—and I trust hon. members will agree with me as I proceed, because I am trying to keep away from controversy—a problem of great magnitude. Think of it: Over one-half of the population of this dominion has gone to the cities and towns. That became apparent for the first time when the census was taken in 1931. It has been greatly accentuated since that time. Our population in cities and towns has grown and grown. People are going from the country to the towns and cities, in the west chiefly because of crop failures and in the eastern communities for other reasons which need not here be discussed; and the result is that to-day, in this early period in our history as a dominion—only now, be it noted, something like seventy-one years, which is but nothing in the life of a country—the major part of our population is in cities and towns.

That is what the right hon. gentleman said regarding the problem to which I am referring. The question which arises in my mind is: Why are they there? Why should it be that in a country so richly blessed in agricultural resources we find in so short a time that our farms are becoming deserted and our towns and cities are overcrowded? There must be reasons, and I submit, Mr. Speaker, that chief among them is the policy of high tariff protection which has been unnecessarily followed and to which the right hon. the leader of the opposition and his followers still pin their faith. Under this policy an artificial disparity has been created between the returns from industry, whose product is sold in the protected home market, and the returns from the products of agriculture the prices of which are set in the open markets of the world.

This inequality in wages, if you like to call it such, has set up a higher or more attractive standard of living in the urban centres, than in the rural districts, and may I say, at the expense of the rural districts. Mankind, true to nature, has followed the lines of least resistance. He has gone where living conditions were easiest, where he obtained higher wages for shorter hours of labour, and so we find the equilibrium between rural and urban population seriously out of balance. If the situation could be reversed, I venture the opinion that our unemployment problem would soon disappear.

If I might be permitted, I would like to refer briefly to a speech made in the house by the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) as reported in Hansard for 1937, at page 1503:

In the old days at home there was a man making shoes in a little village near where I was born. That man is now keeping a shoe store in an adjacent town. Many a time when I was a boy I watched him making shoes, and talking to the man last summer I asked him: How is it that after all the changes which have taken place, with all the fine machinery with which the shoe factories are equipped to-day, with all the improved methods of distribution, when I come to buy a pair of shoes from you to-day they cost more than they did in my boyhood when a man working at the bench made them?

That was the question the hon. member asked after comparing the relative income of agriculture with the total national income.

In the same debate the hon. member for York South (Mr. Lawson) replied in part to the questions, as reported at page 1533 of Hansard for March 5, 1937:

I was in the course of outlining some factors which enter into the cost of shoes to-day. I named one. Secondly, in the days when the shoe merchant of to-day was the shoemaker of yesterday, the shoemaker's wife probably got one new dress a year. To-day the shoe merchant's wife probably gets three or four or five or six new dresses a year.

That is one of the reasons given for the failure of industry with all its labour saving machinery to reduce the cost of its product. It might be noted here, though, that the tariff protection on ordinary boots and shoes is 20 per cent under the British preferential and 30 per cent otherwise, and the question that comes to my mind is: When the farmer sells in the open markets of the world and buys in the protected market, how much will he have left to buy for his wife the half-dozen new dresses a year that she so rightly deserves? The farmer pays for the dresses when he buys the shoes, but the shoe merchant's wife wears them. This applies not to shoes alone, but to almost everything the farmer purchases.

Reading on in the speech of the right hon. leader of the opposition, to which I referred, we find what he proposes as a solution of the problem of unemployment. He says:

> I suggest to hon. members that in a country with a population so sparse, inhabiting an area so vast, that with an urban population so great relatively to the rural population, subject to the conditions I have imposed as to quality and price, the tariff should be such as to give to the Canadian producer in factory and mill the business of his own country. I have never hesitated for a moment to say that I apply that principle also to agriculture.

That is the same policy as was adopted in 1930 when the hon. gentleman was elected to office, only more of it,—even carrying it to a point of exclusion. But we must remember that Canada is primarily an agricultural country and if her farms are properly occupied and worked as they should be, our products will be in excess of home requirements for years to come. We must therefore seek outside markets for our surpluses.

If, as under the policy enunciated by the right hon. leader of the opposition, we will not buy, then we cannot hope to sell, and the result is restricted markets for our farm products, a glut on the home market, lower prices, less purchasing power by the largest consuming class of manufactured goods, and more unemployment until the latter condition is worse than the former.

It appears to me as a farmer that the policy of high protection of the Conservative party is designed to commence at the top and build down, to make the towns and cities prosperous first with the hope that some measure of prosperity will trickle through to the primary producer. But so far this has been a forlorn hope. In contrast to this, the Liberal policy is to commence at the bottom and build up, by seeking to trade with nations who are willing to trade on more equitable terms. It aims first to make the primary producer prosperous, thereby securing a more evenly balanced population, and assuring a greater measure of prosperity for all.

Between these policies it seems to me a serious question is involved. Is this dominion, of which we are all so justly proud, to be the home of many thousands more of happy families, contentedly tilling the soil as nature intended, producing enough and to spare; or on the other hand, is our rural population to be restricted by the needs of the towns and cities within our borders only? Let us pay heed to what has taken place in the world in the last few years. Let us endeavour to people our country as it should be, lest we too fall a prey to the covetous eyes of nations who are not so favourably situated as we are.

There is another aspect to the farm problem about which I wish to speak. I often wonder if those who are not engaged in farming ever realise the position that agriculture holds, relative to the other industries that make up our economic system. Let me use a simple illustration, so simple that I feel like offering an apology for it, but I know of none better and so am going to use it to serve my purpose. It is nothing more than a direct application of the underlying principle of all business, which at some time or another is applied to adjust prices by the various industries that make up the round of our industrial life. Might I ask hon. members to indulge their imaginations for a short time and think of me as a farmer raising hogs on an extensive scale?

Some years ago, just before a sharp rise in freight rates took place, I sold a carload of hogs to be delivered two weeks hence f.o.b. shipping point. In the meantime the increase in freight rates had gone into effect. When the meat packer received the hogs he found his freight bill was up $50, and likewise the freight on all his other shipments of hogs was up corresponding amounts. He immediately gets busy and says, "Here, my hogs are costing me more money; I must have more money for my products." He marks up his prices accordingly. He passes on the increase. He sells his products to the retailer who receives them over the same transportation system. The retailer finds that his invoice is marked up, as well as the cost of his freight or express. He gets busy and says, "My goods are costing me more; I must mark up my prices." He marks them up accordingly and passes on the increased cost. A housewife comes in for her weekly supply of foodstuffs and discovers that prices are up. When she goes home she says to her husband, "I will have to have a larger allowance next week because I find that groceries and other necessities have gone up in price." Her husband meets with his fellow workmen to talk over the matter, and finally they decide that since their living costs have gone up they must ask for more wages. Their employer being a reasonable man, he grants their request. They pass on the increased cost to their employer.

Suppose this employer is a manufacturer of farm implements. When he looks over his payroll he discovers that it has gone up ten or fifteen per cent. He says, "My labour costs are up; I must mark up the price of my implements," and he does so accordingly. He passes on the increase. I may need a new set of implements the following spring. When I interview the agent I find that prices are up fifteen or twenty per cent. As I must have the implements I buy them. If the cost of my implements is up, I must have more money for the next car of hogs I send to market. However, when I try to pass on my increased cost, what happens? I am just as likely to have to take less for my hogs as I am to get more. I am lucky if I break even in a comparison with the previous year's prices. That is the position which agriculture occupies as compared with other industries in our country. Farmers to-day are working eighty, ninety and one hundred hours a week for less wages than the urban worker receives for a forty-four hour week. That is why people are leaving the farms and flocking to the cities.

With our present system there has to be some industry that bears the burden of any readjustment in prices. In our case that industry is agriculture because it cannot count any increased cost of production as a factor in setting its selling price. I have taken you around the circle and shown that even though agriculture has not contributed to the increased cost, yet it has had to bear that additional burden. I had to pay the additional cost for my implements, but I had no way to recoup myself. That being so, then the only thing that can be done is to make the burden as light as possible. I complain only of unjust burdens, and I named the most vicious one when I referred to high tariff protection. There are many others which I shall not attempt to mention, but let me say here that I consider anything for which no value is given as an unjust burden.

I would refer particularly to profits on watered or common stock which do not represent a single dollar of cash investment. One has only to refer to the Turgeon report on the textile industry, or to the report of the committee on agricultural implements, for glaring examples of this. I might refer also to the artificial prices placed upon real estate for which no value is given, but which must be paid by some person. These are some of the burdens that eventually have to be borne by the farmer. Until they are removed from our system, our farmers are doomed to be hewers of wood and carriers of water for the other organized interests in the country.

One other way in which agriculture can be helped, is in the marketing of its products. Hitherto the activities of our departments of agriculture have been along the lines of increasing production, but I am pleased to see that the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has initiated an aggressive program of marketing. I trust that this will not stop short of assisting in the cooperative processing of our live stock. We have one plant fashioned after the Danish system which is operating successfully in Ontario at the present time. I believe this is the only solution to be found for the problem which has been referred to this house on several occasions.

There are other things about which I should like to speak in connection with my constituency, such as reforestation and the tourist trade, but they must wait for another occasion.

Just a word about the unemployment situation. I have listened to many speeches in this house with regard to unemployment, and I have come to the conclusion that some people think all this government has to do is to wave a magic wand, say "presto", and the problem of unemployment will vanish overnight. This problem has been too long in the making to be cured in one year, in three years or in ten years. For tens of years the best brains of the country have been employed in the discovery and invention of labour destroying machines without a single thought being given to the effect on our economic system. Now our best brains will be required for many years to find a way out of this difficulty in order that we may maintain our individual freedom and our democratic form of government.

Let me say in conclusion that I do not believe man can create any condition which he cannot redeem if he sets himself diligently to the task of finding out the cause and resolutely applying the remedy. That is the task which confronts not only this country, but every other nation in the world. If this problem cannot be solved, then civilization as we know it, is doomed to perish.

Mr. H. R. FLEMING (Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is with a certain degree of trepidation that I rise in my place in this house to make a few remarks on the budget that was presented to the house last Thursday. I must say, Mr. Speaker, at the outset of these brief words how deeply I feel for the absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) from this house on account of illness. The Minister of Finance is one of my oldest and closest personal and political friends. I have known him intimately from my early years in Saskatchewan. He has always given the best of his time and his energy for the welfare of his adopted country. I hope that his recovery will be rapid and that he will soon be back in his place in the House of Commons where he occupies a position of such eminence in this new country.

I was pleased as I sat here and listened to the fine exposition of the Minister of Finance concerning the financial affairs of the country. I listened also with considerable pride to the degree of improvement that has been made in our financial position during these difficult, trying, and troublesome times. The financial management of the country has been good, but I was dumbfounded when I found no measure of relief in the way of tariff reductions for the people of the western plains and the people of the constituency that I have the honour to represent in this House of Commons. I must offer, in my humble way, my protest.

I returned just a short time ago from the election battle in Saskatchewan, and during that campaign I addressed, with my fellow-members of this House of Commons, a great many meetings. At these meetings men and women of all shades of political thought and political beliefs were gathered together to listen to the problems to be discussed, and at all these meetings I found that the people we were addressing were one in asking for some relief from the troubles they were enduring. I personally addressed some thirty-five meetings in the time I was absent from this house, and the one question that was uppermost in their minds was that the government of Canada should do something to alleviate in some small way the distress under which they were labouring. At nearly every meeting questions would be asked, and the question that was always asked was: What is your government going to do in the way of removing duties on agricultural implements?

I told them that if they would be reasonable; if they would wait for a short time, I was sure that when the budget was presented this year some measure of tariff reduction would be contained therein. I told them that it was a Liberal government under the leadership of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, in 1911, that brought to them the first measure of tariff reform. I told them that it was the Liberal government under the leadership of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) that brought, in the Dunning budget of 1930, the second great measure of tariff reform to the people of western Canada.

But many of these people asked this question: Why do they wait until election year to do these things? I, in my implicit faith in Liberal governments, in Liberal policies, in Liberal doctrines, said to them: Send Liberal representatives to the parliament at Regina who will be in favour of lower tariffs, and if you do this I can return to my place in parliament and say with strong united voice: "Lower those tariffs, Mr. Dunning. We still trust you. We still believe in you as one of Saskatchewan's great premiers."

But, Mr. Speaker, when I find that nothing has been done in the matter of tariff reductions on farm implements or on anything else, it is difficult for me to support a policy of this kind. The Liberal party had its rise in the natural impulse of the people toward greater freedom, and in all its history it has never lacked witness to the fundamental truth which that word has come to mean. Liberalism means more to me than a passing fancy. I have always believed that in the Liberal party there was the greatest measure of freedom of thought and freedom of action. But the other day, within the hallowed walls of this house of parliament, I happened to ask for some information from one of the ministers of this government, and he turned upon me and said that this Saskatchewan bunch was so-and-so, and that he would not support the wheat board if we did not support the budget. Mr. Speaker, let me tell this house, and let me tell this government, that as long as I am a member of this House of Commons I will not be intimidated by any minister of the crown. I come from a race that has never admitted defeat. For seven hundred years the Irish people fought the might of imperial England, and I as a member of that race will never be coerced by any ministerial threat, whether it comes from privy councillor or governor. This is supposed to be a democratic government, and no party whip will snap me into action.

I resent the intejection that was made during this debate a few days ago by the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Fraser), when he said in a sneering way that we, the members from western Canada, would vote for the budget. Let me tell that hon. member; let me tell this house; let me tell this government, and let me tell this country, that I believe in the Liberal policy and in the Liberal platform. I believe in a united Canada. Too long have we, the people of the western plains, been sacrificed upon the economic altar of St. James street. I believe in national unity; I believe in confederation, and in a strengthened confederation at that, but I believe that the conflict between dominion and provincial powers has reached a point where we may have to decide between a strong federal government and a redivision into provinces and sovereign states. Personally I believe that national unity is essential. Western Canada has contributed much to our national unity and to our national economy.

I mentioned in a former address in this House of Commons that we had been discriminated against by transportation rates and by tariff walls under various federal administrations, but that we had never openly advocated secession. We have always relied upon the good will and understanding of other parts of this great Canadian country which have profited by the new markets which the development of our western lands has opened up to them. But we have now reached the point when something must be done to help the people in those great areas of western Canada. Whatever may be the outcome of our difficulties, I am confident that our destiny lies in confederation, and I am convinced that the way leads through the Liberal party. If there ever was a danger to the west's position, it is through that political appendage of industrialism, the Conservative party.

I cannot vote for the amendment, nor can I vote for the subamendment, because one would mean a Conservative policy, and the other would mean that in order to bring those things into effect it would have to be done through a Conservative government, and we know what that would mean because it is the party of higher protection. The socialist or Cooperative Commonwealth Federation amendment is simply adding a few words to the Conservative amendment, and it in no way modifies or changes the Conservative amendment.

Mr. Speaker, we are an intelligent people. If we gave as much time to the consideration of the broad principles of distribution of the benefits of our progress as we do to much squabbling over inconsequential items of routine administration, the people would have more confidence in us as their leaders. Let us face the future fearlessly. Let us walk with dignity and with pride into the future. Let us believe in the character of our people. Let us believe in the legitimacy of our dreams. Let us return to the principles of Liberalism, those principles that were taught to us by the great leaders who have gone before, those principles of orthodox Liberalism that I learned at my mother's knee. I think, Mr. Speaker, the government should promote a policy of the technique of transition:—

So in the long hereafter this Canada shall be
The worthy heir of British power and British liberty—
Spreading the blessings of her sway to her remotest bounds,
While with the fame of her fair name a continent resounds;
True to her high traditions, to Britain's ancient glory
Of patient saint and martyr alive in deathless story,
Strong in her liberty and truth to shed from shore to shore
A light among the nations—till nations are no more.

Mr. Speaker, after thinking the question over, after communing alone with myself, I have decided that there is no solution that I can offer to this problem which I have been debating with my inmost self, but that I must support my own distinguished leader the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Mackenzie King) and will vote for the budget.

Mr. G. G. McGEER (Vancouver-Burrard): May I tender my regrets and message of sympathy to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in the unfortunate break in his health at this critical time? I sympathize with him the more because I feel that under the course which he is following it is utterly impossible for any Minister of Finance to retain his own health, much less the health of the public purse of the nation.

We have been listening to budget statements for a great many years, and they are all attended with a great deal of justifiable optimism. Apparently that optimism must come from the fact that "hope springs eternal in the human breast," because on every single occasion, whether openly acknowledged or ingeniously concealed, our budgets have consistently shown a deficit that has continually mounted as the impossible and unpayable debt burden of the nation.

If you examine this budget, Mr. Speaker, you will find it strangely similar to every other budget which has ever been introduced in this house. It indicates the persistent rise in the ever-increasing dominion, provincial and municipal taxpayers' load of debt, which is now over $7,000,000,000. The fact is that the Conservative party was elected in 1930 on a promise that they would cure unemployment with an appropriation of $20,000,000 of public funds, and that our national debt has increased by over $1,000,000,000 since 1929, and is still increasing without any real solution being offered of the unemployment problem in Canada, notwithstanding some measure of success. Why is it that a nation as rich as Canada cannot have progress without that progress being overshadowed by unpayable increases in existing unpayable debts? To-day, notwithstanding that the budget shows the highest revenue ever collected in the history of the dominion—and similar expressions are coming from cities and municipalities—investment in city property from one end of Canada to the other is practically a liability. Under the blight of existing taxation business in Canada has come practically to a standstill. Our public service lags far behind twentieth century standards, and unemployment not only continues but is again rising.

I do not want to be one who has not hope for the future. But I read to-day that in the Canadian National Railway shops some thousand men are being laid off until the fourth of July, and Mr. Kingsland, one of the vice-presidents, announces that we shall have to wait until then to see what is going to happen. In my own province of British Columbia we had hopes that the war in Asia would not last very long and that there soon would be a revival of Asiatic trade. To-day, as a result of there being little or no hope of an immediate conclusion of that disastrous conflict across the Pacific, some industries have been hit with almost the same force that the drought conditions struck the farms in southern Saskatchewan. I suggest to the government that it will be a serious mistake for this house to rise without some more ample provision being made for the emergency possibilities of unemployment during the coming year than exists at the present time. It may be unfortunate, but I understand that neither Ontario nor Quebec is willing to cooperate in guaranteeing the loan which this government has made to municipalities for the purpose of preventing unemployment through the promotion of self-liquidating enterprises at a two per cent rate of interest. I know there is no possibility, with the amount of money which would be our share in the province of British Columbia and in the city of Vancouver, of meeting the problems that I feel reasonably satisfied we are going to face before the coming winter is over.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

After Recess

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McGEER: Before recess I had drawn attention to the fact that under our present system progress seems to suffer under the inevitable stalemate of debt. But worse than that, every sane person must acknowledge that a system which taxes us into depression and prevents progress and prosperity, where there is every reason for believing that prosperity and progress both can and should exist, does not contain the remedy for the most important of all Canadian problems, namely that of financing greater Canadian expansion and development, and more widespread and general prosperity. The time approaches when we must all come to the conclusion that our present and previous budgets indicate that those who have the responsibility of administering public affairs must give much more real thought and study to theories and practical details of monetary policy than has been the case in the past. If there is one outstanding feature of our whole economic program to which public men, whether they be in municipal life or provincial or national life, give little or no attention, it is the actual details of our monetary system. Such thought would go very far to disclose that the root of much of our present economic difficulty will be found in our overcautious attitude towards public administration of national currency and credit. We seem to be afraid as public men to grasp and take hold of that all-important problem. Worshipping at the shrine of orthodox finance we ignore the truth that our government is poor simply because parliament has given away its power to create money to those who have made the cost of financing government prohibitive. The result is that while the government exerts great and ingenious efforts to balance the budget, a little thought would disclose that in reality it is vainly trying to budget on a balance. That is, we are trying to budget the affairs of the nation on the inadequate balance of the nation's money power which the taxpayers can afford to borrow from the private hoardings of accumulated savings and from the owners of our privately owned credit system.

The absurd and impossible situation of being taxed into depression exists simply because we have followed the thoroughly unsound proposition that sovereign governments have no access to public spending power other than by collecting taxes from and making other levies on the people and by borrowing from accumulated savings. That this proposition is thoroughly unsound is no longer open to question. Ever since the Minister of Finance for Canada has acknowledged that we in this country have adopted a monetary system based on "a managed paper standard" under which "the value of our currency is determined by the principles of demand and supply," we in parliament, by the adoption of that policy, have made the lawmaking authority of parliament the source of supply of Canadian money. Therefore, unless the government has given away its power to create money through law, or does not know how to manage national currency and credit in the service of the nation, parliament has the power to create and circulate the medium of exchange in the volume that is needed to sustain Canadian progress with orderly advancement. Unfortunately we in parliament have given away, not to the Bank of Canada but to the chartered banks, the power to create Canadian money. Surely every member of this house and every citizen of Canada must, at one time or another during the last few years, have asked himself or herself, From what source are other nations securing the power to finance progress to the extent that it is being financed in other nations, as well as to finance what is unfortunately more costly than progress, the enormous war programs which are under way in practically every nation in the world? This parliament, due to its affiliation with the League of Nations has a right to review what has been said by the director of the international labour office at Geneva. He summarises the world situation in these words:

> But perhaps the most outstanding lesson of the slump is to be found in the profound change it has produced in ideas about monetary policy. In this field more than in any other lies the key to economic prosperity and social progress. The demonstration that in one country after another the upturn of business and employment coincided not with the reduction of wage rates, the cutting of costs or the deterioration of working conditions, but with the abandonment of deflation and the adoption of monetary expansion, has made a deep impression on the world.

Surely this experience the world over proves that the time has gone by when men can scorn controlled inflation and monetary reform and dismiss it idly as something unworthy of consideration. Nations the world over have found a new lease of national strength and new recovery of internal prosperity in the management of their own currency, the acceptance of this conclusion is not dependent upon the evidence which may be found in the monetary experiments of the dictatorships, Russia, Japan, Germany or Italy, or in the pump-priming program in the United States, although the successes and failures of their fiscal policy should not be ignored; for such countries, bankrupt a few years ago, irrespective of whether they are using their financial resources effectively or otherwise, are no longer short of money. People say that the Roosevelt program of expenditure has failed. Let me ask any member of this house what would have happened in 1933, 1934, 1935, if the national government of the United States had not undertaken such expenditures. Even to-day those who scorn Roosevelt's attempt to conquer poverty for the people of the United States are forced to acknowledge that if the national government of the United States failed to go forward with a further spending program, the inevitable result would be a disastrous depression of unparalleled dimensions.

But quite apart from the dictatorships or the Roosevelt administration in the United States, there is ample evidence to support the significance of monetary reform to be found in the recovery program of the British isles, where under a completely revolutionized monetary outlook, human and national need policies are being projected and financed upon entirely new theories of financial and political economy. The epochal British revolt against orthodox finance and classical economy was engendered by sheer necessity, and arose directly from the failure of the deflationary policy launched in 1925 by Winston Churchill, the then chancellor of the British exchequer. Under that policy Mr. Churchill hoped to restore international trade and, in turn, internal trade in Britain by reducing public expenditure, salaries, wages, working conditions, living standards and the cost of industrial production, accompanied by whatever increases in taxation were necessary to balance the budget. Under that misguided policy, which I am afraid we are continuing to pursue in Canada, the national credit of Great Britain was almost destroyed. The resulting collapse of her national credit and security forced the British government to repudiate orthodox finance and classical economy and stake her whole future on inflation.

What has happened in England is simply this: The government has taken the control of currency and credit away from irresponsible bankers and placed it where it properly belongs, under responsible government. From the point of view of human well-being this revolution against banker rule is just as important as and more far-reaching than Magna Charta; for through it the government has found the means of financing the public services that are essential to orderly progress. The old days of laissez-faire are over in England; the day when the government can be indifferent to industry and the well-being of the people has passed. Now the British government moves to protect the standard of living of the humblest and to guard and protect industry in all its ramifications. The first great step in the emancipation of Britain from the slavery of orthodox finance has been taken, and other steps are certain to follow; for this money revolution in Great Britain was not born of blind selfishness or class hatred but had its genesis in the evolution of intelligent understanding. It has been fostered by outstanding industrialists, the London Chamber of Commerce and men of high finance such as Reginald McKenna, war-time chancellor of the exchequer, who financed the war on a managed currency basis. As chairman of the Midland bank, on January 27, 1934, he laid down this basic rule for all governments to follow:

> Nothing in monetary practice is more certain than that contraction of the volume of money, or even failure to secure an adequate increase, tends both directly and indirectly to put a brake upon business of every kind, and to produce the very troubles—unemployment, unremunerative commodity prices, unbalanced budgets and general depression—which have been apparent in almost every country of the world in the past four years. "With expanding population and production we need expansion in the supply of money, or it will inevitably follow that consumption will not keep pace with production."

The support of McKenna for the new British policy was quickly followed by the endorsement of John Maynard Keynes, who pointed out:

> The creation of legal tender has been and is a government's ultimate reserve; and no state is likely to decree its own bankruptcy or its own downfall so long as this instrument remains at hand unused.
> Thus we accept Mr. McKenna's contention that an expansion of credit is the key to the situation. But we conclude that if whilst an increase volume of bank credits is probably a sine qua non of increased employment, a program of home investment which will absorb this increase is a sine qua non of the same expansion of credit.

What we have done in Canada is to create an abundance of credit, but we have not provided that adequate program of home investment which puts that accumulation of credit to work for the Canadian nation and the Canadian people. This problem of public spending presented by Keynes is in reality the one that the British government has solved, and I think it has been solved in this way. If the people owning savings fail or refuse to exchange their savings for treasury notes or other governmental securities offered on terms fixed by the government to provide the government with funds needed for new enterprise or to balance the budget, then the banks are called upon to absorb such securities by expanding bank credits which are placed at the disposal of the government in the form of bank deposits. Therefore the British government always has at its disposal a plentiful supply of money on its own terms. By investing such credits in social services, public works, the development of trade, and the national defence, the British government is able to keep circulating the medium of exchange needed to increase the production, distribution and use of wealth, to raise the standards of living of the people, to enlarge the national income, to increase the volume of trade and the stability of commerce, to supply the means of paying taxes, to maintain all public services and to make more secure the defence of the United Kingdom and its world-wide interests. The British government, by spending national credit, is now fulfilling "its most conspicuous and sacred responsibility," namely that of supplying the circulation of consumers' buying power which is the economic blood-stream of the commerce and industry of the capitalistic democracy that it is charged to sustain.

In avoiding the evil consequences of inflation the British government first limits its expenditure to what it thinks are the practical, economic, social and national needs of the day. It also maintains a scheme of high and widespread taxation on income which prevents the accumulation of an excessive volume of issued buying power medium of exchange. It also maintains a definite leadership in the regulation of prices, wages, working conditions, production and distribution, taking particular care to prevent the development of speculative booms in securities and commodities. Expenditures on social service in Great Britain are no longer feared as burdens of the state but are now being recognized as essential not only to those in need but to the general going-concern activity of the business of the nation. For the same reason the British government now spends freely in granting financial aid to housing and slum clearance programs; to shipping and industry; to the development of electrical energy; to the recovery of fuel oil from coal and the nationalization of coal mines; to agricultural production and, through other channels, to all phases of national development.

Under this practical perspective of currency management the British government now meets the entire public cost of unemployment relief, unemployment insurance and health services, old age pensions, mothers' pensions and aid to children; and through grants in aid has assumed much of the liability of the poor laws and many other obligations which formerly fell upon the taxpayers in counties and municipalities. In pursuance of her policy of relieving the owner of improved property under local government from the burden of excessive taxation by local authorities, the national government of Great Britain now pays some sixty per cent of the cost of education and fifty per cent of the cost of local police services. In addition to these continuing obligations she goes forward with a tremendous program of national rearmament.

Mr. BENNETT: On borrowed money.

Mr. McGEER: Well, I did not hope to get that obsession out of the mind of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett), but I am hopeful of getting it out of the mind of the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King).

Mr. BENNETT: She floated a loan of $400,000,000 just the other day.

Mr. McGEER: Yes, I read about it very carefully.

Mr. BENNETT: It looks like it.

Mr. McGEER: Now that my right hon. friend has raised that question, let me deal with it. In addition to pouring out money for those in need through her inflationary policies, she is also able to pour out, to those who have accumulated savings, an income via the interest route; but if my right hon. friend will be patient for a little while, I shall deal with the reason for that and I think he will agree with me, because probably he knows more about it than I do. But there are men in the old country who agree with me, and I am going to quote one now. For instance, in connection with the controlled inflation program of the British government, in his annual statement to the shareholders of his bank in 1935 Mr. McKenna pointed out that the adoption of controlled inflation was the first essential to the recovery of British commerce and industry, and he then stated:

> The quantity of our money is no longer governed by the fortuitous supply of gold and the degree to which hoarding is practised by central banks and others. The quantity of money is subject now to pure management with first regards to the needs of commerce and industry.

I venture to say that the experience and record of the Right Hon. Reginald McKenna, both as chairman of the Midland bank and as chancellor of the exchequer place him in at least as high a position of authority as that held by the right hon. leader of the opposition in the Canadian House of Commons.

In the May 21, 1938, issue of The Economist, which I have no doubt the right hon. gentleman reads, we are also told:

> There are distinct signs that the policy of cheap plentiful credit is being continued and intensified so as to combat the recession, and also so as to facilitate the financing of rearmament. Such a deduction is not at variance with the occasional reaffirmations of monetary policy which from time to time have emerged from official quarters.

That the British system of managed currency is directly under the control of the government was positively declared by Mr. Neville Chamberlain, then chancellor of the British exchequer and now Prime Minister, in his address at the Mansion House on October 7, 1936. On that occasion he stated:

> Sterling is still free. It is unlinked to gold or any other currency. There is no alteration in the credit policy which is necessary to preserve the internal prosperity of this country or of the other countries of the British empire. "Our improvement is principally due to two causes, both of which arise directly out of government action. The first is the system of very moderate protection which we have established, and the second is the maintenance of low rates of long term interest. We have not in contemplation any change in either of these two branches of our policy."

Here is the chancellor of the British exchequer taking full responsibility on the part of the British government to regulate the rate of interest on long term credits in the British isles. When I mentioned this fact to the house the other night I thought it well to quote it again, because it impressed me so much. I believe I have nearly committed it to memory. When I heard the governor of the Bank of England acknowledge that the government had the unqualified cooperation of British bankers, and that the government was in complete control of the money system, I was amazed. However these are his exact words:

> Those for whom I speak welcome the freedom which we have in comparison with those in many other markets, but we wish to use that freedom in the only proper way it can be used, and that is in harmony with the government's policy. I assure the ministers that if they will make known through the appropriate channels what they wish us to do in furtherance of their policies they will at all times find us willing with good will and loyalty to do what they direct as though we were under legal compulsion.

Here is a British chancellor of the exchequer declaring a policy of government control, and the head of the Bank of England, speaking on behalf of the bankers, declaring that "we, as bankers in England, agree with that program."

We have a little different attitude in Canada because the statement of the governor of the Bank of England stands out in marked contrast to the statement of the deputy governor of the Bank of Canada who, speaking on March 28 in Ottawa to the junior board of trade, said:

> In many countries the policy of the government is the policy of the central bank; certainly no respectable central bank would accept a policy from its government with which it differed fundamentally.

Of course that was the rule when Mr. Osborne was imported by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) from the Bank of England to come to Canada to run our bank; but it no longer prevails in any respectable democracy; for now in respectable democracies the governments and not the bankers rule the nation's currency and credit. British economic and national power to-day gives final refutation to those who have parrot-like repeated the shibboleth that a nation cannot spend her way to prosperity and security. Proportionately to her population, national income, wealth and debt load, Great Britain is spending annually not as much as Germany or Russia, but slightly more than Roosevelt is spending annually in the United States, and at least double the amount we are spending annually in Canada.

If Great Britain were to reduce her budget to the basis we have adopted as safe and sane for Canada, she would cut her annual expenditure in two. What would be the result? Her national defence would be destroyed; her foreign trade would be lost, and her internal economy would stagnate in a welter of bankruptcy, destitution and revolution. We would have conditions in England such as unfortunately we have to-day in Vancouver.

The present plan of Great Britain may be criticized as being far from perfect. I know they are still borrowng unnecessarily, and I know they are still paying interest unnecessarily, but it can be said that much of the public financing has been reduced to the lowest rate of interest in history, and the government is in control. But the great thing about British policy is that Great Britain is no longer short of money. It must be remembered that this new plan is only seven years old. It dates from the bankruptcy of Great Britain in 1931, when she collapsed under the gold standard, orthodox finance and classic economy.

It must also be remembered that it is being carried out by a government which represents the Conservative minority in England whose respect for the wages of money is still higher than its regard for the wages of men, and whose worship of the institutions of accumulated wealth overshadows its concern for the well-being of individuals other than those possessed of interest bearing bonds, and those who live by the sweat of other men's faces. What a great thing it would be for this Dominion of Canada if the right hon. the leader of the opposition would take as much interest in the wages of men as he takes in the conditions of those who collect interest on government bonds!

To the government may I say this, that continued indifference to the financial needs of provinces, cities and people, and to Canadian progress, prosperity and security will not command the respect of the majority indefinitely, who I believe are beginning to feel that the time has come when we should be moving along the lines of currency management which other nations are successfully developing.

Along the course of controlled inflation that Great Britain has taken to success we in Canada must not be afraid to follow; for through her new monetary system developed under the British empire currency policy of 1933, to which Canada is a party, Great Britain now has billions for unemployed relief, pensions, education and other social services; billions for reconstruction of home and city; unlimited billions for the promotion of trade and commerce and the maintenance of empire defence, and billions for the betterment of the world at large.

How is it that that little country, with her limited natural resources, her tremendous obligation to maintain the value of her buying power in the world's markets, and in view of the relation she has to import trade, can do all she is doing under managed currency, when we still are afraid to move—with so little done, so much to do and so much to do with? There is no reason why Canadian development cannot go forward in the light of the experience of other nations, which demonstrates the facilities that can be used for development.

What I wish to point out to the house is this, that we have adopted inflation, and we adopted it under the right hon. the leader of the opposition, when he was Prime Minister, at the time when he put into effect the British empire currency policy at the Ottawa conference in 1932. That was the development which followed the collapse of the world economic conference in London of that year. We adopted that policy first in 1930, second in 1932, and then what did we do in 1933?

To make it effective in our dominion coined gold was withdrawn from circulation; the right of the free export of gold was cancelled; the price of gold was raised from $20 to $35; the right to secure the conversion of paper money and bank deposits into gold on demand was wiped out, and we established a virtual government monopoly over the purchase and export of gold. The issue of a stabilization fund of $250,000,000 to maintain the international value of our dollar was authorized by an act yet to be proclaimed, presumably because our favourable balance of trade has been so satisfactory that it was not necessary, which is a fact.

In 1934 parliament, recognizing the need for currency and credit expansion in Canada, which the new policy contemplated, enacted the Bank of Canada Act containing provision for the reduction of gold reserves for currency purposes to 25 per cent, and it also provided for the complete suspension of gold reserves by order in council in case of national emergency.

Parliament also amended the Bank Act to permit chartered banks to create and issue bank deposits on a five per cent reserve of Bank of Canada bills. By these laws this parliament reduced currency and bank deposit legal reserves and extended the limits of inflation so that our banking system could provide the government with the use of the nation's credit in almost unlimited volume. Parliament in addition did everything necessary to permit our banks to extend to our dominion, provincial and civic governments the plentiful supply of money that a managed currency system is designed to supply, which, under public control of currency and credit, is now available to the governments of Great Britain, Germany, Italy, Japan, Russia and many other nations.

The cardinal features of these laws, which every member of parliament should know if he is performing his full duty, are very simple. They are to be found, first, in section 26 of the Bank of Canada Act, 1934, which permits the Bank of Canada to issue full legal tender money on a 25 per cent gold basis, which means that it can expand gold into four to one of legal tender currency. This section gives the Bank of Canada the exclusive right to issue all Canadian full legal tender cash in the form of currency bills and, as I said a moment ago, on a basis of expansion of four to one.

Under section 27 of the same act, and under subsection 4 of section 59 of the Bank Act, 1934, the chartered banks are authorized to issue bank credit in the form of alleged bank deposits on a five per cent reserve of Bank of Canada bills. Therefore, for every five dollars of Bank of Canada bills which the Bank of Canada may issue, our chartered banks are authorized by parliament to create bank credit in the form of bank deposits up to the value of $100, which they can create with a bookkeeping entry and use to purchase government bonds and securities. While these enactments hardly justify the statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning) in this house on March 8—

Mr. SPEAKER: I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but he has exhausted his time.

Mr. McGEER: I have taken up very little of the time of the house during the last two years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Time.

Mr. SPEAKER: There does not seem to be unanimous consent, so I shall have to ask the hon. gentleman to resume his seat.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I do not rise to address this chamber on the budget. I had intended to make a few remarks, but on account of the regrettable absence of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Dunning), which I trust will be but for a very few days, I shall defer what I have to say until his return. My remarks would have to do with questions connected with the balance sheet as presented the other day, and I shall not trouble the house in that regard at this time. However, I desire to make a few observations with respect to the amendment to the amendment which has been submitted by my hon. friends to my left.

I well recall the circumstances under which the present Minister of Mines and Resources (Mr. Crerar) so brilliantly and powerfully sought the support of the electors in western Canada on promises that were not unlike those contained in the 1919 platform of the Liberal party. Those of us who recall the election of 1921 and the attitude of the Progressive party of that time with respect to matters mentioned in the subamendment, as well as the attitude of the present government in the presentation of its platform, will well remember the picture that was painted as to what was to happen if they came into power. They succeeded in 1921. The subamendment directs attention to the fact that they disregarded the pledges contained in their platform of 1919, of two years previously.

I am bound to say that I cannot find it possible to express regret that they did disregard their pledges. I rise merely for the purpose of directing attention to the fact that it is hardly fair to blame those of us who opposed that platform and who pointed out what would be the inevitable consequences of its being adopted in practice, if we do not to-night give our support to that subamendment. It will be a matter of curious interest to us all to observe the attitude of some of those who assisted in the preparation of that platform. Many of them were not members of parliament at that time, but there are many who attended the great convention of the Liberal party held in this city in 1919 at which that platform was prepared and at which those promises were given to the electorate. We did express the view that if those promises were given effect to; if they were promulgated in the form of policies; if they were enacted as statutes, the result would be disastrous to Canada. It is a matter not of regret but of satisfaction to know that those who now sit upon the treasury benches have seen fit, as evidenced by their conduct, to admit that the position which we took was sound and that their promises were made, shall I say, in error.

There remains, therefore, nothing for us to do but to dissociate ourselves from the amendment to the amendment; not to express regret, but to express our pride and satisfaction that the government, by reason of their appreciation of conditions having recognized that to have given effect to these pledges would have been disastrous to the nation, have seen fit to do the exact opposite. They have thereby given my hon. friends to my left an opportunity to ask those who promulgated those promises publicly to express their disapproval of the promises they made and of the platform they promulgated by voting against the resolution which expresses regret that they have not kept those promises.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I rose merely for the purpose of expressing, not regret that the promises made were not kept, but satisfaction that they were not. Despite all the promises that were made and the speeches with which this country was deluged; despite the literature that was spread from one end of this country to the other; despite the votes that were secured and the great and powerful campaign carried on by my hon. friend who was the leader of the then Progressive party, he now finds himself associated with the government in forgetting those promises. I congratulate them warmly upon this state of affairs. I congratulate the country upon the fact that we have a government with, shall I say the courage to disregard its promises, with such a high and fine sense of its responsibilities to the people as to forget these pledges were ever made and to wish that they had not been made.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, like the right hon. leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) I had not intended to say anything at the present time in this debate. However, since the right hon. gentleman has pointed out to the members of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation group how anxious he is to dissociate himself from them, perhaps I should point out to them that about all they have succeeded in doing by this amendment is to associate themselves with him. When they come to support their own amendment I hope they will realize that they are endorsing the Conservative party in its amendment. This is how the amendment of the Cooperative Commonwealth Federation begins.

That the amendment be further amended by adding the following thereto:

In other words, they have left intact the amendment moved by the spokesman for the Conservative party, and in supporting their own amendment they will be linking themselves through its amendment with that party.

Miss AGNES MACPHAIL (Grey-Bruce): Mr. Speaker, the question is on the amendment. I had not intended to speak, but the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Mr. Bennett) pointed out that his party felt they could not vote for the subamendment on account of the fact that they had always been against the principles expressed; fortified by the further fact that the party which brought those principles into being were against it; and further, that he was followed by the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King), who pointed out to the groups in this corner that we ought not to associate ourselves with the Conservatives since they were not pleased to associate themselves with us, I feel moved to speak. I believe that the group in this corner are following the policy which we have used for many years, that of voting with any group which states our ideas, so in a moment it will not trouble us at all to vote with the Conservative party.

May I point out to the Prime Minister —what he may not have noticed—that the Conservatives have just voted with the Liberals; or, shall we put it the other way, that the Liberals have just voted with the Conservatives?

Mr. LAPOINTE (Quebec East): This is our budget.

Miss MACPHAIL: Any thoughtful person in Canada has known for a long time, certainly since that marvellous speech the Prime Minister made on the night of the election of 1935, that we have one great Conservative party in Canada. It is true that it has two parts, one called Liberal and the other called Conservative. But it is quite obviously a conservative party, with a small "c." Many people in Canada, and possibly many in the Conservative ranks, are somewhat worried over the lack of success of the Conservative party throughout Canada. May I point out to the Conservatives in this house that the reason why they are not more successful is that Canada does not need two Conservative parties. Having one that is so overpoweringly successful, we do not need another. As a word of advice and encouragement to the Conservative convention about to convene, I would say that the only way I see that they can attain power is by becoming liberal, because Canada certainly stands in need of liberalism. The group in this corner has stood by the ideas in which they believed in voting for the Liberal platform of 1919, a platform the principles of which have been reaffirmed by Liberals many times since 1919.

Mr. MacINNIS: At election times.

Miss MACPHAIL: Yes, and at convention times. They have said over and over again that they believed in the principles for which we have just voted. So it has now come to the place where the only Liberals who sit in the house are those who sit in the southeast corner and the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Leader) whose courage I admire. What Canada needs very much and in time will have again is a strong people's party, and when that time comes the sentiments expressed in the amendment on which we are now going to vote are likely to be fulfilled. It must have been hard on some of the Liberals to vote against their own program. I was astonished at the hon. member for Huron North (Mr. Deachman) after his eloquent speech the other day, which would have convinced me had I needed it, but I agreed with him to begin with; it surprised me to see him following the leadership of the Conservatives in the House of Commons.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): All I wish to say to my hon. friend who has just spoken (Miss Macphail) is that I did not for one moment say to the hon. members of the group to which she belongs how they ought to vote. I did point out what they had succeeded in doing by their subamendment, namely that as a party they had placed themselves as an appendage to the Conservative party. I may have made a good many mistakes in my life, and I know I have a good many limitations, but one thing I have not done is to tell any lady how she should behave.

WAYS AND MEANS

SPECIAL WAR REVENUE ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Resolved, that it is expedient to introduce a measure to amend the Special War Revenue Act, chapter one hundred and seventy-nine of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, and amendments thereto and to provide:

1. That schedule III to the said act being the list of articles exempted from the consumption or sales tax be amended by adding to the said schedule the following:

Materials for use exclusively in the manufacture of gopher poison;

Harness for horses and complete parts therefor and articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture thereof;

Feeds for fur-bearing animals whose pelts have commercial value;

Articles and materials for use exclusively in the equipment or repair of boats used by fishermen in the fisheries;

Bricks; building tile, building blocks and building stone; plaster; lime; cement; stucco and stucco dash;

Lumber; sash; doors; shingles; lath; siding; stairways; balustrades;

Plaster boards, fibre boards, wallpaper, building paper, and materials manufactured wholly or in part of vegetable or mineral fibre for wall coverings or building insulation;

Paints, varnishes, white lead and paint oil;

Prepared roofings;

Shower baths, bath tubs, basins, faucets, closets, lavatories; sinks and laundry tubs, not including pipes and pipe fittings;

Glass for buildings;

Furnaces for heating buildings;

Builders' hardware, namely: locks, lock sets, butts, hinges, pulleys and window fasteners.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): Before this paragraph of the resolution is discussed, may I state that I have an amendment adding two paragraphs which I shall ask one of my colleagues to move. The amendment is:

That paragraph 1 of the said resolution be amended by adding thereto at the end thereof the following:

"Structural steel to be used exclusively for the framework and support of buildings and bridges.

[Mr. Hyndman.]

"Articles and materials to be used or consumed exclusively in the manufacture or production of the aforementioned building materials, but not to include materials consumed by waste or wear or abrasives, lubricating oils, fuel oils or non-permanent plant equipment."

This amendment would be added at the end of the list of building materials which are to be exempt from the sales tax.

Mr. BENNETT: Notice should have been given in votes and proceedings because this amendment will have material effect upon the exemption provisions.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does. The first paragraph of the amendment deals with structural steel. That is simply an addition to the list, although it is important. The second paragraph provides for the exemption of articles which enter into the manufacture of building material, and is a very important provision. I hope it will not be necessary to delay consideration of this by reason of the addition of these two items. I would suggest that since this applies only to the exemption of building material, and since there are a few other changes in the Special War Revenue Act which come before this, we might deal with the others first. The first item is, "Materials for use exclusively in the manufacture of gopher poison."

Mr. BENNETT: I think, Mr. Chairman, that would be an admirable way in which to take the resolution.

Materials for use exclusively in the manufacture of gopher poison.

Mr. ILSLEY: Gopher poison as a finished product has been exempt from sales tax for some years. No provision, however, was made in respect of the materials used in its preparation, although the ingredients constitute the main item of expense in making gopher poison. Administrative difficulties in the past have made it impossible to effect the exemption in respect of ingredients inasmuch as they were purchased from so many different sources, and at times through retailers possibly many times removed from the manufacturer of the ingredients, who under the law is responsible for this portion of the tax. The manufacturer was not able in most instances to certify that any particular portion of, say the strychnine sold, found its way eventually into gopher poison. Recently it has been found that more than 75 per cent of the gopher poison used is of one brand, and this concentration of supply makes the exemption administratively feasible.

Item agreed to.

Harness for horses and complete parts therefor and articles and materials to be used exclusively in the manufacture thereof.

Mr. ILSLEY: Farming machinery generally and farm equipment of many specified kinds are exempt from sales tax, and it is found that this general exemption might properly include harness. It has been estimated that about 95 per cent of all harness made is used by farmers, and accordingly the exemption is made general rather than limited to the particular use by farmers. Parts and materials used in making harness are also exempt from sales tax, following the existing practice which obtains in respect of parts, machinery and equipment and materials.

Mr. BENNETT: That would include buckles and copper rivets?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And the wax ends used in sewing, I suppose?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I have been asked whether it would include collars. Should not also the wording of the item include mules, which are used in some places quite extensively for farming?

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that it is construed as covering harness for mules.

Mr. BENNETT: If that is so, all right. I just wanted to know.

Item agreed to.

Feeds for fur-bearing animals whose pelts have commercial value.

Mr. ILSLEY: The existing exemption in respect of animal feed specifically mentions fox feed. Calf, cattle, hog and poultry feeds are also exempt, and the specified list of particular kinds of stock feed are exempt. Under the existing wording, however, no exemption is allowed in respect of feeds for fur-bearing animals other than foxes, as for example, minks. To remove this ambiguity it is proposed to allow an exemption in respect of feeds for all fur-bearing animals whose pelts have a commercial value.

Mr. BENNETT: That was what was originally intended, anyway.

Item agreed to.

Articles and materials for use exclusively in the equipment or repair of boats used by fishermen in the fisheries.

Mr. ILSLEY: At present an exemption exists in respect of ships licensed to engage in the Canadian coasting trade and in respect of boats purchased by individual fishermen for their own personal use in the fisheries. Furthermore, materials used in the construction, repair, or equipment of ships are exempt, also articles and materials used in the manufacture of boats owned by individual fishermen for their own personal use. It will be noted that with regard to these exemptions no mention is made of articles and materials used in the equipment or repair of the boats. This is an anomalous situation, and the proposed amendment removes the anomaly by extending the exemption to cover all articles and materials for use exclusively in the equipment or repair of these boats.

Mr. NEILL: This was asked for by the fishermen on the Pacific coast, principally the small boat owner. They will appreciate the amendment made. I should just like to have it made clear that the boat will not have to be registered to get the benefit of this exemption.

Mr. ILSLEY: It will not.

Item agreed to.

Bricks; building tile, building blocks and building stone; plaster; lime; cement; stucco and stucco dash.

Mr. ILSLEY: The amendment which I have proposed adds structural steel to the list of building materials. Structural steel is in competition with cement, and since cement was in the list it seemed to be desirable to add structural steel. Then came the question about the materials that enter into the manufacture of these exempted building materials. If they had not been added to the list, it would have meant the tax would have been transferred from the finished building materials to the taxable elements which enter into their manufacture, and that would have reduced the effective exemption from eight per cent in some instances to a considerably smaller amount. Since the budget was presented last Thursday, a great many representations have been made by persons interested and others, from which it was apparent that serious administrative difficulties would arise. For example, a manufacturer who manufactures taxable building materials and materials that hereafter would be exempt from sales tax would find it very difficult to separate the raw materials into those which were to go into the tax exempt finished product and those which were to go into the taxable finished product. That is one of the administrative difficulties which arises, and for that reason and others it was felt desirable to add this to the list of exemptions.

It means, of course, that the eight per cent will now be completely removed without deduction for the tax on the materials.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Chairman, with respect to the item dealing with bath tubs, et cetera, not including pipes and pipe fittings, it means that the accessories to the various items mentioned here will pay the tax, even though they may be chromium plated, whereas the bath itself and the shower will be free from tax. Is that a sound provision having regard to the fact that we are now dealing allegedly with the construction of homes? It must be remembered that we are supposed to be making exemptions here to help the man who is building a house, and clearly there are pipes connected with the introduction of a bath into his home, some of them chromium plated but coming under the head of pipes, because a bath tub as it comes from the factory has no accessories attached to it at all. Before it is put into place you attach the various accessories; very often nowadays they are plated with chromium. But as this item reads, even these pipes would not be free from the sales tax.

There is this further point to which I desire to direct the minister's attention. After all, structural steel does not enter into any cheap houses. Structural steel has practically nothing to do with the kind of houses we have been discussing, and the provision regarding it cannot be taken as any incentive except where the larger construction in cement does touch the smallest and lowest priced house. I can understand the desire to make the items complementary, and the action is thoroughly understood in that regard. But when you come to say, "articles and materials to be used or consumed exclusively in the manufacture or production," you have all this machinery. Take, for example, the grinding of white lead. What are you going to do about it? These articles are used exclusively for that purpose. I do not think the minister had that in mind, but surely that is what it means in a court of law where ultimately it would have to be construed.

Articles and materials to be used or consumed exclusively in the manufacture or production of the aforementioned building materials, but not to include materials consumed by waste or wear or abrasives, lubricating oils, fuel oils or non-permanent plant equipment.

"Non-permanent plant equipment." You see it does not include non-permanent plant equipment; therefore it would include permanent plant equipment. That would be the construction which I know the minister would say should be put upon it by a judge. The very fact that it does not include non-permanent means that it does include permanent. I did not see the amendment until a moment ago, but I do not think the minister had in mind the machinery used, for instance, in grinding white lead or in preparing linseed oil. I notice that the words "paint oil" are used. That, of course, involves the use of an inferior product instead of what has usually been the standard product in connection with matters of that kind, but I take it the minister had good reasons for doing that. The cheaper oil makes an inferior paint. Linseed oil is used in the higher standards of paint, white lead being the basis of it. The minister, I am sure, does not mean to free the machinery, shall I say, or any parts of it that are permanent in their character, from the sales tax. I am not quite sure, but I think the clause is drawn in such a way as to leave it open to an ambiguous construction.

Mr. ILSLEY: The wording is that at present used in the act to cover materials, and it has not before been argued, although the—

Mr. BENNETT: The necessity has not arisen.

Mr. ILSLEY:—right hon. gentleman has argued it very well, I think, that "articles" may, perhaps, literally taken, mean machinery; "articles . . . to be used or consumed exclusively in the manufacture or production" of these products has always been construed by the department and held to mean materials or something that actually goes into the product, and not the machinery, and the reason "non-permanent plant equipment" is inserted is to make it clear that this non-permanent plant is not included under "materials."

Mr. BENNETT: I realize that.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is often argued that non-permanent plant of certain kinds is material.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes, I know.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the reason for that.

Mr. BENNETT: I realize fully why that is inserted, but I direct attention to a possible ambiguous meaning of it.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is now suggested that when the words "non-permanent plant equipment" are used, an implication arises—

Mr. BENNETT: The minister is an excellent lawyer, and he remembers the rule of law that if you mention the one you exclude the other.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. There is no objection to putting it beyond doubt by saying "non-permanent or permanent plant equipment."

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. I think that would overcome a possible difficulty.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it is better to put both words in than to leave both out.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite. One or the other.

Mr. STEVENS: Unfortunately we have no copy of this amendment or any information about it at all except what we have heard read. I may be wrong in what I have caught from the words of the minister. Might I suggest that instead of using the word "articles," the word "materials" or "ingredients" should be inserted, because that is all that is involved. It is materials or ingredients which enter into the manufacture of these things, and obviously not an article that is used in the manufacture; yet the amendment, I understand, says, "articles to be used."

Before the minister answers me, may I point out this, which I gather has been considered by the minister in the last few days. I understand, as regards this list of items entering into the construction of houses, building construction, the resolution as it is at present drawn will create a chaotic condition among those who are manufacturing these articles. I notice the minister referred to subseqent items in this group, so I shall also do so. Take for instance:

Builders' hardware, namely: locks, lock sets, butts, hinges, pulleys and window fasteners.

Have representations been made—I understand they have—by the manufacturers of these goods, and, if so, have they been given full consideration? I am informed that if the resolution passes in its present form, it is going to create a serious condition, the objection being that under the law as it has been worked for many years the original parts which enter into a finished article are not taxed at all, but the finished article is taxed. Now, if the finished article is exempted, it leaves the manufacturer of the primary part taxable. That, of course, was never intended. I do not think the amendment will correct that situation.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is intended to.

Mr. STEVENS: I have just received a copy of the proposed amendment. It reads:

Articles and materials to be used or consumed exclusively—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I do not want to interrupt the hon. member, but I think, to keep the record clear, this amendment should be read. It has not yet been read from the chair, and it has been suggested that there should be some change. It is moved by Mr. Power:

That paragraph 1 of the said resolution be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Structural steel to be used exclusively for the framework and support of building and bridges.

"Articles and materials to be used or consumed exclusively in the manufacture or production of the aforementioned building materials, but not to include materials consumed by waste or wear or abrasives, lubricating oils, fuel oils, permanent or non-permanent plant equipment."

Mr. ILSLEY: Quite—"permanent or non-permanent."

Mr. STEVENS: I do not wish to seem to quibble over this matter, but as I read the proposed amendment it refers to building materials. What does that include? Would it not be necessary to classify under one group all the materials affected by that proviso? There is one item here:

Bricks; building tile, building blocks and building stone—

And a number of items, all of which go into buildings. Am I to understand that this amendment will apply to all those items?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Does the minister think that is sufficiently clear?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it will be placed at the end of a paragraph containing that list.

Mr. STEVENS: I suppose that will appear clarified in the bill?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: Is the minister satisfied that this completely covers hardware, for instance?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; only the hardware named.

Mr. STEVENS:

Builders' hardware, namely: locks, lock sets, butts, hinges, pulleys and window fasteners.

Mr. ILSLEY: It covers locks, lock sets, butts, hinges, pulleys and window fastenings, and the materials going into the manufacture of those are exempted now by the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS: Will that include, for instance, screws and bolts—

Mr. ILSLEY: No; it does not include anything except that named in the list. It does not include all builders' hardware but includes only the builders' hardware named in the item.

Mr. STEVENS: In locks there are a certain number of screws.

Mr. ILSLEY: If they are included in the locks, they are exempt.

Mr. STEVENS: It will include those?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. STEVENS: It is claimed by manufacturers that this will introduce an atmosphere of confusion impossible to overcome. I simply wish to be assured that this point has been considered by the department officials and the minister and that they are satisfied that this amendment will meet the situation.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; those representations were received and carefully considered, and the amendment will, I think, do away with practically all the difficulty anticipated by the manufacturers.

Mr. GOLDING: Will that cover furnaces for heating?

Mr. ILSLEY: Furnaces are listed.

Mr. BENNETT: Furnaces for heating buildings only.

Mr. GOLDING: Furnaces for buildings are exempt, but the raw material that goes into those furnaces, that is the steel, was not exempt. Now that will be cleared up?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, exactly.

Mr. McCULLOCH: Is sewer pipe to connect the building with the sewer exempt?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; pipes are not exempt. That is not building tile.

Mr. GOLDING: The hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Gladstone) has a letter here which covers the situation to which I have referred. In the plant with which I am connected we manufacture the steel boilers that this heating firm uses, and I am interested in this.

Mr. BENNETT: This clearly covers furnaces for heating purposes only.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): That is, boilers of all kinds?

Mr. BENNETT: No; furnaces, not boilers.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Information has come to me from a circular that may have gone out to the customs officers giving a list of goods exempt from tax; "hot water and steam boilers, cast-iron and steel, used for heating buildings; bungalow heaters used for heating buildings; warm air furnaces, steel or cast-iron;"—and then this note: "Note carefully: materials used in the manufacture of exempted items formerly not subject to tax are now taxable."

Mr. ILSLEY: The amendment changes that.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): In heating buildings with hot water or steam, a boiler is an essential part of the heating equipment. A building could not be heated by steam or hot water without a boiler. I think the question raised by the hon. member for Wellington South (Mr. Gladstone) was whether the boiler would be exempt under the amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: If it is part of a furnace, it will be.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): The boiler is certainly part of the heating equipment, but I do not know whether they call it a furnace.

Mr. BENNETT: This does not cover heating equipment; it covers only the furnace for heating purposes, and that has a well known trade meaning.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): For the provision to be effective with regard to heating equipment it would surely be necessary to include the boiler that goes with the furnace.

Mr. ILSLEY: Not all heating equipment is exempt. For example, radiators or stoves are not exempt.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Practically all buildings of any size that are being constructed to-day use either hot water or steam heating. I cannot see why a steam or hot water heating plant should not be exempt as much as a hot air furnace.

Mr. ILSLEY: All I can say is that, if it is part of the furnace, it is covered by the amendment.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): I have not been able to get a copy of the amendment; therefore I cannot tell what is exempt. Is expanded metal, wall sheeting, metal sheeting, metal roofing, flashing and sheet metal that would go into a cheaper house or a farmer's barn included?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the hon. member will name those articles one at a time I will tell him.

Mr. CLARKE (Rosedale): Expanded or corrugated metal for sheeting, galvanized iron and tin and sheeting used in the construction of houses and barns.

Mr. ILSLEY: When used as siding or roofing they would be exempt.

Mr. LEADER: Just a moment ago we were speaking of furnaces, and I was wondering if this should not include cooking ranges, for this reason: In some of the smaller houses they have not made provision and perhaps will not make provision for furnaces. About all that such houses will have will be cook stoves or ranges, and it seems to me it would be the part of wisdom to include cooking ranges as well as furnaces. I should like to ask the minister if he will consider that point.

Mr. ILSLEY: The line has to be drawn somewhere, and the moment one gets into stoves he has to consider electric ranges and then other electrical equipment for the house. It was not thought desirable to go into that phase of it.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Also electric fans.

Mr. LEADER: I should like to say a word in regard to that. I still think it would be only a matter of justice if cooking ranges were included as well as furnaces. In regard to equipment such as electric lighting plants, it seems to me imperative that this provision should apply also. I am thinking now of the farmers out in the country who have not access to hydro power; indeed I know of many farmers who have the hydro running past their doors, but because of the cost of reducing stations and so on they are unable to take advantage of it. Some of these farmers, interested in bettering their home conditions, have purchased little power plants to make their own electricity. It seems to me it would be only a matter of justice and, if I might call it that, a gesture to the farming community, if farm lighting plants were exempted also.

Mr. ILSLEY: Electric fixtures are not included in this list of exemptions.

Mr. LEADER: I was going on to deal with that. I should like to suggest that farm lighting plants be exempted from the sales tax. If you have a farm lighting plant, of necessity you will have some lighting equipment, and I would suggest that the lighting equipment entering into not only the homes of farmers but also the homes of those in the cities be exempted from the sales tax. I feel that this would give a real stimulus to better home conditions, and now that we have gone this far it seems to me that we should go all the way in that regard and remove lighting equipment and farm lighting plants from under the sales tax. I think we should also include ranges along with furnaces.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Members of the committee have not a copy of the amendments. I should like to know whether or not the materials that go into the manufacture of paint, varnishes, white lead and paint oil are exempt from sales tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): And also the raw materials that go into the manufacture of furnaces for heating purposes?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, for heating buildings.

Mr. BENNETT: How are you going to determine that when you are in your foundry casting them? That is what the hon. member for Kootenay East pointed out, namely, that it is too complicated.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just let me meet that point. If part of the furnaces are taxable, the materials are free; and now for these furnaces that are not taxable the materials are being made free, so there is no difficulty.

Mr. BENNETT: How are you going to differentiate between materials for a given purpose that are free, and materials that are not? For instance, in this steel item we are freeing structural steel for bridges. Clearly that has nothing to do with the building program; but it is quite obvious that if you are going to do that, you should also free reinforcing steel, which might enter into a concrete building, whereas the other might not have anything to do with building at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that it is included in structural steel.

Mr. BENNETT: This is the first time I have ever heard of that. If you go down to the customs house and try to get it through, you will find that it is not. Just take your bundle of rods down there and try to get them through; then take your structural steel and try to get it through, and see whether they are in the same class.

Mr. ILSLEY: The item is "structural steel to be used exclusively for the framework and supports of buildings and bridges."

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly, and that is structural steel; that does not cover reinforcing rods.

Mr. LEADER: I do not wish to appear insistent, but I should like the minister to give me a definite opinion in regard to the suggestions I have made.

Mr. ILSLEY: My feeling is that this is quite a long list as it is, and the matter of where the line should be drawn has been very carefully considered. The hon. gentleman has suggested that we should move into the realm of stoves, which would get us into electric ranges and even, as one hon. member suggested, electric fans and electrical equipment generally. It is not considered desirable to do that; it would take us into too large a field of exemption. The other request of the hon. member was that lighting equipment for farmers' houses should be included; but I would point out to him that there is no exemption of electrical fixtures or any lighting equipment, so far as I can see, and while it would be very nice not to pay sales tax rather than pay it on a wide range of articles, still I do not see why we should extend this list.

Mr. COLDWELL: I should like to support the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. I believe that if the minister will consider the matter from this point of view, that rural houses must have electric lighting equipment, such as the Delco lighting system—

Mr. BENNETT: Largely sold in the west.

Mr. COLDWELL: Yes; it is sold largely in the west. I take it that this scheme for the construction of lower priced houses is designed to assist not only the people who live in towns and cities but also those who live in the rural communities.

Mr. ILSLEY: The town dweller does not get any exemption on his lighting equipment.

Mr. COLDWELL: But the town dweller simply runs a wire into his house.

Mr. ILSLEY: But he pays for his lighting, and that charge covers the cost of some lighting equipment on which there is no exemption.

Mr. COLDWELL: Nevertheless the additional outlay in regard to the lighting equipment in the rural house is almost prohibitive, and when the sales tax is added it greatly increases the cost of installation. I agree with the hon. member for Portage la Prairie that people living on farms are entitled to consideration because of the disadvantages which they suffer in regard to the hook-up that is necessary to connect them to the hydro or, as in Saskatchewan, to the lines running out from the steam plants in the cities. In my opinion the request of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie would be simply a matter of justice to a large number of people who suffer many inconveniences that most of us do not suffer. I think the same applies to heating equipment. The cheaper houses, particularly in the country places, are often, on account of fuel difficulties, heated by stoves, and I think the rural population is entitled to consideration in this regard. I would very strongly support the hon. member for Portage la Prairie in his request, not that action be taken to-night but that the matter be considered carefully before a definite answer is given.

Mr. TAYLOR (Nanaimo): I am disposed to agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and the hon. member for Portage la Prairie. If people in isolated houses want these advantages, they are compelled to pay about nine times what they would cost an individual in an urban area, where he can get his lighting connection for an expenditure of about $30 or $40. The farmer has to pay about $400 or $500 for equipment which would bring about the same results. That point really requires some consideration.

Mr. ILSLEY: I understand the point of view taken by the hon. member, but I do not think we can possibly do what hon. members are asking without exempting the whole range of electrical fixtures and lighting equipment generally. I do not see how we can possibly draw the line where the hon. member suggests it should be drawn. Certainly it would entail a very serious loss of revenue. We would go from electrical fixtures to lamps and lanterns, and everything pertaining to lighting.

With regard to stoves I must say that they are not part of a building. They are not fixtures, whereas furnaces are. Furnaces are installed as part of a property, and it seems to me that for the reasons I stated before it would be very difficult to draw the line.

Mr. LEADER: May I point out again that the minister would not be entering the realm of lighting fixtures if he were to exempt a lighting plant. The sale of a lighting plant is something entirely by itself, and includes an engine and installation. That is all they charge for.

Mr. COLDWELL: And batteries.

Mr. LEADER: Yes, if you need batteries. The engine and batteries constitute the lighting equipment. Anything else would be extra, and it would not come under the heading of lighting. So, if the lighting plants were exempted on farm houses, it seems to me we would simply be carrying out a matter of justice. I can speak from experience. I have been used to electric lights on the farm, and I know, when we installed one about twenty years ago, before we got through with the installation it cost about $1,600 to get the plant. On the other hand, as one

hon. member has pointed out, in the city all one would have to do would be to attach a wire. Upkeep, refueling and that sort of thing cost a considerable amount of money every year; I know whereof I speak.

At the present time one can buy the Delco lighting plant for $647.50, and that is just the start of the expense in connection with the equipping of farm houses with electric lights and electric power. I have risen to say that we can certainly draw a distinction between a lighting plant and lighting fixtures. Again I say it is only a matter of justice that farm lighting plants be exempted from the sales tax.

Mr. THOMPSON: Are the lightning rods used on rural buildings exempt from the sales tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: No; they are not included.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Would this include metal as well as wooden sash? I notice we mention metal lath as well as wooden lath.

Mr. ILSLEY: It includes both.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then there should be some change, and metal siding should be included as well.

Mr. ILSLEY: It includes all lath and sash.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Why are pipes and fittings not exempt? They enter very largely into the hot water heating systems of houses.

Mr. ILSLEY: Because they are put to so many other uses. That is the reason why they are not included.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): Then the commercial heaters which are used to such a great extent in England enter into the picture, so far as small houses are concerned. I believe they are manufactured by the McClary Company. They take the place of furnaces, and are permanent fixtures in houses. Cannot something be done to have more than furnaces included?

All these houses have hot water heating equipment, and that equipment is just as much a part of the building and is just as necessary a part as is the furnace. Surely hot water heating equipment is part of a building, and it seems to me it should be included in the exemptions.

Mr. STREIGHT: I think the term "furnaces" should be clarified right now. The use of the word "furnace" is not sufficient. Probably it should mention hot air furnaces and hot water furnaces. I would not suggest steam equipment, because it is used only in the large plants, and is not necessary in the smaller type of houses it is here intended to help. But hot water furnaces are being put in small houses of the type indicated, and are installed for about $350.

Mr. ILSLEY: Hot water furnaces are included.

Mr. STREIGHT: With pipes, complete?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, no pipes or radiators.

Mr. STREIGHT: Pipes are not included?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. STREIGHT: Are you putting down hot water furnaces only?

Mr. ILSLEY: All furnaces.

Mr. STREIGHT: All furnaces, without pipes?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ROSS (St. Paul's): I think something should be done about the matter of furnaces. For instance, every house has a domestic hot water heating plant. Every large building has that type of heating plant. They are very expensive, and the sales tax on such a plant amounts to quite a large sum. I should think it would be just as important to eliminate the sales tax on that plant as to eliminate it on any other building material. I think, further, that in order to make the matter clear we ought to mention metal sash and wooden sash.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): No; that would limit it.

Mr. HAYHURST: I should like to add my voice to what was said by hon. members in this part of the chamber and by the hon. member for Portage la Prairie with regard to the lighting system in farm houses. I believe farmers will feel that discrimination has been exercised against them if they are not given the same consideration. We distinctly wish to help farming communities and to make living conditions on the farm worth while. If they did not take advantage of the situation, it would be their own fault, and they would have themselves to blame. I believe the government would be well advised to consider the farmers, and to eliminate the eight per cent sales tax so far as lighting systems in farm houses are concerned.

Mr. ILSLEY: Nearly everything which enters into the construction of a farm house is covered by this list. It includes lumber, sash, doors, shingles, paint, glass and so on.

Mr. COLDWELL: The lighting system is something which is very necessary on a farm. Although conditions may be different in the east, I know that in western Canada, and particularly in Saskatchewan, very few farm houses are adjacent to power lines. Consequently, modern installations in new houses require systems of the type we have been discussing. If the minister could see his way clear to recommend the addition, I am sure it would be greatly appreciated.

Mr. HEAPS: Do the exemptions in the schedule apply for any purpose whatsoever.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not understand the question.

Mr. HEAPS: I am asking if the goods exempted in the schedule can be utilized for any purpose whatsoever?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. HEAPS: I notice that an exemption is allowed only for glass used for building purposes, but it would seem that other goods so exempted could be used for purposes other than building.

Mr. ILSLEY: Does the hon. member refer to furnaces?

Mr. HEAPS: Hardware such as locks and hinges do not necessarily have to be utilized for building purposes.

Mr. ILSLEY: Most of these can be used only in connection with buildings, for example, roofings.

Mr. HEAPS: Pulleys would not have to be used on buildings, and there are other items of hardware that could be used for other purposes. Why should this exemption not apply to items used for other purposes?

Mr. ILSLEY: The hon. member is not suggesting that we should exempt glass dishes, for instance?

Mr. HEAPS: Glass can be used for many other purposes, and I do not see why we should exempt it for buildings only.

Mr. ILSLEY: Glass has so many uses that it is necessary to restrict it.

Mr. BARBER: That would include plate glass?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. DUFFUS: A few days ago a deputation of four or five large manufacturers of builders' hardware came to Ottawa and made mention of several items that had been left out of this list which they considered were just as essential as some of those that are included. Have those items been included?

Mr. ILSLEY: No. I think those manufacturers of builders' hardware suggested that the enumeration should be left out and that all builders' hardware should be exempted. That covered such a tremendous range that we did not think we could do it. Their main difficulty was in connection with materials, and that is covered by the amendment.

Mr. DUFFUS: If I remember correctly, the list does not include handles used for raising window sash. In other words, one can get the window down but would find it impossible to get it up. That leaves one in a rather awkward position.

Mr. GLADSTONE: I have not a copy of the amendment before me, and I should like to understand exactly what it covers. Hot water and steam boilers are now exempt from this tax. Would that apply to old buildings as well as to new?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Radiators are not exempt from the tax. Are all the materials entering into the manufacture of steam boilers and radiators exempt from the tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: All that enter into the construction of furnaces for the heating of buildings. Radiators are not exempt.

Mr. GLADSTONE: Previously materials entering into the manufacture of radiators were exempt from the tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: Radiators are taxable.

Mr. HAMILTON: Would the minister care to express an opinion as to whether reinforcing steel used to reinforce concrete in constructing buildings and bridges will come within the term "structural steel"?

Mr. ILSLEY: All I can say is that it is intended to be included. Before the bill is brought down, I shall consult with the officials to see that there is no doubt about the point.

Mr. HAMILTON: I want to thank the government for bringing in this amendment.

Mr. STIRLING: Now that bridges have been added to the resolution is it quite clear that this item will cover all steel used in the construction of a bridge, such as foundation steel, main girders, cross girders and bearers?

Mr. ILSLEY: I would think they would all be included.

Mr. WALSH: I understand instructions have been given to cancel licences which have been granted to manufacturers of paint and to those engaged in the industrial trade. The result is, except in connection with certain items, that manufacturers of paint will have to pay the eight per cent sales tax on their ingredients.

Mr. ILSLEY: Materials are exempted by the amendment.

Mr. WALSH: The paint manufacturers have been granted a broad licence which covers practically all their primary products. The amendment now specifies certain primary products used in the paint manufacturing business, so that all others will be subject to the eight per cent sales tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: The amendment takes care of the situation referred to by the hon. gentleman. Was the hon. gentleman in the chamber when we were discussing the amendment?

Mr. WALSH: I have been here all evening.

Mr. ILSLEY: The amendment covers all materials entering into the manufacture of paints, varnishes, white lead and paint oil.

Mr. WALSH: All the primary products of a paint manufacturer will be free?

Mr. ILSLEY: But not to include materials consumed by waste or wear or abrasives.

Mr. WALSH: Materials entering into the manufacture of paint?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. WALSH: An industrialist who buys large quantities of paint may still have his licence to buy that paint free from sales tax? For instance, a manufacturer of a household article may buy a large quantity of paint to use in finishing his product. Will he still be able to buy that paint free of the eight per cent sales tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. WALSH: His previous licence has not been revoked?

Mr. ILSLEY: He will not need to use his licence, because hereafter all paint is to be free.

Mr. WALSH: Even though it is not used in connection with building?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is free for any purpose.

Mr. VIEN: I communicated with the minister to ask that rock asphalt should be included in the items to be exempted from the sales tax. This material is being used in the construction of concrete buildings and for the fire-proofing of buildings. The minister told me that this matter would be considered, and I should like to know if it is covered by the amendment.

Mr. ILSLEY: Will the hon. gentleman let that stand until I find out just what is rock asphalt?

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): I notice that builders' hardware is exempted, but no mention is made of nails and spikes. They are a most important item, especially in building small buildings. A small building can be constructed without a furnace or radiator, but it would need a considerable quantity of nails.

Mr. ILSLEY: They are used for so many other purposes.

Mr. McLEAN (Melfort): The two and a half, three, four and even six inch nails are practically all used in building construction. I wish the minister would consider this item.

Mr. WALSH: A paint manufacturer sells probably 65 per cent of his production to the industrial trade, the balance going to the retailer. Will he have to charge the eight per cent sales tax on what he sells to the retail merchant?

Mr. ILSLEY: Paint is free for all purposes.

Mr. WALSH: It has not been in the past.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what we are doing now.

Mr. WALSH: What is going to happen to the retail merchant who may have stocked up a month previously? The public are naturally expecting a reduction in the price of paint, but the retail merchant has already secured his supply and paid his eight per cent sales tax. Will any consideration be given to the retail merchants in that position from one end of Canada to the other? They have prepared for the season's trade and paid the eight per cent sales tax, and customers coming in wanting to buy paint will say, "Why should not paint be lower by eight or ten per cent, now the budget has gone through?" Will any allowance be made for the stocks on hand in the retail stores, or will anything be done to meet that situation?

Mr. ILSLEY: That was very carefully considered, and it was thought that we could not provide for any refund. When the sales tax was being increased there was an appreciation in the value of retail stocks, and the retailer got the advantage of that. Now that the taxes are reduced, there are instances where he will suffer a depreciation of his stock.

Mr. DEACHMAN: I venture to suggest, Mr. Chairman, that the retail merchant is already provided for, because when prices are brought down by the removal of the tax there will be an increased volume of trade which will amply provide for the additional profits the retailer desires to secure. The retail merchant will also receive an additional volume of sales as a result of the building program which this parliament is putting through.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. I think the retailers of builders' supplies will be glad to have this done, for the reason mentioned by my hon. friend, even though they may have stocks on hand on which they may have paid the tax.

Mr. MACDONALD (Brantford): Do I understand there will be no rebate of sales taxes which have already been paid?

Mr. ILSLEY: There will be no rebates.

Mr. TAYLOR (Norfolk): With regard to furnaces for heating buildings, there are in my constituency buildings for the curing of tobacco which are heated by furnaces. Will these furnaces be exempt?

Mr. ILSLEY: They are for the curing of tobacco.

Mr. TAYLOR (Norfolk): But also for the heating of the building. There was also an appeal to the minister for the exemption of the sales tax on oil burners used for the same purpose, and I was wondering if he had given consideration to that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Consideration has been given.

Mr. ESLING: If structural steel used in bridges is exempt, is it also exempt in the construction of industrial plants?

Mr. ILSLEY: For buildings and bridges.

Mr. ESLING: Perhaps one of the most essential things in a low rental house is the electric wiring and the fuses and switches that go with the wiring. These are just as essential as the paint. Is provision made for their exemption?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no provision made for exempting wire. Wiring has a very wide range of use, and it was not thought desirable to include it.

Mr. DUFFUS: I am still of the opinion that there are certain items of builders' finishing hardware which it is essential to include in the exemptions. Would the minister be good enough to let the item stand over until the next sitting?

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. ILSLEY: The question can be raised on the bill. This is merely the resolution, and there will be a bill before us later.

Mr. ESLING: In every community there is a wall paper business. Just to clarify the item, would the minister say whether that is included?

Mr. ILSLEY: Wall paper is included in the list of exemptions.

Item agreed to.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

2. That schedule II to the said act be amended by striking out the following words in paragraph three thereof:

Provided that the tax hereby imposed shall not apply to the goods mentioned herein, when sold to or imported by manufacturers of automobiles or chassis for the original equipment of such automobiles or chassis under the following conditions:

(i) If less than ten thousand automobiles or chassis are manufactured or produced per annum and at least fifty per centum of the factory cost of manufacturing or producing them, exclusive of duties and other taxes, is incurred in the British Empire;

(ii) If ten thousand automobiles or chassis or more are manufactured or produced per annum and at least sixty per centum of the factory cost of manufacturing or producing them, exclusive of duties and other taxes, is incurred in the British Empire;

Provided, however, that effective April 1st, 1938, the words "sixty-five" shall be substituted for the word "sixty" in this paragraph,
and substituting therefor the following:

Provided that the tax hereby imposed shall not apply to the goods mentioned herein when used exclusively for the original equipment of such automotive vehicles.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister explain just what this section means before we proceed with it in detail?

Mr. ILSLEY: At present tires and tubes are taxable, tires at two cents a pound and tubes at three cents a pound. If they are original equipment on automobiles that have a certain empire content, no tax applies. If the number of automobiles manufactured is 10,000 or under, the empire content has to be 50 per cent; if the number is over 10,000, the content now has to be 65 per cent, formerly 60 per cent. That provision is in one of the schedules of our Special War Revenue Act, and it was to offer an incentive to get a larger empire content. The manufacturers of automobiles that did not have that content, and with tires as part of the original equipment, have to pay on the tires and tubes two cents and three cents a pound. At the time that schedule was drafted it was thought that this tax would apply to tires on imported automobiles, but it was discovered that it was not applicable to them.

Mr. BENNETT: Because they were covered by the automobile as a whole.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct, but there is another reason too. The result was that the tire manufacturers in Canada found themselves at a great disadvantage in trying to sell tires for imported automobiles.

Mr. BENNETT: Because they already had the tires on.

Mr. ILSLEY: The imported automobile came in with the foreign tires on tax-free, so there was no reason why it should have a Canadian tire. This provision gives the Canadian manufacturer of tires a chance on that business.

Mr. BENNETT: When you import an automobile with four wheels, it has four tires, I should think. It would not come in as an automobile without the tires on the wheels?

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes, it is a business practice to import automobiles without tires. There is a guarantee which is of value that goes with Canadian tires, and Canadians want Canadian tires.

Mr. BENNETT: This would have to be computed at the end of each year because it is the yearly production of 10,000 or more.

Mr. ILSLEY: We do not have to concern ourselves with that now. We did have to concern ourselves with it, and that was an administrative difficulty which is now removed.

3. That subsection two of section fifty-eight of the said act be amended to provide that the excise tax payable upon the sale, transfer or assignment of any share at a price or valuation of one dollar shall be one-quarter of one cent per share.

Paragraph agreed to.

4. That any enactment founded on this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force on the seventeenth day of June, one thousand nine hundred and thirty-eight and to have applied to all goods imported or taken out of warehouse for consumption on and after that date and to have applied to goods previously imported for which no entry for consumption was made before that date.

Mr. BENNETT: There is a difficulty about section 4, because of the amendment which was made in connection with steel. Is that to be covered also? Under section 3 of the resolution, the rate is a quarter of a cent. What was the old rate?

Mr. ILSLEY: This affects only shares of exactly one dollar. The present rate is one-tenth of one per cent. This is one-quarter of a cent.

Mr. BENNETT: As regards steel, I am thinking about the question of rebates that was mentioned by the minister.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think it can be administered if we leave the date the seventeenth day of June, even for structural steel.

Mr. BENNETT: I take it that there will have to be a rebate.

Mr. ILSLEY: Adjustments will have to be made.

Paragraph agreed to.

Mr. ILSLEY: The resolution is carried, I believe.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolution reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 163, to amend the Special War Revenue Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

On motion of Mr. Mackenzie King the house adjourned at 10.56 p.m.

Friday, June 24, 1938

The house met at three o'clock.

ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following letter:

Ottawa, 23rd June, 1938.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Lawrence Arthur Cannon, acting as deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber on Friday, the 24th June, at 5.30 p.m. for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
R. R. Stewart,
Deputy Assistant Secretary to the Governor General

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Second report of the joint committee of both houses on the printing of parliament.—Mr. St.-Père.

Fifth report of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.—Mr. McPhee.

CIVIL SERVICE SUPERANNUATION ACT—SECOND REPORT CONCURRED IN

Mr. MALCOLM McLEAN (Melfort) presented the second report of the special committee on the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and moved that the report be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE WITH RESPECT TO PRIVATE BILLS—SUSPENSION OF STANDING ORDER 105

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I desire to move the following, which has been customary at this stage of the session:

That for the remainder of the session all private bills from the senate when received from that house be read a first and second time and referred forthwith, and that standing order 105 respecting the posting of bills be suspended in reference thereto.

Motion agreed to.

ANTICOSTI ISLAND

PROSPECTIVE SALE TO FOREIGN INTERESTS—PROTECTION OF CANADIAN INTERESTS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister (Mr. Mackenzie King) if anything further has been done in regard to the island of Anticosti.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a committee of representative officials of different departments have been investigating the situation, and have the matter in hand in a manner in which they believe will fully protect the interests of Canada.

BREN MACHINE GUNS

AGREEMENT BETWEEN DOMINION GOVERNMENT AND JOHN INGLIS COMPANY WITH RESPECT TO MANUFACTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. COLDWELL (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to draw the attention of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Mackenzie) to the fact that he promised to table a copy of a contract between the John Inglis Company and the government. When may we expect it? We should like to have it, as the session is drawing near the close.

Hon. IAN MACKENZIE (Minister of National Defence): There is a motion on the order paper for the production of this agreement, I understand.

[Mr. Speaker.]

ROYAL AIR FORCE

ESTABLISHMENT BY BRITISH GOVERNMENT OF TRAINING CENTRES IN CANADA—QUESTION OF RECRUITING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. G. MacNEIL (Vancouver North): Mr. Speaker, what are the intentions of the Department of National Defence with respect to the proposals that training centres for aviators be established in Canada by the British government, and what steps have been taken to aid recruiting for the Royal Air Force?

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): The question the hon. member has asked is really one of government policy. I think I should say that it is not usual to make statements of government policy in reply to questions on the orders of the day. I believe that is all I can say.

Mr. J. S. WOODSWORTH (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Prime Minister when he will divulge to the house what the government policy is in regard to this matter?

Mr. MACKENZIE KING: Any statement of policy in regard to the matter referred to will be made if and when occasion for such arises.

FARMERS' CREDITORS ARRANGEMENT ACT

FREE CONFERENCE WITH THE SENATE IN VIEW OF AMENDMENTS

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, earlier in the session Bill No. 25, amending the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, received its first reading. Section 5 of the amending measure provided as follows:

The said act is amended by inserting therein immediately after section 19 thereof the following section:

20. On and after a date to be fixed by proclamation of the governor in council, no new proposals shall be made or filed by any farmer or accepted by any official receiver in any province in respect of which the said proclamation is issued.

When the measure was before the senate they amended it by striking out the section I have read, and by substituting therefor the following:

No proposal shall be received in any province later than the 31st of December, 1938, except in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Earlier in the session Bill No. 33, to amend the Soldier Settlement Act, was considered and passed by this house. As hon. members will recall, that measure had to do with what is known as the dollar for dollar bonus privilege that had been extended to soldier settlers under legislation passed by the previous government. The period under which the bonus could be paid expired on March 31 of this year.

At the time the legislation was before the house hon. members will recall that strong representations were made from various quarters of the house that the legislation should be continued for another three years. That was not done, largely on the assumption that soldier settlers who were in financial difficulties would and could have recourse under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act for a composition of their debts, and that since that machinery was open to them for that purpose it was not necessary to extend the dollar for dollar bonus privilege right across the board.

I believe I am correct when I say that it was on that assumption the soldier settlement measure finally passed the house. If the amendment proposed by the senate, as indicated in the order now before the house, is accepted, then very largely if not entirely it nullifies the privilege that we thought would continue when the dollar for dollar bonus provision was before the house. For that reason the government cannot accept the amendment suggested by the senate, which I read a moment ago.

There are still in many of the provinces, and especially in all the western provinces, a very large number of soldier settlers who are in arrears. Those in charge of the administration of the Soldier Settlement Act feel that it is necessary and advisable that the soldier settlers should apply under the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act for a composition of their debts. Consequently for these reasons the government cannot accept the amendment proposed in the senate.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): There remains however a very difficult question in connection with the matter. Assuming that the senate should accept the suggestion made by the minister and extend the exception to applications of those who have loans under the Soldier Settlement Act, would the legislation then be acceptable to the government? The reasons the minister has urged against agreeing with the senate amendment would not apply if the senate were to provide for the exception,—that is, an exception in favour of cases under the Soldier Settlement Act. If that exception were added to the statute, then you would have the act no longer applicable except in Saskatchewan and Alberta, and the minister has not said whether that would be objectionable or acceptable to the administration. He has not referred to that at all.

It would be simple to amend this bill in the senate and say that the act shall not apply to any province in Canada after December 31, 1938, except the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, and to cases which might arise in any province under the Soldier Settlement Act. That would still leave jurisdiction to deal with soldier settlement cases in all the provinces, and would leave the act otherwise operative in Alberta and in Saskatchewan, but not elsewhere. I think the government should indicate, since we are dealing with it in this way and as it will mean an ultimate conference if the amendments are not agreed to, whether or not, if the suggestion now made by the minister is adopted by the senate, he would have any objection to the other provisions of the senate amendments.

Mr. CRERAR: I intended to indicate that that was one reason why the government could not accept the amendment. An additional reason is the fact that it would constitute a hardship on many settlers, apart from soldier settlers, in the western provinces. If a conference takes place it is not the intention of the conferees representing the government to limit it solely to the claims of soldier settlers.

Right Hon. W. L. MACKENZIE KING (Prime Minister): While we are on the subject I should like to move:

That a message be sent to the Senate requesting a free conference with their honours to consider certain amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 25, intituled: An act to amend the Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act, 1934, to which this house disagrees, and upon which the Senate insists, and any amendment which at such conference it may be considered desirable to make to the said bill or amendment thereto.

That the Clerk do carry the said message to the Senate.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS

INCOME WAR TAX ACT

The house in committee of ways and means, Mr. Sanderson in the chair.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Income War Tax Act and to provide:

1. That lump sum payments made in Canada, which sever the funds permanently from the assets of the payor company, for the establishment of superannuation or pension fund plans with a view to providing benefits for employees in respect of past years' services, shall be allowed as a deduction to the extent of one-tenth of such lump sum payments in each of ten successive years, commencing the year in which the payment is made; provided that in the case of superannuation or pension fund plans heretofore established by lump sum payments the said deduction shall commence in the year 1938 and continue thereafter until ten years shall have elapsed from the date of the initial payment.

Hon. J. L. ILSLEY (Minister of National Revenue): With regard to this proposed amendment, I may say that at present deductions are allowed in respect to contributions to pension funds made during the current year. That is to say, these contributions are regarded as legitimate items of cost incurred in earning income on which a tax is being paid. There is no provision in the act for allowing in one year a deduction in respect of lump sum payments covering past years of employees' services. Several large companies have expressed their intention of making contributions to pension funds, of the sort here in question, and have argued that an allowance should be made in respect of them. It is believed that through allowing these lump sum payments as deductions, this practice of creating pension and superannuation funds will be encouraged, and that substantial social benefits will accrue through the incentive here being offered. It is realized that this provision should be amply safeguarded, and it is particularly provided that the funds contributed must be permanently severed from the assets of the company making the contribution. This will prevent an unscrupulous company from retaking to itself contributions once made and in respect of which deductions from income tax have been allowed. It was felt inadvisable that the deduction should be made all in one year and it is proposed that the allowance shall be spread over a ten-year period. Moreover, it was felt that an employer who in the past had made a lump sum contribution of the sort here in question and had received no allowance in respect of such contribution should not be excluded entirely from the benefits of this proposed amendment if such contributions were made within the past ten years. Accordingly, in respect of lump sum payments heretofore established, deductions shall commence in the current year and shall continue until ten years have elapsed from the date of the initial lump sum payment. Thus a company that had made a lump sum contribution to a pension fund five years ago would still be allowed five annual deductions, each equalling one-tenth of the original lump sum contribution.

Mr. BENNETT: Retroactive legislation is always bad so far as theory is concerned. In practice it frequently is. In this case what will happen will be that those who have made payments ten years ago—and large financial institutes have done that—will receive no benefit. But they will receive a benefit if the contribution happens to have been made during the last ten years. They will get one-tenth allowance if it was made nine years ago, two-tenths if it was eight years ago, and so on.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Is not that an invidious condition that operates unfairly with respect to some and favourably with respect to others?

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BENNETT: If you are going to make it retroactive at all, then it seems to me that it should be retroactive entirely. Those that have made lump sum payments and have severed the funds from their own funds should be able, during the period of the next ten years, if you are going to make it retroactive, to deduct one-tenth from their income. That would seem to be the legitimate and reasonable thing to do if you are going to treat it in that way. Any payments that have been made, especially lump sum pension payments which have been severed entirely from the funds of the enterprise, should become a deductible allowance from the income during the period of the next ten years, beginning with 1939. The year 1938 has passed and payments for that year may be regarded as concluded.

Mr. ILSLEY: In a sense this is not retroactive at all.

Mr. BENNETT: It is in dollars, even though it may not be in cents.

Mr. ILSLEY: The deduction cannot be made in one year; it must be divided into ten equal amounts. Where an employer made a lump sum payment five years ago, for taxation purposes we assume that only one-tenth was paid five years ago and one-tenth during each year since then. As far as our purposes are concerned, the payment which was made five years ago is still being made and has four or five years still to run. We are allowing that as a deduction from the passage of this legislation. For the purposes of our deduction the lump sum payment is divided into ten payments. We proceed on that assumption and from the passage of this legislation we shall be dealing with future payments. We are dealing with future payments. The lump sum payment was made five years ago, but it is assumed for the purposes of taxation that it is still being made, and that there are four or five yearly payments still to be made, which we are allowing as deductions. In that sense it is not retroactive.

Mr. BENNETT: One does not question that phase of it. I tried to make clear my understanding of it. Ten years ago a company having a large income put away $100,000 to a reserve fund. As the law stood it was not permitted to make any deductions of any kind by reason of such action, and would have paid income tax on the $100,000. But if the same company, instead of having done it ten years ago, did it eight years ago it would be allowed to deduct $10,000 from taxable income for 1938-39, and $10,000 for 1939-1940. That would be, I think, unfair. This fixes ten years as the limit of time within which an appropriation can be made to lessen the burden of taxation. But taxes have already been paid upon the lump sum; they were paid when it was contributed for that purpose and severed from the funds of the corporation or enterprise, as the case might be.

It must be known to the minister that there are large financial institutions that have set up voluntary pension funds, severed entirely from the enterprise, and to which from year to year they have made large contributions. To the extent to which they may be regarded as expenses they, of course, as pointed out by the minister, do not pay income tax. But if there is an appropriation of a large sum for that particular purpose, and this applies only to that kind, then my submission is that that company should be placed in exactly the same position, if you are going to be retroactive at all, as those more fortunate companies that are making a contribution of $200,000 or $300,000 now to start a fund, and allow them to deduct one-tenth every year during the next ten years. I do not approve on general principles of the idea of making these matters retroactive, but if you desire to place them all on a parity, and that is what apparently the minister does desire to do, from the standpoint of deduction, then it is clear that if $500,000 was set up as the nucleus of a fund from the accumulated earnings of an enterprise which had paid income tax all the years, it would be fair to say that notwithstanding the fact that the contribution was made fifteen years ago, during the next ten years they should deduct $50,000 annually, to put them in the same position as those now setting up a pension fund for the first time; and one-tenth deductible from the taxable income would place them in exactly the same position with respect to that $500,000 upon which they had paid taxes as though they had commenced to-day to set aside the $500,000 and deducted $50,000 during the next ten years from their taxable income.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not agree with that. The company that made its lump sum payment more than ten years ago must be assumed for the purposes of this act to have made all its payments, even on a ten-year basis.

Mr. BENNETT: I say they made a flat contribution of half a million dollars from their accumulated funds. I do not want to name the enterprise; it would be most unfair to do it, but I can give it to the minister for the purpose of illustration.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are quite willing to treat the company that made its lump sum payment ten years ago as though it had made ten payments beginning with the time when it made its lump sum payment.

Mr. BENNETT: But this does not do that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Oh, yes. It is not passed until after the expiration of that time, and therefore there is no deduction that can be allowed that company.

Mr. BENNETT: It never has had a deduction. The lump sum payment has been made, on which income tax has been paid. But here there is an allowance that will free it from income tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not exactly follow what the right hon. gentleman says. He suggests that there is discrimination against the company that made its lump sum payment ten years ago or more, and that it does not get any deduction under this legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: Quite.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are treating that company exactly the same as any other company. For example, we are willing to treat that company as though, instead of making its $500,000 payment ten years ago, it made $50,000 payments for each of the ten years succeeding that. But it still gets all its payments made before this law is changed, and therefore the company gets no benefit under this legislation.

Mr. BENNETT: Surely the minister has not followed me. I am sorry I have been unable to make myself clear. Company A has in its reserves $2,000,000, upon which income tax has been paid, the $2,000,000 having been accumulated out of profits which were taxable. The directors, with the approval of the shareholders, appropriated $500,000 fifteen years ago for a pension fund, and severed that fund from the funds of the enterprise. They will receive no benefits under this legislation.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BENNETT: And their competitor, which makes an appropriation to-day, or eight years or six or seven years ago, will obtain, if payment is made this year, complete freedom in ten years of income tax for the whole amount; and if made within the period of ten years, freedom from taxation for one-tenth of it for each of the years that represent the difference between the number of years and ten. That is discrimination. Whether it is a discrimination that should be approved is a matter, of course, for the administration to say, but it does clearly put one enterprise in a different position from another.

You must remember that many voluntary non-contributory pension funds, notably one or two very large ones, came into being in this country entirely through the voluntary act of the directors, with the approval of the shareholders. Sums of money were appropriated for that purpose, upon which, of course, if the fund were set up since 1917, income tax has been regularly paid, because the funds were accumulated out of profits. It is for the minister to say whether he thinks that is a form of discrimination that parliament should not take notice of, or whether for a period of ten years the company should be afforded relief.

Mr. ILSLEY: Even if the act were not retroactive in the sense in which the right hon. gentleman uses the term, there would, of course, be discrimination as between the company that makes its payments hereafter and the company that makes its payments before the passage of the act. The only way that kind of discrimination could be avoided would be to go back to the beginning.

Mr. BENNETT: Omit the ten years prior to to-day.

Mr. ILSLEY: If we omitted the ten years there would certainly be discrimination between the company that made its lump sum payment last year and the company that made its payments after the passage of this act.

If we were to carry out my right hon. friend's suggestion it would mean going back to the beginning of the Income War Tax Act, and that would be a very expensive thing. I still do not think there is any real discrimination here. This is put on a ten-year basis, and the companies are assumed to have made their payments, not in one year, but in ten successive years. The company that made its payment ten years ago is not dealt with at all. We do not do anything with that company, but we are quite willing to apply the rule that it can be treated as if it made this payment.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: But you cannot apply the rule unless you amend this.

Mr. ILSLEY: The company has not anything to apply it to.

Mr. McCANN: Would companies which set up a fund for the purposes of medical benefits to their employees be eligible for this exemption? Many companies, particularly mining companies in Ontario, for the purpose of assisting their employees have set aside a fund for medical benefits and payments to their employees when they are out of employment by reason of sickness. It is well known that such cases are well taken care of under the Workmen's Compensation Act when they are out of employment or disabled by accident. I submit that companies which set up funds for such purposes are just as much entitled to exemption as those which establish a superannuation or pension fund. This is something which is very much needed, and could be encouraged by the exemption of such funds from income tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am informed that under the law as it stands now, if the company definitely and permanently severs an amount for the purpose of paying the medical expenses of its employees in future years, that severance is regarded as a payment and will be treated as a deduction from the income of the year.

Mr. McCANN: It goes in their current expenses?

Mr. ILSLEY: Just as if the company paid the actual medical expenses of the employees.

Mr. BENNETT: It is chargeable as an operating cost?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. ISNOR: What is the position of an employer who takes out a group insurance policy on his employees, say a ten-year endowment policy? Would he be permitted each year to deduct the premium on that policy?

Mr. BENNETT: There is a distinction. Does not the department treat it in practice a little differently?

Mr. ILSLEY: If the policy is general to all the employees of the company, and not limited to executives or higher paid officials, the premium will be treated the same as contributions to a pension fund.

Mr. BENNETT: Group insurance premiums, I think, are allowed as an operating cost, but endowment insurance—that is, insurance paid for by the business against the possible loss to the business of some man who occupies a position of particular importance in it—stands in an entirely different position. As far as I know, endowment policies have not been made applicable to group insurance. I think the practice of the department makes a clear distinction.

Mr. ILSLEY: If it is general it is allowed as an expense.

Mr. ISNOR: Would the same thing apply if it is contributory, by employer and employees?

Mr. ILSLEY: The company would be allowed to deduct only its part of the premium.

Mr. ISNOR: But it would be entitled to that deduction?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Paragraph agreed to.

2. That every corporation, the main business of which is the making of small loans shall, notwithstanding any other provision contained in the Income War Tax Act, be subject to normal corporation rates of tax.

Mr. BENNETT: Are they not now?

Mr. ILSLEY: Not if they are non-resident owned investment corporations. There was an amendment in 1936 to the Income War Tax Act which set up a new category of corporations for income tax purposes, called non-resident owned investment corporations. They are subject to half the normal corporation rate.

Mr. BENNETT: They were regarded as investment corporations.

Mr. ILSLEY: They came within the definition of investment corporations. It was never intended to encourage foreign companies to come in here and carry on a small-loan business and get half the corporation rate. That is the sole purpose of this proposed amendment.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not think they regarded these small-loan corporations as investment corporations within that definition. It is clear they should be taxed. That amendment was intended—remembering the explanation given—to refer to enterprises which came into this country to engage in what is known in many provinces as investment business, that is, they afford a medium for the acquisition of shares in Canadian enterprises. It was not intended as being over-the-counter business but rather involved the purchase and acquisition of securities. That was my understanding.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is correct.

Mr. BENNETT: The language is regarded as being too wide, therefore they escape the ordinary corporation tax; is that the idea?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is the idea.

Paragraph agreed to.

3. That annuities received under the provisions of any will or trust shall be taxable income of the recipient. Such annuities shall be taxable for the year 1937 and each year thereafter notwithstanding when the will or trust became effective.

Mr. BENNETT: I have never known an annuity that was not taxed.

Mr. ILSLEY: This arises from a court decision, the Whitney case, which decided that annuities payable under a will are not taxable; they are regarded as payment out of the corpus, as being in the same category as bequests under a will, which are exempt under the act. The result is that draftsmen are now preparing wills in such a way that the testators leave annuities instead of a lump sum.

Mr. BENNETT: I read that decision as being dependent on the peculiar language of the will. But it does strike me as strange that an income arising from a fund, payable as an annuity, should not be taxable. If however the annuity was in part contributed by the capital it obviously would not be. I think the language used in the particular case was responsible for the decision; but this restates what I understood to be the law, except that it is retroactive as far as 1937 is concerned. "Such annuities shall be taxable for the year 1937"; that fixes a date, and it is retroactive as far as we are concerned, for the period has passed within which the 1938 return was to be made. If the 1937 annuity is to be taxable, obviously some arrangement should be made with those who have to pay; they should not be chargeable with penalties.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, I agree. That will be done.

Mr. BENNETT: And secondly, "and each year thereafter notwithstanding when the will or trust became effective." A will or trust speaks from the death of the testator in the one case and the date fixed by the document in the other. The rule of law is that the will speaks from the date of the death. If it is a trust within the will the contents of the testamentary document may provide that the trust shall not become effective until a future date. Obviously an annuity can be paid only under the provisions either of a will or of a trust that provides for its payment. An annuity cannot be taxable until it is paid.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not intended to be.

Mr. ILSLEY: But unless these words were added it might be said that annuities that had begun to run, payable in 1932, 1933, 1934, 1935 and so on, would be exempt during the entire period.

Mr. BENNETT: But unless the annuity is actually paid under the terms of the will or trust it is not an annuity. If it has accumulated then it is not an annuity. Payment is necessary to make it taxable as an annuity. I think that is almost an elementary statement of the law.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I think the minister agrees with that.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, that being so I cannot get the significance of the words "notwithstanding when the will or trust became effective."

Mr. ILSLEY: It means that even if the course of annuity payments began in 1935, or before the passage of this act, annuities are taxable hereafter beginning with annuities received in the year 1937.

Mr. BENNETT: That is a retroactive provision.

Mr. ILSLEY: Just for 1937.

Mr. STEWART: A court or a judge might hold, with respect to a will made in 1910 and annuities arising and continuing thereunder all these years, that the act does not apply to such a will that came into force before the passing of the act. A judge might hold that this act really applies only to wills made after the passing of the act.

Mr. ILSLEY: A judge might so hold, if the hon. gentleman is stating what the court might hold.

Mr. BENNETT: It is money that is taxable, not the promise to pay, and it is on the annuity that the tax is payable and not accumulated capital. There is a special provision of the act with respect to a trust that provides for accumulations, but the general rule would be that a trust that provides for accumulation converts income into capital in terms of the document and thereupon it becomes a capital fund, and of course under our laws the tax is payable on the income that arises from that accumulation fund. But an annuity is taxable only as it is paid as an annuity.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is right.

[Mr. Ilsley.]

Mr. BENNETT: I cannot see therefore what is meant by these words "notwithstanding when the will or trust became effective," unless it is intended to make it retroactive beyond 1937.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is not retroactive beyond 1937.

Paragraph agreed to.

4. That the gift tax shall not apply to any gifts made in any year by an individual the aggregate value of which in such year does not exceed an amount equal to one-half of the difference between the income which was subject to income tax in the previous year and the income tax payable thereon. Any enactment founded on this resolution shall be applicable to gifts made in the calendar year 1938 and thereafter.

Mr. BENNETT: May I ask the minister whether I understand this aright. A has an income of $250,000. He pays an income tax of $100,000. He is permitted to deduct $50,000 as a gift, and that is free from taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: No, $75,000.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes, $75,000. Is that what is intended?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: In other words, he can give away $75,000 of $150,000 without incurring any taxation, but if he gives away more than $75,000 he is liable to the tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: If he gave it away within the twelve months.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes. The period of time within which he gives it away becomes very important, the idea being that it is out of the current year's income. That is the theory of it, which I think is sound.

Mr. ILSLEY: The year before.

Mr. BENNETT: The tax period, the twelve months tax period. That is to say, in 1937 A's income was $250,000 and he paid income tax of $100,000 for that year, so that there was $150,000 of his income left. Would he have to give away the $75,000 in 1937?

Mr. ILSLEY: No, 1938.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what I want to make clear. His income was, in 1937, $250,000, and the tax on it was payable the next year, 1938, and he paid $100,000. That meant that there was $150,000 of free money in 1937. He is permitted to give away $75,000 free from tax. Must he give that money away in 1937 or 1938?

Mr. ILSLEY: In 1938.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that clear under the statute?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is clear here.

Mr. BENNETT: There is no doubt about that?

Mr. ILSLEY: There is no doubt about it.

Mr. BENNETT: There is one more question. Here we pay income tax, as the minister will remember, to this government for both Ontario and the dominion. I take it that the words "income tax" here mean federal income tax—or do they mean both? It ought to mean both, properly. Which does it mean? We are collectors for Ontario, and in the illustration I mentioned I used the figure $100,000 as representing the two taxes together; that is, it is an income tax payable to the crown in the right of the dominion as to a portion, and in the right of the province with respect to the other portion. The question is: Are these words "income tax" to be construed to mean what they mean in the return we make, namely, the tax paid to the collector here for income in both the dominion and the province?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is just federal income tax.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that quite fair?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is better for the taxpayer that way.

Mr. BENNETT: I am thinking of the matter from two points of view. I am not putting it from the angle of the taxpayer alone.

Mr. ILSLEY: The right hon. gentleman asks whether it is fair to the crown.

Mr. BENNETT: Yes.

Mr. ILSLEY: I think so. This is more or less arbitrary anyway.

Mr. BENNETT: It is arbitrary. My hon. friend from Prescott directs my attention to something which I really think is worthy of consideration by the committee. The paragraph provides that the gift tax shall not apply to any gifts made in any year by an individual the aggregate value of which in such year does not exceed an amount equal to one-half of the difference, and so on. The twelve months is not specified there. The minister made a clear statement as to what he believed the intention of the legislation was and that is why I was trying to put to him as clear a case as I could so that there would be no misunderstanding. My hon. friend now points out that the use of the words "in any year" and "such year" without reference to the twelve months period still leaves it ambiguous.

Mr. ILSLEY: These are two different matters. The fourth paragraph of the resolution very clearly states that it is the previous year that is referred to. The words are "one-half of the difference between the income which was subject to income tax in the previous year and the income tax payable thereon." That will be found in paragraph 4. Paragraph 5 does not relate to exemptions; it relates to rates and has no connection with that other matter.

Paragraph agreed to.

6. That royalties paid by persons abroad out of royalties received from sources within Canada shall not be allowed as a deduction in determining net royalty income from sources within Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: Just what does this mean?

Mr. ILSLEY: Royalties are paid by Canadian companies to foreign companies, probably chiefly United States companies.

Mr. BENNETT: Perhaps the minister would give an illustration.

Mr. ILSLEY: Let us say a company in Canada is using a patent which is owned by an American company. Probably it will be a company incorporated for the purpose of holding such patents and letting people use them on a royalty basis. Our Income War Tax Act provides that the non-resident company to which the royalty is paid by the Canadian company must pay an income tax at the regular rate on the net income arising from the royalty, and we have an officer here in Ottawa who has charge of that matter. There is a large revenue from these non-resident companies to which royalties are paid.

The procedure is that when the royalties are remitted 12½ per cent of such royalties is paid to the income tax division pending receipt of income tax returns from the non-resident company. It may be that the company will have to pay more than 12½ per cent. It is much more likely that the company will pay considerably less than that rate. In any case it will pay the ordinary corporation rate on the net income which it derives from the royalties. That is the ordinary procedure; that is what the act intended, but the foreign company holding these patents and licensing Canadian companies to use them may itself have obtained that patent from a German company. It may be necessary for the United States company to pay a royalty to the German company, and under the law as it stands without this amendment, the United States patent holding company deducts the royalty which it pays to the German company in making up its net income, upon which it pays tax to the Canadian government. We have no way of reaching the German company—and I mention this only as an illustration—to which the United States company pays royalties; yet it is a case, we think, where we are entitled to something like the corporation rate. That is the intent of the law, so this provides that no deduction can be made in regard to royalties paid by the foreign company.

That is what I might call a legitimate case. There might be a case where the American company has set up a corporation to which it pays royalties. The situation is one which lends itself to some manipulation, shall I say, with the view of minimizing the amount payable to the Canadian government. I do not know that this is the case, but certainly it is entirely possible. If a company reports to us that its royalty was $100 but that it had to pay $90 to another American company we do not quite know whether they really had to pay that $90 to that other company. When this legislation is passed we will not have to inquire into that phase of it. We say that we will not allow as a deduction any royalties paid by the royalty receiver.

Mr. BENNETT: That they pay here on the royalty received here.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, they pay on the net income earned in respect of the royalty received.

Mr. BENNETT: I was going to say that I do not think the word "net" is the best word in the world to use. I think it would be better if you used the term "in determining the taxable royalty income from sources within Canada." The minister knows the line of argument with respect to "net" and matters of that kind, but there can be no such argument with respect to the use of the word "taxable." I have marked it in my copy as being in my opinion a better term, but I only make that suggestion.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall bring it to the attention of those who are drafting the bill.

Mr. ESLING: In 1936 there was an amendment which brought certain royalties down to the equivalent of two per cent instead of five per cent, in connection with rentals or royalties remitted to the United States. Would the minister make that clear? None of us understood it at the time. Let us take it this way. A resident of Canada may own his home. Circumstances arise which make it necessary for him to move to the United States. He rents his home, and on those rentals there is a five per cent deduction when the money is remitted. In 1936 an amendment was passed providing for exemptions which brought the deductions on some royalties down to two per cent instead of five per cent. Or take it another way. Persons in the United States put say $10,000 into a mine—as we are inviting them to do—and may receive dividends, upon which the government takes five per cent, for perhaps two or three years. Then the ore peters out. These people lose their total investment, and of course the government loses its five per cent. But in the case to which I refer, in 1936 the government made the deduction on moving picture films from five to two per cent, and there is little chance of that industry petering out because it is a continuing investment.

Mr. ILSLEY: I remember something about the 1936 amendment, but I will have to read the section that was amended and then read the amendment in order that the committee may see what the hon. gentleman is referring to. In section 9B of the Income War Tax Act, subsection 2(e), we had this provision, that in addition to any other tax imposed by this act, an income tax of five per cent was imposed on all non-residents of Canada in respect of:

(e) (ii) any rights in and to the use of any copyrighted work subsequently produced or reproduced in Canada by way of the spoken word, print or mechanical sound or from paper, composition, films or mechanical devices of any description.

That is a five per cent tax on payments made to non-residents from Canadian debtors in respect of these particular articles. The tax is five per cent. In 1936 there was an amendment. The subsection I have read was repealed, and the following substituted therefor:

Any rights in and to the use of any work, whether copyrighted or not, subsequently produced or reproduced in Canada, by way of the spoken word, print or mechanical sound on or from paper, composition, films or mechanical devices of any description—

The only change being—

Mr. BENNETT: From what section does the minister read?

Mr. ILSLEY: Section 8 of chapter 38 of the statutes of 1936, An Act to Amend the Income War Tax Act. The only change so far is that the section extends to work that is not copyrighted. But there is a proviso in these words:

That in the case of motion picture films, 60 per centum of such payments shall not be subject to the tax under this section.

Mr. BENNETT: That is what the hon. member wishes to speak about, and so do I.

Mr. ILSLEY: In regard to motion picture films it is made two per cent instead of five per cent.

Mr. ESLING: That is the point, and the question is this: Is there any good reason why that should be done? It is a huge institution collecting millions of dollars each year. Why should it be exempt to the extent of sixty per cent, while a person who puts a certain amount of money into a mine, encourages the development of the country, and perhaps loses the whole thing, pays his full five per cent, so long as he receives dividends? When he ceases to receive dividends he has also lost every cent of his investment. It does not seem to me to be quite reasonable.

Mr. ILSLEY: The explanation is that the motion picture films were not up to the time of this amendment covered by the five per cent provision, but were covered by the royalty provision.

Mr. BENNETT: That is the reason the hon. member is asking about it now.

Mr. ILSLEY: And the royalty provision provided only for taxation of this net income which we speak about in respect of royalties. The motion picture people showed that they had no income, and that when you talk about net income you have to take into account their costs, not the royalties alone. And so we were getting nothing in respect of those companies who had no net income. The effect of the section is to bring motion picture films into it, and to tax them two per cent—not five per cent—on the gross amount.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not quite the point. The minister has not gone far enough. It is the sixty per cent the hon. member is referring to, in the amendment of 1936.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: Is that touched by section 6 now before us? You see, we called them royalties at one time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And we taxed them at a five per cent rate, if I remember rightly; is that right?

Mr. ILSLEY: We called them royalties, put them on the net income basis, and taxed them the full corporation rate.

Mr. BENNETT: Exactly. Now, in 1936 we said:

> Any rights in and to the use of any work, whether copyrighted or not, subsequently produced or reproduced in Canada, by way of the spoken word, print or mechanical sound on or from paper, composition, films or mechanical devices of any description.

And so on. That provides for the taxation. Then we say:

> Provided that in the case of motion picture films, 60 per centum of such payments shall not be subject to the tax under this section.

What the hon. member is pointing out is that sixty per cent is entirely too large an exemption. Section 6 says:

> That royalties paid by persons abroad out of royalties received from sources within Canada shall not be allowed.

And so on. That does not apply to this case, apparently. The contention of the hon. member for Kootenay West is that it should, and I agree with him.

Mr. ILSLEY: We are not dealing with the resolution before the committee.

Mr. BENNETT: But the resolution with respect to royalties raises the issue whether or not, having taken the steps we have taken with respect to royalties, it follows that we should do something with respect to this other matter. The minister will observe that section 6 says that royalties paid by persons abroad out of royalties received from sources within Canada shall not be allowed as a deduction. That is, if a company abroad which receives from Canada $1,000 says it pays $500 for the same royalty, that is no longer a deductible item, and they are going to pay income tax on $1,000, which seems to be a reasonable basis. If they are doing business in that way and taking from our people $1,000 of income, we are going to take our share of that income as a tax, the same as from any other Canadian enterprise. And we are not going to deduct from that as a taxable item the money they pay to somebody else for royalties. That is their business in the carrying on of their affairs outside of Canada.

The hon. member for Kootenay West draws attention to the fact that what we did in 1936 was to provide that in the case of a motion picture film, as distinguished from other items, sixty per cent of payments made shall not be subject to the tax under the section. The two things are not consistent. The section which we are now considering, and this section, are not consistent. The sixty per cent is entirely too wide an exemption. In fact I am afraid it makes us the laughing stock of the people who are paying it, if I may say so frankly to the minister.

Mr. ESLING: To clarify the situation may I point out that the films which we use in the various picture theatres in Canada are not all brought in as films for each province or each theatre. There is one duplicate negative brought to Canada. On that duplicate negative for the purpose of establishing an ad valorem value the department fixes a rate of eight cents per foot. Now, that is on the negative. From that negative the company reprint in Montreal or Toronto enough prints to take care of the provinces, and then distribution is made from headquarters. The only duty which is paid on the duplicate negative coming from Hollywood would be on the ad valorem of eight cents, plus sales tax and excise—

Mr. BENNETT: A specific of eight cents a foot.

Mr. ESLING: No, the tax is three cents per foot on the eight cents per foot ad valorem valuation. Then we have an eight per cent sales tax, and an excise tax. However the ad valorem value would be not much more than $600. In other words, the whole expense in connection with the negative is not very great. From that negative they make prints—just like one would make prints from an ordinary photographic negative—which are distributed throughout Canada. A rental is secured for each running of the picture at each theatre. The accumulated earnings of those films, less expenses, are remitted to the United States or to some other country. This government should have five per cent on that remittance, but for some reason it has exempt sixty per cent from taxation. The result is that this government receives only five per cent on forty per cent. The result is that these large film concerns are paying only two per cent to this government instead of five per cent on their remittances.

Mr. ILSLEY: If it were not for this provision the United States company would be paying a tax on an income basis. They would be paying the full corporation rates because they would be receiving royalties from Canadian sources. They would be taxable for the income received in respect of those royalties. They contend, and I think the income tax division is satisfied, that they have no income. The result is that we would not get anything on that basis.

Mr. BENNETT: Would the minister just amplify that? What does he mean when he says that they do not make any money?

Mr. ILSLEY: That is what the income tax division thinks. They believe that if they attempted to tax on an income basis under the section relating to royalties they would not get any tax at all. Therefore it is put upon the basis of gross remittance. The question then is whether five or two per cent is the proper figure, and the income tax division considered that two per cent was more equitable. The income tax division is satisfied that they would not get as much on the income basis as will be obtained on this two per cent basis.

Mr. BENNETT: Will the minister look into that?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall be greatly obliged if he will. Does not it seem amazing to have it suggested that these people are losing money? From what we know of them they would not be here very long if they were.

Mr. ILSLEY: I know I invested a thousand dollars which to-day is worth only $20.

Mr. BENNETT: I congratulate the hon. gentleman upon having had a thousand dollars to invest. I can only say to him that no doubt that was a Canadian company. Since he has mentioned the matter, may I say that I paid $5,000 into one in the hope that I would make some money, but the whole of it has been lost. To-day it has no value at all; it has long since been wiped out. But we were not dealing with these great corporations that have to do with this business when we invested our little $1,000 and $5,000. These people deal in millions and they carry on business in every part of the world. Let us get down to brass tacks. I do not think we could have the matter explained more clearly than has been done by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Esling). These people bring in a negative—I believe it is really called a positive—upon which they pay duty on the basis of a valuation of eight cents a running foot. Copies are made from that negative which are sent out to theatres all over the country. Their remittance to the home office represents, not the proceeds of one film but the proceeds of all the duplicates they have made and distributed to the different theatres in Canada. They are permitted to deduct sixty per cent before they pay any tax to Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: Deducted from what?

Mr. BENNETT: From the sum of money they have taken in. It is provided that in the case of motion picture films, sixty per centum of such payments shall not be subject to the tax under this section.

*[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. ILSLEY: They pay five per cent on forty per cent, which is two per cent on the whole thing.

Mr. BENNETT: It is not put that way.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is the same thing.

Mr. BENNETT: I know that things that are equal to the same thing are equal to one another, but that is not what we are dealing with.

Mr. ILSLEY: It sounds rather bad when you say they pay only on forty per cent. It is different when you say they pay two per cent on everything.

Mr. BENNETT: I am reading from the statute.

Mr. ILSLEY: The result is that they pay two per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I did not draft the amendment. The statute provides that sixty per cent shall not be subject to tax under this section. That fund, of which sixty per cent is free, represents the accumulation of royalties from theatres in which the film has been shown. These films have been produced from a single negative brought into this country and upon which a tax has been paid on the basis of a valuation of eight cents a running foot, as well as other incident taxes. I submit that that is not quite fair and I suggest to the minister that he should look into the matter when dealing with this question of royalties. We are making a declaration with respect to royalties. I think the illustration given by the minister was an excellent one. Here is a company in the United States which has earned $1,000. They say they are not going to pay a tax on $1,000 as they have to pay $700 to Germany. The minister replies that he is not concerned about that, that he is going to tax them on their net royalties earned from sources within Canada. He is treating Canada as a whole and he is not concerned with anything that is paid somewhere else. Then take this other matter, which in a sense is a royalty. Why should that be made sixty per cent free? I cannot see how you can do it.

Mr. ILSLEY: Has the right hon. gentleman any reason to think that five per cent would be fairer?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly. I think two per cent is just making a joke of us. The minister probably has reasons for thinking differently. My view may be erroneous; I do not say for one moment that it is infallible, far from it. These are great enterprises and that is why my hon. friend's $1,000 and my $5,000 are worth nothing to-day.

Mr. ILSLEY: It does not look as though they are making much money.

Mr. BENNETT: They may say they are not, but that is not what they indicate quietly. How could they help but make money? They bring in one negative upon which an insignificant duty is paid. They make copies from that negative which are turned loose in every theatre. Then no tax is paid upon sixty per cent of the proceeds, and we collect only five per cent on the balance.

Mr. ILSLEY: The preparation costs probably amount to something.

Mr. BENNETT: No doubt that is so. In fact, some of those concerned are better paid than legislators. Sometimes they provide greater amusement for the populace, but not always. As long as the minister has made a note of it, that is all I desire to say.

Paragraph agreed to.

7. That if any person or corporation ordinarily resident in Canada effects any transaction which at any stage makes use of any person or corporation ordinarily resident abroad, and which has the effect of reducing the liability to taxation under the act of such person or corporation ordinarily resident in Canada, such person or corporation ordinarily resident in Canada, shall continue to be liable to taxation under this act to the same extent as if the transaction had not taken place. This provision shall apply to any transaction only if the treasury board upon a reasonable interpretation of the evidence available makes a ruling that the transaction was effected mainly for the purpose of avoiding liability to taxation under the act. An appeal shall lie from any such ruling of the treasury board to the exchequer court of Canada.

Mr. BENNETT: This section is a distasteful one, but from necessity it is desirable. It entrusts with the minister for the time being—that means the treasury board in a sense—the power of interpreting the evidence available for the purpose of making a ruling as to whether the transaction was effected mainly in order to avoid liability to taxation under the act. These are matters very difficult to discuss. We read so much in the press with respect to individual cases, but one has to approach the subject without regard to individual cases and deal with it only from the point of view of principle and the effect which it has upon our revenue. For the sake of illustration, A has an income of $4,000,000 derived from the resources of the Dominion of Canada. Under existing law that means a contribution of very large sums of money to the dominion exchequer. But A says: I am not going to do that; it is too large a sum to pay out of my income. I therefore—in the language of the statute—although ordinarily resident in Canada will effect a transaction by which I make use of a trust company ordinarily resident abroad, which will have the effect of reducing my liability to taxation under the act. But we say: We are going to try to get some of that money because the action that was taken was intended as an effort to escape liability to taxation.

I see a little difficulty with the words, "if any person or corporation ordinarily resident in Canada." The Minister of Justice (Mr. Lapointe) gave an opinion on that point when dealing with the high commissioner's taxes some years ago, that is, the words, "ordinarily resident in Canada." Perhaps the minister will recall it. It is quite clear that these people are no longer ordinarily resident in Canada. They have taken up residence somewhere else. They have left our country, and their lawyers will at once say, when they come before the treasury board, "My client was formerly resident in Canada, but he has left the country. It is true that his income of $4,000,000 comes out of this country, but he is no longer ordinarily resident here." Because he has effected a transaction which has the effect of reducing the liability to taxation under the act, as a person ordinarily resident in Canada. This touches only one case, that of the man who continues to live here.

Mr. ILSLEY: Or the company that remains here.

Mr. BENNETT: I am using the word "person" as including corporation. This touches only the one case, and that is not the kind of case we should be dealing with. I do not think it is the case that was intended to be dealt with.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes, it is.

Mr. BENNETT: It touches only one branch.

Mr. ILSLEY: The other is very difficult.

Mr. BENNETT: I will undertake to prepare legislation for the minister if he will give me an hour to do it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I am rather inclined to accept that offer.

Mr. BENNETT: I shall be glad to sit down with the minister and in an hour we shall produce the legislation. If the money has its origin in Canada the arm of Canada is strong enough to catch it. That is all I have to say of the principle on which I would act. I do not care where it is. If it comes out of the ground, out of a mill, out of a factory, if it is within the boundaries of the four corners of this dominion, the arm of this dominion is strong enough to grasp it.

Mr. ILSLEY: I agree.

Mr. BENNETT: And the minister will agree. I admit it is unpleasant legislation.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is not the objection to it.

Mr. BENNETT: All these things are unpleasant in that sense, but the arm of this country is long enough and strong enough to see to it that new wealth produced out of its resources makes a contribution to the welfare of this country.

Mr. ILSLEY: I do not want to argue the case, but the objection is not its unpleasantness at all.

Mr. BENNETT: I meant unpleasantness from the standpoint not of government but of individuals who have to deal with these things.

Mr. ILSLEY: That would not worry us much.

Mr. BENNETT: It would not worry me.

Mr. ILSLEY: The objection to it is this. I do not say it is insuperable. In fact, I shall be glad to receive suggestions, but the objection to taxing non-residents at high rates is that we must expect similar legislation to be enacted against persons who are resident in Canada. For example, if we impose a fifteen per cent instead of a five per cent tax on remittances to non-residents, we would be stretching forth our strong arm and taking money that we have a right to take—there is no question about that—but our whole attempt with the United States has been to keep the non-resident tax down. The United States had legislation by which they would have taxed Canadians receiving payments from the United States ten per cent, but we concluded an agreement with them by which we kept that down to five per cent, and we kept ours down to five per cent. We have the power, of course, to make it fifteen or fifty per cent.

Mr. BENNETT: I was not thinking of dealing with it in that way at all.

Mr. ILSLEY: But that is what it runs into. My hon. friend might say: I am not thinking of taxing remittances from Canada to people in the United States at high rates of fifteen or fifty per cent; I was thinking of men in the Bahamas or places like that. But the question arises, can you discriminate in your non-resident tax rate between residents of one country and residents of another?

Mr. BENNETT: Certainly you can, and I will tell you why. We are dealing with cases of men who made their fortunes here.

Mr. ILSLEY: Can you discriminate on that basis?

Mr. BENNETT: I do not say on that basis alone. We can enact legislation, if we so desire, that deals with that phase of it, plus the fact that if the evidence satisfies the treasury board that what was done was for the purpose of evading taxation in Canada, then action may be taken. You are doing that here to-day. I asked the minister whether he was limiting it, and he said: Yes, I am limiting it to people ordinarily resident in Canada. Well, Mr. Chairman, there will be very few, because the question of residence is going to come up at once. The minister will remember two celebrated cases, one that of a great man from India, and the other that of a great shipowner of Liverpool. One spent the last years of his life admittedly saying: I am going no longer to be a resident of England. And he provided himself with a magnificent yacht and took up his home in the Channel islands. Well, his widow gave one million pounds to the British exchequer. The other case is reported in the House of Lords. In that case the man was from India. I suppose there is no reason why I should not give his name. It was the Sir David Yuill case. They found his residence was in India but his domicile for taxation purposes, succession duties, was in England.

Mr. ILSLEY: It is much harder to shake domicile than residence.

Mr. BENNETT: Domicile is always difficult because it involves a number of things. There are two factors in domicile. One is residence. That is matter of fact. The other is evidence as to intention, by speech, conduct and matters of that sort. But in this provision before us to-day we are making just half a bite at a cherry. It is to deal only with those ordinarily resident in Canada, and at once the solicitors in such a case are going to say: "My client is no longer ordinarily resident in Canada. He has a house somewhere else and does not come under this provision at all. What are you going to do about it?" It is something more than that we have to deal with. I see that the minister thoroughly grasps the idea. He must remember that it was the late government, not this government, that started the tax on remittances. What is more, everything the minister said is true as to the cries that were heard about what the effect would be. We said that if money is made under the laws of Canada, surely some contribution must be made to the revenues of Canada. That is all. And the minister has continued it. We started with 5 per cent under certain circumstances. London people telegraphed that this was going to hurt investments; but go over there and see what happens to you at the source; there is no waiting, you are taxed right at the source, as I know to my sorrow. They take your money then and there.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is equivalent to our corporation tax; we tax our corporations at the source.

Mr. BENNETT: But I am talking about the individual.

Mr. ILSLEY: They do not have the corporation tax separate from the individual tax there; the individual tax is taken from the company at the source. The English shareholder in a Canadian company finds that we take 15 per cent from the company without saying anything to him, and another 5 per cent on his dividends.

Mr. BENNETT: We take it from the company because it is a Canadian company.

Mr. ILSLEY: I understood it was an English case of which the right hon. gentleman spoke.

Mr. BENNETT: No; I am talking about my having shares in an English company; I may say I do not have them now but I had, lest there should be any difficulty on that score. The tax gatherer might think I had omitted that income. But if he looks back he will find that I paid too much; the money was taken at the source and I had to pay here also.

Mr. ILSLEY: The 20 per cent taken at the source is about equivalent to what we take.

Mr. BENNETT: No; that is a different thing altogether. I am dealing with one man, a man ordinarily resident in Canada. I suggest that the minister should consider how he is going to deal with one outside.

Mr. ILSLEY: I have given a great deal of thought to the matter.

Mr. BENNETT: I am sure the minister has. But 5 per cent on the money that goes out is a trifle compared with what we would normally receive. The income tax of those of us who remain here is moderately heavy. If, for instance, one had a fairly large income last year and a small one this year, he would find that a very large proportion of this year's income goes to pay last year's tax. It is not quite fair that large sums made out of the production of new wealth in Canada by those who were ordinarily resident here but have left these shores avowedly for the purpose of escaping taxation should be permitted to escape entirely.

Paragraph agreed to.

8. That dividends received by Canadian parent companies from wholly-owned non-resident subsidiary companies shall be exempt from the corporation rate of tax if at least 75 per cent of the combined capital of the parent and subsidiary companies is employed abroad. Such exemption shall be granted only if and to the extent that the country in which the subsidiary company is located grants a like exemption to parent companies in respect of dividends emanating from subsidiary companies in Canada and shall not extend beyond dividends that are equal to profits that have been subject to tax abroad in the year previous to the year of declaration of the said dividends. Any enactment founded on this resolution shall be deemed to have come into force at the commencement of the calendar year 1938 and to be applicable to the calendar year 1938 and to fiscal periods ending therein and to all subsequent periods.

Mr. BENNETT: What does the minister expect now under paragraph 8?

Mr. ILSLEY: An exemption of a kind here in question has been requested for many years. It is intended to remove an obvious and severe burden of double taxation on Canadian companies which have been enterprising enough to extend their business activities into other countries to an extent that the foreign operations far exceed the Canadian business. At present Canadian parent corporations pay full double taxation on income received from their foreign subsidiaries. For example, the United States taxes the income of subsidiaries at rates ranging from 15 to 19 per cent. This income, when transferred to the Canadian parent corporation by way of dividends, is again taxed by us at the rate of 15 per cent. Obviously, then, there exists a great incentive for the Canadian parent company to move its head office out of Canada and operate with the parent corporation abroad and the subsidiary in Canada. Particularly is this true in view of the fact that the United States government, for example, allows its parent corporations a deduction in respect of taxes paid abroad by wholly owned subsidiaries. Thus a Canadian parent corporation, by moving its head office to the United States, would escape this double taxation.

It might be further pointed out that a Canadian company doing business entirely abroad, with no operations in Canada, is entirely exempt from tax under section 4 (k) of our act.

[Mr. Bennett.]

Mr. BENNETT: Exempt from tax in Canada?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. Also Canadian companies operating abroad through branch plants are allowed under the Canadian act a deduction on account of taxes paid in respect of its profits earned abroad.

Mr. BENNETT: Does that include income tax as well? That is, the taxing authority here allows as a deduction the taxes paid by the subsidiary abroad, including the income tax as a tax?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes; but has the right hon. gentleman in mind the situation? The deduction is not allowed as a deduction from the income of a Canadian company, it is allowed as a deduction from the tax imposed on the Canadian company.

Mr. BENNETT: That is, if the tax here were $1,000 and I had paid $400 abroad I would have to pay $600 here?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes. It is provided in this amendment that where the foreign subsidiary is wholly owned, and where at least 75 per cent of the combined capital of the parent and subsidiary companies is employed abroad, then a deduction will be allowed in respect of tax paid to foreign governments. Provision is made that this allowance depends upon reciprocal action on the part of other countries. It is further provided that the exemption granted in any one year shall not extend beyond dividends that are equal to profits which have been subject to tax abroad in the year prior to the year of declaration of the dividends in question.

Mr. BENNETT: Has the minister reason to believe that this may become reciprocal?

Mr. ILSLEY: It is reciprocal now as far as the United States is concerned.

Mr. BENNETT: Company A receives from a Canadian company $1,000 in the way of dividends. It does not pay income tax on that at the present time. But if it receives it from the United States, it does pay?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: This legislation provides that, under certain conditions with respect to capital, that dividends so received may be deductible here as though the company were a Canadian one, provided other countries treat us in the same way?

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes that is right.

Mr. BENNETT: Have we any reason to believe that other countries will so treat us?

Mr. ILSLEY: Just the United States. I have not considered the situation in regard to any other country.

Mr. BENNETT: That is not a matter of agreement; they simply do not tax.

Mr. ILSLEY: No.

Mr. McNIVEN: Would the minister explain why, in addition to a company being a wholly owned subsidiary, 75 per cent of the combined capital must be employed in the foreign country? As I understand the minister, this legislation applies to those countries which have a reciprocal provision. In the United States there is that provision now. But there is not that requirement in the law of the United Sates as to 75 per cent of the capital. I can think of Canadian companies operating wholly owned subsidiaries in the United States for the production of raw material which is shipped to this country for the purpose of manufacture and distribution, but 75 per cent of their capital is not employed in the United States, so they would not benefit by this provision.

Mr. ILSLEY: That is true.

Mr. McNIVEN: But if reciprocity is desired, why not give a full measure of reciprocity?

Mr. ILSLEY: We should lose too much money if we went as far as the United States goes. This is as far as we can afford to go. It applies to companies that are predominantly American. It is an encouragement to companies that are enterprising enough to extend their operations to other countries to the extent that those operations far exceed their Canadian business. Seveny-five per cent is a matter of judgment.

Mr. McNIVEN: The companies I have in mind are of the enterprising type to which the minister has referred. They are Canadian companies; in order to make themselves as nearly self-contained as possible they have organized subsidiaries in the United States to acquire raw materials that are not available in Canada, and they have shipped and are shipping these raw materials to this country for manufacture. These materials subsequently manufactured are distributed solely to the Canadian people. It is true that the parent company remains here and the greater percentage of their capital is still employed in the manufacture and distribution of their products here.

Mr. BENNETT: Head office here?

Mr. McNIVEN: Yes. Some of the companies I have in mind maintain manufacturing plants in at least three of the provinces, with a Canada-wide distribution system; they bring into Canada raw material that is not available here for the manufacture of their products; yet their subsidiaries are taxed in the United States from 15 to 19 per cent, and when the subsidiary declares a dividend it comes to the coffers of the parent companies and is again taxed under the corporation tax.

Mr. BENNETT: Fifteen per cent.

Mr. McNIVEN: Yes, 15 per cent; and then when the parent company distributes its dividends to the shareholders the shareholders pay a third tax. I can see no reason why the second clause should be added limiting the investment to 75 per cent, particularly when reciprocity with the United States is desired, and the United States does grant that privilege to wholly owned United States subsidiaries operating in Canada.

Mr. ILSLEY: The loss would be very great. I know the class of companies to which my hon. friend refers, but there are other classes in connection with which the circumstances are not the same at all. It is rather a matter of doing some processing in the United States and producing some raw material here. It is difficult to answer what the hon. gentleman has said. If we went the whole way, the loss of revenue would be very great, and we felt that we could not do that. We have gone a part of the way and we may go further yet, but not this session.

Mr. McNIVEN: Do I gather from what the minister says that he appreciates the fact that this particular provision is a hardship upon certain companies which may be described, in the terms he himself has used, as sufficiently enterprising to invest some of their capital in other countries for the purposes I have named?

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall not go further than to say that taxation on these companies and their shareholders is heavy under the system.

Mr. McNIVEN: And it is out of proportion to the taxation that is imposed on corporations generally and upon individuals engaged in similar activities.

Mr. ILSLEY: I shall not agree with that.

Mr. McNIVEN: It is double taxation.

Mr. ILSLEY: There is a good deal of double taxation all through our system. It is honeycombed with double taxation.

Mr. BENNETT: Treble in some cases.

Mr. McNIVEN: That is what this is.

Paragraph agreed to.

9. That any enactment founded on the provisions of these resolutions shall be deemed to have come into force at the commencement of the calendar year 1937 and to be applicable to the calendar year 1937 and to fiscal periods ending therein and to all subsequent periods, except as otherwise provided.

Mr. BENNETT: In a measure this is retroactive for one year, but that may be desirable from the administrative standpoint on account of the broken periods of time.

Mr. ILSLEY: Yes.

Resolutions reported, read the second time and concurred in. Mr. Ilsley thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 164, to amend the Income War Tax Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

ELECTIONS AND FRANCHISE

MEASURE RESPECTING FRANCHISE OF ELECTORS, ELECTION OF MEMBERS OF HOUSE OF COMMONS AND PRINTING AND PUBLICATION OF ELECTION DOCUMENTS

Hon. C. G. POWER (Minister of Pensions and National Health) moved that the house go into committee on Bill No. 91, respecting the franchise of electors and the election of members of the House of Commons.

Right Hon. R. B. BENNETT (Leader of the Opposition): It will be remembered that when this legislation was introduced into the house it was accompanied by another measure which was complementary to it. I see no report of the complementary measure; presumably it is intended to proceed with the main bill without its complement. A sad fate has overtaken a measure of such grand promise as was indicated by the minister who had the matter in charge on that occasion. It breathed a spirit of altruism which had the effect of lifting the sordid atmosphere of this community into the ether of a higher realm, and made men think in terms of that glorious day when peace should reign and good will should be the dominant factor in all our transactions. Alas, it has apparently fallen by the wayside.

Mr. POWER: Not fallen by the wayside.

Mr. BENNETT: It has only been crippled, I understand. At an early date it may be revived on the way. There may be travelling on the road some good Samaritan who will give it that measure of kindly treatment which will ensure its early recovery. Before we proceed with this legislation, I might ask whether the complementary measure from which so much was hoped is also to be proceeded with this session.

[Mr. McNiven.]

Mr. POWER: The bill known as the Political Expenditures Act is being considered by the committee on electoral matters. It was considered at great length yesterday morning, and, I understand, will be still further dealt with. Whether it will be possible to carry to fulfilment this year the high hopes my right hon. friend entertained for this house and the country is something I cannot say. I can say this, however, that all great reforms are not carried out in one hour, or one day, or one session.

Mr. BENNETT: That accounts for the budget, I take it.

Mr. POWER: I am not dealing with the budget at the moment. It is quite possible that there were contained in that bill certain provisions which did not meet with the entire approval of all the members of this house or even of all the members of the committee. I am under the impression that sooner or later, possibly this year, the committee will accept at least the principle of the bill, and it will perhaps be left for some of us to work out the details in a manner which will be more acceptable to the members of the house generally.

Mr. BENNETT: I am told that questions of principle have not been the important matter; that a sufficient gathering of interest was all that was required.

Mr. POWER: That might have helped, too.

Motion agreed to, and the house went into committee, Mr. Johnston (Lake Centre) in the chair.

Sections 1, 2 and 3 agreed to.

On section 4—Tenure of office, salary, rank and powers of chief electoral officer.

Mr. POWER: I will ask my colleague to move an amendment, that after the word "of" in line 23 there be added the words "eight thousand dollars per annum."

Mr. MACKENZIE (Vancouver): I move accordingly.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Sections 5 and 6 agreed to.

On section 7—Writs of election.

Mr. NEILL: We are passing these sections without the slightest consideration. Might I ask if the report of the committee was unanimous about all these matters?

Mr. BOTHWELL: So far as any sections so far carried are concerned, the vote of the committee was unanimous. There are certain sections of the bill on which the committee did not vote quite unanimously, but I would suggest that when we arrive at those sections those who were opposed will have something to say regarding them.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Appointment of returning officers.

Mr. NEILL: I do not know what the people will think about this. Is this a proposal to fire all existing returning officers and appoint new ones; or is there that possibility, in any event?

Mr. BOTHWELL: The situation under this as under past elections acts, is that the returning officers will have to be appointed again. Whether it will be the same or different officers will depend upon the powers that be.

Mr. NEILL: I did not understand the hon. member. Would he mind explaining that more fully? Does the legislation require all positions to be made vacant?

Mr. BOTHWELL: It does.

Mr. NEILL: Why?

Mr. BOTHWELL: I might explain that in arriving at the general principles which are embodied in this new measure, the committee followed the act of 1930 to quite an extent. This is an entirely new bill; it is not an amending bill in any sense of the word, and officials who are appointed under this bill will have to be appointed again. No matter who have held positions in the past, we have to make provision here for either appointment or reappointment.

Mr. STIRLING: Is it not the case that until to-day a returning officer holds office under a certain act which is about to be repealed and replaced by this bill? Consequently, as I understand it, he must receive appointment under this measure.

Mr. BOTHWELL: That is so.

Mr. NEILL: This section states:

> The offices of all returning officers appointed prior to the passing of this act shall be deemed to be vacant—

If we are doing away with the old act, they would become vacant automatically, would they not?

> —and the governor in council may appoint to such offices either the same persons as now hold them, any of such persons or any other persons.
