By tradition the OECD leadership is a consensus decision. Given the outcome of this announcement—

BLOC QUEBECOIS

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to warn the House and the Board of Internal Economy that some members of the Bloc Quebecois shamelessly use their privilege as members of the House of Commons by promoting Quebec's independence in their Christmas cards.

In addition to being in poor taste, this practice probably goes against parliamentary rules. Using taxpayers' money and the great Christmas holiday for political purposes is reprehensible and shameful.

Will Bloc members reimburse the Canadian government for these immoral expenditures? Will Bloc members include these expenditures in the "yes" campaign in order not to contravene Quebec's referendum act?

I therefore ask you, Mr. Speaker, to investigate and condemn this outrageous practice.

An hon. member: Come on.

An hon. member: You exaggerate.

The Speaker: It is Wednesday, what do you expect?

MIL DAVIE SHIPYARD

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in this House, the Prime Minister agreed with the verdict of the Canada–Newfoundland board which denounced awarding a contract without tender to Saint John Shipbuilding. The Prime Minister instructed the Minister of Natural Resources to require the Hibernia consortium to review its decision that was unfair to MIL Davie, the only bidder able to carry out this contract which had been awarded to Saint John.

How can the minister explain the government's decision to hold another call for tenders on this contract, when MIL Davie was the only other shipyard that bid on it?

[English]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me clarify that which the Prime Minister and I said yesterday.

In light of the Canada–Newfoundland offshore board decision which indicated all Canadian shipbuilding companies were not given a full and fair opportunity to bid or tender for the contract in question, we have asked through the president of the Hibernia Management Corporation that the owners review their decision.

I understand from Mr. Hull, the president, that he will be in contact with the other owners and seek that review. Pending the outcome of that review, I think it would be unfair or inappropriate for me to anticipate the outcome.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since everyone admits that MIL Davie was wronged in this affair, why does the minister stubbornly refuse to recognize that the only way to correct the injustice done to the Quebec shipyard is to award it automatically and without delay this contract which it should have had from the beginning?

[English]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me reiterate the position of the Prime Minister and myself. What we are concerned about in this situation is the process that was used by the Hibernia Management Corporation. It is clear based on the report of the offshore board that all Canadian companies were not treated fairly. We have asked the management board of Hibernia to review that decision. Our concern is with the process. We have never commented on the ability or lack thereof of any shipyard in this country to do the job in question. We are concerned that everyone get the opportunity to be treated fairly.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we see how complicated and difficult it is to obtain justice when a Quebec company like MIL Davie is involved. Does the minister realize that by reopening the bidding, she is leaving MIL Davie vulnerable to its competitors since they will probably have access to the documents from the first bid and find out about their contents? Does she realize that?

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I simply reiterate the concern of this government. It is with the process that was followed. We are committed to ensuring that all Canadian shipbuilders have a fair and full opportunity to bid on contracts.

I think, for whatever reason, my learned friend across the way is having some difficulty comprehending the fact that our concern is always with fairness.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Natural Resources. If someone has problems in this House, that person is on the other side.

The MIL Davie shipyard, in Quebec, is on the verge of closure. The company needs new contracts to ensure its survival. If the Hibernia contract for a sub-module of electric equipment was transferred to MIL Davie, the company could immediately recall 400 of its recently laid off workers. It is still time to act, since the component housing the modules has not yet left Marystown, in Newfoundland.

How can the minister explain that, with over six billion dollars of economic spin-offs related to the Hibernia megaproject, the MIL Davie shipyard, the only one in Canada with the expertise to build drilling platforms, has so far been awarded only one contract representing a mere $15 million?

[English]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me reiterate that this government does not wish nor is it in any position to comment upon the relative merits of one shipyard over another in relation to this contract. What we are in a position to comment upon is fairness and full opportunity on the part of all shipbuilders to participate in this contract. That is what we will ensure.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, let us not forget that Quebecers invested $800 million of their tax dollars in Hibernia, only to see MIL Davie get a small $15-million contract. In the meantime, the Sorel-Tracy shipyard and the Montreal shipyard were closed and every attempt is being made to also close the one in Lévis, while shipyards in Newfoundland and New Brunswick are being subsidized and contracts are awarded without any tender to Saint John Shipbuilding. Is this all part of a scheme to kill MIL Davie? How can the government be proud of such an attitude?

How can the minister abdicate her responsibility regarding management of Hibernia by always telling us the same old story and hiding behind the private partners of the consortium, when the federal government guarantees close to 50 per cent of the funds for this megaproject, or some $30 billion?

[English]

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me inform my hon. friends across the way that the Hibernia project has been of considerable benefit to the province of Quebec over the years that it has been in operation and will continue to be in the future. Over half a billion dollars worth of contracts for over 100 Quebec companies.

They do not want to listen, but let me assure my hon. friends that this government has no desire to hurt MIL Davie or any shipyard in this country. What we want to ensure is that every shipyard has the opportunity to be treated fairly.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, over the past year we have repeatedly seen the government float proposals and legislative intentions without having the faintest idea of what the cost or the value received would be.

• (1425)

This is evident in the human resources minister's policy paper. It has been evident in defence department commitments to peacekeeping and other areas. Today the Minister of Justice is once again putting forward legislative and policy proposals, this time for firearms control.

Can the minister assure the House that comprehensive cost estimates for the firearms control program exist and will be tabled prior to the introduction of his new gun control legislation?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be announcing this afternoon particulars of the decisions we have made in relation to the firearms control program.

I can assure the hon. leader of the third party that we have looked in detail at the costing of all the proposals we will put before the House.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, like the social policy reform, any proposed firearm control program cannot hope to succeed without the enthusiastic support of the provinces.

The attorneys general of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba have already implied that the minister's draft proposals for a national firearm registration system are more likely to increase paperwork than they are to increase public safety.

Can the minister tell the House which provincial governments are supportive of the minister's legislative intentions in this area and which are not?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the announcement of our decisions will take place this afternoon.

As a matter of courtesy I have furnished copies to my provincial counterparts. In answer to the question put by the hon. member, let me express my own belief that when all the provincial attorneys general look at these proposals and decisions in their entirety, they will support these initiatives.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, time will tell.

With respect to consultation, first the justice department leaks its gun control proposals to the media with appropriate spin doctoring. Then it breeds the support of the interest groups and only then, five days later, does Parliament get to see the documents and the provinces are included almost as an afterthought.

The government puts public relations and interest groups ahead of Parliament every time. It has done this on social policy. It has done it on immigration, on finance and gun control.

Does this order of preference, media leaks first, interest groups second, Parliament third and provinces dead last, reflect the government's consultative priority?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first, I make no apologies for the four months of personal consultation that I conducted across the country.

During the course of the last several months, I have been in continuous touch with senior officials and indeed with provincial counterparts, attorneys general and ministers of justice, exchanging views about the proposals that will be decided upon and announced this afternoon.

May I make it clear that any leaks to the media were entirely beyond the control of the Department of Justice. What steps we took were as a matter of courtesy to furnish representatives of the hon. member's party and of the official opposition with advance copies of the material so that they could see it before this afternoon.

FERRIES

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

We heard the news that MIL Davie was treated unfairly by the Hibernia consortium in the matter of a contract that would have maintained several hundred jobs at the Lévis shipyard and, meanwhile, the federal government has yet to announce what it intends to do about the proposal by the Government of Quebec for the construction of a ferry for the Magdalen Islands.

When is the minister going to respond to the proposal made by the Government of Quebec on November 14, and how can he justify his government's slow response?

• (1430)

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Transport Canada is responsible for providing a safe and efficient service between the Magdalen Islands and Prince Edward Island, and we will do everything we can to ensure that the people of the Magdalen Islands have this service.

However, I want to point out to the hon. member that we have asked the operator who is now responsible for providing the service with the Lucy Maud Montgomery to advise us of his requirements, and then Transport Canada will award him a subsidy.

Acquiring, leasing or building a ship is the sole responsibility of the service operator, not of the Government of Canada.

Mr. Antoine Dubé (Lévis, BQ): Mr. Speaker, when we started our first session a year ago, I asked the same question and today, the answer is still the same.

Considering how the government deals with matters that concern MIL Davie, how can the minister expect us to believe that the government is not making a concerted and deliberate attempt to close down MIL Davie?

[English]

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have made some progress in trying to determine exactly what is required to provide the service between Iles de la Madeleine and Prince Edward Island.

I want to say to my hon. colleague that we have made significant progress in this place since yesterday. One of the things that has been cleared up, I hope to the satisfaction of every one, particularly my friends who are concerned about the future of MIL Davie, is that in the future whenever the Government of Canada is concerned there will be no question of sole sourcing ships. Any process for acquisition will be through a clear, transparent and competitive bidding process.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Terence Wade report commissioned by the Department of Justice reveals that the handgun registration system is replete with confusion, inconsistencies, non–compliance and mismanagement. Most important, the report reveals how completely useless the handgun registration system has been as an aid to law enforcement agencies and in reducing the criminal use of handguns.

I ask the Minister of Justice why this report, which was available in July, was not tabled with the standing committee on justice, why it was not tabled in the House, and why I was denied access to the report by his officials when I requested it three weeks ago.

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will get answers to those questions and I will put them in writing to my hon. friend. As I told him yesterday, he should have a copy of that report and I shall see to it that he does have one.

Let me make clear, before we lose the point the Terence Wade report made, that the manner in which the registration system for handguns was organized during the past two decades was flawed and needed improvement. It did not condemn the principle of registration nor the purpose of registration.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, right now there are firearm interest groups locked up pending the announcement of the Minister of Justice regarding gun control later today.

The minister has expounded upon his virtuous cross–country consultation process this summer. While in consultation with these various groups did the minister inform them of the findings contained within the Terence Wade report, or was the report concealed from them as well?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the course of those dozens of meetings I had across the country I took it as a given that the registration system in place at present in the country for handguns will not serve as a model for any future registration system. It is indeed flawed, without argument.

The point of the discussion in those consultations was how such an approach could be effected to serve the very important social goals that registration can and will achieve.

COLLÈGE MILITAIRE ROYAL DE SAINT–JEAN

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

On the issue of the Collège militaire royal de Saint–Jean, the Quebec government is prepared to discuss with the federal government how the transition plan proposed by the mayor of Saint–Jean should be implemented. In Quebec's view, this is an interesting proposal, as it could ensure the survival of the college the long term.

Now that he has finally seen reason, or so it seems, can the minister who welcomed with interest this proposal by the mayor of Saint–Jean tell us if he intends to assign federal officials to resume talks with the Saint–Jean authorities and the government of Quebec?

• (1435)

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Minister Beaudoin should know that negotiations are not conducted through the media. I have received nothing official from the minister yet. I therefore have no answer to give, since no question has been asked in the first place.

It is essential however that any negotiations regarding the mayor's proposal be conducted on the basis of the two conditions the mayor and myself have agreed upon, that is to say, first, that the conversion of the military college to civilian use must take place and, second, that there must be a transition period. These two basic principles are part and parcel of the agreement proposed on July 19, which the government of Quebec has yet to comply with.

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we are not negotiating through the media. I have put a question to the minister and I would like to get an answer.

How can this minister have the gall to parade about with the "Sauvons Saint–Jean" badge on his lapel when, once again, he is showing bad faith in refusing to resume talks?

The Speaker: Members must refrain from assigning to other members motives that are not honourable. Perhaps the hon. member could rephrase his question.

Mr. Bachand: Mr. Speaker, does the minister intend to resume talks, yes or no?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the opposition may be under the impression that using unparliamentary language will improve the negotiation climate, but that, of course, is wrong.

The reason I am wearing the "Sauvons Saint–Jean" badge is because we hold the key to the continuation of the college in Saint–Jean and this key is the July 19 agreement. I sent a letter to Mrs. Beaudoin two weeks ago, indicating that I was prepared to resume negotiations on the details of the agreement which is in effect under the terms of the agreement signed on July 19.

BOSNIA

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Secretary–General Boutros Boutros–Ghali's mission to Sarajevo today has failed. The Bosnian Serbs refused to meet with him and the Bosnian government refused to agree to a ceasefire.

Should Canada not now take the position that unless all UN detainees are immediately released, there be no further aggression against UN personnel, the Sarajevo airport be reopened to humanitarian flights and convoys allowed to proceed and an effective ceasefire be put in place, Canada should call for the withdrawal of all UN forces from Bosnia?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has been quite clear on Canada's participation in this very troubled mission and I do not propose to repeat it.

I subscribe to some of the points raised by the hon. member. We in Canada believe that obviously those detained should be released, that the hostilities should cease, that there should be a ceasefire, and that the Sarajevo airport should be reopened. We believe all of that and we believe that can be accomplished by negotiation.

We are very sorry that the Secretary–General of the UN was denied a meeting today. I would only hope that this is yet another bargaining ploy on the part of those who refused to meet with him and that they will get down to meaningful negotiations within the next few days.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

The situation in Bosnia is increasingly hazardous and is causing great concern to all Canadians. All possible attempts should be pursued in attempting to find a resolution.

The contact group, Britain, France, Germany, Russia and the U.S., was formed last April to use diplomacy to minimize tensions and to encourage agreements among the warring factions. Why is Canada not a member of that contact group?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if I could answer that I would certainly be a wise person.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Prime Minister have made the point that Canada should have been part of that group. We are among the top contributors of forces in the ex–Yugoslavia. It is a shame and a disgrace that we are not part of that group. I hope the Prime Minister makes that point this weekend in Budapest.

REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. On November 30, 1993, exactly a year ago today, the Royal Commission on New Reproductive Technologies published its final report after studying the issue for four years and spending over $28 million. We are still waiting patiently for the federal government to respond to the commission's recommendations.

How can the Minister of Justice explain that, one year after the Baird report was tabled, he still has not introduced a bill to regulate reproductive technologies, research on human embryos as well as the sale of ova and human foetal tissue in Canada?

[English]

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Health and the Ministry of Health have been working on the response to the royal commission for quite a while.

As the hon. member knows, the royal commission created far more controversy than it answered questions. We need to look at how we can deal with provinces and with special groups, to look at how we can set guidelines for recommendations and to follow the recommendations.

However, as far as taking our time, I bring to the hon. member's attention the fact that the royal commission was supposed to have reported in two years. It took four years to bring in its report.

Because the matter is so controversial I think it is quite acceptable that we have to deal with the same controversies in formulating our response.

[Translation]

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I think that blaming the government's delay in introducing a bill on the commission's own two–year delay in tabling its report is a pretty poor excuse. Is the minister aware that by delaying the introduction of his bill, he makes it even more difficult, if not impossible, to counter abuses in research on human embryos and to prevent the sale of ova and foetal tissue on the black market?

[English]

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member mentioned the fact that we must counter abuses. We are dealing with an extremely serious and extremely difficult and complicated issue.

This department and the Minister of Health want to ensure that we make the right choices that will ensure the safety of Canadians and will ensure that all medical, ethical, social and psychological issues are dealt with.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

In northwestern Ontario companies frequently lay off employees due to seasonal and climatic factors. Through no fault of their own affected employees end up having to claim unemployment insurance frequently.

What is being done to ensure that this type of unemployment insurance claimant is not unfairly affected by the proposed UI reforms?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, we are particularly sensitive to the importance of a wide variety of seasonal and cyclical work in the country. It is important for a variety of regions.

As the House probably knows, for that reason we established a special working group that represents different sectors and different regions of the economy. We are now specifically looking at the issue of seasonal work. We have established a series of bilateral discussions with construction trades and other affected sectors. We are working with them in a very co–operative way to make sure that any new design of unemployment insurance fits the requirements of Canadian industry and Canadian seasonal workers.

HIBERNIA

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House the Prime Minister stated and today the Minister of Natural Resources reaffirmed that they would ask Canada's representative on the Hibernia holding company to ask for a review of the contract to Saint John Shipyards. I have been assured by the officials of the Hibernia holding company that the awarding of this contract to Saint John Shipyards was done as a fully justifiable decision in full accord with the provisions of the Canada–Newfoundland Atlantic Accord Implementation Act.

• (1445)

My question is for the Minister of Natural Resources. How can she justify interfering politically in this matter when the Hibernia consortium clearly followed the rules contained in the offshore accord?

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me explain that in spite of whatever contacts the hon. member may have and what he may think about the processes that were followed, the Canada–Newfoundland Offshore Board which is seized with the regulation and determination of these issues, concluded late last week that Canadian shipyards were not given a fair and full opportunity to tender for the work in question.

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, clause 45 of the Canada–Newfoundland Atlantic accord states that in instances where the budget or the time restraints are in question the accord allows for contracts to be given without tender.

I would like to ask the minister why she would jeopardize the budget and the completion date of the entire project by demanding a review and/or tendering of the contract when it is clear that all the rules have been followed.

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me reiterate. In spite of what the hon. member has asserted, the Canada–Newfoundland Offshore Board, a board created to deal with these issues, has determined that the rules were not followed, that all Canadian shipyards were not given a full and fair opportunity to bid on the contract.

I do not think there is anything else I can say on the issue.

SEVERANCE PAY

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Canadian press revealed how generous the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is when it comes to pleasing his friends with money provided by Canadian taxpayers.

My question is for the fisheries minister. Can the minister explain to us how someone can work for four months in his office, quit his job voluntarily and pocket a bonus of $31,000, then be rehired by the minister in the same office at an annual salary of $93,000, without having to pay back even a cent of his severance pay? How?

[English]

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the individual in question is the executive assistant to the minister of fisheries. Last February he was named in a matter that was under investigation in the Parliament of Newfoundland regarding fundraising practices in the province of Newfoundland.

The individual in question, my executive assistant, resigned his position in my office the next day until the matter had been cleared up. As it turned out the matter in question was subsequently referred to the RCMP because it involved a provincial cabinet minister.

Seven and a half months later the RCMP concluded that notwithstanding questions raised in the House initially by the opposition, subsequently referred to the RCMP for a thorough seven and a half months investigation, that individual was cleared of any question of wrongdoing whatsoever.

In that seven and a half months period the individual, Mr. Gary Anstey, sought no employment with any other operational organization, received no other income, in fact went without income for three and a half months.

After he was cleared of any wrongdoing he was restored to his job as executive assistant. He has done without three and a half months' salary in the process. How that can be described as a golden handshake boggles the imagination.

• (1450)

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as we well understand, the minister's answer shows that he cannot deny that the amount of severance pay was at his discretion.

How can the minister, who preached virtue when he was in opposition, take refuge behind Treasury Board's lax rules to explain such generosity to his friends when the government is not ashamed to cut unemployment insurance for those who quit their jobs voluntarily? That is what bothers us. How can he do it?

[English]

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. member would want me to restate two points he made rather quickly.

First, the individual in question was away for seven and a half months and in that period received no salary for three and a half months.

Second, Treasury Board rules provide in this kind of circumstance—and I would be glad to lay a copy on the table for the House—for up to six months' severance pay for an individual who leaves a job abruptly for these kinds of reasons.

The assistant deputy minister of corporate affairs, when I sought advice, recommended in writing four months' severance. I accepted the advice.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, first we learned about the limo service of the official language commissioner and Ottawa digs at taxpayers' expense. Now we hear that the part time chairman of Ports Canada has billed the government $61,500 in extra pay on top of $53,000 in expenses, $12,000 for an Ottawa apartment that is used 24 days a year and $34,500 in travel from his home in Vermont. Does this sound like fiscal restraint, Mr. Speaker?

My question is for the President of the Treasury Board. Will he undertake an immediate review of per diems, honoraria and expense accounts of all government appointees to federal agencies?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows the government has already undertaken a review of all agencies and boards, and we are doing it very quickly.

I look forward to the assistance of members of the third party and other members of the House as we review in depth the operations on the maritime side of my responsibilities at Transport Canada. We have already announced that we are going to be looking at the structure of Ports Canada and how these arrangements are arrived at.

The case that the hon. member raises today is a result of an order in council appointment that I understand was made in 1987. It exemplifies the need to review all of these matters in depth, whether they have to do with the per diems of the chairman of Canada Ports Corporation or orders in council.

I can assure the hon. member that we are going to be doing it as quickly as we can. I look forward to their co–operation on this matter, unlike some of the things we have tried to correct where they have gotten into bed with whoever is convenient.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I address my supplementary question to the Minister of the Treasury Board.

Reviewing is one thing, we want action after the review. The government is sending all the wrong signals to its federal officials. How can we expect the bureaucracy to spend more responsibly when the executive assistant to the minister of fisheries received a $31,000 severance package for four months—or seven months even, I could certainly live on that—and is not even required to repay a penny when he is rehired to the same position several months later?

My question is for the Minister of the Treasury Board. How can the government dare to ask Canadians to tighten their belts? What part of fiscal restraint does he not understand?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has made it quite clear that the employee involved resigned.

Until an investigation could be completed that person was without employment for some seven and a half months, which means that the $31,000 covered only the first three and a half months. There was a considerable period of time when that person was not employed and yet that person had not done anything wrong, as the minister clearly said.

The government is dedicated to ensuring the cost efficiency of every taxpayers' dollar that comes into the revenues of the government. We are tightening up on many of these procedures which previous governments had put in place to make sure that happens.

SALMON SPORT FISHERY

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The Sport Fishing Institute of British Columbia has developed a proposal called Quickstart to rebuild stocks of coho and chinook salmon. All sectors of the industry in British Columbia, commercial, sport, and aboriginal fishers, will work together in rebuilding the stock and also restoring habitat with broad community involvement.

Has the government endorsed the Quickstart plan, and when will it come into effect?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, receiving such a valuable, worthwhile and sensible question gives me a quick start today.

We have had many questions about the state of the coho salmon resource in British Columbia from members on all sides of the House. The proposal of which the member speaks is a private sector initiative that we welcome, one that will help rebuild weak stocks of coho and chinook salmon through a privately funded program of support of breeding and habitat restoration.

The program Quickstart represents a unique partnership between the private sector, the sport fishing sector and both levels of government. It is a solid initiative. We intend to work fully and quickly with the proponents to make sure it is a success.

NATIVE PEOPLES

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. We just learned from Statistics Canada that the tuberculosis rate among status Indians is 43 times higher than for non–native Canadians born in this country. In fact, the infection rate is higher than in some of the world's poorest countries.

Since this incredible rate reflects appalling living conditions, can the minister tell us which concrete proposal his colleague from Public Works made to native leaders who recently met with him, to improve the housing conditions which are at the root of these health problems?

[English]

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has brought forward a question that is of great concern to public health and to the Ministry of Health.

We have been spending a million dollars a year so far to curb tuberculosis in aboriginal communities. We have now added $2.8 million extra per year over the next three years to try to eradicate tuberculosis so that by the year 2000 there will only be 20 per 100,000 affected and by the year 2010 we will have eradicated it completely.

ELECTRONIC SURVEILLANCE

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadian Press has reported that an interdepartmental working group co–ordinated by the PCO is studying the issue of electronic surveillance by federal authorities.

The group is concerned with the development of a clipper chip that would ensure that government agencies like CSIS, the RCMP and the CSE are able to intercept telephone, fax and computer transmissions despite attempts to encrypt them.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Will he confirm the existence of this working group and explain why, if CSE does not have a mandate to spy on Canadians, it is concerned about ensuring the ability of government agencies to spy on Canadians when the CSE is supposedly prohibited from doing so?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of the tasks of the CSE is to advise the government on the protection of the data in its computers because of the issue of cryptography.

It is quite normal that the CSE would be on a working group within the government where the working group is looking at developments in the United States and has been asked to give advice to government of what measures we may have to take to protect the privacy of information in our data banks from possible questionable intrusion.

TRADE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

It has to do with the stated intention of the government to expand NAFTA to include first Chile and perhaps other southern American countries. Recently the government opposed an attempt by the NDP to inject a social dimension into the legislation having to do with the Uruguay round.

I ask the Minister for International Trade whether in the Canadian negotiations leading to the expansion of NAFTA it is the intention of the government to continue to shy away from introducing a social clause or a social dimension into these treaties or whether he could say today that in those negotiations leading to the expansion of NAFTA the government does intend to insist on a social clause, charter, dimension, whatever you want to call it so that we have a truly level playing field in these agreements.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the NAFTA agreement includes two side accords, one on labour and one on the environment. Those will be an integral part of the negotiation with Chile with regard to its accession.

On the broader question of social policy and trade, that issue is being addressed in the International Labour Organization and indeed to a degree in the OECD. The recommendations and the findings of the ILO will come in time before the World Trade Organization.

The Speaker: It being 3 p.m., I have a point of order from the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster.

POINTS OF ORDER

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief and to the point.

When the leader of the Reform Party questioned the Minister of Justice regarding the leak of his statement on gun control, the Minister of Justice suggested that confidential material concerning his statement on gun control may have been leaked by the opposition.

This is not only entirely untrue but it is impossible because this material was broadcast on television last night and is in the Globe and Mail this morning. Our party and the Bloc received the information only after eight o'clock this morning.

I would ask that the minister retract this statement and clear the air so that there is no condemnation and no unfounded charges against this party.

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the record will show that I said no such thing.

I make it clear if there is any doubt that I was not suggesting that. Rather, I was responding to the statement that I was preferring interest groups and journalists to the House of Commons. I was making the point that I gave no information to journalists. I do not know who did. The people I gave it to were my colleagues in the House and in accordance with the time honoured practice on a lock–up basis for those who are particularly in the issue.

I did not suggest nor do I say that hon. members opposite breached the terms on which I gave them the documents. I make no such statement.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to certain petitions.

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of the defining characteristics of our country is its deep commitment to order and to civility. It has been that way from the beginning.

Ours is a nation created by consensus, not by revolution. Our domestic history is a chronology of quiet accommodation rather than dramatic conflict. We are known throughout the world for our distinctly peaceful character. Our proudest international symbol is the blue beret. Our most valued asset at home is the safety of our cities and of our streets.

• (1505)

Canadians firmly intend to preserve and strengthen the outstanding civility that has always distinguished them. The political and legislative program on safety in public and private places shows this government's commitment in this regard.

[English]

It is in the context of that unconditional commitment to public safety that we undertook and have now completed a thorough review of Canada's laws in relation to firearms.

I rise in the House today to announce the decisions that we have arrived at and to table a document that sets them out in detail.

Let me first report to the House on the process that I followed in preparing the decisions that are being announced today. Since May of this year when the Prime Minister asked me to take on this challenge, I have worked with the caucus of the Liberal Party to meet with Canadians from all walks of life who are interested in this issue.

During the past five months I have visited for this purpose all 10 provinces and both territories. I have met with more than 150 national and regional groups of firearm owners and users: with farmers for whom the rifle is a tool in their daily work, with hunters, with gun collectors, and with sports shooters, some of whom have achieved international distinction in their sport.

I have visited aboriginal communities and I have spoken with families that hunt for sustenance. I have also met with police, doctors, nurses and victims organizations. I have reviewed the research relating to firearms safety and public health. I have listened and I have learned. I now wish to report on this extensive process of consultation.

In the first place there is of course no doubt that the entire subject of the regulation of firearms is controversial, but I can also report that there are broad areas of consensus. First, Canadians believe strongly that they do not want a country in which people feel they must own a firearm to protect themselves. That is simply not the way we wish to live.

Second, Canadians want above all to have a lawful and safe society in which the criminal misuse of firearms is dealt with severely. Canadians do not want to follow the approach taken to firearms by the United States. They want this government to chart a different course that will lead us to a different destination.

Third, I have learned that the firearms question is not a rural–urban issue. Canadians who live in the rural environment are just as concerned about their safety as are the rest of us. Indeed, they have reason to be concerned. Studies have shown that the homicide rate in rural areas is almost twice that in the urban environment.

Fourth, Canadians want our firearms laws to acknowledge and respect the legitimate interests of hunters and of farmers. They too are an important part of the Canadian way of life. Hunting is a long and valued tradition in Canada. It is a pastime enjoyed by many Canadians and, of equal importance, it is a very significant economic activity for many regions of this country.

[Translation]

Therefore our goal must be to strengthen and safeguard our Canadian approach, which allows people to own and use a weapon only for purposes that we as a society consider to be justified. An approach that ensures a fair and reasonable control on the possession and use of firearms. An approach that provides safety standards for the use and storage of firearms throughout the country. An approach that severely punishes any criminally negligent use of firearms.

[English]

With the careful consultations now concluded, the time has arrived to act. I wish to table in the House a document which describes the approach that the federal government will take through legislation.

Let me be very clear in doing so. The process of consultation leading to legislation is now over. As I have said, we have listened and we have learned but now we will lead. We will lead with the support I hope of this House. We will continue to work with the provinces, the territories and the aboriginal communities to ensure that our proposals are implemented in the fairest manner possible.

The areas in which we will act follow the three broad categories: First, criminal sanctions for the use of firearms in crime; second, controls over firearms in private ownership; and, third, efforts to reduce firearms smuggling.

Let me turn first to the question of criminal penalties. There is a disturbing trend particularly in urban areas toward violence with firearms. Five Canadians each week are victims of homicide by guns. The increased use of handguns in crime is particularly troubling. To strengthen the law and to provide real deterrents in sentencing we will introduce new strong penalties for 10 specific serious crimes.

Where firearms are used for robbery, attempted murder, manslaughter, sexual assault, and six other serious offences, there will be mandatory minimum penitentiary terms of four years together with a lifetime prohibition against the possession of restricted firearms.

[Translation]

Those who choose to use a firearm in such a way must know that they will surely incur severe consequences. We will also propose minimum mandatory prison sentences for the possession of a stolen firearms and the possession of handguns without permits if they are loaded or if the owners have ready access to ammunition.

[English]

Our second theme deals with the controls over private ownership of firearms in Canada. There are two measures here. The first is our proposal to ban most handguns and a wide variety of military type weapons. The second is the proposal for a universal registration system for all firearms.

I will deal first with the banning of military type weapons and most handguns. I say at the outset that we start from the principle that only those firearms that we agree as a country are appropriate for legitimate purposes should be available for private ownership. Hunting rifles and shotguns of course are in that category.

[Translation]

But there are also several types of military and paramilitary firearms that are designed to imitate weapons used by the army and the police and are intended not for hunting or farming but for combat.

[English]

I am able to tell the House today that we will prohibit effective January 1, 1995, 21 types of such paramilitary firearms comprising more than 200 individual models. When the laws we propose are in place we will also ban, among others, the Ruger Mini–14 used in the murders at l'École polytechnique.

We will also ban the further sale of most handguns because we have determined they have no legitimate sporting purpose. Almost 60 per cent of the handguns currently registered to Canadians fall within that category, some 553,000 handguns. With respect to those handguns that remain, we will strengthen the controls over access and use and we will require their owners to prove each five years that they continue to qualify or they will lose the privilege of possession and use. We will also ban the import, the manufacture and the sale of replica firearms.

Let me turn to the subject of universal registration. We will introduce such a system for all firearms. Indeed such a system is the foundation for all three strategies that I am describing today, criminal sanctions, controls over private ownership and efforts to reduce smuggling.

[Translation]

For years, the chiefs of police and medical community in Canada have been asking the federal government to adopt such a system. They believe that such a registration system can contribute to greater public welfare without imposing excessive constraints on hunters, farmers and target shooters. Our government agrees with them.

[English]

During a reasonable period of transition a registration for all firearms will be introduced in order to identify the owners of firearms and to record all firearms they own. Registration will encourage compliance with safe storage requirements. It will allow police responding to emergency calls to know the firearms that are present before they arrive. It will allow police to seize all firearms owned by someone who is the subject of a prohibition order in the criminal court.

I ask that the House not underestimate the importance of that last point, of enforcing prohibition orders in the context of domestic violence. The House must bear in mind that on average one woman every six days is shot to death in this country, almost always in the home, almost always by someone she knows. Almost all of the firearms used for that purpose are legally owned. Almost all of them are rifles and shotguns. The people who pull those triggers become criminals by that very act.

We must also not lose sight of the fact that 1,100 Canadians commit suicide with a firearm each year. Too many of them are young people who act on an impulse. We must also remember that in the years since 1970, 425 children have died because they were accidentally shot and killed in Canada.

Increased compliance with safe storage, encouraged by universal registration will make it more difficult for these young persons to get access to a firearm either in a moment of torment or by tragic accident.

Registration will also be the key to ammunition controls. Once the system is in place only those persons who are 18 years of age or over and who can produce proof of registration will be entitled to purchase ammunition.

May I pass now to the control of Canada's borders and emphasize at the outset how large a task that is. I need not tell anyone how vast the frontier is we share with the United States. In terms of preventing the illegal entry of firearms the challenge is extraordinary.

We share the border with a country where guns are readily accessible. There are 130 million border crossings a year. It is simply impossible to open every trunk and glove compartment, but there are ways in which we can and will do better.

Further to the vigorous measures already taken by the revenue minister, we are announcing additional strict measures today to control the importation of firearms and to reduce illegal imports and gun trafficking.

First, we will end the practice of using Canada as a transit point for deliveries of weapons to countries that would not allow their direct entry.

Second, all shipments of firearms arriving in Canada will therefore have to be accompanied with a permit issued in advance.

[English]

Third, inspections and enforcement at the borders will be enhanced.

Fourth, new criminal offences and stiff penalties for smuggling will strengthen our hand.

Fifth, every firearm entering Canada will be registered. This will allow guns that disappear from bulk shipments to be traced and will permit us to follow every firearm to the point of sale.

May I finish as I began by talking about the kind of country we want to live in. The laws we will introduce are for all of Canada. They are sensitive to the concerns and the lifestyles in both the rural and the urban environment but they are also designed to achieve a single national purpose: safety in our homes and in our streets.

It has been said that the best way to predict the future is to invent it. Today we propose a way to invent a Canadian future that will reflect the best about us and to preserve what matters most.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice deceived us, fooled us, took us for a ride with the help of the Prime Minister himself. He had been promising a new gun control act for months, instead we get lip service from the minister.

In September, the minister said that he would table a bill in November and today he has the nerve to tell this House that it will be delayed until February. And we are supposed to trust him!

We will not, Mr. Speaker. We took his word for it, but we will not be caught a second time. We no longer believe the justice minister's promises.

There is nothing before us today, but good intentions. A ministerial statement does not commit the government to anything in particular. The justice minister may very well change his mind again tomorrow morning, and we will not be any further ahead, we will be at a standstill. Since the past is an indication of the future, the minister will probably change his mind and postpone the tabling of his bill till kingdom comes.

I find it very suspicious to see the minister wriggle out of it. Obviously, even if he takes the trouble to deny it, he yielded to the gun lobby to which several of his cabinet colleagues belong. A vocal minority easily won him over in spite of his supposedly strongly held beliefs.

On September 22, the minister stated in the House that the Liberal government was "going to deal with illegal firearms in this country, toughen the criminal law in its response to those who use firearms in the commission of offences, and deal with the regulation of firearms in the hand of lawful owners in a manner consistent with safety in our society". When, Mr. Speaker, when?

The same day, the justice minister stated that he had spent the summer consulting with Canadians. In response to one of my questions, he said, and I quote: "I spent most of the summer consulting Canadians throughout the country and I listened to what they had to say". Either he is hard–of–hearing or he listened only to what the pro–gun lobby has to say. Apparently, nothing positive has transpired from these consultations. We are still dealing with good intentions.

Today, the minister tell us that now is the time to act. What is stopping him? It seems that action does not mean the same thing across the way as it does on our side of the House. On this side, when we say the time has come to act, it means that appropriate action is being taken and, in the present case, it should have taken the form of a gun control bill. But for the Minister of Justice, now means three months down the road, maybe.

The minister quoted disturbing statistics: "on average, one woman every six days is shot to death in this country". How many more will have died three months from now?

Does the minister need a better reason to act? He should realize that the longer he waits, the worse it is. With its action plan, the government is sitting on the fence.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know if can you hear, as I do, the noise coming from the back, but I must admit it interferes with my concentration.

The Deputy Speaker: Order, hon. colleagues. I give the floor back to the hon. member.

Mrs. Venne: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I was saying that the government action plan is best characterized by fence–straddling. It reflects in part the position of citizens requesting gun control and gives in to the pro–gun lobby by postponing indefinitely the universal registration of firearms.

The minister has no intention of seeing universal registration implemented during his mandate. He expresses concern for the number of victims of homicides by gun, but tables no bill and puts off until 2001 the requirement for gun owners to obtain firearms certificates. They will have until the next millennium to comply with the minister's action plan.

As for firearms registration per se, owners are given until 2003 to register their firearms. How can the Minister of Justice think that he can be taken seriously when he says that the time has come to act and, in the same breath, tells us that weapons currently in circulation will not have to be registered for nearly ten years?

On the subject of penalties, the government action plan proposes a number of improvements regarding maximum sentences for crimes involving the use of a firearm. The list of offenses, however, includes neither assault with a weapon nor confinement.

The Minister of Justice also promised us tough measures on the smuggling and importation of firearms. Strangely enough, his action plan suggests stiffer penalties for owners of hunting rifles without registration cards than for those who import or own smuggled weapons.

While the hunter will be liable to a minimum sentence of one year in prison for a second offence, the smuggler may not even have to go to jail. Today, the minister tried to cover all bases of gun control, except perhaps when it comes to issuing registration cards for cannons, without biting into any of the real issues.

The Liberal government's lack of action does not take into account the realities faced by gun owners. In this regard, the regulations already in effect are inconsistent and difficult to enforce, even by police officers, who often are not familiar with them. On November 15, the minister replied to me in this House, and I quote: "We will make every effort to simplify (the regulations)". This does not seem to be among his priorities today.

Nowhere in the paper tabled by the Minister of Justice do we see an attempt at regulatory reform. The minister has failed to ensure that the existing regulations, particularly on the display, storage and transportation of firearms, are consistent and easy to enforce. These regulations are not published in an equitable manner. For example, the Minister of Justice is currently distributing among police forces throughout Canada an information booklet with different French– and English–language versions. It is this booklet I am talking about.

The inconsistency can be found in the chapter on the transportation of restricted weapons. Francophone and anglophone readers do not have to transport the weapon in the same way to conform to the regulations. In fact, the English–language version specifies that restricted weapons must be locked and stored individually, while the French–language version stipulates that these weapons only have to be stored individually. Does the minister promise to withdraw this misleading booklet from circulation?

The Minister of Justice is quite aware of the investigation conducted this month in Montreal by coroner Anne–Marie David. For his information, some 20 witnesses representing various organizations told coroner David how inconsistent and confusing these regulations are. Their lack of clarity leaves room for interpretation and its attendant dangers. In addition to promising new measures attempting to plug all the holes, he should have revised the faulty regulations already in effect.

[English]

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the creation of gun control legislation in a democracy places an obligation upon the government to balance the right of the individual to own property, in this case firearms, with the responsibility of the state to protect members of society from the dangerous or illegal use of firearms.

Like many Canadians, Reform members support gun control legislation based on common sense. In fact we fully support any and all gun regulations that will enhance public safety by reducing the criminal use of firearms. However, the onus is on the Minister of Justice to prove to us and to Canadians that current regulations have reduced the criminal use of firearms and that his proposed restrictions will be successful in this regard before we support the final product.

In his 1993 report the Auditor General of Canada expressed some concern about the effectiveness of Bill C–17. He questioned the motivating factor behind it, concluding that Kim Campbell proceeded for reasons of public policy and without a statistical base.

The Auditor General stated: "Our review of the new regulations indicated that important data needed to assess the potential benefits and future effectiveness of the regulations were not available at the time the regulations were drafted. Because of this, we believe it is important that the measures chosen by the government be evaluated at the earliest opportunity".

Although we had asked the minister whether he had taken the advice of the Auditor General we never were quite sure of the answer until today. Given the proposals the Minister of Justice has introduced, I suspect he may have ignored the recommendations of the Auditor General and proceeded to implement his own agenda for gun control.

In November of last year the minister stated that only police officers and the military should have guns. In respect to the minister he has clarified that remark to me since. Nevertheless, I see this sentiment still reflected in some of the proposals presented today.

The minister has proposed the banning of certain handguns from society without statistical justification for doing so. He is saying to law–abiding Canadians that if you do not use your handgun the government will take it away from you. I think this is wrong and we will stand opposed to this if it appears in the final legislation.

The minister has introduced mandatory minimum sentences of four years in prison in addition to a lifetime prohibition against the possession of a restricted weapon when committing any of the ten specific violent offences with a firearm. He has introduced a new mandatory minimum jail sentence for possession of a stolen firearm and possession of a loaded restricted weapon without a permit. The use of imitation or replica firearms in the commission of an offence will draw a minimum mandatory sentence of one year in jail under section 85 of the Criminal Code.

It is good to see that the efforts of the Reform members have not gone unnoticed by the justice minister. It is indeed encouraging to see the Minister of Justice following our lead.

On June 15 private member's Bill C–260 of my colleague from Surrey—White Rock—South Langley was read for the first time in the House. That bill expands the present offence of using a firearm in the commission of an offence by including replica firearms. It also increases the penalty for a first offence from one to fourteen years to five to fourteen years and for a second offence from three to fourteen years to ten years to life.

That same bill establishes the theft of a firearm as a new offence with a penalty of three to fourteen years. It also creates a new offence for the unlawful importation of a firearm for the purpose of selling it or using it in the commission of an offence. This offence would carry a penalty of three to fourteen years.

Finally, a person who sells a firearm other than by the process proscribed by law would be deemed to have aided in an offence later committed by the purchaser of the weapon.

Reform's position on justice has been very clear and consistent from the start. We firmly believe that the justice system should provide for harsh punishment as a deterrent for committing crimes and for just punishments once a crime has been committed.

The minister's position with regard to deterrence is however questionable. In debates on the Young Offenders Act, the minister has stated that he does not believe harsher penalties to be a deterrent to preventing youth crime. It seemed he had to be pushed to raise the maximum penalty for murder from five to ten years. This was the only area under the Young Offenders Act where the penalties were increased to any substantial degree.

Therefore, I place this on the record. The justice minister has been inconsistent in his support of a deterrent principle in criminal justice.

As well as supporting the criminal sanctions created by this proposed legislation, we also support the efforts of the government in regard to smuggling and the stiffer penalties created for illegally importing and trafficking firearms. However, we will remain sceptical about whether or not the government will be successful in catching gun smugglers.

To date, the government has not been successful in catching drug and alcohol smugglers. In fact there has been an increase in smuggling activity in this country which I have reason to believe in some cases is a result of the prohibitively high taxes and prices found in Canada.

The only way the government was able to stop the proliferation of tobacco smuggling into this country was to reduce the taxes, thereby making it an inexpensive item that was not as lucrative on the black market. In other words, it was not able to deal with the criminals who were involved in that illegal trade. It simply reduced the taxes on cigarettes and was able to reduce the smuggling by using that means.

We also have some concerns regarding whether the border controls will be effective, given that Bill C–34 has granted the Yukon Nation self–government. From statements the Minister of Justice made on October 4 while in Yukon, we have reason to believe that special legislation may be granted to reserves.

Since a number of reserves are on the Canada–U.S. border and the minister of revenue has stated that the U.S. is awash with weapons, how does the minister propose to deal with smuggling and black market activities that is already so prevalent on reserves adjacent to the international boundary? In this regard the proposals of the Minister of Justice do not go far enough and we have some concerns in this area. What use are the penalties on border controls if there are other areas that may be left wide open?

Reform does not believe in tinkering and amending only parts of the system. We believe in full reforms which are aimed at the total picture, not just one small aspect of the problem. This is true with our policies on immigration, deficit cutting, social policy reform, and other matters.

I now turn to the area which poses the greatest concern to me, my colleagues and constituents and that is the registration of shotguns and rifles.

A confidential report commissioned by the research section of the Department of Justice clearly points out the defects in the current handgun registration system. In fact it identifies approximately 30 problems with the registration system. The system has been in place for 60 years and it has failed to work. I cannot see how the minister can justify extending this failed system. How can he honestly tell Canadians it will reduce the criminal use of firearms when the criminal use of handguns has been on the increase?

The statistical justification for the registration of rifles and shotguns has not been made available to us in these proposals. How can we and how can Canadians in the absence of such information be confident that universal registration will in fact reduce the criminal use of firearms and thereby make society safer? We cannot.

We cannot afford ineffective legislation, particularly in the area of criminal justice. We must have sound and proven controls in place that ensure public safety.

On the banning of handguns, where is the information and where are the statistics that the Minister of Justice used to justify such a draconian measure?

It has been proven by various sources that gun controls do not prevent criminals from getting firearms on the black market. They do however make it more profitable for individuals to deal in the black market of these items. Repeatedly governments in this country have learned that prohibitive or restrictive measures lead to an underground market where people thrive on the challenge of obtaining something illegal and where ruthless entrepreneurs profit tremendously.

We witnessed this years ago with the prohibition of liquor and we have seen it for years with the trafficking of cocaine, speed, marijuana and other narcotics into our country. Guns are not immune from the underground economy. In fact trade in that market has not been diminished but rather enhanced by government action.

I observe the minister has outlawed hand–held crossbows and the registration of other crossbows has been put into place through these proposals. What is the justification for this? Does this not indicate an unrealistic degree of fear or apprehension underlying this legislation? I think it does. More murders are committed with knives than with handguns. Are we to see the justice minister move to the registration of these weapons?

We look forward in the coming months to the minister tabling the legislation. We assure him and the people of Canada that we will support legislation that is aimed at the criminal activity involving firearms. The case for such action has been evident far too long in this country. However, we will be closely scrutinizing that legislation which is a further encroachment upon the rights of law–abiding Canadians.

In closing I would like to quote from a letter written to me by a loyal and dedicated Canadian. He stated: "The people of Canada will not accept the suppression of our rights and freedoms by criminals and they will not accept the suppression of those same rights and freedoms by our government".

CANADA–JAPAN INTERPARLIAMENTARY GROUP

Ms. Paddy Torsney (Burlington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to present in both official languages the report of the Canadian delegation to the fifth annual meeting of the Canada–Japan Interparliamentary Group which was held in Vancouver from October 15 to 18, 1994.

The agenda at Canada–Japan meetings is always extensive and wide ranging. The Vancouver meeting was no exception. The delegates dealt with bilateral topics such as trade and the political situations in Japan and Canada. On the multilateral front reform of the United Nations peacekeeping operations and the environment dominated the discussions.

The range and depth of the discussions that took place in Vancouver went a long way in allowing Japanese and Canadian parliamentarians to better understand the issues. The opportunity to put forth the Canadian viewpoint was critical and the Canadian viewpoint was effectively expressed.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the sixth report of the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

The report tabled today in this House concerns program evaluation. In his annual report for 1993, the Auditor General reviews program evaluation in the federal government.

After spending two meetings hearing witnesses, the public accounts committee is convinced of the need to publish an annual performance report on program evaluation.

The committee therefore recommends that Treasury Board Secretariat produce a report on the departments' performance with respect to evaluation no later than October 31, 1995 and annually thereafter.

Several other recommendations are also in this report. Pursuant to Standing Order 109, the committee asks the government to table a comprehensive response to this report.

PETITIONS

FIREARMS

Mr. John Cummins (Delta, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition which states in part that the justice minister is proposing anti–firearms legislation that will do virtually nothing to reduce violent crime but will severely restrict the rights and freedoms of millions of innocent firearms owners, contrary to the very principles of justice upon which this great country of ours is based. The petitioners insist that he bring forth legislation to convict and punish criminals rather than persecute the innocent.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of approximately 300 petitioners from in and around the city of Calgary living in the Wild Rose riding, I present this petition today.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibitive grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase, sexual orientation.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in this petition the petitioners point out that there is now easier and greater access to capital for small and medium sized businesses. They point out however that there needs to be more done to remove red tape and impediments to business. They underline as well that the GST is cumbersome and costly to business. They note the government is currently studying options to replace the goods and services tax. They want the government to consider the needs of business as it goes forward with the various options.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three petitions from the Carleton—Charlotte riding to be presented today. They are signed by many citizens from such areas as St. Stephen, St. Andrews, Moores Mills, St. George, Rolling Dam, Back Bay, Deer Island, Pennfield, Blacks Harbour, Beaver Harbour, Mace's Bay, McAdam, Harvey, Grand Manan, Dipper Harbour and Bonny River.

I am certainly pleased to present the first petition regarding societal approval of same sex relationships. The petitioners encourage the Parliament of Canada not to take any action that might be deemed as approval for same sex relationships. The petition is signed by 313 citizens.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is signed by some 312 citizens residing in the same areas I previously noted.

They would like Parliament and all members to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

They petition the House of Commons to take action.

ASSISTED SUICIDE AND EUTHANASIA

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): The third and final petition, Mr. Speaker, is signed by 307 persons in the same areas. They request that the House ensures that the present provisions of the Criminal Code prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced and that Parliament makes no changes in support of euthanasia.

The petitions have all been duly checked by the clerk of petitions and I am pleased to present them to the House.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today to present to Parliament a petition signed by constituents in the riding of Red Deer.

These citizens express their sentiments and great concern with respect to the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

Therefore the petitioners humbly pray and request that Parliament ensures the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced and that Parliament makes no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present to Parliament today two different petitions from residents of my constituency.

First, the Union of B.C. Municipalities urgently requests the federal government to amend the Young Offenders Act to strengthen sentencing provisions for young offenders who commit serious crimes. I concur with the petition.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): The second petition prays that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

SERIAL KILLER CARDS

Ms. Paddy Torsney (Burlington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition with well over 1,000 names from residents right across Ontario who support Mrs. Mahaffy's efforts to have serial killer cards seized at the border.

The petitions were started well before the justice committee tabled its report to have the obscenity code amended to reflect these changes.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is my duty and honour to rise in the House to present a petition, duly certified by the clerk of petitions, on behalf of 198 concerned citizens throughout British Columbia.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to refuse the government's proposed anti–firearms legislation and introduce legislation to convict and punish criminals rather than persecute the innocent.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my constituents from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt call on Parliament to reject any proposals which might add to the existing regulatory restrictions regarding firearms; to respect the integrity of law–abiding, responsible firearms owners; to cause the Government of Canada to take such measures as are necessary to provide for strict enforcement of existing statutes governing the use of firearms in the commission of a criminal offence, with particular emphasis on the rigorous use of section 85 of the Criminal Code; and to provide strict sentencing guidelines and mandatory sentences for anyone convicted of the use or possession of a firearm in the commission of a crime in which violence is threatened or actually used.

I concur with my petitioners.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36 I would like to present a petition signed by residents of the district of High Prairie in my riding of Athabasca.

The petition requests a referendum of the people binding upon Parliament to accept or reject two official languages, English and French, for the government and the people of Canada, the acceptance or rejection of the proposed amendments to be determined by a majority vote of the total votes cast in the whole of Canada, together with a majority vote in the majority of the provinces and with the territories being given the status of one province.

I present the petition and support the petitioners.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Cummins: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On September 28, I directed a question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans concerning the possible conflict of interest of members appointed to the Fraser River Sockeye Public Review Board.

The board has started public hearings and I have yet to receive a reply. Questions have been raised about the suitability of certain board members. I believe the public and Parliament have a right to know about the relationship of the appointees to the Department of Fisheries and Oceans before the inquiry proceeds much further.

My question deserves an immediate answer.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: The point of order raised by the hon. member for Delta had to do with questions. I assume the parliamentary secretary, who does not usually do this, will take it as representation and will try to speed the matter up.

Shall the remaining notices of motions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the leader of the Reform Party I should indicate that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2) because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended by 35 minutes today.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BUDGETARY POLICY

The House resumed from November 28 consideration of the motion.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to participate in the debate with three purposes in mind: first, to hold the federal government accountable for its management of public finances over the last year; second, to put forward constructive alternatives where the performance of the government has been weak or inadequate; and, third, by accomplishing these first two things to endeavour to assist the finance committee and the finance minister in the preparation of the 1995–96 budget.

The focus I would like to make is on five major deficiencies in the government's fiscal performance, all of which have negative consequences for the economy and, second, to make some recommendations for remedying those deficiencies.

The first deficiency pertains to the inadequacy of the government's deficit reduction targets. The government's target to date has been to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP in three years. The target is simply inadequate. It is too modest. The business community says that it is inadequate. The money markets say that it is inadequate. Just this week the IMF said in no uncertain terms that it is inadequate.

Why is it inadequate? It is inadequate because it does not get the job done, because it permits the government to add over $155 billion to the federal debt over the next two years, because it does not stop the erosion of social programs, because it creates upward pressure on taxes, because it fails to stimulate private sector confidence thereby retarding job creation.

Most important, the 3 per cent of GDP target is inadequate because it will not eliminate the deficit during the current upward swing in the business cycle. When the business cycle turns down, the deficit will not have been eliminated and it will be infinitely more difficult to make the spending cuts required under those conditions.

In other words, the government will have missed its window of opportunity for deficit reduction just as the Mulroney government missed its window in 1984–85. The reality is that the government's deficit reduction target is totally inadequate and our recommendation is that the government set a fiscally responsible deficit target soon. That target should be to aim to reduce the deficit to zero by the end of this Parliament.

The second deficiency is the inadequacy of the government's grasp of the real costs and benefits of social spending. Over 50 per cent of total federal government's spending is now spent in the social areas. Yet the Auditor General has pointed out that this is the area where the federal government has the poorest grasp of the actual cost of what it is doing and the values received.

If the auditors of a resource company that had over 50 per cent of its business in the oil and gas development area were to issue a statement saying that the company's accounting was defective with respect to both costing and values received in the principal area of its business, the stock of such a company would be driven through the floor.

This is, however, the great weakness of the discussion paper produced by the Minister of Human Resources Development: insufficient and inadequate data on the real costs of social programs and values received and virtually no data on the costs and benefits of alternative social programs proposed.

Professed social concern without fiscal responsibility makes a mockery of social service. In the 1990s the politician who is genuinely concerned about the well–being of the young, the old, the sick, the poor or the unemployed will ensure that the programs upon which those people are dependent are financially sustainable. The old style Liberal politician who fails to ensure that will do more to damage the people dependent on those programs than the most hard headed fiscal conservative.

Our recommendation in this area is to bring the Minister of Human Resources Development, the Minister of Health and the Minister of Canadian Heritage before the finance committee of the House and to grill them on the costs of their existing programs and proposed alternatives; to have that committee ask them the hard questions that they never ask themselves and are rarely asked by their own officials; to have them answer those questions before they run the Canada pension plan into the ground, before they run medicare into the ground and before they run the Canada assistance plan into the ground; and to ask them those questions until they learn the meaning of fiscal responsibility in the 1990s.

The third deficiency concerns the insufficiency of the government's spending reduction proposals. In October the finance minister made a sobering presentation to the finance committee and the public, saying that he could not meet even his soft deficit reduction targets without cutting an additional $6 billion to $9 billion in spending. The minister presented no list of spending cuts. The minister was coy and he asked the committee and the public to provide that list for him.

Members of the business community have since presented such lists to the finance committee. Last week Reform members of the finance committee provided it with a detailed specific list of $10 billion in spending cuts outside major social spending areas.

During the same period of time, however, various parliamentary committees have been treated to the spectacle of ministers—the Minister of Foreign Affairs, the Minister of Canadian Heritage, the Secretary of State for Multiculturalism and heads of agencies like the CBC—endeavouring to protect and defend high levels of spending and high levels of overspending rather than putting forward responsible proposals for spending reduction, which is what the finance minister asked for. In other words they just do not get it. They are not listening to the finance minister. They are part of the problem, not part of the solution.

Reform members of the finance committee have provided that committee and the minister with a $10 billion spending reduction list. We challenged the committee to endorse it and to implement it. If we cannot persuade the government or Bloc members to support our list, perhaps we can stimulate their imagination to produce their own spending reduction list.

I ask Liberal members to put themselves in the place of the finance minister and pretend they have just received a call from their fiscal agent that the money markets are rejecting a major Canadian government bond issue. The Government of New Zealand once got such a call. The Government of Sweden got a call like that a little while ago. What then?

They would have to reduce spending overnight. Where would they make the cuts? They would have to produce the list. There would be no other alternative. We are saying produce the list now while there is time to buy time.

I ask the Bloc members to imagine themselves as finance minister of Quebec, the most highly taxed jurisdiction in North America, or soon to be.

They have just received a call from their fiscal agent saying that the latest Quebec bond issue cannot be sold. It has been rejected by the market. They cannot borrow any more. Quebec Hydro cannot borrow any more. What then? It would have to reduce its spending overnight. It would have to produce the list. We are saying why not produce the list now while there is time to make a difference.

The fourth deficiency: The incapacity of the government to estimate the employment impacts of either government overspending or deficit reduction. For 30 years the federal government has operated on the assumption that government spending and overspending is a stimulus to economic growth and job creation. It is finally discovering the falsity of that assumption. The finance minister acknowledged this in his grey paper.

If government spending and government overspending could indefinitely stimulate an economy and job creation, Canada would have the highest economic growth rate and the lowest unemployment rate of any country in the G–7. However, Canada has over one million people unemployed. The premise that government overspending creates jobs is false, particularly when you are overspending at high debt levels and high taxation levels.

Increased government spending and the increased taxation that goes along with that kills private sector job creation, particularly under those conditions. The policy models and the econometric models used by the government do not measure this. It is infected with the Keynesian virus that ignores the negative effects of government overspending and underestimates the positive employment effects of deficit reduction.

The premise that deficit reduction, particularly deficit reduction that leads to tax relief, is a powerful economic stimulus to the private sector is not built into the equations of those models. In effect we are flying blind when it comes to estimating the negative employment effects of government overspending and the positive employment effects of deficit reduction.

The finance minister is flying blind, the finance department is flying blind, the finance committee is flying blind and the Bank of Canada is flying blind on both of those issues.

Recommendation: That the finance department, with the assistance of the finance committee of the House and the Bank of Canada, issue a request for proposals for a new econometric model that accurately reflects the employment impacts of government overspending and deficit reduction. The finance department and the Bank of Canada need a new compass to chart their way through the years ahead and they should order that now.

The fifth deficiency: The unwillingness of the government to explicitly recognize the connection between the management of federal finances and the management of the national unity issue. One of the principal arguments that separatists will make against the federal system is that the federal government systematically mismanages its finances and then tries to offload its mistakes and its debts on to the provinces.

The current size of the federal debt, the current size of the federal deficit, the current federal tax burden and the decline of federal–provincial transfers will all be offered as evidence in support of this thesis. These arguments will be made by separatists in Quebec despite the evidence shown every day in this House that most members of the Bloc do not have the foggiest notion how to balance a budget either federal or provincial.

Two recommendations, one general and one specific. If the finance minister and the government cannot be persuaded to redouble their efforts to eliminate the deficit in the name of fiscal responsibility, if the finance minister and the government cannot be persuaded to redouble their efforts to reduce the deficit in the name of social responsibility to preserve the financial underpinnings of the social service safety net, perhaps they could still be persuaded to redouble their efforts to eliminate the deficit in the name of national unity, to demonstrate that the federal government can balance its books thereby refuting separatist claims that it cannot or will not.

More specifically, before the national unity debate begins in earnest, federalism versus separatism, the finance committee should also make a specific recommendation to bolster the confidence of investors and lenders in the Canadian dollar and the securities of Canadian governments.

They should recommend that the finance minister, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, and all 10 provincial finance ministers, including the finance minister of Quebec, make a solemn public declaration that it is their intention to honour all the debt obligations of their respective governments regardless of the outcome of the federalist sovereignty debate or referendum. Such a declaration would be in the interests of all governments and the interests of all taxpayers no matter where they live in the country.

In conclusion, I have identified five major deficiencies in the government's management of the fiscal affairs of this country, deficiencies that have a major impact on economic performance. These are not insignificant things: the weakness of the deficit reduction target, the inadequacy of the government's data on real costs of social spending and values received, the inadequacy of the government's spending reduction proposals, its inability to measure the employment impacts of either government overspending or deficit reduction, and its unwillingness to recognize the connection between the federal deficit issue and the national unity issue.

On the positive side, I have made six major recommendations which I sincerely hope the finance committee, the finance minister and the government will take to heart: one, set the deficit reduction target at zero deficit by the end of this Parliament; two, drag the human resources minister, the health minister, and other soft headed ministers before the finance committee and grill them until they understand the meaning of fiscal responsibility in the 1990s; three, adopt the Reform Party's list of $10 billion in specific spending cuts in non–social areas or produce an equally specific alternative; four, issue a request for proposals for an econometric model that will actually reflect the employment impacts of both government overspending and deficit reduction; five, urge the finance minister and the government to redouble their efforts to eliminate the deficit not only in the names of fiscal and social responsibility but also for the sake of national unity; six, recommend that Canada's finance ministers and the Governor of the Bank of Canada issue a solemn declaration of their intent to honour the debt obligations of their respective governments regardless of the outcome of any federalist–sovereignist debate or referendum in 1995.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this opportunity to direct some questions and comments to the leader of the Reform Party.

I listened carefully to what the leader of Reform Party had to say. In fact, I always listen very carefully to what Reform members have to say, and there are two points I would like to make. My first point is that the leader of the Reform Party does not have the foggiest idea of what is happening today in Quebec, of what is shaping and promoting the sovereignist option in Quebec to make a country out of the land we cherish. It is not because of poor management by the federal government. It is, first and foremost, about choosing the kind of society and country we want, and above all, it is about getting out of a system that is impervious to reform, a system that is doomed.

I think the Reform Party is accelerating the process in Canada, because last week they proposed cuts to all the symbols that are a source of pride for Canadians. I do not feel more Canadian than the Reform Party, but I think they lack vision.

They brag about proposing $10 billion in cuts, but just look where they want to make those cuts! It is so vicious and shortsighted, for instance, to suggest cutting and slashing and even destroying the CBC, as well as everything connected with the language, culture, development and international presence of the country they claim to defend. They want to save $10 billion by destroying the very foundations of what they claim to defend. This is odd, to say the least.

About a month and a half ago, we in the Bloc Quebecois presented proposals that would raise between fifteen to twenty million dollars. Mr. Speaker, consider the difference between our approach and theirs. Consider that $8 billion worth of unpaid revenue is out there, $8 billion owed to the federal government, a point that was raised in the Auditor General's report last week. They are not talking about going after those $8 billion worth of unpaid revenue and taxes, and do you know why? Because most of those accounts receivable are big accounts, people with very high incomes who owe money to the federal government and who can count on the right incarnate on our left—I know it sounds peculiar—to defend them with blind dedication. They know these people will defend them practically to their dying breath. They are not interested in those $8 billion because these are their pals out West.

They also ignored the fact that $1.5 billion could be cut in the National Defence budget, as we suggested. They did not even consider what the Auditor General had to say about wasteful spending at National Defence. Why? Again, probably because they have some friends there, so they will not admit there is any wasteful spending in the Public Service and at the Department of National Defence.

They did not take a look either—guess where, Mr. Speaker? At the tax treatment of corporations. They do not want to touch it. Why? Because they are so dogmatic. As far as the Reform Party is concerned, these big corporations can do no wrong.

I suppose if they are prepared to say it is morally right—they are very keen on morality—to have a classified ad in the newspaper that says "unused federal tax deduction for sale", and accept that, they will not look at the tax treatment of corporations, which I think is disgraceful. They have no social conscience and do not have the foggiest notion of what Canada is all about.

They approve of an outrageous family trust system which defers for 80 years taxes payable on capital belonging to the wealthiest in this country, and there again, I think they lack a sense of morality and they lack vision.

For all these reasons, I think it is disgraceful that Reform Party members set themselves up as great reformers. It looks more like they are out to destroy the country they claim to defend. We are anxious to get out of this country because we are sick and tired of these dogmatic speeches.

[English]

Mr. Manning: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his comments. Let me respond on two fronts. I believe the member's comments demonstrate exactly what I was saying, that with all due respect the Bloc members do not have the foggiest notion as to how to balance a budget.

With respect to unpaid taxes, we could collect all the unpaid taxes referred to in the Auditor General's report, the $5 billion to $6 billion, every one of them, and we would not even help the finance minister to get up to his soft target. He needs $6 billion to $9 billion.

This idea that they can tax our way out of the problem we are in, either in Canada as a whole or in Quebec, is completely fallacious. Any government that attempts to do that will turn itself into the most highly taxed jurisdiction in Canada. If they followed their advice they would end up having the most highly taxed jurisdiction in Canada.

On the second point, that Reform goes after all the things that people hold dear, the $10 billion in spending reductions that we advocated in front of the finance committee are outside the social area. That is one of the reasons for focusing there first. Second, I challenge this whole thesis. It has been people who said: "Don't reduce your spending because all these things are sacred" in many other countries that have helped destroy those very things they said were sacred. They let the debt get higher and they let the interest on the debt get higher until it eroded every social service they considered important.

My point, and I conclude with this, is that to demonstrate social concern today is not to use the rhetoric of the 1930s that we need more social programs. It is to come up with ways of making essential social services financially sustainable. That is the social conscience of the 1990s.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe what I hear from the Reform Party leader. I want to ask him a specific question and I would like to get a specific answer. If he does not have it today he can table it some time soon in the House. Over and over again during the campaign the Reform Party told Canadians it would balance the budget in three years.

I want the hon. member to give me the specific programs that would be cut, the specific initiatives that would be undertaken, item by item, and table them in the House before the end of the week. Then we will see how they will eliminate the deficit in three years.

Mr. Manning: Mr. Speaker, we have done this over and over again for two years. We have tabled this already. We have tabled the Reform Party zero in three program for reducing the deficit. Now we are in the process of updating it, using the minister's latest figures. The first phase was the $10 billion in detailed, specific cuts that were laid before the finance committee last week.

The problem is not getting the list. The problem is finding a government with the political will to implement it.

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I wish to advise the Speaker and the House that from this point on government members will be dividing their time, 10 minutes each.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a brief question for the hon. member. He said in his statement that the government has not taken into account the impact of deficit financing on jobs, et cetera.

Does the member not agree that the impact on the Canadian economy of slashing the deficit at such a pace would drive Canada into a worse recession than we have just come out of and would create even more hardship on the Canadian economy?

Mr. Manning: Mr. Speaker, the thesis that balancing the government budget in that three year period would create recession is a view that was in vogue 30 years ago if you subscribe to Keynesian economics. In our view it does not operate today.

The reason it does not operate is because at our levels of debt and taxation, a dollar left in the hands of a taxpayer, a lender or investor today is more productive than that dollar in the hands of a politician or a bureaucrat. That is the 1990s economics.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very honoured to take part in the debate on Canada's budgetary process.

It is important to spend a little time trying to realize how we got to where we are. Studying the history of where we are and how we got here may allow us to reach a conclusion on how to get back out. We got here by getting on what I call the STB formula for disaster, which is basically spend, tax and borrow.

The concept of spend, tax and borrow has caused a ratcheting effect, constantly spiralling interest rates with the debt expanding and growing ever faster. It is very much like a mortgage where you never pay the interest. It just keeps getting bigger and bigger until we get to the point where we cannot pay it off. That is what we have done.

We started back in 1982, just to use a very short period of time to reflect on. From 1982 until 1992 federal government spending increased from $67 billion to $141 billion, a 210 per cent increase. Governments have become insatiable spenders. We have been sold on the idea that somehow we can continue to enjoy services without paying for them.

It is partially the fruition of the baby boom generation. Some of this is psychological. The baby boomers believed they could continue to consume without paying. Politicians told us this was possible and we wanted to believe it.

The exasperating formula of STB is also partially related to the fact that there is no division of these powers within government. In other words, the power to spend, the power to tax, the power to borrow is all in the same hands. Some people have suggested that we should have a special commission, one that simply collects taxes so that governments would have to match their spending to the taxes that were available, rather than the other way around.

In addition to the spending we also started building up a huge civil service. Currently 6.5 per cent of our labour force, 866,000 people, is employed by government. We seem to have growth for the sake of growth.

In most of these areas we did not actually add any productivity into the economy. In spite of the fact we were told we could do this for free, taxes slowly started rising. Many people in the House have complained about the complexity of our tax system. They search for some kind of new Utopia, a flat tax, a simple tax. To me that is a recognition of not knowing why the tax system is what it is and how it got to where it is.

The tax system is designed to extract the maximum amount of money out of the pockets and purses of the people of Canada. It gets more and more intuitive and more and more inventive as our insatiable desire for more taxes increases. A simplistic tax system is very easy but it may allow the escape of some moneys in the system.

For instance, even in the Income Tax Act there is an anti–avoidance section, which simply says in layman's terms that if we cannot catch you somewhere else in here, we are going to catch you anyway; we can override the income tax system. I often thought that we should call the GST or a new value added tax the value added cumulative user utility method or vacuum tax which is basically what we want to do. We can put a vacuum into everyone's house and suck every last cent out of it.

Not happy enough to increase our spending, to increase our taxation levels to the point where people did not have any disposable income, we then started borrowing. First we started borrowing from ourselves. The baby boomer generation borrowed from its predecessors who knew how to save, who had gone through the depression and had great savings. Canadians were the second highest savers in the world. Even so, we outstripped that. We used all their savings.

Then we started borrowing from foreigners. We started borrowing from people in the United States. We started borrowing from people in Japan. Currently 44 per cent of our gross domestic product is accounted for in foreign borrowing. Twenty–five per cent of our total outstanding debt is owed to people outside the country.

This creates an additional problem. We have to keep getting investment money into the country so that we can earn foreign exchange reserves to pay the interest. We are caught in a constant ratcheting spiral.

Where are we today? People talk about continuing to spend. We have curtailed some of our spending. We have discovered that some of the benefits in our current governmental system are really earned by people going back to work, causing upward changes in our revenue and a downward push on the UI account. The reality is we continue to spend. Worse than that we continue to tax.

I have some interesting statistics on the average Canadian family that earns $57,696 in 1994. Here is the bill: social securities, unemployment insurance, Canada pension plan and medical taxes, $5,011; gas taxes, vehicle licences, $926; liquor, entertainment taxes, $1,274; property taxes, $2,041; federal and provincial sales taxes, $4,284; other taxes such as import duties, $2,630; income taxes, $11,037; total, $27,203 which is almost 50 per cent of what it earns.

During the recession this got worse. Suddenly some lost their jobs and half the income went out the window. The Auditor General reports that he is concerned about the over $6 billion in arrears of income taxes. What I cannot understand is why it is so low. The reality is that when people could not put food on their tables they stopped paying their income taxes. We only left a small pittance for these people to pay their mortgages, feed and cloth themselves and still we continue to borrow.

Some of our smarter people started thinking: "Wouldn't another country be better to live in?". Some people think we can continue to tax. People earning over $250,000 pay a 53 per cent marginal rate of tax. In the United States it is 32 per cent. In the United Kingdom it is 42 per cent. Suddenly people start thinking: "Let's get out of here. There are better places to live".

We talk about assisting small and medium sized businesses but in reality the federal government crowds out the capital markets. People cannot borrow. Why loan money to Joe's auto body up the street when you can get a mortgage on all the people of Canada?

The federal government, in trying to resist spiralling interest rates, started shortening the length of its debt instruments. Currently the federal government debt is out to four and a half years. That is the equivalent of refinancing your mortgage 25 per cent every year. What does it mean? It creates all kinds of volatility. What if some day somebody does not want to lend you any money? That is exactly what is happening. People are starting to look at Canada and wonder about our insatiable appetite for spending. They start debating whether they should lend to us at all. They certainly start pushing up the interest rates and for a short term period of time.

In September in the private sector there was the greatest conversion of Canadian denominated bonds in two years; $1.9 billion was converted into foreign currency away from the Canadian market.

Where do we want to go? We want to get the ratchet working the other way. We must look back at these three aspects of spending, taxing and borrowing, and reverse the process. We must cut spending but we have to be very judicious as to how we do it.

Public sector unions are trying to maintain their existing wage structure. The reality is that the public sector unions in all segments of their employment are paid 20 per cent higher than all private sector wages.

We have a guild system in our transportation network. These are things from the past, from history. We cannot afford to continue. Everybody, whether it is labour, business or government has to be part of the solution. Everybody has to realize that they have to accept less to make the country whole again.

As well as the Reform Party, I have made some suggestions. We should roll back RRSPs from $12,500 to $7,500. This would save the government half a billion dollars a year.

On the question of international aid, I do not think it is a matter of being mean. It is a matter of doing what we can afford as a country. Canada's foreign aid is twice as high as that of the United Kingdom as a percentage of our gross domestic product, twice as high as the United States, and a third higher than Australia. We simply cannot afford that degree of spending. By cutting foreign aid by half so it is consistent with all these other countries would save a billion dollars.

We have to restructure our social programs. This is not to take money from the people who need it, it is to make those systems work more efficiently. We are not eliminating them but we are trying to cut those areas of abuse from the system. Over $3 billion could be saved in this area.

Money could be saved in the area of the CPP. We could make it more efficient by being more efficient in collection methodology. That would save a quarter of a billion dollars.

We need a further cut of $2 billion in defence spending. By cutting the funding of cultural and advocacy groups a small amount of money, $.01 billion could be saved. Agricultural subsidies are another area that we are going to have to cut. We just cannot afford it, a billion dollars.

I looked at civil service wage reductions. How we are going to get them, I do not know, but the bottom line is savings of $3.6 billion. We can make our prison system more efficient by making it more income sensitive, saving half a billion dollars. By restructuring of our transportation industry, another half billion dollars can be saved. That is $12.36 billion.

I also estimate that a reduction of that magnitude will actually lower interest rates in Canada by 2 per cent. This will reduce interest on the federal government debt by a further $12 billion. That is a $25 billion reduction. These things are possible. These things are necessary. We have to do this and we have to get on with it.

In conclusion, regardless of whether they are in the labour movement or in business all people in Canada realize we have to address this problem. This country can no longer continue on the road to wrack and ruin. We can no longer afford champagne when we have a beer budget.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé, BQ): I shall be brief, Mr. Speaker, because I believe we are allotted only five minutes.

One of the remarks that caught my attention in the speech of my hon. Liberal colleague is the one to the effect that perhaps civil servants are too well paid, unless I misheard because I was listening to the interpreters. I find this is shifting the blame onto someone else than oneself.

They are the ones, the Liberals, in charge of administering government finance. They are the ones in charge of giving instructions to civil servants. As far as I know, civil servants listen and do as they are told. Personally, I always asked my boss for pay increases when I was in the private sector, but I would assure him at the same time that he would get his money's worth.

The problem—and it is easy for the Liberals to put the blame on the civil service—is that employees are not given clear orders. They are not given a mission. They are not instructed to listen to what the public has to say. The message they get is: "Do as you are told and when you get on my nerves, I will beat you over the head". As I said, I think that using civil servants as scapegoats is cheap. They should instead be given clear instructions and mandates so that they can make savings. But you cannot put the blame on they if you did not listen to what they had to say earlier. This baffles me.

[English]

Mr. Shepherd: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his questions.

The reality is there are all kinds of factors and forces within our economy. Needless to say in the public sector there are public sector unions. They have signed contractual obligations with the Government of Canada and the Public Service Alliance is also involved with the provincial governments.

The bottom line is that some bummer contracts have been negotiated over the years. The government has been very judicious at trying to reduce the civil service by way of attrition. It is not working in the sense that it is not working nearly fast enough for what we need to do to make us more efficient.

We have to look at all aspects of government spending. This is very much on the government's agenda, that is not necessarily rolling back public sector wages but to negotiate with the unions a more effective and efficient civil service.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it seems like only yesterday that we were sitting here listening to the finance minister presenting the very first budget of this new government. It brings home the fact that there is precious little time left between now and the next budget.

The motion of this debate is that Parliament take note of the views of Canadians on the fiscal situation in giving advice to the finance minister and to the government of the day in developing the 1995 budget.

I know that many of us are out there consulting with our constituents. For the first time in the history of this country consultations on the budget are taking place not behind closed doors but in open and in public. In every corner of this land we hope to engage Canadians in addressing the fiscal problems we have, in addressing what kind of country they want and how much they are prepared to pay for it. In my view this is the way to do a budget.

I had what would be the first stage of input to the 1995 budget in Ottawa West several weeks ago when we held a consultation on the social programs review. The message that came out of that consultation which was attended by over 150 people was very clearly a budget message. The message was that yes, they are aware of the fiscal problems of the country. Yes, they want a sounder, economic situation for our country, but they want fairness above all and a country that is still committed to those values of sharing, of fairness, of compassion and of shared responsibility for the collective well–being and for the well–being of fellow citizens.

All of us have been receiving much input from our constituents as the media has speculated about measures that might possibly be taken in the budget. Therefore I certainly want to share with this House and with the finance minister what I have heard from my constituents and the specific messages around that fundamental message I am hearing.

People are very much aware of the fiscal situation we are facing. In the Liberal red book we said very explicitly that any responsible government has to have the goal of a zero deficit. We felt it was a responsible target to commit ourselves to reach 3 per cent of GDP, that is, cutting the deficit in half compared with our GDP in the first three years of our mandate, by 1997. That is the goal we set and that is the goal we intend to reach.

I will spend a couple of minutes on why it is important that we do that. For the people I am hearing from in Ottawa West certain things are important to them about this country's programs and values.

The fact is that the debt and deficit restrict our ability to move our nation forward and to build our economic prosperity. Right now close to one–third of every dollar we spend is being spent just to pay interest on the debt. That is money we do not have for other things that are important not only to the Canada of today but to the Canada of our children and grandchildren.

Let me talk a bit more about some specific issues people have been bringing to my attention. They realize that this level of debt and this level of interest payment on our debt restrict the sovereignty of a government. They restrict its ability to make decisions and to make plans for the country and for its people.

The question then to my constituents and to every Canadian is as to how they want us to deal with that, which means a better balance between what we are spending and what we have in revenue. That is what we are asking Canadians. How do they want us to achieve that balance?

We indicated our direction clearly in the last budget where cuts in spending were five times the increases in revenue. Those increases were achieved on the revenue side by getting rid of perceived special treatment for certain groups in society.

I want to express the concern that we not make decisions that look good in the short term but that impact on our ability to be strong economically in the long term. I am very concerned that we not harm our scientific and research base to the point where we may look better in this year's budget and in the budgets for the next few years, but we are starting to undermine our ability to have jobs 10 years from now.

I want to make sure we are not cutting back in areas now that are feeding the economic growth of the small and medium sized businesses. They provide 85 per cent of the new jobs in this country. I want to make sure we are not cutting back on our ability and our contribution to the development of countries around this globe that are our future customers if they can develop their economies and if they can develop their democratic systems of government.

Above all I want to make sure we are not cutting back on the development of our most important resource: the talent of our young men and women, the young boys and girls who will become our young men and women.

Fairness is a strong theme I hear. People want to know that everybody is paying their fair share. They want to know that they are not being targeted for cuts in benefits they now enjoy while others continue to get away with not paying their fair share into the pot from which we all benefit.

Seniors are particularly concerned. A very large proportion of them live in Ottawa West. They want to remind this House that old age security and the Canada pension plan are not charity and are not welfare. I read the debates again from the fifties when the old age security was implemented. It very specifically said that this pension is a right of citizenship and everybody is going to pay on their income tax for that pension. They did that and they continue to do it.

A few years ago it was rolled into the general tax rate, but it is still there, a special payment for old age security. That is a pension people have paid for. They want me to remind this House and our government how much they have sacrificed, the hardships they have put up with, the things they did without, to take responsibility for providing for their own retirement. They want me to remind this House that we owe a debt to them, a debt of gratitude and a debt for the quality of life we have in this country.

I want to talk a bit about the public service as my colleague before me has done. I remind the House that we could cancel the whole public service tomorrow and we would still have a huge deficit and a huge debt. We could cut all government spending on the actual operating of government tomorrow and it would not take care of our deficit and debt problem.

Everybody who works for the public service knows we are going through a tremendous period of change. They know that period of change will certainly mean changes in jobs and a smaller public service. Again we have to be sure that we are not targeting specific segments of our society, including the public service, to bear an unfair portion of the burden that belongs to all of us as Canadians.

We want to continue to reaffirm the value of government services across this country. They are the kind of services that keep our transportation and food supply safe, that keep goods and services moving across this country and without which we would not have an economy.

In the few seconds I have left I also want to say that above all my constituents want to keep reminding us that the best way to solve our debt and deficit problem is to have more Canadians working, more Canadians employed and contributing to the economy instead of requiring the assistance of their communities and their society.

They do not want us to lose sight, as we have not done, that our main target is jobs and economic growth, that fiscal responsibility is part of that but so is social responsibility. We should not solve our fiscal deficit by creating a social deficit. They remind me and I remind the House that disparity is growing in this country, not decreasing. Those who are well off, those for whom the Reform Party seems to speak are better off than they have ever been. It is below that where everybody is a little worse off. That means our country is worse off.

Like the constituents I have spoken with, and I will be speaking with many more when we hold another consultation on the budget specifically on December 11, I wish the finance minister the best of wisdom in the deliberations he has ahead of him. I wish him above all an open ear to Canadians.

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the comments by the deputy whip. I wish to draw my colleague's attention to a point: she talked about the finance minister's budget, about the red book's objective of 3 per cent of GDP. She repeated what people in her riding told her. I would like to remind her that someone in my riding said that the Liberal Party's objective of 3 per cent of GDP was like being in a sinking ship and worrying about peeling paint.

With this comparison in mind, my question to my colleague is this: What does she think of the lifeline thrown by Premier Jacques Parizeau regarding areas of overlap? There are firm proposals on manpower training, so that we can make rational use of your surplus public servants. What do you think of transferring job training to the provinces? That is a nice lifeline.

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, my colleague knows full well that we are carrying out a full review of federal government programs and how we deliver them to Canadians. One of the goals of our review is certainly to identify duplication and overlap and reduce problems in this area, because it is indeed a form of waste when two levels of government deal with the same problems and programs.

Although my approach to the division of responsibilities would be different from that of my colleague, we are certainly trying, in co–operation with all the provinces in the country, to rationalize services in order to reduce overlap and duplication.

[English]

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask my hon. colleague her definition of the relationship between the increasing debt load and the level of employment. If there is such a relationship in her mind, how is it affected by the fact that the target of 3 per cent really does not eliminate the debt load? It is increasing the debt load.

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, there are members in this House who have different levels of private wealth or income. I represent people who earn different levels of income. The ability to borrow, the kind of mortgage you can carry and afford depends on your income and wealth. It is the same with a country. That is why we have chosen to express our debt and deficit target in terms of the GNP, which is the wealth of the nation.

Obviously if you have an income of $100,000 you can afford a different kind of mortgage and can afford to borrow and pay more for a car than if you have an income of $20,000. It is that simple. That is why linking what is an appropriate target for reduction of debt and deficit to the GDP is a proper way of doing it.

I will answer the question, but not quite in the way I think the member wanted an answer. I believe very firmly that in large measure the debt and deficit have risen because of our declining level of employment in this country. It has been increased by major steps over several decades. Clearly if there are 10 people contributing to paying for a project, it is more expensive for each one of those 10 than if there are 20 people contributing to pay for the same project.

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, unlike my colleagues, I am not too pleased to speak on Motion No. 17, because for me it is a waste of time. This motion is mainly about tabling a committee report. Imagine the time we take while people, taxpayers, Canadians are worried and unemployed and have no solutions. What Canadians and Quebecers want is a government that acts, a government that will present programs and do things to put people back to work and give them some pride. That is what Canadians expect of us.

Excuse me, Mr. Speaker. I forgot to tell you at the beginning that I was sharing my time with my colleague.

In the present economic situation, of course, the debt is $150 billion—everyone says so and condemns it. Everyone knows the cuts that could be made when preparing a shopping list but no one ever makes them. We are not presented with anything to do it. When facing such an economic situation, of course they want to hide and above all they want to avoid debating the government's finances.

Why? I ask you why they want to avoid this debate. It is time. The people have been consulted. It is time to come up with something.

Are we ashamed of the budgetary policies that they want to bring in to control the deficit? Are they ashamed to apply them? Of course I would be ashamed to hold phony pre–budget consultations, if my budget strategy, already established in advance, was to reduce the deficit on the backs of the poor, welfare recipients, the unemployed and especially students and to slash transfers to the provinces. This is what the Liberal government wants to do, but it does not dare to put it on the table for discussion. It holds phony consultations. It wants to limit debate so as not to make too many waves.

The government set a target for deficit reduction of $39.7 billion. This same government also says that a change of policy is needed to put its finances back in order. This government's budget policy has three main thrusts: economic recovery, attacking the poor and cutting transfers to the provinces, as I shall explain.

On the subject of economic recovery, the Minister of Finance says that 80 per cent of the federal deficit is structural. The fact that it is structural means that the deficit has nothing to do with the current economic conditions, or with the unemployed. Contrary to what this government thinks, Quebecers and Canadians are faced with a structural unemployment problem and they are not out of work by choice.

The Liberals sincerely believe that a large proportion of jobless people are lazy and are unemployed by choice. The Liberals also think that they will stimulate employment by forcing many unemployed individuals to look, and I emphasize the word look, for work. Yet, jobless people constantly come to our constituency offices to find out about programs. But these programs are in a state of chaos. Employment centres cannot keep up with the demand for work. The fact is that our unemployed are energetic and more than willing to work. It is the structure which is at fault.

The government's policy consists in targeting the poor by making cuts in social programs. The government wants to cut $7.5 billion in the budget allocated to these programs. However, it will not eliminate the deficit by targeting the poor. Instead of making thoughtless cuts through their social program reform, the Liberals should define clear and specific objectives, and they should also develop a job–creation policy, as they promised they would in their red book and during the last election campaign. They have failed miserably on this one. Indeed, they only managed to create a few temporary jobs through the infrastructure program.

The Liberal government also wants to reduce the deficit by making unilateral cuts, with no compensation, in transfer payments to the provinces. The Minister of Finance is once again passing the buck to the provinces. The debt will not go away by depriving the provinces of $2.6 billion. Other solutions are needed to eliminate that debt, as well as the deficit.

The Minister of Finance keeps asking us for suggestions. We say that the time has come to eliminate duplication and overlapping with the provinces. Ottawa must withdraw from those sectors which fall under provincial jurisdiction, and it must compensate the provinces accordingly. Eliminating federal interference will translate into savings of $3 billion for Quebec alone. Moreover, Quebec would finally be able to devise its own integrated policy regarding job creation, a policy that would really answer the needs of Quebec men and women.

However, the Bloc Quebecois agrees with the Minister of Finance when he says that the deficit cannot be eliminated simply by cutting government spending. This is why we have made fair and equitable proposals that would lead to savings of $34.5 billion. These proposals should be taken seriously by the government, because they are far above the $25.6 billion savings that the government wants to realize at the expense of the neediest, mostly by cutting unemployment insurance and transfer payments to the provinces for education.

The Liberal government should draw up a budget which would focus on cuts in government spending and in subsidies to companies which do not undertake to create jobs, in its deficit reduction measures. Programs should be managed more efficiently, that is to say we should have sound management of business subsidies. We should stop giving money to companies which are neither productive nor competitive, money which is very often a form of patronage. We are talking about $3.3 billion here. It is high time that the minister and his government look squarely at the problem and stop dumping their problems on the provinces.

The red book promises jobs, and the Liberal government must adopt concrete job creation policies to bring us back to pre–recession employment levels. We need close to 825,000 new jobs, a far cry from the 45,000 temporary jobs they created during the past year. They still have a long way to go.

Let the government keep another one of its promises: not to raise taxes. To this end, the time has come to review certain tax loopholes enjoyed by high–income earners and big corporations. We all know in this House that family trusts, which are an important tool used in tax planning, are for the government a source of losses we can assess. According to some tax experts, they amount to several hundreds of millions of dollars.

The government has the tools to disclose the value of the assets in these trusts. Let the government tell us how much money is lost in tax revenues. This question was raised on several occasions in different committees. We never got an answer. But above all, let the government be true to its position when it was in the opposition, when it opposed delaying payment of taxes on capital gains until the death of the last beneficiary.

The finance minister and his government must come forward and say how they intend to deal with the nation's finances. Let them stop procrastinating and let us start tackling immediately one of the most pressing problems for our future, namely public finance. This is the reason why the Bloc Quebecois is going to vote against the motion.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the presentation made by my hon. colleague from the opposition. In his remarks, he attacks the federal government on the grounds that apparently, the federal government does not work in co–operation with the provinces.

In fact, this is exactly what this government is doing. With the Minister responsible for Intergovernmental Affairs, we are presently reviewing all federal programs to find out the best way of delivering these programs. If, for example, it turns out that the provinces are the ones in the best position to look after a given program, this program will be transferred to the provinces. If the most appropriate level of government is the municipal level, then the program will be transferred to the municipalities. That is how this program review works.

As for federal transfer payments, the problem we used to have in the past is that the provinces did not know from one year to the next how much they would be getting from the federal government. Our government has assured the provinces that arrangements will be negotiated to cover more than a year, at least five years, so that the provinces will know in advance how much they will receive from the federal government.

I can assure my colleague that, when he talks about education, whether the money comes from the federal, provincial or municipal government, the money all comes from the same place, out of the same taxpayers' pockets.

Social services programs do not require additional funding, but the system certainly needs to be simplified. Efficiency has to be improved and money spent more wisely, especially in education, where we spent $50 billion each year. This is more than in almost any other country in the world. All these programs must be assessed to ensure adequate program delivery. We must make sure that essential services, national services, remain national essential services. That is why a review is necessary.

If my colleague wants the federal government to introduce new programs, he is going to have to tell us where to get the money. However, the idea is not to turn off the tap, as our colleagues from the Reform Party are suggesting, and leave all existing programs as they are. How can one eliminate the deficit in this manner? They have yet to bring forth in this House a single proposal as to how they plan to eliminate the deficit within three years.

Mr. Fillion: Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. I am quite pleased with the comment that my colleague just made. He is ready to transfer programs to the provincial governments. They are analyzing them and want to disperse them either to the provincial or to the municipal level.

That is what Quebec has been asking for for a long time; that is what Quebec has been telling you for a long time, to eliminate duplication and return jurisdiction to Quebec and also to the other provinces. We quite agree on that.

Except that this government is not facing up to its responsibilities. Why? Because it is not making any decisions in this area. It is indecisive. Make some decisions and tell us what field of jurisdiction you want to return to Quebec and to the other provinces. That is what we want to do here.

The Liberal government should table a list of programs where overlapping is very expensive so that these programs can be administered directly by the provinces concerned. Do it and table it so that we can discuss it as soon as possible. Quebec could save $3.3 billion as a result. That is one reason we want a sovereign country.

The Deputy Speaker: Hon. members, before giving the floor to the member for Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, pursuant to Standing Order 38, I must inform the House of the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment: the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake—Northern Tax Allowance; the hon. member for Calgary Southeast—CRTC.

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, for someone who did not feel like speaking to Motion No. 17, my hon. colleague from Chicoutimi has delivered quite a passionate speech.

I, for one, am pleased to speak to this motion, which I would like to read for the benefit of the Canadians who are listening to us. It reads as follows:

> That this House take note of the opinions expressed by Canadians on the budgetary policy of the government and, notwithstanding the provisions of Standing Order 83.1, authorize the Standing Committee on Finance to make a report or reports thereon no later than December 7, 1994.

The committee was supposed to table this report on December 2. The motion under consideration asks us to authorize the committee to postpone this report until a later date. This will reduce the time allocated for consideration of this report. It is an old magic trick involving reducing the attention span of those who should be looking at this report, that is, the people of this country. This is one of the numerous magic tricks being used by the government to hide from citizens what they should see. Let me give you a specific example, a simple magic trick now being performed by the government.

We know how magic tricks are done in general. We know how they are performed but we still get fooled, so I will explain again for the benefit of the people. Magic tricks are always simple: the magician hides with the right hand what he wants to hide while moving his left hand to draw the public's attention. That is why people do not see what is really happening. What is the government holding in its right hand? Things that are totally amazing.

First of all, every year, the Auditor General of Canada tells us about the shameful waste of billions of taxpayers' dollars. Every year, it is the same story: we talk about it for two or three days before shelving these reports, then the cycle repeats itself.

There is also the issue of overlap, which my hon. colleague tackled just before me. The inefficiency cost of this overlap of federal and provincial programs was estimated at $3 billion per year in Quebec alone.

What lies under the right hand? Family trusts, where we find enormous amounts of tax–exempt money that the federal government refuses to disclose. There is no way to find out how much money is involved.

We also have tax havens. On this subject, in 1992, the Auditor General pointed out that many big companies had invested some $16 billion worth of profits in tax havens around the world, thus avoiding payment of their fair share of taxes. We are not talking about peanuts but about $16,000 million.

The right hand also hides smuggling rings whose traffic in cigarettes, alcohol, guns and drugs amounts to several billions of dollars every year. They are apparently unable to solve this problem.

Furthermore, the Auditor General has just told us about $6.6 billion in uncollected taxes.

Then there is the issue raised by the Liberal member for Gander—Grand Falls, who just wrote to the minister, to the effect that Canadian companies use a forward averaging provision to defer the payment of $40 billion in taxes.

In his letter, the hon. member also mentions that 1,200 companies with profits of over one million dollars do not pay taxes.

Then there is the Hibernia project. Huge amounts of money are poured into this project which will never be a profitable venture, and the government tries to keep that a secret.

There are also more mundane current issues such as the situation of CN's president, Mr. Paul Tellier.

• (1710)

Mr. Tellier, whose annual salary is $345,000 and who made cuts in CN services to streamline that corporation, received, on top of a $52,000 yearly allowance for petty expenses, an interest–free loan of $432,000 to buy a house, all this at taxpayers' expense. It goes without saying that Mr. Tellier's case is another issue which this government does not want to publicize too much. This is what the right hand is doing.

Then there is the case of Gary Anstey, which was discussed today and yesterday, during question period. After four months on the job, Mr. Anstey, who was executive assistant to the Minister of Fisheries, received a severance pay of $31,000. Mr. Anstey was rehired last month at a salary of $93,000 per year. He kept the severance pay, even though he voluntarily quit his job.

As you know, people who have a job and who voluntarily leave that job do not get any UI benefits. Yet, the executive assistant of the Minister of Fisheries got $31,000 from taxpayers. Fishermen in the Gaspe Peninsula certainly have the right to wonder who the real suckers are.

Then there is Operation William Tell, during which the Canadian Armed Forces had a good time in Florida, from October 10 to 23, 1994, with artillery pieces worth $395,000 each. Always in Florida; all this sun is good for the army. There is also a statement made by Mr. Yves Séguin, a prominent tax expert and a former minister in the Bourassa government, who said, not long ago: "In 48 hours, I would get $3 billion for the federal government by imposing a two per cent tax on shares".

Meanwhile, the left hand is getting a lot of exercise. They have to explain to the public what they are going to do to deal with the problem of our public finances which are, as you know, in a parlous state. It seems that the real problem in Canada, and the Prime Minister said so himself, is those beer drinkers slumped in front of their television sets, people who are totally unproductive. This includes all those unproductive people who lost their jobs at Hyundai, at CN, at CP, at MIL Davie in Lauzon, the refineries in Montreal, fishermen in the Gaspé who cannot go fishing any more because there are no fish, and miners who cannot go down into the mines because the money is being used to operate mines in Chile or somewhere else. So all these people are drinking beer in front of their TVs and that is where the cuts are going to be made.

They are going to traipse all over Canada, the MPs, the press, the media and they are going to ask people: "What do you think is the best way to cut these people's benefits?" They will cut unemployment insurance, cut welfare benefits, raise students' tuition fees, cut transfer payments to the provinces. They keep waving their left hand but never say what the right hand is doing.

Meanwhile, our social fabric is starting to unravel. People feel somewhat frustrated. So, as we saw yesterday in Toronto and as we saw not so long ago in western Canada, people are starting to fill the halls every time they organize meetings of committees on social programs. People are invading the halls and taking over the meetings from their members. They are saying: "Now you are going to listen to us". There is a basic feeling of frustration.

We also had students who demonstrated here on the Hill, at least 10,000 of them, and they told us they were not prepared to pay for the sins of others and pay the full shot, on top of that. These may not be huge demonstrations, but I may remind you, and you were probably there, that huge demonstrations are not necessarily the most effective ones. I remember an extraordinary demonstration held on Parliament Hill a few years ago, a demonstration by one person. This person went to the Prime Minister at the time, the Hon. Brian Mulroney, and told him: "If you touch our pensions, Brian, goodbye Charlie Brown!" That sent a shiver through the government. So I hope we will not be hearing that on the Hill.

Of course, some people are prepared to explain how this trick works, and they actually do that. There are at least two Liberal members, the hon. member for York South—Weston, for instance, who told us that for ten years they were in the opposition and they condemned what the Conservatives wanted to do, which was to cut the deficit at the expense of the most vulnerable. That is exactly what they are doing. I may remind you that the hon. member for York South—Weston is not a member of the Bloc Quebecois. He is a Liberal member. There was also the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls, to whom I referred earlier, who at the end of his letter to the minister gave an excellent summary of our proposal, and he put it in these words: As you can see, you can get the billions you need simply by collecting taxes owing by the corporations that are making the biggest profits and do not pay taxes. That is also the position of the Bloc, and we will vote against the motion.

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint-Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am somewhat surprised to hear the Bloc, the opposition, say the same thing over and over. They keep saying that this deficit reduction effort will be at the expense of the disadvantaged, yet they have no positive alternative plan to reduce this deficit we are faced with.

I would have a question for the hon. member. I would like him to suggest some truly specific ways of bringing the deficit down to three per cent of the gross national product, as we have promised to do and the Minister of Finance fully intends to do. I would really like him to tell us how exactly, within our global budget, as relates to social programs in particular, we could manage to streamline this deficit we are struggling with at present.

An hon. member: We are all ears.

Mr. Pomerleau: Mr. Speaker, I have just given a ten minute speech on the subject. I do not know if my hon. colleague paid close attention to what was said.

An hon. member: Of course I did.

Mr. Pomerleau: Let me simply read this specific suggestion back to her, a suggestion coming from the Liberals themselves, from the hon. member for Gander—Grand Falls: go and get the $9 billion you need in the pockets of those who do not pay their taxes. Start there and see what will happen after that.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary has 30 seconds to ask a question or make a comment.

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, the hon. member did not answer my colleague's questions. We have put forth a proposal through the Minister of Human Resources Development, to receive feedback from the public. We would like to know what the Bloc has to suggest.

The Deputy Speaker: The hon. member has approximately 30 seconds to answer.

Mr. Pomerleau: Mr. Speaker, here is a suggestion, the simplest one I can find in here: give us the exact amount, the exact current amount, of capital invested in family trusts in Canada.

[English]

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to participate in this debate.

I intended to review some of the background of the consultation process but in view of the drift of the debate in the House I want to speak about specifics.

I would at least like to highlight some of the principles that the finance minister has articulated to the members of the House and to the Canadian public. He said that in approaching our budget for this year deficit reduction indeed is part of our overall strategy for jobs and for economic growth. He also stressed that fairness is paramount so that the most vulnerable in our society will not be left behind.

I think it is an extremely important part of the budgetary process to ensure that whether it is the social security review, the review of our social safety net, or whether indeed it is part of the budgetary measures, we are constantly going to focus on the needs of those who are most needy in our society first.

He also said that the deficit reduction must be selective and strategic, clearly reflecting our priorities. He said that budgetary action should weigh on the side of cuts in expenditures and not, and I stress not, on increased taxes.

Finally he said that the economic assumptions must be prudent to stimulate confidence so that our deficit targets would in fact be achieved. As you know, Mr. Speaker, a problem of former governments was setting targets that never were achieved.

• (1720)

I commend to all members and all Canadians the book Canada's Economy: What Past, What Future? This workbook which has been prepared by the Canadian Foundation for Economic Education is available to all Canadians in all public places; post offices, grocery stores, et cetera, and even through their members of Parliament. I find, having gone through this a couple of times, that this is an excellent layman's language discussion on the kinds of issues that the government is addressing today in dealing with the challenges of balancing our budget over the coming years.

In the last couple of hours there has been quite a bit of discussion about whether or not the deficit should be eliminated in three years, whether it should be five years or whether it should be ever. These, as members well know, are the same discussions that went on during the last election campaign. I think that the Canadian people made their choice, a very clear choice.

Members may recall that the Conservative government proposed that it was going to eliminate the deficit in five years. The Reform Party said it would do it in three years. It was almost like a bidding war. The Prime Minister said during the election campaign that we have to be realistic, picking targets which are achievable within the time frames that are available to the government.

The Prime Minister made a commitment in his election platform that his government would achieve a deficit reduction strategy which would achieve 3 per cent of GDP by the end of the third year of the mandate. We are on target now. The minister has assured the House and Canadians that we will continue to introduce whatever changes are necessary to make sure that we stay on track and that we meet that target.

That means that by the end of the third year our deficit will reduce to some $25 billion. That is only an interim target. By the time that third year is over and we have hit that $25 billion target Canadians will have before them a further strategic plan for the next period to balance the budget for Canada.

Yet today the leader of the third party comes again to the House and reiterates: "We could do it in three years: We could slash that deficit".

I was at the finance committee when the Reform Party presented its program. I was astounded that of the $40 billion deficit the Reformers just said: "Here is our plan". They started off saying that $18 billion of the $40 billion deficit was going to be eliminated by economic growth. That has absolutely nothing to do with the Reform Party. It has to do with the initiatives that have been taken within our country to ensure that we stimulate economic growth in Canada. The Reform Party is somehow taking credit for some $18 billion reduction in the deficit.

The Reformers then went through a mathematical exercise to identify areas where they would cut. Not one explanation, not one rationale of how that would impact on the delivery of the services of those areas that they were going to cut; not one analysis or statement as to the impact on jobs for Canadians; indeed, not one indication of what that might do to the economic confidence that Canada has been developing over this period since the election.

The Prime Minister yesterday said in the House, and I quote: "If tomorrow we were to eliminate the deficit, $42 billion to zero, there would be a huge recession in Canada. The wise thing is to do it in a progressive way". I think that is the fundamental difference between the approach of the Reform Party and of this government, that we do have to keep control, we have to keep things in perspective.

I want to move on because I know that my time is very short. I want to share with Canadians a few facts which I think they may find interesting as they go through their assessment of where we are and the kinds of things that we should do. One of the key areas in which Canada would like to make progress and our budget would intend, and indeed our social security review, is to help Canadians to acquire skills. We have to help Canadians acquire skills to get jobs, to keep jobs and to find better jobs.

As Canadians know there has been much debate and much discussion about potential cuts in funding for post–secondary education. I want to share some figures.

Last year there was a 19 per cent growth in jobs for those who had a post–secondary education. At the same time there was a 17 per cent decrease in jobs for those who did not have a post–secondary education.

All of the experts say that over the next decade 45 per cent of all new jobs will require a post–secondary education. The government has included these facts, figures and initiatives in its priorities because our young people who are now in school must be given every incentive and opportunity to continue their education. We do not want them to be sitting on the curb watching the rest of Canadians go by.

During the 1990 to 1993 period, 190,000 jobs were lost during the recession. However, if we look very carefully at how that is composed, we find that 640,000 jobs were lost for Canadians who had a high school education or less. Offsetting that, 450,000 jobs were gained during the recession by those who had a post–secondary education. I think that indicates to all Canadians how important that education component is in terms of our overall strategy for Canada in the coming years.

The next area I want to share with hon. members is an analysis I did of taxation from 1992 as to who paid how much taxes and when. I found it very interesting that the top 10 per cent of taxpayers made $50,000 or more. That means if someone made more than $50,000 in 1992 they were in the top 10 per cent of Canadians. Interestingly enough, that top 10 per cent of Canadians, approximately two million, contributed 32 per cent of all taxes paid and 44 per cent of all charitable donations.

When people start discussing should we tax more, should we raise our tax rates or should we go after the rich, they should first understand that they are talking about people who make over $50,000 and there are only 10 per cent of them.

Second, they have to understand that they already paid 32 per cent of all taxes and of their disposable income they are the major contributors to charitable donations. I find that very, very important to understand when we start discussing whether or not we should for instance cut RRSPs. At the $50,000 level one cannot even contribute more than $9,000 to RRSPs. Therefore, if the level were reduced we are basically talking about reducing it only for those taxpayers who are making much more than $50,000. Those things will have to be taken into account as we discuss the measures with regard to RRSPs.

With regard to matters such as employer paid health benefits, that has come up. Eight million employees receive employer paid health benefits tax free. The fairness of that has to be assessed.

Today in the newspaper it was reported that the mayor of my city, Mississauga, said that if the government raises taxes it is going to force more people into the underground economy than it has now. It is also going to force people to withhold taxes. I agree with the first statement but not with the second one.

With regard to the underground economy, there is no question about that. If we make serious and tough but fair cuts as a result of this budget there is no question that there will be increased pressure on the underground economy. As a result, I believe the government should as part of this consultation, and I hope members will consider this, have a parallel defensive measure to ensure that there is no increased pressure on the underground economy.

I have many more things to say but I will—

The Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Fraser Valley West.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says Reform is taking credit for assuming some $18 billion in growth. On the other hand, the hon. member says the economy has grown since the Liberals were elected, taking credit for that of course.

I would ask the hon. member if he thinks that any growth in the economy to date is really due to the natural business cycle and not to the accomplishments of his Liberal Party? Surely he does not think that way. I would like him to try to express himself a little better as far as the business cycle as opposed to what the Liberal Party has done and forget the red book rhetoric.

Mr. Szabo: Mr. Speaker, I am astounded that the member would not give some credit to what has happened in Canada since the election. One of the most important ingredients to growth in the economy is the confidence of the Canadian people, of the lending community and of business.

Three hundred and twenty–seven thousand jobs have been created since the government came to power. Much of that has to do with the confidence and credibility the Prime Minister has brought to political life, which the member enjoys as well. The hon. member should give credit where credit is due.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I must agree with my colleagues in the Reform Party this time. The Liberal government has done nothing at all for the economic recovery. On the contrary. A few weeks after Mr. Martin tabled his first budget, interest rates shot up. That is why we will have to pay $2.7 billion more for interest alone.

Not only the finance minister's credibility, but the measures he advocated in his first budget did not help the economic recovery and job creation; rather, they hurt economic growth and the growth of employment. If he had taken effective—I would say tougher—measures on February 22, more jobs would have been created and the financial picture would have been much better in the last few months.

I ask him where the Liberal Party contributed to greater growth, when everyone says that it has not in the past six months?

[English]

Mr. Szabo: Mr. Speaker, the member knows that the Government of Canada does not control global interest rates. The member is an economist. He knows the national debt is denominated in long rates, not in short. The Bank of Canada has influence only on the short end.

He is somehow suggesting the government has not done anything with regard to those rates. He is living in a fantasy world that somehow the government flips switches to make things happen. He knows interest rates have risen and are higher than the assumptions that were included in the finance minister's previous budget.

The finance minister has made corrections to ensure he meets his targets. That is responsible government. The finance minister understands the economy much better than the hon. member.

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with considerable pride that I stand in the House today to make my submission to the first significant prebudget consultation process in Canadian history. On behalf of the constituents of Vancouver South I want to thank the Minister of Finance for this opportunity to express our views.

Let me begin by saying that there continues to be a tremendous amount of confidence within my riding for the Liberal plan for reducing the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP by 1996–97.

As many have remarked in the House before, this 3 per cent target serves as one of the major benchmarks for entry into the European Union. It is also a target that has not been achieved in Canada in 20 years. Still there are those on the opposition benches who continue to argue this 3 per cent target is not tough enough.

What is indisputable is that the Liberal government made a promise to the Canadian people on October 26, 1993. We promised Canadians we would meet this target within the specified time. Then we would begin our ultimate objective, the complete elimination of the deficit. I would like to quote the Minister of Finance: "Come hell or high water we will meet this promise to Canadians".

Recently the Reform Party attempted to bring some credibility to its original zero in three claim, which I know is very difficult for it to do. I am glad that today the leader of the Reform Party has changed that zero in three to zero in five, to do it in five years. He is learning that our goal is much more rational and balanced. He has moved from a zero in three approach to a zero in five. I ask my colleagues to check the record.

The members of the Reform Party have outlined a remarkably vague and draconian plan to cut a number of government programs. All one has to do is read the Edmonton Journal which is often quoted on the other side to understand about what has been brought forward.

This plan along with the announcement of more brutal cuts to come to programs like post–secondary education and old age pensions demonstrates what I will call the half–marble approach to deficit reduction, an approach that only deals with half of the whole solution. Dealing with the deficit in Canada requires a two–sided approach: decreasing government expenditures by streamlining programs and services and increasing government revenues by promoting a healthy and vibrant economy.

Trying to solve Canada's economic problems through extracting $25 billion from the economy in two years without any plan for economic growth is like trying to roll half a marble. Like the marble, it is an idea that will not go very far.

Further, anyone who believes that government revenues will not be seriously diminished through a plan which, while cutting regional development spending, also cuts Canada's social security system is not only trying to roll half a marble but is not playing with all the marbles.

If members take a moment to look at the plan of the Reform—I do not know from where it gets its economics—it thinks that by cutting $42 billion over three years that will somehow create great confidence in the economy and will create jobs. Then everybody will be spending money and we will get a tremendous amount of growth. The Reform Party has a lot to learn. What we are presenting is a much more balanced and rational approach. Canadians see that.

Recently I took the question of how to solve some of Canada's economic problems back to small business owners in my riding through the venue of a public policy forum. I would like to share some of their valuable ideas with the House today.

Overall, my constituents have requested that the budget continue to reflect the commitment of the government to promoting the health and growth of Canada's small business community. I am sure all my colleagues would agree with that.

With regard to access to capital, my constituents feel that the federal government should introduce strong measures to ensure that Canadian financial institutions are more equitable and accountable to small business owners.

With regard to federal deficits, my constituents feel that the federal government should do everything possible to find areas of waste and overlap, duplication and extravagance and eliminate them immediately. I know I will get lots of support from the other side on that issue. In terms of government expenditures on programs and services, there is considerable support among my constituents for the extensive program by program review currently under way.

With regard to taxation, they felt that the federal government should begin reducing the tax burden on average Canadians through a reduction in personal income taxes. It should begin harmonizing and simplifying the tax system so as to decrease administrative costs, expensive paper burden and overall taxation. It should lower payroll taxes through savings made through the UIC system. It should give serious consideration to the recommendation made by the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and supported by the region's small business working committee to increase the small business tax deduction to $400,000 from $200,000.

As I have noted before, this measure has not been adjusted since 1982 when it was first introduced and should be increased to the rate of inflation.

With regard to the most effective role for government, small business owners stated that they want their governments to offer a hand up not a hand out. They feel that the best route to take is not through grants, subsidies and expensive tax deductions, but through addressing wide ranging concerns such as interprovincial barriers and global trade.

They feel that government should promote a healthy business environment with low taxes and minimal regulations and that they should support the business sector in meeting their own needs in job training and knowledge networks.

They feel that the federal government should target businesses operated by Canadians with special needs but should do so by reallocating current budget expenditures, not by making further expenditures.

With regard to women in small business, my constituents feel that the federal government should give serious consideration to a system of affordable national day care, allowing more women the freedom to begin small businesses. This can be done either directly through the federal government or with government support. They feel that the federal government should find ways of offering training which will help female entrepreneurs get started and expand their business operations.

In conclusion, there was a reason I went to my constituents for their advice. I knew the government was listening to Canadians. For the first time in Canadian history a government has gone to the people for their input on the budget before the budget is introduced. For the first time the government is making a genuine attempt to include Canadians in the decision making process that will affect them. These prebudget consultations, like the other extensive government consultations currently under way, are part of the Liberal election promise to do things differently, to make government more inclusive and to make government more responsive.

We promised to listen to Canadians and that is exactly what we are doing. I am proud to be a part of this government.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to talk in terms of marbles to the hon. member. I could say he has lost some but he has not. He is talking some of the talk but that is really all it is. I want to ask him a question about the infrastructure program.

The government is faced with a $40 billion deficit. One of the answers to resolve this situation is to create an infrastructure program. The infrastructure program uses $2 billion tax dollars from the municipal level, which the municipality gets by taxing people on their residences and so on. Then the infrastructure program uses another $2 billion from the provincial government which it gets from the same taxpayer. Then the federal government throws in $2 billion to make $6 billion. It all comes from the same taxpayer.

I would like the hon. member to explain the logic of another $6 billion out of the taxpayers' pocket as a positive influence in trying to balance a budget of $40 billion deficit a year.

Mr. Dhaliwal: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague for a very good question. There is a very good answer for that question.

Some time last year I was in Singapore and I had an opportunity to look at some of its infrastructure program. As many members know, Singapore has been a miracle of economic development over the past few decades. It is a model that other countries have looked at.

The reason that country has been so successful is because it has an incredible infrastructure program. It had a vision.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the member a quick question. I have not heard any response other than the fact that we are going to meet this goal that is so easy to achieve, of 3 per cent of GDP. Three years from now we will only have a $25 billion deficit at which time we can bring in new ideas and all that sort of thing.

The IMF, the Globe and many economists nationwide indicated recently that it was not nearly good enough, that it was going to be a failure. They do not seem to read the newspaper or they do not pay attention to what they read. It is one or the other.

There does not seem to be any mention of the fact that in three years the debt is going to be another $100 billion deeper in the hole. They do not seem to take into account that the interest on the debt will go from $40 billion a year to probably $50 billion a year, unless interest rates keep going the way they are.

I would like the member to address the future in that sense.

Mr. Dhaliwal: Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. colleague that the debt is going to increase. However, we have to make sure that we deal with the deficit before we can deal with the debt issue. That is what we are doing in a reasonable, common sense approach.

If we say we will do it within a year, I guess if we cut every program in government it could be done within a year. But what would be the long term cost of that? It could be done in two years if we wanted to cut every program. We would have to look at the cost of the programs.

Let me respond to the question of my hon. colleague. I am sure he is willing to listen to my response. In our cultural industry and scientific community it takes years to build infrastructure. They do not pop up from nowhere. We as the government are not going to cut them wholesale, which would cause serious problems in the future.

It is the same with our social programs. We can ignore and cut our social programs, but what price do we pay in the future? I ask the hon. member to look at the future cost of cutting those programs because in the end we will have to face the social costs.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I only have one very simple comment, since unfortunately I must admit that I missed the beginning of the speech by my hon. colleague, the parliamentary secretary to the fisheries minister.

Since he is responsible for fisheries, instead of talking to us about big infrastructure programs, I would have liked him to tell us, in his area, his department, what he will suggest to his boss, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Since the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is to be reorganized, what kind of reorganization does he foresee? The provinces are expecting cuts but also policies.

[English]

Mr. Dhaliwal: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member. Unfortunately he missed the first half of my speech. It was an excellent part of my speech. I know he will not do that again.

I will be telling the minister, and I am very happy to share it with the member, that we need to look at duplication. We need to look at the overlap between the provinces and the federal government. We need to look at that to see if we can save money by dividing some of the responsibilities. Let us have a look at them. We will look at the different departments.

Is there something in the coast guard? Can we amalgamate the services of the coast guard fleet with the department of fisheries fleet to create more efficiency? Can we consolidate those services so a better job can be done in a more efficient and effective way?

I will be telling the minister that we need to look at small craft harbours. Maybe we can privatize them. Maybe they can be privatized at a much lower cost than for us to continue holding on to them.

I will be advising the minister that we have to look at overlap. We have to look at duplication, not only between the provinces and ourselves but between the different departments like the Department of the Environment and the coast guard. Let us see what services we can consolidate and save money.

Why should we have within a mile fleet maintenance services for the coast guard and close by one for the Department of Fisheries and Oceans? It does not make sense.

We have to look at the common sense approach. We need to look at overlap and duplication. I hope the minister will listen to what I have to say because coming from the business sector I can provide some good advice on saving money for the taxpayer.

The Deputy Speaker: The bells will ring at 6.05 p.m. so if the two colleagues in the Reform Party would like to divide their time perhaps it would work.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I say to the hon. parliamentary secretary to the minister of fisheries that the government had better soon decide whether it is going to fish or cut bait. He should stick around; he may learn something. Here we are in 1994. We have an overtaxed worker and we have a frustrated taxpayer, all of whom depend on us to relieve them of their concerns.

I listened to the comments today. A Liberal member suggested that because they were in office the economy was growing and we were doing well. Let us imagine how the worker in British Columbia, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland or elsewhere across the country thinks about the rhetoric in Ottawa. His pockets are empty. He is overtaxed and he is frustrated. It is abysmal that they can stand here and talk about how well we are doing.

We are not doing well, folks. We owe $40 billion. We have a debt load of $530 billion. We cannot delay any longer the implementation of a tough budget. We often talk about the baby boomers versus generation x, the next generation so labelled after us. To some extent the generation of baby boomers has been a fairly unrealistic group. We have overspent the last 20 years. Now we are whining about the fact that we have to cut. That is exactly what is going on across the way. They are whining.

We in this party have the courage to come up with a plan. That is exactly what we are doing and what we are going to proceed with. They can whine as much as they like. We are right and they are wrong. It is as simple as that. I think fish or cut bait should apply not only to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans but to everyone sitting across the way.

One of the jobs I have in the Reform Party is to look at regional development grants. That is what I want to talk about today. Many of my colleagues have spoken about areas in their expertise, in their portfolios, but regional development grants are of particular interest. They represent about $1.3 billion. We are advocating the phase–out of regional development grants.

ACOA is one of them. The Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency has a budget of about $376 million. I spoke about blueberry research the other day and a Liberal member commented. He said: "I am sick and tired of hearing anti–Atlantic Canadian comments coming from members of the Reform Party".

That is clearly not the case. Regional development grants are located in Atlantic Canada through an organization called ACOA, in western Canada through an organization called Western Economic Diversification, and in Quebec through an organization called FORD–Quebec. FORD–Quebec has a budget of $437 million each year of taxpayers' dollars to give out in its area and Western Economic Diversification has $452 million.

A taxpayer sits in his home and says: "I am going broke. The taxes are more onerous every day. How am I going to survive?" And the government says: "That is okay. We cannot look at these programs because they are regional development programs and we best know how to spend your money". That is basically the way it is.

These agencies have about $1.3 billion to know how best to spend taxpayers' money. I will go through some of the ways in which they spend the money and give some examples later.

The concept of regional development grants, as I understand from the government, is that it wants to support and promote opportunity for economic development and to foster development of entrepreneurship. That is an interesting one. A fellow who was given the entrepreneurial award of the year in one of the regions had six or seven grants from a regional economic development organization. I do not know what the Liberal concept is of an entrepreneur, but to me it is somebody who does not live off the taxpayers' dollars, who does not get any grants whatsoever. It is somebody who has done it on his own. He is not counting on government. They are not fostering the development of entrepreneurship in regional development grants. It is not happening. That is contrary to the concept, but the award was good.

One concept is to increase the rate of new business formation and another is to improve the competitiveness of small and medium sized enterprises. We have done a lot of research into regional grants. How does one improve the competitiveness of a small or medium sized business in an area when the government comes along and says: "Just a minute. You want to update a motel. Here is $67,000 for you", and the next motel says: "Wait a minute. What about me?" The government says: "There is none for you; this is going to be a competitive world".

He walks away with $67,000 profit from the taxpayer. It goes out of the taxpayer's pocket to somebody else. That does not improve competitiveness and is why we have to start eliminating regional development grants. I am sure we will have a great debate on this matter, because that is not the way the government thinks.

The concept of entrepreneurs does not include government handouts, at least where I come from. If we ask businessmen in my community what an entrepreneur is, they will tell us that it does not include government money.

We all know that Canada has a serious problem. We all know the Liberals are facing a $40 billion deficit. They are overspending each year. We know they have to cut it. They know they have a $530 billion debt and the interest on that debt is increasing by the day, by the hour, by the second.

What are they going to do about it? They are going to close the gap. They are going to get it down to 3 per cent of gross domestic product. That is around a $26 billion a year deficit. Imagine going to the bank, paying our bills on more and more debt, and the Liberals are saying: "We are going to look after that, folks. We are going to bring it down to about $26 billion a year". That is insufficient.

Over a short three–year period let us look at what we will have. We could look at four years or over the whole mandate. We are adding to the debt load in excess of $100 billion.

Who will pay for it? Our children will. If we think of nothing else in the country, we have to think of the little ones behind us. We have to think of the ones in university who are wanting to get out and get jobs. Jobs are stifled by business being overtaxed and by debt load. We have to give them something to look forward to. It is time to make some tough decisions. We know they do not like zero in three. We know they do not like to fish or cut bait, but we know they have to deal with the problem.

The average taxpayer uses a litmus test when he hears about giving a grant to any organization. A civil servant from the Department of National Revenue knocks on the taxpayer's door and says: "The motel down the street needs $67,000 to upgrade its facilities. Would you give us $3 out of your pocket to do that?" The individual would wonder why he would give him money out of his pocket and would ask: "Does he not make a profit? If he does not make a profit should he be in that business? I do not have $3 anyway so I really have to borrow it".

What will the individual say? He will say: "No, I need that money. I am not going to the bank to borrow it and give it to you". That is exactly how the taxpayer feels.

The government has taken it upon it itself to make the decision on behalf of the taxpayer to give out the taxpayer's money to projects he does not agree with. I only have a minute so let me mention a few: $38,000 to acquire fencing and improve a go–cart race track; purchase of equipment for a luxury tour and outdoor recreation, $15,000; purchase and renovate an inn to higher quality; acquire office furniture and computer equipment; construct a two bedroom cottage; and to refurbish an existing cottage. If we ask the taxpayers they will say: "No. If you want that then you earn your own profit and you upgrade your own facility".

I would love to say more but I am out of time. It is time to fish or cut bait over there.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the member for finally coming out of the closet in front of the entire House, declaring that he is a baby boomer that is.

The member continues to mention that we have a deficit and we have a debt. Hypothetically if the Reform Party had formed the government over $100 billion of additional debt would have been incurred even with their plans. It is almost as if there would be absolutely nothing happening.

The member said this very large debt was accumulated over the last 25 years by the baby boomers and that they are the ones who are going to have to pay it back. I wonder if he would care to comment on whether he feels that seniors were in any way responsible for any of this debt. Does he feel that seniors should pay some portion of that debt?

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, do you know who is responsible for this debt? They are sitting in here. The politicians in this place are responsible for the debt. The Liberals and Conservatives are responsible for this country's debt regardless of their age. Do not blame it on the average taxpayer. It is politicians, the ones sitting right in here.

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I will try to be brief. The point I want to make to the hon. member from western Canada is that we are not only separated by distance: We also have diverging views on economic development.

Economic development in the east means something specific, whether it is in Quebec or in the Maritimes—I do not want to speak for the Liberals, they are quite capable of digging a hole for themselves. It is a development tool to help people; for example, instead of providing transfer payments and social assistance, you give people tools to look after themselves.

In this respect, I wish the hon. member would be careful when addressing easterners.

[English]

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, once again I have been informed to be careful about how we talk about the east. I thought I opened this up with the Western Economic Diversification Board, Quebec and ACOA. The facts are that a lot of the dollars given out as grants in all three of these all across the country are not serving the purpose for which they started out, the concept which I described earlier.

Please, let us not get into being careful how we talk about Atlantic Canada, or Quebec, or western Canada. It is the concept that we have to look at, the larger picture of economic development in this country. Is the money better off in the hands of the taxpayer or in the hands of the politicians?

The Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. The hon. member for Wild Rose will end the debate in about two minutes.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my speech was prepared for a lot longer than two minutes but I will try to reduce it.

The basis of this whole topic which bothers me is that it appears the government does not realize we are out of time and that we cannot afford Cadillac services any longer. We have to take a step backward. We have to drop the frills. It is time to trade in the Cadillac for a smaller car and realize that the days of wine and roses are over.

It amazes me. We asked for a simple thing. It would be a nice gesture on the part of the government to give up $10 million a year. Maybe it could go to the hungry children that the minister of human resources keeps talking about. It would be a good gesture. From the Bloc, from the Liberals and from everywhere else but the Reformers we hear: "No way, we are not giving up the good old pension plan, not for a moment. It is the rest of the country that has problems. Let them figure out what they are going to do. We do not want to do anything".

I look around the Hill and I see those blue cars courting ministers wherever they want to go. There are green buses that will take us any place we want to go on the Hill.

I understand that if they were willing to sacrifice a little, they each could cough up $45,000 a year that would really go well in the hands of the Children's Aid Society in Ottawa or Toronto. That is the kind of attitude I would like to see.

The Deputy Speaker: It being 6.05 p.m., it is my duty pursuant to the order passed on Thursday, November 24, 1994, to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith the question necessary to dispose of Motion No. 17 now before the House.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

• (1825)

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent that we proceed with the vote on Bill C–57 and then proceed with the vote on Motion No. 17.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to proceed in that fashion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

WORLD TRADE ORGANIZATION AGREEMENT IMPLEMENTATION ACT

The House resumed from November 29, consideration of the motion that Bill C–57, an act to implement the agreement establishing the World Trade Organization, be read the third time and passed.

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I believe you will find that the members of Parliament who just voted on the previous motion could be recorded as having voted on the next motion, with Liberal members voting yea. The whips of other parties will indicate how their colleagues are intending to vote.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to proceed as proposed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, Bloc Quebecois members oppose this motion.

[English]

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find all the Reform Party members present today will vote yea.

Mr. Solomon: Mr. Speaker, as the New Democratic Party caucus whip, New Democrats in the House today vote no.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

The Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

It being 6.38 the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

EXECUTIVE SALARIES

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.) moved:

That this House support the principle of disclosing the salary ranges of all senior executives of crown corporations and publicly traded companies incorporated under federal charter.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in this motion I am asking the House to support the principle of disclosing the salary ranges of all senior executives of crown corporations and publicly traded companies incorporated under federal charter.

I admit right off the top that I do not think this motion really goes far enough. That was suggested by the Globe and Mail newspaper which suggested that the motion include boards and commissions of the federal government.

I tried to keep the motion as simple as possible. Adding other entities, in my opinion, only complicates the issue. I wanted, in a fashion, to set the bar as low as possible so that we could get some kind of easy discussion on this matter.

I wanted to discuss this issue so that Canadians can get an idea of how members of Parliament feel about generous and sometimes extremely lucrative benefits which executives of public companies and crown corporations receive.

Why did I introduce this motion? It has not been designed to settle the impossible question of what executives are worth. I am not trying to do that in this motion. After all we live in a free market economy in which employers can pay employees whatever they feel is acceptable.

If my purpose is not to determine an executive's worth then why the motion? Consider how the public would feel if both politicians' and senators' salaries and benefits were not disclosed. People would be very unhappy. People want to know how public servants or public representatives treat themselves. Similarly, and I think in a growing fashion, people want to know how powerful, influential people in the private sector treat themselves.

Also consider the province of Ontario which under its securities act requires companies currently trading on the Toronto Stock Exchange to disclose the compensation packages of senior executives. Ontario is the only province with this requirement. The Ontario example provides a basis for us. Summaries of all companies should be required regardless of location in Canada and whether that company is publicly traded or a crown corporation; in other words, extend the Ontario example right across the country.

Ontario's securities act was implemented several years ago. It was implemented to force companies trading on the Toronto Stock Exchange to disclose the compensation packages of senior executives. As well, the Ontario legislature has given first reading to two private members' bills relating to salary disclosure.

Bill 108 would amend provincial access and privacy statutes to provide access to information relating to the salaries of public service officers and employees at the provincial and municipal levels. Bill 114, entitled an act to provide for the disclosure of executive compensation in the public sector, would require the Ontario government to report annually the salaries of the five most highly paid officials in each government ministry and crown corporation.

Perhaps through example we can more clearly understand the motivation for the introduction of disclosure regulations. Let me give some examples.

Hartland MacDougall, the former chairman of Royal Trust was handed a combined salary, bonus and severance package of $2.9 million for 1993. That came after the collapse of Royal Trust.

Marvin Marshall is CEO of Bramalea Ltd., a real estate firm. In 1993 even though Bramalea lost something like $90 million Mr. Marshall was paid almost $1 million in salary, $971,225.

Bill Stinson, CEO and chairman at Canadian Pacific, received a 31 per cent increase in salary in 1990, earning $1,181,895 despite the fact that Canadian Pacific's profits declined by 52 per cent in that same year.

Paul Stern, former CEO of Northern Telecom, left that company in 1992, receiving $164,000 for two months of employment. Stern also took with him a compensation package totalling $6 million. Also we cannot forget another $1.5 million in stock options.

When Stephen Banner joined Seagrams he received a signing bonus of 200,000 Seagram shares with a market value of $5 million as well as his salary and a bonus package worth $1.2 million. In addition Mr. Banner received a $1 million interest free loan to buy a house in Montreal and additional stock options worth $2.1 million. As for his performance that has to be yet evaluated.

Those are examples. Some people might say those are examples of lucrative benefits. Some people might say that is an example of greed. There are cases where greed is not so apparent.

Paul Desmarais, the chairman of Power Corporation of Canada, a Montreal based firm, paid himself $1.6 million while the firm's net earnings were $201 million.

• (1845)

In my opinion such salaries become more than a simple matter of disclosure, but disclosure is at the heart of this issue. Executives of large firms and crown corporations are powerful people, perhaps in some instances more powerful than ministers or even the Prime Minister. In this respect there needs to be some legislation to inform Canadians how corporate moneys are dispensed with or spent.

One reason for introducing this as a motion rather than a bill is that several legislative changes would be required in order to facilitate salary disclosure. I do think though that salary disclosure means that salaries or compensation packages would be tied more closely to performance: the better the performance, the better the compensation package; lower performance, lower remuneration.

Disclosure at the federal level would require all kinds of legislative changes. For example, under the existing legislation in section 3(19)(iii) of the Privacy Act the federal government is now required to only disclose the salary ranges for senior civil servant positions. The Federal Court has interpreted salary range as meaning the exact salary amount of officials and shall remain personal information and not subject to public scrutiny. However, the Canada Business Corporations Act does permit public access to documents such as letters patent and annual returns which do not include certain information on a corporation's directors.

Federally there has been an effort to amend the Privacy Act to require the exact salary to be announced with order in council appointments. In a 1987 report the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General recommended but did not implement the amendment which would have made specific salaries of government officials mandatory.

Financial institutions are major corporations incorporated under federal charter. Several acts would have to be amended to effect this change, namely the Bank Act along with its counterparts, the Insurance Companies Act, the Trust Loan Companies Act, and the Co–operative Credit Associations Act.

The Canadian Business Corporations Act could also be amended to include an order to state executive remuneration. When filing annual returns with the Superintendent of Financial Institutions a corporation could be required to report the salaries of its senior directors. This information would be accompanied by a report of the corporation's operations and activities of its directors already provided to the superintendent in accordance with section 262 of the act and open to public scrutiny as required under section 266.

It may also be necessary to make an amendment to the definitions in the Privacy Act to clarify the intent and need for salary disclosure for the sake of public interest. The amendments mentioned here could sufficiently cover the salaries of private sector executives.

Those are some necessary legislative changes. That is down the road. Right now we are more or less talking about the principle of disclosure.

As politicians we are continually reminded of the notion that absolute power corrupts absolutely. I am not trying to imply that senior executives are morally corrupt or have ethics that are worse than any other person. I do not think they are any more greedy than anyone else, but I do think that because of their influence and power they may be in a better position to act upon the greed they may possess. I suppose we all have some greed in us.

I am saying that senior executives are so powerful that even though they are technically employees their compensation can be extreme relative to the company's economic performance. Currently some executives can virtually set their own salaries and bonus packages. I suspect there would be a considerable debate on this point, but they are very powerful, especially in their own realm within their own companies.

Senior officials are also in a position to stack or heavily influence advisory boards or shareholder boards with friends and allies. Corporations are not the most democratic institutions. One might ask at this point: Why not leave this matter to the shareholders?

I do not expect private companies to be as democratic as this old institution we call the Parliament of Canada is. Given the fact they are not that democratic I do think that shareholders need a little helping hand to open up the process and to provide better disclosure. We have to remember that shareholders in private corporations are a disparate group and are spread all over the place. It is very difficult for them to get together to make things happen.

Legislation would do executives a favour in some instances, in those cases where salary and compensation packages are reasonable relative again to company performance. They would receive strong public support and it would be good for their image. In cases where remuneration is unreasonable there would be some reason to worry and they would have to bring about some adjustment on account of adverse public opinion.

Countless times executives are quoted as saying that the government should cut back on its expenditures. What I am proposing in this motion would require that private sector executives practise what they preach. Or, if one believes that executives in private corporations already practise what they preach maybe this kind of disclosure would ensure that they would continue to practise what they preach.

During the recent recession a number of companies lost a great deal of money, yet executives of some of these companies were rewarded handsomely. In some cases executive salaries went up despite the fact that the performance of their companies went down. The greatest irony is that in many of these cases it was these individuals who made decisions which cost their firms a great deal of money, yet they were in receipt of greater rewards and greater compensation. Should we be rewarding bad decisions and bad choices? If we do that then I suppose the Conservative Party would still be ruling this country.

Crown corporations also play a significant role in the economy and should be subject to the same rules of disclosure. The fact that executives can earn more money while the companies they work for lose money suggests that executives have the power to design their own packages in secrecy, behind closed doors and out of sight of public scrutiny. The public should know how the packages of crown corporations are established.

In recent days there has been a controversy surrounding the head of CNR. We discovered that as part of his package he was in receipt of a $300,000 loan interest free, which probably makes it worth another $30,000 or $40,000. There is no need in my opinion to hide that kind of thing. If in this case the head of the CNR deserves that kind of assistance, if we want to put it that way, then it should be open and above board. He has no reason to hide it. My guess is it was made as obscure as possible because the man involved did not want that kind of information out. He probably thought it would add to his discomfort.

Disclosure is not intended to embarrass executives. It simply outlines the need for constraint. Disclosure gives us those constraints.

Initially this action may be considered intrusive. However, in the case of crown businesses they are the businesses of the government. Because they use government money they are using tax dollars. Furthermore, these businesses are important to the Canadian economy. Consider for a moment the significance of General Motors, Canadian National Railways, the Bank of Canada and the Department of Finance.

In conclusion, I wish this motion had been made votable but the powers that be decided otherwise. I wanted it to be votable because it would have given us the vehicle to express ourselves on this issue. I think Canadians want parliamentarians to express themselves on this matter.

• (1855)

In the remaining 40 minutes of this debate, I welcome the comments and the insights of my colleagues. If there are members who believe that executive compensation is nobody's business but their own, then let us hear about that. If in the opinion of some members disclosure is deemed to be harmful to the public interest or harmful to the private sector, I would like to hear about that too. Let the debate continue.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to start by commending the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James on the way he presented his motion. His motion was well researched, and his arguments were excellent. I just wanted to say that. I would also like to take this opportunity to bring another perspective to the subject of this motion.

The hon. member for Winnipeg St. James moved: "That this House support the principle of disclosing the salary ranges of all senior executives of Crown corporations and publicly–traded companies incorporated under federal charter". I think I should add, for the benefit of those who are watching and listening, that there are three types of companies. First, private companies which usually belong to a single owner or are family–run businesses. Publicly–traded companies are usually big corporations or could be SMEs but, as a general rule, they are traded on the stock exchange market and the owners are shareholders. Finally, we have a third type of company, Crown corporations, which have a single owner: the government.

I may recall that in October 1993, the TSE, following the example of the New York Stock Exchange, required companies traded in Toronto to disclose the salaries and bonuses of their five most senior executives. The remuneration of these executives includes salary, bonuses, options or share premiums as agreed by the issuer. It also includes allowances, annual dues and life–insurance premiums. This policy applies to all companies trading on the TSE and the Montreal Exchange. Companies trading on both exchanges are subject to the regulations set by the TSE.

With this measure, the Ontario government makes it incumbent on heads of Crown corporations to give an account of their remuneration to shareholders. The TSE's policy follows the example of American exchanges, and about 3,700 Crown corporations have been affected by the TSE's new policy.

Quebec, however, seems to be the exception in North America. The Montreal Exchange requires only disclosure of the total remuneration of the five best paid executives of companies trading on the exchange. Toronto requires disclosure of the salaries of these executives, while Montreal simply wants to know the total amount, without requiring detailed information in each case.

In December 1993, the Quebec minister responsible for finance, Mrs. Louise Robic, said that she did not believe that it was necessary to require the disclosure of individual salaries of executive officers of companies listed on the Montreal Stock Exchange. She mentioned their need for privacy.

The Conseil du Patronat in Quebec was of the same opinion. Its spokesperson, Ghislain Dufour, opposed the Ontario policy for the sake of protecting the right to privacy.

Yet, the Ontario policy already applies to a vast majority of companies listed on the Montreal Stock Exchange. These companies are usually listed on both exchanges and, since they must abide by the rules of the Toronto Stock Exchange, they have to make public the salaries of their best paid executives. At the time, Mr. Dufour praised Mrs. Robic's decision.

We should add to this the opinion the Deputy Premier of Quebec, Mr. Bernard Landry, expressed when his party was in opposition. He said, in January 1994, that his party was totally in favour of the disclosure of executive salaries. He said and I quote: "We are following the example of the Americans", and he went on to say that the public and semi–public sectors would have to follow suite.

The Parti Quebecois favours openness. "What worker would agree to make sacrifices if he felt that the salary spread was much too great?" asked Mr. Landry. He points out that during its first term in office, the Parti Quebecois came very close to making the individual disclosure of top executives' salaries mandatory. But at the time, it was not a requirement in Toronto, and such a discrepancy in the rules of both stock exchanges could have been a problem.

It is important to note that, in October 1994, the Quebec Deposit and Investment Fund issued a different policy in this matter. It is opposed to the individual disclosure of top corporate executives' salaries, preferring instead the policy adopted by the Montreal Stock Exchange. However, the fund adds in its regulations that it expects corporations to abide by the disclosure rules established by regulatory agencies such as the Toronto Stock Exchange.

The Quebec Deposit and Investment Fund clearly states its preference for a policy like that of the Montreal Stock Exchange, although it expects companies listed on the Toronto stock exchange to obey TSE regulations and authorize disclosure, as well as other companies entitled to follow the applicable regulations. Companies are expected to comply with these regulations.

Let us go back to Motion No. 309 tabled by the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James. It is apparently aimed at extending the policy adopted by the Toronto Stock Exchange to everything under federal jurisdiction, including Crown corporations and publicly–traded companies incorporated under federal charter. Crown corporations have a single owner and are not currently required to follow the policy of the Toronto Stock Exchange since they are not listed on the TSE.

To give our viewers an idea of what these Crown corporations are, I would like to identify some of them. The list of parent Crown corporations includes the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority, the Canadian Wheat Board, the National Capital Commission, Canadian National Railways, the Canada Council, Canada Development Investment Corporation, Atomic Energy of Canada, the National Gallery of Canada, Canada Post Corporation, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Canada Lands Company, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, VIA Rail Canada, etc. These are examples of what we are thinking about when we talk about parent corporations.

This motion would require not only parent corporations but also other companies incorporated under federal charter to disclose the salaries of their senior executives.

The situation of publicly–traded companies incorporated under federal charter is more complex. We must keep in mind that most of these companies are listed on the TSE but that some Crown corporations are not. This matter comes under provincial jurisdiction and does not require the adoption of a federal law.

In fact, the federal government has been unsuccessfully trying for several years to control the securities industry. In any case, I do not think that this law should apply to publicly–traded companies incorporated under federal charter.

The motion should be restricted to parent corporations, although federal public corporations are already subject to Ontario or Quebec laws. I think that we should let them administer their own affairs as they see fit and let the provinces continue to regulate them as they have done until now.

[English]

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the motion that stands before us today is interesting because it highlights a problem that has existed for many years.

In particular, I would like to address the issue of disclosure of the salaries of the executives of crown corporations. The motion strikes at the balance between the right of the individual to his own privacy and the right of the taxpayer to know where his tax dollars are being spent.

Allow me to quote from Hansard of November 21, 1983, just about 11 years ago to the day. Hansard records a question in the House of Commons on that day, a question that arose out of the tabling of a report detailing all the orders in council appointees by the government, a report that is still regularly published today. The report was 264 pages long. It gave the salary ranges, not the actual salaries, of all order in council, and by that I mean cabinet, appointees.

On that November day 11 years ago, a Conservative member asked the Deputy Prime Minister why salaries of the heads of crown corporations were not publicly disclosed. In his characteristic fashion, the Deputy Prime Minister replied: "The information that was tabled was in compliance with the law passed by the Parliament of Canada. Obviously with respect to public servants we have made public the range of salary. In this particular case, because it is impossible to find anything equivalent to a range, we have shown the maximum salary and the minimum salary".

I am not sure exactly what that means but in any case the former Deputy Prime Minister in perfect Liberal fashion avoided answering the question altogether. That member is of course sitting in the Senate today.

The answer more coherent people usually give to this question is that while the public has a right to know what civil servants are being paid, those who are heads of crown corporations work at arm's length from the government. They are not purely public servants and therefore they have a right to their privacy when it comes to personal information like salaries. In a grand Canadian fashion we have compromised and split the issue right down the middle by publishing salary ranges, allowing us to say that we know but we do not know at the same time.

It kind of reminds me of the question: "Why did the Canadian cross the road?" The answer of course was to get to the middle.

Almost immediately after the Conservative government took power in 1984, it began to publish more accurate salary ranges of the heads of crown corporations because they had been the ones asking the government to do that for some time.

Please notice that it did not publish the actual salaries of the executives either, but it published the ranges with one significant difference from the Liberals. The ranges it began to publish were much narrower than had been previously published.

We learned from another question in the House asked by another Conservative member, again in November 1983, that the salary range of 18 employees of Canada Post was at the time $63,000 to $228,000 a year. Given this range, appointees could receive a salary anywhere within that range, maybe $170,000 a year. That is a range.

That gave very broad anonymity to all 18 executives appointed to Canada Post in 1983. Today the situation is much different.

The salary range for the chief executive officer of Canada Post is more accurately stated at $255,000 to $319,000 a year. This still leaves the actual salary of the CEO unknown, but it gives such a revealing hint that there is very little left to the imagination.

In addition, most order in council appointees are given a ranking number, called a governor in council rating that falls between 1 and 11, each showing a progressively higher salary with a range somewhere between $20,000 and $30,000. The yearly reporting of order in council appointees called "The Governor in Council Appointment Guide" also gives a complete list of 15 CEO salary ranges of senior executives of crown corporations and a few other executives. The salary ranges given have about $30,000 between the minimum and maximum salaries for these positions.

Over the last decade and a half a trend toward greater disclosure has been established until we have today reached what I would call almost virtual disclosure. Although interest was high when salaries were fully veiled, now less is being left to the imagination, so interest in the topic I think is naturally waning.

If I were the CEO of a crown corporation I would argue that my salary has been virtually revealed and there is no more danger to the public from the small amount of secrecy that still exists. What is the harm in a little bit of secrecy?

On the other hand the taxpayer would argue what would it hurt to know the exact salaries? Since a trend toward greater openness has already been established over a period of years and since we already have full disclosure in all but name, since the privacy of these individuals with respect to salary is only a charade anyway, what is there to lose by revealing all? The taxpayer would feel that a corporation may well be at arm's length from the government in the legal sense, but the taxpayer is not at arm's length in any way at all.

Every time the CEO receives a pay cheque the taxpayer feels it directly in the wallet. The taxpayer would argue that he has a compelling interest in full disclosure, knowing the exact salary he is paying anyone, be it a clerk in a UI office or the chairman of CN rail. We have two opposing arguments with two competing interests. The question then becomes: Which group has a more compelling interest, the taxpayer or the one who serves the taxpayer either as a public servant or as an arm's length quasi–public servant?

In my former life I operated a contracting company with about 230 employees. As the manager of those employees I had to know their exact salaries or I could not have run the company. The requirement of full disclosure is not only important, it is necessary for the manager. Just let the listener try to run his or her own household when they do not know all of their expenses. It is, of course, impossible.

If full disclosure is necessary to the financial manager, it begs an important question. Just who is the boss of Canada? Is it the government or the people who elect the government? I would say that the people of Canada are the boss and they have hired this government for a short period of time to manage the public affairs for them.

The government is not the boss, it is the servant. It is impossible for the taxpayer, the employer of the government, the real boss, to adequately judge the performance of its servant without exact information. This applies across the board, not just to the salaries of chief executive officers, but to government information across the great span of the federal government.

As a matter of principle, the taxpayer deserves full disclosure of all government expenditures. By receiving employment from the public purse and by fulfilling some type of a public mandate through their work, an individual gives up his or her right to privacy regarding salary. We can see why this principle is so important.

Just a few days ago the CEO of Canadian National revealed that in addition to his salary of something between $324,000 and $377,000 he has received an interest free loan of $300,000 to mortgage his house. This practice of mortgage perks is long-standing. I would refer the listener to the 1981 report of Petro–Canada where we first got wind of this in which $16.5 million was listed as mortgages. Is there anything else that the president of CN receives today for instance?

How can the ordinary member of the public judge whether the taxpayer has received a fair deal without knowing the details of the remuneration? If I owned a company and I found out that my manager was hiding important financial information from me, we all know what I would do. I would require that manager to tell me everything immediately or I would find a different manager. The principle becomes much larger and much more important when the poor taxpayer begins to delve into the government books and finds out how huge the whole system is.

The governor in council appointment guide I referred to earlier now has well over 286 pages in it, not 264 as in former times. The guide has a list of political appointees, 51 pages long. There are 2,500 names on the list.

If we are to assume that each one of those persons receives $70,000 a year, which is a fairly conservative estimate, it means that the salaries paid to those political appointees amount to $175 million a year. If we consider that these employees receive salaries within a range that is perhaps $30,000 a year more, then the salaries build to $250 million and so on.

The electorate will never see this information because it is hidden. The Liberal government, I would propose, has carefully hidden it so that we will not be able to see who gets what.

When we move on to other sectors of government full disclosure is even more necessary. For instance, the Department of Canadian Heritage gives out $552 million in grants to 10,000 different groups every year. It is a shame. On August 18 I asked for that list. It is somewhere in the bowels of the department. I cannot get it. They will not give it to me.

To summarize my remarks today, the taxpayer has a compelling interest in full financial disclosure from the government. There are many aspects of individual privacy about which the public does not have a right to know. When it is an individual employed by the taxpayer to fulfil a public mandate in service to the taxpayer, the interest of the taxpayer to know outweighs the right of the salary to be held secret.

Disclosing where the taxpayers' dollars are being spent and just who are the beneficiaries are valid principles. Where the motion helps to accomplish this, I think I could support that.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to take part in the debate on a very worthwhile motion by the member for Winnipeg St. James. I am very much in favour of his motion.

The motion really addresses, even though it does not quite say so, the concept of transparency and the possibility that people should be remunerated based on their performance. I do not think there is anything particularly wrong with that. In the case of crown corporations the customers are the taxpayers of Canada.

I have been involved with the Lobbyists Registration Act. People are concerned about the accountability of government and people working with government and interrelating with the public in general. Basically the motion attempts to address that accountability.

The Ontario Securities Commission requires the reporting of salary ranges in publicly traded corporations. This is a jurisdictional problem as the previous member from the Bloc pointed out. One advantage of having federally chartered corporations respond in that way is that it will actually be spread across the country. We could have federally incorporated companies which operate mainly in Vancouver now coming under the guise of this legislation.

Another important aspect, although it was not really addressed in the member's motion, would be to deal with some of the problems of the securities exchange commissions in the country. I firmly believe there is a definite need for a national securities commission that would have a uniform standard of securities legislation across the country. There are many people who believe that as well. It has an additional advantage in that it could possibly create new capital markets for small and medium sized businesses. That is an issue for another day.

We speak about transparency in corporations. The shareholders are very interested in what their executives are being paid. I can remember during some of the bad troughs of the last recession when our banks were having problems with Canary Wharf. I actually watched some of these institutions raise the salaries and remunerations of their executive officers, the very people who had made the decisions concerning that project. It was amazing to note at the same time that some foreign banks, especially some in the United States, were actually firing those people. It gives a different onus.

I am sure the people in the Royal Bank and others were very happy to receive at least the information. Although they might not have liked the results, they were certainly pleased to be in receipt of the information that these people had decided to give themselves a salary boost.

The transparency aspect in the recording of salary ranges is not a matter of simple curiosity. The reality is that when we expose them people start thinking the very thing we are thinking: "What is it that you did to earn that money?" Having crown corporations provide that information is nothing but good.

For instance, Canada Post was mentioned earlier in the debate. Why should its remuneration not be more directly linked to its actions as a crown corporation? In other words there should be a portion, if not dollar for dollar, of its remuneration directly related to customer satisfaction which is basically the people of Canada who use Canada Post services.

Today I attended an interesting interview. Some people from IBM were telling us how they run their corporation these days. Ten per cent of the remuneration of their employees is now based on a combination of five per cent on the profitability of the corporation and five per cent on customer satisfaction. They have a way of measuring customer satisfaction. We have to go more toward that in our governmental institutions.

I take the train to Ottawa quite often. I have often thought the executive officers of VIA Rail should possibly be paid, at least partially, based on the performance of that service. It seems that every time that train is late we should focus on the profitability of VIA Rail and customer satisfaction. Of course a lot of people would understand that these people may well have to pay money to work for VIA Rail today. If that focus were available, we may well get more efficiency in government as well as in our private sector.

I will conclude to allow other members to discuss the motion by raising the aspect of the civil service. I do not want to be getting into a position where I always seem to be bashing the civil service. Many civil servants do worthwhile jobs. I am very conscious of their concern for the Canadian citizen. I would, however, like to restore the word civil to the term civil servant. I looked it up in the dictionary on the way to the Chamber today and the word civil means belonging to the citizens, polite, obliging and not rude. Those are some of the things that we would address by making the remuneration more directly related to the citizens of the country.

I am very supportive of the motion of the member for Winnipeg St. James. It is quite appropriate that he brought it before the House tonight.

The Deputy Speaker: I might indicate that the debate is to end at 7.37 p.m. If there are two members who wish to speak, perhaps they could divide the time.

Mr. Julian Reed (Halton—Peel, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be quite brief. I rise in support of the motion. I congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James on his motion that will help to bring Canada fully into the 20th century in terms of business.

Other countries are ahead of us by many years in terms of the requirement to disclose. I approach the question perhaps a little differently than my colleagues who have spoken before. It has to do with the question of fiduciary responsibility. We know the term fiduciary responsibility applies to business, to stock companies and so on. That responsibility is to the stockholders, to the people who buy the stocks, who are entitled to attend annual meetings and who presumably are entitled to all pertinent information about the company, the financial information particularly.

We have lagged behind in this country by not acknowledging that salaries, especially significant salaries of senior executives, have been exempt. It would seem to me, and I do not want to comment on the size of the salaries or the stock options, the perks or whatever, that a lot of senior executives probably deserve more than they are making. Perhaps some of them deserve less. Those are privately held opinions as often citizens hold about members of Parliament as to whether their salaries are adequate, overadequate or under, or whatever.

Since the incomes of those senior executives have a direct relationship with the profitability of the company and with the dividends that are paid and so on and presumably in the end the value of the stock that it would be in the positive interests of that business if those things were revealed. A prospective shareholder then would not be made aware of only part of the financial information it needs but would have all of the financial information. I believe that is correct.

In the case of crown corporations naturally the fiduciary responsibility is to the people of Canada, to the citizens. It seems to me that they are as entitled to that kind of information as are private shareholders in companies.

It is for those reasons that I rise in wholehearted support. I hope this goes ahead and the thrust of this motion prompts us to adopt legislation that will bring us into line at least with other countries we compete with around the world because it will be good for our business and good for investment in this country.

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak on the motion put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James respecting the principle of public disclosure of salaries of senior executives of publicly traded private corporations and crown corporations.

Unfortunately because of time I do not think I am going to get through my whole presentation but I thank my hon. colleague for sharing the time.

The issue as it relates to provisions of the Canada Business Corporations Act rests mainly with my colleague, the Minister of Industry.

[Translation]

For Crown corporations the government has a more direct responsibility because of the public policy purposes these corporations serve and has a strong interest in ensuring appropriate compensation levels.

[English]

The subject of salary disclosure of executives in Canada's corporate world has always been one of great debate and great importance. Our government has traditionally attempted to balance the right of the public to access information concerning both public and private institutions against the rights of individuals to privacy.

Disclosure rules in the private sector for publicly traded corporations reflect an increasing desire on the part of investors and creditors to exercise their corporate governance rights and responsibilities in ways that ensure that compensation packages to management harmonize to the degree possible with the interests of the shareholder. Compensation should reflect corporate performance and industry standards.

Provincial securities legislation deals with disclosure rules for public companies. For example, Canadian companies which do or may file debt securities which trade under the Ontario Securities Commission jurisdiction are required to file information on executive compensation for the presidents of the companies and the four most highly compensated officers. These rules appear to be well designed to meet the needs of private investors and creditors. They provide assurance and accountability.

Disclosure of compensation for CEOs and chairpersons establish a reasonable and welcome degree of public transparency concerning corporate affairs for some of Canada's most important corporate bodies whose shares trade on the open market.

Sound corporate governance for crown corporations continue to be a matter of concern to this government. This past October the President of the Treasury Board hosted a conference of chairpersons and CEOs of crown corporations to discuss ways of improving the performance and accountability of crown corporation boards.

I think it is fair to say that all crown corporations represented displayed sensitivity to the public's changing expectations concerning the responsibilities of corporate boards. This sensitivity extends to the development of appropriate compensation policies for corporate employees.

In recent years a number of studies in the area of corporate governance, including the report prepared by Mr. Peter Dey for the Toronto Stock Exchange, have addressed the changing role of the board of directors.

Crown corporation boards face difficult challenges complicated by the need to balance the corporate agenda with the public policy agenda. They also face problems similar to those in the private sector such as ensuring open communication programs with shareholders, stakeholders and other affected parties, and that includes the taxpayers of Canada.

In the Dey report there is a particularly challenging concept of a modern business corporation put forward by the Canadian Centre for Ethics and Corporate Policy. The centre sees "the modern corporation as both an economic institution and a social institution". The role of the "economic institution" is "to conduct affairs with activities with a view to enhancing profit for the benefit of the shareholders". This of course is the traditional role.

However, I think we can go further and say that "as a social institution a corporation in the conduct of its business activities must take into account those ethical principles and considerations that are reasonably regarded as appropriate for the responsible conduct of business" in Canada. This expands the traditional view and puts the onus on boards of directors to become accountable for much more than only the bottom line on a set of financial statements.

Crown corporations by their very nature have always had to consider the public policy principles and considerations to a much greater degree of public scrutiny than private sector corporations.

Furthermore, the Treasury Board secretariat continually reviews corporate government issues as they relate to federal crown corporations. The review of annual corporate plans and budgets, including salary budgets, is one aspect of their work. In addition, much information on crown corporations is now publicly available.

Hon. members are probably aware that for crown corporations, directors, chairpersons and chief executive officers, these are appointed by order in council and have their remuneration fixed by the governor in council. Salary ranges for these appointees are in fact now very much public information. The practice has been to provide easy access to information concerning the salary range of a particular person. This protects the privacy of the individual concerned, especially with respect to exact salary, while allowing the public to have access to significant information. Similarly, the salary schedules of senior appointments to federal agencies and commissions are publicly available.

Crown corporations seeking to issue debt instruments follow rules established by respective provincial securities commissions. They too are subject to disclosure requirements as are their counterparts in the private sector.

With respect to the current public sector wage freeze, all crown corporations have been asked to follow government policy. Order in council appointments such as board chairs have had their wages frozen. Senior crown corporation officials who are not government appointees have had their compensations set by the boards of directors of their corporations. Crown corporations subject to access to information or privacy legislation can be required to provide salary ranges and discretionary benefits of a financial nature for these officials.

The Financial Administration Act requires as well that any benefits other than remuneration paid to directors, chair or chief executive officers shall be fixed by the board of directors in accordance with the regulations made under this act. The regulations require that these benefits do not exceed any industry norm.

I would like to emphasize that federal crown corporations are subject to more stringent accountability and control rules than are publicly traded corporations.

The Financial Administration Act, part X, sections 83 to 154, establishes very thorough and comprehensive reporting requirements. This law requires corporations to submit annual corporate plans and budgets to Treasury Board for approval.

Corporations must conduct internal audits as well as being audited externally. In most cases, external audits are undertaken by the Auditor General who is empowered to make special reports on the matters he believes require the attention of ministers and Parliament.

In addition, crown corporations under part X must undergo a special examination at least once every five years. These examinations are established to ensure that systems and practices respecting financial and management controls are maintained in order to provide assurance that the resources of the corporation are being managed effectively and efficiently.

How much more disclosure is reasonable for other crown corporation executives? Is there a further need to add more rules for Canada's 48 crown corporations? Should smaller corporations which do not issue debt instruments and have only a handful of employees be treated in the same manner as a larger corporation? It would be premature to go beyond what we now have in the area of salary information reporting by crown corporations. Public accountability for crown corporations is now well and adequately established under a sufficiently rigorous statutory and regulatory framework.

The corporate form together with this framework has served Canadians well. In the 1993 report to Parliament, the Auditor General of Canada stated:

> In 1991, we reported that the control and accountability framework established in 1984 represented a vast improvement over the previous situation and provided for greater vigilance and stability. It has, in our view, improved the management of crown corporations as well as the receipt of essential information by Parliament on a more timely basis.

The government will continue to monitor this system to ensure its effective functioning and make whatever amendments are needed.

The Deputy Speaker: Under Standing Order 44, the member who began the debate is entitled to approximately two minutes in which he might close the debate.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to use up the whole two minutes.

In closing off the debate I want to express my sincere thanks to all the members who participated in the debate. I want them to know that I really appreciated their participation and contribution.

Tonight's debate, even though we did not have a vote, indicates that there is an interest, there are different points of view and we should not let this debate go. Perhaps we can pick it up again under some other format at some other time.

The public is interested and they too would not want us to let this go. It is a matter of importance to all of us. We in Parliament truly believe in transparency, openness and disclosure whether it applies to crown corporations or private sector corporations.

Again, I want to thank all those members of the House who took part in tonight's debate.

The Deputy Speaker: The time provided for Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96, the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

NORTHERN TAX ALLOWANCE

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to again raise the issue of the northern tax allowance, a matter that I and my constituents have expressed concern about for many years. This was an issue that concerned my constituents and other Canadians during my first election campaign in 1988. It was an issue that the Mulroney government completely misunderstood and in responding to the complaints raised it made the situation worse.

I have always seen the northern tax benefit program as a simple acknowledgement that not all taxpayers in Canada have equal access to the programs and services to which they contribute as taxpayers. Northern residents live at a considerable distance from the majority of federal government services and the northern tax program provided them with some relief on their income tax as a result.

For example, an individual living in Pierceland, Saskatchewan has less access to federal government programs and services than does an individual living in Saskatoon. Therefore, it seemed the right thing to do when the original tax benefit program was initiated and brought into being.

However, there were problems in its implementation. Some communities achieved northern benefit status and others did not. There were arguments about why the residents in one community received benefits while residents in another did not. Instead of reviewing the criteria for the program and finding ways to increase its fairness, the Mulroney government appointed a special task force which reported to Parliament in October 1989.

The task force recommended that instead of fixing the problems the federal government should simply move the eligibility line so far north that few communities would argue about where the line was drawn. In other words, the task force recommendation walked away from the problem, took the easy way out and completely ignored the needs and desires of the people who were living in the area previously defined for eligibility.

According to the Mulroney government, which accepted the task force recommendations, the people who were receiving the benefits would be best served if they lost those benefits, not all at once but slowly, phased out over three years.

Despite their protests, these residents will see the end of the northern tax allowance this year. When taxes for 1994 are calculated and the benefit taken into account, that will be it. In 1995 these hard working Canadians will lose their benefits.

As a result it also means that each and every one of these tax paying families will see a dramatic increase in their tax bill beginning in the 1995 tax year. At the time of the task force report, I said it did nothing but address the cash grab needs of the federal government and completely ignored the needs of the people who live in the areas designated to receive the benefits.

I acknowledged the unfairness of the existing program, but I suggested that a review and some new criteria would be better than completely removing the benefits from so many tax paying residents.

Although the Liberal government since its election one year ago has refused to review the northern tax allowance program at my request, I decided last week to try once again so that in the development of the 1995 budget the government might consider reinstating the program to ensure that additional tax increases are not going to be unfairly forced on northern residents.

I was pleased to learn there is the possibility of a review. I hope the government will again tonight confirm that it is going to look at this program and give the residents of a part of my constituency and other northerners some reason to be optimistic.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has asked that the government reconsider the phasing out of the tax benefits for residents of the north and isolated areas.

I would first like to clarify that the program is not being eliminated at the end of this year. Rather, a new approach to providing benefits to residents of the north was implemented at the beginning of 1991.

This new system was accompanied by a transition period ending this year for those communities whose benefits were being reduced or eliminated. I can appreciate that some individuals living in communities no longer eligible for some or all of the benefits might oppose these changes.

However, after reviewing the events that led to the implementation of the current system, I believe that the zonal approach is the right one. The current system was the result of a comprehensive study. It was implemented on the basis of the recommendations of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas established in 1988 and of further consultations as well.

The previous community by community approach to allocating benefits was widely criticized as inherently unfair because it created border problems between adjacent communities that were treated differently for tax purposes.

The existence of ill–defined boundaries made inequities inevitable. The new system is based on carefully delineated broad zones and it minimizes inequities. I believe that the current policy will prove to be fairer, simpler and more effective than any of its predecessors, providing tax assistance to residents of northern and isolated areas.

CRTC

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I asked a single question of the Minister of Canadian Heritage during question period on Friday, November 25.

I asked the minister to explain why cabinet had decided to order a review of the CRTC exemption order on direct home satellites. Even though cabinet had made its decision for the review, even though cabinet had directed the details of the review to be gazetted, even though cabinet had decided who would conduct the review and who would be on its advisory council, even though cabinet had decided that the CRTC would not be the body to conduct the review, the minister refused to answer the simple question I posed.

I was aware of the details concerning the review. Surely the minister was informed so he could respond to my question. It is unfortunate that he could not explain the reasons supporting this decision. The decision had been made on Tuesday and yet three days later, on Friday, he still refused to explain fully to Canadians the basis of the decision and why it was made.

Telecommunications policy in Canada is rapidly being outpaced by the developments that are being made in the industry. Technological convergence is occurring at an exponentially increasing rate and the government must recognize that it can no longer adequately regulate the industry while providing fair treatment.

Competitive fairness is what this issue is about. The Reform Party does not oppose the idea of a review of the direct to home satellite distribution policy. We encourage such a review. However, we must ensure at all times that this review like all matters of government is dealt with fairly.

In order to maximize the level of fairness the process should be as unbiased as possible while still securing a high level of competency. At no time has it been suggested that competent people should be excluded from making contributions to the debate. However, we must ensure that no one interest is given more weight or is seen as being given more weight than any other.

The cabinet also decided to appoint three members from private industry to advise it on the decision. First, I would like to know the criteria for the selection process. Second, how much will this six month process cost? Third, how much are these advisers to be paid? Fourth and last, what exactly is their role?

It is not even clear why the government needs advisers on this issue. Surely there are competent people within heritage, industry, and the CRTC who understand how DTH policy will affect both the industry and Canadian culture.

As well, the review calls for interventions from the public and then it allows for comments on the interventions. Without advisers the only one who could influence the process would be the minister. However, if the minister wants an independent review of DTH policy and how it affects Canadian culture, then he should either let the CRTC do it or give it over completely to an independent public panel where there will be no undue influence.

In conclusion, I support the review of this policy. It is important that we ensure government regulations accurately reflect the needs of the industry and allow for all interested parties to compete on a level playing field.

Unfortunately, the minister's in house review with advisers who many in the industry believe will favour one company over another cannot accomplish these goals unless he makes it non–partisan. No matter what decision results from the review it will be viewed with skepticism from the industry because it will appear to have been influenced. The only way to ensure a quality review is to overhaul the process before it begins.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Industry and the Minister of Canadian Heritage have launched a review of policies relating to direct to home satellite distribution undertakings because of the impact these new services will have on Canada's broadcasting and telecommunications system.

The new generation of direct to home satellites combine the use of high powered satellites, digital technology and small dish receivers to provide up to 200 channels of broadcasting and other services.

Some of these systems are operating now in the United States and there are plans to have Canadian direct to home systems in the near future. However, if Canadian systems are not competitive with the U.S. systems, then Canadians may choose to get their TV direct from American suppliers which have no requirement to offer any Canadian programming at all.

On August 30 the CRTC exempted Canadian direct to home undertakings from licensing provided that they meet a number of criteria. Some of these criteria limit the ability of the Canadian direct to home undertakings to compete with cable systems and with American direct to home undertakings.

On September 12 the Ministers of Industry and Canadian Heritage announced their intention to review policies governing direct to home undertakings. There is in no way an overruling of the CRTC decision. The CRTC has enunciated its views on how it would issue such orders in the future.

A notice was published in the Canada Gazette on November 26 seeking public comment on a range of policy issues raised by the introduction of direct to home satellite undertakings in Canada.

Issues to be examined include competition, Canadian content, programming distribution rights, and the use of Canadian satellite facilities among other concerns. In addition, as the member recognized, the Ministers of Industry and Canadian Heritage have announced Gordon Ritchie, Roger Tassé and Bob Rabinovitch as the panel who will review submissions and make recommendations which will assist the government in formulating policy in this area.

Although some have argued that the matter should have been referred to the CRTC, it is the government's responsibility to establish policy and the CRTC's job to implement it.

The introduction of direct to home systems will have an impact on individual Canadians and on a range of industries. Concerns have been brought to the government's attention from a number of sources on this issue. We intend to balance the interests of all parties and consider the best interests of the Canadian public in formulating policy in this area.

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 38 the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

COMMEMORATION OF BIRTHPLACE OF CONFEDERATION ACT

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–292, an act to commemorate the birthplace of Confederation.

He said: Madam Speaker, as you probably know, this bill has been a project of mine for the last number of years. The purpose of the bill is to allow the Minister of Canadian Heritage to erect plaques or set up museums to mark Charlottetown as the birthplace of Confederation.

In 1864 the Fathers of Confederation met in Charlottetown and laid the foundation for this great country. A few years ago the House passed my motion recognizing Charlottetown as the birthplace of Confederation. The time has come for the federal government to act on that recognition.

This bill provides the government with the authority to act. I urge all members in the House to support the commemoration of this great historical event.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–46, an act to establish the Department of Industry and to amend and repeal certain other acts, as reported (with amendments) from the committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): We have a ruling on Bill C–46, an act to establish the Department of Industry and to amend and repeal certain other acts. There are 10 motions in amendment standing on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C–46, an act to establish the Department of Industry and to amend and repeal certain other acts.

Motions Nos. 9 and 10 will be debated and voted upon separately.

I will now call Motion No. 1.

MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C–46, in Clause 4, be amended by replacing line 13, on page 2, with the following:

"(h) patents, trade–marks, indus–".

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Madam Speaker, the debate in which I am taking part today is of the utmost interest for the entire Canadian artistic community. If the government were to show some open–mindedness, it could give a great deal of hope to creators working in the cultural industry.

On November 16, 1993, exactly two weeks after the federal election, the Coalition of Creators and Copyright Owners published an open letter in Le Devoir addressed to the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

It pointed out, and I quote:

> Honourable Sir, the books, recordings, films, radio and television broadcasts, paintings, sculpture, photographs, choreography and works of entertainment produced by the 30,000 creators, artists and other eligible Quebecers belonging to the Coalition of Creators and Copyright Owners are everywhere. Both the creators and the public are happy with this situation. However, in the absence of adequate legislation, creators' fundamental rights are still not being recognized and new reproduction and distribution technologies are depriving them of the revenues that the use of their works should generate.
> You undoubtedly realize, Sir, that in order to be able to create new works, creators must earn their living from what they produce. Only the Copyright Act can ensure the legal basis for fair remuneration for the work of creators.

The Minister of Heritage had promised to take prompt action. But one year later, creators are still waiting for legislation that would recognize their right over their work. Why is this? There are those who tell us that the answer to this question lies in the fact that two departments share the responsibility for the question of copyright. These departments are the Department of Industry to be established under Bill C–46 and the Department of Canadian Heritage that will eventually be established under Bill C–53.

We now come to the heart of the debate. According to Clause 5 of Bill C–46, one of the duties assigned to the Minister of Industry will be to defend consumers and large corporations. The rights of artists and workers in general are not even mentioned in this bill. As a result, this department would have a hard time recognizing the rights of creators on their works, as these rights are in direct conflict with those of consumers and large corporations.

The heritage department has a moral right to look into the matter. It is, after all, recognized as the primary stakeholder in cultural matters. About 10 people work on these issues on its behalf. However, these officials have no powers; they can only try to influence their colleagues from Industry. That can be a very frustrating experience.

We now come to the second issue, copyright, which comes under two departments defending diametrically opposed interests and is stuck in its turn–of–the–century version.

The review of the act, announced with great pomp on many occasions, is getting nowhere, simply because of differences of opinion between the departments involved. The Union des artistes, for one, wrote in its December 23, 1993 letter to the Prime Minister that dividing responsibilities between the heritage department and Consumer and Corporate Affairs Canada, which had jurisdiction over copyright before reorganization, "stood in the way of harmonious legislative reform —This division of responsibilities has led to a dual vision, which more often than not results in conflicting objectives".

What the creative artists ask for is a strengthening of their first claim on their rights to their work and thus their right to negotiate the use made of these works. For example, the coalition of creative artists and copyright holders says that their rights should be protected as much as those of drug patent holders. In a press release from the coalition, Jean–Claude Germain said that the least a healthy society which is proud of its culture could do would be to protect its creative artists as well as it protects its drug manufacturers.

Briefly, this is what the creative artists are asking for. They want recognition of neighbouring rights, that is, the rights of performers to reproduce and present their works. They want recognition of consequential rights, namely the visual artist's right to a percentage of any profit made on his or her work. They want recognition of equal duration of protection, that is, for all types of works, copyright would be recognized for at least 50 years after the artist's death. They also want a law that is technologically neutral, that is, one that will apply regardless of technological developments.

They want fees to be paid on their private copies, that is, royalties on media which can be privately copied such as diskettes, tapes, videocassettes and cassettes. They want rental rights, that is, a royalty on all works protected by law. Finally, they want appropriate recourse and adequate penalties for those who break the law.

For ten years, the cultural communities in Canada and Quebec have been demanding these straightforward changes to the Copyright Act. They are unanimous on this, but have been unsuccessful. It is therefore urgent to act; the survival of Canadian and Quebec culture is at stake. It is urgent to give our artists the ability to earn a living from what they produce, because without culture, a country has no life, no colour and no future.

The purpose of the amendment moved today by my colleague from Richmond—Wolfe is to make Canada and Quebec full–fledged players in this new global economy, which is no longer based on trade in goods but rather on quality of thinking, artistic value, imagination and open–mindedness. Our artists are ready and able to meet the challenge. Denying them the means to do so is not the way to ensure their survival.

[English]

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Madam Speaker, as I listened to the member from Quebec City I must say I share all of her concerns. Coming from a riding where the cultural community for people who are employed in cultural industries represents the greatest number of people employed I am extremely sensitive to this issue. I do not want you to think, Madam Speaker, that this is a community that I do not care for or am insensitive to. I depend a lot on the views and feelings they provide me in the direction I take.

The member for Québec said that the fundamental rights of the artistic community were being threatened by the positioning in the Department of Industry.

Historically copyright was with the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs which is now part of Industry Canada. From a historical sense we are being fairly consistent but I think the member for Quebec mentioned a more important thing, the strengthening of the role of the creator. I believe that we are doing that. First of all, we have to realize that this is a joint relationship between Heritage Canada and Industry Canada.

Copyright does not deal exclusively with cultural aspects. On the international level, it is a business issue that impacts on revenues, investment, job creation, innovation, piracy, theft, non–tariff barrier concerns, many of the things that the member talked about in her remarks.

As a government we believe that the Department of Industry, especially with all the new technologies, with the information highway, the concerns that we have for protection, is best equipped to meet those concerns and those needs of the artists.

In light of all of that and the balancing of the concerns, we cannot accept this amendment.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the amendment that is being proposed in effect deletes the provision of the minister that the Department of Industry deal with copyright. It is really intended to bring that over to another department.

The issue that has just been made by the hon. member opposite is a very accurate statement, that we need to recognize that the whole area of creator's rights and the business of intellectual property ought to be identified. It is not strictly a matter of heritage, history or things of that sort but is rapidly developing and rapidly changing in our economy in Canada today. We need to recognize that in the area of patents and trademarks of those sorts of things are no less the property of people who use their minds and who use their knowledge to develop particular ideas as much as other kinds of property.

We are moving today into a knowledge economy which is not only a business of making things and of moving people. It is a matter of ideas. It is a matter of innovations. It is a matter of applying these in the right way.

It seems to me that there may be some interest here. In other departments, it is with regard to specific content but in terms of the ownership of certain sorts of things we need to recognize that this is included here in the old traditional way of talking about copyright.

We are really talking about much more than the initial intent of copyright. We are talking about intellectual property. The matter should not be taken out of this clause at this time.

Therefore I think the Reform Party would suggest that colleagues not support this amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to speak to Bill C–46 on behalf of the Official Opposition, as its critic on regional development.

There are at least two major elements at stake in this bill to establish the Department of Industry. The first one concerns jurisdiction over regional development, while the second one has to do with whether or not duplication will be perpetuated in government management.

At report stage of Bill C–46, an Act to establish the Department of Industry, the Bloc Quebecois proposes that clauses 8, 9 and 10 be amended by inserting, at line 21 in clause 8, line 21 in clause 9, and line 36 in clause 10, the following: "With the approval of the Lieutenant–Governor in Council of Quebec when it is a field related to regional development in Quebec —"

What does that mean? It means that the federal government does not have jurisdiction over regional development in Quebec and that the province is the only one with the authority to define policies and set up structures in that field.

• (1030)

The constitutional coup against Quebec represented by the Constitutional Act dated November 5, 1981, to which Quebec never subscribed in spite of the fact that it represents one quarter of the Canadian population, allowed the federal government, by claiming it had jurisdiction regarding regional disparity, to give itself unlimited spending power and therefore also give itself every power concerning regional development.

The 1982 unilateral patriation of the Constitution is federal interference in Quebec's regional development since, as you all know, regional economic development is not a jurisdiction included in the 1867 Constitution.

Bill C–46 is a logical follow–up to the Constitutional deal which was struck in November 1981. It is part of the plan of the Liberal Party of Canada to isolate Quebec, to direct the economic development of Quebecers and to deny their distinct identity by making Quebec's development contingent on federal regional development policies.

In Bill C–46, the government has irresponsibly chosen to ignore Quebec's regional development policies and structures. Unconcerned about duplication, although the party in power, the Liberal Party, admits duplication exists because it wants to eliminate duplication and overlap, in this case they have made it abundantly clear that they want to preserve this duplication by refusing to recognize Quebec's sole responsibility for regional development. They prefer to ignore existing duplication and overlap just as they prefer to ignore the wasteful spending of public funds. The Minister of Industry and his Liberal colleagues want to increase their interventions in Quebec through this bill.

In section 9(1)(a) and (b) it says that the Minister of Industry, and I quote:

> —with respect to regional economic development in Quebec,
> *(a)*in co–operation with other concerned ministers and boards and agencies of the Government of Canada, formulate and implement policies, plans and integrated federal approaches;
> *(b)*co–ordinate the policies and programs of the Government of Canada;

I think we can clearly interpret this as a full scale invasion of regional development in Quebec and a federal takeover of development and policies in this area.

However, the government party must realize that for decades, Quebec has had regional development programs that were far more effective than federal intervention has ever been in this area.

The federal Liberal government, with its two–fold obsession with developing the industrial centres of Quebec's metropolitan areas while ignoring the rest of the province, and with spreading the federal, centralist gospel right and left, without any policies for co–ordinating the interests of those concerned, has often acted in ways that have proved disastrous for Quebec's peripheral regions.

Madam Speaker, in this House I had an opportunity to refer to an impact study of federal regional intervention policies in Quebec, policies that, because of this intervention focussed on large urban centres, have had a devastating effect in the regions, since we now see that peripheral regions throughout Quebec have lost their young people and experienced a decline in population.

In its second report, the Conseil des affaires sociales du Québec pointed out that the situation was disastrous in all Quebec's peripheral regions. The number of municipalities and peripheral regions where the population has declined increased to an alarming extent between 1971 and 1988, when federal intervention in regional development was at its peak—in other words, the better part of the period when the Liberals were in power in Ottawa—so that today, they outnumber communities experiencing population increases. Young people are the first to leave their regions for the big urban centres.

That is the result of the federal regional development policy. In the Gaspé, the Magdalen Islands and other rural areas of Quebec, solidarity movements have sprung up to restore hope to local communities and begin work on comprehensive, integrated development. They include, among others, Coalition urgence rurale, Ralliement des Gaspésiens et des Madelinots and Rural Solidarity. The numbers and types of development partnerships are increasing.

Businesses, unions, local authorities, and the co–operative movement no longer hesitate to take charge of their own development. These players have sought, when appearing before forums such as the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, to promote the idea that, for instance, control of economic development levers must rest with Quebec and that decision–making powers must be decentralized, and to obtain a consensus in this regard. The major consensus that has emerged fits in with regional development in Quebec, and there is growing consensus that the federal government should be told clearly to withdraw from regional development, an area in which it does not belong.

As I have already mentioned, regional development is not a separate area of responsibility in the Canadian Constitution, thus forcing Quebec to take part in unending and fruitless negotiations such as those involving the regional economic development agreements. Bill C–46 confirms the federal government's determination to take over regional development in Quebec.

It also points up the stupidity and waste of such an insistence on interfering, which leads to still more duplication and overlap. Let me give an example. Under section 9(1)(b), the Minister of Industry, through the responsible minister in the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, shall collect, compile, analyse, coordinate and disseminate information with respect to regional economic development in Quebec, thus enabling the federal agency to undertake a series of studies and analyses with the purpose of defining socio–economic profiles for each region of Quebec.

Studies released by the FORDQ in November, a few weeks ago, studies that were a total waste of time and which were conducted on a region–by–region basis in Quebec, are examples of a monumental waste of money and energy, because it so happens that Quebec has produced its own studies and analyses on each region of the province this past year, in preparation for regional strategic development plans. I have perused the studies released by the office and noticed that the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec had wasted money, using the same statistics and reaching the same conclusions, region by region.

Since such studies cost money, this confirms that this government is ignoring what Quebec does in that area and spends money needlessly on duplicating studies that have already been done. To conclude, the federal government must withdraw from regional development and recognize that Quebec only has jurisdiction over economic development on its territory. That is what our amendment, the Official Opposition amendment, is about.

[English]

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to enter the debate at this time. If I understand correctly procedurally we are debating Motions Nos. 2 to 8. Is that correct?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): That is right. We are debating on the group of motions. Since you are one of the proposers you can have the floor.

Mr. Schmidt: Madam Speaker, I will address very briefly the particular motion that was just presented. I will put my interventions primarily in terms of our reasons for presenting the motions we wish the bill be amended to meet. I would like to focus and couch my remarks in terms of three principles.

• (1040)

First, there ought to be within legislation checks and balances to ensure openness, honesty and integrity on the part of government and on the part of the ministers who bring about the implementation of government policies.

Second, it is the marketplace that should determine winners and losers in business, not government.

Third, the government's role is to provide a level playing field so that competition can be equal, that there be fair administration and that the refereeing be done in such a way that the conduct of manufacturing, trade and commerce is in fact fair and equitable.

The result of these kinds of principles would be to develop confidence in business and government and of course in oneself. It would enhance international competitiveness for the nation and for individual businesses. Another consequence is the ability to meet the challenge of a new economy which is so necessary.

The Department of Industry is a major and very important department in this government. It has a wide ranging impact on the economy of this country and indeed on the jobs and on the welfare of many Canadians at all age levels. It is important that we recognize the significance of this department.

This legislation enshrines and should enshrine in this department as much scrutiny as possible so that we can determine precisely what is or is not meant in the particular clauses. This is why I wish to address these particular motions whereby we want to bring about certain amendments.

I wish to start with the amendment to clause 8(a). Our amendment proposes that clause 8(a) be deleted. Now clause 8(a) reads that the minister shall: "promote economic development in areas of Ontario and Quebec where low incomes and slow economic growth are prevalent or where opportunities for productive employment are inadequate".

The reason we would like to see that stricken from the clause is that in principle we object to the idea of regional development for a minister who has responsibility for all of Canada. There is a conflict of interest here in principle to begin with. One should not prefer one region of the country over another. Certainly that is implicit in this kind of provision.

Regional programs have proven to be preferential and the way in which certain pork barrelling projects have been created, many of them questionable and sometimes with disastrous results. The government being engaged in these types of things separates regions in one area of the country from another. That in itself is disunifying. It divides the country rather than brings it together, which is what we want to do. I personally and the Reform Party want to bring about equality rather than divisiveness. In order to accomplish that the provision in the act found in clause 8(a) needs to be taken away.

With respect to clause 9, our proposal is to delete the clause completely. That of course is the administrative, or if you like, the empowerment section which gives the minister the way in which he or she would implement the provisions found in clause 8(a). By eliminating that clause the minister would not have the authority to go into regional development specifically in Ontario and Quebec.

Our amendment with respect to clause 10 is simply an administrative one. If we eliminate clause 8(a) and we eliminate clause 9, then of course we have to make the consequential change in clause 10.

There is a confusion in the provisions of clauses 8(b) and 8(c). Upon initial reading it would appear that they would apply to clause 8(a) in terms of Ontario and Quebec. But upon a more detailed reading and in an in depth situation they could be interpreted as applying to all of Canada. In that case the situation is such that the minister may now have full responsibility for the economic development in areas where there is low income or where jobs are not plentiful. He can then intervene in the particular business promotion in any area of Quebec.

Because of its lack of clarity it is suggested that this be rewritten in such a way that misinterpretation cannot take place. If clause 8(a) is deleted then the clarification becomes unnecessary because it is then obvious.

To conclude my remarks on these motions, this section on regional development does not uphold the three principles which I mentioned earlier. It does not inspire Canadians to feel that their government is open, honest and possessed of great amounts of integrity. It does not provide for a level playing field in the marketplace and it does not provide for a clearly refereed game.

It does not allow the marketplace to determine the outcome. In other words, it gives to the government and to the minister, in particular, the power to intervene and to determine who wins and who loses. Because these principles are not observed we must recognize that we should go ahead with these. I hope that all colleagues will recognize that certain changes to the act must be made.

I would like to add a brief word about the Bloc's amendment. If clauses 8(b) and 8(c) are interpreted to give to the minister the wide–ranging powers for all of Canada, to accept an amendment such as was proposed by the Bloc a moment ago would give to the lieutenant–governor in council in Quebec the right to approve or disapprove economic development in the rest of Canada which, as far as I am concerned, warrants only one word to describe it, and that is ridiculous.

We have to be very careful that we not divide the country. We have enough stress already and to do something like this adds to that stress. If there is one thing we want to do it is to build a strong Canada that is competitive in the world, a Canada that provides for the innovation of people, that provides for a level playing field, that allows the creativity of entrepreneurs and creators at all levels to succeed, and to do so in fair competition with other individuals across Canada. No one province, no one individual should have the authority to decide who wins, who loses, other than on a fair playing field where the referee is honest, has integrity, is open and where the things that matter come to the fore.

Therefore, I urge that the Bloc's amendments be defeated and that the Reform Party's amendments be supported.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to begin by addressing the remarks that were presented earlier by my colleague from Richmond—Wolfe.

His remark that the federal government has no jurisdiction in Quebec represents a difference that I have with him, one that probably represents the single biggest reason why I decided to run for public office.

I had the privilege and pleasure of working for the man who I think was the greatest Prime Minister this country every had, Pierre Elliot Trudeau. I believe that Pierre Trudeau and his vision of this country, his feeling about making sure we had a strong national government that would make sure we had national programs that would allow us to develop a national spirit, a national will that would pull us together. He also wanted a government that was designed to make sure that when regional disadvantages occurred, the national government had the capacity and the instruments to help those people in regionally disadvantaged areas.

My colleague from Richmond—Wolfe says that the federal government has no jurisdiction in Quebec. Let us imagine that every provincial premier or every provincial political party took that position. That was the essence of the Meech Lake accord which is why I opposed it.

For the Bloc Quebecois to expect the government to support an amendment which essentially states that the federal government has no jurisdiction in Quebec is just not on. I believe that a majority of Quebecers would not support it either.

I accept the constructive remarks of the hon. member for Richmond—Wolfe about the fact that we have to be more efficient. We have to reduce some of the overlapping that goes on between the federal–provincial programs so we can better provide services for the people of his community, his province, as we want to do for the people in northern Ontario or Atlantic Canada or western Canada. I agree with him on that. The purpose of this bill is to redesign this department so it can become more efficient and address those concerns.

However, to go to a position where the federal government has no jurisdiction in Quebec, no jurisdiction when it comes to looking out for small and medium sized businessmen and women, no jurisdiction on retraining, no jurisdiction in special projects is not my position. From time to time we may need to use extraordinary powers to assist and promote special projects in Quebec and that is what this bill allows the government to do.

I am in this Chamber because I believe more than ever we need a strong national government. We do not need a government that is gutted. We do not need a government that is decentralized to the point where we no longer have the capacity to handle a difficult economic environment. Therefore I say respectfully there is no way we can accept this amendment from the Bloc Quebecois.

I turn now to my colleagues in the Reform Party, who I should add are in accordance with our view of making sure that we have a strong national government. They have recognized that. This is not in any way, shape or form isolating Quebec. I get very concerned when the Bloc all of a sudden thinks that we are trying to isolate them. We are trying to do the exact opposite. We are trying to make sure that all Quebecers, all Canadians, interact and exchange with each other on the total resources of this country, not just part of it.

Reform members have a very difficult time with some of our regional instruments like the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency and the western diversification instrument of government. In every high risk situation it is normal and historical, whether in business or in government, that from time to time mistakes are made and there are failures. It happens in business—

Mr. Hermanson: Especially when government is involved.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I am trying to make my point. I think—

Mr. Hermanson: Who pays? The taxpayer pays.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I am going to tell you who pays.

The essence of this country is those communities that are stronger, that are richer—I come from a city which is strong and rich but right now it is in economic difficulty. It is the city of Toronto. I know that my community, my city is having a very difficult time—believe that we must make sure that communities that are more disadvantaged are looked after properly and effectively by the national government.

I believe that ACOA and the western diversification fund are doing a very good job. For those reasons we will not support the Reform Party's amendments.

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member who spoke before me for recognizing his government's clear identification of the need for a strong central government with an unshakeable desire to impose its will. Such a federal government, as proposed in the Meech and Charlottetown accords, was rejected not by a minority but by the majority of Quebecers, including federalists unhappy with the status quo.

I rise today in this debate on Bill C–46 so that some key amendments will be made to Clauses 8, 9 and 10 to make them acceptable. As I explained at length on October 17 during debate at second reading, I am against this bill as it stands because it does not recognize Quebec's jurisdiction over its regional development.

Granted, regional development is a complex issue. Identifying the regions to be developed is a major challenge in itself, all the more so if we try to do it from afar, without knowing each region's particularities.

This federal tactic of trying to develop regions by centralizing policy–making is not new and was not always successful. As early as September 1982, the Senate Committee on National Finance said this in a report: "Designating the least developed regions for special status to ensure that regional disparities are not forgotten is not an easy task. As DREE discovered, a political system generates enormous pressures to extend the boundaries of programs that generate cash flow. As a result, DREE ended up including more than half the geographic area of the country in the designated areas, and the purpose became hopelessly diluted".

Why these lamentable effects? Quite simply because the federal government is unable to understand that, with general policies, it cannot meet the specific needs of each province, much less the specific needs of each region.

It is utopian to pass a bill at the national level to meet particular local objectives. Instead, we need legislation that is appropriate to the development of the province concerned, with the flexibility to respond to regional requirements.

Quebecers see their needs for regional development very differently depending on which region they live in. I suppose that is why previous legislation created different development agencies for western Canada and for the Maritimes. That is why we believe that Bill C–46 must be related to Quebec's regional particularities and to Ontario's as well.

The need to develop a region is often related to its unemployment level. Unemployment is higher or lower in some regions for various reasons. For example, high unemployment may be due to lack of education in a region and the solution will be to train the workers there.

A second possible reason for the lack of jobs is a shortage of capital to modernize industry. This can be corrected by investing in industrial or tourism infrastructure.

A third possibility is lack of natural resources, for example, over–exploitation of forests in the past. This is what happened in my region and it must be corrected by diversification to stabilize regional development.

However, the solutions are sometimes hard to find. For example, take the price of metals on the international market. For example, if the price of copper drops, this reduces employment in the affected mining region, but the solution is not to keep mines open at all cost.

How can we protect or develop a region where companies have a harder time to survive in the context of international free trade? For example, in the case of Montreal's textile industry, the solution could be found by that industry and its workers, with the help of regional development consultants.

These examples show that, for optimum results, solutions to regional development issues must be found in the region itself. This is why we insist that federal bills reflect a will to co-operate with the provinces.

Quebec developed its development tools and these tools are close to the stakeholders. Consequently, we feel that the federal government should also adopt this cost-effective approach, by increasing development tools instead of reducing them.

Lines 21, 22 and 23 of Clause 8, on page 4 could provide a good example of efficient co-operation between the federal government and the provinces. That clause currently reads as follows: "The Minister shall exercise the powers and perform the duties and functions assigned by subsection 4(2) in a manner that will—", but it should say: "With the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council of Quebec"—we could also say Ontario, since this bill concerns both provinces—"when it is a field related to regional development in Quebec, the Minister shall exercise the powers and perform the duties and functions assigned by subsection 4(2) in a manner that will—".

We want to link regional development to the power of Quebec to decide and the power of regions to select priorities. The amendment to clause 8 is intended to reflect respect for the strategic development plans of the regions in Quebec and should apply to all regions in Canada. We have had enough of this competing by various levels of government at the expense of the regions, because we want to eliminate waste and inefficiencies.

In my own region, considering the unemployment rate and the exodus of our young people, there is a very clear case for making proper use of any instruments we are given and for avoiding federal products that are not adapted to the needs of the region.

In the past few months I talked to senior officials at the Federal Office of Regional Development about the need for reviewing the agency's 1994-95 priorities for our region.

Their new focus is to promote entrepreneurship that will use new technologies to create jobs. There is nothing wrong with that, but this should not be done in total disregard of the choice made by our region, which wants to focus on infrastructures for tourism. The Abitibi—Témiscamingue region wants to acquire the basic infrastructures that will attract tourists to our region for more than a few hours. People have to travel long distances to get there, and we could sell our region if points of interest were sufficient to make a stay of several days worthwhile.

Tourists will not drive 600, 700 or 1,000 kilometres just for the sake of driving. The FORDQ previously subsidized tourism facilities which, it felt, contributed towards developing the economy, but now its focus has changed. Other priorities may be acceptable, but the region's decision to set a priority on the tourism industry should be supported by the federal government and the regions should not be saddled with priorities that are not often acceptable.

People in the community of Radisson near James Bay do not see how the new focus of FORDQ would fit their situation. The only development they could sustain is tourism. They have neither the population base nor the industrial environment for these new development priorities and new technologies. Let us be practical and use the tools we have.

The people of Radisson want to use the far north as a tool to attract adventure tours and other types of tourism. The federal government should realize that the intent of our motion to amend clauses 8, 9 and 10 is to maximize effectiveness by focussing on the needs of the community and thus promote regional development. The gap between developed and undeveloped regions is widening, because in the past, these regions did not have the right development tools.

Quebec has approved a policy to decentralize regional development. Ottawa should also agree to decentralize and consider the particular needs of each region. Regional development councils in Quebec, which include of the mayors of MRCs and regional intervenors, have already designed their own development scenarios. They know what their needs are, and the federal government should consult them so as to harmonize its projects.

I think this brief presentation has sufficiently clarified the intent of the amendments to clauses 8, 9 and 10. Failure to support these amendments will reflect the present government's reluctance to co-operate with the provinces and spend the scarce amount of funds available more effectively.

[English]

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, as I was listening to the member for Abitibi I imagined that this member could actually be giving this speech from any region of the country. He talked about the importance of tourism, education, enough capital coming to a region, proper and efficient utilization of our natural resources—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The hon. parliamentary secretary has already spoken on this group of motions and I would now like to recognize the hon. member for Fraser Valley West. We can intervene only once on each group of motions.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's speech probably would have been so good I would have been happy to let him speak for a little longer—

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): We could get unanimous consent.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): You will not get my consent to speak in my spot.

Yesterday we talked about regional development grants in the House. Yesterday we heard a member of the Liberal Party taking credit for the great growth in the economy since the Liberals have been elected.

I reminded the hon. member that this is really the business cycle, the natural business cycle in this country that is taking place. This government should in no way take credit for what is a natural business cycle. Of course the comment—

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): We don't take any blame either for anything.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): We will give them the blame. They are suggesting that they should not get the blame but we will give you all sorts of blame in some areas.

This is a natural business cycle, my point being that as we stand here in the House of Commons taking credit for how well things are coming along the average taxpayer out there who is getting hit harder and harder and has less and less money looks at us on television and these other ways of communicating today and wonders what in the heck is going on in the House of Commons. These politicians—

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): We wonder where you got that tie, Randy.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): You see how important this is, Madam Speaker. The Liberals are at me for my tie. Rome is burning and they are at me for my tie.

• (1110)

My point is that while we talk about taking credit for business cycles and so on, Rome is burning to some extent. The average taxpayer is wondering what these federal politicians are really doing in Ottawa.

Yesterday I also heard comments in the House from one of our colleagues in the Liberal Party who was very concerned about my criticisms of ACOA, the regional development agency in Atlantic Canada. The comment was Reformers do not like Atlantic Canadians because we have the audacity to complain about regional development grants.

The relationship between complaining about grants and not liking a certain region is ridiculous. Yesterday I heard from one of the Bloc members: "You had better be careful what you say about the east; you are talking about FORD–Quebec". It is not about the people and where they live. It is about how much money we have in this country.

Today we hear about the federal government's central control over regional development, about the funds that are going its way. We also hear the PQ, the separatists, talking about how this is so much of a waste: "We are doing it in our province anyway and the federal government is wasting its".

We hear the Liberals saying they are going to keep it the same and big daddy is going to hand out all the regional development grants to everybody.

What people are hearing from the Reformers is the logical approach. Should we be handing out in excess of $1 billion a year in regional development grants when we are overspending by $40 billion a year and we have a $530 billion debt load? We have to get some priorities in place.

The people watching and listening must think this is all a nightmare. We are talking about giving moneys out to regions and the amounts given out are not small dollars. ACOA, the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, is over $375 million a year, FORD–Quebec is in excess of $437 million a year and western economic diversification is $452 million a year.

We have to borrow this money to give out. We are saying let us be a little more realistic here, folks. We have to cut back, if not over a period of time eliminate this. I have some ideas on where to eliminate. I will show today some of the ridiculous grants that have been given out by this government—

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do this with respect. The member knows of my affection for him. However, I am having a difficult time linking the relevance of what he is saying to the actual amendment. I would ask for clarification on that.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I am surely not required to give an explanation to somebody from the Liberal government on how I express—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry. The hon. member should, however, be relevant.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, I just heard these people here, these separatists, talking about regional development. That is what I am talking about. I am not going to stand here and justify to a member, Madam Speaker. I can justify to you. This is about regional development and that is what I am going to talk about whether this government likes it or not. I will continue my speech on regional development if the member does not mind. I hope this time is added on to my speech.

The concept of regional development is what we are talking about here. We will try to get a concept through these minds here. As I understand it and as the Auditor General has so reported the concept, it is to support and promote the opportunity for economic development, to foster development of entrepreneurship, to increase the rate of new business formation and to improve competitiveness of small and medium size business.

I find the concept of entrepreneurship and government sponsored dollars incompatible. That is something this government has to learn as well.

For instance I have been tracking some of the payments made by this government. There is an individual who has received the entrepreneur of the year award in one of our great provinces. He has received something like seven or nine grants from one of the regional economic development programs. I find that hard to understand. It is an oxymoron. To be the entrepreneur of the year and have the government shovel money your way just does not fit, but I do not think this government understands this.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): You do not understand that?

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): As far as the value to industry, this is an industry bill. I am still relevant, am I Madam Speaker? I am just making sure.

I have a great deal of difficulty with the concept of regional development in industry and shelling out the dollars. We have to start eliminating these four regional development programs. This government is handing out $1.4 billion a year and a lot of that is shelled out not for the concepts I talked about. It is not necessarily for fostering entrepreneurship. It is not necessarily to increase the rate of new business formation and improve competitiveness. In fact, improvement of competitiveness philosophy really does not work at all in some cases from regional development grants.

For example, there are some regional development grants given by this government to motels and inns across this country, but the trouble is it gives to one and not to another. How do we get competitiveness by giving a grant on the backs of the taxpayers to one and not to another? I do not understand that philosophy at all.

Members of the Liberal Party stand in the House and say: "Big daddy is going to pass out your money", and another party says: "You should not be doing that. We have our own. You are wasting the money". Rather than doing that, maybe for a moment they should consider phasing them out. If a government has to borrow from Japan, Germany or the United States to hand this money out it should really consider its management style.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I cannot believe you are saying this.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Well I am saying it and I mean it.

Mr. Stinson: And the taxpayers mean it too. They are tired of it.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): You guys are missing the point.

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): What about the young people coming behind us? What about the debt load we have taxed to these people? What about the taxes the small business person is paying? What about the interest that Canada itself must pay to pay back the debt? It is all borrowed money on the backs of the taxpayers and the young people so that this government can shell out $1.3 billion a year to regions.

Do we need grants? Why do we need grants? Why do we need regional development? Regional development is important. But to the Liberal Party regional development means shelling out dollars to those you know. Next week in this House of Commons I will be disclosing some of those they know who get money.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): What would you do? You say it is important. But what do you mean by that?

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Only when it is absolutely necessary should the government be in the business of private industry.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Give us an example.

• (1120)

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Madam Speaker, not to expand a tea room for $99,000. They call that regional development and it is not. Not to modernize a campground and facilities. That is up to the owner with his profits. It is up to the individual to expand in regional development.

Finally, this government really does not have a clue on regional development. We heard the separatist party here talking about what is wrong with it and we are saying the government cannot afford it. And I think I was relevant.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I would like to remind members that Motions Nos. 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 and 8 will be grouped for debate but voted on as follows:

A vote on Motion No. 2 applies to Motions Nos. 4, 5 and 7. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 2 obviates the necessity of the question being put on Motions Nos. 3, 6 and 8. On the other hand, a negative vote on Motion No. 2 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 3. A vote on Motion No. 3 applies to Motions Nos. 6 and 8.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The question is on Motion No. 2. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(1)(8) a recorded division on the motion stands deferred. The recorded division will also apply to Motions Nos. 4, 5 and 7.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.) moved:

That Bill C-46 be amended by deleting Clause 14.

He said: As with respect to our amendments to clauses 8, 9 and 10, we wish to address the amendment to clause 14 with the same kind of principles we used to evaluate and analyse the others.

In particular, we want to suggest to the House again that it is the obligation of government and it is and should be the intent of legislation to provide checks and balances to ensure openness, integrity and honesty in the performance of the duties and responsibilities incumbent upon government.

Second, the marketplace should determine winners and losers, not the government or intervention by government or its ministers in that marketplace.

Finally, the role of government is to provide a level playing field so that competition can be equal, fair and on a level playing ground so that the refereeing of the game of business is in fact conducted in a manner that provides success for as many as possible.

The results of the application of these principles is confidence for business and government and it certainly enhances the international competitiveness and the ability to provide for changes in the new economy that is coming.

I wish now to address the particular amendment to clause 14 which really is to eliminate and delete from the bill the total clause. There are a number of reasons we would like to propose that clause 14 be deleted from the bill.

Clause 14 gives to the minister a tremendous range of powers. May I just quote briefly from the provisions of the bill. The bill suggests that the minister under this act may:

(a) make loans to any person;

(b) guarantee the repayment of, or provide loan insurance or credit insurance in respect of, any financial obligation undertaken by any person; and

(c) make grants and contributions to any person.

• (1125)

The broad range of power given to the minister under this section is such that it makes it possible for that minister to intervene directly in the marketplace on behalf of or against any business or individual or group of persons, organizations or associations.

We believe that that provision is most objectionable and must not be allowed to stand. It allows the minister or through the minister under certain conditions that follow in the other sections the cabinet to pick winners and losers in the economy.

The authority violates a fundamental principle of openness, honesty and integrity. As we know, and history has shown over and over again, power tends to corrupt and absolute power tends to corrupt absolutely.

The provisions of this act are such in this clause that the minister can without reference to anyone do the kinds of things we talked about: make loans, give grants and things of this sort.

The government's role is to regulate the marketplace so that it is level but not to intervene and choose winners and losers by that intervention. If business is to succeed then it must be allowed to do so without having competitors gaining unfair advantage as a result of government intervention of one kind or another, particularly when it has to do with monetary assistance in particular areas.

If a business or a business sector is going to fail, it should do so because it lacked the competence or for some other reason it did not succeed. The government assistance should not be used to prop up a business that cannot survive in its own right. If the only way a business can survive is by government intervention and by shoring it up then indeed that business is of questionable integrity and questionable work in the economy.

I would like to refer particularly to what can happen when government intervention of this kind takes place. I refer here to the 1993 Auditor General's report with regard to the then Department of Science, Industry and Technology now known as the Department of Industry.

There we have a very interesting situation. In 1985, the cabinet authorized the Minister of Finance to provide an equity injection into the Federal Business Development Bank to enable that bank to purchase a $69 million special issue of preferred shares.

Subsequently, that was increased to $79 million, only $10 million more. The investment of the company was made pursuant to a directive of the governor in council and executed by the Minister of Regional Industrial Expansion, then Industry, Science and Technology and currently Industry. It was done under this clause and a subsequent clause in section 14.

On October 26, 1986, the government signed a share subscription agreement with a company for a two stage $260 million plant modernization project.

The information provided to cabinet for its approval on October 7, 1986, identified a specific Russian technology for the project. This technology was described as the newest and best available in the world. The company decided to switch from the Russian technology to new German technology which it purchased in September 1986.

Cabinet was not informed of the major change in this project. What was the result of all of these kinds of changes? The company's new plant using the German technology attempted startup in December 1989 and suspended operation in March 1990.

In December 1992, two years later, the company advised the Department of Industry that it could not complete stage one before December 31, 1992, for reasons beyond its reasonable control thereby suspending its obligation under the agreement.

In 1990 the department estimated that the Federal Business Development Bank was unlikely to recover its investment or earn any dividends. To date, the bank has received no dividends. In fact the Federal Business Development Bank wrote that particular investment down to zero. The agreement, however, remains in force until the year 2006.

The company's audited statement of total capital expenditures for the project at May 31, 1990 indicated that the company had incurred costs of $161 million. With $134 million that came from the federal government and some from the British Columbia government, the company was out of pocket $27 million and then only because of cost overruns. Had these cost overruns not occurred, the company's share in the project at that point would have been zero.

That is not the way to use taxpayers' money. The emphasis on it being best left to the private entrepreneur is the principle the government should observe and not use tax dollars to do these kinds of things. This clause of the bill should be deleted.

Many of the clauses are unclear. They are intrusionary. They are elitist. They allow the government and the minister in particular unlimited opportunities to interfere in the free market, and the cabinet as well under another section. In my remarks today I have shown that the legislation needs clarification. There are things that should be deleted from it. There are powers that should be circumscribed; the minister and the cabinet should not have these powers. They unbalance the very fundamentals of our economy and can strangle our treasury, as was already indicated in the Auditor General's report.

We should get to the point where the government does not take winners and losers but in fact develops a level playing field. The Department of Industry can be the department to bring about a strong engine that will drive the economy and bring about a balanced budget. That is what the department should do. However the way to do that is not by intervening directly in the marketplace through particular regional development programs or by providing loans, grants and subsidies to industries. The minister has the right to do this for any particular person and is not obligated to require that certain conditions be met for those loans.

At this point the legislation, the way it is being proposed, needs to be amended as we have suggested.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Madam Speaker, my Reform Party colleague from Okanagan made so many assertions in his speech that I do not know where to begin. I challenge his statement that this clause works against open government.

That is just not so. In his discourse the member referred to detail about the Federal Business Development Bank. It was proof of public accountability for nearly every transaction that goes on in government and specifically in Department of Industry. The blue book details—and the people of Canada should know it—every decision and every taxpayers' dollar spent by this department.

To suggest that clause 14 allows the Minister of Industry to go around with a chequebook in his pocket so that if he happens to run into somebody he likes or he thinks has an interesting idea he can write a cheque is not what it is all about.

This clause is about our space arm. Spar Aerospace was an example of the taxpayers of Canada investing approximately $140 million in 1979, 1980 and 1981. When that arm opened in outer space and the word Canada was on the side of it, I do not think there was a Canadian who said anything other than bravo. Today that space arm technology has brought the country a tenfold return.

What about the McCains? The Reform Party member said we should listen to private entrepreneurs. That is an example of a private entrepreneur in Atlantic Canada who got his $4 million kickstart from the Government of Canada in a DREE loan. Right now he is employing close to 20,000 Canadians in every region of our country, all the way from processors to marketers to packagers to truck drivers and so on. He is a private entrepreneur and has paid back in tax dollars and employee tax dollars a thousand times the investment. What about Bombardier? It is selling monorails all over the world right now. It is doing all kinds of stuff.

I will talk about a personal experience I had. I was involved with a company called Magna International that received taxpayers' money. It not only paid it all back but this year it paid the treasury $145 million in tax. It employs 20,000 people and is flying. The company needed it. It was the story of an entrepreneur getting a bit of a push for his idea, his technology. That company makes the best automotive product at the most competitive price and is recognized as one of the leaders in the world.

What about Northern Telecom? What about MacMillan Bloedel in western Canada? What about the oil and gas industry? These are concrete examples of entrepreneurs, men and women, who went through due process and received taxpayers' money.

There is another thing Reform Party members do not understand. They think if someone has an idea he or she knocks on the door of Industry Canada and there is a cheque writing machine there.

I like to think I am an entrepreneur. I find the whole process of dealing with bureaucrats to be very frustrating. They want paper and more paper. They want to make sure the promised job creation objectives are being met with the taxpayers' money. They come in and do audits. There is scrutiny beyond imagination.

I would be the first to admit that the Government of Canada has made mistakes from time to time. If they add the last 20 years of taxpayers' money invested in R and D, in new technology and in regional development projects versus the return, Reformers would suddenly come across the Chamber and join us.

Mr. Stinson: Then why are we so far in debt? Why is the country so far in debt?

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I want to take a minute to answer the question about why are we so far in debt.

We should not be punishing or casting aspersions on entrepreneurs who have had some financial support from the Government of Canada and have more than paid back the investment not only in terms of payback on loans but also in taxes. It is not relevant but I will deal with the member's question. Why the debt? They should not hang the debt on the entrepreneurs of the country. If that is what the Reform Party is doing now, hanging the debt of the country on the entrepreneurs, the small and medium sized business—

Mr. Stinson: No, it is your policies.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Would the hon. parliamentary secretary continue.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, it is interesting to hear the Reform Party. We have been in the House one year and now the Reform Party is against entrepreneurship.

• (1140)

Mr. Schmidt: We are against your pork barrelling. That is what we are against.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): I quote directly from the member's speech: "Government assistance should not be used if a company cannot make it on its own".

There is not a single entrepreneur in the country, whether it was through the tax act, some form of grant, loan assistance or whatever, who has not received some sort of recognition and support from the Government of Canada or the various provinces.

All they have to do is look at the tax act of Canada to see $40 billion worth of tax grants buried there. Most of them are going to businesses in the member's riding and now he is against entrepreneurship. We will not support this amendment.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am a little surprised to hear what the hon. member from the Reform Party had to say immediately after the speech the hon. member for Fraser Valley West had given, emphasizing that the government was to step in only when necessary. He was in fact leaving the door open to some government involvement, while in the amendment and the remarks made by the hon. member for the Reform Party who spoke just before me, the door is totally closed.

Deleting, in Clause 14, lines 19 to 47, on page 7, and lines 1 to 8, on page 8, is absolutely unthinkable, as far as we are concerned. Let me explain. Again, this Reform Party proposal shows that this party is totally out of touch with economic reality. It cannot conceive the role of the State as that of an economic leader, a developer. It sees it more as a wait–and–see role, if not that of a killjoy.

By deleting large portions of Clause 14 which enables the government, through its Minister of Industry, to influence small and medium size businesses to facilitate the implementation of programs or projects under the act, the Reform Party shows, once again, its commitment to fostering wild liberalism: "Let us go. We will see where it leads us".

The Bloc Quebecois can only condemn such an attitude, an attitude of permissiveness with respect to the market economy. You cannot just say: "Go at it, any which way you want". I think that the State has a role to play as an economic leader, and a promoter of development. I think that is part of the responsibilities of the State.

Therefore, we think it is essential that the government be able to have a say concerning loans that may be made, guarantees that may be given and loan insurance or credit insurance that may be provided, as stated in paragraph 14(3)(a).

Unlike the Reform Party, we feel it is also essential that the government be able to make loans and guarantee the repayment of any financial obligation or provide loan insurance ir credit insurance and make grants and contributions.

The Premier of Quebec made it clear —he sent clear signals— when he said that the State must be an active player in the economy. It must not assume the role of a banker, but its certainly can guarantee repayment for SMEs, which are recognized as creating the most new jobs, to promote their development and help them face this free trade, global market, high–tech, competitive context. In a nutshell, support the development of businesses. The primary role of the state is to be an economic leader and developer.

Quebec, as we know it today, is the product of the emergence of a state actively involved in the economic development of its territory since the beginning of the 1960s. Take for example the great success of Hydro–Québec, the major role played by the Quebec deposit and investment fund and, more recently, the success of the Solidarity Fund, which go to show that the economy of the community has to be made available to small and medium size businesses, indeed, the ones that generate the most employment.

Minister Paillé has just implemented a program for SMEs, to guarantee repayment to a maximum of $50,000 for SMEs, people who have ideas, who can implement ideas, create jobs and develop them.

That is what we call economic support. Action must be taken to support the people who are very active in terms of development and job creation. There are many out there who have ideas and can set up businesses.

The Bloc Quebecois can only express disagreement with this presentation and the Reform Party amendment. Because we recognize that any State has a role to play as a developer and must support economic development, particularly as regards SMEs, we are clearly opposed to the amendment brought forth by the Reform Party.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ) moved:

That Bill C–46, in new Clause 21, be amended by replacing subclause 2 with the following:

"(2) The Minister shall, at least 60 days before the date on which the Minister fixes or increases a fee under sections 18, 19 or 20, cause to be published in the Canada Gazette and in no fewer than two leading newspapers in each province a notice clearly indicating

(a) the products, services, rights, privileges, regulatory processes, approvals or use of facilities provided under these sections; and

(b) the fees to be fixed or increased pursuant to these sections."

He said: Madam Speaker, the Official Opposition has a pretty straightforward position on clause 21(2). Our amendment is aimed at putting things right side up instead of upside down.

This clause of Bill C–46 found in the third report of the industry committee says in part (2) that, after setting fees under sections 18, 19 or 20, the minister has 30 days to publish these fees in the Canada Gazette so that Treasury Board can pass regulations to authorize them.

People are notified 30 days after the fees have been set. This is totally unacceptable. This is a devious way to increase taxes without notifying taxpayers or notifying them after the fact. Something is wrong here.

We also detect an attempt to give disproportionate powers to senior officials, since this clause enables them to set fees without the approval of the House of Commons. They will simply bypass those elected by their fellow citizens to manage the affairs of state.

This provision of the bill is clearly undemocratic, in our opinion, since fees can be set without the approval of lawmakers. The doors are wide open. That is why the Bloc Quebecois tabled this motion:

(2) The Minister shall, at least 60 days before the date on which the Minister fixes or increases a fee under sections 18, 19 or 20, cause to be published in the Canada Gazette—

Not 30 days after but 60 days before, so that we can respond and look into the matter.

Let us be serious. I am telling the Liberal government to stop using devious means to increase taxes and make all Canadians poorer.

The Bloc Quebecois is simply asking the federal government to stop managing the Quebec economy, either through fee–setting policies or regional development. That is why we oppose this amendment.

• (1150)

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the member raises a very good point here. The part of his address I want to deal with is the statement he made that this basically overrides the rights of the legislators.

Members of our statutory instruments and regulations committee brought that very point up about three weeks ago, that the flaw did exist in the bill. The government recognized this was an override. We believe our amendment deals with this in a constructive way so legislators are not bypassed. I believe my colleague critic from the Reform Party shares that view.

I want to say something to the member dealing with this whole notion of overriding legislators. The Prime Minister, whom I have had the pleasure of working with since 1980, who has come up through the ranks as a parliamentary secretary, a young MP, is very sensitive to making sure the individual roles of legislators in this House of Commons are meaningful.

The Prime Minister has stated this on several occasions. It is part of the red book. We do not come to this city day in, weekend in and weekend out, making sacrifices with our families and friends to be subservient to unelected officials or bureaucrats. That is why our committee process has reached in my judgment a new level of reform.

Our committees are almost independent now. I would not want to say we are totally independent because the government obviously has a majority in terms of the members. There is a push by the Prime Minister to encourage MPs to develop their ideas, to get control of their own agenda and do what they believe in.

I believe the amendment we proposed in committee meets the concerns the member from the Bloc raised in his address. We would be supporting our own motion and we therefore would not be supporting his.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I think we would all honour the intention of the amendment being proposed by the Bloc. I have addressed the idea of having openness. Making sure there is a certain element of knowledge that is open and fair to everybody who wishes to have that information about fees and things of that sort is very laudable. I certainly commend that.

I do agree with the hon. parliamentary secretary to the minister that the government saw the error of its original proposal in the bill as it was originally written, bringing to the committee a whole series of amendments that I think does meet the intent of the Bloc member's comments.

There is another principle that needs to be observed. There has to be a certain freedom to do the things that are right by government. There has to be an openness. The accountability of government has to be observed.

The amendments that were proposed and accepted in committee that are now in the report of the bill that will be voted on at third reading will meet not only the intent but also the detail of the member's suggestion.

Therefore I would respectfully suggest that we all support the amendments that come out of the committee and that we defeat this amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(1)(8) a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of the bill now before the House.

Call in the members.

Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), I have been requested by the chief government whip to defer the division until a later time.

Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(6) the division of the question now before the House stands deferred until Monday at the ordinary hour of daily adjournment, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent to further defer that vote until Tuesday at 5.30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Does the hon. government whip have the unanimous consent of the House to defer the vote until Tuesday?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON FINANCE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent for the following motion:

That the Order of the House, made November 30, 1994, concerning the report of the Standing Committee on Finance pursuant to Standing Order 83.1 be amended by changing the words "December 7, 1994" to "December 8, 1994".

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent to suspend the sitting until 2 p.m. this day.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(The sitting of the House was suspended at 11.59 a.m.)

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 1.57 p.m.

The Speaker: It being 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to statements by members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

INTERNATIONAL DAY OF DISABLED PERSONS

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to bring to the attention of the House that the United Nations has declared Saturday, December 3, 1994, as International Day of Disabled Persons.

In a draft resolution, the United Nations stated that the General Assembly was well aware of the need for more vigorous and broader action. It stated that measures were required at all levels to fulfil the objectives of the decade and world program of action concerning disabled persons.

As a member of the United Nations, Canada honours this international commitment. Our federal strategy is aimed at equalization of opportunity for disabled persons and optimization of their positive contribution to Canadian society.

The government also realizes that more has to be done. Through awareness raising and action oriented measures we aim for increased comprehension and better access for persons with disabilities. As a member of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, I too am convinced of and committed to these initiatives.

A disability or handicap is no deterrent to achievement. In politics alone, William Mr. Hughes, the former Prime Minister of Australia was hearing impaired. Former President of the United States, Franklin D. Roosevelt, was confined to a wheelchair. Trevor Morgan, a former member of Parliament, was blind. Who can forget the epic journeys of Terry Fox and Rick Hansen. The determination of these individuals and countless other disabled persons have shown that the barriers can be overcome.

I encourage all members of this Parliament and Canadians to—

QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Robin Richardson of the Fraser Institute told the media yesterday that if Quebec decides to separate and refuses to pay its share of the debt, Canada would be destitute.

It is inconceivable that an institution which claims to be serious could make such statements. Quebec sovereignists have always said openly that they would meet their responsibilities and that when Quebec becomes sovereign, it will assume its fair share of the federal debt. On the other hand, a sovereign Quebec will of course receive its fair share of federal assets.

At present, Quebec taxpayers are already bearing their share of the federal debt in the present system. But the way the Canadian government is managing its finances is cause for concern.

This is the second time in less than four months that the Fraser Institute has engaged in such speculation. In future, we hope that the institute will be a little more serious, because as Talleyrand said, anything exaggerated is not worth taking seriously.

INTERNATIONAL DAY OF DISABLED PERSONS

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my privilege to rise today in recognition, along with my colleagues, of December 3 as International Day of Disabled Persons.

This day is to remind us of the special concerns and needs of the disabled. The Reform Party joins with all Canadians to create a fair, equitable and sustainable system for all. We believe that Canadians have a personal and collective responsibility to care and provide for those unable to care and provide for themselves.

Equality of opportunity for the disabled will come about as individuals, employers and governments at all levels work together to remove the barriers to their full participation in our communities and in our workplaces. To assist the disabled in the pursuit of their goals is both just and appropriate.

Today as we recognize the valuable contribution of the disabled, let us reaffirm our support for their desire to be an active, integral and productive part of our society.

FIGHT AGAINST AIDS

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today our Prime Minister is attending the Paris summit on AIDS.

[English]

This summit is a French initiative in co–operation with the WHO. Forty–two countries representing 70 per cent of the world population will make a joint acclamation of their commitment to fight HIV–AIDS. The Paris declaration will reflect the principles and values already adopted by the United Nations for HIV–AIDS and will add a new component for nations to respond to urgent needs with practical and lasting measures. This declaration would be operational by January 1996.

AIDS is a public health issue and political world leaders have made the fight against this disease a priority. Special attention will be given to reducing the vulnerability of women to AIDS, to the important role of associations of persons living with the virus, and to strengthening national and international mechanisms for human rights and ethics as they relate to AIDS.

I am proud to say that Canada has built an international reputation as a leader in these three sectors.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Nigerians whose voices cannot be heard from behind prison bars, I would like to draw the attention of the House to activities engaged in by the de facto government in the Commonwealth country of Nigeria as they relate to human rights.

Nigeria's circumstances represent a severe setback to the process of democratization in Africa. Mr. Abiola's election victory in June 1993 was quashed by General Babangyida, who went on to install an interim political body that yielded finally to military rule. Already the de facto government has breached the UN human rights declaration by its brutal attacks on newspaper editors, human rights lawyers and any other type of political or economic dissent. As well there is a risk of civil war on the basis of ethnic divisions.

I am requesting, on behalf of concerned Canadians, that the Minister of Foreign Affairs meet with the High Commissioner for Nigeria to register Canada's concern for human rights conditions in that country. As a signatory to the UN human rights declaration, Canada must continue to be vigilant in monitoring human rights accordance for men, women and children throughout the world.

INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on November 21 the Queen's Square infrastructure project was launched in my riding of Brampton. This is a $15 million project funded under the Canada–Ontario infrastructure program which will result in many medium and long term jobs.

The project is being undertaken in conjunction with the project negotiated between the city of Brampton and a private contractor, John Cutruzzola of the Inzola Group. When construction is complete the downtown city core will have undergone a $50 million facelift, leaving residents of Brampton with a beautiful market style downtown core.

The national infrastructure program is putting Canadians back to work, and at the same time revitalizing communities. It is a model of how all three levels of government can co–operate for the public good. The Queen's Square project in my riding of Brampton is an example of the benefits of this co–operation when it extends to the private sector.

On behalf of my constituents, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the minister responsible for infrastructure for the swift and effective implementation—

INTERNATIONAL DAY FOR THE DISABLED

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the United Nations has decided that December 3 will be International Day for the Disabled. This is an opportunity for all members of this House to become aware of the obstacles which these proud and courageous people have to face on a daily basis.

As a person who worked for the Office des personnes handicapées du Québec for several years, I am aware of the courage and determination of these people who, unfortunately, must still put up with the prejudices of those who refuse to recognize their full value. Insufficient resources and access problems, particularly in the workplace, are constant challenges for these people.

Let us hope that the International Day for the Disabled will help their cause and that these people will stop being treated like second class citizens, even here in Canada.

TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, southern Vancouver Island is the fastest growing region in Canada. Currently we face a major transportation problem with the only arterial highway in and out of Victoria choked most of the time.

However, there is a solution available in the existing Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway. We must put in place measures to ensure its viability as an effective and efficient mover of goods, services and people. It is currently owned by Canadian Pacific and operated in a grossly inefficient fashion by VIA Rail.

I encourage the Minister of Transport to convene a meeting of members of the federal government, the provincial government and Canadian Pacific to address this pressing issue. This is not an issue of politics but of public necessity. To allow this railway to be abandoned will be a gross travesty to the taxpayers as ultimately money will need to be spent to provide an alternative form of transportation to southern Vancouver Island.

HIBERNIA

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, politics should never stand in the way of signed legal agreements. I am talking about the portion of the Hibernia oil project that was given to the Saint John shipyard in New Brunswick under a signed agreement.

The board decided on Saint John Shipbuilding because it is an ice free port and because the company has the proven expertise to do the job.

This past Tuesday the Prime Minister stated that he is asking the board to review and overturn the signed legal agreement with Saint John Shipbuilding in order to put it out to tender. Under the agreement the government may be liable for expenses and damages as a result of the termination of the agreement, should it occur.

Is this what the government is all about, cancelling signed legal agreements that could cost the taxpayers millions of dollars in damages? I ask the Prime Minister to please keep politics out of a signed agreement for the Saint John shipyard. The taxpayers have paid enough.

NATIONAL TRIATHLON TEAM

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute to members of the Canadian National Triathlon team from my riding of Parry Sound—Muskoka who returned this week from the world championship in Wellington, New Zealand.

Don McCormick, Sue Tovee, Darlene Murdy, Barry Webb, David Vass, John Hiley and Helmut Kruckle qualified for the world championships, with five of the seven making the trek to New Zealand. At personal expense and significant sacrifice the five triathletes travelled to a country that is 18 time zones away and braved 140 kilometre winds during pre–race training sessions.

When race day finally came, the five triathletes from Parry Sound—Muskoka along with other Canadian athletes performed well for their country in the 1.5 kilometre swim, 40 kilometre cycle, and 10 kilometre run. These individuals demonstrated the true nature of sportsmanship.

I support the athletes of Parry Sound—Muskoka and know that all members of the House support the athletes of Canada.

RWANDA

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Vancouver South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last night I watched a documentary on CBC's "Prime Time News" regarding the mass murders in Rwanda.

I must say I am deeply shaken, as all of us should be, to learn that the genocide of a reported half million people was part of a well planned and premeditated scheme known as network zero. It has also been revealed that many in the international community had been warned of the impending tragedy.

I personally find it absolutely appalling and incomprehensible that the potential for such atrocities to occur was known and yet very little was done.

Why did the global community not mobilize in an attempt to prevent the mass killings? I have to ask also, how did the entire international community fail the people of Rwanda.

It is absolutely imperative that changes be introduced in the United Nations to ensure that the mass murders of men, women, and children never happen again.

REFORM PARTY OF CANADA

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have been observing the Reform Party for some time and things just did not add up about it.

Last Friday its members presented to the finance committee their plan to reduce government spending by $10 billion. On the suggestion of the member for Calgary Centre I undertook to read this document. The proposal for reductions is broken down into five parts: first, $70 million; second, zero; the third is $3.5 billion plus $.64 billion; four, $1 billion; and five is $2 billion plus $1.7 billion, plus an additional $.125 billion. This adds up to only $9.035 billion, a shortfall of $1 billion.

To ensure I was correct I had a chartered accountant, an economist, two students at Carleton University and one at Ottawa University check the figures. The results are the same. Members of the Reform Party cannot add and they do not add up to Canada either.

There is only one finance minister but it took their three finance critics to come up with this result.

AIDS

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, today, on this first day of December, people throughout the world are stopping a few moments to reflect on what can be done to wipe out the terrible scourge called AIDS. This epidemic of a disease that scarcely ten years ago was little known to the public is today a cause for concern throughout the world and spares none of its victims.

According to the World Health Organization, by the middle of 1994, more than 16 million adults and one million children had contracted the AIDS virus since the beginning of the pandemic. Even worse, by the year 2000, the cumulative total of people infected by the virus will be between 30 and 40 million, while the total number of cases of full-blown AIDS will be close to 10 million. No responsible government, in the United States or in France, in Italy or in Africa, can afford to overlook the fact that the fight against AIDS must include a campaign to promote safe sex.

CRIMINAL CODE

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon will be the third and final hour of debate on my private member's bill C-240. This bill will permit corrections and parole officials to apply to the courts to keep high risk offenders in custody or under community supervision beyond the end of their sentences.

The government has stated that it would not support such legislation because it may be a violation of the charter of rights of the offender. So much for the promise of making the protection of society its number one priority.

Canadians are demanding protection. After the murder of 16 year old Pamela Cameron in October, citizens in my riding started a petition calling for the protection from high risk offenders.

I made public this morning a petition with over 8,000 names. In Milton, Ontario, Pamela's older sister obtained over 10,000 signatures on a similar petition that has yet to be introduced.

A recent poll indicated that 76 per cent of Quebecers support the use of dangerous offender designations against violent offenders.

I urge all members of the House to listen to their constituents and provide them with the protection they are demanding.

MEADOW LAKE TRIBAL COUNCIL

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I rise to congratulate the Meadow Lake Tribal Council for its success in the forestry business, as reported this week by their auditors Price Waterhouse.

Federal loans worth $1.5 million, used by the tribal council to start two businesses, have paid off with a return of $10.7 million in corporate taxes.

The tribal council, led for many years by Chief Percy Derocher and today by Chief Richard Gladue, created jobs, contributed to their community and proved that there is an important and useful role for the federal government to play in support of aboriginal businesses.

The success of the Meadow Lake Tribal Council has paid off in other ways. Their contribution has helped lead to the naming of the town of Meadow Lake as Canada's forestry capital for 1995. We can all help them celebrate next year by ensuring that the federal government acknowledges this success with a continuation, indeed an enhancement, of the aboriginal business support program.

ROAD SAFETY

Mr. Raymond Lavigne (Verdun—Saint-Paul, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like draw the attention of the House to two important events connected with road safety. Today marks the beginning of Road Safety Week, sponsored by the Canada Safety Council. This year's theme reminds us of the dangers of driving while under the influence of alcohol and stresses the fact that the lives of thousands of Canadians are affected each year by this problem. Concerning another aspect of road safety, five years ago, the federal government announced that all new motor vehicles sold in Canada were to be equipped with daytime running lights.

• (1415)

This morning, the Minister of Transport released a study that found that daytime running lights had prevented thousands of collisions, so that our roads are now much safer.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON CANADIAN HERITAGE

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, many will recall Marlon Brando as the godfather when he muttered: "A favour is a favour".

Yesterday Liberal members of the Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage collectively played the role of godperson to the hon. member for Calgary Southeast. Hon. members should know the hon. member for Calgary Southeast refused to propose or even vote on a motion authorizing funding for witnesses from western Canada to appear before the committee, the very witnesses the hon. member had previously insisted must appear.

Lack of funding would have killed the agreement the member had vehemently insisted upon. Certainly, in the vernacular, all members have bad hair days but perhaps the hon. member would like to manger ses mots.

We must restore trust in politicians. Trust only begins when we live up to the spirit and intent of agreements made in this our parliamentary home. In her own words I would like to say again: "Anything less would be absolutely outrageous".

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MIL DAVIE SHIPYARD

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the government persistently refuses to right a wrong done to Quebec, by transferring immediately the contract for the construction of a Hibernia drilling sub-unit to the Quebec shipbuilder MIL Davie, the only loser in this whole business, as it was the only other bidder on this contract. Yet Hibernia argued that the time constraints and deadlines required that this contract be assigned to Saint John Shipbuilding without competitive bidding.

My question is directed to whichever minister would be so kind as to answer on behalf of the government. How is it that the government has the time to call for tenders now, when the normal practice, as the Quebec Minister of Industry indicated, is to go to the next bidder on the list if the first one is unable to perform the work?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Hibernia benefits plan provides that all interested parties be given a full and fair opportunity to submit a bid for part of the work under the Hibernia deal.

The independent Canada—Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board reviewed the decision in this regard by the consortium and found that the Hibernia benefits plan had not been followed. It is only normal for the government to ask members of the consortium to review their decision. I think that makes sense because we are asking if the proper process has been followed in a way that is fair to all concerned.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the solution seems obvious. A bid has been submitted and the bidder's name is MIL Davie.

Why does the government not transfer the contract to MIL Davie, as would seem appropriate? And where does the government find the time now to launch a new bidding process, if the work was so urgent, or so we were told, that the contract had to be let to Saint John Shipbuilding in the first place?

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member is complaining about is with respect to a decision made by the consortium that gave the contract to Saint John Shipbuilding without following the Hibernia benefits plan according to the findings of the independent Canada—Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board.

That is why the government is asking the consortium to review the decision because of the findings of the board. We are asking the consortium to make that decision as quickly as possible. We hope the hon. member will agree with this sensible step.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, what is the government of Canada waiting for to table the full report of the Canada—Newfoundland Board, so that everyone can take cognizance of the facts and see that MIL Davie was treated unfairly and that the Hibernia board of directors has contravened every contract award rule in the book in this particular case?

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire as to the possibility of tabling the report of the Canada—Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board.

I think that we should also table in this House the report on the nearly $500 million in economic benefits that have accrued to Quebec as a result of some 100 contracts. As a result of these contracts and conditions, the government just could not leave the people of Quebec unaware of such crucial facts.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, at a press conference this morning, the minister of defence quickly tabled his white paper without any warning and without regard for the Official Opposition.

The minister of defence announced that, with the holiday season approaching, he intends to spend hundreds of millions of dollars on used military equipment. The defence minister's shopping list includes four used British submarines, helicopters and armoured vehicles.

Now that the cold war is over and that the government must reduce spending, how can the minister dare contemplate at this time the acquisition of used military equipment whose usefulness is highly questionable?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first on the procedural matter, it is customary for government to table responses to standing committee reports in the House. That was done.

I do not think it would have been within the normal practice to have given advance warning of that. However I did give a copy immediately to a member of the hon. member's party and the critic for the Reform Party immediately upon tabling, knowing that there were at least four hours before question period within which to reflect upon it.

On the specific point regarding the major capital purchases that have been called for in the white paper, it is very important to differentiate between the helicopter purchases required to replace the Labradors for search and rescue, the Sea Kings for the combat helicopters on ships and the armoured personnel carriers for the army from the submarine question.

The submarine question is simply a matter of investigating a possible arrangement with the United Kingdom that wants to sell four used conventionally powered submarines which would assist us in discharging our maritime mandate not just on the Atlantic coast but on the Pacific coast as well.

There is no commitment on the part of the government to purchase such submarines. Simply we are looking at the matter and we would have been remiss if we had not mentioned it in the white paper.

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the minister that I am quite able to differentiate between submarine and helicopter purchases!

How can the minister explain to Canadian taxpayers that, barely a year after cancelling the EH–101 helicopter contract at an approximate cost of $800 million, he has now decided to buy new helicopters to replace the Sea Kings which last spring were declared fit to fly until the year 2002 by the minister himself?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the red book we never discounted the need for search and rescue helicopters. We said that combat helicopters for ships would be studied in the defence review. The hon. member was part of a committee that recommended we buy new helicopters.

What is important is that the Conservative government wanted to spend $5.8 billion to develop a state of the art helicopter that we did not need and could not afford. The solution that we are proposing is going to save considerably more money, well over a billion dollars and perhaps $2 billion. That is not bad economics as far as I am concerned.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Justice said:

> During the course of the last several months, I have been in continuous touch with senior officials and indeed with provincial counterparts, attorneys general and ministers of justice, exchanging views about the proposals that will be decided upon and announced this afternoon.

• (1425)

However today in a television interview he revealed that he had not spoken to some of the provincial justice ministers but hoped that he would get their support.

Given that the registration of firearms will have a significant impact upon the financial resources of the provinces and territories, why did the minister not get the support of provincial justice ministers before the fact, not after?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government is confident it has the support of the vast majority of Canadians in the decisions we announced yesterday with respect to firearms.

In terms of the provinces and territories, as I made clear yesterday I have been in direct contact with some of my provincial counterparts. Throughout the process the Department of Justice has been in continuous contact with senior officials of provincial and territorial ministries of justice. Those communications have been continuous and, I can advise the House, very productive.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it still seems wise that we would get support from all of them when all the provinces will be involved.

In one short statement yesterday the Minister of Justice eliminated the role of Parliament, of the Standing Committee on Justice and of interested parties on both sides of the issue. He said: "Let me make it very clear. The process of consultation leading to legislation is now over". This is unacceptable.

What gives the Minister of Justice the power to interfere with the parliamentary process which includes the Standing Committee on Justice? Is true democracy proving to be inconvenient for the justice minister?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I meant yesterday exactly what I said. The process of consultation leading to the proposals in the legislation the government will put forward is at an end. We have reached the government's policy on firearms.

Naturally the bill will be put before the House of Commons in February when we resume. It will then be referred to committee in the ordinary course. It will go through the regular parliamentary procedure in which we hope to have the involvement of all members of the House.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it seems evident across the country that these proposals are in fact full of holes and seriously flawed.

We have seen in previous legislation in the House that this minister has set a precedent for ramrodding, railroading and running roughshod over the democratic process.

The minister said that yesterday's proposals are final. Will the minister, upon tabling the legislation, be open to further consultation? Will he consider changes to these proposals that attack responsible law–abiding gun owners?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious the support among members of the Canadian public for these proposals is very high. We are making proposals that have the support of the vast majority of Canadians.

In terms of the consultation process, I spent almost five months consulting with over 150 national and regional organizations of firearms owners and users. I dealt with them at close quarters on the details of the proposals. Our consultations leading to the formation of government policy are at an end. Naturally when I put the bill before the House it will be referred to committee, witnesses will be heard, and the usual parliamentary process will be followed.

COLLÈGE MILITAIRE ROYAL DE SAINT–JEAN

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

Yesterday, the minister refused to respond favorably to the invitation from the Mayor of Saint–Jean, saying that he had not received an invitation from Quebec's Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs. Now, the Mayor of Saint–Jean publicly invited both governments to Saint–Jean to continue discussions on the future of the military college on the basis of his proposal. Quebec is ready to delegate representatives.

Can the minister tell us whether he, like the Quebec minister, intends to respond favorably to the invitation from the Mayor of Saint–Jean and delegate officials so that discussions can resume and thus show his good faith?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I already said in this House a few days ago, I met the Mayor of Saint–Jean to listen to his proposal and to discuss the future of the college in Saint–Jean.

We both clearly agreed that the college in Saint–Jean must continue and for this two essential conditions of the July 19 agreement had to be met: the college has to be demilitarized and a transition period is needed.

What has happened is that I sent Ms. Beaudoin a letter several weeks ago, asking her to do just that, and she has not yet sent me a reply. As soon as she gives me an answer, we are ready to meet her.

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell us whether or not he is prepared to continue discussions on the basis of the proposal from the Mayor of Saint–Jean, which would provide a transition period and also keep 350 officer cadets at the college next September?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I already told the House exactly what we had agreed on. What we need now is a reply from Ms. Beaudoin that she is ready to accept the July 19 agreement as a basis of negotiation. Our position was and still is the same and the Bloc Quebecois is preventing the development of the royal military college in Saint–Jean and hindering normal economic activity in the Saint–Jean region because it opposes implementing the agreement.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday during the justice minister's press conference when asked whether the registration of rifles and shotguns would reduce the criminal use of these firearms, the minister could not say that it would.

Given that the objective of firearms control is to reduce the accidental, intentional and criminal use of firearms, can the minister today state that the registration of shotguns and rifles will meet these objectives and reduce the criminal use of these weapons in society?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the only reason this government is proposing a registration system for rifles and shotguns is our firm belief that it will have exactly that result.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in his proposals yesterday the minister failed to provide the statistical information to justify the registration of rifles and shotguns and to ban other firearms.

The Auditor General found the same lack of substantiating evidence for Bill C–17, which led him to conclude that C–17 was initiated for reasons of public policy.

I ask the minister, when will he provide statistical justification for introducing these measures, or is this being done for reasons of public policy as well?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is a reason why the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police wants universal registration of firearms. There is a reason why the Canada Safety Council has been urging the government to introduce universal registration of firearms, quite apart from common sense.

As we announced yesterday, there is a direct link between the registration of firearms, the reduction of crime, the reduction in the number of lost and stolen firearms in the hands of criminals and public safety and safety in the home.

REGISTERED RETIREMENT SAVINGS PLANS

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

Right in the midst of its pre–budget consultation exercise, the government continues to leave open the possibility of taxing RRSPs when, according to a Gallup poll, over 86 per cent of Canadians and Quebecers oppose such a measure.

Considering that the government did not wait until the end of its pre–budget consultation to announce that it would not reduce UI contributions below the level mentioned in the budget, will the Minister of National Revenue now reassure concerned Canadian taxpayers that he will not tax RRSPs?

[English]

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the question is raised about the recent poll that was conducted for the Retirement Savings Alliance. That group had the opportunity to present its paper before the finance committee in the consultation process. We are listening to all the consultations and will look forward to that.

I will not, as the Minister of Finance has said in the past, comment on individual proposals at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister continue to leave open the possibility of taxing RRSPs and increase the concerns of Canadian taxpayers at a time when people are taking and renewing RRSPs, and considering that if RRSPs were to be taxed, 44 per cent of those who participated in the poll said they would stop contributing?

• (1435)

[English]

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not this government that is raising the questions of taxing RRSPs. It is the opposition party and the third party that have raised these questions again and again before this House.

I will repeat that we are not going to comment on the individual proposals until our budget is presented in February.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the gun control proposals submitted by the justice minister yesterday would ban the .32–calibre handgun like the one fired by Olympic gold medalist, Linda Thom. This is a calibre of handgun used in Olympic sport competitions.

Does the Minister of Justice realize that he has effectively eliminated Canadians from this Olympic sport? They will no longer be able to own and practice with this gun in preparation for world class events.

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the category of handguns that this government proposes to ban is not broadly used in legitimate sporting activities. Instead, these small handguns we propose to ban are cheaply made, easily concealed and commonly used in crime. That is why we are banning them.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is an international sporting event being eliminated for Canadian competitors which points to how poorly thought out this whole proposal really is.

I have not yet mentioned the violation of the rights to privacy, the confiscation of personal property without compensation; how poorly thought out this whole proposal really is.

As a start, will the minister make a commitment to remove the .32–calibre hand gun from this list of banned firearms?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I most certainly will not. The categories of handguns which were identified for ban were worked through with the RCMP, with expert advisers. They were identified precisely for the reasons we gave the House when we announced these decisions yesterday and they will remain on the list.

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

On December 6, 1989, 14 young women were killed at the École polytechnique, in Montreal. This tragedy triggered a major movement for gun control. Yet, five years later, the government introduces a mere action plan, in spite of the commitment made by the Minister of Justice and the Prime Minister to table a bill before Christmas.

How can the minister be satisfied with his action plan, whose effects will not be measurable until the year 2003, almost 15 years after the tragedy at École polytechnique?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the question put by the hon. member echoes the pale and oblique commentary she gave yesterday following my speech in the House. It disappointments me, as much as her speech did yesterday, that instead of dealing with the substance of the matter, instead of expressing her position with respect to the substance of the decisions and the proposals, she seizes upon the form of the matter and comments caustically upon that.

This government has made its position clear. We shall introduce legislation in February to implement the decisions in the paper I tabled yesterday.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister claim not to have caved in to the gun lobby, considering that his eventual legislation will allow more than 4,000 Canadians to keep their AK–47s and more than half a million others to keep their hand guns for the rest of their lives, all the while keeping within the law?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in connection with the AK–47s, those firearms will be prohibited. Future sales will be prohibited. Those who have them can keep them but not transfer them.

In connection with the banned handguns the position is, once again, future sales are prohibited. Those who have them may keep them but may not use them. They can keep them and store them safely, surrender them to the police or disable them.

MULTICULTURALISM

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Secretary of State for Multiculturalism.

It is ironic when MPs like the Reform member for Calgary Southeast yesterday misrepresented the cardinal principles of multiculturalism, a policy long viewed by other countries as a model for social cohesion and national unity.

• (1440)

Given that nearly half of Canada's people are of neither English nor French background, can the minister assure us that the government will continue to promote the cultural, economic and social benefits inherent in Canada's diversity?

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question and his incisive observations. Of course the answer is yes. Diversity and pluralism are the Canadian reality.

This government is committed to nation building, to ensuring that we live in an inclusive society and that we will have multicultural programs which will contain cross–cultural undertakings, intercultural exchange and will promote social harmony, social cohesion and peace.

We in this party believe that we should build a society in which racism, bigotry, intolerance and misunderstanding shall find no home. That is the goal of this government. That is nation building and the Liberals support the multicultural program.

SAINT JOHN SHIPYARD

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Natural Resources or whoever should choose to answer on behalf of the government.

Could the minister explain why the Canada–Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board made a decision to review the process of awarding the contract to Saint John Shipyard last week as opposed to when the decision was initially made some months ago?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to get that information from the board. In the meantime I think we should take satisfaction that this independent review board is doing the job for which it was set up.

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my supplemental is for the same minister.

Could this minister please explain why the Canada–Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board is reviewing the contract awarded to Saint John Shipyard when other contracts have been awarded without going to tender, such as the contract awarded to the Norwegian Contractors Newfoundland this past summer and no review took place?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I understand it, this is an independent board, an arm's length board and it does its job according to its mandate.

I will seek the information the hon. member is asking for but I do not know why the Reform Party, which wants probity in actions by government bodies, refuses to pay attention to the work of an independent, arm's length board reviewing the expenditure of taxpayers' funds.

BOSNIA

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

Yesterday, the United Nations suffered a major diplomatic reversal when the Bosnian Serb authorities refused to meet with UN Secretary–General Boutros Boutros–Ghali. Peace negotiations have reached an impasse. The NATO Ministers of Foreign Affairs met today in Brussels to develop their position on the Bosnian situation, while major tensions between the Americans and Europeans continue to grow.

What position has the Canadian government taken today at the NATO Summit in Brussels in order to break the deadlock concerning Bosnia?

Hon. David Michael Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, we regret that the Bosnian factions refused to meet with the UN Secretary–General. We are very sorry.

The Prime Minister has stated our position on the Bosnian conflict and this is the position which was stressed again this morning and this afternoon by my colleague, the Minister of Foreign Affairs. Right now, I do not have a report from these NATO meetings, since I am told they are still under way in Europe, but when I have an answer I will contact the hon. member.

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, instead of simply criticizing the United States for their attitude, as the Prime Minister did in an interview he granted to the daily Le Monde, does the government not think it should take a much more constructive approach and consult its main partners in order to come up with solutions that would get the peace negotiations moving again in Bosnia?

• (1445)

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister spoke to the French Senate today which is indeed an honour. I think he is the second foreigner ever to have addressed that body.

After the speech the Prime Minister was quite forceful in his desire for Canada to remain as part of the solution in the former Yugoslavia to help bring tensions to an easier point and to bring negotiations to fruition. Certainly he believes that Canada has a role, and I hope the Prime Minister has a role, to help in any new negotiating process.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the contact group on Bosnia was established in April, two of the five members being countries that had no troops there. Canada is one of the largest contributors but we are excluded.

Why did the government not do its job in April and demand our membership in the contact group? Why did this government wait silently for so long before it finally became involved as conditions worsened? The Canadian people want to know why.

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we made representations at the establishment of the contact group and for reasons I cannot explain Canada was not invited to be part of that group.

Certainly, even though we regret that state of affairs, that does not mean that we renege on our commitments to be an active full member of United Nations missions in Bosnia and Croatia.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if the contact group refuses to admit Canada when the Prime Minister asks this weekend in Budapest what exactly is the government going to do? Are we going to continue to be wimps in answering these sorts of things? Canadian lives are at stake and the people of this country want to know what the government is going to do.

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has been most articulate and most forceful in declaring Canada's interest in participating in all manner of fora to deal with the very terrible conflict in the former Yugoslavia.

We will certainly take note of the hon. member's support for our position that Canada should be much more involved in trying to get a diplomatic solution.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. Next Tuesday, December 6, is a national day of remembrance and action to end violence against women.

Most of the violence women experience is in their homes and at the hands of men they know. What measures is the minister taking to protect women from violence?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are doing a great deal but it is not enough.

We must renew our commitment and focus our energies to do more, but what we have started to date is considerable. I can refer to the initiatives of yesterday with respect to firearms. I can remind the House that one woman every six days is shot to death in this country, that most of the time it occurs in her own home at the hands of someone she knows, and that person is using a rifle or a shotgun. The steps we took yesterday I believe will help in some way to deal with that issue.

I should refer as well to the creation of a national crime prevention council and the attention it will devote to violence against women. I can speak about Bill C–42 and the efforts to change the peace bound provisions to make them more effective to protect victims of domestic violence, and Bill C–41, the matters it deals with in terms of breaches of positions of trust, including relationships between physicians and female patients.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry.

The coalition for affordable telephone services has asked the government to reverse the CRTC's decision to allow telephone companies to raise rates for local calls by $72 annually over a three–year period. Furthermore, the association for competitive telecommunications is concerned that telephone companies would use the additional revenue from local calls to compete unfairly on the long–distance market.

Does the Minister of Industry intend to look into the association's allegations and examine the cost structure of telephone companies that offer local services, to ensure that the increase in local rates approved by the CRTC does not affect competition on the long–distance market?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we received the request to which the hon. member referred just now. I am examining this request, and I think I will submit a recommendation to cabinet before the end of the year to determine the outcome of this case.

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

To allow enough time to check the cost structure of the telephone companies, does the Minister of Canadian Heritage intend to delay the application of the CRTC's decision to allow an increase in local rates as of January 1?

[English]

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is perhaps difficult for the opposition sometimes to understand but responsibility for the telecommunications sector does fall within my domain.

Therefore it will be a recommendation brought forward by me to cabinet which will be dealt with in the course of determining the government's position on the appeal and on the determination made by the CRTC decision 94–19.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

The Reform Party is pleased to see that in general the white paper reflects much of what was recommended by the special joint committee on defence in its report. However, the white paper calls for a reduction in Canadian forces personnel to 60,000, 6,700 below the numbers projected in the February 1994 budget.

The defence review stated that cuts, either financial or numerical, beyond those projected would necessitate the surrender of Canadian forces capabilities. What capabilities has the government identified to be forgone?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do appreciate the support of the hon. member and his party. He worked very hard on the joint committee and he should be commended. I thank him for his consideration.

With respect to the reduction in force personnel from a projected 66,700 as envisioned in the 1994 budget to an end state of around 60,000, we believe that much of the capability can be maintained simply by moving a lot of uniform people out of administrative positions of downsizing, of rationalizing, of privatizing certain services, of doing things efficiently to make better use of the personnel we actually have.

With respect to the specific point about those aspects of combat capability that we are losing, we are sort of trimming at the edges. Obviously the big one is that our fighter capability will be reduced somewhat from about 72 that are in service now to between 48 and 60. We have some flexibility depending on the financial requirements that I will be discussing with the Minister of Finance. It will be largely in that area.

My colleague, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, has made it clear that from now on we just do not have the resources to take part in every peacekeeping mission. It is very expensive and we have to evaluate each request on its merits and look at what we can do and what we can afford to do.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, all of the reductions the minister mentions in his response were included and considered before the recommendations were made.

The defence review recommended that Canada be able to commit to the United Nations and sustain approximately 4,000 personnel. However, the white paper commits numbers that could "conceivably involve in the order of 10,000 military personnel".

As we know from Bosnia and other UN commitments, it is easier to become involved than to disengage. Canada cannot sustain such numbers. Why are we committing them?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, just because we have the capability to commit a certain number does not mean to say we actually do it.

What we say in the white paper is that at any one time we could deploy in missions, not necessarily in peacekeeping but in natural disasters or other measures, up to 10,000 people at once.

We also commit to increase by 3,000 the number of personnel actually involved in the army able to take part in the land forces missions.

• (1455)

Certainly the point that I raised earlier in terms of evaluating each particular mission on its merits answers the hon. member's question. We have to be very judicious in future in the way we deploy our forces. We believe that there is a consensus in Canada that this country really does want to continue to do its part for the UN and to help bring peace and stability to the world.

CANADIAN PACIFIC

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and it concerns the offer by CP to buy CN east of Winnipeg.

I wonder if the Minister of Transport is aware of arguments to the effect that if CP were to be permitted by the government to buy CN east of Winnipeg, given the tax treatment of such a purchase CP might well get CN from the Canadian taxpayer for nothing.

I would like to ask the Minister of Transport if he could assure us that in the event the government does consider this proposal it would make absolutely sure, even if it has to change the tax system to do so, CP does not rip off the Canadian taxpayer by manipulating the tax system in such a way as to get CN for nothing.

Even better, could he assure us today that the government will have nothing to do with this offer whatsoever even though it has been extended?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the question of the unsolicited bid by CP for CN assets east of Winnipeg is under active consideration by both the management of CN and the Government of Canada.

It is a very serious question. In addition to the matters raised by my hon. colleague, there is the question that it would have the result of reducing competition and really changing the way rail operates east of Winnipeg.

It is a very serious not only business question, as the hon. member has raised, but policy question. For that reason we are going to weigh the pros and cons very carefully and the government will announce its decision in due course.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for international financial institutions.

Our government has decided that the way to deal with the problem of the debt and the deficit is to put the economy back on track by stimulating job creation and economic growth.

Could the minister inform the House about the present state of the Canadian economy and tell this House whether the strategy to stimulate employment and growth has been successful?

[English]

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to confirm to this House and to the hon. member the government's commitment to its deficit reduction program on two fronts, the reduction of spending and the growth in the economy.

Since the beginning of the year the economy has forged ahead at a 5 per cent annual rate. It is the best performance in more than six years. During the third quarter real exports were up more than 5.6 per cent, a record level. A tremendous export performance has led to the highest merchandise trade surplus in six years.

Corporate profits are up for the eighth consecutive quarter to levels that will bring more business advancement and more jobs for Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

The government's net spending on Crown corporations in the transportation sector will total $528 million this year. Other major cuts planned for the next few years will almost exclusively affect VIA Rail, which serves all Canadians.

What explanation does the minister have for the fact that Marine Atlantic, which will cost $131 million this year and operates only in the Maritimes, will hardly be affected and that most of the cuts will be borne by VIA Rail?

Mr. Loubier: Shame!

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can inform the hon. member that, in the case of VIA Rail, these cuts are public knowledge and that we are to review VIA's role. I may add that this year, the government has not received a single request from VIA to cut services.

Point of Order

As for Marine Atlantic, during a meeting I had with the president this morning, I advised him that he would have to take a very close look at all the operations of this Crown corporation, since we intend to put the activities of Marine Atlantic on a strictly commercial footing, as we are doing in the case of all sectors for which I am responsible at Transport Canada.

ROYAL ROADS MILITARY COLLEGE

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

Royal Roads Military College is a superb educational facility with a long history on Vancouver Island. Sadly it is falling apart. Much of the faculty and staff have already received their termination notices and the civilian employees are going to close it down in order to get an expeditious move on the decision.

I would like the minister to please tell us exactly what the stumbling blocks are to an agreement and what steps the minister is prepared to organize to make sure there is a speedy resolution to this ongoing problem.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have been concerned with the fate of the Royal Roads College. We have continued the discussions in the last weeks and months.

Last Friday I was in communication with the minister of finance of British Columbia, Ms. Elizabeth Cull, who is in charge of the negotiations. We then faxed to her a new proposal. We received a counterproposal this week. We are now in the midst of negotiations. I would expect that in the course of the next few weeks the negotiations would be finished.

QUESTION PERIOD

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during question period when a very serious question was being put to the Minister of Justice on violence against women and the type of violence that women are suffering, mainly at the hands of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I ask the member to give me a moment. The hon. Speaker, who was in the chair during question period, will return.

The Speaker: I apologize to the hon. member. Would she please put her point.

Mrs. Gaffney: Mr. Speaker, during question period a very serious question was being put to the Minister of Justice with regard to violence against women and particularly about the number of women who die violently at the hands of their partners. This question is something that most members of this House take very seriously.

A member opposite from the Reform Party shouted out in the middle of the question "give them .32s". That is a very serious violation—

The Speaker: The hon. member raises a serious point. I did not hear the statement and therefore I will check the "blues" and at that time, if it is necessary, I will return to the House.

The hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to the point of order raised by the hon. member for Nepean.

I was a witness. I heard the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap say that if women wanted to defend themselves, they could use a .32 handgun.

[English]

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if it is parliamentary language here to say that that is a lie, but I certainly did not say that—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: Order. I gave the floor to the hon. member for Okanagan—Shuswap.

• (1505)

Before we go any further, I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the word lie. Then I am going to give the floor to the hon. member again.

Mr. Stinson: Mr. Speaker, I withdraw that. But what has just been said in the House is a total mistruth. I never said that. I would like to have the record rectified on this.

The Speaker: Order. Evidently we have either a misunderstanding or possibly someone misheard. We have hon. members on one side raising a point of order and we have an hon. member from the other side saying that he who was singled out did not say that.

As your Speaker, I am bound to take the word of hon. members in this House. In the face of an allegation which was totally denied by another member, I am forced to take the word of the hon. member, and I do. I consider this matter closed.

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, a point of order.

The Speaker: Order. Is this on the same point of order?

Mr. Silye: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

The Speaker: Then it is out of order.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like the Government House Leader to tell us what the order of business will be for next week.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to respond to the question of the House leader for the official opposition and provide to him and to other members of the House the weekly statement of government business.

This afternoon and tomorrow the House will debate second reading of Bill C–59, the income tax amendments. On Monday the House will commence with report stage of the grain bill, Bill C–51. On Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday we will consider that bill followed by the environment bill, Bill C–56 and the Department of Public Works and Government Services bill, Bill C–52. On Wednesday we will begin with third reading of Bill C–46 and if it is completed, revert to other unfinished business.

Thursday, December 8 will be the last allotted day for the present supply period and the government will be seeking approval of supplementary estimates at the end of government business on that day.

That is my statement.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Fernand Robichaud (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C–59, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and the income tax application rules, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to launch second reading of Bill C–59, an act to amend the Income Tax Act, which legislates measures contained in last February's budget.

Members will recall that the budget was based on widespread consultations with groups across Canada and these consultations revealed certain concerns among Canadians regarding Canada's personal and corporate tax systems.

As members know, Canadians wanted tax incentives to be better targeted. They wanted tax loopholes to be closed and complexity to be reduced. Overall they wanted a more equitable tax system.

The government shares these concerns and accordingly in the 1994 budget the Minister of Finance proposed measures to make the tax system more supportive of economic growth and more reflective of fiscal realities, simpler to comply with and more respectful of Canadians' ability to pay taxes. Bill C–59 will amend the Income Tax Act to implement several of the budget's tax measures. On behalf of the government, I would like to summarize these amendments.

First, I would like to review these amendments as a reminder to colleagues in the House and to Canadians. The capital gains exemption eliminates the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption and provides an election with respect to the gains accrued before the date of the budget.

The second amendment in the bill relates to employee benefits, extending the taxation of employer provided benefits to include the first $25,000 of life insurance.

The third is the age tax credit, which provides a reduction in the amount of the credit based on an individual's income level.

The fourth amendment is the homebuyers plan, which modifies the provisions of the homebuyers plan, extending it indefinitely for first time home buyers.

The fifth amendment is the charitable donations tax credit which lowers the threshold at which the tax credit is calculated at the highest individual marginal tax rate.

The sixth amendment is the business meals and entertainment expenses, which reduces the percentage of such expenses that may be recognized for tax purposes from 80 per cent to 50 per cent.

The seventh amendment is the tax shelter partnership interests. This amendment requires that limited and other passive partners report any negative adjusted cost base in their partnership interest as a capital gain.

The eighth amendment is the divisive corporate reorganizations, which curtails the tax avoidance technique that allowed capital gains on the disposition of corporate assets to be avoided in certain circumstances.

The ninth amendment is the investment tax credits. This reduces the rate at which the credit is calculated in respect of certain regions. It eliminates the regional component of the credit in respect of scientific research and experimental development and it discontinues the special investment tax credit.

The tenth amendment is the expenditure limit for scientific research and experimental development, which prorates the expenditure limit for a Canadian controlled private corporation based on the corporation's business limit for the year.

The eleventh amendment is the small business deduction which progressively reduces the small business deduction available to Canadian controlled private corporations having a taxable capital over $10 million employed in Canada, so the deduction is eliminated at the $15 million level.

Finally, the twelfth amendment is the mine reclamation fund, which permits a tax deduction for contributions into these funds in the year in which the contributions are made.

This represents a major list of amendments to the Income Tax Act. It will add approximately another 106 pages of rules and regulations to the act.

I support all of these amendments to Bill C–59, but I have to say this is yet another reminder that the the Income Tax Act continues to be complex. In spite of our best efforts I really do not believe we are heading in the right direction when it comes to income tax reform.

I hope all members of Parliament will support us as we put this series of amendments through the House of Commons because the basic principle behind these amendments is to increase economic activity.

We have targeted enhanced support for our small business community, which I know all members of the House support. We have made sure that the homebuyers plan is given added rejuvenation. We have been extremely sensitive to senior citizens at the lower part of the income threshold. These are all efforts to make sure there is fairness and equity, but I believe passionately it is not enough.

We are not going far enough in our income tax reform. In order to get our Income Tax Act on track we have to go back to 1948. Last week I asked one of the pages to get me a copy of the 1948 Income Tax Act of Canada from the Library of Parliament. This document worked very well in those days and is approximately 100 pages for the whole tax act of Canada. This was tax paradise.

Over the years the tax act of Canada has been used to run every sector of the economy, just as these 10 amendments we are talking about today are affecting certain sectors of the economy. They are put in to move and stimulate positively those sectors of the economy.

Over the years there have been so many amendments to the tax act, so many exceptions and exceptions to the exceptions that the tax act is now almost 1,500 pages. As this act has evolved the situation is that even Canada's best tax lawyers and best tax accountants are saying the act is no longer comprehensible. The exceptions to a particular amendment which lead to another exception create so much confusion that an inefficient system is being created.

Did you know that right now before the courts of Canada there are 37,200–odd cases challenging the tax act of Canada? Just think of the cost to the judicial system. Talk about a make work program. This is a make work program in tax challenges alone for the lawyers, most of whom are subcontracted to the Department of Justice. A company which is assessed by the Department of National Revenue and wants to challenge it hires its own lawyer, but the Department of National Revenue calls up the Department of Justice. Justice in turn hires a lawyer to defend the crown.

Right now the taxpayers of Canada are funding 37,000 cases before the courts. Just think of what that does to our judicial system, all because of the lack of clarity and the lack of efficiency in our tax act.

Bill C–59 is a good bill. The specific amendments in it are designed to stimulate the economy and create jobs.

I would like to take this opportunity to say to my colleagues in the House of Commons that perhaps now is the time to look at comprehensive reform of our tax system. Perhaps now is the time to take up the challenge. We have taken up some great challenges in social security reform during the last few months and we will be doing so over the next two months. We have taken up incredible reform of our UI system and our retraining system. Why not take up the challenge of comprehensive tax reform?

Quite frankly when I was re–elected last year I hoped that the notion of comprehensive tax reform would hit the floor of the House of Commons quickly. I was hopeful for a couple of reasons.

The government in its red book said it would look at tax reform. Of course, the finance committee is in the process of listening to all kinds of ideas which are being brought forward. As we prepare for the budget this is a perfect time to look at some alternatives to the tax regime we have right now. That was the number one reason I was optimistic for a shot at real comprehensive tax reform.

The second reason I was optimistic was that I thought I would have some company in this whole notion of tax reform. That is because lo and behold over 50 members of Parliament were elected under the Reform Party flag and I can remember that one of its cornerstones of public policy during the campaign was comprehensive tax reform.

I can remember campaigning in my riding in downtown Toronto against the Reform Party candidate, a terrific candidate. It is awful when someone forgets a person's name. Where is my friend Nick Lamacchia when I need him? He would always help me remember someone's name.

Mr. Silye: If you do not get elected, you are a nobody; if you leave, you are a has been.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Nick, where are you when I need you?

At any rate when we had public debates and it came to the issue of tax reform, the Reform Party candidate would stand up and say: "When it comes to tax reform we support Mr. Mills' idea of a single tax system. We call ours the proportional tax but generally speaking we think he is heading in the right direction". Actually the Reform Party member helped me get elected because some of the things that my constituents perhaps did not like about me were offset by the fact that the Reform Party candidate helped me push forward on the single tax.

Here we are one year later and we have not been able to spark an interest in comprehensive tax reform in this House of Commons. I want members to know that we are missing a great opportunity. You might ask: Why does the government not take it up on its own initiative? It does not work like that around here. As members know, the essence of a democracy is good solid debate. There has to be a to and fro. A good opposition has the ability to move an agenda item from the back burner to the front burner.

On the issue of tax reform the opposition has done a lousy job and that is in spite of my giving them a good push every now and again. At any rate, I want to say to the people of Canada that I passionately believe the single biggest thing we could do to spark economic activity in this country is to act on comprehensive tax reform.

I say that because we as a government are counting on the small and medium size businesses to recharge and reignite this economy. I hear constantly as I am sure other members do from those same small and medium size businesses that the paper burden relating to the income tax system, the complexity of it, and the unfairness of it on the corporate and personal side make it a disincentive to productivity. It is a disincentive to risk taking. It is a disincentive to taking that extra shot.

I believe that. In fact a lot of entrepreneurs who have achieved success are not only frustrated by the tax act of Canada but many of our superachiever entrepreneurs are currently being taxed at a rate of 58 per cent rate when the federal and provincial taxes are combined. Many of them are starting to do two things. Some of them are parking their resources, their investments and their cash offshore. The second thing is some are starting to move themselves offshore. They are not just moving their cash but some of them are actually taking their talent and walking into better tax regimes.

When we have a bill like C–59 with all of its pluses and advantages in moving and improving the tax act it gives us the opportunity to look at the big picture over the next eight to ten years.

If Canada does not have a globally competitive tax system we are going to see talent and capital fly out of this country at a rate we cannot imagine. When capital flies out interest rates go up. It is like any other commodity. A store that has only a few pieces of chicken or a few potatoes can demand a higher price. Capital is no different.

When capital is not in the marketplace or if there is restricted amounts of capital, interest rates go up. That causes a tremendous strain on our ability to service our deficit and our debt. It is a tremendous burden. It is tough for our entrepreneurs. When they go to the bankers and try to rent money from them, those rates are higher as well.

If Canada had a globally competitive tax regime, if we had something like the single tax system where—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order. I know that the member for Broadview—Greenwood, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, is one who can express himself very well and certainly is not in any need of props or anything else to substantiate his arguments on any piece of legislation or debate. I would ask him to keep that in mind.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I thank you for your generous remarks but after five years of trying to advance the debate on tax reform in a comprehensive way sometimes I wonder what you have to do. It is not just props; I think you even have to go beyond props.

At any rate the point I wanted to make was about Canada having a single tax system. On both the personal and corporate sides the rate would be around 20 per cent. On the personal side there would be very generous deductions to make sure those people at the lower income spectrum were protected. If we had a progressive single tax system like that I believe capital would flow into this country in a way we could not imagine. Canada would be the home for capital from all over the world.

It is not unlike the grocery store: if there is a sudden glut of potatoes or of chicken the price goes down. It is not different with capital. If the capital were suddenly parked here in large amounts it would put downward pressure on interest rates. This would mean it would be much easier for us to service our deficit and debt. More important, it would provide capital at an inexpensive price for those one million small and medium size entrepreneurs, those men and women who need to be fired up to get the economy going.

I attended a townhall meeting with my colleague from Nepean last night at which we had a little session on small business and tax reform. One person in the crowd said: "I don't like this kind of a system. I would like a two–tier system. If you make up to $60,000 you pay 20 per cent but once you get over $60,000 you pay 40 per cent". I told him that I totally disagreed with that. I believe the harder we work the more we achieve, and the more we make the more we should have left in our pockets. We should and we have always rewarded productivity in Canada.

I do not believe for a second in a system where people who make millions of dollars get off with paying nothing. I believe in an airtight system and the single tax system is an airtight system. It does not matter whether one is making $100,000, $500,000 or a million, it is 20 per cent; it is airtight. It is airtight on the corporate side as well. If we had a system like that in Canada we would do much to stimulate economic activity.

There is something else we have to be concerned about. In the last three weeks our neighbours to the south have been talking about the issue nearly every day in Washington. There has been a change in the Congress of the United States. Most of the people who were elected three weeks ago in the United States are now starting to talk on almost a daily basis about a single tax system.

That concerns me. If the United States adopts a single tax system before we do we would have a problem. It may be difficult to move money to the islands, to move money to Switzerland or to move a business to another part of South America or some part of eastern Europe, but it will be very easy for Canadians to cross the 49th parallel.

I am standing here today in support of every one of the amendments in Bill C–59. They are targeted amendments. They are all related to generating economic activity. They are simplifying the tax system. I do not disagree with any part of the bill because it is taking us in a positive direction in a constructive way.

My challenge to all members of the House of Commons is that it is good but it is tinkering. It is time to go the whole nine yards, clean up the whole system and start from scratch. If we did that all Canadians would cheer the House. We would have rebuilt trust and respect. More important than all those things or equally as important, we would ignite the entrepreneurial spirit of the country. Our ability to cope and handle our deficit and our debt would be much more focused and much easier to address.

This will probably be one of the last days in this year that we have an opportunity to send out a message to all officials in the Department of Finance, to my colleague, the Minister of Finance, and to all my other colleagues.

Mr. Stinson: He will not listen to you.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): No, that is not true. The Minister of Finance listens to us but he does not listen to just a few of us. He listens to all of us. In order to move an issue forward as comprehensive as this one it cannot be done by one, two, fifty or sixty members. We need one hundred and fifty members to move the issue forward.

Our team presented the idea of a single tax system to the finance committee looking for GST alternatives about two months ago. Opposition members started questioning at the end of our presentation and the finance critic from the Bloc said: "We have no criticism of what you are trying to do but we might not agree with some of your credits". He basically said: "When we become an independent country this is the type of tax system we will have. Why would we begrudge it to the rest of Canada?"

I felt that was a pretty straight comment from the Bloc. Obviously none of us in terms of the Reform and Liberals believe in wanting to destroy the country, but he was certainly direct about the type of tax system they would have. The Reform critic for finance was there and supportive, on side. However there is a missing factor in that equation.

Mr. Silye: Excessive spending.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): No. The problem with trying to achieve tax reform is not the men and women of the Chamber. I believe most men and women who sit in the Chamber hear from constituents about problems and complaints in the tax act.

The problem is Canadians complain day in and day out about the unfair, inefficient, complex tax system. I should not say never, because I have received about 100,000 letters from a community of about 12 million to 15 million taxpayers. I would say that 90 per cent of Canadians complain but they do not do enough. They do not get up to make phone calls or write letters to their MPs on whether they agree or disagree with the status quo or whether they have a better idea.

I believe part of the reason we have tax inertia is that Canadians have not pressed enough of us hard enough. In spite of all that, I personally and passionately believe that if we were to take up this challenge and have a single tax system we would have the most exciting economy on the planet. It would be the fastest way to deal with deficit and debt. In the next budget I hope we can get a reference for this system.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, before proceeding with my speech, allow me to express my scepticism regarding the remarks made by the parliamentary secretary who mentioned the openness of the finance minister and of his government vis–à–vis the consultation process. Supposedly, they are listening not only to MPs, but also to all citizens. This process is a farce; next week we are going to listen to witnesses, while the report has already been written. What kind of influence are these people going to have? The committee must return to Toronto, at the insistence of the Liberal members in the area, to hear more witnesses who did not, or will not, have any impact on the consultations. This is somewhat less than transparent.

Let us go back to Bill C–59, which could be described as one of the pieces of legislation resulting from the Liberal government's first budget. This bill includes 12 specific measures, which are only some of the legislative measures resulting from the last budget. Some are good, others much less so. Some will need to be clarified when the clauses of the bill are reviewed by the committee.

Indeed, this bill was, and still is, the first financial test for the Liberal government. Let us say that, in certain respects, it is very timid. Since coming to power, the Liberal Party may not have had that much time to influence the budget process, a reason which is often given to justify the fact that the budget does not reflect what the Liberals wanted. This is strange because they came to power in October. We were all elected then. They claim they did not have enough time, so they tried to postpone the pre–budget consultations which are supposed to end in mid–December. There is something wrong there.

Let us now move on quickly to the measures themselves. We will come back in more detail on some of them later. The Bloc Quebecois agrees with certain of them. Being more positive than negative by nature, I will start with the ones we agree with, although we will need clarification on some in committee. The first one, of course, is the cancellation of the capital gains exemption on the first $100,000. I will come back to this measure because it has to be put into context to see what happened with capital gains exemptions.

There is also the Home Buyers' Plan, which allows first–time home buyers to use their RRSPs for financing, which is made permanent. This is a good measure. There was much pressure on the Conservative Party at the time, and on the Liberal Party when it came to power, to make it permanent. This has now been done and it is a positive step.

Tax credits for charitable donations. The first $250 used to be deductible at 17 per cent and any amount in excess, at 29 per cent. Now, the limit has been brought down to $200. That is to say that amounts in excess of $200 will be deductible at 29 per cent. There is now an extra $50 that is becoming deductible at 29 per cent. In itself, this is a positive measure. It is not the reform of the century, but we, from the Bloc, recognize the contribution of charitable organizations and other organizations that benefit from this funding. That is why we support this measure.

There are also a number of technical provisions to close certain fiscal loopholes. I am thinking about company reorganization, tax shelters in the form of partnership interests and the small business deduction in particular. Let us just say that there are three measures to close technical loopholes. I will not get into the detail, as this can be done in committee, but this is not the tax reform of the century. It is certainly not the reform the parliamentary secretary would like to see and he is seeking public support to improve on it. Having participated in the consultation process myself, I can tell the hon. parliamentary secretary that public support is a subject that was brought up very regularly by various people.

One of the reasons why we end up with outstanding accounts—if you add up the GST, accounts in dispute and outstanding accounts per se, as they appear on the books, it is in excess of $9 billion—is that somehow individuals do not abide by the applicable part of the social contract, in terms of how revenue is to be collected. So, the system will have to be changed, so that the public can get the right idea. In some cases, public perceptions are quite accurate, but in others, perhaps if we could clarify and simplify things, people could change their minds about certain commonly–held beliefs. But in order to do that, we must lay our cards on the table and not be afraid of being truly transparent.

Another measure dealing with mine reclamation funds permits a tax deduction for contributions to these funds in the year in which the contributions are made. This will benefit these businesses, particularly those which had trouble taking advantage of these measures when closing or confirming their operations.

This bill contains a number of positive measures. I will review two of them, which can be described as being positive but requiring closer scrutiny. One is the capital gains exemption. A few years ago, this exemption was set at $500,000. The first $500,000 in capital gains was not taxable. To help people understand capital gains, I will give an example: Someone could buy, not a principal residence which does not qualify, but a secondary residence, a cottage, for $20,000. When he sells it later for $50,000, he makes a $30,000 capital gain which becomes taxable income. However, the first $500,000 in capital gains is tax–free. At least, it used to be $500,000.

The first reform reduced this exemption to $100,000. Now they want to eliminate it, arguing that it only benefits the rich. This statement, however, requires careful scrutiny. If this measure benefits the rich, it also benefits the future. Some of those who used this capital gains exemption are not affected because they have already exceeded the limit. Many people benefited.

When we say that our financial situation is difficult and that the country is in debt because of our social programs, we should take an occasional look at the cost of tax expenditures. If this approach is not valid today, why was it in the past? Of course, we can say at some point that we must provide the tools needed to stimulate investment, to encourage people to invest in economic development, with appropriate tax incentives. Although investments are still needed today, we say: "No, this measure benefits the rich. It took us a while, but we have finally realized it". In reality, this penalizes young people like myself, people of my generation. Those who would have benefited in the future will be denied this advantage. This is a sacrifice we are willing to make in the fight against the deficit. Although we are willing to make this sacrifice, I find it very difficult to believe that it penalizes today's rich people.

We now must work on this in committee and I can say right now to Liberal Party members: Older people seem to have a problem with this measure this year. The finance minister's budget provides an election in respect of gains accrued before February 22, which authorizes tax–selling throughout the year. To go back to the example I gave earlier, suppose I now have a cottage worth $50,000, which I bought for $20,000. I could resell it to myself for $50,000. If I sell it for $80,000 in 15 years, the only taxable portion will not be $80,000 minus $20,000, or $60,000, but $80,000 minus $50,000, or $30,000, which is the increase in value between February 22, 1994 and the date of the sale.

So this year everyone can sell their tax benefits to take advantage of the exemption for the last time. They must do so before the end of this fiscal year.

Take a senior who collects an old age pension or the income supplement. He must declare it on his tax return under capital gains so his net income which is used to calculate the amount of his pension is artificially increased this year, even though he did not collect it as income. As a result, he might lose some pension or income supplement. There is a problem, because some seniors are being penalized. We would have to know who is being penalized. We will need the information. How much money is involved and why was a mechanism not provided so that people are not discriminated against on the basis of age? Someone who is 64 is not affected, but someone who is 65 or older and makes a capital gain may find his pension or income security affected.

This needs to be looked at carefully. I say that some amendments should certainly be possible. I talked to some accounting offices and they told me that it happens in many cases. Sometimes people take a while to react and now, thanks to the vigilance of some people, we are starting to realize that things are not quite right and that something is not working as it should. We must ask the government whether it intends to penalize seniors or if it is ready to develop some way so that they can avoid being penalized.

I comment now on another measure, the tax credit for charitable organizations. Since the government wants to implement a social program reform which will hit hard, there is good reason to consider providing additional support, so that these groups would somehow have the option of finding their own sources of income. Many officials representing community groups, agencies, charitable institutions and philanthropic organizations told us that this was an avenue to pursue, adding that an evaluation should be made of how much it costs the government to either give funding to organizations, or encourage them more strongly to raise funds. Then the government's participation, from a fiscal point of view, should be looked at.

This is an avenue which must be pursued thoroughly, and the minister should conduct such an analysis before going ahead with in a social program reform which will adversely affect these groups.

The few measures proposed to close some loopholes are symbolic of the will of this government to eliminate all existing loopholes in the taxation system. We keep raising the issue of family trusts, which is still being examined by a committee. More people than ever before feel that there is a lot of money involved. It is very difficult to get information. In fact, it is almost impossible. But the government does not seem interested in getting that information.

The government will consult on just about anything, but it cannot provide the required information to form an opinion on this issue. Eliminating family trusts might be much more profitable for the government than implementing the few proposed measures. These measures must be taken too, but there are initiatives which would help restore public confidence.

People say that there is a problem with family trusts. When it comes to RRSPs, the government says: What we want to do is take a chunk of your future income now, either by taxing RRSPs or by lowering the maximum to which you can contribute. It is essentially telling people that they will have to pay taxes immediately instead of when they cash in their RRSPs. However, the government does not follow the same reasoning when it comes to capital gains in family trusts. Indeed, it may take up to 80 years before such gains are taxed.

I do not see any logic there. The time has come to target the general public—and it is true that this is the most profitable move, because it affects the largest number of people—but the middle–class is tired of always being the scapegoat, while those who earn the most are left alone.

I watched the Minister of Finance last week, when he was the guest on Jean–Luc Mongrain's program. There was a pyramid of small blocks representing social classes. Mr. Mongrain asked the minister: Where are you going to cut? The minister was hesitant in choosing a block, thinking: I cannot really go for the middle one, because all the other blocks will fall and it would not look good. He was reluctant to take the block at the top. And when he realized what he had to do, Mr. Mongrain asked him: "Why not take the top one?" He took it without any hesitation and said: "I will take them first". Surprise, surprise! Everybody saw him hesitate when he went for the block in the middle, representing the middle class. That was an object lesson people will remember.

There is another aspect to this and I am referring to butterfly companies and tax shelters. This was partly addressed in the last budget. The government should listen a little more to the Auditor General instead of just paying him to publish his annual report!

The government has invested $50 million in the Auditor General's activities, so we might as well make sure this money is made more productive. I am not saying they are not doing a good job, but the government has to use the information they provide. There are still many so–called problem countries listed because of the opportunities they provide for tax evasion as a result of a lack of reciprocity between their tax systems and ours. There are still 16 countries on this list, and in some cases an investigation followed by corrective action would be necessary.

It gets very complicated when you want to go after the top blocks. When you want to get at the top of the pyramid, it is not easy, and the government never seems to have the best tax experts. They are all in the private sector, and they know how to use the tax system to make money. So I do not believe that is the answer.

We have resources here to be able to evaluate all this. People know that but of course there is a very strong lobby, and lobbying expenses are tax deductible, would you believe. They did not talk about that either. They may talk about cutting the amount you can deduct for charitable donations, things like that, but never a word about lobbyists. Perish the thought!

I was talking about the measures we support and that there is room for improvement. I will now talk about the measures we oppose, because we will vote against this bill since it contains measures that would not appear and, in fact, are not in order. Those of my colleagues who will speak on this bill will have a chance to come back to this issue, however, the government singled out the age credit and I will devote a small part of my speech to that.

Although we did not estimate its impact precisely, we have some questions about the reduced deduction for meals and entertainment. We are not necessarily dead set against it, but we would like to evaluate its impact, and we will be able to do that in committee, since there is some time left before its implementation.

Then there are the investment tax credits. The notion of regional development seems to have been dropped. The region is Canada as a whole. I will come back to this to explain what happened. Technically speaking, it is rather complex, but things have happened. There again there is a lack of imagination. Revenue has to be raised but during election campaigns candidates always say, and the Prime Minister was no exception: "We will not raise taxes, at least not in the first two years".

Yet, we tax employee benefits like employer-provided life insurance. Previously the first $25,000 of coverage were tax free, this will no longer be the case. Why is the government afraid of saying that it is a new way to get more money? Because it would not be able to claim that it did not raise taxes. However, taxpayers realize that as the years go by, there is less money left in their pockets.

They are told: "No, we did not raise taxes". They think: "This does not make sense! The government finds all kinds of tricks to come and take our money". Then, people start getting mistrustful, and they think: "It is my turn now to get even and find ways to avoid giving money to the government".

Therefore they deal under the table, they pay cash and avoid paying taxes. Merchants, too, get on the bandwagon, for they are also consumers. Many small merchants, who belong to the middle class, are just as frustrated as consumers; they understand their fellow consumers and they do the same thing. This is how the underground economy was created. The finance minister does not agree with his colleague, the revenue minister, on the size of the underground economy, nor do they agree on the importance of tightening the collection of unpaid taxes.

For his part, the finance minister claims that efforts are needed, that it does not make sense, whereas the revenue minister tries to minimize the situation regarding unpaid taxes. With a sudden change of heart, Mr. Martin realizes that there is a good deal of money there, but he admits that there are few solutions for improving the situation.

You know, we have seen it before. Year after year, it is the same thing. I recall especially the past three years, maybe because I am the youngest. I believe the next budget is going to be tough, it is going to hurt. This is what we see in the press every November or December. In January, the finance minister will say: "I will not comment on individual measures, wait for my budget". In February, we get a budget which is not all that tough and the deficit for the year is reasonable. The big deal this year is that the deficit is not higher.

It will probably be around $38 or $39 billion, but some expenses are not recurring. This year, for instance, the Unemployment Insurance Fund has a surplus so that the deficit is two to three billion dollars less than last year. But this is not a reason to rejoice. We have skipped a turn, there was a non-budget or rather a budget without any effect. They believe that economic growth will solve the problem but we will need much more than that.

I would now like to talk about the regional investment tax credit. I will try to be as simple as possible about all the technical aspects. There were three regional investment tax credits. There was the special investment tax credit; the investment tax credit in the Atlantic region and the investment tax credit for scientific research and experimental development, also in the Atlantic region. To tell you the truth, nothing is simple in the taxation system; there are numerous credits, and the fact that the federal government wants to take action of its own in regional development often results in that kind of situation.

The first one, the special investment tax credit of 30 per cent is abolished. It was mainly used for buildings, machines and equipment.

The second one, the investment tax credit in the Atlantic region, is reduced from 15 per cent to 10 per cent.

The other one, the investment tax credit for scientific research and experimental development, which was 30 per cent in the Atlantic region and 20 per cent elsewhere, is reduced to 20 per cent across the board.

We can see that regional investment tax credits are generally not considered as effective economic means to attract additional investments. After a while, we can see that they do not have the results expected.

The real question to be asked is: Why? Why did it not have the expected results? Because there must be a direct incentive somewhere. Maybe if there were not always the same problem with two governments, each in its own way, trying to stimulate experimental development, especially aimed at small and medium size enterprises—because it is the thing to do nowadays, when you are a finance minister, to talk about small and medium size enterprises. They talk about it but they do not necessarily act on it. It always sounds good in their speeches. They talk about measures especially for them.

When you look at the way things are, when you look at these people, who are born entrepreneurs, who came up with good ideas and were able to capitalize on it, you come to the same conclusion as many have, including the Standing Committee on Industry and other committees. These people have strong points, these are brave and enterprising people who are helping to build Canada and Quebec, but they also have some weaknesses, one of them is their lack of administrative expertise. This could explain why some projects have failed.

These people are good businessmen and women, with good ideas, but we provide them with such complicated tools; depending on where they are located and what they do, with this type of tax credit, there are three possibilities— They become so disheartened that they start to think that, with all the time they are going to lose on these tax breaks, they might as well go back to their business and get some more work done. It would cost less and they would be able to save more money than they would have by using the tax credit.

They are not entirely wrong, since consultant services in this area, whether we are talking about lawyers, tax specialists, or others can be costly. This may be why they are not widely used.

With regard to regional development, here is what we say to the federal government: Instead of squandering your money, why not transfer these resources to the provinces which are probably in a better position to understand the specific needs of their regions. In turn, the provinces can allocate this money anyway they want to.

For example, transfer the tax points and assess how much these credits are costing you. Tell yourself: We still want to help businesses, because we know there are future entrepreneurs out there and we want to help them work on their weaknesses, like their lack of interest in research and development, so we will provide them with the means to do so. Transfer the resources where they are needed. We are not talking here about transferring dozens of tax points, these are not major expenditures, but we will see what will happen.

I am convinced, as many others are, that the closer a level of government is to people, the more it is able to understand the people's specific characteristics. We should stop managing everything from this level and we are certainly not doing so with this measure. What the government is doing once again is setting its own standards nation–wide, and it will continue. . . I am sure other tax credits will be created and soon the situation will be just as complex as what we have now.

This year, the Auditor General was harsh in his judgment, especially on the issue of money. Even if our country lags behind in the area of research and development, the little we spend, we spend inadequately. And this comment applies to all areas. In almost all fields of activity, people say we are spending too much and they are convinced there is a better way to spend whatever amounts we do spend. Better spending practices alone would improve our performance in the area of economic development. But it is hard for such changes to get to the top, all the way to this place. Whether we are talking about the tax system or the transmission of information, it is always a problem for changes to reach the highest levels. The message does not always get there, in spite of numerous consultations.

Another measure is the age tax credit. It certainly is striking. At one time, the present Minister of Human Resources Development was a member of the opposition. He was there during the Tory period. We all remember the Charlie Brown incident, when the Tories launched an attack on the old age pension. Just look at what he said in those days. He said this, about the budget, here in this House, on June 18, 1985: It is a fact that the government has reduced considerably, and in a backward way, the purchasing power of seniors. Not only are they being deprived of income assistance, but their purchasing power is also being reduced. And as if this was not enough, the government hits them again by cutting two billions—in dollars of 1985—in transfers to provinces, between now and 1990. Clearly, this budget is an attack on several fronts against seniors'incomes. Now, in their first budget, the Liberals reduce the age credit. Eight years later, they do exactly was they opposed back then.

We sometimes have this impression of déjà vu. At one time or another, we all feel as though we have already lived a particular experience. Since the beginning of this new Parliament, we often have this feeling of being back to 1985, under a Conservative government. The Liberals conduct the same consultation exercises that they criticized before, and they do so regarding the same issues. They deal with problems in the same way as the Conservatives did, something which they would never have dared mention during the election campaign.

Let me explain this age credit. People aged 65 and over can ask for a tax credit equivalent to 17 per cent of $3,500. This is a non refundable credit; in other words, it can only be applied to the tax payable. If there is excess tax to be paid, the credit cannot be refunded. That credit translates into a tax reduction of about $610 per year. From now on, seniors with a net income of over $25,921 will see this credit diminish progressively with every dollar over that amount. The credit will totally disappear when the income reaches $49,100. Is this the level to be found at the top of the pyramid the Minister of Finance was talking about during the TV interview he granted to Mr. Mongrain? Was that the top block, an income of $25,000 or $26,000 for the elderly?

In the meantime, a new level of Old Age Security benefits is being added. The government clawbacks the old age pension it pays to people with incomes over $52,000. This level includes income from about $52,000 to $80,000. Now the government is proposing a new level for incomes between $25,000 and $49,000. Is this the basis for a new scale or, where old age pension is concerned, is the government trying to add new levels to the existing scale in order to reduce benefits? I think we have good reasons to be concerned. Very often, this is the way things happen. Once you have an in, it is easy to do whatever you want. Here, the government has set this new level and in the future we will most probably see the government adjust or recover pensions paid to elderly Canadians with a net income of over $25,000.

Older Canadians are concerned and have trouble understanding why they are the first to be picked on in this budget. Over the next three years, the government will recover $500 million. In 1985, the Minister of Human Resources Development feared that the then government would clawback $2 billion over a period of five years. But now he is not concerned about the $500 million the government will recuperate over the next three years. The worst part is that what he was objecting to was partly implemented, therefore older people already lost money. He thought that was indecent, but now that the government is asking for more he is in the Cabinet and he is going to do it.

My colleagues will have a chance to elaborate on the issues regarding seniors, but I must say that senior citizens are more and more concerned. This is somewhat ironic, because members opposite, to fight Quebec sovereignty, go to retirement homes and talk to seniors, trying to scare them. They tell them that Quebec separation would endanger their well–being and they use the vilest substantives they can find. They blackmail them with their pensions, because the cheques they receive bear the logo and flag of the federal government.

Yet, this same federal government is the first to pick here and there in their pockets. Yes, there is something to do collectively to fight the debt. While there might be some categories of senior citizens willing to do more, they do not want to be first because they do not seem themselves as different from other taxpayers. We should strike at the top of the pyramid, at those who benefitted from the capital gains exemption in the past. Today they are still alive, and probably rich. This is no coincidence.

When we draw the pyramid, we realize that the top gets higher, but that the middle is slumping. We have a pyramid with an ever bigger base and an ever higher and narrower peak. The gap between rich and poor is widening.

Of the 20 million taxpayers, 50 per cent have incomes of less than $20,000 and 60 per cent, below $25,000. At this level, there is not much hope of getting at the top of the pyramid, and by so doing perhaps make our society more equitable, high enough to dare demand that those who finance the major political parties do their share to solve the debt and deficit problem in general. It seems difficult to ask for such an effort.

In conclusion, all committee members will look at these legislative measures in detail and report back at third reading in this House. This is a relatively timid and cautious budget, probably because the government ran out of time. People have high expectations for 1995; they expect us not only to reduce the deficit but to do it in a fair and equitable manner. Successfully meeting the debt challenge requires that everyone co–operate by fighting the temptation to evade taxes. To achieve this goal, people must know what the government's intentions are and feel that it is acting fairly and equitably. They are willing to give the Minister of Finance a chance because he is new at this and because this will be his first real budget this year.

They may blame him for wasting a year. We lost two years because of the election; one year because after its leadership race, the Conservative Party did not dare table a budget. They decided to give some leeway to the new administration. Then the newcomers argued that they got there too late. As a result, we lost two more years in the fight against the deficit, two more years during which the debt grew by $40 billion. That is a lot of money. This additional $80 billion is costing us between $5 billion and $6 billion in interest charges alone.

That is a lot of money, and I cannot help talking about an impending threat with respect to the next budget. Rumours to the effect that RRSPs will be affected continue to circulate. And there is no truth to the allegation that the Official Opposition is keeping it alive, contrary to what the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance maintained three or four weeks ago and, realizing it was not credible, stopped saying so, but now, someone is playing the parrot, taking an old quote and circulating the same rumour again.

The Minister of Finance could very easily state, in any of the speeches he makes in his travels—because I am convinced that he gets media attention when he travels—that plans to put government finances in order, for next year, do not include taxing RRSPs. Because there is a problem. People who try to sell RRSPs, who are trying to get other people to contribute, are faced with the normal reaction of individuals telling them: "Sure, but there is much talk about RRSPs. Apparently, they are going to be taxed. We are going to have to pay tax on that money". It does not sell well. Potential customers are sceptical.

They may go for it, but it will probably be more difficult this year to sell RRSPs, and that constitutes saving. One of my colleagues, the hon. member for Rosemont, quoted statistics on consumer saving in Canada, showing the decline in saving. On one hand, we could be glad that people are consuming more and stimulating our economy, but on the other, we must be concerned because their ability to consume is increasingly limited.

There is a problem, because our recovery could level off, especially with what is happening to economic growth in the United States, which is operating close to capacity, raising fears of inflation and all that this involves. So we need savings. Hitting savings would send a very bad signal. Not only is our future being mortgaged and our debt burden very high but today they want to take a bite out of our future income as well.

I am very worried. I am trying to think what the situation will be for a finance minister in 15 or 20 years. He would be able to count on the income from retired people since they will be cashing in their RRSPs. Instead of collecting benefits, many will be taxpayers. If they are not encouraged to invest in their own retirement—and anyway, all they are doing is deferring income tax—what will happen in 15 or 20 years? Again, the room to manoeuvre will be limited.

Let us solve the government's financial problem without touching RRSPs and within 15 or 20 years, we will have a much greater pool of revenue. I am concerned, but it also makes me smile, that in the finance minister's grey paper, it is listed as a tax expenditure, with a very awkward calculation, but basically it is deferred income. If someone puts money in an RRSP, it will be taxed when he takes it out.

It is true that many taxpayers could find their RRSP taxed at a lower rate than it is today. That is the incentive for the government and that is a tax expenditure. The tax expenditure is not the amount which taxpayers can deduct this year: It is only the difference between what they would now pay in taxes and what they will pay when they cash in their RRSPs. This might be a sizable amount, but it is also the actual figure which the government should quote.

However, the government uses a different approach. It would rather come up with huge figures and say: "It costs us $15 billion". We are not only talking about RRSPs, but also about registered pension plans. The government says that it badly needs money and that it must get it somewhere. Then it is quick to add that it might be a good idea to look at this option, using the argument that rich people who put a lot of money in their RRSPs are benefitting more than others.

But that is not necessarily the case. Indeed, when these very rich people cash in their RRSPs, chances are they will still be in the same tax bracket. Consequently, in their case, it is strictly a tax deferral.

The government should tell it like it is. When it calculates tax expenditures, it should do so accurately.

In conclusion, I want to point out that there are measures such as the use of RRSPs for the purposes of the Home Buyers' Plan. RRSPs could be a more effective tool for economic development, based on the argument that, maybe, people should invest more at the local level. Whether or not this is a good idea could give rise to a long debate.

So, the government takes such measures but, at the same time, it is considering going after RRSPs. This is not good, and I hope that the Minister of Finance will have the courage to say: Enough is enough, RRSPs will not be touched this year. Just like he said he would not lower UI contributions.

The Bloc Quebecois opposes the bill as a whole because it targets seniors. Some measures will have to be clarified in committee and, in any case, we will discuss it again at third reading. The real budget will be tabled next year and people will not be as tolerant as they were this year. That budget will have to bring results.

[English]

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to address Bill C–59, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and the income tax application rules. This bill is nothing more than a 110–page sequel to the confusing, convoluted Income Tax Act which has become a 10,000 page script of income tax rules, regulations and subsections.

I am beginning to think that the Income Tax Act is some sort of secret government IQ test. Like most sequels, Bill C–59 serves up more of the same, showing no new ideas, no new twists and, for the most part, it would have been better if the writer had sat down and spent the time writing something new.

With Bill C–59 the federal government eliminates the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption which will seriously impede the build–up of capital in Canada. This is at a time when most wealthy people have already used up their exemption, whether it was the $500,000 or the $100,000. It is nothing more than a tax on the middle class who are the very people the Liberals purport to represent.

What the government should be doing is eliminating $5 billion in direct subsidies to businesses and start privatizing some of the 380 crown corporations. Like the Conservatives, the Liberals have continued to pick the pockets of taxpayers.

The biggest job that the Liberals are working on right now is figuring out how to get more money from the taxpayer without disturbing the voter. It boggles the mind to watch the government go after capital gains. It is considering taxing RRSPs and it is apparent that the Canada pension plan is in major trouble due to revenue shortfalls.

The questions that beg to be asked by Canadian taxpayers are: What is in it for me? Where are the incentives? What benefit do we get from government spending? Can someone give us a break? The answer is no.

The average benefit to taxpayers is about $20,000 per person while they are paying out about $22,000. In other words, they are getting less in benefits from the government than what they are paying in taxes. That is why people are very sensitive about paying taxes. We are at the high end of the tax scale. In fact, we are too far at the high end of the tax scale.

For the Liberals it is the same old story. The answer to these questions and problems are very complex. They must be studied. They will need committees, subcommittees, task forces and of course, to quote the finance minister, input for effective output and we must square the circle to solve the problems facing Canadians.

A planned economy is what the Liberals are targeting with infrastructure, a $2 billion expense; CIDA, Canadian International Development Agency, $2.2 billion, let us develop the other countries, let us help them not Canada; direct grants and subsidies to businesses, $2 billion. Yes, a planned economy. That is when the politicians make the plans and the people make the economies.

We have seen this movie before under directors Trudeau and Mulroney. Now we are going to add director Chrétien to the list. The only solution the current finance minister can come up with is to blame, first, the previous government for the inherited debt of $480 billion, as the Liberal government conveniently forgets that close to $200 billion of that was left by them when it left the House in 1983–84.

Second, the finance minister blames the Bloc Quebecois, the separatist official opposition, which he claims is negatively influencing the investment community.

Third and most recently, after a year in power he blames small and medium size businesses for not increasing productivity in the marketplace. It is their fault the economy went into a recession, according to the finance minister a couple of days ago in an interview with the Financial Post.

What will be the fourth excuse? I do not know but it will not be addressing the real issue. I would like to tell Canadians that Reformers and the Reform Party are currently working on a different script, a new story that will have a better ending for all Canadians.

If there is anything this bill proves it is the need for true tax reform. Listen to the 12 items the finance minister is trying to deal with: capital gains exemptions; employee benefits; age tax credits; homebuyers plan; charitable donations tax credit; business meals and entertainment expenses; tax shelters; partnership interests; divisive corporate reorganizations; investment tax credits; expenditure limit for scientific research and experimental development; small business deduction and mine reclamation funds.

Mr. Schmidt: Mind boggling.

Mr. Silye: Yes, mind boggling.

Although we support all of these measures with the exception of the capital gains elimination, it represents a whole bunch of tinkering with little gain for Canadian taxpayers and the government. It has spent a year doing nothing but politics as usual, as did the Conservatives. Canadians voted for change. They thought the Liberals would change the way we conduct business and they have changed very little.

We need a new set of principles to set a new direction for federal taxation. The need for reform in matters of taxation is widely recognized. The federal government under Brian Mulroney raised taxes 33 times and implemented the GST plan in the face of widespread opposition.

The Liberal government is now considering revisions that will inevitably prove to be even more unsatisfactory, a combination of the son of GST, called the NATVAT, or a surtax on income or both. Consumption taxes on top of income taxes are not the answer.

Five fundamental principles should be applied to the Canadian system of taxation: first, all taxation programs of whatever kind should be for the exclusive purpose of raising revenue to fund authorized government spending and should not be for the purpose directly or indirectly to shape economic or social activity.

Second, all taxation programs should be consistent with the governmental role of creating a framework. It can be square or round, whichever—we do not have to mess around, whether we square it or round it, or round it or square it—just do what is right so it widens people's choice and wherever possible leaves power and responsibility in the hands of the people.

Third, tax legislation should be simple and easily understood by taxpayers, permitting most taxpayers to file their own returns.

Fourth, taxation should be visible, that is, no hidden taxes.

Fifth, rates of taxation should be limited and not punitive for both individuals and corporations. The incentive should be to reward production and leave more dollars in the hands of taxpayers and wage earners than the government. The only purpose of taxation should be to raise funds.

However, we have become accustomed to a multiplicity of objectives in our taxation system. It tries to encourage domestic production, investment in certain industries, charitable donations and further education. It tries to discourage smoking, drinking, imports and pollution. Unfortunately it also ends up discouraging taxpayers.

There will always be convincing arguments for making the taxation system more responsive to some other government initiative. Examples are taxes on petroleum products to protect the environment; taxes on alcohol or smoking to reinforce moral standards and healthier living.

Once we give in to one of these arguments we leave ourselves open to making judgments based upon personalities, effectiveness of lobby pressure, political expediency and other human frailties.

I believe the only purpose of taxation should be to raise funds needed to pay for government programs approved by the Canadian voters. I believe a proportional tax is the answer to creating a simpler, more efficient and more effective system of taxation.

The idea of a proportional tax is an attempt to improve upon the flat tax models that have circulated for many years to improve upon the single tax as proposed many years ago by the member for Broadview—Greenwood who is presently working on the single tax and trying to refine it, improve it and make it understandable to the government. Now that he is on the government side it would be hoped that members of the government would pay more attention to the proposal because it has a lot of advantages. There are a lot more advantages than disadvantages.

Of course it has that one big weakness that governments do not like and that government bureaucracies do not like. It is too simple and because it is too simple it will not work. It has to be complicated, convoluted and confusing before governments will support it.

An hon. member: Isn't that a shame?

Mr. Silye: That is a shame. Much has been made of simplifying the tax system. Successive governments have succeeded only in adding dramatic complications while explaining at the same time that they are simplifying it.

The member for Broadview—Greenwood as he spoke to the bill today found himself saying—and it was the only part of the speech I did not like—that he supported the 12 measures and that it did improve the Income Tax Act. While it laid out a more level playing field in 11 areas, it distorted the capital gains area. It is easy to fall into that trap.

We defend a bill by explaining that it simplifies things, yet we are adding to the problem. I do not know the cost in millions of dollars for this one bill alone, but it probably involved modifying different regulations, sections and subsections to get the 12 items changed in the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Schmidt: It is 110 pages.

Mr. Silye: No, the Income Tax Act is more than 110 pages.

Mr. Schmidt: No, no. That is the addition.

Mr. Silye: The addition is 110 pages. It is amazing. The vast majority of individual Canadians should be able to confidently prepare and file their personal income tax returns without the services of tax consultants. Tax consultants should be busy calculating taxes on profits, not companies going into receivership.

Requirements of a simple and fair income tax system are one flat rate of tax, one personal exemption amount per individual, the same deductions for all individuals and corporations, and a clear understanding of the definition of income. A simplified tax system also allows lower income individuals to claim a personal exemption to avoid taxes on a basic living income. An individual's income is much easier to track than an individual's expenditures.

I would suggest that a proportional tax on income is the most acceptable tax model for Canada. It is a flat tax model that would be ideal for provincial and municipal governments, although I am aware that the federal government cannot and should not force provinces and municipalities to adopt any particular tax policies.

What I mean is that the government determines where it should spend the money, what programs Canadians want and need and how much is required to deliver services. In the process it has to be evaluated which government can better deliver a service. As some of the services are pushed down to lower levels of government and are within provincial jurisdiction, they are given the same points in taxation to raise the money for services because the federal government will no longer need them.

That is how the system would work. That is how we could clean up the current Income Tax Act. That is what I mean by taking out income taxes as the driving vehicle for economic and social development and social policy.

I call our version of the flat tax a proportional tax versus a flat tax or a single tax because it would be calculated in proportion to family size, income and therefore according to the ability to pay. I will explain that a little further on when I get into a sample of a single page tax return that I know members would look forward to filling out one day in the near future.

There is considerable logic to adopting a taxation system that can be efficiently administered. The calculation of income would utilize generally accepted accounting principles without special rules specified by government.

This proposal defines income to be productive income from employment, business and investments, including interest income, capital gains, pensions and dividends. It also allows immediate deduction of capital acquisitions in the year of purchase but would not tax capital gains on an individual's primary personal residence due to many economic variables over a long period of time.

Let me review two tax forms that I believe would improve our international competitive advantage if we adopted them within two years. I am borrowing some of these points from the member for Broadview—Greenwood, but it is very critical at this point to get a handle on excessive spending by governments, have more efficient and effective spending by governments, determine which levels of government should be raising and spending that money for delivery of services to the people, determine which crown corporations should be privatized and which ones are better administered and run by the private sector versus the public sector. I cannot be told that all 380–plus crown corporations are better in the hands of government bureaucracy.

I recommend that over 90 per cent of them are better off in the hands of the private sector.

Yes, there are some businesses and corporations that should be administered by the crown and we should retain them, but we should have a review of which crown corporations should stay in government hands and which ones should go to the private sector.

By deciding which level of government should deliver a service we have removed the need to raise x amount of funds for the federal government. By privatizing we eliminate the need of direct subsidies to crown corporations and businesses of $2.2 billion. That is another saving.

Another aspect is the process of doing a government review of government programs. No standing committee that I know of reviewing the prior year's spendings on the main estimates talked about a sunset clause. We do not have a habit of doing that in the House.

Very few programs expire on a certain date; they go on ad infinitum. In many cases cabinet ministers, ministers of the crown who are currently trying to do the job that they were elected to do a year ago, are in no way, shape or form in control of the purse strings. Money is being spent by administration, by the departments, that they only find out about if it hits the newspapers or if opposition parties point out the misspending of moneys. That just proves my point that we hold cabinet ministers accountable but in effect they are not the ones who are spending the money.

This has to be fixed and we are trying to tell the government how to fix it. We are trying to point it out to the government, yet somehow it refuses to listen to us and ends up embarrassing itself. It knows full well that it is not in charge of these funds in all cases.

Let us get back to the proportional tax system and what a flat tax would be like. It would be one page in length. It would be one side only. The other side would be blank so it could be folded and mailed like that. It would have employment income; investment income which includes interest, dividends, capital gains and rental income; and any other income which includes UI benefits, pensions, old age security payments, alimony, child support payments and foreign income. That would be all the areas of income that would be defined. The key principle under income is that a buck is a buck. All personal income generated in any form should be taxed with no special treatment for various forms of income.

From this income would be deducted, for example, the personal exemption. Everybody would have a personal exemption of $12,000 to generate income; a spousal income of $6,000 less the spouse's income; a child care deduction of $5,000 up to age 7 and $3,000 between ages 7 and 14. RRSP contributions would be deductible but the maximum would be $6,000, not the current $13,500. That would tax higher income people. They would not be able to find loopholes to reduce their taxable income.

This tax form is geared toward the middle income which comprises the majority of Canadians. This taxation system would help them. It is a taxation system geared to help people who make between $45,000 and $65,000 per year so they can raise families, look after their homes, look after their spouses and look after themselves.

There would be an age deduction of about $2,000 for 65 years of age and over. If foreign income is declared, any foreign tax paid would be offset. Other mandatory deductions would be UIC premiums, CPP contributions and any alimony or child support payments.

The deductions I have gone through on a personal tax form are at levels the middle class can afford. It would result in more tax being extracted from the wealthy than is now the case and would leave more disposable income in the hands of taxpayers.

Mr. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood) What is your rate?

Mr. Silye: I will get to my rate in a minute. Lower income earners would be basically exempted from paying tax and families would be granted a generous deduction to help them get by on one income.

Leaving the dollars in the hands of the people who make them in the first place eliminates the need for the government to collect and redistribute the funds. There are handling costs both ways and the net result is that the person who is dishing it out and is making $18,000 a year and qualifies for some social assistance gets less back than what he or she had in the first place. Why not leave it there? That would help relieve some of the strain, stress and pressure on our welfare program. It would be a form of savings for the government as well.

The purpose of the RRSP contribution being reduced to $6,000 from $13,500 would be to gear the program more toward middle income earners, thus not appearing to favour the wealthy. Spousal income up to $6,000 would be filed on one return. However any spousal income exceeding $6,000 would require a separate return with a $12,000 exemption allowance. It might be a little difficult for two people to fill out two forms but I do not think that is as difficult as the current tax form.

Let me refer to the advantage of the deductions I have described. The child care deduction would help solve two of the biggest problems in our society today. We have the Suzanne Thibaudeau case wherein the recipient of child support payments said they were not enough money and she does not wish to pay tax on them, whereas the payer of the child support payments has a deduction. If we do not allow the deduction for the payer and do not tax the recipient, we will find that settlements will be less and the whole single family syndrome will be distorted.

To help solve the problem, we would allow a reasonable amount for child care to be given to all families, to all wage earners, of $5,000 up to age 7 and $3,000 between ages 7 and 14. If there is a divorce, and it happens in 50 per cent of the marriages these day, the recipient of child support payments would be allowed to offset that income. The deductibility would be back to normal. It would help solve a big headache for the finance minister.

Members of the government have private members' bills that conflict with what the finance minister knows to be valid and true in terms of the taxation and deduction system. They are at odds and have a problem on their hands. I am offering them a constructive solution.

That is what a proportional tax form would look like. Some people have asked me outside the House: "How are we going to make investments? It is going to hurt the economy". The rate charged in the proportional tax would be between a low of 15 per cent and a maximum of 20 per cent. It would be somewhere in that rage. It is a range right now because we have to determine what services the federal government will keep. What services is it going to look after? How much money is required for those programs? To raise that amount of money it can look at the gross incomes, look at the GDP and establish the rate.

A corporate tax return would be just as simple. It would be one side of one page. The gross income would include GST or NATVAT or a combination, and all corporate income. The deductions from this would include GST or NATVAT paid and the cost of operations: goods, services and materials; wages, salaries and benefits; interest payments; and pension contributions. Another deduction would be dividends paid out for domestic shareholders only. This eliminates the current problem of double taxation on dividends.

Another deduction would be capital investments at cost, no depreciation. That might surprise some people because a company might be generating $2 million in sales and qualifies for a loan at the bank and qualifies for a $4 million land and building. That would be deductible against the $2 million income and would create a loss. That loss would be carried forward until the profits chewed it up. I believe we should only tax income once and the recipient of that $4 million would be paying the income tax.

The total deductions would be subtracted from the income and the answer multiplied by the rate of 15 per cent or 20 per cent. I recommend not to go higher than 20 per cent and not to go lower than 15 per cent. A system like this is simple. It is understandable. It is equitable and would be a lot more efficient.

The fundamental approach to corporate income is to ensure that income is only taxed once, as I mentioned before. If we apply this principle to the current GDP of $750 billion this could generate a 15 per cent tax rate. Assuming that income is only taxed once that goes through the economy and would generate $112 billion. At a 20 per cent tax rate it would generate $150 billion.

We could almost have a balanced budget. If the government spends around $160 billion including the interest on the debt to raise $150 billion out of a taxation system at a 20 per cent rate and leaves disposable income in the hands of those earning it, the corporations and individuals, they would be making their investments with after tax dollars.

There would be no need to have tax driven deals and tax driven models. Accountants and tax lawyers would not be figuring out ways to create loopholes for the following two years which have to be shut off. That cycle would end.

People who take care of their basic needs, their food, shelter and clothing and make over, say it is $25,000 or $45,000 whatever the amount is, might have a few thousand dollars to invest. They would invest after tax dollars. They would give it to a corporation. It could be a mining company trying to raise money, an oil or gas company trying to raise money, or a manufacturing company trying to raise money.

That company would invest the seed capital, generate its product or services and would make a profit. The company would pay out dividends to the shareholders. The company would get a deduction and the recipients would pay the tax. It all works. You do not need tax driven investment in this society.

If we just get our mindset into an acceptable mode for a paradigm shift then we could make progress. The problem is that not enough people in this country are ready for the change. I will echo what I heard earlier from a government member on this issue. Until people say they want change, until Canadians recognize that change is attainable and there is an alternate solution to this dreaded Income Tax Act and the income tax that continues to rise and confuse people, until they accept the need and demand change, nothing will happen.

I encourage all those who hear this debate to write their members of Parliament or the finance minister with a copy to their members of Parliament. Demand a response to the question: Mr. Finance Minister, why will a flat tax not work? If he has no answer, then ask him to check with the member for Calgary Centre. I will provide him with some talking points.

I want to speak about the provinces again for a second. The current provincial tax rate would apply on the federal tax payable as it is now.

With corporations paying for tax this could mean more revenue. We always hear from the Bloc members and some government members that corporations do not pay their fair share, that we have to tax corporations more, individuals at their maximum, but we have to go after corporations.

Corporations would be glad to pay 15 to 20 per cent. Individuals would not be glad but they would be willing to pay 15 to 20 per cent. Then we would get rid of a good portion of that underground economy which people know can vary from as low as $18 billion to $100 billion depending on the economists and their mood for that day. If we brought this income out into the open we would make gains.

The GST or the NATVAT, or a combination of the GST and NATVAT, and a surtax on income, whatever the finance minister finally does in a year, I am sure it will be the NATVAT. If it is not the Deputy Prime Minister will have to resign. She made a commitment during the election campaign to resign if the government did not scrap the GST. I am going to hold her to that. I will remind her of that as we get closer and closer to January 1, 1996 which according to the red book is the date by which it will have eliminated or scrapped the GST.

With a combination of solid revenues and reduction in government operations and expenses the result would be an impressive surplus to go toward debt retirement. Then we could lower taxes further if we wanted to. We could go to 10 per cent or 12 per cent. The Japanese currently have a single rate of 17 per cent.

This system would be simple, understandable, equitable and efficient. It would eliminate the need for convoluted tax bills like Bill C–59. The government would not have to tinker with all these social programs, the economic and business driven programs. It would supply programs to the Canadian public, determine the cost and raise the money to pay for them. It is done and they are not tax driven.

Tax reform of this magnitude cannot take place without a renewed commitment by the federal government to cut spending and balance the budget. There are two sides to this issue. As the song goes, you can't have one without the other. Thank goodness that at least now after a year of our harassing the Liberal government is listening to Reform and the finance minister is planning cuts of $9.5 billion over the next two years.

I am pleased we are making some progress. I am pleased our pressure is working because it is important. It is not important for us to make political gains. It is important for us in terms of being Canadian citizens that we are doing something in this House for the good of all Canadians.

Canadians have been unequivocal in expressing their opposition to further tax increases. Here is a solution that lowers taxes. We in the Reform Party have heard the message.

The bottom line for the Reform Party is that the next federal budget must not increase the total tax burden on Canadians. However I have a hunch the finance minister will be forced to find ways and means by tinkering around and probing, a little thing here, a little thing there and will increase the overall tax burden on Canadians.

The Reform Party does not object to the principle of eliminating inequities in the existing tax system. That is why we support 11 out of the 12 elements of this bill. It does level the playing field. It does make necessary modifications. With the exception of the elimination of the $100,000 capital gains, we would be in favour of the other items.

We believe the solution to our structural deficit problem must be found on the expenditure side rather than the revenue side. Elimination of the deficit in three years requires substantial measures. It is not the reduction of the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP, it is the elimination of the deficit that will help us out of this mess.

The Liberal government did a good study. It found that in Europe the Maastricht treaty recommended that those economies should target themselves to 3 per cent of GDP. What it did not tell the Canadian public I am going to tell them right now. In the economies in Europe the 3 per cent of GDP in the Maastricht treaty applies to all levels of government.

Here in Canada if the Liberal government's intention was to copy what is being done in Europe, then we would have to look at the size of the provincial debts. They add another $250 billion collectively. The reduction and the target for the deficit as a ratio to GDP should be 4.5 per cent.

That is why we say that 3 per cent is not enough and not fast enough. It is the elimination of the deficit that is important so that this wonderful country, this beautiful home we live in can finally have a mortgage. We could finally take that debt, equate it to a mortgage on a home and remortgage our home over a 30 year period. We could start to pay off the principle and not just borrow money to pay the interest.

Assuming a deficit of approximately $40 billion based on the finance department's total 1994–95 deficit forecast and revenue growth in the range of $14 billion to $18 billion based on the finance minister's grey book scenario, it becomes apparent that government expenditures must be reduced by $22 billion to $26 billion over a three year period.

Deficit cutting is an exercise in setting priorities. We have pointed these out. Many members in the Liberal Party laugh at us and mock us, but we are serious. I stand before the Liberal Party today in all seriousness and suggest that the people at the top of government must be the first to make significant and visible sacrifices before introducing cuts to government spending.

Many members of the Reform Party have done so and many members of this party will continue to do so. It is not to belittle nor to embarrass any member in this House. All members should be free to do what they want to do, but I am of the position that we are going to show leadership by example. If we expect the Canadian public to recognize that cuts are necessary, then we as politicians should be prepared to make sacrifices as well.

Duplication and overlap between federal and provincial governments must be reduced. That is why we have to decentralize and evaluate both levels of government. Based on these principles for instance if we applied this decentralization theory and eliminated the duplication of services, $3.5 billion to $6 billion could be saved, if the interprovincial barriers to trade were also addressed. These are serious numbers and they are worth considering.

The overhead costs of government could be reduced as a part of a comprehensive restraint program. A 15 per cent reduction would save $1 billion. At home if we had to reduce our budget by 8 per cent we could do it. That is all the Reform Party is suggesting, 8 per cent in one year. With the increased disposable income that this new proportional tax would present, more money would be in the taxpayers' hands. That money in the hands of the wage earners is more productive than in the hands of a politician or a bureaucrat.

The federal government should not subsidize business or special interest groups. There is a savings there of $2 billion.

Social policy review is important. After all the studies are done it will get back in this House and we will look at it seriously. This area is 67 per cent of the current federal budget. Over a three year period there have to be cuts in the neighbourhood of $12 billion to $18 billion or the Liberal government will not reach its deficit targets.

The advantage of deficit elimination includes lower taxes for Canadians which leaves them with more disposable income. That will continue to fuel the economy. We would be able to remortgage our debt over a 30 year period. We could introduce a new taxation system as outlined in the proportional tax or work with the Liberal government on a single tax system if we were forced to. One way or another, I believe that together we could come up with a tax system that would put us ahead and on the leading edge of economic development and growth. We would be ahead of rather than always following the United States.

In conclusion, Canadian taxpayers have already made it clear that they want politicians with the guts and the vision to lead the way with changes that will benefit them and their children, no matter how difficult those changes may be. We have the guts on this side of the House to recommend where we should cut excessive spending. We also have the guts to put forth some tax reform ideas.

It is a shame that government members are nothing more than Conservatives in red clothing. It is a shame they have only succeeded in adopting Conservative bills for a year. It is a shame that in one year they have spent $40 billion more than they have generated, just like the Tories. They host $1,000 a plate fundraising dinners for their Prime Minister, just like the Tories. They make patronage appointments, just like the Tories. In three years I predict that if the Liberal government does not listen to this party, the Liberal government will fall, just like the Tories.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is as follows: the hon. member for Jonquière—Native Peoples.

[English]

I have received notice from the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell that he is unable to move his motion during private members' hour on Friday, December 2, 1994.

Since it was not possible to arrange an exchange of positions in the order of precedence pursuant to Standing Order 9(2)(a), I will ask the clerk to drop this order to the bottom of the order of precedence.

[English]

Pursuant to Standing Order 94(2)(b), private members' hour will thus be suspended and the House will continue with the business before it prior to private members' hour.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I cannot move that private members' ballot item tomorrow. It has something to do with Safe Driving Week, and I will leave it at that.

Pursuant to Standing Order 43(2), I wish to indicate that the Liberal members will be sharing their time for the rest of this day's debate.

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the Reform Party speak. I would like some clarification. The hon. member has talked a lot about support, that the Reform Party is collectively supporting a flat tax idea. I would like him to explain the rationale for that briefly if he could.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I want to remind the member that we have now gone from the first three interventions of 40–minute debate without questions or comments to a new stage. Resuming debate.

Mrs. Chamberlain: Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to give my speech.

I am pleased to participate in this debate on Bill C–59, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and the income tax application rules. Last February the Minister of Finance told this House that he was restoring fiscal sanity to government.

That budget was about jobs for Canadians now and lasting jobs for their future. More important, that budget also offered Canadians for the first time in memory real deficit reduction and comprehensive changes to government programs.

Guelph—Wellington residents are concerned about their future. They know that in the past governments have overspent. They are also concerned that our current debtload includes increased borrowing from foreign lenders. They see their money being sent abroad and they would prefer that we concentrate on programs that will encourage domestic growth.

They know that the only way to show the world that Canada is committed to real deficit reduction is to prove our commitment to fiscal discipline. This bill is an example of this commitment and I am sure that all members of Parliament will want to support this government in these measures.

Guelph—Wellington residents voted Liberal because they know we promised to bring the deficit down to 3 per cent of GDP in three years. That is a real commitment we intend to make. They knew then and they know now that the Reform Party does not have the plan for deficit reduction. They know that the Reform Party has admitted that Reformers have no idea what impact their ideas for spending cuts will have on Canadians.

Guelph—Wellington residents want spending cuts and government action to be wise, made with their well–being in mind. They want a government that is serious about its commitment to Canadians.

Let me remind this House that our program of net spending reduction over the next three years is the most significant of any budget in a decade. Eighty per cent of the net fiscal improvements set out by our government will be from spending cuts.

These cuts as demanded from my constituents and constituents all across Canada will reduce the operating budgets of government departments by $400 million in the next fiscal year, with savings rising to $620 million annually in 1995, 1996 and beyond.

As well, the extension of the freeze in government salaries including those of members of Parliament will provide an additional saving of almost $1 billion annually by 1996–1997.

We have extended our ideas to include all facets of government. Grants and contributions made by government including foreign aid and grants to businesses have also been trimmed for savings of $253 million this year and $409 million in 1996–1997.

• (1705)

Changes to unemployment insurance will reduce expenditures by $725 million this year and $2.4 billion annually thereafter. We are reducing. There is no question. We are making changes to our social security system. These changes are necessary in order to respond to a different and more challenging society.

In an earlier speech in this House I outlined the support that my constituents have shown for changes to social security. They know that I as their member of Parliament and we as government are listening, but they also know we can no longer provide everything to everyone.

Social security changes like those announced to unemployment insurance will recognize our diverse society, our difficult economic situation and our commitment to ensuring that our children, and my children, have a future.

Our budget is about co–operation. We have launched various consultation initiatives asking Canadians what they want in our future. These consultations have been welcomed by my constituents. They also welcome co–operation with the provinces and local levels of government which study reforms and test new approaches. The challenge for deficit reduction and wiser spending is not only going to result from spending cuts but also from revenues.

My constituents have told me that taxes are too high and I agree with them. Lower deficits will mean lower taxes. People in Guelph—Wellington do not mind paying taxes as long as they are fair and as long as they know the money is well–spent.

Bill C–59 answers some of those concerns. Included in this legislation are changes to the corporate tax system that make it fairer and also allow it to better target the tax assistance made available to certain businesses. These include the reduction in the business income tax deduction and GST credit for meals and entertainment expenses; the elimination of certain tax preferences aimed at small businesses that are utilized by some large, private corporations; the elimination or reduction of certain regionally based investment tax credits that have not been cost effective in attracting new investment.

This legislation is about tax fairness and further broadening the tax base. For example, the full value of employer paid life insurance premiums will now become taxable. This will remove the advantage that people with corporate plans enjoy over self–employed Canadians or those whose employers do not offer insurance benefits.

The $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption will no longer be available for gain realized after budget night. The income tax credit provided to persons over the age of 65 will be income tested, affecting one out of every four seniors in Canada.

This legislation also modifies the provisions of the home buyer's plan, extending it indefinitely for first time home buyers, a move welcomed by real estate people in my area and all across Canada.

The 1994 budget and this legislation are only the beginning. These fiscal measures are but the beginning to our efforts to reach our goals. Action must be taken. Our response must be comprehensive and wide reaching.

Last year we spent $38 billion on interest payments, money my constituents believe could have been used for programs and services. My constituents have asked me to come to Ottawa and end the past excesses. Most are prepared to do without certain government services if it means we really make an effort to end that cycle of deficit and debt.

Our government is committed to action. We will meet our budget targets. There is no question. We have put an end to unrealistic projections. We are serious about meeting our commitments to the Canadian people. The measures included in Bill C–59 deserve speedy passage so we can move on to the next stage of our fiscal challenge. This legislation includes significant measures that will improve the fairness of our tax system while at the same time improving our fiscal situation.

These measures originated in last February's budget. This was a budget that took concrete committed action to bring government finances under control, action that is an essential step in Canada's economic revitalization.

My constituents heard the message in February. They accepted it during the last election. My constituents want a return to fiscal sanity. If we accept the challenge of fiscal management we will not only restore our faith in ourselves, but we will have made a real step in ensuring that our children will have faith in us because we have acted for them and for their future.

We cannot turn back, and this legislation today calls for our support.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for her fine statements today in support of this bill. I know that she is very concerned about social justice within our country, to ensure that we are taking care of those in most need and certainly the children.

We listened to the words of the member for Calgary Centre who somehow decided he was going to outline for Canadians a simple one page tax return that you fold over and just send in, that this somehow is going to make the world a panacea and that we can reduce taxes all of a sudden by having a smaller form. I know that the hon. member who just spoke shares my view that having a shorter form is certainly one thing and lowering a tax rate is another.

She probably also would agree that the income taxes, for instance, for an ordinary member of Parliament under the Reform Party proposal would be reduced by about 13 per cent. Of course, that 13 per cent, if we assume that the total amount of revenue still has to be collected, would have to be collected from somebody else which means that under the plan it would certainly be unfair to lower income Canadians.

I want simply to ask the member if she feels that the finance minister has brought in appropriate changes and that more changes would be required, particularly in the areas of child tax credits or child care expense deductions which would maybe assist even further those most in need in our society.

Mrs. Chamberlain: Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank my hon. colleague from Mississauga South. There is no silver bullet to the mess that we are in, quite frankly. That is the reality. I think it is going to take numerous methods and types of procedures to decrease this deficit. I think that we all have to be committed in this House, every party in this House. It is going to be necessary that we put our energies together to bring some sort of financial stability to this country again.

Some of the methods that my colleague from Mississauga South has talked about are certainly going to be some of the options that the finance minister is going to explore.

As the finance minister has spoken about many times, we are going to hit our budget targets and that is going to make things a lot better in this country.

Ms. Susan Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to support Bill C–59 today. Action that increases the fairness of Canada's tax system, as this legislation does in a wide range of areas, deserves non–partisan support from all members of the House. I am surprised there is any debate on this bill at all.

The specific measures in this legislation have already been amply highlighted but I think it would be worthwhile to remind members of the context which set out this legislation, the February budget.

I believe it is fair to say that our 1994 budget set in motion the most comprehensive, fundamental change in decades. It is change that focused on three central goals, goals that directly answer the concerns and priorities expressed by Canadians during last winter's first ever series of consultation conferences. Canadians wanted to see action to restore our country's economic vitality and to create the jobs so many people desperately need. The budget took that action through funding for the infrastructure program, a commitment to rolling back unemployment insurance premiums and through new strategies to promote small business and technological innovation, the sinews of the new economy.

It is worth pointing out that the Canadian job situation has seen a substantial improvement. So far this year, about 307,000 new jobs have been created. Just as important, those are full time jobs.

Second, in last year's consultations Canadians also told us they wanted reform of the social security system to ensure it is fair, compassionate and affordable, a reform that delivers incentives for work and creates jobs and opportunities. That reform has been launched by the Minister of Human Resources Development. The budget highlighted important steps in meeting this challenge. The link between the length of time a person works and UI benefits was strengthened. Assistance was enhanced for those with dependents. These and other actions growing from the sweeping policy review process now taking place should reduce the cost of the program further and allow premiums to come down.

The 1994 budget consultations delivered the third blunt message: get government finances under control and make government more effective, cost conscious and less of a burden that undercuts job creation and entrepreneurship.

The government has consistently made clear that these are obligations we must accept, not options. That is why the Prime Minister and Minister of Finance have staked out a concrete commitment to reduce the deficit to just 3 per cent of gross domestic product in three years. They have made clear that this is just a first step toward the ultimate goal: a balanced budget.

To support this goal the 1994 budget took fiscal action to bring the deficit under $39.7 billion this year. Just as important, the action plan was based on $5 of cuts in spending for every $1 of action on the revenue side. It is aspects of this revenue side action that are included in Bill C–59. Measures such as the elimination of the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption and the reduction of the meals and entertainment expense deduction for business will help the government's bottom line.

These actions do not respond to fiscal pressures alone. They are also based on improving the tax system and ensuring that all Canadian taxpayers are treated equally and equitably. To me that makes such measures an example of win, win action at its best.

Let me return to the overall fiscal challenge of the budget and our commitment to bring the deficit down to 3 per cent of the economy. I know that some hon. members feel this is too little, too slow. But I and the government continue to share the view of many Canadians, that too drastic action could risk the economic progress needed to sustain consistent fiscal improvement.

One issue that I believe most members here can agree on is that reducing the fiscal burden of government is not enough. We must give better value for the taxpayers' dollars. That includes eliminating unnecessary or cumbersome barriers to business. The 1994 budget highlighted action here as well, including our continuing commitment to replace the GST and an intensified effort to eliminate program overlap and duplication between levels of government.

As members can see the 1994 budget undertook vitally necessary measures of which Bill C–59 represents merely a few. This wide ranging action plan is still not enough. That is why we emphasized that the 1994 budget was just the first important step in a two stage process.

Canadians have made clear that further, more fundamental change is needed in virtually every area of government activity if our country is to face the future with renewed confidence. They have told us that they must consulted on these changes. That is why the budget highlighted an extensive process of policy review and consultation to improve a wide range of policies and programs. The House has seen this process at work in the papers and reports such as those dealing with social assistance reform and financing for small business.

Based on the continuing process of policy reviews and consultations, future budgets will carry forward further detailed strategies to encourage growth and new jobs. These will also be strategies that will help ensure continuing progress on deficit reduction.

Let me remind all Canadians that this two stage approach is not a case of deferring action and evading responsibility and leadership. Rather it reflects the dimension of the challenge facing us all. As the finance minister has said, for Canada to recover and grow we must regain a sense of national purpose, a sense of national will. What we require now is the kind of effort that we have agreed to expend only a few times in our history.

To achieve this effort we must accept a fundamental fact of Canadian life. Without reasonable consensus and real consultation, dramatic change can become a disastrous failure. We do not intend to fail because Canadians deserve success.

It is timely to highlight another aspect of our commitment to consultation and more effective government. This is the change we have made in the budget planning process itself. In the time available before last February's budget we undertook public consultations across the country, through conferences organized by independent institutes. The Minister of Finance issued a report on this process, openly addressing the advice we received, how the budget has responded, and why we did not accept some suggestions.

This was just the start of a deeper process of reform to bring budget planning from behind closed doors and to enlist the insight and wisdom of Canadians, including parliamentarians. As was promised in February the government has acted to further expand the consultation process for the 1995 budget. This has included the cross–country hearings by the finance committee, ongoing town hall sessions by the finance minister and other members, and the debate on budget options that occupied the House yesterday.

To support this process of public consultation, to ensure that interested Canadians are fully informed of the fiscal challenges we face, the government has arranged for a range of materials to be made available. This includes the workbook prepared by the Canadian Foundation for Economic Education which has been acclaimed for its ability to make the fiscal facts accessible and engaging.

Bill C–59 is just one part of the 1994 budget that delivered real action while setting in place the policy reviews and consensus building that will deliver further action in the years ahead. It was a budget that took steps to spur job creation while recognizing the need for real fiscal discipline and improvement. It is a budget that refused to abandon the values of compassion and support for those in real need in Canada.

Politics has been described as the art of the possible but Canadians want more than possibilities. They want to see a government committed to doing all it can through concrete, measurable action to help build a future of real opportunity and real growth.

That is the challenge the government has accepted. That is the goal the budget acted on, through the measures before us today. That is the vision we will continue to build on in the next budget and those the government will deliver in the many years ahead.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I really enjoyed the reference to balancing the budget, being fiscally responsible and making sure that expenses are under control. Those are the absolutely right things that one should be saying. We have been saying them over here.

I failed to discover in the remarks made just a moment ago exactly how this would be done by actually making a promise to people that says we would reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP. This really does not ever get to the point of reducing the deficit to zero.

We need a particular sort of plan. In my opinion it is not good enough to say that it will be reduced to 3 per cent of GDP. That means a deficit in perpetuity. Or is there something I missed in the speech that shows us clearly that there will be a reduction of the deficit to zero at some time?

Ms. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may want to take a look at the red book and the government's commitment. We stated very clearly that our goal was to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP in the first three years. Our ultimate goal is and always will be a balanced budget. If we can achieve it sooner, we will. The finance minister will set out a new fiscal plan in the next budget. I anticipate that Canadians will review this plan and be very pleased.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the member for her excellent presentation.

I wonder if she could make a comment in the area of accountability. Members of the Reform Party have been speaking about this quite aggressively. They presented one of their proposals to the finance committee last Friday.

I took the time to add the figures up. There are five sections in their program. The bottom line when we add up their $10 billion reduction program is it adds up to $9.035 billion. It is short $1 billion. It is a $10 billion program for deficit reduction by the Reform Party that is already short $1 billion.

I wonder if the hon. member would comment on a party that would propose that sort of accountability.

Ms. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, Reform members have said over and over again that we should be reducing the deficit to zero tomorrow. They made a proposal to reduce it by $10 billion and the figures did not even add up to $10 billion.

Canadians need to take a second look at what the Reform Party has been talking about before, during and since the election. They should also take a more serious look at what the government has been talking about, what the Prime Minister, the finance minister, and what all the government members have been talking about.

We are serious about meeting our commitment. We are serious about going beyond that commitment. We are serious about reaching a balanced budget in the future.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, given the closeness of 5.30 p.m., I wonder if the House would consider calling it 5.30 so this debate would not expire and we could resume it tomorrow. If there is unanimous consent to call it 5.30, perhaps we could proceed now to private members' hour.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House has heard the suggestion of the chief government whip. Is there unanimous consent that I see the clock as being 5.30 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 5.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

CORRECTIONS AND CONDITIONAL RELEASE ACT

The House resumed from October 7 consideration of the motion that Bill C–240, an act to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act and the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member from the Reform Party has made a proposal concerning the safety of the Canadian public.

We as the legislative body of this great nation must take a lead role in ensuring that our citizens live in safe communities. That responsibility extends even with greater seriousness to those who are simultaneously most vulnerable and most vital, those who carry our future in their hands, our children.

Let me take a moment to tell of some of the things we in Parliament have done to date to try to give both immediate and long term protection to our citizens from people who have shown little regard for the welfare of others.

In Canada's early history, clemency was unconditional and only granted through the royal prerogative. In 1899 Parliament passed the ticket of leave act which established conditional release and a system of supervised freedom. The Governor General could grant conditional release to anyone as a method to bridge the gap between the controls and restraints of institutional life and the freedoms and responsibilities of community life, as one historian has noted. The Department of Justice provided supervision and eventually established the remission branch in 1913.

In 1938 the Archambault commission recommended that rehabilitation become the purpose of incarceration. The Fauteux report recommended the creation of the National Parole Board which came into existence with the passage of the Parole Act in 1959.

It is important to note that in 1969, 31 years after the Archambault report, the Ouimet report reaffirmed that rehabilitation was the major purpose of conditional release. More recent developments suggest that the protection of the public is the primary goal of conditional release.

In 1978 Parliament amended the Penitentiary Act to permit offenders to earn time off for good behaviour. Good conduct in a penitentiary, it was hoped, was some indication that an offender had changed the type of behaviour that led to incarceration in the first place. In 1978 this period of remission when offenders were in the community was called mandatory supervision.

By 1981, the Law Reform Commission expressed concern about the small group of offenders who constituted an imminent danger to public safety but had to be released under the provisions of that law.

In 1982 the National Parole Board began suspending the release of a small number of offenders who it believed presented a danger to public safety.

The Supreme Court of Canada struck down this practice in 1983, saying that the board could only suspend in reaction to an offender's behaviour on release, not in anticipation of problematic behaviour.

In 1986 Bill C–67 amended the Parole Act to permit the National Parole Board, after a referral from Correctional Service Canada, to detain in custody until the end of their sentence those offenders it deemed likely to commit an offence causing serious harm before the expiration of their sentence. The legislation introduced a schedule of offences which were considered to have caused serious harm and required CSC to review the cases of all offenders convicted of one of these scheduled offences to determine whether they should be referred to the board for a detention hearing.

On November 1, 1992 the Corrections and Conditional Release Act replaced both the Parole Act and the Penitentiary Act. This new act, known as the CCRA, eliminated the previous system of earned remission and provided that statutory release take effect at the two–thirds point of the sentence for offenders who had not been granted parole earlier. In addition, it included and amended the provisions for detention that had been added to the Parole Act through Bill C–67.

The CCRA expanded the schedule of offences to include a greater number of specific sexual offences. As well, the CCRA calls for notifying victims upon their request of when detention and other hearings are to take place and permits them to observe such hearings.

Other measures in the CCRA include requiring an annual review of offenders ordered to either remain in prison or to reside in community facilities and one chance provision for statutory release which means that certain offenders felt to represent a certain level of risk but probably manageable in a residential facility are given this one chance to prove themselves.

Any breach of condition or increase in risk requires that they return to prison until the end of the sentence with no further opportunities to complete the sentence in the community.

These steps have all been designed to give immediate, short term protection to society by removing dangerous offenders from the streets and, more important, to give long term protection by effecting change in the behaviour of offenders so that they will never commit another crime. The bottom line, however, remains the same. We must do more to protect our children.

We said in the red book that we share Canadians' concerns that more must be done to better protect society from repeat sex offenders. These measures are part of ongoing reforms to improve our handling and management of these offenders in federal correctional systems, especially those who victimize our children.

We are all outraged by crimes perpetrated against our children. We are angry and we demand measures that will protect them.

• (1735)

At present, the CCRA permits the National Parole Board to detain sex offenders and certain other high risk offenders until the end of their sentence if they cause serious harm and if they are likely to commit an offence causing death or serious harm if released.

What about when the victim is a child, a person who cannot articulate the problem or even realize that there is a problem until many years later? We now know that when the victim is a child, the serious harm caused by a particular offence may not become evident for a number of years.

In addition, the victim may be too young to communicate adequately the trauma inflicted by the offence. We must protect and support our vulnerable children. It has been difficult for the National Parole Board and CSC to determine that a child was seriously harmed using the legal meaning of the term serious harm.

Without this determination, the National Parole Board could not legally detain the offender until the end of the sentence. The Solicitor General has already introduced amendments that make it easier for the National Parole Board to keep sex offenders who victimize children in a penitentiary until the end of their sentence.

This amendment removes the requirement to establish serious harm as a criterion for detention in these cases. This gives the board the authority to detain a sex offender if a further sex offence against a child is likely. I would like to add that the government has proposed to expand the list of offences for which an offender could be referred for detention until the end of the sentence.

This list includes criminal harassment, commonly known as stalking, conspiracy to commit serious drug offences and serious drinking and driving and criminal negligence offences which result in bodily harm or death.

These behaviours also put our citizens at risk, including our children. We all have a responsibility to protect our most vulnerable citizens, our children, from predators like paedophiles.

The National Parole Board must now detain offenders who it feels may cause death or serious harm before the end of their sentence. With the proposed amendments, if the victims are children, the board will not have to determine serious harm. It is assumed. This means that whenever the board finds that an offender might reoffend against a child, it must detain that offender.

The hon. member from the Reform Party oversteps the bounds of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. No administrative tribunal such as the National Parole Board would be granted such broad powers of post–sentence detention without due process nor would the courts countenance this.

No government would put into place a system it knows would be struck down by the courts, a system that is presently being proposed by the hon. member from the Reform Party who is promoting this private members' bill.

This government is certainly committed to strengthening Canada's criminal justice system to protect the public and most especially our children from dangerous offenders. Our government has acted in an increasing number of ways to bring about public safety, whether it be revisions to the Young Offenders' Act, whether it be much tougher action against criminals who utilize guns during the commission of a criminal offence and other progressive change which will greater ensure the protection of all our citizens.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after the news we just heard about Mr. Bouchard's illness, I can assure you that I will do my duty as I am expected to do as a member of Parliament.

Bill C–240 is a prime example of a philosophy that is both reactionary and repressive. The Reform Party is pulling out all the stops to give the impression that this is a crisis and they are the only ones who can save us. The bill introduced by the hon. member does not provide any realistic or practical answers to the problem of repeat offenders.

• (1740)

In fact, it favours a drastic and simplistic response to a complex problem. The bill consists of two parts. The first part concerns the conditions to be met for conditional release, in the case of an offender convicted of sexual assault involving a child. Under the new conditions it would be easier to continue the detention of such offenders by denying them a conditional release.

They would have to serve their full sentence. The second part of the bill concerns new regulations that would permit dangerous offender findings to be made after sentencing. The concept already exists in the Criminal Code. At the present time, the dangerous offender finding can be made at the time of sentencing. In the bill before the House today, this finding could also be made just before the end of the sentence.

Once a dangerous offender finding has been made, the offender's prison sentence may be extended for an indeterminate period, irrespective of the original sentence. I will first consider that part of the bill that concerns individuals convicted of sexual offences involving young victims. These are among the most repugnant crimes we can imagine. As I have said before, society must protect itself against this kind of individual.

Bill C–240 has the advantage of preventing the premature release of these offenders. However, similar provisions already exist in Bill C–45, whose purpose is to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act. In fact, Bill C–45 provides that in the case of a sexual offence involving a child, the National Parole Board would not have to establish the existence or probability of serious harm.

The Board must be satisfied that an offender is likely to commit a sexual offence involving a child before the expiration of his sentence. These provisions may be found in section 43(1) of the bill to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act. Bill C–45 has been referred to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs where it is now under consideration. Since the amendment proposed by the hon. member is in all respects identical to the amendment from the Department of Justice, I think it would be premature to comment at this stage.

The second part of the bill presented by my colleague deals with finding an offender to be a dangerous offender. Clause 26 introduces an important amendment to the Criminal Code, which would make it possible to detain in a penitentiary for an indeterminate period an offender found to be dangerous. It would be post–sentencing detention since this penalty would be imposed after sentencing.

By presenting a bill of this kind, the Reform Party member shows to what extent repression and vengeance underly that party's policies with respect to criminal law. Looking at this bill, I have the feeling that Reform members have never heard of the principles of fundamental justice, procedural fairness, and presumption of innocence. These are the principles which make our society free and democratic.

To undermine these principles puts our society at risk. As members of this House, we must be on guard and defeat rightist proposals, which are taken up by a press eager to make us believe that we are still in the midst of a crisis. Before commenting further on this, let us first look at what constitutes a dangerous offender.

Section 753 of the Criminal Code allows the court to find to be a dangerous offender an individual convicted of a serious personal injury or sexual offence. These offences are listed in section 752 of the Criminal Code. Once the accused is found guilty of any one of the offences listed in section 752, the court hears the evidence presented by the Crown and hands down its decision based on the following factors, as listed in section 753:

A pattern of repetitive behaviour showing that the offender is failing to restrain his behaviour; the offender is showing a substantial degree of indifference respecting the consequences of his behaviour; the behaviour associated with the offence is of such a brutal nature that it is unlikely to be inhibited by normal standards of restriction of freedom.

The decision of the court is given after the offender has been convicted, but before sentencing. The court finds the offender to be dangerous and, instead of imposing a regular sentence, imposes a sentence of indeterminate imprisonment. This is the harshest sentence that can be imposed by a court, since the offender is not eligible for mandatory parole.

The case of the person is reviewed three years after the conviction and every two years thereafter. In practice, these are pro–forma reviews, since officers of the National Parole Board never hesitate, except in a few rare cases, to recommend the continuing of the sentence.

In her bill, my colleague proposes that the whole judicial process be repeated just before the end of the sentence of a given offender. Bill C–240 proposes nothing short of a new trial, with new evidence and a new sentence. Let us remember that this new procedure would not apply to a crime already committed, but to a crime that might be committed.

In fact, it would amount to convicting again someone who has already served his sentence. May I remind this House that the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms protects individuals against double convictions. Section 11(h) says, and I quote: "Any person charged with an offence has the right— if finally acquitted of the offence, not to be tried for it again and, if finally found guilty and punished for the offence, not to be tried or punished for it again".

As we can see, this bill would not withstand a constitutional challenge. It also seems incompatible with the principle of basic justice to go after an individual by reopening the investigation and introducing new evidence on which the initial verdict could not be based.

Another issue raised by this bill is that of relevance. The hon. member herself admitted in this House that her bill only affects a very small number of inmates. The problem of repeat offenders is much broader and requires more comprehensive solutions than those proposed by my colleague.

She even wildly exaggerated an isolated case, arguing that her bill would solve that kind of problem. The truth is that Bill C–240 suggests only partial solutions and affects only dangerous offenders representing 0.5 per cent of all Canadian inmates now in federal correctional institutions.

If we look at the statistics a little more closely, we will see that, as of December 17, 1992, there were 121 offenders designated as dangerous in Canada. Interesting enough, none of them were in Quebec, the vast majority of them being found in Ontario and the Western provinces. Between 1985 and 1992, the number of dangerous offenders on parole was limited to one per year, a number which has always remained constant.

There are no facts which justify such drastic action. The reactionary measures proposed by my colleague are also superfluous, as the courts already have tools to identify as dangerous any offender before them. Judicious enforcement of the Criminal Code could solve many problems.

It is not enough to respond to public opinion as conveyed by tabloids trying to boost sales and it is not enough to go after a very small number of individuals. From now on, the Liberal government must decide, in co–operation with the provinces, on a global approach to identify repeat offenders and ensure that society is better protected.

Ms. Margaret Bridgman (Surrey North, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise in the House today to speak to Bill C–240, an act to amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act in the Criminal Code.

I would like to thank the member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley for introducing this much needed legislation. The member is my southern neighbour and we share the same community of Surrey, a growing vibrant community but also a community which has experienced many tragedies over the past few years. The number of murders in Surrey and the surrounding area is astonishing.

It is also completely unacceptable, most of all to the people of Surrey. A day does not go by without someone from the community contacting me or my staff about problems with our justice system in such areas as lack of deterrence, repeated offenders, parole, young offenders, criminal intoxication defence, and so on.

It is these concerns that we in this Chamber must respond to. Canadians across this nation will no longer accept a slap on the wrist justice system or a system which holds the rights of criminals above the rights of victims.

Canadians from all walks of life are demanding action from Parliament, not tomorrow or not next week, but now.

My colleague has responded to that demand by introducing this legislation aimed at preventing violent offenders from perpetuating further violent crimes upon our community and the country.

This bill is the result of the concern that many Canadians have with regard to repeat offenders repeating violent offences, particularly sex offences. This bill would amend the Corrections and Conditional Release Act to permit offenders convicted of certain serious offences to be denied statutory release if they are likely to commit sexual offences involving children.

This amendment would change the current legislation basically by removing the serious harm aspect. Under this bill it would only have to be established that a sexual offence was committed by the offender and that further sexual offences against a child are likely upon release. This bill would also amend the Criminal Code to permit dangerous offender findings to be made after sentencing but near the conclusion of the offender's sentence.

The reason for permitting dangerous offender findings to be made after sentencing and near the conclusion of the sentence is that the court would have evidence as to how the offender responded to the treatment and the degree of his or her progress while in custody. This corrects a flaw in the present system where dangerous offender findings must be made at the time of sentencing. Only those who are still considered dangerous near the end of their original sentences, as opposed to the beginning of their sentences, would be detained.

How one will behave after a course of treatment and educational sessions cannot be judged before they participate in the sessions. Prejudging in this manner is not a motivating factor for any individual to make an effort to change their behaviour while they are in these courses of treatment.

The process that this bill proposes for identifying and detaining offenders is as follows. The correctional service act of Canada would identify those who are likely to commit offences causing death or serious harm if they were released at the end of their sentence. These offenders would then be referred to the National Parole Board. If the parole board agreed that this person were likely to commit such an offence, the board would then refer the person to the appropriate Attorney General. The Attorney General would then consider asking the court to find that the offender is still a dangerous offender.

If the court accepts the application it could make an order for continued detention. The results of this process continued custody for an indefinite period of time, continued custody for a definite period of time, or supervised release in the community for a period of 10 years.

This is fair and reasonable and serves two essential purposes. It allows dangerous offenders to be kept out of the community, and it ensures that the state or justice system does not detain persons at its whim without good reason and due process.

When this bill was debated in the House on June 10 of this year some members were concerned that this bill would be contrary to certain sections of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Specifically the resentencing provisions of this bill were thought to contradict section 11(h) of the charter:

> If finally acquitted of an offence, not to be tried for it again and, if finally found guilty and punished for an offence, not to be tried or punished for it again;

• (1755)

The judiciary is the final arbitrator with regard to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. However, this bill does not contradict section 11(h). This section guards against being found guilty or punished for an offence for which one has served the full sentence.

Bill C–240 amends the serious harm definition of the dangerous offender's designation. This means that those who are designated a possible dangerous offender by the process outlined earlier are done so on the basis of their past history, their treatment and progress which incarcerated and the likelihood of their offending again. This does not equate with resentencing a person for the same offence.

Also this legislation is almost identical to the current dangerous offenders legislation which was found to be constitutional.

In October of this year the community of Surrey experienced another tragedy when Pamela Cameron was murdered. It appears that the chief suspect in this case could have been detained had post sentencing detention legislation such as my colleague is proposing been in effect. This is something which all members of this House should carefully consider.

What we do in this Chamber with this proposed legislation shows how serious we are in combating violent crime in our nation and in providing for the offenders positive rehabilitation programs that are not cut short of their effectiveness by a date on the calendar.

I urge all members of this House of all political parties to respond to the nationwide concerns over the justice system and support these reasoned amendments to our existing system.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague from Surrey—White Rock—South Langley for providing me with this opportunity to speak on her private members' bill C–240. I strongly believe in the merits of the proposed legislation and what it endeavours to address. I encourage all my colleagues on both sides of the House to support it.

There are two essential components to the proposed legislation before us today. The first deals with the application for dangerous offenders designation. The second part would eliminate the requirement of the crown to prove than an offender is likely to commit serious harm, especially as it relates to assaults of children. It is this second component on which my remarks will focus this afternoon.

Childhood is supposed to be a time of innocence, of exploring, learning and growing. For far too many kids, however, their childhood has become an unending nightmare created by those repugnant sexual predators who prey on children. It is a sad commentary on today's society that more and more frequently we read in our newspapers about cases of sexual abuse or assault where innocent children have been the victims, in some cases ending with the death of a child.

Imagine the terror in those instances where the abuse continues for years, where the child is terrified into silence by threats against themselves or their parents and family. This is a common tactic used by these monsters to control their victims. Not one of us in this Chamber can forget the atrocities of Clifford Olson. The very fact that man still breathes today is an affront to the memory of his victims, defenceless, innocent children.

This bill addresses these problems. Bill C–240 provides for indefinite incarceration of dangerous offenders who prey on our young society.

Whose rights are more significant here, the rights of a convicted sexual predator or the rights of a child? Who among us wants to condemn any child to the danger posed by these offenders? Do they pose a threat? That is the question we should ask. Cases upon cases show that upon release these predators are likely to reoffend. Research shows a very poor rate of rehabilitation in these cases. The very least we can do is make provisions for the courts and the judicial authorities to protect our children from those who are likely to turn another child's life into a nightmare, or even murder a child.

Law–abiding Canadians, and maybe that is too legalistic, or ordinary Canadians like you and me and the people who live on our main streets in our communities are absolutely fed up with hearing about offenders' rights. What about the rights of the little child? How can the House even consider any measure that puts the perpetrators' rights above those of innocent victims? If these offenders pose a risk of any sort to the public, to little children, for goodness' sake let us keep them in jail. Some would say let us keep them in jail until they rot.

Canadians will no longer tolerate the lenient Liberal justice system of the past 20 years. They are struck with disbelief of the travesties of justice about which they have read in their daily newspapers of repeat offenders who are released on parole or on work release into unsuspecting communities.

The rage that is felt by the public at these crimes demands that we in this place, their representatives, take action and take action now. The public no longer has the patience to deal with MPs who will not respect their constituents' wishes. If the members opposite have any doubt in their minds about that, they had better consult with their constituents.

This fall 16–year old Pamela Cameron of Surrey, B.C., was raped and murdered. The man charged with the murder, James Owen, is in the words of the director of the Canadian Police Association "a walking advertisement" for the dangerous offender legislation before us today. He has a record of 28 prior criminal convictions, including rape, and refused all sexual behaviour and substance abuse treatment programs that were offered to him in prison. The authorities should be able to look at this case and keep offenders like Owen in prison beyond their sentence. Perhaps, just perhaps, maybe Pamela Cameron would be alive today.

I have held a number of townhall meetings in my constituency. My constituents have voiced their concerns and outrage at this crime and many others. They have called on hon. members in this place to act.

Perhaps little eight–year old Mindy Tran of Kelowna would be alive today if the provisions before us had been enacted.

Today in my riding alone there are some eight cases of sexual assault before the courts involving children: eight lives damaged, eight kids forced to go through the hell of abuse. Recently a school principal was convicted of molesting his 15–year old foster child. There have also been two recent cases where fathers were convicted of sexually abusing their children. There is another case before the courts where a neighbour sexually assaulted a little girl for two years before it came to light, and this suspect, a known sexual offender, had been released.

Even the B.C. attorney general has recognized the need for more severe sentences in these cases and, as my local newspaper, the Penticton Herald, reported in an editorial: "Respect for the individual rights should not take precedence over public safety".

These crimes involving children tear into the heart of the communities where they occur. Every parent must shudder in horror at the atrocities committed on these poor children.

What of these young victims? Currently the onus is on the system to prove that an offender is likely to commit serious harm in cases that involve sexual assault on children. The actual harm to the child may not be evident for several years or even decades. It is difficult for adults, let alone children, to adequately communicate the effects of a sexual crime on them. It is our responsibility as a society and as members of this place to protect children from these vile, sexual predators.

Parents in communities across the land raise a hue and cry when such criminals are released into their communities. Why? It is because experience shows that there is a very good chance they will offend again, and this time the victim could be their own child.

Parents want to protect their children. Short of imprisoning kids at home they cannot because the judicial system does not give them a chance to do so. Even courts have ruled that convicted child molesters have the right to hang around schoolyards and playgrounds. They have that right. That is absurd. If the benighted charter of rights is causing this insanity then it had better be amended.

Many of my hon. colleagues in this place are parents or grandparents. This tragedy has to strike in their own homes before the House hears their cries of outrage. Can we as people stand by and see even one more defenceless child brutalized or murdered by a sexual predator? I think not.

I call on all members of the House to unite on Bill C–240 and protect our children. We have a chance to make a difference. Let us not throw it away. Canadian kids are counting on us.

In closing, I would like to remind everyone how this day started and each day starts in the House when the Speaker says these words: "Grant us the wisdom, knowledge and understanding to preserve the blessings of this country for the benefit of all and to make good laws and wise decisions".

Bill C–240 is a good law and I pray all members make the wise decision and vote yes to Bill C–240.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I know the hon. whip of the Reform Party is very vigilant. I will try to be equal to the task.

Seeing no members rising for debate, I have received notice from the the member for Surrey—White Rock—South Langley who moved Bill C–240. Under right of reply she will have two minutes to conclude the debate. Members must understand that no one else can rise and that this will in fact conclude the debate.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, for allowing me to close debate on Bill C–240.

I have appreciated the level of debate the bill has received in the House. It has been interesting to see that members of the Bloc have continued to debate against any changes of this nature. They find them draconian. I suggest that they are not listening to their constituents. A poll was taken by Léger et Léger which indicated that 76 per cent of the people in the province of Quebec support this type of legislation. It is nice to know that although Bloc members do not support it the people of Quebec support it.

I have heard the argument on the opposite side that Bill C–240 may not withstand a court challenge. While there are countless pieces of legislation that may not withstand such a challenge, I believe that as parliamentarians we cannot abrogate our responsibility as lawmakers because of the possibility of a court challenge. I certainly hope that feeling is shared by all my colleagues here. We cannot afford to shy away from legislation solely because of a court challenge.

When I first introduced the legislation I did not think that it would hit home quite so quickly. However, on October 4, as my hon. colleague mentioned, a 16–year old girl was pulled off one of the busiest streets in my community in the middle of the afternoon and murdered. This legislation may have prevented her death.

If this bill is not passed it is inevitable that in the future there will be more such deaths. This bill will not put an end to all murders but if it prevents even one, it would succeed.

I ask all members of this House to please be concerned about the lives of our children, the lives of the victims and support Bill C–240.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a committee.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): For proper verification, is there unanimous consent to proceed to the proceedings on the adjournment motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

NATIVE PEOPLES

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I put a question to the minister of Indian affairs concerning the pitiful state of public health in aboriginal communities on reserves. According to Statistics Canada, the tuberculosis rate among status Indians is 43 times higher than for Canadians born in Canada.

This rate is comparable to those found in the third world, whether we are talking about Africa or Asia, in countries that do not enjoy the benefits of the kind of economy we have in this country. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development let the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Health reply on his behalf. The parliamentary secretary mentioned the amounts now being spent by her department to improve the health of aboriginal communities.

She mentioned one million dollars this year and several million dollars over the next couple of years. I think this is not a satisfactory answer, considering that such a high tuberculosis infection rate, according to many experts, is an indication of sub–standard housing conditions. I think it would have been appropriate for the minister of Indian affairs to answer the question, since he has a fiduciary responsibility for aboriginal communities, for aboriginal reserves in this country.

Moreover, the minister could have mentioned that two years ago, the aboriginal affairs committee had examined the state of aboriginal housing and that the title of its report was Time to Act. In its report, the committee found there was a backlog in housing construction on reserves, and it also pointed out that there was a lack of funding to renovate existing units.

Furthermore, in recommendation No. 7, the members of the committee asked the government to deal immediately with the health and safety problems arising from the condition of aboriginal housing.

Finally, it is essential that the minister of Indian affairs, until such time as appropriate and much needed action is taken, make it clear to his colleagues at Health, Public Works and Finance that budgetary cutbacks are not to be used as an excuse for allowing these appalling conditions in aboriginal communities in Canada to continue, shaming us in the eyes of the rest of the world.

I would like to know whether the government really intends to do something about this.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when we look at the frequency and the situation of the disease, we must consider not only where we are but also where we have come from and where our strategy to reduce the frequency of this disease should take us.

[English]

In the 1930s we were faced with death rates, not incidence rates but death rates, of 700 per 100,000 population among Canadian Indians.

An extensive program to discover and treat active cases of TB was begun in 1938. In the late 1940s the necessary funding and expertise were provided, new sanitoria and nursing stations were built and aggressive case finding, extensive vaccination and new treatment regimes were begun.

These early efforts bore fruit and today the mortality rate is almost negligible while the incidence of TB has been dramatically reduced. In 1992 the rate was 60 per 100,000 population using official population figures for the First Nations communities.

The reason we were allocating additional funds to implement a national strategy for the elimination of aboriginal tuberculosis was because the decrease in rates had stalled. There remains a number of active TB cases in older people who continue to harbour tuberculosis and who become infectious as they get older and suffer from other diseases and debilitating conditions.

The government has been spending $1 million per year to address this problem and has allocated an additional $2.8 million over the next three years.

While the spread of TB to other people is facilitated by overcrowding and other personal and environmental conditions, the main way to eliminate the disease from the population is to find active cases at an early stage and treat them before the bacterium is spread to contacts, particularly young children who are especially susceptible.

The strategy which this department in partnership with First Nations communities is putting in place aims to reduce the incidence of TB to less than 20 per 100,000 by the year 2000 and to eliminate the disease by the year 2010.

The Speaker: My dear colleagues, this is a very sad day for us here in this House. One of our own is ill. I hope that our colleague, Lucien Bouchard, will be in your prayers today.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed from December 1 consideration of the motion that Bill C–59, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and the income tax application rules, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, you will understand that having just learned of the sudden and dreadful illness that has afflicted our leader, we are all, and particularly those of us who are members of the Bloc Quebecois, deeply saddened, not to say in shock. I can only hope that the Leader of the Opposition will make a speedy recovery.

The Bloc Quebecois is opposed to Bill C–59, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and the Income Tax Application Rules, because of certain measures it introduces. We are not, however, opposed to the following provisions of Bill C–59. First, the permanent renewal of the provision under which money accumulated in an RRSP can be used to finance the purchase of a first home. Second, the measure increasing the value, in many cases, of the charitable donations tax credit. The Bloc Quebecois is in agreement with this last measure, as it recognizes the contribution made by charitable donations to the well–being of the community.

At the present time, taxpayers are entitled to a tax credit equivalent to 17 per cent of the first $250 of charitable donations and a tax credit equal to 29 per cent on charitable donations over $250. The bill before us increases the total value of the tax credit for charitable donations, while lowering the threshold from $250 to $200.

The third measure that we do not object to is the one that permits a tax deduction for contributions into mine reclamation funds by businesses in the mining industry in the year in which these contributions are made. Such funds are used to cover the costs incurred when mines are shut down.

However, as a spokesperson for seniors' associations and organizations in Canada, I have undertaken to ensure that the social programs review not be reduced to simply making cuts across the board in programs designed to protect the disadvantaged, and the aged in particular.

The Bloc Quebecois denounces the fact that, over the next three years, the federal government will take half a billion dollars from seniors with this reduction in the age tax credit.

The National Advisory Council on Aging reported the following regarding the personal disposable income of the elderly: in 1989, the average income of unattached senior citizens 65 and over was $16,316, as compared to $23,080 for their counterparts under 65. An unattached senior citizen is a person who lives alone or in a household in which he or she is related to no other member of the household.

In 1992, the average income in unattached senior citizen households was $18,434, whereas that for other unattached persons was $25,039. Nearly 21 per cent, or 625,000, of Canadian senior citizens are considered as low income. The percentage of low income elderly is always higher than in the general population.

On March 9, I rose in this House and asked the Minister of Human Resources Development this question:

> By making alarming statements on the old age security system, is the minister preparing to hit seniors with a considerable cut in their old age security pensions?

By way of an answer, the Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification simply said that he wanted to "ensure that there will be a stable, effective, fair, honest system for seniors in the future and to make sure that this country can pay for it".

Allow me to wonder about the meaning of the word "stable" used in his reply in relation to seniors, as some tax provisions in Bill C–59 create a climate of insecurity for seniors.

On September 28, I asked the Minister of Human Resources Development another question concerning programs for seniors:

> Does the minister still intend to slash programs for seniors in order to finance other federal government programs?

The minister's reply was this:

> Mr. Speaker, it never was our intention, it will not be our intention, la réponse est non.

The next day, September 29, I rose again in the House of Commons to say this to the Minister of Finance:

> The Minister of Finance turns a deaf ear to public opinion and is using current consultations to deflect any questions. Senior citizens have often saved for years to have a decent income in their old age—
> The government wants to change the rules in the middle of the game. Although the minister has been stalling for several days, he will have to make a decision. Seniors hope he will select the only fair option: no taxation of RRSPs.

Bill C–59 clearly penalizes those most in need. Seniors have worked hard all their lives. We should be grateful to them for being pioneers.

In the last budget, the federal government decided to reduce the age credit. All taxpayers aged 65 and up can apply for a tax credit equal to 17 per cent of $3,482 at the federal level and to 20 per cent of $2,200 in Quebec. This credit is non–refundable, that is, it applies to the tax payable and there can be no refund on the excess portion.

The credit reduces federal income tax by about $610 a year for all seniors who have to pay income tax. In most provinces, including Quebec, this credit also reduces provincial income tax. The combined reduction of federal and provincial income tax averages about $950; in Quebec, it is about $1,050: $610 in federal tax and $440 for Quebec.

The change made by the latest budget would reduce this credit for seniors whose net income exceeds $25,921, the current threshold for other income–dependent credits. This threshold will be indexed to the annual increase in consumer prices over 3 per cent. The credit will be reduced by 15 per cent of an individual's net income over $25,921 and will be completely eliminated when his or her income reaches $49,100.

This measure will be phased in over two years. In 1994, the reduction will be half the amount calculated and the total reduction will apply starting in 1995.

According to the finance department, this measure will affect 800,000 out of 2.6 million seniors, including 600,000 seniors whose income is between $25,921 and $49,134 and 200,000 whose income is over $49,134.

Although the finance department estimated that the credit cost the federal government $1.3 billion in 1991, the expected savings are as follows: $20 million in 1994–95, $170 million in 1995–96 and $300 million in 1996–97.

By tightening the program conditions for seniors, the government is just lowering their income and making them feel insecure.

Furthermore, the government still stubbornly insists on penalizing seniors by proposing to install voice mail systems to answer inquiries from seniors. On May 10, I asked the minister responsible for seniors about using voice mail to answer inquiries from seniors. The minister simply told us about how fast the proposed service was. I explained that many seniors were reluctant to use this type of service, as the representative of the seniors' federation said clearly on their behalf. At the beginning of the period when we present petitions, I will have several petitions to table on this subject.

On May 11, 1994, I raised the issue again by asking this question in the House:

> —why does the federal government insists on attacking senior citizens, considering that most of them find it very difficult to deal with a system that is so impersonal?

The minister's response was both disarming and unacceptable. He said that the program would be more efficient and personalized, and that it would provide better service to seniors. The implementation of a centralized telephone answering system using voice mail to answer every request for information from seniors regarding government services will have a major impact on the quality of services provided to these people.

The Liberal Party was the first one to oppose cuts affecting programs for seniors. The government did not keep its promises. After targeting the age credit, cutting into old age pensions, scaring seniors with the announcement of a review of the Canada Pension Plan, the government now has the audacity to try to tax RRSPs. Every available source of income for seniors will be adversely affected and the federal government does not guarantee anything any more to people who saved money throughout their lives to have decent retirement incomes.

This fear among seniors is prevalent right across the country. I recently met with a delegation representing various associations for seniors, and I was told about their concerns regarding the government's proposed cuts to seniors' programs. I am referring more specifically to the old age pensioners' association, which was represented by its president, Mr. Grabke, its director of public relations, Mr. Ben Swankey, and its chairperson, Mrs. Marjory Kingsbury.

This association is the oldest organization in English Canada and has nearly 10,000 members in about 100 groups throughout British Columbia.

The position of the seniors in these groups was expressed as follows by their representatives.

[English]

"The position of seniors is that our generation made a lifelong contribution to building our country and we believe strongly that Canada should continue to provide a measure of security for seniors in their declining years".

On December 1, here on Parliament Hill, I also met representatives of the coalition of seniors for social equity. The association which has a membership of about 500,000 senior citizens, submitted a brief on the income of seniors: Myth or Reality. The coalition expressed the need for wide ranging consultations and planning, involving both government and seniors groups, before any changes were made in the old age security program.

Mr. André Lécuyer, a spokesman for francophone seniors, stressed that it was important to give people time to plan and adjust to changes in the system. According to Mr. Lécuyer, the public had been led to believe that the government could save more money than it does now, by cutting income security programs for seniors.

The spokesman for the coalition and president of the Federal Superannuates National Association, Mr. Claude Edwards, said during this press conference that they were not prepared to sit idle at a time when the very foundation of their superannuation plan was cracking. He said it was like buying insurance during one's working life and, upon retirement, being told by the insurance company that the policy had been cancelled and the money was no longer available. Why tax seniors?

And what about family trusts? According to some tax experts, wealthy Canadian families use family trusts as a special tax planning tool. Assets in trusts are not subject to capital gains tax for several decades, which means that these families are able to protect part of their family inheritance from one generation to the next. The family trust system introduced in 1972 by the Trudeau government, provided for the disposition of assets in trust after 21 years, which means in 1993, for instance, in the case of trusts created before 1973.

The Bloc Quebecois has nothing against the principle of family trusts but objects to their use as tax shelters. For instance, the Bloc Quebecois objects to the carrying forward of capital gains tax to the next generation. Furthermore, we want the government to reveal the figures on the value of assets and family trusts and the amount of tax revenue lost by deferring capital gains.

Why is the government so hard on the most vulnerable in our society who have worked all their lives and deserve a decent quality of life?

Bill C–59 is unacceptable in its present form because, as a result of certain measures introduced in this bill, the most vulnerable in our society will be penalized.

[English]

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is a sad day for parliamentarians, a sad day for Quebec and a sad day for Canada. Our thoughts today are with our hon. colleague, the Leader of the Opposition who is courageously fighting a very serious personal battle. I wanted to begin my comments by letting him know that our prayers are with him, his family and his children. All Canadians are with him.

I am pleased to join in the debate and to support Bill C–59. There are several aspects of the legislation and how it relates to our overall tax system that deserve comment and clarification.

Let me emphasize that our government knows full well Canadians believe taxes are already too high and we agree with them. That is why our priority objectives are to stimulate economic growth while putting in place real fiscal discipline. It is this double–barrelled thrust that will ultimately allow us to reduce taxes in the years ahead.

Let us remember that the tax deficit relationship is a two–way street. Every dollar of deficit borrowing we accept today will axiomatically lead to higher taxes tomorrow. Every dollar we can trim from the deficit, preferably through spending cuts but also through tax measures if need be is a step on the road to keeping the tax burden down.

That is why our government's 1994 budget was in many ways a tax reform and a tax reduction budget. It included measures to eliminate loopholes and increase tax system fairness and equity. It also committed to direct action to bring down unemployment insurance premiums which is a payroll tax that acts as a real barrier to new job creation.

It was also a tax reduction budget because of the firm commitment made by the Minister of Finance to cut the deficit to 3 per cent of the economy in three years. Again, let me make this central point. Fiscal discipline is the key to long term tax reductions in two key ways.

Obviously the less we have to borrow the less we have to tax to repay the loan and its interest, but there is another important dimension to this process. Controlling government's appetite for debt is our fundamental tool for getting interest rates back down. Lower interest rates mean lower carrying costs on our $500 billion debt. Again that means fewer tax dollars we need to spend.

I understand the concern some Canadians may feel about measures that add to tax revenues today in order to let us cut taxes in the future. We know the tax fatigue felt by so many. That is why the 1994 budget undertook a program of net spending reduction over three years. That is the most significant of any budget in a decade.

Over 80 per cent of the net fiscal improvement delivered by the 1994 budget over three years comes from spending cuts. In other words there are $5 of spending cuts for every $1 of revenue increase.

There is another aspect of our approach I must highlight. The net savings of $17 billion we will achieve in spending cuts comes after paying for our new initiatives. Some $6.7 billion in current federal program spending was reallocated to encourage growth, create jobs and to fund new priorities.

So far I have touched on the broad budgetary context of Bill C–59. Now let me comment on some of the specific aspects of the legislation and how it relates to the tax system and to other issues.

Clearly the most contentious part of the legislation is the measure to subject the age credit to an income test. Let me remind hon. members how this will work. Under the existing tax system Canadian seniors 65 years and over are eligible for special tax relief in the form of an age credit. It results in a combined federal–provincial tax reduction of about $950 per year. It is critical to note that under Bill C–59 individuals with net incomes below $25,921 will retain their full credit. That represents three–quarters of all seniors; 2.6 million seniors will not be affected.

But what about the 800,000 seniors who will feel an impact? Like our tax system itself, the effect will be progressive. For individuals with net incomes above the threshold, the age amount will be reduced at a rate of 15 per cent of their net incomes exceeding $25,921. The threshold will be indexed.

The bottom line is that most of those who will be affected will continue to receive partial benefits. In fact, only about 6 per cent of seniors, some 200,000, will no longer receive benefits because their incomes exceed $49,134, the threshold at which the benefits will be exhausted.

Let me just step aside for a second and give a context to that threshold. In 1992 only 10 per cent of all Canadians filing tax returns had incomes over $50,000. I should also point out that the reduction will be phased in over two years. For 1994 the reduction will be one–half of the amount otherwise determined. As well, the age credit will remain transferable to a spouse.

Let me now turn to the measures in Bill C–59 to eliminate the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption. As was said in the House yesterday, this exemption has been subject to much criticism. It distorts the tax system, totally exempting certain gains while taxing others. It also gives our tax system the real sense of being inequitable because it mostly benefits high income Canadians.

Let me highlight just one aspect of the dilemma. In 1992 there were some 12,000 Canadians out of the 19.4 million tax filers who earned $50,000 or more yet paid no income tax. A wide range of allowable tax deductions and credits made it possible for these people to eliminate their tax liability. Figures show that over 4,700 people in this group, some 40 per cent, used their lifetime capital gains deduction to reduce their tax payable.

I am not suggesting that those Canadians did anything wrong. But there is a real public policy problem, a philosophical wrong at work when millions of less affluent taxpayers see those well–off individuals escape taxation completely.

The bill will be an important step in helping to restore Canadians' faith in tax equity. It will help prevent some people from feeling any justification for their tax evasion, an important goal when the Auditor General reports billions of dollars of unpaid taxes.

The issue of tax system fairness and the ability to avoid taxes leads me directly to other measures of Bill C–59, those related to the corporate sector. There are many Canadians today who feel that the business sector receives preferential treatment compared to the individual taxpayer.

It is worth noting that people often focus on the corporate income tax and do not recognize the many other taxes that businesses must pay. They include provincial corporate income taxes, capital and insurance premium taxes, payroll levies such as UI premiums, Canada and Quebec pension plan contributions, workmen's compensation premiums, and municipal property taxes.

In fact in 1993 Canadian corporations paid some $51 billion in such taxes, about $21 billion to the federal government and $30 billion to the provincial and municipal governments. That being said, the perception of corporate welfare bums still remains in many minds. People still read of profitable corporations paying no tax. They believe there are still too many loopholes and deductions that are not justified given our serious national debt problem.

Bill C–59 takes new steps to reduce deductions and eliminate loopholes that were clearly violating the spirit of a fair tax system. For example, the bill will reduce the tax deduction for eligible business meals and entertainment expenses from 80 per cent to 50 per cent. This measure will make the tax system fairer by helping to ensure that all businesses, large and small, pay an appropriate share of tax. It also better reflects the element of personal consumption that we believe is inherent in such expenses.

I should reiterate a key point made by the government's opening speaker. This measure is consistent with recent reductions of business meals and entertainment expense deductions in Ontario, Quebec and the United States.

The legislation also proposes to restrict the use of certain tax shelters. These are ones where limited or passive investors in a partnership have been able to claim tax deductible losses and/or to receive cash distributions that actually exceed the cost of their investment.

Similarly Bill C–59 will also curtail the use of the tax avoidance technique known as a purchase butterfly. Let me remind members of how this flighty corporate provision has functioned.

Current federal tax rules permit corporate property to be divided pro rata among its shareholders on a tax deferred basis. This assists the splitting up of a corporation so that the shareholders can continue to carry on separately the corporation's business.

In recent years, unfortunately, the rules have been used to avoid or defer tax on the sale of corporate assets. In May 1993 the government introduced rules to curtail cross border purchase butterfly transactions. Bill C–59 proposes to modify these rules and extend them to all purchase butterflies.

The final measure I want to highlight is the proposal to make large private corporations ineligible for the small business deduction. In today's new economy small business is the major job creator. It is a sector that deserves effective targeted support.

Unfortunately under the existing rules this support was also going to larger firms, companies that do not have a reasonable claim on the limited public and taxpayers' purse.

The small business deduction recognizes the special financing difficulties and higher capital costs faced by the vital small business sector. The deduction lowers the basic federal tax rate on the first $200,000 of active business income of Canadian controlled private corporations from 28 per cent to 12 per cent, a reduction of 16 percentage points.

This lower tax rate provides small corporations with more after tax income for reinvestment and expansion. Regrettably under the current rules, some very large corporations are also obtaining this benefit. The proposed rule changes will make large corporations, those with taxable capital of $15 million or more, ineligible for the small business deduction. As well, the rule changes will reduce the deduction for corporations having taxable capital between $10 million and $15 million.

Let me acknowledge that Bill C–59 will not in itself resolve Canada's fiscal problems nor restore equity throughout the tax system. Those are the goals that will only be met by consistent, continuous effort, effort our government is committed to delivering.

Bill C–59 does take valuable steps in both directions, measures to broaden the tax base for fiscal renewal and even more important, measures to improve the fairness and efficiency of the tax system itself. On both counts it deserves the full support of the House.

As I said, Bill C–59 in itself is not going to change or fix all our problems. We do need a continuous and consistent effort to deal with the deficit and the debt.

I want to spend the remaining moments of my time to review very briefly some of the initiatives that the government and the finance minister have brought forward in preparation for our next budget.

On October 17, 1994, the finance minister came before the finance committee of the House of Commons and outlined the framework for economic policy. I want to remind hon. members of the first principles that the finance minister articulated for all members.

He said: "First, we have one overriding goal as a government, that is jobs and economic growth. Second, good economic policy and good social policy are one and the same. Third, a country that is to continue to care for its citizens must be a country that can pay its bills, and, fourth, we need to create a new infrastructure for a Canada of ideas and innovation". Finally he said that government itself must change. A government cannot or should not do everything. Responsibility should lie with those who are best able to do the job.

We have had changes in the world economy. We are now in a strong economic recovery. Jobs are being created. The job crisis is not just about a recession or a cycle. It is a global epidemic. The world economy is truly integrated. Trade barriers are now gone. Communications are instant. Transportation is efficient. Markets never close and of course information technology is exploding. All this spells competition and opportunity. To be successful we need to upgrade our skills to fit a knowledge based economy. In addition we must reform our social and income support programs upon which so many Canadians have become dependent.

The fiscal track we have been on is unsustainable, not because of ideology but because of its mathematical reality. The only answer to our job dilemma is sustained substantial economic growth. That growth requires improved productivity in terms of ingenuity, better management and paying attention to the common sense workers.

High productivity increases incomes and contributes to a higher standard of living for all Canadians. To improve our productivity we must also improve our skills.

During the social program review and in the budget review it has become clear that we will and we are reviewing all programs. Rather than trying to fix everything by ourselves we are also trying to facilitate solutions in partnerships with business, industry, and Canadians at large.

We must also continue to clean up federal regulations which cost businesses billions of dollars. We must create a healthy fiscal and monetary climate. We must restore our fiscal health and deal with the deficit and the debt. As we know the debt is growing faster than the economy and that is unsustainable. As the finance minister and the Prime Minister have told us on so many occasions, our goal is to balance the budget.

As an interim target the government is committed to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP by the 1996–97 year. We are going to hit that target.

Finally let me highlight the principles guiding our choices in the 1995 budget as represented to the finance committee on October 18. He said that deficit reduction is an integral part of jobs and growth strategy. Fairness, and I stress fairness, is paramount so the most vulnerable in our society will not be left behind. Deficit reduction must be selective and strategic, reflecting clear priorities and not simply a mathematical across the board approach.

Budgetary action should weigh on the side of cuts and expenditures and not increased taxes. Economic assumptions must be prudent to stimulate confidence that deficit targets will be achieved.

We have $120 billion that the government spends on programs, one–third of which went to individuals in the form of elderly or UI benefits, transfers to Indians or to the Inuit. Twenty–five per cent of transfers were to other levels of government, ten per cent to business subsidies, international assistance, et cetera, and nine per cent to defence. All aspects of our program spending will be reviewed.

This is the commitment of the government. This is the direction established by the 1994 budget. This is the direction supported by Bill C–59.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to rise for debate on Bill C–59, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and the income tax application rules.

Before getting into my speech, I want to say that I am deeply concerned for the health and welfare of the Leader of the Opposition as I know all my colleagues are. I want him and his family to know that our thoughts and prayers are with him through this ordeal. We sincerely wish him the very best.

I am going to speak against the bill today for reasons I will talk about later. I would like to first summarize the bill. As I do that I will point out the positive and negative aspects as I see them. I will outline why I will not support the legislation. Then I will briefly talk about what the government should have done instead of putting these changes in place.

To summarize, the bill has 12 main points. First is the elimination of the $100,000 lifetime capital gains exemption. I believe this is the most significant change in the bill. I will discuss it later.

Second, it extends employee benefits to include the first $25,000 of life insurance. Reform supports this measure. I support this measure because it harmonizes employer funded plans with private plans.

The third aspect dealt with in the bill is the age tax credit. It reduces the amount of credit based on an individual's income level. It provides for income testing which I believe is something we need in this tough financial crisis we are facing right now. It provides a clawback of credits that begins at $26,000 and ends at $50,000 when the credit is fully clawed back. We support this measure because it moves away from universality, benefiting those most in need. This is something we have to move to in the times we are in.

The fourth aspect is extending the homebuyers plan indefinitely for first time buyers. While I support this to some extent I do have some concern with it. It is discriminating against second and third time buyers and so on. One thing I do not like to see in the income tax system is measures that encourage and give special preference to one group and not to others. While I support the idea and think it will be productive, I do have some concerns for these reasons.

Fifth is the area of charitable donation tax credits. It lowers the threshold at which the tax credit is calculated. The amount is now 17 per cent of the first $250 donated and 29 per cent for anything over $250. The change lowers the threshold for the 29 per cent benefit to $200. This is an acceptable change.

The sixth change is a reduction in the business meals and entertainment expense allowance from 80 per cent to 50 per cent. I support the elimination of this measure which I believe has been a subsidy to business to some extent. I believe the meal allowance is due to some extent at least a double–up on an expense that would normally be there in the life of other individuals who are not carrying out business. I agree with the lowering of this level to 50 per cent from 80 per cent.

Seventh, in terms of tax shelters and partnership interests, it requires limiting the amount to passive partners. It really deals with the issue of using partnership interests for tax shelters. I believe this change will correct a loophole that Reform has seen and we support it for that reason.

Eighth, the device of corporate recognition closes tax loopholes. This loophole has allowed capital gains on disposition of corporate assets to be avoided in certain circumstances. Because it is being removed we support it.

The ninth measure, the investment in research and development tax credit, reduces regional disparity in certain credit schemes and distortions in the tax regime. Because it removes these disparities in the distortion we support it as well.

The tenth amendment is the expenditure limit on scientific research and development. It prorates the expenditure limit for a Canadian controlled private corporation and is based on the corporation's business limit for the year. It seems that it would make sense although we have some concern about that as well.

The eleventh measure reduces the small business deduction available to Canadian controlled private corporations with taxable capital over $10 million but under $15 million. These changes ensure that only small businesses can avail themselves of this deduction which was intended for small business in the first place. At least it is moving the deduction toward the more common or more accepted definition of small business. We support the measure for that reason.

The final change is to the mine reclamation fund. This results in lower taxes and provides for environmental clean–up. It is something that Reform expects in any business venture. Part of the business analysis before start–up should involve environmental reclamation in the case of mines or should involve figuring the cost of putting the environment in as near to the original condition as possible. Reform supports that.

Why does the Reform Party not support the legislation? The main reason is that the $100,000 capital gains tax exemption is being removed. This is a serious impediment to the build–up of wealth in Canada. To me that is a large concern.

Yesterday and the day before I attended a conference in Toronto. It was called Hitting the Wall and was sponsored by the Fraser Institute. There were speakers from several countries who were seized very much with the situation in countries like Canada that had refused to deal with the situation until it became a crisis.

One of the things that was talked about at the conference was the fact that it is very important to have savings in a country, especially a country like Canada that is seriously facing the very real possibility, in fact probability according to these speakers who had lived through this in other countries, of Canada being cut off in terms of bond issues to other countries.

It is a very real possibility. I will talk a little later about how the different speakers dealt with this issue and their thoughts on it. If there comes a time, and I believe there will come a time, that Canada issues a bond and there are no takers, we have a crisis. Our savings in Canada have been declining. It used to be that the United States had the lowest percentage of savings in the OECD countries. Now Canada has surpassed the United States in having the lowest savings level in the OECD. The United States which is notorious for having low savings now has been outstripped by Canada in winning that honour.

When the time comes that we have no takers on our bonds from outside the country, we will then we have to rely solely on Canadians to finance any additional debt and to finance payments on our present debt. What does it mean if savings are decreasing? It means there is that much less money available to finance the new debt and the new money that Canada has to borrow just to continue to keep the country operating. Therefore there is less money available.

Speakers at the conference made it known that it gives us less margin to react come the time when our bonds will no longer be accepted. There were speakers at the conference who deal in offering and buying Canadian bonds. One individual worked for a Japanese corporation. When asked he said that his corporation probably would continue to fund Canada's debt through bonds, but not because Canada is a good risk. In fact this gentleman said very clearly that Canada is a very bad risk. But his corporation will continue to buy bonds because Canada will pay the risk premium that is necessary for its investors to be willing to buy them.

Another reason is that the proportion of Canadian bonds held by this huge bonding company, of which this gentleman is the chief economist, is 3 per cent of its portfolio. Because of the high risk premium, in other words the high interest rates Canada must pay to maintain this foreign debt, this company will continue to finance these bonds for now.

However this gentleman said there could well come a time when the financial situation will be so bad that Canada will not be able to fund our debt from without. It could be very soon. That is why it is extremely important we have savings in the country to at least tide us over until we can make some kind of an arrangement with the International Monetary Fund to deal with the crisis, get some intermediate funding and work out an arrangement to work through the crisis which is caused by debt that is out of hand and government spending which is out of hand.

At this conference several things came across very clearly. First, most of the speakers at the conference said that Canada is in a very serious situation right now. Two of the speakers said they thought government would not deal with the problem. In other words they said Canada will hit the wall. It means that our economy and this country will go into a crisis situation. We will not be able to obtain financing from outside the country.

Both of these speakers were very clear in saying that it does not have to be like that, but that history has shown that is what happens. The history of Argentina, Brazil, Italy, Chile, Mexico and New Zealand among other countries has shown this. These are countries that had well developed economies, much like Canada's. However history has shown that governments in well developed countries will not deal with the problem.

Two speakers said we are going to hit the wall, our economy is going to collapse. Most speakers said we do not have to. The telltale time will be the finance minister's next budget. If he comes out with a budget that cuts spending, that will lead to a balanced budget in a very short time, then we will avoid this crisis.

These speakers were not confident that will happen. They said we certainly can avoid it. But this next budget is the last chance. They made that very clear.

One speaker told a story about our finance minister. He said our finance minister had gone to the doctor because he had a serious hearing problem. The doctor said: "Your hearing problem is directly related to the fact that you are drinking a little too much. You have to cut your drinking down and that will fix the hearing problem". The finance minister went away and came back several months later. The doctor asked: "Have you quit drinking?" The finance minister said: "Yes, I have. I did quit drinking but I found that what I was drinking was much better than what I was hearing, so I started drinking again".

I hope sincerely that is not the case, that is not the way the finance minister will react to this crisis and that he will come down with the budget we need next February. It is our last chance to avoid this crisis.

Increases in taxation will not solve the problem. A decrease in government spending will. This is our last chance. Let there be no doubt about it.

The Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45(6), the recorded division stands deferred until Monday, December 5, 1994, at 6.30 p.m.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent that the vote be further deferred from Monday until Tuesday at 5.30 p.m.

The Speaker: Members have heard the hon. member's suggestion. Is there unanimous agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind hon. members and all Canadians that, as citizens of Canada and citizens of the world, each and everyone of us is responsible for protecting our precious natural heritage and for transmitting it to future generations.

[English]

Each year the Environmental Achievement Awards recognize the special contribution Canadians have made toward protecting and restoring the integrity of our natural environment.

The 1994 winners of the Environmental Achievement Awards, the finalists and the candidates, are an outstanding example of how we all, individually or as a group, can make a difference.

[English]

Special congratulations are in order, Mr. Speaker, for yourself and all the employees of the House of Commons. The House received an Environmental Achievement Award yesterday, recognizing its environmental leadership within the federal government for its program "Greening the Hill", an initiative designed to incorporate environmental considerations into its daily operations.

IRVING WHALE

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, recently, Le Radar, the Magdalen Islands newspaper, published an editorial that was very critical of the Minister of the Environment for her attitude to the refloating of the Irving Whale. The barge is lying on the bottom of the sea between the Magdalen Islands and Prince Edward Island, with three million litres of oil in its hold.

The people of the Islands are alarmed at the prospect of this very risky operation to refloat the barge, especially since two sea birds were recently found covered in oil, on the beaches of the Islands.

The Regroupement des Madelinots has demanded that the Minister of Transport reconsider the decision to refloat the barge and adopt a safer method, consisting of pumping and refloating.

Why is the government so reluctant to listen to these people who are afraid that an ecological disaster could threaten the fragile ecosystem of the Islands? What is it waiting for?

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to express the deep concern of all members of the Reform Party for the current health crisis the member for Lac–Saint–Jean is facing.

Our thoughts and prayers go out to his wife and family as they deal with this serious situation.

We want our colleagues in the Bloc to know that we share their concern for the health of their leader. While we do not share the same political views, there is no question of the member's sincerity and dedication to his cause and those who support him.

Good health and a loving family are far too often taken for granted as we deal with life each day. It is the suddenness of something like this that serves to remind all Canadians of how fragile our hold on good health really is.

We in Reform wish the member for Lac–Saint–Jean a speedy recovery so that he may return to his family. We look forward to his return to the House.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. Minister of Justice for making good on the government's promise to fight crime with tough gun control legislation.

The vast majority of my constituents of Parkdale—High Park welcome mandatory prison sentences for those who commit violent crimes with a gun. We welcome mandatory jail terms for those caught in possession of stolen or restricted firearms. All Canadians are pleased to see that gun smugglers will serve up to 10 years.

Tougher gun control is just one part of the government's commitment to safer streets and safer homes. Personal safety is in everyone's interest. If this legislation will save one life it will be worth the time, the effort and the cost of the program.

GUELPH POLICE CHIEF

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, once again the city of Guelph has made history. On November 29 the Police Services Board announced the appointment of the first woman to head a city police force in Canada.

I join my constituents in congratulating Lenna Bradburn on her appointment. Ms. Bradburn becomes police chief at age 34. She is described as extremely intelligent, extremely innovative and extremely productive. She was chosen largely because of her innovative ideas on strategic planning and community policing.

On December 19 Lenna Bradburn becomes chief of police and will lead Guelph's 142 officer force for the next five years. The city of Guelph and the residents of Guelph—Wellington welcome Chief Lenna Bradburn and wish her much success in this challenging position.

AWARDS FOR BRAVERY

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq, Lib.):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

I would like to take a few moments today to recognize some very courageous people in my constituency. Earlier this month they were honoured with the NWT Commissioner's award for bravery.

Moses Aliyak of Rankin Inlet received the award for bravery at the highest level for rescuing his wife and nephew from a polar bear attack.

Three Cambridge Bay residents, Peter Evalik, Richard Evalik and Grant Corey, also received the award at the highest level. They saved the lives of two women in a burning house by crawling through heavy smoke to find them and get them to safety.

Dennis Klengenberg and Kevin Niptanatiak of Coppermine received letters of commendation for rescuing each other after their snow machine broke through the ice near the mouth of the Coppermine River.

With great pride and admiration I salute these heroes of the north.

BLOOD SYSTEM

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, some important aspects contained in the report of the panel of experts on the safety of the blood system in Canada were revealed yesterday after being leaked to the press.

Several complaints and fears expressed by a number of groups were confirmed in the report. The experts noted a manifest lack of consistency in the work done by Health Canada's Bureau of Biologics, which is responsible for controlling the quality of blood products and facilities at the seventeen transfusion centres of the Canadian Red Cross.

This proves how reluctant the Minister of Health is to take the present situation seriously. The minister prefers to let the provinces take the blame for this mess and, instead of doing what she is supposed to do, has tolerated these lax procedures at the Bureau of Biologics. It is high time the minister acted responsibly and tightened up the standards and their application.

JUSTICE

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in July of this year an RCMP officer in my constituency caught Ian David Martin crossing into Canada illegally.

This 200–pound man lunged at the officer, knocking her down and wrestling away her service revolver. Just before he could shoot the officer a private citizen by the name of Klaus Soth stopped his car and intervened. Though threatened with death he bravely continued to reason with the assailant until they could both escape. Subsequently the criminal torched the police car, causing $41,000 worth of damage.

For these grievous crimes he received a slap on the wrist of 15 months. He may be paroled by Christmas. Mr. Martin also had a smuggled .357 magnum revolver on his person.

If the government would have followed Reform's prescription a year ago and put in place automatic sentences for the commission of crimes while using a gun, this dangerous man could have been put away for years instead of months.

Our current system mocks justice and declares open season on police officers by allowing criminals to act with virtual impugnity.

SOCIAL SECURITY PROGRAMS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government has launched the first ever comprehensive review of social security programs.

To say the least, this has been long overdue. Canadians realize that the social safety net no longer meets the needs of those in need. Not enough emphasis is placed on ending the cycle of dependence on poverty.

This is particularly true in Atlantic Canada. That region desperately needs better access to higher education and training programs to help people get jobs that last.

Atlantic Canada has a seasonal economy. Agriculture, tourism and fishing are our largest industries and will remain so for a long time. In redesigning the unemployment insurance program and other social programs, I urge the minister to remember the seasonal foundation of our economy.

I am confident this government will design a package that will help us move beyond a seasonal economy and that seasonal workers will not be left behind.

JUSTICE

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on November 16, 1992 I had the honour of introducing in the House two very important bills. Bill C–365 considered crossbows dangerous weapons and recommended that they be prohibited. Bill C–366 sought to prohibit the sale and use of replica guns that might be mistaken as a real weapon and used in crime.

These bills came about as the result of major crimes in our community. On behalf of the victims of these crimes, in particular Patricia Allen's family and friends, I want to congratulate the Minister of Justice in committing this government to taking action on the banning of these two items.

The people in my community are solidly behind the minister's bold, progressive and dynamic approach to addressing the issues of crime and community safety.

I would also like to take a moment to thank my former staff member, Mike Bonser, who worked very hard on these two bills, and my current staff for their continued support and hard work. As members know, an MP without staff is like a bird without wings. I thank all MPs' staff for making our job a lot easier.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS REVIEW

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in October the Minister of Human Resources Development released a discussion paper entitled: "Improving Social Security in Canada". This document outlined the government's options for improving Canada's social programs.

To ensure that the people of my Dauphin—Swan River riding had input into the changes being made, I sponsored four public forums as part of the public consultation process. I am pleased to report that the forums were a complete success.

The participants represented a cross–section of the riding. The discussions were thoughtful and constructive. A variety of very good ideas were brought to the table. Today I will be providing the minister and the standing committee with the report that summarizes these very valuable ideas.

I strongly recommend to all members of this House who have not yet met with their constituents about this important issue to do so.

THE DEFICIT

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, many Canadians are demanding that the government increase its efforts to reduce the deficit. We must cut the deficit now while the economy is still expanding. The government does not appear to be listening, but maybe it will listen to the latest news.

The International Monetary Fund is also disappointed by the government's deficit reduction targets. A confidential IMF report said that it would be appropriate to plan on the basis of a more ambitious medium term target in the 1995–96 budget, with a view to accelerating fiscal consolidation the next few years.

Along with the IMF, market watchers are becoming uneasy with the federal government's 3 per cent target. Last month witnessed the largest sell off of foreign held Canadian securities since the eve of the Charlottetown accord.

When will this government get the message that 3 per cent is not enough? The debt clock today is $540,471,337,554.19.

NATIONAL ROAD SAFETY WEEK

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to remind all Canadians that this week is National Road Safety Week. It is important that all motorists in this country realize the importance of safe driving.

[Translation]

Last Monday, I had the misfortune to be involved in a traffic accident. I emerged with a broken nose, a few bruises and a good scare. The woman driving the second vehicle was also slightly injured.

I can tell you that the fact that I was wearing a seat belt probably saved my life. There are far too many deaths in Canada. A number of lives could be saved simply by the use of seatbelts.

• (1110)

It is my keen hope that this message will be heard by the public and that National Road Safety Week will be a reminder to motorists that safety on the roads is in their hands. I repeat my message: we must all be on our guard when driving.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice has indicated his desire to enact stringent gun control measures that will primarily affect law–abiding citizens and will do little to address the criminal use of guns.

I fully support several measures which call for increased penalties for the trafficking of illegal weapons and certainty of sentencing for weapons offences. However, I caution the Minister of Justice to bear in mind that of all homicides committed between 1961 and 1990, less than 1 per cent were committed with legally owned handguns. As a result the registration of all firearms will be of little value in attempting to reduce crime and it will be the law–abiding citizens who will bear the brunt of this legislation.

The reality is we have a serious crime problem, not a serious gun problem. The principle of the protection of life and property of every Canadian citizen must be the number one priority when considering all legislation pertaining to our criminal justice system. I trust the Minister of Justice will bear this in mind.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House the member for London West was asking a very serious question of the Minister of Justice about violence against women and I quote: "Most of the violence women experience is in their homes and at the hands of men they know. What measures is the minister taking to protect women from violence?"

A male member from the Reform Party clearly shouted out: "Give them .32s," a shameful display of disrespect—

The Speaker: My colleagues, this matter was dealt with yesterday on a point of order. At that time I heard both sides. I would say that this statement is coming back on a point of order that I declared closed. This statement is out of order.

LEADER OF THE OFFICIAL OPPOSITION

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Lucien Bouchard, our leader and our friend, is right now engaged in a human drama, the intensity of which we can scarcely imagine. We are powerless before this tragic event and must rely completely on medicine and on providence.

But we want him to know that we are all with him in spirit, that our thoughts and our energies accompany him. All the members of this House, and the members of the Bloc Quebecois in particular, wish to express their support to his family, especially his mother, his wife Audrey and his two children, Alexandre and Simon. Lucien Bouchard is a man who has devoted all his energy and all his talent to the cause of the people of Quebec and today, in his personal struggle, the people of Quebec are behind him.

MIL DAVIE SHIPYARD

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the acting Prime Minister.

The board of directors of Hibernia has really thumbed its nose at the Prime Minister—a move with very serious political consequences—by refusing his request to review its decision to award a contract without tender to Saint John Shipbuilding. In doing so, the Hibernia board is maintaining its original decision which violates all the rules for awarding contracts.

Does the acting Prime Minister maintain the position of the Prime Minister, who said that the contract should not have been awarded directly to Saint John Shipbuilding?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): First of all, Mr. Speaker, before answering the hon. member's question, let me say that our thoughts and prayers go out to the Leader of the Opposition and his family. We pray that he will recover and regain his health. I think that I speak not only for my colleagues but for all Canadians.

[English]

I was in agreement with what the Prime Minister said when he made the remarks quoted by the hon. member. I continue to be in agreement with those remarks.

However, after the announcement of the consortium yesterday that they had acceded to the request of the government to review their decision but after doing so had decided to maintain their original decision, we sought legal advice. I say with some regret that the advice was that the government does not have the legal means to do anything to change that decision.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, while everyone, including the Minister of Natural Resources and the Prime Minister, admits that MIL Davie was wronged by this appalling decision and that the Hibernia consortium is making a mockery of the established rules, does the government now intend to intervene directly so that justice and equity prevail?

I recall that there were two bidders. When one of them cannot fulfil the contract, usually the second one is called on. Will the government put sufficient pressure on the board of directors?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, MIL Davie was not the only one wronged by this decision. I think that all other shipyards that could have bid are in the same position. That is why the government, in light of the report from the Newfoundland–Canada Offshore Petroleum Board, asked for a review of the initial decision.

I am sorry to say that based on the legal opinions we have received we cannot insist that the call for tenders be reissued. I must add that a general review of all the economic spinoffs in this area is already in place. The government will take this situation into consideration to see what changes must be made in future to avoid a recurrence.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, let us recall the facts. The Canada–Newfoundland board said that only MIL Davie was wronged. First, no other shipyards were mentioned. Second, all the shipyards could bid. When Hibernia called for tenders, only two shipyards bid, Marystown and MIL Davie. Normally, the second one is called on if the first is not up to scratch.

Remember that before he left for Paris, the Prime Minister clearly instructed Hibernia to review its initial decision, which he termed unfortunate. How does the acting Prime Minister explain that, although his government guarantees 50 per cent of the Hibernia project and is investing more than $3 billion in it, it cannot make the Hibernia consortium respect its decisions and those of the Prime Minister?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I said that not only MIL Davie but also the other shipyards were wronged by the decisions in question because all the other shipyards did not have a chance to bid on the work which was taken away from Marystown.

• (1120)

Second, my answer was given in light of the fact that the previous Conservative government had passed a bill on the Atlantic Accord which does not give the present government the power to have the contract in question reopened. I am sorry but that is why the government is reviewing the whole program of economic benefits to be certain that the situation will not recur.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind the Acting Prime Minister that the Bloc Quebecois was the only party to vote against the Hibernia legislation; the current government voted in favour.

The Hibernia consortium, heavily subsidized with billions of dollars from taxpayers in Canada and Quebec, was denounced last week by the Canada–Newfoundland Board for violating the terms of the plan for awarding Hibernia contracts. By renewing their decision, probably with the agreement of the representative from Petro–Canada, 70 per cent owned by the federal government, the members of the Hibernia board of directors continue to deny justice to the MIL Davie shipyard.

Is the government aware that by not immediately demanding the cancellation of the contract awarded to Saint John Shipbuilding, it is condoning another decision that discriminates against the MIL Davie shipyard?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, according to the advice I received, the government does not have the power to have the contract in question reopened but, because it wants to ensure that MIL Davie and all other shipyards are treated equally in this matter, the government has asked the consortium to review its decision. We regret that the consortium has decided to maintain this decision. As I just said, that is why we will undertake a full review of this system of economic benefits and do what we can so that this situation does not happen again.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if I understand correctly, the government has no power to act, but it has the power to sink billions of dollars into this project.

Are we to understand that the government's refusal to take immediate action in this matter is intended to doom the MIL Davie shipyard and to satisfy its little Liberal friends in the maritimes?

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that in this difficult situation the hon. member can do nothing but try to sow dissension and ill will between various parts of Canada. I think it is shameful that he misuses this serious situation in this way.

This government wants to treat all involved in a fair and equitable fashion: MIL Davie, the shipyards in Atlantic Canada and everyone else concerned, and that is the way we have been acting. We have used the powers we have and unfortunately they do not extend to having the whole thing reopened. However, we are reviewing the whole process to try and make sure that this unfortunate situation does not happen again.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the report of the special joint committee on Canada's defence policy has been generally well received. There has been virtually unanimous support for the recommendation to constitute a standing joint committee on defence to monitor progress on defence department programs. I have been unable to find any reference to this committee in the white paper.

I ask the defence minister, is this an oversight or has the government decided to exclude Parliament from defence matters?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we deliberately did not address ourselves to this particular question in the white paper because this is really a matter of negotiation between the leaders of the various parties and in the other place. That is something my colleague, the House leader, will obviously take into consideration. However, that is not within the ambit of defence policy.

• (1125)

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, perhaps this falls into the same category, but I think the minister should address it.

The committee report also recommended that except in extraordinary circumstances Canadian forces commitments for overseas tasking should not be made prior to a debate in Parliament.

Canadians want to know what is involved and want to have more opportunity to express their opinions before our forces are committed overseas. The government has been better than the previous government, but Rwanda and Haiti had in fact been decided before they were brought before Parliament.

Will the government reconsider and commit to incorporating this parliamentary process?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member has answered his own question, if I may say. The fact is this government has had debates on our peacekeeping engagements and I am sure the Prime Minister will continue to do that in future.

In terms of the flexibility of having those debates, that is really up to the Prime Minister and the government generally. Again it is a representation that I am sure we will consider.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we would very much like to see a commitment by the government to bring this to pass.

The military training assistance program is one in which foreign military personnel are trained in concepts and procedures by our military. Unlike Canada, foreign military officers are often directly involved or very influential in their governments.

In the white paper the government has committed to expand this program. While the training is done by the military the results support foreign relations, international trade or it could even be called foreign aid. The committee recommended that that defence dollars be spent only on defence.

Will the minister confirm that the costs of the MTAP will not come out of the defence budget.

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, they do come out of the defence budget now and they obviously will in the future.

I beg to differ with my friend. We believe that the bilateral assistance that we give to members of other armed forces is consistent not only with our foreign policy, but is an aspect of defence policy. That is something we will continue. In fact, in the white paper we do announce a decision which was communicated by the Minister of Foreign Affairs yesterday in Brussels to his colleagues to reduce our commitment to the NATO infrastructure budget so that some of those funds which now do not come back to Canada, because Canada has given one of the largest shares and has probably the lowest payback, will be used for bilateral training at our Lester B. Pearson Peacekeeping Institute in Cornwallis, Nova Scotia, involving specifically those countries in the Partnership for Peace Program from eastern Europe.

BOSNIA

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The war is more intense than ever in Bosnia. After the visit of the UN Secretary–General to Sarajevo ended in failure, Bosnian Serbs took more peacekeepers hostage in a raid in Croatia. They are pursuing their assault on Bihac and continue to block humanitarian relief convoys. It is even reported that, today, they fired missiles on Sarajevo.

Does the minister confirm these reports? And can he give us an update on the situation in the former Yugoslavia, especially as the conflict may well spread to Croatia now?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we did not get any dramatically different news from the former Yugoslavia today than we got yesterday except that there are some hopeful signs. Some convoys, I believe involving British and Dutch, have been allowed to proceed. So they are not being detained.

Discussions are under way concerning our Canadian peacekeepers that have been detained. As I have said publicly, those people who are detaining them from the Bosnian—Serb side are not unknown to our forces. There is a good rapport between them. While it is obviously becoming much more worrying and frustrating for everyone concerned, especially the families, we have no reason to believe that the situation involving our own peacekeepers has deteriorated substantially.

[Translation]

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the contact group is scheduled to meet today in Brussels to develop a new diplomatic approach. Can the minister tell us what Canada's preference would be in terms of such an approach and whether or not he supports the idea that was put forward, to let the Bosnian Serbs form a confederation with Serbia?

[English]

• (1130)

As far as we are concerned it is time to take a fresh look at negotiations for a settlement in the former Yugoslavia. Obviously the settlement the contact group came up with earlier this summer is unacceptable, at least to the Bosnian Serb side.

We need some fresh thinking. Whether or not Canada is part of the contact group we are kept informed. We have indirect input. I hope that Canada can play a more prominent role in bringing the various points of view together in the coming weeks.

BUDGETARY POLICY

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party has been saying that the deficit should be eliminated during this term of Parliament but the Minister of Finance has said it is unrealistic.

In the finance hearing, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Business Council on National Issues, the C. D. Howe Institute and others have said that we should balance the budget within the term of this Parliament.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Does he believe this is realistic at this point in time?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government continues to be committed to its deficit reduction target. Its interim target is 3 per cent of GDP in the third year of its mandate. It is definite. It is clearly the Minister of Finance's response to this. It is clearly on the agenda and we will certainly make that target.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the pillar of the Liberal Party is the red book. On page 20 of that book it says that there will be a balanced budget, but it also says that it is unrealistic to do it five years. It is time the government puts on the table what is a proper time line. Could the minister indicate to the House when the budget will be balanced?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the interim target is within two years now. It is important for the government to meet its targets on a year by year basis.

It is important to restore the confidence of the financial markets in the ability of the government to meet its targets. There is no point in putting forward a target that is unreachable such as the Reform Party has done in the past. It is important to put forward targets that are reachable and attainable to ensure we have the financial market's support.

That is what we are going to do. We are going to reach our target of 3 per cent of GDP in the third year. Then we are going to go on to a balanced budget.

DEFENCE POLICY

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

The minister tabled yesterday, and rather hastily, his white paper on defence, which is in fact a botched job, a spur of the moment job, a paper characterized throughout by a backward–looking vision and lacking any real, meaningful direction.

Does the minister not realize that the hurried tabling of his white paper has deprived the government of practical proposals with respect to NATO, NORAD and the UN and thus provides no real vision of the future?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe the hon. member made this assertion. I can only assume he has not read the white paper. As has been pointed out by the critic for the Reform Party, the white paper has been very well received.

As to the timing, we always said we would try to table the document before Christmas. We are cognizant of the fact that going into the holiday season people are preoccupied with other matters and we wanted to give Parliament and Canadians a good time to reflect on it.

Again the hon. member is indirectly reflecting on the work of the special joint committee on defence. I know his party had a dissenting report, but there were three other parties including a party not represented in the House officially, but represented in the Senate—which shall remain nameless—that all agreed with the report. We have taken the core of that report, almost all the recommendations, and we have embellished them. I believe that if the hon. member reads the document he will see it does set out a clear vision for defence policy in the 21st century.

[Translation]

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, knowing that the development of any defence policy is really only possible when it is keyed to a clear foreign policy, how can the minister suggest and maintain that he has a clear vision of the future, when his white paper was tabled before the government even had the chance to announce the new thrust of its foreign policy?

• (1135)

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): It is true, Mr. Speaker, that defence policy is to some degree an instrument of foreign policy but not exclusively so. There are constitutional requirements made of the armed forces which do not fall into the foreign affairs category. The whole question of protecting Canada offshore, around its coasts, aid to the civil power, are domestic considerations to protect Canada's interest.

With respect to the substance of the question on why we have done this now as opposed to doing it jointly with a foreign policy report, the government felt that with all of the rapid changes, especially reductions, being faced by the armed forces we owed it to all those in the forces, both civilian and uniform personnel, to give some clear indication of where we are going as quickly as possible, but also to set in motion some of the equipment purchases for which we have a dramatic need.

The defence white paper and its security review coincide with the recommendations of the joint committee on foreign policy, the joint committee on defence policy and was developed in conjunction with my colleague, the Minister of Foreign Affairs, who is quite comfortable with it.

From the point of view of Canada's security policy we feel it is quite appropriate to table the document at this particular time.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Health.

The Reform Party is committed to ensuring that every Canadian citizen receive essential health care services in a timely fashion regardless of income. The presence of private medical clinics would allow this by decreasing waiting lists and decreasing pressure on the public system.

Why is the government exercising the archaic Canada Health Act and threatening to penalize Alberta for trying to provide better health care for all of its citizens?

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at the meeting of November 28 the Minister of Health advised that she would be providing a clarification of our interpretation of the Canada Health Act to all provinces in the very near future.

The minister has repeatedly maintained that the Canada health system is the best system in the world. The rest of the world envies our system. We invite the province of Alberta, like the other provinces are doing, to continue to protect and develop this wonderful system.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we used to have the best health care system but tragically we do not any more. I hope no one in the House has to find that out.

Private clinics exist in Alberta, Ontario and the rest of the country. Why is the government threatening only Alberta for this by cutting transfer payments and not Ontario?

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the minister has repeatedly stated in the House that a broad consensus exists on the need to regulate private clinics to ensure there are no financial barriers to access any necessary medical services, and the minister invites the Alberta government to do that.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. In spite of the disastrous state of public finances, the Minister of National Defence has drawn up an extensive shopping list. Indeed, he wants to buy new armoured personnel carriers, new land helicopters, new remote controlled weapons, and even new submarines. Yet, the white paper tabled yesterday does not include any concrete measure to eliminate the waste of some $100 million disclosed by the Auditor General in his recent report.

How can the minister explain that his white paper totally ignores the Auditor General's recommendations and that his department still does not implement better management practices to cut spending and save money?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member has read the report.

The white paper talks about improvement of administrative practices, of saving money, of privatizing certain functions such as maintenance and things of that nature, all of which have been advocated by the Auditor General over the years. In addition, administrative measures have been announced recently that are ongoing and meet the Auditor General's requirements.

On the question the hon. member raises about a so–called shopping list, the fact is, and let us be frank about it, we are either in the defence business or we are not. If we are in the defence business we cannot have our armed forces personnel ill equipped. There is agreement both in the parliamentary committees and across the country that we have to equip our armed forces better.

In the case of the armoured personnel carriers I do not think there is any argument that these are justified. In the case of helicopters we always knew that the search and rescue helicopters would have to be replaced. It is a civilian role, not purely military.

As to the question of the helicopters on the ships that is something that was recommended by the special joint committee and something we can fully justify.

[Translation]

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister, who was described last week as the minister of waste by the Auditor General, justify that his white paper contains none of the Auditor General's recommendations, whether on the reserve army—which, incidentally, is the most costly in the world—, on the deplorable management of capital assets, or on the procurement programs of the defence department?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the only person who has ever called me the minister of waste is my wife and that has to do with the fact that I need to lose a few pounds. The running around we are doing in budget preparations and with the white paper will achieve that objective.

From cover to cover we talk about doing business differently in the armed forces. We talk about ending project management. We did in the last budget. We talk about buying equipment off the shelf. We talk about contracting out to the private sector a number of functions that are already being performed internally. We think we can do them much more cheaply. We have even mused about privatizing the operation and maintenance of the search and rescue function with Department of National Defence crews.

If the hon. member reads the report over the weekend I do not think he would ask this type of question on Monday.

CONFERENCE ON SECURITY AND CO–OPERATION

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The Prime Minister and the Minister of Foreign Affairs will be in Budapest next week to attend the Conference on Security and Co–Operation in Europe. What does Canada hope to accomplish at this summit, in particular concerning the crisis in the former Yugoslavia?

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the upcoming CSC summit in Budapest is to enhance security and respect for human rights in Europe.

Canada would also like the summit to broaden the CSC's capacity to prevent and resolve conflicts, notably by giving it the ability to establish or monitor peacekeeping operations. The conflict in former Yugoslavia, including recent events in the Bihac area of Bosnia will be of primary concern to the heads of state and government.

In support of an eventual comprehensive political settlement to the conflict, the summit could and should offer CSC expertise in areas such as human rights, elections monitoring, the protection of minorities, arms control, and confidence building measures.

Canada's voice at previous summits, conferences, and general meetings has always been listened to and highly respected.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice and relates to a recent directive given by the Canadian Human Rights Commission to its tribunals.

Apparently they have been ordered to hear four complaints of discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, three of which pertain to same sex spousal benefits.

Why has the minister allowed such a directive when the legislation to amend the act to include sexual orientation has not even been introduced in the House, never mind been approved by the will of the people? Is this just another example of ignoring the genuine concerns of Canadians, including some members of his own party?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should understand that the human rights commission is an independent body which is not under the control or direction of the government or any minister thereof.

The commission is obligated by law to make up its own mind based on its own investigation and the exercise of its own independent judgment with respect to those matters to refer to tribunals for hearing. We would not want it any other way. There must be independence.

While she may ask me as the minister responsible to the House for the Human Rights Act and its administration to speak to matters of structure or of the human rights system, I do not direct the commission in what decisions to make or what matters to undertake in terms of hearings.

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for that response. I do feel the minister has made it clear he is convinced that there is wide support for this issue.

I challenge the minister today, as he is unwilling to challenge the Human Rights Commission, will he not agree if he thinks there is so much support to allow a free vote on this issue so that the real will of the people on this issue can be expressed?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, that is a separate question and I understand it is separate. I am prepared to deal with that as a matter for which I am responsible, that is to say whether the Human Rights Act should be amended to add certain words. That is my responsibility.

We are dealing with commitments made by the Prime Minister and by me, not so much based on polling for support but based on principles and what is right, on fundamental justice.

The amendment which is under discussion has to do with adding sexual orientation as a ground on which discrimination is prohibited. I would have thought that on that principle, that is to say whether discrimination should be prohibited against somebody only on the basis of their sexual orientation, there is not much debate.

On the subsidiary questions, separate questions, of whether there should be same sex benefits or whether there should be this or that form of marriage, those are entirely separate. We are not proposing any amendments to deal with those. We are talking about discrimination and it is on that issue I would have thought there is not a great deal of controversy.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The minister's new procurement policy, which consists in buying equipment already operational and available on the world market, will have harmful consequences on the Canadian defence industry.

In his white paper tabled yesterday, the minister recognizes that it is vital to promote defence conversion, but no concrete solutions are proposed.

How can the minister explain that his white paper does not contain any concrete initiatives on defence conversion, given the clear commitment made in the red book?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my colleague, the Minister of Industry, will talk perhaps on a supplementary on the matter dealing with conversion specifically as announced in the white paper.

With respect to the capital purchases that we have announced, we do have in Canada the capacity to build armoured personnel carriers. One company has served the Canadian and foreign markets quite well, the General Motors diesel division in London, Ontario. Many components are built across the country including in the member's home province of Quebec.

In terms of the helicopters, I have to emphasize that while this could in all likelihood come from external sources, much of the work with respect to avionics, electronics and integrated systems probably would all be done in Canada because anybody who wants to sell to a country like Canada equipment of such cost knows that it is in the best interest of being competitive to source a lot of that work in Canada. I do believe that the equipment purchases will not have the effect the hon. member says.

Finally, with respect to the submarines, I covered that yesterday. This is simply a matter of exploring whether this is a good deal for Canada. That question will be looked at very carefully before a decision is taken.

[Translation]

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, obviously the minister did not answer my question. I hope his wife will remind him of that.

• (1150)

Does the minister not realize that the existing defence material program, DIPP, of which only a part concerns defence conversion, is clearly insufficient, and that he must show leadership with his colleagues from Industry and Public Works to implement a true conversion strategy for that industry?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as always, it is very hard to figure out what the Bloc wants.

First, one member tells us not to buy military equipment because it is a waste, and then one of his colleagues says that we must save the defence industry.

[English]

It is always a little hard for me to understand quite where this party is coming from. Its two wings do not always beat at the same pace.

The fundamental issue that we need to deal with is the use of the existing program DIPP as a defence conversion program. As the hon. member knows, of the 41 applications approved by this government under DIPP so far 39 have been for civilian or dual use purposes. Clearly that has been the key tool in assisting industries in their defence conversion.

More important, and I have said this repeatedly and I hope other members understand how important this is, the government's strategy in helping the Canadian industries in all sectors is not to throw money at them. It is to provide them with the strategic advice and assistance that will enable them to be competitive in the world markets. That is the key to their success.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this week marks the end of the 30–day discussion period between the U.S. and Canada on proposals made by the U.S. department of agriculture that all Canadian grain shipments to the United States must go to a feed lot, a feed mill or an end user and require an end user certificate.

What have we heard from the minister of agriculture on this issue? Silence.

My question to the minister is what action has the minister taken on this issue which is a direct violation of the August 1 Canada–U.S. grain pact on wheat which specified that neither country would introduce any new trade restricting measures until the deal's one–year term ended?

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to the member across the way, he should get his facts straight. The United States has not yet made its decision on whether it is going to put end use certificates in place.

We have expressed to the United States our views on that. It knows our views and we will await its action as far as end use certificates.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as I expected, the minister has done absolutely nothing on this issue. The United States has not made the decision yet therefore it is not urgent.

Why has the government done nothing? I would expect that the reason is that it could be wanting to protect the Canadian Wheat Board at the expense of farmers. For the Canadian Wheat Board end user certificates only involve slight inconvenience, while for the farmers it will put an end to their market in the United States.

Why has the minister once again chosen to avoid the real issue which is reform of the Canadian Wheat Board, a change which he has acknowledged farmers want, by letting American foreign policy solve the problems for him here at home?

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I again remind the hon. member that the United States has not yet made the decision that he would obviously like it to make. It should be pointed out that he has made that assumption and western wheat growers and farmers should note that.

I repeat, the Canadian government and the minister have made our views very clear to the United States as far as how we would view its imposition of end use certificates. That discussion will continue and we will await its reaction to our views.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, many Canadians are concerned about the tax loopholes which make it possible for the rich to invest in order to avoid paying taxes.

• (1155)

[English]

My question is for the Minister of National Revenue. Can the minister tell my constituents what he is doing to ensure that all Canadians pay their fair share of taxes?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his concern on this very important issue.

The Minister of Finance and I issued yesterday a press release outlining changes to the tax system that will plug loopholes with respect to tax shelters. We are particularly concerned that there are many people who are taking advantage of what were originally set up as legitimate opportunities in high risk areas. They are now taking these opportunities simply to avoid paying taxes.

For example, we have uncovered tax shelters where no business activity was being undertaken and the only thing the individual received in return for their investment was a brochure; that is, the only thing other than a tax benefit of substantial proportions.

We will continue to make sure that the tax system is fair for Canadians and we will make changes as necessary to make sure that all Canadians pay their fair share.

DEFENCE POLICY

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in his white paper the defence minister claims that he is going to save $7 billion over the next five years. Yet the minister is planning to buy numerous helicopters, submarines and a good deal more. In short, the Department of National Defence is embarking on an unjustified equipment purchase program which will be the source of additional waste.

Since today's international context does not justify new capital expenditures, how can the defence minister explain, in view of the present fiscal restraints, the planned purchases listed in his white paper?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there has always been in the capital program of national defence spanning a 15-year period the need to replace certain types of equipment. Those allocations were made.

Over the last number of budgets, including those of the former government, $21 billion has been cut off the projected expenditures for national defence, including a lot of the capital program.

We announced yesterday that we will be cutting $15 billion out of the capital program over the next 15 years for planning purposes. With respect to helicopters, I am surprised that the hon. member would make the assertion that we do not need to replace helicopters when he knows that the Sea Kings and the Labradors are coming to the end of their life.

Even if he does not agree that our state of the art ships and our refurbished destroyers should not have combat helicopters on board, surely he, from a province that has a coastline and uses the search and rescue facility, has to agree that the Government of Canada will be committing a grievous error if we did not make provision for new equipment even on the search and rescue end which is purely civilian.

JUSTICE

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Ian John Hutton has been serving a life sentence for murder at the Archibald Centre halfway house in Vaughan, Ontario.

He failed to return to the facility on November 28 and a Canada-wide warrant has been issued for him. Can the Solicitor General explain why a murderer who is classified on CPIC as being violent and an escape risk is serving time at a halfway house?

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is great news for all Canadians when more and more working men and women find meaningful employment in this country.

The number of Canadians unemployed is still too high but it is below 10 per cent for the first time in several years in Canada.

In examining the employment figures, has the secretary of state for finance a breakdown of the numbers and has he determined how many of the new jobs are worthwhile, rewarding and full time jobs as opposed to part time jobs?

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, that is good news for Canada. This raises to over 400,000 the number of new jobs that have been created in this country this year alone. All these jobs are full time jobs. Indeed, last month there was a growth in employment of some 95,000 new jobs. All those were full time jobs. There was an actual drop in part time employment.

I remind this House that a Prime Minister of a previous government said we would not get the unemployment rate below 10 per cent this decade. The Liberal government brings in next decade's unemployment levels this year.

SENIORS

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, this petition comes from the Association féminine d'action sociale du Québec. It is signed by 437 petitioners.

They urge Parliament to press the government not to go ahead with its voice mail project for the elderly.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Jean Payne (St. John's West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw to the attention of the House a petition signed by residents of the regions of St. Mary's, The Capes and Whitbourne area in the province of Newfoundland in the riding of St. John's West. I fully support this petition which reads as follows.

"We the undersigned residents of the province of Newfoundland draw the attention of the House to the following: That there is a severe unemployment problem in this area of our province causing great hardship to many residents. Therefore, your petitioners call upon Parliament to provide emergency response funding to provide employment in the short term to alleviate this hardship".

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to introduce three petitions today. The first one asks Parliament to ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously. I support that petition.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition prays and request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality. I agree with that petition as well.

PRICE CONTROLS

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I have presented a petition of this sort. In the third petition, 70 petitioners from across Canada ask the present government to institute price controls to include housing rental, hydro, heating, food, phone, UIC, et cetera.

I understand their motive, but I do question the reasonability of that particular petition. I am happy to present it on their behalf.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present to Parliament a petition signed by 130 people in the Red Deer and surrounding area.

My constituents express their grave concerns with section 241 of the Criminal Code and the issue of assisted suicide and euthanasia.

• (1205)

The petitioners humbly pray that Parliament not repeal or amend section 241 of the Criminal Code in any way to uphold the Supreme Court of Canada decision of September 30, 1993, to disallow assisted suicide or euthanasia.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition from persons all across the province of British Columbia containing 196 signatures. The petitioners request that Parliament refuse to accept the hon. Minister of Justice's anti–firearms proposals and insist that he bring forth legislation to convict and punish criminals rather than persecute the innocent.

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I too would like to present three petitions on behalf of my constituents.

The first one is that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): The second petition, Mr. Speaker, requests that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act, or the charter of rights in any way which would indicate societal approval of same sex relationships.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition asks that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously.

RIDING MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to present three petitions today on behalf of my constituents of Dauphin—Swan River.

The first petition containing 451 signatures is from the RMs and towns of Grandview and Gilbert Plains calling upon Parliament to urge the government to take action on construction of an all–weather gravel road through the west end of the Riding Mountain National Park. This road connects the communities of Grandview, which is my home town, and Rossburn and contributes to stimulating a stagnating agricultural economy by promoting trade, tourism, social and cultural exchanges.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition has 138 signatures. It is asking, first, that Parliament continues to reject euthanasia and physician assisted suicide; second, that the present provisions of section 241 of the Criminal Code of Canada which forbids the counselling, procuring, aiding or abetting of a person to commit suicide be enforced vigorously, and, third, that Parliament consider expanding palliative care that would be accessible to all dying persons in Canada.

RIDING MOUNTAIN NATIONAL PARK

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): The third petition, Mr. Speaker, has 350 signatures. It draws the attention of the House of Commons to the following. There is a remarkable increase in beaver numbers in the Riding Mountain National Park. These beaver are causing extensive damage to land which is located near the park.

My constituents ask this Parliament to urge the government to take action toward developing beaver control methods within the Riding Mountain National Park.

Mr. John O'Reilly (Victoria—Haliburton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the honour to present a petition from Little Britain, Ontario, constituents of mine in Cavan, Ontario, and Port Parry, Bowmanville and Oshawa.

It requests the government not to enact any further firearms control regulations or legislation or orders in council.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, having completed the bill that was before the House this morning, I think you would find unanimous consent that we now call it 2.30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House has heard the suggestion of the chief government whip. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 2.30 p.m, the House stands adjourned until Monday next at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24.

STUDENT LOANS

The House resumed from October 21 consideration of the motion and of the amendment.

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to join in the debate this morning on the important subject of Canada's post–secondary education system. I commend the leader of the Reform Party for having taken the initiative to place the issue of federal support for our colleges and universities on the parliamentary agenda, as he did last spring, and for his suggestions regarding the concept of income contingent repayment or ICR of student loans.

I believe this debate is helping members of the House gain insights into the importance of higher education to our country's future and how the federal government can work with the provinces to assist our colleges and universities. Since this motion was introduced last spring, however, there have been several important developments.

First, the government moved the new Canada Student Financial Assistance Act, which is known as Bill C–28, through Parliament to receive royal assent. The new legislation, which provides the framework for reforming the Canada student loans program, will be proclaimed in 1995. The new act provides the flexibility to implement the ICR pilot projects with interested provinces. This possibility is being pursued as a means of learning more about how an ICR scheme might be designed to meet Canadian conditions.

The government has moved quickly to implement its students' assistance reforms by increasing assistance for those students who need it the most. In August of this year the full time Canada student loan limit was increased from $105 per week to $165 per week and the limit on part time loans was raised from $2,500 to $4,000.

Over the next five years the changes already announced to our existing student assistance program will provide $6 billion in loans, which is over $2 billion more than during the last five years. The reforms include not only higher loan limits but special grants for students with disabilities, part time students and women in certain fields of study at the PhD level.

In addition to the reforms already under way in the area of student assistance, the government has demonstrated its keen interest in the future of post–secondary education by informing Canadians about federal assistance to the post–secondary system and putting forward an innovative approach for discussion.

The social security green paper provides two options for the future of established programs financing arrangements for post–secondary education. Under the first, total transfers would be frozen at the 1993–94 level starting in 1996–97. The result would be that as the tax portion of the transfer grows with the economy, the cash transfers will decline correspondingly, disappearing altogether within about ten years' time.

On the other hand, if we have an opportunity, we could transfer the declining cash into a sustainable system of loans and grants. These new loans could be based on the concept of income contingent repayment. For those who enjoy relatively high income after their studies, the rate of repayment would be rapid. Those who experience periods of low income would repay only when they were in a position to do so. The repayment would adjust automatically to income, thus reflecting the ability to pay rather than the amount borrowed. Those of us in riding offices know a lot about that.

We are discussing this concept with interest groups and provinces, examining how such a system might work in Canada. The government is guided by the principle of equality and at the same time the belief that those who benefit from post–secondary education have a responsibility to pay a fair share of the costs of their education.

We believe that every Canadian has the right to an equal opportunity in the workplace and in the classroom, consistent with the ability to do the job or handle the course work. At the same time, government resources are very limited and must be directed to those who need help to help themselves. It is true that students are often needy while they are in post–secondary education, but thereafter their employment prospects and incomes usually improve dramatically. On average, post–secondary graduates earn 40 per cent more than the general workforce over their careers.

Once graduates begin to reap the benefits of higher education it seems reasonable that they should pay back part of the costs which society has invested in them. We are proposing that students take on a greater share of the costs of their education. We are asking them to invest in themselves. This is the option we want to discuss with Canadians.

The potential advantages of income contingent repayment or ICR have been widely discussed in recent years and several countries, including Australia and New Zealand, have moved to introduce ICR schemes. Clearly, in making his original motion, the hon. member concluded that ICR could be an important tool in assisting students in financing their education.

An ICR loan program would be fairer and less risky for students. Payments would be geared to income. If a year's earnings fell below a certain level, repayment of the loan could be suspended.

ICR has the potential of making loans available to all students without the means testing used in current student loans programs. If the government was not paying the interest on the loans while the students were still in school, there would be no need to limit eligibility.

The ICR concept, as it could apply, is currently being explored. The specific design would have to be tailored to reflect the Canadian environment. The government is undertaking work in this area in consultation with various student and other interest groups and will involve the provinces fully in such consultations.

We believe that ICR loans have a role to play in helping to maintain a high quality system of post–secondary education through the provision of a sustainable source of funding.

As I have indicated, the discussion paper on social security reform suggests a new approach to how the federal government might transform its decline in cash transfers into a sustainable system of income contingent loans and grants. This represents an innovative approach to dealing with the challenges ahead. The idea is receiving considerable support and the option deserves consideration.

To successfully face the challenges of the future, Canada needs well–educated young people and citizens who will continue to learn throughout their lives. The government is seeking ways to help Canadians achieve their learning goals through improved access to higher education.

As part of our social security reforms, we must enable Canadians to develop the tools they need to become productive and self–sufficient members of society. Our objectives must remain consistent with the Canadian value of fairness and generosity to those in difficulty while recognizing that governments have limited resources. Quite simply, we must help people to help themselves.

The government is listening to Canadians. We have put post–secondary education high on our list of priorities through reforms to the existing student assistance program and proposals in the social security reform paper.

The standing committee has already started its consultations from coast to coast and many members are conducting forums on social security reform in their own constituencies.

We look forward to hearing from Canadians in all walks of life.

[Translation]

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, as someone who has spent the best years of his professional career working as a teacher, guidance counsellor and school principal at the secondary level, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on motion M–291, introduced by the Reform Party. The purpose of this motion is, basically, to amend the Canada Student Financial Assistance Act to include a loan repayment system that would take into account the employment income of students after they have finished their education.

At first glance, we might think this measure would be to the students' advantage. It seems reasonable to adjust the terms of repayment to the income of the person who contracted the loan. However, when we look at what the Reform Party has in mind with this motion, our support for this proposal quickly disappears as it becomes clear there is no benefit in this for students. The objective is clear:

> reduce the cost to taxpayers of financing post–secondary education by reducing the number and dollar amounts of loans defaulted upon, by charging accumulated interest, rather than simple interest on default loans, and by reducing the number and dollar amounts of collection fees for defaulted loans.

The Reform Party's first objective seems to be based on the false premise that former students do not repay their loans because they do not feel like it. There is a tendency here to forget the economic problems facing young people today. Even for those with a university degree, the unemployment rate is close to 15 per cent. And there is also the troubling fact that many university and college graduates are underemployed and, as a result, underpaid.

In addition to the Reform Party's failure to realize that such situations exist, it is clear that if we want to reduce the cost of education for the taxpayer, someone will have to pick up the slack and pay the bill, and obviously, that onus will now be on the students.

This point of view is short–sighted on several accounts. First, it ignores the social situation of a great number of students. Second, it does not take into account the significant changes in lifestyle of every class of society. Today's students are the product of what is known as the consumer society which, as a social model, constitutes the basis of our western economies. How could we confine our young people to a ghetto and believe that they will take part in mass consumption only when they graduate?

A recent survey conducted in Quebec shows that high school students spend one billion dollars a year. This means that half the students in their last year of high school are working part–time. Nobody will deny the impact of this new reality on school results, but we must accommodate these new needs. We created them from scratch and ubiquitous advertising fuels them.

Transferring greater financial responsibilities to post–secondary students will only increase the tendency of students to go to school and hold a paid job at the same time. Faced with increased tuition fees resulting from the government's so–called social program reform, and the Reform Party's intentions, as described in motion M–291, students will react quite normally by trying to increase the number of hours they spend on the labour market, in order to limit as much as possible the need to borrow money. The consequences will be disastrous: time spent studying will diminish, the failure rate will go up, courses and even whole years will have to be repeated, resulting in increased costs for the governments subsidizing education. Basically, it is a vicious circle.

Transferring heavier financial responsibilities to students in such a manner is short–sighted for another reason. It ignores the fact that with the globalization of the economy, the quality of human resources is the key to competitiveness. It is by taking advantage of knowledge, research and development that Canadian and Quebec businesses will be able to penetrate a trade arena with no borders and maybe no rules.

Any increase in the financial burden of post–secondary students flies in the face of this universal reality. Instead of limiting access to higher education, as the Liberals and the Reformers are planning to do, we should do the exact opposite. That is a major reason for not supporting Motion M–291, a motion which, by its objectives, is anachronistic.

The third objective of the Reform motion also reveals the fallacious nature of their project. It reads as follows: "ensure that post–secondary institutions in Canada receive the funding necessary to maintain the high quality of services they presently provide".

This is not very subtle! This objective acknowledges that students, by bearing a larger part of the cost of their education, will contribute to generate resources for universities and colleges. Moving in that direction is refusing to recognize that knowledge and know–how are the keys to any modern economy. In this regard we should stress the vision of the Quebec Premier who announced last week, in his speech from the Throne, that he was freezing university tuition fees and removing the failure tax at college level. This is the direction to follow if we want to be able to compete with our trading partners under NAFTA and the Uruguay Round.

We sense that the government as well as Reformers are doing their best to gradually withdraw from the area of education. We, of the Bloc Quebecois, believe that the federal government must withdraw entirely from that area of provincial jurisdiction, an area that it invaded not to serve the interests of the people, but to enslave, to dominate and to impose its national standards on the provinces. By withdrawing from that field, the federal government could transfer tax points to the provinces. They would then be in a better position to deliver to their people education services geared to their needs and realities.

In so doing, the federal government would go beyond speeches and do something concrete to reduce the duplication of services delivered by both levels of government. However, to act in that direction would require great discernment and common sense.

These ingredients do not seem to be on sale in the federalist supermarket. To conclude, I urge all members who still care about the future to vote against motion M–291, a dangerous and anachronistic motion because of the objectives its seeks to achieve.

[English]

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to lead this debate for my party.

This motion is about Canada's future. It is about the future because it is about education. Education is the key to the future for Canada's young people.

I have spent virtually all my adult life in the teaching profession. Conveying knowledge to our young people was for me a most rewarding vocation. We must ensure the future of our educational system in Canada, and part of that is ensuring that as many students as possible can take part in it.

As literacy critic for my party, I recognize what happens if people do not take advantage of our education system when they are young. If you do not learn to read and write when you are young, you are going to have to learn when you are older through the various literacy programs sponsored by communities across Canada.

Reading and writing are learned either young or old but have to be learned at some point if one wants to become a fully functioning member of society. That is why it is so important that everyone who wishes has access to education at every level of our school system.

Years ago, back in the 1950s, 1960s and 1970s, I believe we thought we had licked the access problem for education and if we had proceeded with balanced budgets from the 1970s through until today, I suppose we could have been right. However with the advent of budgetary deficits and the recession from which we are desperately trying to emerge, access to education has been called into question.

It has been called into question by two groups, the students and by us, the politicians representing the people of Canada. Students are concerned that through the Canada student loan program they will receive insufficient funds to allow them to attend university without worry.

At the same time because of the repayment scheme attached to these loans, students are concerned they will emerge at the end of their university careers with a huge debt which they are unable to discharge in the amounts and in the time required.

The repayment problem for student loans is alarming. At present one in five borrowers is in default on their student loan. About two–thirds of these eventually repay but only after the federal government assumes the debt from the bank and has launched some form of collection activity.

The other third, about 7 per cent of all student loans, are never repaid and become simply bad debts. In all, we are talking about $1 billion in bad loans, money the treasury may never see.

That is why the Reform Party felt it important to look at the whole scheme of financing again; look at it with a view to making it easier to fund a student's education, making it easier for the student to repay and therefore making it easier on the country's finances because the loans would eventually be repaid, perhaps with lesser amounts, but repaid nevertheless.

Let me explain how the Reform Party's income contingent loan repayment program will work. It is designed to allow students to pay back their student loans over a period of time based on their annual income after leaving university. The concept is funded on two fundamental principles, the full use of the income tax machinery in monitoring and collecting student loans, and the implementation of an income contingency principle whereby students pay back a set percentage of their income.

Upon graduation a student would begin to pay back their student loan. There is no eight–month delay period as there is presently. The repayment of the loan however would link the repayment plan to a student's earnings or ability to pay. Precisely how much a former student pays back would vary from year to year depending on his or her salary level.

A specific amount set as a percentage of income would be paid through the tax system. If a person's income does not reach a specified minimum amount, the payment would be deferred until earnings go up. This repayment system, however, depends on the supply of accurate income statements long after the individual has left the institution of higher education.

Revenue Canada could therefore supply the necessary data automatically and cheaply through income tax statements. This would necessitate the recording of student borrowers with the tax department and the inclusion of social insurance numbers on student loan forms.

With the possession of the full details of most students changing future incomes and geographic locations, the income tax authorities could then act as the primary monitor subsequent to loan collection.

I do not believe the use of SIN numbers in this context should be objected to. The end result of a more equitable loan scheme justifies this requirement.

• (1125)

We in the Reform Party like the idea of income contingent loans for three basic reasons, the first being the reduced cost to the taxpayer. Under the current Canada student loans program taxpayers end up footing the bill for defaulted loans. The difference between the simple interest paid by borrowers and the accumulated interest paid by the government and the collection fees charged on defaulted loans is charged to the taxpayer.

Two, there would be greater flexibility and fairness for students under the program. Under the Canada student loan program borrowers and taxpayers are discriminated against and repayment terms are onerous and rigid. The current program discriminates against borrowers in two ways. First, it discriminates against the poor and unemployed by forcing them to pay back their loans at the same rate and at the same level as those who are gainfully employed and who can afford to pay off their loans. Second, the prospective borrowers are discriminated against on the basis of their parents' or partners' income potential through means tests.

This often means that students whose parents are well off are ineligible for student loans even if they receive no assistance from these same parents. Low income taxpayers are especially discriminated against, as they are less apt to send their children to university.

The burden falls especially on those who pay taxes but do not use post–secondary education services. By 1990 two–thirds of the adult population did not possess post–secondary credentials. In other words, under the Canada student loan plan the poor or those without university education as the case may be have been subsidizing the rich.

The repayment plan is inflexible because it forces former students to begin repaying their loan only eight months after graduation irrespective of their income. The income contingency plan in contrast involves no burden of debt that must be repaid unconditionally. Repayment falls only on the prosperous; that is, upon those persons who graduate and earn income at or above the given level.

Three, the maintenance of high quality educational services. The government is broke. As such both federal and provincial jurisdictions are grappling with the problem of how to finance post–secondary education. The financial pressure on higher education through reduced public funding has been inevitable in an era of growing deficits, high taxation and the increasing competition of health, environment and other lobbies for a greater share of public spending.

As governments contribute less and less funding and costs increase at the same time the quality of education has and will continue to decline. The bottom line is that governments can no longer finance post–secondary education at a declining level and expect the quality of the service to remain constant.

One cannot increase tuition and other fees charged to students without making the cost of a university education more and more prohibitive under the current system. If students were to be permitted to repay their loans on an income contingent basis over a longer period of time if necessary tuition fees as a percentage of the total contribution to post–secondary financing could easily be increased. This would ensure that the quality of educational services would remain strong and that those who benefit most from the system are those who contribute their fair share.

The position taken on this subject by the academic world is heartening. Mr. Clark Lajeunesse, president of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada stated the current student loan program is outdated as it does not meet students' needs and it does not meet university needs either.

The income contingent repayment loan is seen by universities as allowing them to maintain accessibility and qualify by making more effective use of tuition fees.

Under the ICR program universities can be more realistic about the cost of the programs that they offer. Some fees might increase for high cost programs while other fees might decrease for low cost programs. While some student groups have expressed concern that such a method of financing education could lead to higher tuition fees, other students and student organizations have expressed support.

The Ontario Undergraduate Student Alliance believes that ICR holds promise for protecting accessibility to and the quality of post–secondary education. The most important matter for this group is not so much that costs may increase marginally but that the education received by students be worth something. The key to the ICR program for this Ontario group is that it is never an unmanageable debt load.

I believe we should now look seriously at changing the method by which university education in Canada is financed, especially the financing available for students. The proposal from the leader of the Reform Party represents a scheme which is fair and equitable to students but is also inexpensive to administer. I would urge all members of the House to support this motion.

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today in response to the member's Motion No. M–291 and make some comments about the financing of post–secondary education using an income contingent repayment plan. I would like to offer some comments on investment in post–secondary education.

All of us recognize that the income contingent repayment principle is intended to facilitate investment by individuals in their own future. It therefore offers a way for public policy to foster what the social security reform discussion paper calls mutual responsibility, governments helping people to help themselves.

Canadians collectively make a greater investment in learning than practically anyone else in the world. Few industrialized countries spend more of their gross domestic product on education than we do. No country spends more than the 2.6 per cent of GDP that we spend every year on post–secondary education. This represents $16 billion per year, nearly 80 per cent of which comes from taxpayers through federal and provincial support.

Indeed our public investment in post–secondary education is also the highest in the OECD countries measured in relation to our overall economic activity. The result is some of the best and most accessible post–secondary education in the world.

We have in relative terms more adults with post–secondary qualifications than many other countries and we have more people enrolled at any given time. There are currently nearly one million full time post–secondary students in Canada, about 70 per cent in universities and the rest in colleges and institutes of technology. Because of its shorter duration programs the college level actually produces more graduates than the university sector. Both of course make equally essential contributions to individual opportunity and national development.

In addition to the full time students there are also hundreds of thousands of students enrolled in part time programs. Still more take short courses, specialized training and other learning opportunities. Indeed, one in every four adult Canadians is engaged in a learning activity in any given year, an increase of about 20 per cent during the last decade. Canadians understand the importance of investing both time and money, public and private, in learning to adapt to new challenges and opportunities.

A recent survey by EKOS Associates showed that some 25 per cent of the adult workforce are keen to improve their qualifications and move up to better jobs through their own efforts. These so–called bootstrappers are prepared to work hard at self improvement and self investment. They typically have adult responsibilities, modest incomes and limited opportunities for learning on the job. Their learning needs are widely divergent and may range from literacy training to advanced education or technical training.

Despite our record in creating across Canada an excellent and accessible post–secondary education system, many of these people still have great difficulty in finding the optimum combination of time and money in order that they can participate. There are no easy solutions but we need to ask ourselves how we can improve this situation.

The social security reform discussion paper therefore raises two basic questions about federal investment in post–secondary education. How can we help to ensure long term stable and sustainable support for post–secondary education in a context of increasing financial restraints by all governments? How can we at the same time not only maintain our accomplishments in making post–secondary education accessible but broaden and expand that access to more people?

The social security paper outlines two options for future federal support of post–secondary education. Under the first option the current established program funding for post–secondary education transfer arrangements would be maintained. The total amount would be fixed at the 1993–94 level in keeping with the government's restraint on transfers announced in the 1994 budget. With total entitlements thus restrained but the tax portion of the transfers growing with the economy, the cash transfer portion would decline correspondingly.

In 1996–97, the first year of any new arrangements, tax transfers are projected to be about $4 billion and cash to be about $2 billion for a total of just over $6 billion. While this total remains fixed, the tax portion is projected to reach $5 billion by the year 2001, meaning that the cash will be automatically reduced to about $1 billion at that point.

Finally, about 10 years after the new arrangement starts the value of the tax transfer would exceed $6 billion and the cash transfer would be virtually zero. The federal government would no longer provide cash support to provinces for post–secondary education.

We think there is a better way to invest the available cash. Instead of just letting it dwindle away to nothing, the green paper suggests using it to create a new $2 billion per year loan scheme on income contingent repayment principles. This would help students to meet the rising cost of tuition and thereby contribute an increasing portion of the cost of post–secondary education. It would thus help to ensure both the availability of high quality relevant opportunities for higher education and career training, but also their affordability.

The ICR principle as other hon. members have pointed out can ensure that an individual's payments on student loans do not become unmanageable. In a sense the income contingent repayment plan means sharing the risk between government and the individual, guaranteeing that payments will adjust automatically to income and therefore to ability to pay.

This second option would provide support to the post–secondary education system in two ways: first through a permanent and growing endowment of tax points that provinces can use to help finance their grants to colleges and universities, and second through loans that enable students to contribute to their own education.

Over the 10 year period beginning in 1996–97 the first option of the continuing current arrangements would provide a total of just over $60 billion to the post–secondary system. By contrast the second option would provide around $70 billion in tax transfers and loans over the same period. That is a difference of $10 billion in favour of the alternative approach.

This approach depends on the creation of a new student loan system that would ensure affordable payments for borrowers as well as simple and efficient means of repayment that would avoid problems of default. The scheme must be both fair and efficient.

The income contingent repayment approach properly designed could offer an answer to this need. The government is consulting interested groups about the specifics of design and welcomes their input to the process.

The options in the green paper for enhancing our national investment in post–secondary education are proposals, not decisions. The government is looking forward to reviewing these ideas in light of the many valuable comments and alternative proposals now being put forward. Not the least of these will be the suggestions of members of this House offered through the current debate.

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I speak on the motion put forth by the Reform Party, but it is with no pleasure that I read and consider it. It seems to me that much of this motion is contrary to the principles young people have been given for many years.

If you take a look at what is underlying this motion, because there are the words of the motion but there is a lot more to these words, to what lies under all this. Reference is made to reducing the number and dollar amounts of loans. We understand that the intent is to recover a larger part of the defaulted loans that are presently difficult to recover and that we should be shifting toward a university tax situation.

This smooths the way for what follows: to ensure that post–secondary institutions receive all the funding necessary, while the goal—as previous Reform speakers have conceded—is to reduce the cost of education to taxpayers. So, if the necessary funding is to be maintained while you reduce the cost to taxpayers, of course someone else's costs will have to go up.

Whose costs? Probably the students'. They are told: "Your costs will increase but you will be able to repay based on a fixed percentage of your income—what is commonly called university tax, or post–graduate tax, among students". We are told that this is a good idea, one that was always considered in academic circles as potentially interesting—a post–graduate tax— but not as part of a system that doubles their indebtedness.

In that sense, I fail to see the difference between the Reform motion and the social program reform proposed by the HRD minister, who is basically suggesting the same thing. He is not as direct, though. Perhaps the one thing that can be said to their credit is that the Reformers are more direct. The documents tabled by the Minister of Human Resources Development talk about cuts in cash transfer payments to the provinces—this will amount to $324 million for Quebec—as well as cuts in income tax points—over $700 million—which will have the direct effect of increasing students' indebtedness and doubling tuition fees.

I now want to come back to indebtedness from a student's perspective. I was one myself not so long ago and I have been fortunate in that I have a good job and have been able to repay my student loans. I am very proud of having been raised in a good, accessible education system. I am one of those who first saw tuition fees rise every year and those who followed me have seen them rise even more because of subtle cuts in cash transfers.

How can we hope for a competitive, highly qualified labour force ready to take up challenges, when our young people look at the labour market with little hope while we encourage them to increase their debt load for their own good? Well, that is a major problem.

Why not give them a chance to get through the system and then increase their contribution? I think this would be a better approach that will ensure greater access. Is this the new system you are proposing for something that has always been a top priority in this country? Is this the new alternative you will try to sell Quebecers when the time comes to make collective choices? Is that the system you want to give us?

Both Liberals and Reformers see eye to eye on this. The third part of the motion would ensure that post–secondary institutions in Canada receive the funding necessary. I told my colleagues: "They have the wrong level of government; they should ask their provincial legislatures". Education is not an area of federal jurisdiction; our Constitution clearly stipulates that it comes under provincial jurisdiction.

But they always find a way. Liberal and Reform members would like to campaign on improving the education system because it is a priority for people. They do not have the courage to tell them that it is in provincial jurisdiction and explain power sharing under the present system to them. This leads to a lot of confusion and debt. Let this be a warning to this government.

There is no question of letting them meddle in education. It makes no sense. They will not repeat on a large scale with education what they are doing with occupational training. We should not let them. This paragraph about ensuring that educational institutions receive the necessary funding is not the federal government's role. So far, the federal government's only role has been to provide funds for the provinces, which reinvested them as they wished, and if this government wanted to be consistent, it would let the provinces that so desire collect these funds themselves by giving them the tax points or achieving their objectives like reforming the sales tax.

Why not take the opportunity to see how the provinces could do it themselves and at the same time ensure that they have the necessary funds so that they would no longer need to constantly ask the federal government, which always wants to centralize more with a cumbersome bureaucracy that always wants to meddle and control more?

It has been a long time since the government—in fact it probably never happened—downsized its operations and made real transfers to the provinces.

Let us take a look at the situation of students. Quebecers and Canadians in general often live far from educational institutions. In order to pursue studies at the university of college level, students often have to leave their place of permanent residence. Not always, but very often. It was the case for me. Except for those enrolled in a few training programs, every university student from my region of Timiskaming or from Abitibi—Timiskaming must move to some large centre.

Obviously, we could provide more university programs in the regions and that would be a good thing, but it will always be necessary to go somewhere else to get specific training. This means that students will have to pay for rent and other expenses. There are certain related benefits in that these students develop a certain independence; they learn to become part of society and they gain a greater autonomy. However, there are related costs which, traditionally, had been partly met by society, through loan and bursary programs.

However, for the last ten years or so, the proportion of loans and bursaries has been reversed. Greater emphasis is put on loans now, since it costs students more to pursue studies. The user pay principle is being implemented in the field of education; yet, education is really a collective good in that everyone can benefit from it.

Now the government wants to restrict that access in a very underhanded manner. Attending university can cost around $10,000 for a student from my region. Increasing, if not doubling tuition fees would translate into an additional $2,000 per year for every student enrolled in a university program. Let us not forget that, since many students must already work part–time to pay for their studies, very few manage to complete their program in the normal time frame. Many students need four years to complete the three–year program leading to a bachelor's degree. Many students take three years instead of two to get their CEGEP diploma and they even take four and a half years to get their university degree because they have to work while completing their education.

What would happen if we were to implement the proposals made by the Liberals and the Reform Party? What impact would it have on full–time versus part–time students, on the quality of education, on the quality of graduates? They do not seem to be thinking about that. They just look at the financial situation, and that is a real cause for concern.

If the debt incurred by students is supposed to double, do you think that our young people will attend university in larger numbers, especially since they often have to face a new requirement? They must have a microcomputer, which has become an almost essential tool. Of course, many universities provide microcomputers on site. Also, there are loans guaranteed by the Government of Quebec to help students afford a microcomputer, but it is another loan and this ever–growing debt becomes more and more of a burden to the system.

Students look at Canada's fiscal situation and they see that we have an enormous debt, but they also see the cuts that are being made. For example, our young people today will never benefit from the capital gains exemption that was available to previous generations. Many of the incentives and tools that Canadians used to become successful are being eliminated. Our young people are willing to accept that, but at the same time they are being told that they will have to pay more for their education.

They are being asked to do the job the government is no longer able to do with regard to the debt and we are supposed to believe that it will be better for them, that it will improve our education system.

Canadians are being deceived and the Bloc Quebecois will never support such a motion that goes against all the principles that society as a whole must contribute for the benefit of all, whether for health or education.

[English]

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to speak in support of the motion by my colleague, the member for Calgary Southwest, on the income contingent repayment of student loans.

For the record let me assure the House that my position and that of all the Reform Party caucus is that we wholeheartedly endorse all aspects of education. The country needs as much as it possibly can get. The debate this morning seems to have centred around education. The motion before us today deals with the collection of outstanding amounts owed by students in order for Canada to ensure the money that is being lent to students is being returned.

I listened to the debate and the nonsensical rant of members of the Bloc Quebecois going back to the idea that only Quebec can handle the problems. The arguments they put forward seem to be rather ludicrous, looking at the motion put forward by the member for Calgary Southwest.

The Liberals have talked about fairness. When we take a look at outstanding loans we see that 90 per cent of Canadian students repay their loans with or without hardship but they do so. Ten per cent have been written off. If we are talking about fairness, surely we should expect all students to live up to their financial obligations rather than 10 per cent being allowed to walk away from their responsibilities while the other 90 per cent act responsibly and repay the debt.

Today we have a very difficult financial situation in the country caused by previous governments and a current government that refuses to grasp the situation and ensure that we get our finances in order. By the admission of the Minister of Finance we are going to add another $100 billion to our debt in the next three years, thereby squeezing the amount of money we are going to have available to pay for education and the other services we so desperately need.

We also know that the young people are going to pay back the debt on top of their education. They are the ones who are getting squeezed twice. We are asking them to pay more for their education as we continue to consume the assets of the country. The students who graduate statistically speaking earn 40 per cent higher incomes than those who do not have higher education; but we must look to the idea that higher education is very expensive. It must be handed out to those who have the desire to take that education, go forward, help develop the country and use it for the betterment of Canada.

Higher education is not a place where people can fritter away some time and borrow the money from the Canadian taxpayer and hope that if they have some money they will pay it back at a later date.

Lets look at some statistics. I have the 1994–95 estimates from Human Resources Development Canada, the part III expenditure plan. Looking at page 5.4 under the social development and education program, we find that claims paid by the government, it is estimated for 1994–95, will be $195 million. That has been increasingly steadily. Working backward, the forecast for 1993–94 was $162 million. The actual for 1992–93 was $175 million and back in 1991 it was $147 million. The amount is getting larger all the time.

Can we expect the Government of Canada to continue to provide education free for some who want to flaunt the rules and expect those who abide by the rules to have to pay for it? I do not think so. We have to remember that 90 per cent of students pay their loans back.

Let us take a look at the defaulted loans. On page 5.39 of the same book, in the 1992–93 loan year the student assistance branch reimbursed lenders' claims for 29,079 defaulted loans. Let us take a look at the dollar amounts. Under $2,500 there were 8,180 claims. Between $2,500 and $5,000 there were 10,642 claims. Well over half of all student loans that have been written off were for less than $5,000. Five thousand dollars does not buy a decent used car today. It is not a downpayment on a house. It does not go very far.

The average income in the country is around $24,000 a year per individual. We are talking just a few months of income. Surely it is only fair, when we are talking about the obligation people assume to go to university to get a higher education, that these people live up to their responsibilities and repay the loans.

Regardless of the Bloc Quebecois talking about how hard it would be, we must remember that only 10 per cent are abusing the privilege. Of that 10 per cent more than half of them are for less than $5,000. If these individuals whose student loans are written off have financial difficulties because they have no job and have no income, they should be allowed time to repay the debt.

However when they become employed, when they start to generate some income, surely we can expect them to live up to their obligations. Therefore the motion by the member for Calgary Southwest is perfectly in order. We should recognize that when there is hardship we should allow them the opportunity to defer payments. When they have the opportunity to pay back the loans they signed up for which provided for their education, provided for the betterment of their lives and presumably added to their standard of living and quality of life, the 10 per cent, like the other 90 per cent, should be expected to repay the loans.

We must remember that over half of the 29,000 who defaulted last year defaulted on an amount that was less than $5,000. Let us be realistic. Let us talk about being fair. Let us talk about fairness for everybody rather than just those who want to live up to their education.

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to be able to address the House on the crucial subject of federal support for post–secondary education.

The motion before us which was introduced in the spring by the Reform Party has taken on new meaning in the context that has evolved since then. Not only has legislation been passed to overhaul the Canada student loans program but the government has released its social security reform discussion paper. Both these initiatives reinforce the notion that income contingent repayment of student loans is a potential important component of the future post–secondary education financing scene in Canada.

As a further example of the interest in income contingent repayment loans demonstrated in the past few months, I would like to point to the conference in September sponsored by the Government of Ontario with financial assistance from the federal Department of Human Resources Development. It brought together leading experts from across Canada, Australia and the United States and gave some 300 participants a chance to exchange views and argue the issues.

The arguments in this area often involve strongly held views as we have seen in the debate in the House. Throughout the debate all sides of the House stress the importance of post–secondary education to the future of individual Canadians and of our country.

I believe none of us questions this basic value but we do have differing views as to how best the federal government can contribute to ensuring that Canadians continue to enjoy access to post–secondary education over the long term.

In our red book we did admit that "we must make better use of the $44 billion we spend on education every year". Many Canadian students already receive assistance from the federal and provincial governments to finance their studies. The costs to students of post–secondary education have increased significantly in recent years. The government has introduced reforms to the Canada student loans program to help today's students handle the increased costs.

There is no doubt that in the past significant numbers of students have difficulty repaying existing fixed payment loans. The government has moved to address the problem by introducing grants and expanding interest relief to include borrowers of low incomes.

• (1200)

The government will soon be entering into contracts with lenders for the Canada student loans program whereby the institutions making the loans will assume greater responsibility for servicing and collecting them.

Under this new financing arrangement lenders will have a much greater incentive to provide income sensitive terms to borrowers. This flexibility will assist former students in repaying their loans.

More fundamental than the question of the operation of existing student loans problems is that of the share which tuition represents of higher education costs. Canadian post–secondary students contribute through their fees on the average about 20 per cent of university operating costs. We know that post–secondary graduates have much greater employment prospects and income potential than those who have not undertaken such studies. Should they perhaps contribute more toward the costs of this education?

As the House knows, the standing committee on human resources—

The Deputy Speaker: With profound apologies to the hon. member, she will have six minutes when the matter comes up for debate at the next occasion.

The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

CANADA GRAIN ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–51, an act to amend the Canada Grain Act and respecting certain regulations made pursuant to that act, as reported (without amendment) from the committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Deputy Speaker: There are eight motions in amendment standing on the Notice Paper for report stage of Bill C–51, an act to amend the Canada Grain Act.

[Translation]

Motion No. 1 will be debated and voted on separately. Motions Nos. 2, 4 and 5 will be grouped for the purposes of debate but voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 3, 7 and 8 will be grouped for debate but voted on as follows. Motion No. 3 will be voted on separately. A vote on Motion No. 7 applies to Motion No. 8.

Motion No. 6 will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

The Chair would now propose that Motion No. 1 be debated.

MOTIONS IN AMENDEMENT

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ) moved:

That Bill C–51, in Clause 2, be amended by replacing lines 42 to 45, on page 2, with the following:

"4.(1) The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the committee of the House of Commons that normally considers agricultural matters, shall designate one of the commissioners to be chief commissioner and another commissioner to be assistant chief commissioner."

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the second time I rise in the House to speak to Bill C–51. The bill was discussed at length in committee, mainly so that we could provide some clarification.

The House will recall that the purpose of this bill is to clarify some procedures with respect to contracts concluded by the Canadian Grain Commission with grain elevator operators and producers.

I will first comment on the amendment I proposed to improve Bill C–51. The amendment in question does not affect the main thrust of this bill. According to the government, the bill will impose greater responsibility on grain producers to secure payment for their grain from elevator operators and grain dealers licensed by the Commission. The government is telling producers: Look, you know how this works. We now have to make some adjustments to make things work more smoothly.

The amendment I am proposing to Bill C–51 is along the same lines, in that its aim is to provide for more effective and, above all, more transparent operations.

• (1205)

The proposed amendment affects the government body that is involved in all these operations, the Canadian Grain Commission—and more specifically, section 2 of the bill which concerns the appointment of the chief commissioner and the assistant chief commissioner of the Canadian Grain Commission.

The section reads as follows:

The Governor in Council shall designate one of the commissioners to be chief commissioner and another commissioner to be assistant chief commissioner.

Before the amendment provided in Bill C–51, the governor in council only designated the chief commissioner. Bill C–51 adds the appointment of the assistant chief commissioner to this section. The motion I am presenting this afternoon in the House would involve the Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food in the process.

As amended, the section would read as follows:

> The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the committee of the House of Commons that normally considers agricultural matters, shall designate one of the commissioners to be chief commissioner and another commissioner to be assistant chief commissioner.

The governor in council appoints the seven commissioners of the Canadian Grain Commission. Of course, if you want to be naive—I remember very well how the commissioners were appointed under the previous government. I have some friends who sat on the Immigration Commission, and I can assure you that the Conservative Government did not appoint any Liberals. These were well–paid jobs. You were paid to work not too hard for five or six years, depending on the appointment.

The Liberal Party will be no exception. In appointing these commissioners, it will make sure to select good red commissioners, making partisan appointments. What we would suggest is to enhance slightly the role of the MPs sitting on the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food. Our proposal is that, within the committee, which is—need we remind you—dominated by the Liberals, the Liberal Party could nominate a chief commissioner and an assistant chief commissioner. The Liberals are in the majority on the committee, but at least we would get the impression that the opposition parties had a say in deciding which of the seven commissioners would make the best chief commissioner.

I sometimes wonder if committees are not used a little bit like so–called occupational classes in a school, where you stick less–gifted or motivated students who nevertheless have to attend school.

But here, if we want our committees to have a degree of credibility, we must give them responsibilities and roles to play. With this motion, the Bloc Quebecois would give them some role to play and slightly reduce this shameless partisanship.

As it currently stands, the clause allows these appointments to be made unilaterally by the Governor in Council, that is, by the government.

You will understand that it is out of concern for transparency that I am suggesting that the government consult the appropriate committee so as to appoint the best qualified people to run the Canadian Grain Commission.

I think it is only fair to say that the credibility and importance of the commission are well established. That is why is must raise above any partisanship and the best qualified individuals, regardless of their political colour or affiliation, must be put in charge of it. Such a unilateral approach has often led to unfortunate situations in the past.

A competent person can be appointed to be chair, only to be replaced by someone who is a little closer to the party forming the new government. I imagine that certain very political positions can only go to people who agree with the government's policies and can implement them. But I do not feel that CGC positions fall in this category.

Furthermore, when someone is fired for partisan reasons, the tab for breaking this person's contract is often picked up by taxpayers. If this person worked on implementing initiatives, we hope that the whole process will not come to a stop while we wait for someone else to be appointed and start carrying out the new policies.

Several people came to testify before the Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food, and I remember very well one witness who was very interesting and especially quite eloquent. A lady told us her story. She said that she used to sit on the CGC and that she was fired when the former Conservative government took office. Until we find evidence to the contrary, the Liberal Party resembles the Conservative Party in all respects. It will not hesitate either to get rid of someone even if that person is doing a good job.

The members opposite will respond that they do not engage in such practices. If all their decisions in situations such as this are devoid of partisan considerations, they should be happy to shout it from the rooftops today. As nothing lasts forever, they should think about their successors who will have total faith in them.

Incidentally, this approach would also avoid many recriminations since representatives of all political parties would have their say on who is appointed to these two positions, in the Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food.

In closing, I urge once again all members, at least all members of the Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food, to vote in favour of this motion.

• (1215)

[English]

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on Bill C–51 which is before the House this morning. Probably the best way is to sum up what this bill is all about and then I will make a couple of specific comments about the motion before us.

I would like to quote part of the speech the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food delivered to the House when the bill was put forward some weeks ago.

The grain industry is changing and the pace of change is accelerating. To remain competitive in global markets, and global markets are where Canada sells most of its grain, we need a regulatory and legislative framework which protects the shared interests of all stakeholders. At the same time it must assist the individuals and groups within the industry to compete successfully, adding value where possible to their efforts.

The minister made that statement a number of weeks ago and I can assure the House and the industry that this very comprehensive consultation process has taken place as we have moved through the bill.

As far as the motion that has been put forward is concerned, I would like to assure the members of the House that as the government reviews the appointments, we can guarantee that they will be filled with competent, capable, enthusiastic and qualified people. When those appointments come along they will be advertised in the Canada Gazette. There is nothing prohibiting any member of the industry or anybody else suggesting that the minister consider someone. There is ample opportunity for all of that to take place.

However, we must recognize in the final analysis that the chief commissioner and the commissioners are responsible to the minister. The best way to ensure that the minister is comfortable with those appointments is to leave things as they are at the present time, with the minister having the final say. But I can assure the House that anyone whose name is put forward will be reviewed in the same manner as everyone else. The House does not have to be concerned about the quality, capability and competency of those with whom the government fills the positions.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment brought forward by the hon. member this morning. From the parliamentary secretary's statement it seems he really supports the motion as well.

This motion does not take final authority to make the appointments from cabinet. All the motion does is give the agriculture standing committee the power to discuss and to recommend. I do not believe there is any disagreement and the Liberals should support the amendment.

The amendment allows the agriculture and agri–food committee to recommend names to cabinet for the Canada Grains Council's chief and assistant chief commissioners. Our party supports this because it will allow for discussions to take place, at least in the standing committee, which is better than only in cabinet.

Even with a Liberal dominated committee, as the committees are now, it would still give opposition parties the ability to put forward suggestions and to talk about the qualifications or the lack of qualifications of these appointments.

Where Reform and Bloc members do not agree with the appointments the Liberals are making, we can talk about it in committee and get some public involvement in the discussion. It would make it more difficult for government to make appointments strictly based on patronage. It would take that aspect out of it to a large extent. At least if the minister did make appointments strictly based on patronage and the qualifications of the person appointed were not there, then the public could make him pay the price because there would be open discussion.

I would like to close by asking a question of the parliamentary secretary. Who could possibly oppose a motion which will provide for more discussion of these appointments and still leave the final authority to appoint with cabinet? I think I heard the parliamentary secretary say that so why would he or his party oppose the motion? They should not, based on what he has said.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I listened with care to the member for Frontenac. While I agree with his sentiments, he is attempting to define a role for the agriculture committee in the appointment of personnel for boards such as the grain commission.

In reading the motion carefully I see that the amount of leeway available to the agriculture committee is very limited. Essentially all its members will be doing is deciding among the three to five people who currently are appointed to the commission which would be the chief commissioner and which would be the assistant chief. I get that reading in either language.

Essentially what you will have, even if this becomes part of the law, is the governor in council or the cabinet appointing the three to five commissioners. After that process is finished the agriculture committee or designate would then recommend to the agriculture minister and to the governor in council, the cabinet, which of those three to five—however large the commission happens to be at the choice of the government of the day—would be the chief commissioner and which would be the assistants.

That is not particularly important. I have no objection to it going into the bill but it does not change the power of members of the committee to decide which of a bunch of Liberal appointees, Conservative appointees, Reform appointees, or Bloc appointees might be considered the chief and which would be the assistant chief in the event that the chief could not act.

I liked the arguments that the hon. member for Frontenac made when he argued that committees should have more power in the management of these commissions by proposing names. Unfortunately that is not what the proposed motion does. It only picks the three to five appointees and ranks them. That is really not a very important job even though it might set a bit of a precedent.

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to my colleague from Frontenac. His amendment reads:

> "4.(1) The Governor in Council, on the recommendation of the committee of the House of Commons that normally considers agricultural matters, shall designate one of the commissioners to be chief commissioner and another commissioner to be assistant chief commissioner."

I think that is the key to a transparent appointment process for the Canadian Grain Commission and I really see the members who will oppose it. It also gives the members of the agriculture and agri–food committee a new role.

The purpose of the amendment submitted by my colleague from Frontenac is to have good people appointed to the Commission in a non–partisan way.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

• (1225)

[English]

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76.1(8) the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP) moved:

That Bill C–51, in Clause 12, be amended by replacing lines 37 and 38, on page 6, with the following:

"et or receipt relates within one hundred and eighty days after the day on which".

That Bill C–51, in Clause 19, be amended by replacing line 9, on page 11, with the following:

"grain in a licensed primary elevator, licensed terminal elevator or li".

That Bill C–51, in Clause 22, be amended by replacing lines 33 to 40, on page 11, with the following:

> "81. (1) With respect to the purchase of western grain from the producer of that grain, every licensed grain dealer shall, at the prescribed time and in the prescribed manner,
> (a) issue a grain receipt, elevator receipt or cash purchase ticket stating the grade name, grade and dockage of the grain, and immediately provide it to the producer, or
> (b) where no Canada grade name is applicable to the grain, issue a grain receipt, elevator receipt or cash purchase ticket stating the type of grain by name, value of the grain and dockage of the grain, and immediately provide it to the producer."

He said: Mr. Speaker, these motions propose to achieve two things. One is to extend the time that grain may be left in an elevator before it is priced. In effect it will be extending the time from 90 to 180 days and provides additional protection to the farmer who left the grain for storage up to the 180 days.

This is a reduction from the current law in which the protection lasts for one year. It would cut the time in half. The effect on farmers is that it forces them to price grain more quickly than is currently required. Ninety days in my estimation and in the estimation of a lot of producers is not a great deal of time. It forces them to unload the grain that has been delivered to commercial storage to await a price.

Second, Motions Nos. 4 and 5 have the effect of including the designation, "elevator receipt" in the choices of paperwork that might be engaged in on delivery of grain to the various receivers.

It is extremely important that an official elevator receipt be available on demand for the producer. I remind the House that the elevator receipt means a document in the prescribed form issued in respect of grain delivered to an elevator acknowledging receipt of the grain and subject to any conditions contained therein or in this act, entitling the holder of the document, who now be the farmer; (a) to delivery of grain of the same kind, grade and quantity as the grain referred to in the document or; (b) in the case of a document issued for specially binned grain, which is another designation under the act, to deliver the identical grain.

With the inclusion of an elevator receipt we are permitting the producer to retain the exact amount and type of grain he has delivered. He has not yet given up ownership of it. He has only put it in storage and started it into the system.

This is important in the event a grain dealer goes into bankruptcy. It permits the farmer to extract his grain from the institution and safeguards against what can only be described as rip–offs that have occurred in the past.

Prior to the grains act being changed a couple of years ago, some processors actually accumulated thousands of bushels of grain and collected credit on them, when bankrupt, using the grains to relieve some of the elements of their debt. In effect they were transferring the ownership of that grain from the farmer to themselves without any money having changed hands.

• (1230)

These amendments are designed to provide adequate protection for producers who use the wide variety of choices under the grains act. Therefore no matter what their choice they would have the same recourse to protection by the demand for the issuance of an elevator receipt. With my amendments this would give the producer the protection and knowledge that he would still be the owner and would still have the right to the sale of that grain.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak on the three amendments put forth by the hon. member for Mackenzie.

The purpose of Motion No. 2 is to limit the time period for a grain dealer to meet the paper requirements to 180 days from the flexible type of arrangement under the Canada Grain Act right now. I do believe flexibility is needed.

The Canadian Grain Commission has to be given the power to set different lengths of time for the different transportation situations and for the different types of dealers in the industry. It takes and requires that flexibility. The 180 days would end up setting a maximum which is too long for some grains and may be too short in the rare case. Flexibility is needed.

We cannot support this motion because that flexibility is needed for the commission to operate properly.

The intent of the motion is good. However we must consider the Canadian Grain Commission's overzealous enforcement in some cases and its unwise laxness in others as in the case of ensuring that companies are operating within the bonding level. While those concerns are there with some of the past dealings of the Canadian Grain Commission I believe it does need the flexibility in this case. Therefore we will oppose this motion.

Motion No. 4 adds primary elevators to the list of terminal and transfer elevators in terms of facilities where the seller will have top priority. If the company that is operating should become bankrupt or insolvent the seller has the top priority, the first right to receive payment for grain that he has in storage in those facilities. This is a good amendment.

It never did make sense to me that a farmer with grain in an elevator of a company that went bankrupt and was out of business would not have the first right to receive payment for his grain that was sitting in that facility. That is the case right now. Therefore we do support the amendment.

Motion No. 5 adds the additional stipulation that in cases where no official Canada grade name is applicable to a grain under the Canada Grain Act, then the grain dealer shall immediately issue a receipt stating the name, the value and the dockage of the grain.

While its intentions are good, this amendment will make it virtually impossible for speciality crop dealers along with others to operate. This is especially so in cases where farmers are loading directly on to a dealer car or a producer car or for truck pick up in the yard and these shipments are going into the United States. In cases like that it would make it virtually impossible for the sellers, the farmers and the dealer to do business.

This recommendation restricts too much. Again the intention is good in that the concerns the member has are legitimate. In some cases now grain is being loaded on trucks without a grade given and without a value assigned.

If that grain does not make it to its destination, what compensation can the farmer get? What proof has the farmer that the grain has been shipped other than the bill of lading, which a farmer should get from a trucker before loading?

In the case of loading directly on a rail car, whether it be a dealer car or a producer car, it is just a copy of the paperwork that the farmer sends to the company and the Canadian Grain Commission. The company they are dealing with has not really been verified by anyone. How much weight would that carry in legal terms? Probably very little.

In practical terms, how is the farmer going to weigh the grain that goes on to the car? How is the farmer going to weigh the grain that is put on a truck and is moving into the United States? There is no practical way.

The cars of course are weighed when they go over the first scale on the track but in terms of grade and dockage, that has to be determined from the spill. In case of a spill, samples can be taken from the product.

My personal experience with this is from people I have talked to who have had spills. One happened a couple of years ago by Innisfree in my constituency. The farmer felt that the compensation was fair. Dockage and grade was taken from the spill. A weight had not been taken but the farmer was paid out at the maximum load that was allowed on the car. Therefore the railways have treated farmers fairly in this regard.

For those reasons I oppose this amendment.

Mr. Althouse: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I was listening to the last debate and I wanted to clarify which motions had been grouped. My understanding is that it was Motions Nos. 2, 4 and 5. I believe the hon. member was talking about Motion No. 6. It confuses the debate to have him opposing something we may not yet be talking about.

The Deputy Speaker: The member is correct that it is Motions Nos. 2, 4 and 5. It is very difficult for members I am sure to keep track of what motion we are discussing.

Mr. Benoit: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Motions Nos. 5 and 6 do deal with a very similar topic area, but the member is absolutely correct. I just spoke on Motion No. 6. A lot of the same rationale does apply to Motion No. 5. It is virtually the same rationale except we are not talking about transportation. We are talking about paperwork. The debate I have just given applies if it is translated to paperwork instead of transportation.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to address Bill C–51, An Act to amend the Canada Grain Act and respecting certain regulations made pursuant to that Act. As you know, the Canadian Grain Commission has the responsibility to guarantee to purchasers of Canadian grain the quality and the quantity that they order, and to ensure the reliability and the wholesomeness of products intended for domestic and foreign markets.

The government wanted to give more operational flexibility to the commission by amending the act. The amendments include changes to the current provisions on licensing and security. The Official Opposition tabled a motion regarding the appointment of the commissioners to the Canadian Grain Commission. Let me tell you that the public has had enough of partisan appointments and is tired of seeing heads roll as soon as a new government takes office.

The amendment to clause 2, which will be discussed more thoroughly later on by a colleague of mine, must be adopted for reasons of transparency. Motions Nos. 2, 4 and 5, tabled by the NDP, deserve some consideration.

The hon. member for Mackenzie proposes that the deadline set in clause 12 be changed. We cannot accept that amendment.

The Canadian Grain Commission requires producers to do what is necessary to get paid for their grain, within 90 days of delivery to an elevator operator or a grain dealer. After this 90–day period, a producer who did not get paid has 30 days to notify the commission. The 90–day period is fixed by regulation.

In its amendment, the NDP proposes to set that period at 180 days in the act. Thus, it would no longer be possible to change that period by regulation. The Canadian Grain Commission would see its flexibility to ensure payment for the grain within a reasonable period of time and especially to avoid bankruptcy be reduced.

Do we need to remind the NDP that this time limit was set up following a Federal Court ruling in 1990, which held the Canadian Grain Commission responsible for the bankruptcy of two of its licensees? The security given by these two licensees was not enough and the taxpayers had to make up the difference, which came to $3.8 million in this case.

Let us just say that it would be better to avoid such incidents from now on. The 90–day time limit provided for in the regulations seems fair. This is why we urge members to vote against this motion.

Motion No. 4 to amend Clause 19 is inappropriate, since we are not talking about the same type of elevator receipts. In the case of terminal elevators or transfer elevators, a receipt can be resold. The last holder has the priority to receive the grain. However, in the case of a primary elevator, the purchase or the sale is handled directly by the producer and the terminal operator.

The elevator receipts are redeemable immediately. Even the Canadian Grain Commission does not see the need to add primary elevators to Clause 19 of this bill, because we are not talking about the same type of transactions.

In Motion No. 5 concerning Clause 22, the NDP proposes that the commonly used name of some types of grain be stated on the grain receipt, or the elevator receipt, if no Canada grade name is applicable to the grain. After checking with the Canadian Grain Commission, it seems that almost every grain has a Canada grade name, even though it is not always well known.

The amendment as proposed by the NDP could cause even more serious administrative problems than if everybody used the grade names. Greater responsibility is imposed on grain producers and operators to state the grade name, grade and dockage of the grain in order to help assess the value of the grain.

Anyway, the Commission can exempt an elevator operation from using the grade. If the Commission releases the lesser known grades of some grains, people should be able to manage. In this case, we do not think the bill needs to be amended in this way.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on these three motions.

First I will comment on Motion No. 2. As has already been said this motion which has been put forward by the member for Mackenzie sets out a definite date on which settlement would have to be made. Other members have commented today that there needs to be some flexibility. After a long period of consultation which has taken place on this the industry feels it should be 90 days. That is why it is there. If we were to prescribe in the bill that there be a set number of days, no matter what that was, there would be difficulty in the future. If the industry deemed it should change, it would take a change in the legislation to do so.

• (1245)

By doing this in 90 days, as will be suggested and done by the commission without having been carved in stone in the legislation, one of the things we have to keep in mind is to keep the money getting to the producers as quickly as it possibly can. If the producers were allowed to leave their grain in an elevator for a longer period of time those elevator operators would probably have to have a greater amount of security posted at all times because of the volume that might be there.

Also, we want to get the dollars back to the producers as quickly as we can. We do not want to put the temptation out there for producers to leave the grain in the elevator a long period of time and start using it as a storage facility to hold their product so they might be able to speculate on the market as it goes along and maybe have some distorting influence on the price of the market.

We certainly cannot support Motion No. 2 for those reasons if no others.

On Motion No. 4, I want to point out to the member for Mackenzie that if he looks at section 112 of the act it already provides protection for the holders of primary elevator receipts. The section that he is referring to or suggesting that they make an amendment to is the section that deals only with terminal and transfer elevators. The provision that the member is requesting is looked after.

The member for Vegreville raised the issue that the producers should have first claim. The producer does have first claim. The producers have first claim in any situation if the producers still maintain their receipt. If the producers wish to assign their receipt to somebody else well that may very well differ the situation. The producers do have first claim as long as they have that receipt.

Motion No. 5 refers to the use of grades on a receipt when it is received. What we want to avoid here is the temptation that has been there in the past to not list the grade name. The elevator operator in the past, when they did not have to list the grade name, it was not necessary that they post security for that product in the elevator.

We want to close that loop and close that possible gap, also recognizing that there may be times when that has to take place and that can take place and that the grade name does not have to be there. The elevator operator in that case, if it were a feed grain or something, could have that without a described grade on it providing that they agree with the commission that they provide security so there would have to be specific recognition and co–operation made in that case.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 2. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76.1(8), a recorded division on Motion No. 2 stands deferred.

• (1250)

The next question is on Motion No. 4. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. The motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 5. All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

An hon. member: On division.

The Deputy Speaker: Motions Nos. 3, 7 and 8 will be grouped for debate but voted on as follows: Motion No. 3 will be voted on separately; a vote on Motion No. 7 applies to Motion No. 8.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.) moved:

That Bill C–51, in Clause 13, be amended by adding after line 15, on page 8, the following:

"49.2 (1) A person who proposes to operate a primary or process elevator or carry on business as a grain dealer without being licensed under this Act may apply to the Commission to be exempted by order under paragraph 117(b) from the requirement to be licensed.

(2) Unless the Commission has reason to believe that the elevator is not suited to handling grain or that the person is not a suitable person to carry on business as a grain dealer, the Commission shall make an order under paragraph 117(b) exempting the person from the requirement to be licensed.

(3) A person who is exempted from being licensed under subsection (2) shall display prominently a statement in the prescribed form that the person is not licensed under the Canada Grain Act to operate an elevator or carry on business as a grain dealer

(a) at every place of business operated by that person at which a contract for the delivery of grain may be executed;

(b) at every place where grain may be delivered to the person as an elevator operator or grain dealer; and

(c) on every document that is, relates to or solicits a contract to deliver or handle grain."

(4) Section 83 does not apply to a person who is exempted from being licensed under subsection (2).

That Bill C–51, in Clause 33, be amended by deleting lines 9 to 15, on page 15.

That Bill C–51 be amended by deleting Clause 34.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak to these three motions which have been put forward by the Reform Party.

The purpose of Motion No. 3 is to allow grain dealers or the operators of primary or process elevators the ability to opt out of licensing under the Canada Grain Act. This amendment would remove from these operators all of the requirements and restrictions under the Canada Grain Act.

This amendment also imposes certain conditions for opting out to make sure that it is very clear to people using these services that this particular dealer or elevator operator is not licensed and therefore meets no bonding requirements under the Canada Grain Act. That is an important protection which I think is necessary to make this opting out work.

The Canadian Grains Commission must allow the opt out on the part of the dealer unless it can show good reason that this person should not be allowed to carry on business or that the facility is not a proper facility to carry on a business.

All we are talking about there is the individual who is applying to carry on business should have a good credit rating, one that would not interfere with allowing him to carry on a business, and should not have a criminal record which would restrict him, which the commission would feel would not allow him to carry on his own business.

Those are the only restrictions. Barring those restrictions an individual who wants to opt out should be allowed to opt out.

This amendment would also allow those who have opted out to deal under the Canadian Grains Commission with grading and inspection services, to use its services. Unfortunately, it was not possible as far as I could tell to make this amendment require that the Canadian Grains Commission allow these opted out individuals to use its inspection and grading services. I would hope that the Canadian Grains Commission would feel an obligation because these people are in the grains industry and the Canadian Grains Commission says it is important to have the integrity in our business by having grading and inspection services. I would hope that the Canadian Grains Commission would allow for this grading and inspection even for those who have opted out.

That is the purpose of this amendment and I believe that it would allow these opted out people to operate. They can of course provide security on their own through some type of private insurance, some type of bonding. It would also allow groups like the special grains people who have expressed a real concern with this bill to opt out and then, especially small dealers, opt out as a group and form their own group, put their own bonding or insurance in place. They could be under the umbrella of a special grains group for example. It would allow these individuals to operate still using official Canada grain names where it applies.

I believe the purpose of this amendment would be allowed under these changes. Still, it would depend on the goodwill of the Canadian Grains Commission to allow for the grading and inspection services to be used because these people would have opted out completely from the requirements under the Canada Grains Act. That briefly is amendment number three. The hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminster is going to speak later specifically about the special grains end of it later.

I think we can talk about Motions Nos. 7 and 8 together. Both of these motions are simply there to delete the changes that have been made through Bill C–51 to the act. What it would do is have these sections revert to the old language of the Canada Grains Act which does not specifically state that the governor in council, the cabinet, has the power to overrule the Canadian Grains Commission in these areas.

These two changes that were put into the Canada Grain Act under Bill C–51 specifically state that cabinet does have the power to overrule the Canadian Grains Commission.

It is political interference with a body that is supposed to be an arm's length body, a regulatory body. Those who are in favour of making the change under Bill C–51 which gives the cabinet the final say state that really all it does is give cabinet a power that it has over the entire Canada Grain Act anyway. That is true to some extent because the cabinet does have control. The minister and the cabinet do have control of the Canada Grain Act.

When I was in committee my question to the people in the Canadian Grains Commission who administer this act was why put these amendments in Bill C–51 which specifically designates this power to cabinet. I was given no answer.

All I am asking is that these powers which are specified under these section of Bill C–51 are again left out as they originally were in the act. I cannot understand why the Liberal Party would oppose this change. I would like to trust that the exclusion of this was an oversight on the part of the people who drafted this new legislation. The only other reason for adding it is to give cabinet hands on, more direct control over the Canadian Grains Commission in these specific areas of the act. That is the only reason to leave them in.

I would ask for support from all parties in the House.

• (1300)

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I will speak to the House about Bill C–51 and the grouping of motions 3, 7 and 8. I will start with Motion No. 3. This motion presented by the member for Vegreville is the result of complaints voiced by western producers, in particular special crop dealers. I understand that the purpose of this motion is to make it possible for elevator operators or grain dealers to be exempted from the obligation to hold a licence for selling or buying grain.

Before voting on the motion, we must consider the sections involved, as they appear in Bill C–51. According to what was explained to us, we understand that the amendment proposed by the bill is aimed at reinforcing the obligation to hold a licence. Bill C–51 clearly and explicitly prohibits the sale and purchase of grain without a licence. If a producer deals with an unlicensed merchant and if the latter goes bankrupt, the producer will receive no compensation from the CGC. Therefore, he does so at his own risk. The situation which led the CGC to include this provision in the bill could roughly be described as follows:

Certain new elevator operators are in the business of cleaning grain from special crops; their neighbours, too, find it practical to deal with them because they are closer and, possibly, because it is cheaper since they are not licensed, thus saving on license–related costs.

These costs can amount to as much as $20,000 a year. Eventually, the elevator operators offer to act as intermediaries for their customers and sell the grain they cleaned. It seems that there is some uncertainty in the act that would make this possible. This is why the government wants to go ahead and clarify this provision. The motion before us now would make it possible for small operators to be exempted from the obligation to hold a licence, thus allowing them to save the costs associated with such a licence.

At the present time, all elevator operators and traditional grain dealers hold a licence certifying that they meet CGC standards. The commission prohibits anyone without a licence from buying or selling grain. The CGC demands that licensees post bonds equal to the value of their highest monthly transactions. The reason for this is very simple. If they want to deal in grains, they have to prove that they have the financial capacity to do so.

There is a system of securities guaranteeing payment of delivered grains in the event of bankruptcy of the elevator operator or grain dealer. In the past, the CGC, and consequently taxpayers, had to pay for shipments made to two elevator operators who went bankrupt. The cost was $3.8 million. The motion by the hon. member for Vegreville would be especially worthwhile for special crops since the government intends to introduce a bill on that subject in the spring.

I suppose that we could then include a provision to that effect. What concerns me about the motion of the Reform Party is that it could lead to deregulation of the industry. With this motion, those who would apply for a licence exemption would get it unless the CGC proves that the elevator is not suitable for grain processing.

Given the cost of a licence, well–established companies, like Cargill, could ask to be exempted and the commission would be unable to refuse. Consequently, despite the underlying good intention of the motion, I must reject it because of the risk of deregulation.

As for Motions Nos. 7 and 8, grouped together, they puzzle me. They are mainly technical in nature. Lines 9 to 15 in clause 33, and clause 34 have been added to the bill to allow the CGC to change grade names more quickly. Removing these would block the process. I will therefore oppose the motion.

The confusion started in 1988 when the CGC wanted to be able to react more quickly when new grades were needed. An amendment allowing for the creation of grades and grade names by regulation was adopted in 1988. Although the amendment dealt only with grades and grade names, the approval of the Governor in Council was needed. From 1990 to 1993, the CGC used an invalid procedure to modify grades and grade names of grains. Prior to 1988, grades and grade names were specified in a schedule to the act and could be modified only by legislative amendment.

According to lawyers, a regulation made without Governor in Council approval cannot be implemented. The CGC did not see fit to have Sections 33 and 34 exempted from Governor in Council approval in order to speed up the process. Therefore, I will oppose the motion because we must abide by the law and also for the sake of efficiency.

[English]

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak briefly to the Reform motions that would amend the Canada Grain Act. I particularly want to speak as they concern the special crop industry.

I have spoken about the matter before in the House. I have a very relevant concern in that it is a growing industry in my constituency of Kindersley—Lloydminster. It is one of the bright spots in the agricultural industry throughout at least western Canada and possibly other parts of the country as well.

There have been a couple of minor problems, not minor for those involved but minor in the scope of the entire industry. Two facilities ran into disrepute. The one in my constituency was the Klemmer seed company and the other was Pro Star. The producers that delivered to these companies were not adequately protected.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food is also aware of some of these concerns and problems. It may be part of the reason some of the current amendments are put forward to amend the Canada Grain Act. However there have been discussions with the industry and it is proposing further changes in the form of a new special crops act that would adequately protect those who deal with this new and growing industry.

In the interim Motion No. 3 would, temporarily at least and ongoing if we did not change the act, allow special crop producers to opt out of the auspices of the Canada Grain Act which was first passed about 1912 and really does not fit the needs of the industry, because they are not Cargill, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool or United Grain Growers. They are much smaller operators, almost taking the form of family farm operations in many instances. They not only provide valuable services to the special crops act but they are extending the viability of many rural communities through employment opportunities and through service to local producers in those areas.

The industry is a very conscientious industry and is promoting changes and regulations to protect producers. It needs time for the government to enact a special crops act so it can function and protect producers who deal with the industry.

Motion No. 3 would allow them to opt out of the auspices of the Canada Grain Act. That is not something that is unheard of in the current situation. For instance, right now feedlots which buy a lot of grain are able to opt out. They must clearly indicate that they are not under the constraints of the Canada Grain Act.

The hon. member for Vegreville has indicated that the same provision should be made available to other players in the industry. They must clearly indicate that they are not under the auspices of the Canada Grain Act so that those who would deal with operations such as Klemmer and Pro Star would not be under any illusions that they were being protected by the Canada Grain Act.

There have been a lot of allegations of political interference particularly in the Klemmer case. We may never know the full story behind that situation, but it is clear producers must be aware of where they are protected by the Canadian Grain Commission and where they are not protected.

With this motion the hon. member for Vegreville is attempting to clarify that and allow the special grains people to opt out so they can bring in their own special crops act, which would clearly protect producers who deal with them. Unlicensed individuals may still buy and sell using Canadian Grain Commission approved grade names if the commission would agree. It could perhaps even charge a modest user fee to provide that service.

As far as Motions Nos. 7 and 8 are concerned, they apparently clarify and revert to how the old act was structured. The amendments as put forward in Bill C–51 would clarify and give far more power to cabinet or to order in council decisions affecting the Canadian Grain Commission. If anything, we should be moving the other way where this quasi–judicial body would be at arm's length and cabinet would not be interfering in the daily work of the Canadian Grain Commission.

I also ask the House to consider support for Motions Nos. 7 and 8 so we can have better legislation to facilitate the work of the industry and we can see it progress rather than revert to the days of 1912.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on the three motions before us in this grouping, the first one being Motion No. 3.

I have to question something because I cannot quite figure out where Reformers are coming from when they talk about wanting some people to opt out. They want the Canadian Grain Commission to make the decision on whether somebody can opt out or cannot opt out. Let us look at the practical application of that. If someone asked for permission to opt out and the Canadian Grain Commission thought there might be some requirement for the elevator or operator and it was not totally satisfied the security was there without a legal bonding or security being posted, the commission could say that he should not opt out. What message does that send?

In other cases, as has been mentioned, some larger grain companies that might be considered to have all kinds of backing could opt out. As the member from the Bloc said, I could see a total breakdown in regulation and therefore deregulation of who was secure and who was not secure.

Having farmed for many years myself, not in the west admittedly but taking grains to elevators, I know farmers are busy. There is an assumption that if we know some elevators have bonding or security we assume that probably others do. We could end up in a situation where an elevator had security posted and 20 or 30 miles away an elevator might have security posted because it chose to.

It is certainly not the intention of the government to leave in place a situation where everybody is not treated in the same way. Hopefully it will be some comfort to members that the Canadian Grain Commission realizes every operator out there does not do the same amount of business. They may not have a large volume of product in their facility or on their site at any one time. There is work being done as far as how smaller operators can collectively post bond or securities so they can be covered. We have to remember that.

What would it do as far as competitiveness between dealers or elevator operators is concerned if one had further costs due to posting security and another one down the road, 100 miles away or even 10 miles away, did not have those costs? It is certainly our intention to treat everybody fairly. It is not our intention at this time to encourage or to allow some dealers to be in the system and some dealers to be out.

In reference to the comments from the member for Kindersley—Lloydminister as far as special grains, he is right. The government is working with the industry to put a special act in place to cover those, the peculiarities and specific requirements there. There was some concern that we do it in Bill C–51 but the general feeling was that there were some things in this bill that we could and should do and get out of the way rather than holding all those things up. I see the member is nodding his head yes, get those done and then work with the special crops people to look after their needs which are otherwise there.

As far as Motions Nos. 7 and 8 are concerned, again I find the comments from Reform Party members confusing. It seems that if members of that party have questions on something that has happened in agriculture they do not like, the first person they turn to is the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food and ask: "Why did you allow that to happen? It is in your ministry, your department. Why did you allow that to happen?"

What we are asking here and what it does is it gives the minister the final say, the governor in council. The minister would have an opportunity to comment on it. It gives the minister the final say on these types of actions and that is where the responsibility is going to end up.

The intention is not to get into the day to day operations of the commission. If there are questions, these things will have had to be approved by the minister and the governor in council. This will enable the answering of questions the Reform Party seems to be in the habit of asking the minister as to why he allowed something to happen. It gives the minister the opportunity to review those types of decisions before they happen.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have just a few short words on these amendments.

Motion No. 3 proposes to allow people who operate a primary or process elevator or who carry on business as a grain dealer without being licensed under this act to apply to the commission to be exempted under paragraph 17(b) of the act. In effect it sets out a class that is not particularly well defined which may apply for exemption under the Canada Grain Act. That is probably rather dangerous for us.

We would probably be better to await a specialty crops act and deal with these kinds of issues properly. There is the possibility for the kind of anomaly that was raised by our friends from the Bloc. One of the large players might decide to opt out. It would make the whole marketing practice that Canada has been engaged in since the turn of the century very suspect.

What we have now is a system where product identification is absolutely secure. It is guaranteed in Canada. This is one of the tools that Canada has used for almost 100 years to break into markets. We are the quality product. We have made Canadian grains similar to what the Mercedes Benz is to cars.

We have to take some care in allowing people to opt out. I am sure that McDonald's would not permit some of its franchisees to opt out and still go on selling Big Macs. We have not designated with this opting out process whether Canada No. 1 can still be sold as Canada No. 1 even though there is a disclaimer on the bill of lading saying that the dealer did not comply with the Canada Grain Act. Customers are not going to understand this. It is only going to reflect badly on all Canadian farm produce. We would be just as well to stay away from it.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

• (1320)

The Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 3. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: The recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 7. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: A recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP) moved:

That Bill C-51, in Clause 25, be amended

(a) by replacing line 16, on page 12, with the following:

"84. (1) Except with the written permission of";

"(2) Except with the written permission of the Commission or in accordance with prescribed terms and conditions, no public carrier shall transport grain unless it has first been weighed, the dockage established and the quality designated."

He said: Mr. Speaker, technically this motion divides what is now section 84 in the act. The bill we have in front of us proposes to amend section 84 in the act into subsections (1) and (2). In clause 25 of the bill before us now it would become subsection 84(1) and we would add a subsection (2) which would read:

(2) Except with the written permission of the commission or in accordance with the prescribed terms and conditions, no public carrier shall transport grain unless it has first been weighed, the dockage established and the quality designated.

There are two reasons for this. One is to make it easier to track grains that might be subject to bankruptcy procedure and as well to look forward to the new technology which is now being introduced into western Canada. It is the portable elevator which is a very large tandem truck with two units behind it. It has the ability to weigh grain as it goes in. The truck driver does the dockage testing and provides a grade. It makes certain that particular process which some companies are now engaged in is done in a way that provides the kind of paperwork transactions that will protect the producer.

The prospect of watching 2,000 bushels of flax or peas walk off the farm maybe to disappear without the proper paperwork in the event that particular grain dealer turns out to not have been properly bonded is not one a farmer looks forward to. This attempts to address that by requiring these kinds of operations to do the same paperwork as elevators do.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on Motion No. 6. The purpose of this motion is to add to transportation requirements for grain being shipped out of Canada the stipulation that unless an exemption has been provided for under the act which is already available, that the seller of the grain, the farmers in most cases, be provided with documentation stating the weight, dockage and quality of the grain. That is the intent.

There is a concern no doubt that when farmers load their trucks, as the hon. member just explained, not knowing the grade, the weight and the dockage then they are trusting that the people at the other end will give the proper payment for the commodity. That is a concern. Who would like to see a truckload containing $10,000 or $20,000 worth of commodity in extreme cases going out of the yard and not knowing exactly what they are going to be paid for?

However, I believe this amendment does not provide a solution. Instead, for farmers and businesses that are operating in this way with pickups on the farm or by producer cars, dealer cars, rail cars, it would make it very difficult if not virtually impossible for them to operate.

While I would like to know that every time farmers are shipping a load of grain off the farm they know they are getting paid for it, if we look at the practicalities it just is not possible. We have to recognize that. For that reason I oppose the amendment.

Mr. Jean-Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the motion standing in the name of the hon. member for Mackenzie is to add standards for public carriers. It would prescribe that grain carried by a public carrier must first have been weighed and cleaned and its quality designated.

According to the Canadian Grain Commission, no amendment is necessary since this is already being done in most cases and always when grain is destined for human consumption.

As a result of the proposed amendment, smaller producers who ship feed grain would see their costs increase unnecessarily. If there had been complaints that the quality of feed grain was below acceptable levels, the motion would be justified. Since that is not the case, at least as far as I know, I do not think it would be useful to oblige producers to spend more on precautions that are absolutely unnecessary. If most of these producers happen to use private carriers and the motion therefore does not affect them, it will then have no effect at all, since public carriers would only carry grain for human consumption.

According to the Canadian Grain Commission, this grain is already cleaned and weighed and its quality designated. So we have their guarantee that grain for our own consumption is being handled in the way specified by the hon. member for the New Democratic Party.

Furthermore, if small producers also have to conform to these procedures, their costs will go up, although we have no reason to believe they should be more regulated than they already are. And if they use private carriers, they will not be affected.

I therefore fail to see the relevance of the motion presented by the hon. member for Mackenzie. That is why the Bloc Quebecois will not support the motion, since all wheat for human consumption is very well regulated and perfectly safe.

• (1330)

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri-food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will say at the outset that the government does not have any intention of supporting the motion. I will give a few of the reasons for it. There is no question in my mind that what is said in the motion is a bit confusing versus what may or may not be its intent.

It would have a definite impact in the industry of slowing down the movement of grain whether transported by truck, producer car or dealer car. Therefore it would increase the cost to producers, which is certainly not the intention of the government.

At the present time the weight, the grade and the dockage content of grain delivered by a producer or dealer car are immediately determined at the unload. That is the system. To have to do that as the car or truck is being unloaded would certainly slow things up and add a cost. It would also put an additional obligation on the public carriers to have with them at all times the documentation on the grade and dockage. It would shift some of the responsibility to public carriers for having the documentation available at all times.

In practical terms, the motion would mean that when a truckload of grain to be delivered to a local feed mill was loaded by the producer on the farm it would have to be graded. The dockage, the weight and everything would have to be with it to take a load of grain to a local feed mill. That would be absolutely unnecessary. It would be cumbersome. It would slow everything up and be expensive.

We do not intend to support the motion.

SENIORS

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Guelph—Wellington is enriched daily by the contributions of our seniors. We can all learn from their experience and are fortunate to have many seniors as important members of our communities.

Unfortunately as time passes, it becomes more and more difficult for some seniors to care for themselves and each other in their homes. I congratulate organizations like Meals–on–Wheels, the Victoria Order of Nurses and Life Line that are active throughout Guelph—Wellington and that help our seniors stay in their homes for as long as possible.

Growing old should not mean having to leave the family home. Governments at all levels should encourage our seniors to remain in the family home where memories and stability provide comfort and support. We owe them no less than this.

SEXUAL HARRASSMENT

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, an Ontario judge has ruled that General Motors Corp. did not act properly when it fired a supervisor for using offensive language and making sexual innuendos in the presence of five subordinate female employees. According to the judge, sexually explicit language was the norm in the GM security service.

Members of the Bloc Quebecois are concerned about the implications of such a decision on present and future cases when they go to trial. This decision implies that sexual harassment cannot be invoked when the culture of a given service or company allows this type of behaviour.

In 1987, the Supreme Court of Canada clearly established, in the Robichaud case, that employers are responsible for sexual harassment in the work place. The decision of this Ontario judge reduces the scope of the Supreme Court decision, and we find that regrettable.

This decision is a step backward in our fight for zero tolerance of sexual assault against women. We must oppose it.

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to pay tribute to the hon. member for Lac–Saint–Jean and to say on behalf of my caucus how pleased we are that he is recuperating.

When I arrived at Edmonton International Airport on Thursday evening I received the news of his frightening illness. I was stunned, as were all Canadians. I lay awake almost all night thinking of him, praying that he would live through the night and that the doctors treating him would have real wisdom.

I will always remember the years that the Leader of the Opposition and I sat side by side in the House, from the summer of 1990 until the election of 1993. We talked about the birth of his two sons, Alexandre and Simon. His eyes would light up when he spoke of them, of the incredible joy they have brought to him and his wife, Audrey.

This disease ravages those whom it affects. Mr. Bouchard's life has been spared and it seems nothing short of miraculous.

Good luck, Lucien. We continue to pray for your recovery. God bless you.

ETHANOL

Mr. Gar Knutson (Elgin—Norfolk, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the recent trade mission the government led to the People's Republic of China has been a great success.

One of the agreements signed by Canadian business while in China was the building of an ethanol plant. The people of China will benefit greatly from ethanol. So will the environment of Asia, Chinese farmers and industry. This technology can also benefit Canada.

The proposed ethanol plant to be located at Chatham, Ontario will ensure that this country does not have to rely on foreign produced ethanol and, as in China, our agricultural industry will be able to count on a stable consumer of corn.

Ethanol makes economic and environmental sense. I praise the Chinese government for showing interest in this technology.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wheat Board is a winner.

Prairie farmers have overwhelmingly demonstrated their confidence in the Canadian Wheat Board by electing 10 strong supporters of the agency to its 11 member advisory board. They have rejected the efforts of a small but vocal group that wanted to weaken the board and implement a dual marketing system. Their vote was a sweeping endorsement of the board and single desk selling.

It is a recognition of the outstanding job that the wheat board has done selling Canadian grain, expanding export markets and working with farmers to make Canada a world leader in agricultural production.

The message from farmers is clear. The future of Canadian agriculture must include a strong Canadian Wheat Board.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a recent subcommittee report highlighted our under usage of the St. Lawrence seaway system.

It is my hope the justice department will approve the proposal submitted to it by interested operators to allow cruise ships to sail the lakes. With 14 million Americans within a one–hour drive of my riding I would welcome approval to allow them to enter Canada to enjoy the pleasure of sailing the lakes.

This is an opportunity for the federal government to see a tidal wave of American tourist dollars enter Canada, with a resulting spin–off being increased employment in our hospitality industries.

Skagway, Alaska with a population of 700 people welcomes 300,000 people each summer from cruise ships. Ports of all sizes along the Great Lakes would welcome the same level of prosperity if timely approval is given.

The Great Lakes Conference of Mayors recognized the potential of this industry more than a year ago. I urge the departments of justice and finance to move this concept to the approval stage quickly before our American neighbours control this industry.

SOCIAL PROGRAM REFORM

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in Montreal, 200 students and unemployed young people came to tell the Minister for Human Resources Development how deeply disappointed they were by the social program reform the Liberal government is trying to impose on them.

These young people, full of energy and eager to work, denounced the cynicism and lack of action of the minister who claims that he is powerless to stem the rising unemployment rate.

These young people strongly criticized the reform which is trying to save money at their expense, going ahead without the provinces' consent, and turns a deaf ear to Quebec's demand to take over manpower training.

These young people refuse to have imposed on them a reform which endangers their future and cuts social benefits hard–won by previous generations. The results of the public consultation are loud and clear: the proposed reform is unacceptable and young people reject it.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the business community is near consensus. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business declared its research consistently shows that small and medium sized businesses advocate the complete elimination of all grants and subsidies to businesses and associations. Yet the Liberals continually insist they are helping small business through regional development.

The Business Council on National Issues had but one suggestion for the federal government: "Just say no". The Canadian Aerospace Industry said: "We have seen attempts to create pseudo–competition by region in this county by pitting companies against each other supported by tax dollars. This has resulted in wasted energy, misguided marketing, lost opportunity, squandered money, and all too frequently, failed enterprises".

If the minister will not eliminate regional development he might as well amalgamate the regional development programs. He could then create a new crown corporation called "Pork Barrel Incorporated".

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, recently in my riding of Brant, we have witnessed a successful and important example of intergovernmental co–operation.

The town of Paris has recognized that its police station is outmoded and can no longer effectively meet the town's needs. Meanwhile, Canada Post, while continuing to serve the rural and urban residents of the area, has been under utilizing its large building in the downtown core.

After successful negotiations, the town of Paris and Canada Post have reached an agreement under which the town will renovate the old post office into a new and modern police station with the help of infrastructure money, which I might add is another product of intergovernmental co–operation. Canada Post will find a more suitable and cost–effective location to continue its service to the town.

I would like to congratulate the council of the town of Paris and in particular, Mayor Bawcutt, for identifying and implementing this common sense deal. I would also like to recognize Canada Post for its effective resource management and its commitment to the betterment of our local communities.

POST–SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to see a draft memorandum of understanding between Nunavut Arctic College, which is based in Iqaluit, and Trent University in Peterborough. It provides for the development of mutual accreditation of courses, exchanges of faculty, students and staff and the development of other joint programs.

It also provides for the participation of the Nunavut Implementation Commission, Nunavut Tunngavik Incorporated and other bodies in the development of post–secondary education in Nunavut.

Trent has the longest established native studies program in Canada. Many students from the NWT have already studied in that program and other programs at Trent University.

This new agreement formalizes two–way co–operation. I congratulate those involved and look forward to working with the member for Nunatsiaq on projects related to the agreement.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on November 21 my colleague, the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys, spoke eloquently in the House about the importance of gun control to women.

He pointed out that a woman is shot to death every five days in Canada, half of those by a partner, 78 per cent with legally owned weapons.

I believe that most members of Parliament want to see an end to violence against women and yet offhand comments in the House and elsewhere call into question our commitment. As the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice spoke on that day, another member, like a little boy playing with a pretend gun, said: "pow, pow, pow".

Such comments are a tragic betrayal of the hopes of women for a better and safer country.

LEADER OF THE OFFICIAL OPPOSITION

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after hours of anguish, we learned with tremendous relief that Lucien Bouchard was out of danger. We now hope that he can rest and recover at his own rate.

Speaking for the parliamentary wing of the Bloc Quebecois, I want to thank everybody and the members of this House for their fantastic messages of support and encouragement.

I also want to express our admiration for the Saint–Luc Hospital medical team, for its unbelievable expertise and dedication. Finally, on behalf of all of us, I want to stress the courage and composure of his wife, Audrey, who stood by his side every minute of this terrible tragedy, surrounding him with her loving presence. She, too, deserves all our admiration.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canada must stop the folly of regional policy. The Liberals continue their borrowing ways and the pork barrel rolls on and on. It is time to jump over the barrel.

Canada could learn from experiences around the world where these programs have failed miserably. The government knows regional development programs are doomed to fail, yet the practice continues.

The finance minister's budget will be quite telling. Will it be business as usual or will the minister heed the Reform message? Western economic diversification has not diversified the western economy. The Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency is not creating opportunity. The Federal Office of Regional Development is not developing regions in Quebec.

Since their inception, these agencies impoverished the Canadian taxpayer to the tune of about $1 billion a year. It is time to end the folly of regional policy.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to wish the Leader of the Opposition a speedy recovery.

Setting aside partisan rhetoric and the constitutional differences of opinion that oppose us, all my colleagues from the Liberal Party join me in telling the Leader of the Opposition that he is in our thoughts as he goes through what must certainly be the most difficult time of his life. We also wish his wife, children and family the courage to see him through this ordeal.

The words of support that flood in from all parts testify to the great parliamentary qualities of the Leader of the Opposition.

On behalf of all Canadians, I wish for the speedy return of the Leader of the Opposition among us, here in this House.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow marks the anniversary of the Montreal massacre.

Today I will not talk of the increased incidents of violence against women reported, nor will I talk about how only 18 per cent of the guns used to kill women were illegally owned.

Instead today I would like us to take one minute to remember the women who were killed that day. We remember the killer's name, but the women are faceless to most of us and just a number, 14.

Tomorrow I would like us to take a minute to remember, Geneviève Bergeron, Hélène Colgan, Natalie Croteau, Barbara Daigneault, Anne–Marie Edward, Maud Haviernick, Barbara Maria Klucznik, Maryse Laganiere, Maryse Leclaire, Anne Marie Lemay, Sonia Pelletier, Michèle Richard, Annie St–Arneault, Annie Turcotte.

Violence against women is not just a women's issue. Violence against women affects all of us.

HEALTH CARE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, a serious issue of women's health has yet to be addressed by the government and that is the question of breast implants.

This issue was raised during the mandate of the former government and continues to be a serious issue related to the health of women.

Several organizations across the country of breast implant support groups have been formed and have been asking for assistance to make sure information is available to women who have had breast implants, that there is equal access to surgery for removal of breast implants and access to good primary care.

I call on the government to address this serious women's health issue, to respond to these groups that are requesting assistance and to look into the moratorium on breast implants which has not seen an end of their use.

TOWN HALL MEETINGS

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have just completed a series of town hall meetings across my riding of Simcoe Centre.

My constituents attended so they could discuss the issues, ask questions and give me their input. A survey was conducted at each meeting and I would like to share the results with the House.

Over 90 per cent responded that they believe there should be mandatory AIDS testing of all immigrants to Canada. There was overwhelming support for the review of social programs and that they be focused on those who are truly in need. Over 90 per cent want section 745 removed from the Criminal Code to eliminate possible early parole for those convicted of first degree murder. They also believe that the names of young offenders convicted of serious crimes should be made public.

On the issue of gun control, my constituents believe that the primary emphasis of new legislation should be placed on the criminal misuse of firearms and firearms smuggling and not new restrictions on legal gun owners.

Finally, I believe that I should represent my constituents and vote according to their wishes. I encourage all other members of the House to do the same.

MIL DAVIE SHIPYARD

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, by refusing to take a firm stand on the Hibernia contract issue, the government has made another move which, combined with the actions of the Minister of Transport and the Minister of Industry, will lead MIL Davie straight to disaster.

• (1415)

We learned over the weekend that the Minister of Industry had been keeping secret for more than a year a report on Canadian shipyards that urged the government to depend only on a small number of shipyards and drop MIL Davie.

In light of the unfair treatment of MIL Davie by the Hibernia consortium and the failure of the government to follow through with the Magdalen Islands ferry contract, does the Deputy Prime Minister recognize that all the actions of her government are being dictated by this secret report to the Minister of Industry, which has the MIL Davie slated for closure?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, before answering the hon. member's question, let me say that I was relieved to learn that the Leader of the Opposition was on his way to recovery. In the months to come, he will have to exhibit incredible strength, something we all know he is capable of, and we wish him much courage in getting better. Knowing the Leader of the Opposition—he is a real fighter—we are confident that he will return quickly.

[English]

In the name of all Canadians I would wish the Leader of the Opposition a very speedy recovery. The whole of Canada was watching the events of the last few days. Our hearts go out to him and to his family. We wish his speedy return to the House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Ms. Copps: To answer the question, Mr. Speaker, of course the government of Canada, through the Prime, has expressed disagreement with the policy adopted by the Hibernia consortium. We are aware of the possibility and support tendering. Unfortunately, we are dealing with a private sector consortium that is entitled to make its own decisions and, in spite of the views expressed by the government of Canada, it has decided not to proceed to a call for tenders, as we felt would have been proper and fair.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we asked the Minister of Industry several questions in this House on saving the MIL Davie shipyard.

Are we to understand from the answers of the industry minister, who has always hidden behind the lack of an MIL Davie business plan to avoid facing his responsibilities, that what he really wanted was to follow up on the secret report he has been hiding in his department for over a year, which proposes closing MIL Davie, and that the minister lacks the courage to say so frankly?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member is big enough to admit, first of all, that MIL Davie's shareholder is responsible for announcing its position on the MIL Davie corporate plan submitted by the former Quebec government. That is first and foremost the shareholder's responsibility. That is what I said several times.

Yes, there was a report. That is no secret. The Financial Post obtained it on request. That is normal. That is the position of someone who was a consultant. That is not necessarily my position or the government's. Moreover, if MIL Davie wants to succeed, it must do so on global markets. That is what I said several times here.

[English]

For any company to succeed in the modern marketplace it must produce goods at a price the world is willing to pay to acquire them. That is first and foremost for any company the responsibility of its management and its shareholders to determine.

When we hear the point of view of the Quebec government on the MIL Davie business plan, when we know whether its unions are willing to support it, perhaps then we can respond accordingly to any further request we have on their behalf.

• (1420)

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows full well that some contracts were necessary to allow MIL Davie to reorganize. Instead of acting as his responsibilities called for, the minister has always hidden behind the lack of so–called business plans.

Are we to understand that after demanding that Quebec make 90 per cent of the efforts to rationalize shipyards in Canada, the federal government's only goal, after closing the Sorel–Tracy shipyard and the Vickers shipyard in Montreal, is to close Quebec's third major and last remaining shipyard, MIL Davie, so that the shipyards in the Maritime provinces can survive?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, maybe using statistics for demagogic purposes is a good strategy. In fact, Quebec's share of shipyard rationalization is 30 per cent. Please, Mr. Speaker, let us stick to the facts.

Second, I wish to say to the hon. member that it is not a matter of hiding. I think it is essential for a company seeking help from the taxpayers in Canada and Quebec to have a good corporate plan that has been approved by shareholders and workers alike. At that point, we can make a move with MIL Davie.

[English]

I cannot understand why the member is not willing to say that we have to find a long term solution. If he would look at the business plan that has been presented, he would understand the business plan does not claim that the long term solution to MIL Davie is one contract turned over from anybody. The long term solution involves fundamental readjustment of that company to a new marketplace.

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. Yesterday, the Minister of Human Resources Development greatly disappointed the young unemployed people who had come to discuss his reform of social programs with him. A participant asked him: "Where are these jobs? Tell me; I am ready to work".

Why does the minister have nothing else to offer young people who want to work, who want real jobs, than a so–called reform whose main purpose is to make cuts at their expense? They will be the second–class unemployed. They will have to go into debt to pay their tuition fees, which will double. Why?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member should know, last Friday Statistics Canada released its latest job report. It pointed out that for the first time in six years the jobless rate had dropped to below 10 per cent; in fact it is 9.6 per cent.

Much more important, in the last 11 months 414,000 full time jobs have been created. That is the fastest growing job rate of any industrial country in the world. The unemployment rate for young people dropped a full two percentage points during the same period of time.

We are living up to our commitment to create jobs. If the hon. member would go back to her own riding and look at it, she would see that the job rate dropped over the past 11 months by 3.1 per cent. It is now below 9 per cent. That is real job creation.

[Translation]

Mrs. Francine Lalonde (Mercier, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that the Minister of Human Resources Development is not pleased that 1,364,000 people are still without work, not counting all those who are looking for work and are not declared as unemployed.

• (1425)

Does the minister admit that if he had wanted to do just one thing to help create jobs, he should have reduced unemployment insurance premiums in September, when he knew that the fund had ten times as much as he wanted when he promised to reduce UI premiums: $2.7 billion compared to $240 million?

Young people would have benefited the most from these new jobs.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the fact is that on January 1 the premium rate on unemployment insurance drops down to $3 per hundred. We have already taken the step we committed to in the last budget and the premium rate is coming down.

While the hon. member is exaggerating a number of figures, I remind her that she should recognize at the end of this year the cumulative deficit for the UI fund will be over $3 billion. Until we get that cumulative deficit down, because it is a real drag on the economy, we will not be in a position to make changes. By the time of the next budget I am sure we will be in a position to have a better report or a better analysis. In the meantime we have to move to get that $3 billion deficit out of the way.

GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, one of the promises in the red book was for more transparent government. I have not read the fine print but I do not think that meant government leaks.

Today the industry minister's orange paper takes it place with the GST report, the HRD green book, the justice minister's action plan on gun control and the defence white paper. All were conveniently leaked to the media before the official announcements were made. The government's complete disregard for Parliament reinforces fears of Liberal arrogance.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Why is the government showing such disdain for the House of Commons and what is it doing to end these leaks?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that it was out of a desire to present the next paper in our series of papers on the economy that I decided to make the presentation in the House of Commons this afternoon, which I will be doing immediately following question period.

For that matter, I want the hon. member to know that there is no obligation either under the rules of the House or otherwise to make such a presentation in the House. I want to assure him that we will be very interested in hearing his support for a plan which should help build a more innovative economy.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government totally missed the point.

The problem is that leaks are occurring and they are unprecedented. Leaks to the media must be at the top of every government communications plan. The government leaks like a badly fitting diaper. The government is making a mockery of the House of Commons with every proposal it produces. While opposition MPs are sworn to secrecy and they are stuck in departmental lockups, Liberal spin doctors are out descending on the media like locusts.

My supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Are these leaks part of a deliberate communications strategy on the part of the government?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a certain amount of experience with fitting diapers. We always preferred the reusable rather than the disposable in our household.

I assure the hon. member it would be of very great concern if information were leaked that could either affect the markets or could lead to somebody prospering inadvertently or indirectly. In the case of the information I have seen published as a result of these documents having reached the public domain, no such case will occur.

I assure him that the participation of members of Parliament in discussion coming from the proposals we put forward in the action plan is of great importance to us.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I could quote instances when the Liberals were on this side of the House and they condemned the government for leaks. They are promoting more leaks that are far worse than the previous government did.

Time and time again they place political strategy ahead of parliamentary procedure and have shown no respect for the House.

• (1430)

They seem to think that polls give them a blank cheque to do as they please. I have news for this leak infested government. Reform MPs are tired of its arrogance and it is starting to wear thin on Canadians too.

Will the government investigate this process of leaking proposals and reports before they are even tabled in the House? Will it take the appropriate and necessary action?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the point is being missed here. Most of the matters I have seen reported in the newspapers today were matters which were debated and discussed in various fora over quite a number of months. In many ways what we see today is the culmination of many months of consultation, of discussion and of thought which have been engaged in among members of Parliament as well as in the House.

I know the member is concerned about this because he recognizes the strategic importance of this document. I hope for that reason he will take the opportunity afforded to him to study it, to read it, to make further suggestions. I believe it plays an important part in the gradual unfolding of an active government policy on economic development in Canada.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

More than two months after he tabled his working paper on social program reform and two weeks before the public consultations end, the minister has tabled only four of the nine technical papers that are to lay out the directions of his plan. This delay suggests the worst, especially as far as education and welfare are concerned.

In view of the urgency of making all the relevant information public, so that a real debate can take place on this reform which will directly affect millions of Quebecers and Canadians, how does the minister justify this delay?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I believe the rest of the papers will be tabled publicly within the next 10 days.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister not agree that this delay and the lack of information in the papers already tabled, as the Auditor General pointed out, are because the minister has gone ahead with this reform blindly, just so that he can make the cuts required by the Minister of Finance?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, that may be the case but I just read a large scale national survey this week. It showed that 96 per cent of Canadians believe major changes have to be made in social policy. It may be that the hon. member does not understand but 96 per cent of Canadians are in favour of what we are doing.

GOVERNMENT SPENDING

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. It appears the industry strategy seems to be one of shuffling money around, not reduction in spending. Yet this morning the Minister of Industry stated on "Canada A.M." that his departmental budget would be reduced by as much as 50 per cent by the end of the third year. That is two years from now or less than that.

Can the minister tell us specifically what will be cut?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will not disclose that. As the member knows we are involved in an ongoing process of program review which is in effect, as the Prime Minister announced in September in Quebec City, a basic review of each and every program in every department and agency of the Government of Canada from bottom up.

I believe this review is important. It is a vital part of our own plan in order to achieve our objective of reaching 3 per cent of GDP as the level of the deficit by the third year of the mandate. In the industry department we are prepared to make the changes that, as the member indicates, will result in an overall budget decrease of almost 50 per cent by the third year of the mandate.

• (1435)

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the answer I expected the minister to give.

I think it is about time that we get down to some specifics rather than these generalizations. It has been very clear that Canadian business has said the best way for government to create a competitive environment is to reduce taxes. Yet there is no such statement in the industrial strategy.

Why will the minister not make a definitive commitment to reducing taxes?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, because one of the happiest days of my life so far was the day I was told I was not Minister of Finance.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

On September 19, here on Parliament Hill, the minister promised Ogilvie Mills workers that, by December, he would table amendments to the Canada Labour Code, introducing anti–scab provisions. Yesterday, the minister reneged on his promise, giving as a pretext that his department was preparing another bill on pay equity.

How can the minister justify his about–face regarding the need to introduce anti–scab provisions in the Canada Labour Code? How can he justify his about–face, except by an obvious lack of political courage?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, no, it just means that we are doing a very thorough job of consulting with business, labour unions and other parties that would be affected. We are trying to do a major rewrite of labour codes. I have assigned the assistant deputy minister for labour to undertake that process. He is busily engaged at the present time reviewing the various aspects and a fairly broad based set of proposals. As soon as that is ready we will present the appropriate legislation to the House of Commons.

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister justify his refusal to table a bill before Christmas by saying that there is not enough time, when all that is required is a few amendments to the Canada Labour Code?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that it is not as easy as that. Certainly our experience over the last several months is that when we table amendments the members opposite usually hold up that legislation for weeks and months on end.

I have asked our assistant deputy minister to make sure that we have a very carefully assessed, very carefully judged set of reforms and proposals to make to the labour code.

As the Minister of Industry put in his paper today, the reform of the workplace, reform and modernizing our whole labour relations is the key to economic growth and development. Therefore we want to make sure that we do it right.

The Speaker: I would encourage all of us to listen to both the questions and the answers. It takes time to both pose and answer but I would ask you to curtail both the questions and the answers.

SMALL BUSINESS LOANS

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government is reported to be increasing the total value of loans it guarantees under the Small Businesses Loans Act to $12 billion, an increase of 300 per cent. The program now loses about $100 million a year.

Would the Minister of Industry tell the House why taxpayers should underwrite Canadian banks by assuming liabilities that should properly fall to entrepreneurs and banks, not taxpayers?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there are really two questions there. The first one is why should there be a Small Businesses Loans Act program in the first place. The answer to that is very simply that the primary reason for getting loan capital to many small businesses is to provide some government guarantee, thereby offsetting the fact that many small businesses lack the security they require in order to otherwise borrow from the banks.

• (1440)

In answer to the question about subsidies, I would like to assure the hon. member that we are proposing changes to the SBLA program and further review which will move that program to one which is fully cost recoverable because I agree with him that it should not be an indirect subsidy to the banks.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the business community and banks cannot be blamed for taking advantage of government largess. If we are dumb enough to give it to them they are going to be smart enough to take it. We have to put a stop to it.

We do not have a revenue problem in our country. To paraphrase a colloquialism, which is not intended to anybody in this House certainly, it is government spending stupid that we have to get under control. It is those three or four words.

The business community has time and time again told the government to reduce the tax burden on business and individuals. What specific measure has the Minister of Industry taken that will reduce government spending which will in turn reduce government borrowing which will in turn reduce interest rates and taxes?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that I am sure the member will agree with the thrust of the document which we will be tabling today. It does recognize the fact that the key to continued economic growth and job creation is going to be the private sector and that it is important for government to do as much as it can to stay out of the way of the growth and job creation potential of the private sector.

That is how we intend to move the economy forward so that as the cycles go up and down overall we see a general gain in employment levels as well as in productivity and the economy. That is the key to it.

Do we need to reduce spending? Yes, we need to reduce spending. That was the purpose behind the consultation process that my colleague, the Minister of Finance, launched in this House and in the finance committee a few weeks ago. It is toward that end that we will be working in this February's budget.

BOVINE SOMATOTROPIN

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

The Director of the Bureau of Veterinary Drugs at Health Canada, who is currently on leave without pay, is lobbying MPs, on behalf of a group of private drug companies, regarding the virtues of bovine somatotropin.

Does the minister realize that this paradoxical situation in which her department finds itself, with a senior civil servant responsible for the Bureau of Veterinary Drugs now acting as a lobbyist for drug companies interested in marketing somatotropin?

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the person in question is on leave of absence without pay and as such has not been involved at all on the file having to do with BST.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister realize that such leniency in dealing with this unacceptable situation completely destroys the credibility of Health Canada with the public and with the dairy industry, as well as her own credibility as minister responsible?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I already said, the person in question is on leave of absence without pay, is employed by another centre at this time, is not speaking for Health Canada and has not been involved in the BST file.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Raymond Lavigne (Verdun—Saint-Paul, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Most of my constituents are very pleased with the numerous signs of economic recovery, including the slide in the unemployment rate. Many, however, especially young people and women, remain concerned about their future. What steps does the minister intend to take to ensure that the benefits of this recovery are enjoyed equally by all Canadians.

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as members will recall, last spring we introduced a major program for youth employment which sponsored in particular major internship programs in which we would work with the private sector and educational institutions to sponsor on the job training programs for young people.

• (1445)

Up to this point the program has only been working for four or five months. Already close to 10,000 young people have enrolled through private sector arrangements to help them with that major problem of school to work transition. It is our aim by next year to have close to 60,000 young people enrolled.

I believe the new wave of the future is to bring business, government and education into partnership to provide better opportunities for Canadian youths.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry.

Business leaders and academics and most recently the Globe and Mail have called for the end of regional development agencies across the country. The Minister of Industry has one industrial strategy yet other ministers have another strategy.

How does the Minister of Industry explain the obvious contradictory messages being sent out? While he says that regional development programs do not work, his colleagues are handing out over a billion dollars a year to repeat defaulters, huge corporations that do not need the money, lobby groups and friends of ministers. Which one of these incompatible ministers are we supposed to understand?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, not only have I not made the statement the member alludes to but I would say to him that he has made a startling allegation and it is incumbent upon him to provide facts, dates, numbers and names. We will be happy to look at them.

Let me say also that a key component of an economic development strategy has to be one that recognizes the differences that exist among and between the regions of this country. We have a very large country with quite a varied economy.

The role played by the federal government in understanding the differences among regions, in meeting the needs and requirements of sectors as diverse as those in natural resources as well as those in the manufacturing and new advanced technology sectors is one which requires a great deal of co–ordination across government. That is what we are endeavouring to do.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I could have retracted one statement because these people do not have too many friends.

We are releasing a report this week on regional development which showcases the government assisted gravy train which is off the tracks.

The Minister of Industry is on record as opposing massive grants and subsidies to businesses. Therefore, what assurance can he give the business community and Canadian taxpayers that he will fight the difficult decision among the ministers of goodies who have two different messages coming out, one from two ministers of goodies and another from the Minister of Industry?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let us try to keep some perspective on what we are trying to accomplish here.

The member will know the concern I have about assistance to business is that it be very strategic in target. That is in line with the strategy other ministers who have responsibility for economic development are pursuing.

As the member will know, we need to make sure our investment in economic development is strategic. It is targeted and focused. It recognizes the need to recognize those sectors in which high risks are prominent, in which other countries are providing assistance to their businesses, in which the markets for goods and services being produced are international and therefore subject to the discipline of international marketplaces.

Those are criteria that apply to regions. Those are criteria that apply to sectors. We have been very consistent in seeking to put our assistance to business programs on that kind of footing.

SITUATION IN BOSNIA

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence.

Yesterday in Budapest, the Minister of Foreign Affairs said that we should give the search for peace in the former Yugoslavia a last chance and that he used the expression "last chance" because he thought an agreement was not far off. Meanwhile, the Bosnian Serbs still refuse to listen to reason and accept the peace plan proposed by the majorpowers, including the United States and Russia.

• (1450)

Could the Minister of Defence tell us what grounds his colleague at Foreign Affairs has for being so optimistic, at a time when the Bosnian Serbs still refuse to accept the peace plan proposed by the contact group?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in Budapest the Minister of Foreign Affairs was stating the obvious and I believe a position all Canadians would support. That is that this country believes the only way out of the terrible tragedy which is unfolding in the former Yugoslavia is through a negotiated settlement.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs was expressing that optimism. I hope the hon. member shares it. If he does not I would like to hear the alternative from him.

[Translation]

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we would love to share the optimism of the Minister of Foreign Affairs. Could the Minister of Defence indicate what the Canadian government intends to suggest at the meetings of the CSCE that would help revive negotiations and lead the Bosnian Serbs to finally accept the proposed peace plan?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this morning, the Prime Minister himself stated the importance of a negotiated peace. There is also the fact that at this very moment, 55 Canadians are still being detained in Bosnia, and I think that, following the release of 53 Dutch and British soldiers, we first want to ensure the release of our soldiers over there.

That being said, their release is expected to be imminent, and the pressure is being kept up at all levels, including the CSCE, the UN forces and all international means, as the Prime Minister did this morning.

WESTERN ECONOMIC DIVERSIFICATION

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry.

The Department of Western Economic Diversification has loaned $670 million to companies in the four western provinces since the Tories invented the department. Only about 25 per cent of those loans are currently being repaid. Many experts predict that the default rate will be in the 40 per cent range.

Given that the minister has publicly stated he is not in favour of massive subsidies and that he said earlier today that he favours private sector development, is he prepared to admit that regional development programs are not effective ways of enhancing Canada's economy?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say to the hon. member that both his facts and his assessment are wrong.

We have made major changes in western economic development so that we are not giving large grants to large businesses. We are now providing basic assistance to firms with under 50 employees so that we can help them deal with some of the challenges in the export market, such as meeting quality testing and other kinds of requirements.

I will give one example. A few months ago we were able to assist with a very small grant of $200,000 the Vancouver based firm Northstar which allowed it to secure a $30 million line of credit with one of Canada's major banks so that the firm could provide export financing for small business. Since then the firm has already had 2,000 applications for financing of small business export development around the world.

It seems to me that was one very good investment that will help thousands of western Canadian companies secure new markets. The hon. member should get his facts straight.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, speaking about facts, perhaps the minister could get his facts straight. One good investment out of $1.2 billion worth of regional funds is not good enough in this country.

Since the Minister of Industry will not answer the question, my supplemental is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. There is a world of difference between entrepreneurs taking risks with their own money and taking risks with other people's money, especially when it is the taxpayers who will have to pay the interest on the borrowed funds and the defaulting loans.

What does the minister consider as an acceptable level of risk from his Department of Western Economic Diversification as it continues to flush taxpayers' money down the drain? Where is the rest of the justification on the $1.2 billion?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member knew anything about the way the program worked rather than just repeating a bunch of mythology and garbage he has heard from other people he would realize that most of the money is coming back by repayable contributions. Western economic development recycles money back into business so we can create jobs. I understand the Reform Party is not interested in jobs, it is not interested in employment and it sure as hell is not interested in western Canada. I can tell you that.

TRADE

Ms. Paddy Torsney (Burlington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister for International Trade has pushed very hard for Chile to join NAFTA. He visited Chile last January and he has made numerous speeches on the subject.

Can the minister explain why he believes it is in Canada's interests to have Chile join a free trade agreement?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the question is entirely topical in that we do hope to make some real progress on the accession of Chile to NAFTA at the Miami summit of the western hemisphere later this week.

There are three reasons. Principally while we urge and have continued to take a lead in urging the early accession of Chile to NAFTA, one is that Canada is a principal investor in Chile. We have already promised a $4 billion plus investment in Chile. The second reason is we want to counter the confusing network of trade rules that are becoming a problem for members of our business community as they develop their trade in the western hemisphere. The third reason is that we are in favour of open markets, market liberalization throughout the world and the step toward the integration of Chile in NAFTA—

BLOOD SUPPLY SYSTEM

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health. On December 1, important elements in the report of the expert advisory committee on the safety of Canada's blood supply system were leaked to and disclosed by the media.

How can the minister explain to us, as mentioned in the report of the expert committee, the blatant lack of rigour in Health Canada's Bureau of Biologics, which has the huge responsibility of checking the quality of blood products and facilities at all 17 transfusion centres of the Canadian Red Cross Society?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as you can appreciate, this is a very sensitive subject. This report is in the hands of the Krever Commission. I will not comment on this until the commission has held public hearings on this issue.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on Friday the results of the Canadian Wheat Board advisory elections were made public. It is not a surprise that less than 40 per cent of farmers turned out to vote for these largely symbolic positions. It is a surprise that leading up to this election Lorne Hehn, the chief commissioner for the Canadian Wheat Board, campaigned actively for a group of candidates who had a specific political agenda.

Does the minister of agriculture condone the fact that the chief commissioner who is supposed to be politically neutral campaigned actively during the advisory committee elections?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge the chief commissioner and a number of the commissioners of the Canadian Wheat Board participated in public meetings during the fall. They discussed a broad variety of aspects pertaining to the marketing of western Canadian grain. To the best of my knowledge they were not actively involved in any campaign with respect to the election of the advisory committee to the Canadian Wheat Board. If the hon. member has any information to the contrary I would be happy to have it.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the same minister who has had a chance now to analyse the results of that same advisory committee election which demonstrated overwhelming support for pro–wheat board candidates.

Since the sole support for dual marketing and the subsequent weakening of the board's powers is clearly seen to be limited to a small minority special interest group, what action will he take to protect and reinforce the ability of the board to act in the best interests of the vast majority of producers who support the board?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated on a number of occasions that I will be providing the opportunity this winter for farmers to become engaged in a discussion about the marketing systems that they regard to be most appropriate and in their interest.

In the course of that kind of objective, reasonable, rationale dialogue, the respective merits of certain marketing systems will become obvious. I would imagine under the close scrutiny that public dialogue and examination gives, the Canadian Wheat Board will be able to demonstrate its merits very effectively.

TRADE

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for Agriculture and Agri–Food, Fisheries and Oceans.

The Prime Minister's recent trip to China secured trade opportunities and created wealth for our country. On the heels of this success, can the secretary of state tell the House what is being done and what will be done to promote Canada's fishing products in the far east?

[Translation]

Hon. Fernand Robichaud (Secretary of State (Agriculture and Agri–Food, Fisheries and Oceans), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my colleague was certainly inspired by the Holy Spirit, since her question is quite timely.

[English]

I will have the honour of leading a Canadian delegation to China for the first ever China Fish Processing Expo on December 10–15.

Nineteen executives, representing 11 Canadian companies, will be participating in an attempt to forge closer links with the Chinese fishing industry and also explore business opportunities.

Furthermore, of 15 booths made available to participants outside China, 10 have been reserved for Canadian companies at that Expo. It goes without saying that Canadian participation is in keeping with the new spirit of closer ties between China—

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to certain petitions.

THE ECONOMY

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 32(2), I am tabling a document, in both official languages, entitled "Building a more Innovative Economy".

I will have remarks to make apropos this document.

JOB CREATION AND ECONOMIC GROWTH

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Madam Speaker, before beginning my speech, I would like to join the Deputy Prime Minister, who spoke earlier, in wishing the leader of the opposition and his family a lot of courage on his way to recovery.

Today on behalf of my Cabinet colleagues, I am putting forward the next key part of the government's jobs and growth agenda. This plan introduces over 30 concrete measures involving ten Ministers and their departments "to help create a climate where business can create more jobs for Canadians", if I may quote the Prime Minister.

But before I turn to what we will do next, let us revisit where we were just over a year ago when this government took office.

[English]

We were faced with an unemployment rate when we took office of 11 per cent. Business confidence was volatile and consumer confidence was very low. After two years of a half–hearted jobless recovery, fewer Canadians were working and the economy was producing fewer goods and services than at the beginning of the decade.

As a government our first order of business was to work with other levels of government and the private sector to get the recovery moving. Our first weeks in office were characterized by decisive action, including the launching of the national infrastructure program. The reward for leadership and action has been a continuing rise in confidence and improvement in the overall economic conditions of the country.

Most important of all, more Canadians have jobs. Since taking office 414,000 jobs have been created by Canadians for Canadians. Only a year ago people were talking about unemployment rates in excess of 10 per cent to the year 2000. As of last Friday we broke the 10 per cent barrier and Canada's unemployment rate stands at 9.6 per cent. But the government believes it has to do better than just recover from the last recession.

The cycles of recession and recovery over the last three decades have shown some disturbing trends. Decade over decade average unemployment rates have risen, productivity growth has fallen and with it real incomes of Canadians have stagnated.

[Translation]

The time has come to reverse these trends. The time has come to get average unemployment rates down permanently. The time has come to increase productivity, thereby increasing real incomes. But you cannot do this simply by wishing or declaring it to be so. What is required is decisive action by government, wise investment by business and labour, and a new model of co–operation and partnership.

[English]

The government is taking decisive action. That is why we have launched a root and branch review of our social programs. That is why the Minister of Finance has set out a new framework for economic policy. That is why we are reviewing every program in every department and agency of the federal government. That is why the government is committed to reducing the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP, come hell or high water. That is why I am introducing Building a More Innovative Economy.

At the outset let me say that this plan will disappoint some. It will disappoint those who believe that government can and should do everything. That approach defined the success of economic programs by bigger budgets, not better government. That is an approach I reject.

This plan will also disappoint those who believe that the best thing government can do is nothing. That is not our view. We believe that economic leadership by government can contribute to economic success.

The fundamental premise behind Building a More Innovative Economy is that it is the private sector, not government, that creates jobs. What government can do is to improve the climate for the private sector to create those jobs.

Where can good government make a difference? The first priority is building a healthier marketplace. Business needs better access to the financing required to help it grow. It needs a labour–management environment that is more co–operative, less adversarial. It needs fewer and more focused government programs. It needs regulations that makes sense. It needs fewer demands from government to fill out forms and shuffle paper.

Tomorrow the President of the Treasury Board will announce the details of our plans for regulatory reform and paper burden reduction. We will use the power of government purchasing as a strategic tool for small and aboriginal business development and growth. My colleague, the Minister of Public Works and Government Services, will soon announce the details of this initiative.

Our second strategic priority is trade. The challenges here are crucial for all Canadians. For jobs, incomes and prosperity we depend more on trade than almost any other country does. Yet we are not the nation of traders that we could be.

That is why my first priority as Minister of Industry was to achieve Canada's first internal trade agreement—the beginning of a process that will bring down interprovincial trade barriers.

And that is why in the early days of its mandate, the government moved quickly and decisively to improve Canada's international trading arrangements both in North America and elsewhere in the world.

[English]

That is also why the Prime Minister has made international trade a personal priority. The recent Team Canada trip to China was an unprecedented success, showing how Canada can succeed in global markets when we work together. We will build on this momentum.

This plan introduces a variety of steps we will take to improve Canada's trading performance. For example, my colleague, the Minister for International Trade, will introduce measures to help develop globally minded businesses. Our challenge as a government is to equip more and more Canadian firms to win in the fiercely competitive international marketplace.

[Translation]

We will focus on support to small businesses that are entering export markets for the first time and target resources for exporter preparation.

We will improve export financing measures.

Taken together, these measures will quickly enable more Canadian firms to meet the challenge of international trade.

Also, a large component of our balance of trade accounts is in tourism. Tourism is big business in Canada and, for the last ten years, we have done a pathetic job promoting ourselves to the rest of the world. That is why last year, Canada suffered a travel account deficit of almost $8 billion.

[English]

That is why the Prime Minister announced we will be establishing a Canadian tourism commission to work with other governments and the tourism industry to be more aggressive in marketing Canada as a safe, beautiful and sophisticated destination, meeting the needs of almost every traveller.

• (1515)

Our third strategic priority is infrastructure, both physical and intellectual. This is an area of comparative advantage over which we have control. In this area the government is working on several fronts. The Minister of Transport is producing a new direction for transportation in Canada to meet the needs of the 21st century. The Canada infrastructure works program is well under way and will create a further 65,000 direct jobs.

Today I am announcing that the government will proceed with phase II of CANARIE, the Canadian network for the advancement of research, industry and education. This commitment will accelerate progress on the Canadian information highway.

In addition, I am announcing a continuation of the SchoolNet program which will see all of Canada's 16,500 schools and 3,400 libraries connected to the information highway by 1998, a full two years before the target set by vice–president Gore for the United States.

Our fourth strategic priority for building an innovative economy is science and technology.

[Translation]

In the world today, virtually all product innovation is science–based, the result of research and development. And nothing is more important than product innovation for businesses to maintain and improve market share, thus contributing to economic growth and productivity.

[English]

Therefore, nothing is more important for jobs. I believe that no one will dispute the importance of the federal government's role in science, technology, research and development. The need to be more strategic and to ensure that our investment in this area supports Canada's social, economic and environmental goals led to the launching of a comprehensive science and technology review last June.

This review is nearing completion and will set the stage for a clear articulation of a renewed science and technology strategy for Canada.

[Translation]

Building a more innovative economy lays out specific initiatives to do just that: build a more innovative economy. My plan is a series of over 30 initiatives involving ten ministers and their departments—a truly government–wide effort in responding to the challenges of economic leadership.

[English]

It is not a panacea. Panaceas do not exist. It is a co–ordinated plan of action, responsive to the real needs of the private sector, a result of consultation, a commitment to a work plan and the accountability that comes with it.

The challenge before us is clear, to push the limits of this recovery and to achieve real and sustained jobs and growth. We will not decree an innovative economy. That simply means we must work together to build one piece by piece. I believe we can do that by acting together, by focusing on real results and by targeting our programs and reducing our spending to meet our deficit commitment.

We said in the red book: "Dynamic economies constantly re–invent themselves and grow through innovation. Innovation and experimentation inevitably entail risk and the possibility of failure. It is the job of government not to protect entrepreneurs against all failure but rather to create the best economic conditions and institutions to allow entrepreneurs to get on with the job".

Building a more innovative economy is a plan of action to implement this vision.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Madam Speaker, I would like to react today to the tabling of the industry minister's policy statement for his department.

Although this document has some good points, as we admit, we can only see it as a political document that seeks to make up for a non–existent substantive industrial policy; we were entitled to expect a substantive policy, given the state of the Canadian economy.

The statement refers to a plan of action for some thirty programs involving co–operation among ten or so departments. We already know that for some aspects of the announced action plan, some ministers will work together and we will only see the results in 1998, according to information we obtained for parts of the document. Some plans will only take effect in 1995, if then, according to conversations I had with people in the department.

We therefore think that this paper is premature, since the proposed new policies depend on other departments' policies which are not yet known or will come, very late, from consultations that are still incomplete and program reviews that are a long time coming.

We know very well that several key documents on social programs have not yet been tabled. How can the minister boast that his policy takes into consideration all that businesses need to achieve the desired growth? For example, the action to be taken by the Department of Public Works will not be known until 1995.

The minister wants to promote growth for small businesses by opening up government procurement and allowing companies to have access to what is available in terms of such procurement. However, we have no idea of where this will come from, nor when the action plan will be completed.

In the context of that growth, how will this access to government procurement for small businesses work? Will companies be allowed to register in some file? Will there be calls for tenders for professional or technical services? How will this plan work? We do not know. For companies, growth does not mean the same as development. Indeed, the growth of some companies does not necessarily promote economic development for a territory or a region.

Given these unknowns, we find it hard to understand why the minister is so quick to extol the virtues of his action plan and say that it meets an urgent need in the economy, and particularly a desire to develop small businesses, which will generate employment as everybody agrees.

The strategy for technological innovation is another example of the government's lack of global vision. Indeed, the minister is considering a technological innovation policy without knowing the results of the current consultations on research and development, which will only be completed in 1995.

The minister talks about consulting with partners. However, when you think of the information highway issue raised by Quebec, it is very hard to see the minister showing leadership, since his government is totally opposed to any dialogue on this issue.

How can the minister justify the existence of a true technological innovation policy while putting on the back burner the whole issue of research and development? By definition, innovation implies the search for new products and processes, so that companies are competitive in the international market. Otherwise, we obviously cannot talk about competitive businesses.

In his action plan, the minister proposes three strategic priorities: Support for small businesses, infrastructure and technology. As far as support for small business is concerned, the minister reluctantly proposes to maintain funding support through the Small Businesses Loans Act program. I say reluctantly since it is only because this program is mentioned in the red book that the minister has decided to maintain it, although without implementing the red book promise to get rid of personal collateral.

The minister is announcing that available funds will be increased to $12 billion because this program gets results. In itself, this is good news.

This program is so popular that businesses register quickly. Small businesses are a well–known fact; they are dynamic, eager to innovate and expand. On the other hand, the minister is announcing that the program will have to be self–financing. This is what the government is seeking, to go and get back the money it loaned. I believe that to be its fundamental goal. In itself, it is laudable.

But if we compare that to what the Minister of Human Resources Development is suggesting when he says that access to credit will be made easier for students, we quickly understand the equation. To save public funds, the government is forcing individuals into debt. What is the impact of this on SMEs? Are they going to be pushed deeper into debt or will they really get help to start up or develop domestically or internationally?

Thus, without even conducting a cost–benefit analysis, which could have shown the efficiency of the program and indicated which policy was preferable with respect to tariffs, the minister is acting, in our view, as an amateur, increasing, without any consultation, the cost of financing SMEs. We can draw a parallel with the social reform whereby the government says that it will cut support to students, but they will be given the chance to go deeper into debt while the government sets up mechanisms to recover the loans it guaranteed.

I wonder whether this is a responsible way to behave for the government and especially the industry minister, in the present economic context. Although some people on the government side sometimes think we are the bad guys, I must congratulate the minister on announcing measures to reduce red tape.

Everybody is complaining and rightly so. Everybody agrees, every time you want to do something you have to fill out 16 different forms and send them all over. Therefore this is a good move by the government. Reducing red tape is something SMEs have been asking for for a long time in order to stop wasting time and resources. Imagine having to submit 119 pages of information to get $10,000. Finally we are giving SMEs what they have been asking for.

However, I would like to point out to the minister that we are here to promote a sovereign Quebec and I mentioned the information highway where the message to the minister was to open up to negotiation and co–operation. The minister did not open up, so I remind him that under our option, a level of government—the federal level—will disappear, thereby reducing red tape, inefficiencies and regulations often at cross purposes, making our industry much more efficient. This is a clear goal.

The government is continuously reminding us that we must create the atmosphere for growth in the high–technology sector. We agree. SMEs in that area represent the future of our industrial base. True, high–tech SMEs are creating the jobs of tomorrow and will be mainly responsible for our ability to maintain the high standard of living we need and must have.

It is therefore regrettable that the government would not propose any policy to stimulate their growth and, in particular, improve their financing. We must realize that these companies pursue speculative endeavours and have specific financing problems. Banks are seldom willing to finance technology and this brings me back to the role of government. It says it wants to recover its money, and it acts like a banker. We know what a bank does, it loans money when it is reasonably certain that it is secure. Precisely what the government is doing.

Yet, there are technological areas where risk is high. It is impossible to act like a banker in the sense that we cannot expect all the guarantees that a bank would normally require. That is obvious.

• (1530)

If we really want to encourage the development of these businesses, we must provide ways to find more appropriate funding for them. In our dissenting opinion to the report of the industry committee we proposed extending the Small Businesses Loans Act in order to fund the working capital of all businesses. This would have made it possible to support the financing of small and medium size high–tech enterprises. Instead, this government proposes a piecemeal strategy with a program that would only provide exclusively for the financing of exporting SMEs.

Even the Canadian Association of Exporters recommended to the industry committee—and I do not know if the minister has heard about it—that the working capital of exporting SMEs be financed under the act. The government does not listen to the people involved.

As for infrastructure, the minister praises the transport minister's policy. We have seen what has been going on in that area up to now and we are not at all heartened. If this is an indication of what this government intends to do about transportation, we should expect the worst.

We believe that the national policy on airports, among others, is nothing but a disguised way to pass on the cost of regional transportation to municipal and provincial governments. This process had begun under the previous government and we already see costs being passed on to other levels of government.

Furthermore, the federal government has the nerve—and this is important because they did it in several departments—to keep the revenue from the national network of airports and use it to finance regional airport infrastructure while disavowing any responsibility for their operating costs. This is how the federal government wants to manage public property and public funds throughout Canada.

This is what federalism is all about. This is it. The federal government keeps the power even though it cuts funds and totally withdraws from the administration of services. As we were told, it does not have any choice, it is debt–ridden. It will have no choice but to turn to the provinces for help, and will be unable to return the favour. The facts are really very simple. Everyone understands the situation.

The Minister of Transport is following a policy which jeopardizes some regional transportation facilities and will greatly increase the cost of transportation from region to region.

The information highway is the best example of the total lack of consultation and co–operation between the federal government and the provinces. As I said earlier, the minister is about to ask the CRTC to significantly change the regulations concerning telecommunications in order to facilitate the creation of this information highway, without even consulting the provinces. The information highway will have a major impact, as you know, on a great many areas, some under exclusive provincial jurisdiction.

In committee, we were very surprised to learn that the minister is going ahead with the information highway. But who will control the information to be found on this highway? Who will provide the information? One thing became clear in our discussions with officials from the Department of Industry, nobody has the answer to these questions. This issue has not been examined yet. It will be in the months to come. We are about to go ahead with the information highway without even making sure that its contents will be controlled and that there will be joint action with the provinces, which obviously have jurisdiction in this area.

Finally, I would like to address the issues of technology and R & D. The document tells us that Canada's effort in R & D is less than that of other G–7 countries. However, the Canadian government invests as much as its competitors in civilian R & D. This demonstrates how badly administered and inefficient the government's R & D effort is.

It is about time we thoroughly reviewed our involvment in R & D matters and adopted a true science policy for R & D. The government must be ready to question everything, to decentralize our technological efforts and to base our research laboratories outside Ottawa to take advantage of the scientific resources that are found across the country and make better use of them. This may create some synergy with the scientific research capabilities throughout Canada.

• (1535)

To conclude, the document tabled by the minister is nothing but an incomplete policy statement, which contains many policies already announced by his colleagues and others that will be announced by 1998. Thus, to be able to put Canada and Quebec back on the prosperity track, we have to consider—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. I will now recognize the hon. member for Okanagan–Centre.

[English]

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege and very exciting actually to be participating in response to the minister's statement. I think there were some very positive things said by the minister and I want to commend him for those kinds of things, particularly for the fact that he recognizes that there is a problem. The difficulty is that I am not quite so sure that he has a solution to the problem. This is where I think we have to focus our attention.

It is very interesting the way this particular paper has been presented to us. The first omission I find that really bothers me a lot is that there is no particular and no direct reference to the recommendations that were contained in the "Taking Care of Small Business" report by the Standing Committee on Industry.

There were many recommendations in that particular report that gave direct impetus to the kinds of strategic planning that ought to be done in the Department of Industry and in the government at large.

It became very clear during that particular discussion that there was a major gap in the recognition of the contribution that small business makes to the creation of jobs in Canada. It is true that there have been a number of new jobs created in Canada but for the government to take credit for this is not correct. The jobs were created by entrepreneurs and those people want to develop themselves.

I commend the particular suggestion that there is going to be a particular place for small businesses to enter into government procurement contracts, contracts that are $125,000 or less but larger than $25,000. It raises all kinds of interesting questions that my hon. colleague raised not so long ago when he spoke about a particular department other than the Department of Industry in which certain contracts were divided up into smaller components so that indeed they would not have to meet certain regulatory provisions.

Is this a possibility now that certain procurements may be made so that larger procurements will be broken up into $125,000 ones, or will that not be the case? Will others be combined? This not clear.

I want to pay particular attention to the Small Businesses Loans Act. That ceiling was increased from $4 billion to $12 billion. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business says that particular program is not working so well. This morning I heard the hon. minister say on Canada AM that small businesses liked it so much that they used it up right away, within 18 months of it having been increased.

The interesting thing is that banks have to a large extent used the SBLA to cover their particular risks, so that it became a subsidy to the banks. It is small wonder that with this kind of help the larger banks in Canada can show a combined profit of something like $4 billion. Is this the kind of thing that small business is supposed to be supporting, so that the big banks can make big profits like that? The Small Businesses Loans Act had no small contribution to that particular sector.

That is not all. The other part of this is that there seems to be a suggestion that subsidies and grants to businesses create jobs. I submit to you, Madam Speaker, and to the minister and to this House that is probably false, that in fact when you have a subsidy which may create a job over on this side, it loses a job over on the other side because this business over here has to pay larger taxes, has to pay increased interest rates in order to subsidize that particular business over there. That is misleading if nothing else.

There is another thing that happens when you do this sort of thing. You divert investment from those businesses that are solid to those businesses that have some kind of artificial government support and shoring up.

Business should be allowed to stand on its own feet. Where I commend the minister is where he says that the government should create an environment so that private businesses can succeed. I endorse that 100 per cent. I commend him for that statement. Now may he go ahead and prove that he believes that by taking away subsidies and grants for small business.

Much was made about trade and much was made about the imbalance in trade when it comes to tourism. There is a suggestion that some $100 million is going to be spent in the tourism industry, approximately $50 million for the setting up of a tourism commission, another $50 million from $15 million, so it is not quite the $50 million in addition, for a promotion budget that has been increased from $15 million to $50 million. That suggests more than a triple amount of dollars spent in promotion.

I ask the minister and the House whether they really believe that spending three times as much money will result in three times as many tourists coming to Canada and spending three times as much money than if that promotion budget were not there.

Madam Speaker, I suggest to you that there may be an increase but it will not be in direct proportion to the increase of public spending in that particular sector.

The minister said not too long ago and he states in his orange book that the solution is not in throwing dollars at a problem but rather to solve the problem. The best people to solve the problem are the entrepreneurs. They understand the business. They understand the marketplace. They know the value of the dollar. They know how to efficiently deploy those dollars. They know how to employ people. They know how to get good work out of people. Throwing dollars at the problem is not the answer. We need to recognize that applies in the tourism industry as well as in every other industry.

There has been a suggestion that the infrastructure program is a major innovative development in this particular strategic document that has been presented to the House. The infrastructure program that currently exists, I believe it is $6 billion on the one side and that is going to be matched by the provincial government and the municipal government, is a beautiful pot of money. It has become known in many quarters as boccie Canada, and builds boccie courts.

The infrastructure program needs to be recognized for what it is. It is a program that benefits particular places. I want to really commend the British Columbia government. So far I know of no instance, and there may be some since I last looked at the list, when the money has not been spent on bona fide infrastructure programs such as highways, bridges, water systems, sewer systems, things of that sort. That is significant but building boccie courts is not. Building canoe museums is not. These are the kinds of things.

I want to move into another area which has to do with the science and technology program. We have had a review this spring of the science and technology program all across Canada and we had the hon. secretary of state go across Canada holding various discussions with business people, interest groups, looking at what should be done in this particular area.

Three things became very clear. When they put together the summary forum which took place here in Ottawa in mid–October they came up with a bunch of round tables with some very high powered, highly trained, highly developed and intelligent people who made some beautiful statements. When I examine those particular conclusions and compare them with conclusions of 1940, 56 years ago, there are in many instances very few substantive differences between the problems articulated today and the problems articulated some 50 years ago.

When a noted journalist put things together and compared the two he recognized, in particular when it came to the industrial application of the technological and scientific studies and R and D research that had been done primarily through government funding, that the minimal effect was industrial application.

Some $6 billion is being spent in that area plus $1 billion being spent on tax credits. That is a total of $7 billion. In this fall's statement the Auditor General said that we were not getting an effective resolution and application of those dollars. We were not getting the kinds of results we should be getting.

The time has come for us to do some new thinking, not to go through the old thinking and do it all over again. We know what the problem is. It is time we build a new innovative economy that provides for the private entrepreneur the ability to make money and to give everybody jobs.

PICTOU LANDING INDIAN BAND AGREEMENT ACT

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–60, an act respecting an agreement between Her Majesty in right of Canada and the Pictou Landing Indian Band.

AGRICULTURE AND AGRI–FOOD ADMINISTRATIVE MONETARY PENALTIES ACT

Hon. Ron Irwin (for the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–61, an act to establish a system of administrative monetary penalties for the enforcement of the Canada Agricultural Products Act, the Feeds Act, the Fertilizers Act, the Health of Animals Act and the Meat Inspection Act, the Pest Control Products Act, the Plant Protection Act and the Seeds Act.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–293, an act to amend the Criminal Code (use of a firearm in the commission of or attempt at an offence).

He said: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague from Fraser Valley West for seconding introduction and first reading of the bill.

Today it is my pleasure to introduce the bill to the House. It will increase the minimum mandatory sentence for the use of a gun in the commission of a crime to five years.

Canadians are demanding stiffer sentences for the criminal misuse of firearms but the recently proposed four–year mandatory sentence of the justice minister is only restricted to 10 offences and is not consecutive.

He is merely introducing a minimum sentence for four years for these crimes, and with parole it may be less. Although the tougher sentences in his reaction plan are a step in the right direction the bill would go even further. It would make the minimum five–year sentence consecutive to any other sentence and would apply to any accomplices who had access to the firearm during the crime or attempted crime whether or not the gun was fired.

Canadians want deterrents and I believe the bill would provide some.

PETITIONS

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am honoured to present a petition on behalf of Susan MacDonell and 59 other Albertans, many of whom are my constituents.

The petitioners request that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Charter of Rights and Freedoms to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

Not only am I pleased to present the petition but I endorse it as well.

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Rose–Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have the honour and privilege to table to two petitions signed by the constituents of Lambton—Middlesex, pursuant to Standing Order 36 and duly certified by the clerk of petitions.

In the first the petitioners are concerned about the future of VIA Rail passenger service in southwestern Ontario and call upon Parliament to urge the government to place a moratorium on any passenger rail cuts in the Sarnia–Toronto corridor.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Rose–Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Madam Speaker, in the second petition the petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

VOICE BOXES

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Madam Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I give my support to two senior citizens' clubs in the beautiful riding of Frontenac, namely the Saint–Alphonse and the Saint–Maurice clubs in Thetford, which are opposed to the uncontrolled use of voice mail.

Since senior citizens are naturally more intimidated by voice mail technology and have a right to expect proper service, especially for enquiries concerning income security payments, we ask the Liberal government not to use voice mail for senior citizens.

I fully support the Saint–Alphonse and Saint–Maurice senior citizens' clubs from Thetford Mines.

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions that I have the pleasure of putting forth this afternoon. One petition deals with gun control.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition in opposition to euthanasia or person assisted suicide.

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition in support of the Canadian Wheat Board.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition in opposition to same sex couple benefits.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have several petitions I would like to enter, the first dealing with sexual orientation.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including the amending of the Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation. There are 304 signatures.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions dealing with the topic of euthanasia, one with 242 signatures and the other with 93.

The petitioners pray that Parliament ensures the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament makes no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Madam Speaker the third petition deals with the sanctity of human life. There are 305 signatures from my riding.

The petitioners pray that Parliament acts immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

• (1555)

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the last petition deals with immigration levels. It has 128 signatures from various parts of the country.

The petitioners pray and call upon Parliament to reduce immigration to the previous average level of one–half of 1 per cent of the population, or about 150,000 per year, with the basic intake of not less than 50 per cent of the total composed of carefully selected skilled workers required by the Canadian economy and to bring our refugee acceptance rate in line with the average of other asylum destination countries.

I heartily agree with all petitions.

LIGHT STATIONS

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 it is my duty and honour to rise in the House to present a petition, duly certified by the clerk of petitions, on behalf of the constituents of Saanich—Gulf Islands.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to immediately revoke the directive from the Minister of Transport that proceeds with a detailed plan for a program of unmanning all west coast light stations and request a complete and thorough public inquiry in the province of British Columbia into the need for these manned light stations on the west coast.

EUTHANASIA AND ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to table in the House two petitions.

The first petition asks that Parliament ensures that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament makes no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

I concur with the petition.

JAPANESE CANADIANS

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have a second petition that respectfully requests that Parliament acknowledges, through compensation under a redress agreement, an injustice did occur when Canadians of Japanese ancestry who happened to be in Japan on December 7, 1941, were denied by the actions of the Government of Canada the right to return home until March 31, 1949.

JUSTICE

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am pleased to present the following petition which comes from all across Canada and contains 244 signatures.

The undersigned request that in memory of Dawn Shaw, a six–year old girl who was murdered in my riding of Comox—Alberni, this petition be brought to the attention of Parliament. The petitioners request that Parliament enact legislation to change the justice system to provide greater protection for children from sexual assault and to assure conviction of offenders.

I fully concur with the petitioners and endorse the petition.

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have a petition from more than 40 people living in the city and county of Peterborough.

The undersigned consider the present gun control legislation in Canada to be more than adequate. Therefore the petitioners humbly pray and call upon the Parliament of Canada to refrain from any further gun control legislation in the name of controlling crime that would be of no value and would constitute unjust harassment of a lawful gun owners.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is my duty to present two petitions from citizens of Oxford.

The first one is signed by 25 petitioners and requests that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to legalize, normalize or indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

LAP DANCING

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.): The second petition, Madam Speaker, is from 156 constituents. They request Parliament to ban lap dancing as understood, as such activity poses a potential fatal health risk. It may be compared to prostitution.

Exotic dancers may have to lap dance against their will or lose their chosen profession. Lap dancing devalues the essential worth and dignity of all people.

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am presenting six petitions from my constituents in the riding of Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe.

The first two petitions containing 120 and 467 signatures respectively call upon the government to amend the Criminal Code to extend to unborn children the same protection enjoyed by born human beings.

• (1600)

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): The third petition contains 121 signatures and calls upon the government not to amend the human rights code in relation to the recognition of same sex relationships.

PARLIAMENTARY PRAYER

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): The fourth petition contains 59 signatures and calls upon Parliament to conclude the parliamentary prayer with the phrase "through Jesus Christ, our Lord. Amen" and reinstate the Lord's Prayer at the conclusion of the opening prayer.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Murray Calder (Wellington—Grey—Dufferin—Simcoe, Lib.): The fifth and sixth petitions contain 121 and 362 signatures respectively and call upon the government to ensure that the present provisions in the Criminal Code with respect to assisted suicides be enforced vigorously and make no changes to the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Shall all the questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I wish to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 33(2), because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 40 minutes.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–56, an act to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment act, as reported (with amendments) from the committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): There are four amendment motions on the Notice Paper for report stage of Bill C–56, an Act to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 will be grouped for debate but voted on as follows: Motion No. 1 will be voted on separately. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 2 obviates the necessity of the question being put on Motion No. 3.

On the other hand, a negative vote on Motion No. 2 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 3.

[Translation]

Motion No. 4 will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

I shall now propose Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 to the House.

MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C–56, in Clause 1, be amended by adding after line 11, on page 1, the following:

"(b.2) to ensure that projects likely to cause significant adverse environmental effects or public concern are publicly reviewed through a process of independent decision making."

That Bill C–56 in Clause 3, be amended by replacing lines 18 to 33, on page 2, with the following:

"(1.1) Where a report is submitted by a mediator or review panel, the responsible authority shall take a course of action consistent with the findings and recommendations in the report.

(1.2) Within 30 days of the public release of a report mentioned in subsection (1.1), the Governor in Council may, for the purpose of dealing with any or all of the findings or recommendations set out in the report

(a) require the mediator or review panel to clarify any of the findings or recommendations set out in the report; and

(b) substitute its own findings and recommendations for those of the report where it concludes that the findings or recommendations of the report are not in the public interest.

(1.3) Following a decision by the Governor in Council under subsection (1.2), the responsible authority shall take a course of action under subsection (1) that is consistent with the decision of the Governor in Council."

• (1605)

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.) moved:

Motion No. 3

(a) by replacing line 22 on page 2, with the following:

"approval of the Governor in Council given by order in council, re–"; and

"(1.2) The order in council made under paragraph (1.1)(a) is exempt from the application of sections 3, 5 and 11 of the Statutory Instruments Act."

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I am pleased today to rise to speak on the amendments, some of which I brought forward and one of which has been brought forward by a member of the Reform Party.

The amendment process of Bill C–56 that is in front of us today will give us a good indication of the seriousness with which the government wishes to approach the process of developing the best environmental assessment legislation that we possibly can.

A lot of testimony was heard before the committee studying the bill. Among that testimony were many clauses of the original bill that are not discussed under Bill C–56 today but are matters which require attention in any case. I am hoping that we will have some opportunity in the future to address some of the additional concerns that we are unable to deal with in this bill.

Also among the testimony of the witnesses before the committee were matters relating to the concept of an independent decision–making process. That is what the first amendments I proposed today deal directly with. First, these amendments ensure that the concept of independent decision–making is included in the section outlining the purposes of the act to make things perfectly clear. Second, they ensure that the decisions are consistent with the recommendations of the assessment panel and are treated seriously by giving the necessary authority to the responsible authorities.

The concept is not a new one. It is one that has already been recognized by the Liberal Party which, prior to being elected, made certain promises to the Canadian people in regard to the environment. These promises contained in the now famous red book include the following: "Under a Liberal government the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will be amended to shift decision–making powers to an independent Canadian environmental assessment agency subject to appeal to cabinet".

In Bill C–56 the only amendments the Liberals have brought forward to the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act fail to create this independent decision–making body. In fact one could argue that they do almost the opposite because the government bill amends the act to give cabinet, referred to as the governor in council, the ability to amend the panel reports and then gives it the final say on the panel report. Certainly cabinet cannot be considered an independent decision–making agency.

There are all too many examples where government departments and even ministers are the proponents of projects which would sooner see the recommendations of an independent assessment panel disappear than have them implemented. The possible conflict of interest with cabinet or between federal and provincial governments is altogether far too likely to go unaddressed.

On the other hand it is important to recognize that elected governments must be held accountable for their actions and they must be given the power to act when the interests of the electorate, the Canadian people, the citizens of Canada, need protecting.

I recognize that at the end of the day the government is responsible for its actions or the actions of those operating in its name.

Therefore in writing the amendment before us I have tried to establish the framework for independent decision–making, that is establishing the independence of the assessment panel.

• (1610)

At the same time, I want to express my support for the concept of an appeal of this decision to cabinet. I tried to incorporate the idea of appeal into my amendment but it was ruled out of order by the legislative counsel before it appeared on the Order Paper. Therefore I had to rewrite my amendment in a way that would fit the needs of the legislative counsel rather than the needs that I really wanted to bring forward here today.

I was told that the idea of an appeal to cabinet was not consistent with the government's intent in Bill C–56, but I want the government to realize that although my amendments do not specifically allow for the appeal to cabinet of a panel decision or of a cabinet decision, I am willing to accept an amendment in the future, another bill that the government may wish to bring forward.

I am willing to accept an amendment that would incorporate an informal appeal process. It would be easy to do with reference to the fact that any person who participated in a mediation or a panel review in respect of a project could appeal to the governor in council any or all of the findings or recommendations set out in the report.

I want to make clear that accepting my recommendations today does not preclude a further amendment by government in the future to ensure that the appeal process exists and to give the protection that the government may think is necessary by government.

In the meantime, it is absolutely imperative that the legislation ensure the independence of the process. I think only the support of my motions today would ensure that. It is worth noting that the concept of independent decision–making is already accepted and practised in other areas of federal government activity.

Perhaps the best known example of the process, although it is somewhat different, there are similarities, exists within the mandate of the CRTC. It exists basically at arm's length from government. It issues orders that are basically binding on those applications that have been made before it.

However, there is an appeal process of sorts that allows the cabinet to make decisions on appeal. In the testimony heard during the committee study of the bill before us, officials from the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office, FEARO, admitted that the current process requires that every decision of an assessment panel is not actually final until such time as the cabinet responds to it.

They also admitted that cabinet is not required to respond within any specific period of time. Therefore it is fairly easy to say that cabinet could take an infinite amount of time to respond to any report or any recommendations contained in a report from an assessment panel or from a mediation review.

We are already aware that cabinet, when it is not supportive of a panel decision or indeed parliamentary decisions, and I give the example of Bill C–13, the legislation that required more than two years to be proclaimed because of arguments received in cabinet over the regulations, as an example of how cabinet can delay matters for a long period of time.

Actually, the Indian lands claims process is also one in which cabinet has indicated that it is prepared to take its time on reviewing a decision that it is not altogether happy with. The Indian Land Claims Commission reported two years ago on the Canoe Lake Indian Band claim regarding the Cold Lake air weapons range. Cabinet is still sitting almost two years without responding to that recommendation of the commission.

We cannot allow that sort of a timeframe to elapse in regard to environmental assessment reports. Without going into any specific detail about how the two amendments that I have brought forward would work, let me simply conclude by saying that regardless of which path the cabinet wishes to take, the responsible authority is required within a short period of time to take a course of action consistent with the recommendations of the panel and, second, cabinet, if it has found the panel authority not consistent with the public idea, does have an opportunity to respond but the idea of an appeal is not within this amendment.

Therefore, I would be very happy to hear what the government has to say about adding an appeal process to the motion I have put forward.

It is my submission that the bill fails to meet the test of an independent decision–making authority as promised by the government prior to the election. I urge support of the motions I brought forward to ensure that the independent decision–making authority exists within the new agency.

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to put forward Motion No. 3 to amend Bill C–56. This amendment addresses clause 3 of the bill which amends section 37 of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. My amendment changes the decision–making authority on environmental panel reports from cabinet to order in council. That is the basic meat of it, changing it from cabinet to order in council.

Prior to Bill C–56, the decision to act on or reject panel recommendations was made solely by the Minister of the Environment. Bill C–56 broadens the distribution of power to include the governor in council, which basically means cabinet. However, this is still not strong enough.

Although the spirit of the government's amendment is to ensure that responses to public panel recommendations are decided by cabinet, it must be clear that cabinet, or governor in council, does not refer to cabinet as a whole.

Cabinet remains undefined. It could mean full cabinet or it could refer to only a few ministers. Cabinet may be many things. Cabinet can be simple and informal or it can be formal in the way of an order in council. Cabinet has many versions. For example, there are inner cabinets, outer cabinets and committees of cabinet.

The term cabinet is far too loose. As it stands, important environmental decisions could be controlled by two or three ministers with their own agendas. To avoid this potentially divisive situation, an order in council involving the full cabinet is required to ensure that all interests are fairly represented. The interests of one particular region will then be balanced by the representation of ministers from regions all across the country.

To ensure that decision–making is democratic, panel recommendations must be approved or rejected through order in council which means the cabinet as a whole, not just two or three ministers. This amendment reduces the likelihood that environmental decisions will be subject to the whims of any individual minister as government as a whole is responsible for actions on panel recommendations.

The amendment addresses concerns brought forward by the Liberals regarding the environmental assessment process. The Liberal red book states: "The gap between rhetoric and action under Conservative rule has been most visible in the area of environmental assessment. All too often Conservatives have ignored the solid recommendations for environmental protection offered by public review panels".

As it stands there is nothing in the bill to prevent a few cabinet ministers from rejecting panel recommendations. What better way to ensure that recommendations for environmental protection, brought forward by public review panels, are fairly reviewed and justly responded to than to make sure that the decision–making power is held by cabinet as a whole, not two or three ministers. This amendment directly addresses those concerns by limiting the discretionary powers of ministers.

It is my hope that hon. members on the opposite side will give serious thought to this amendment before they cast their vote. This is a fair and just amendment that will ensure a more democratic and balanced process of environmental assessment. It ensures the interests of the environment and industry are protected and works in favour of the best interests of all Canadians to ensure the continued protection of our environment.

I now wish to respond briefly to the proposed amendments to Bill C–56 brought forward by the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake.

In Motion No. 1 the member proposes to amend clause 1 of Bill C–56 by adding a subclause that strengthens the intention of the bill to ensure that projects likely to cause significant adverse environmental effects or public concern are publicly reviewed through a process of independent decision–making.

The Liberal red book promises that: "Under a Liberal government, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will be amended to shift decision–making powers to an independent, Canadian environmental assessment agency subject to appeal by cabinet". Yet nowhere in the act or proposed amendments contained in the bill is such independent decision–making powers granted to the agency. As it stands, the current intent of the bill is in conflict with the promises contained in the red book. There is no process of independent decision–making granted to the agency in the bill.

As it stands, the agency provides for ministerial decision–making as Bill C–56 proposes to broaden decision–making to cabinet. However, there is nothing in the bill that allows for independent decision–making because recommendations are approved or rejected by cabinet. The agency attends the hearings, prepares its report and presents it to cabinet. Beyond that there are no powers granted to the agency. This proposed amendment will recognize the agency as an independent decision–making body.

I agree there are several advantages to having this agency at arm's length from the government, similar to the relationship of the CRTC and government, as proposed in the red book. This proposed amendment by the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake is in line with the Liberal red book and as such I would expect the government to honour its election commitments and include this amendment, which I support, into the act.

The member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake also proposed Bill C–56, clause 3, Motion No. 2 in the Order Paper, to make the panel or mediator reports binding to the governor in council. This proposed amendment requires the responsible authority to take a course of action consistent with the findings and recommendations in the panel report.

The amendment addresses the first amendment as it gives the agency independent decision–making powers. As I said earlier, I agree that the agency should have some independent decision–making powers. However, the proposed amendment would give the agency absolutely authority over decisions. There are some merits as well as some concerns with this proposal.

One aspect it recognizes is that panels and mediators have a far greater level of expertise regarding the issue than a review by cabinet. It also makes the final decision–making process more open to the public as panel reviews are open to the public, whereas cabinet meetings are not. The public is not privy to matters which guide cabinet decisions behind closed doors.

I agree that there are many benefits to granting decision–making powers to the review panel. However, I cannot support this clause which allows for appeal to cabinet. The government must be allowed the opportunity to intervene when necessary.

There will be occasions when the government will need to make decisions for political reasons, contrary to the review panel. Obviously this will not be a popular decision for which the government will undoubtedly take political heat. However, I feel the option must be open to the government. Therefore, I cannot and do not support this amendment.

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I wish to speak to the three motions. First, Motion No. 1 from the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, ensures that projects reviewed through a process of independent decision–making are instituted.

The member's suggestion is indeed interesting. However, he is adding words to an amendment which has been put forward to promote the concept of one project, one assessment. In this regard I suggest his proposal is out of place.

With respect to the intent of the member's suggestion, the government has put forward in Bill C–56 an amendment to section 37 of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act which would ensure that projects are subject to public review through an open and transparent process. This amendment ensures that panel recommendations are reviewed and responded to by the governor in council, thus ensuring that not just one minister will respond to panel recommendations.

The government believes that this amendment, along with the creation of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency, will allow for decision–making which is as independent as possible, coupled with an open and transparent process in which all Canadians may participate. For this reason the government will not support this motion.

• (1625)

Motion No. 2, moved by the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, goes right to the heart of the cabinet decision–making process. The government has committed itself to ensuring that public reviews are carefully considered and responded to.

However to suggest that the governor in council be given a time limit to respond would unduly fetter the decision–making process of the federal government. It would as well not reflect the seriousness of the decisions in front of cabinet.

In some cases ministers may wish to respond quickly, or depending on the significance or complexity of the issue, the governor in council may well wish to take more time in its consideration of projects which are of national significance. The length of deliberations might also be influenced by stakeholders that in some cases may desire speedy responses or in others a more lengthy debate.

Further, as the member knows, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act is progressively designed to encourage harmonization with the provinces. In this light many provinces do not have time lines and it would be inappropriate for the Government of Canada to impose them.

While we can understand the intent of the member's motion, we feel that the proposed amendment would unduly fetter decision–making and would contradict the careful deliberation that environmental assessment calls for. The government therefore cannot support this motion.

Finally, with regard to Motion No. 3, introduced by my colleague for Comox—Alberni, as was confirmed by the committee studying Bill C–56, the governor in council responses to public reviews will be and must be made by order in council. This is the way the governor in council works.

In this regard the member's motion is somewhat redundant and the government again cannot support its adoption.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Madam Speaker, Motions Nos. 1, 2 and 3 put forward today by our colleague from The Battlefords—Meadow Lake and Motion No. 3 put forward by the hon. member for Comox—Alberni are amendments to Bill C–56.

First, I will remind you that the Bloc Quebecois will vote against Bill C–56 since this bill amends the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act which implements across the country an environmental assessment process that duplicates a process already existing in some provinces, including Quebec where there has been an environmental assessment process for more than 15 years now.

We have spoken against the enactment of this Act wich we consider to be unacceptable federal interference in provincial jurisdiction. We will have another opportunity to oppose federal interference in provincial jurisdiction on third reading of Bill C–56.

Let us look now at the motions from our colleagues. Motion No. 1 wants projects likely to cause significant adverse environmental effects to be publicly reviewed through a process of independent decision making. That amendment would be included in the purposes of the Act. It is hard to see what our colleague from the NDP is really getting at with this amendment. He should tell us more about this process of independent decision making. Should the body or agency making the decision be permanent or ad hoc? What would the administrative structure of such an agency be? Who would be on it? Who would pay? How would the recommendations or the reports of that body be handled?

Members of the NDP propose creating a new body which would only add to the list of existing agencies. In Quebec, we already have the BAPE, Bureau d'audiences publiques sur l'environnement. On the other hand, for those who support the imposition of the federal process—which we do not—the act provides for the establishment of the Canadian assessment agency, as well as opportunities to use a mediator or a review panel for major projects.

As you can see, there are already many authorities provided for in the act. It seems to us that the NDP motion wants to add more to that federal superstructure, but without saying specifically what that new independent authority will be.

You will understand that we, in the Bloc, cannot accept this motion from the NDP. We have a firm fundamental position on this bill and nothing can change it. We will also vote against Motion No. 2 that was moved by the same member.

I would like to deal a little more with parts (1.1) and (1.2)(b) of the motion. Part (1.1) says: "Where a report is submitted by a mediator or review panel—" But what does the NDP do with the independent authority that it is proposing in its first motion? It is talking here about the report of a mediator or review panel. What about the independent authority report? Clearly defining structures does not seem to be a strength of the NDP.

I think that the NDP does even worse when it proposes, in clause (1.2)(b), that:

> —the Governor in Council may, for the purpose of dealing with any or all the findings or recommendations set out in the report
> (b) substitute its own findings and recommendations for those of the report where it concludes that the findings or recommendations of the report are not in the public interest.

I ask my colleague if the whole process that the federal government wants to implement and impose on the provinces is really to further public interest in environmental assessment issues. With this amendment, the NDP is telling us that the process as a whole is not important and that, in the end, Cabinet can impose its own decision in the public interest.

It is not reassuring at all, considering who influence our dear ministers. Lobbyists are certainly not the greatest champions of public interest and the environment.

Another major inconsistency in the motions of the NDP is that it is asking for an independent public review while giving the last word to the government. It is inconsistent and illogical to advocate these two things at the same time, that is, an independent agency whose recommendations will be submitted to a higher authority.

The NDP is not very clear and rigorous in its proposals. If what it wants is to give more power to the people, its two motions are not very convincing. They are pulling in opposite directions. The result is a draw, since it is impossible to answer yes and no at the same time.

Motion No. 3, presented by the member for Comox—Alberni, adds a reference to orders in council in clause 3 of Bill C–56. The bill only mentions the approval, or consent, of the Governor in Council, in a non–specific fashion. The Reform Party simply wants to specify how it will be done, by order in council. For us, this is merely specifying how they will go about it; it does not change Bill C–56 significantly.

Finally, we will not vote in favour of any of these motions. Bill C–56 and the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act are both unacceptable and the changes proposed by our NDP and Reform colleagues do not make them more acceptable to us.

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak on the amendments to Bill C–56 proposed by NDP and Reform members.

My comments will be similar to those made by my colleague for Laurentides, because, for different reasons, three of the motions cannot be approved by our party.

The first motion proposed by the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake raises problems, as it says this:

"projects likely to cause— public concern are publicly reviewed through a process of independent decision making".

The process of independent decision making causes problems, because it remains undefined. It is said that an independent process should give some directions, but the process itself is not defined.

• (1635)

As far as environmental assessment is concerned, I wish to analyze some aspects, some government structures, mostly at the federal level, where these assessments are made. One must remember that each department, before implementing a project, must do an assessment demonstrating that it is not harmful to the environment.

Moreover, the Federal Environmental Assessment Review Office, FEARO, is about to be replaced by the Canadian Environmental Assessment Agency.

The bill provides for a mediator who will review, hold hearings, carry out consultations—an activity our Liberal friends are particularly fond of—and this mediator will make decisions as part of the environmental assessment process.

Such processes also exist at the provincial level, as my colleague from Laurentides pointed out earlier. In Quebec, the BAPE, or Bureau d'audiences publiques sur l'environnement (office of public hearings on the environment) conducts an environmental assessment which, by the way, is very serious and highly respected. My hon. colleague, who was Minister of the Environment, could attest to this.

The bill also provides for something that no one has objected to, a very good idea: environmental groups, which are concerned with the environment but, unlike industry groups, may not be able to afford to appear before committees and panels to express their views, would receive government funding to come and share their views with various committees. I think that this provision, and particularly the government funding granted to environmental groups—it is important to mention this because these groups will finally be given a chance to be heard—will facilitate public participation in the various environmental assessment processes.

I think that adding to the four or five existing environmental assessment organizations or agencies a fifth or sixth one, which would be this independent umbrella organization at the federal level, is going too far. It is difficult enough getting along as it is. As my colleague said earlier, they are pulling in opposite directions, so that putting the icing on the cake would not necessarily make sense.

As I said in my preamble, how does our colleague from The Battleford—Meadow Lake define "independent organization"? That is very important because we can move in different directions with that.

At this time, Madam Speaker, I would like to give you another reason why we are opposed to Bill C–56. We see here that Clause 4(d) of Bill C–13 would allow the public to participate in the environmental assessment process. Bill C–56 also provides for the compulsory creation of a participant funding program, as I said earlier. So we see that the public is really involved in this.

As for Motion No. 2 providing that the Governor in Council may substitute his own decisions for those of the mediator, we find it somewhat unparliamentary and undemocratic, since we were elected to the House of Commons by the people. We have had responsible government since 1848 and we are here to make it work.

So the Cabinet could be asked to reject out of hand the work done by our environmental assessment agencies and impose its own decisions when the public interest is at stake. I submit to you, Madam Speaker, that this is not quite acceptable in a democratic society.

With respect to Motion No. 3 proposed by our Reform colleague from Comox—Alberni, we have a slight problem, as we have with three of the motions, in that simply adding by order in council would not amend the bill sufficiently for us to support Motion No. 3.

Decisions are made by the Governor in Council but it remains to be seen whether the government has the will to act on the environment; we seriously doubt it. That is why I support my colleague from Laurentides in opposing the three motions proposed to us.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 76.1(8) a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP) moved:

Motion No. 4

That Bill C–56 be amended by adding after new subclause 5(2), the following new Clause:

"5.1 The Act is amended by adding the following after section 59:

"59.1 (1) Every regulation that is proposed to be made under section 59 shall be laid before each House of Parliament at least twenty sitting days before the proposed effective date thereof.

(2) Where, within fifteen sitting days after a proposed regulation is laid before either House of Parliament under subsection (1), a motion for the consideration of that House to the effect that the proposed regulation not be approved, signed by no fewer than fifteen Senators or twenty Members of the House of Commons, as the case may be, is filed with the Speaker of the Senate or the House of Commons, as the case may be, the Speaker shall, within five sitting days of the filing of the motion, without debate or amendment put every question necessary for the disposition of the motion.

(3) Where a motion referred to in subsection (2) is adopted by both Houses of Parliament, the proposed regulations to which the motion relates may not be made, and the proposed regulation shall be referred to the committee of the House of Commons that normally considers environmental affairs for further consideration.

(4) Where Parliament dissolves or prorogues earlier than fifteen sitting days after a proposed regulation is laid before both Houses of Parliament under subsection (1) and a motion has not been disposed of under subsection (2) in relation to the proposed regulation in both Houses of Parliament, the proposed regulation may not be made.

(5) For the purposes of this section, "sitting day" means, in respect of either House of Parliament, a day on which the House sits."."

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to speak to my motion in front of the House today. This is a motion that I have raised in this Chamber on one previous occasion. I am very pleased to have an opportunity to again try to convince the members of this House of the importance of dealing with public involvement in the regulatory process.

I should indicate to members and to those who are watching today from outside this Chamber that public involvement in decision making is something that I have always taken very seriously.

Although Bill C–56 in front of us deals to a certain extent with participant funding and individual participation within the process of environmental assessment, I was very anxious to include amendments as well dealing with participant funding, define more readily participant funding and also ensure that the agency in the legislation take more responsibility for participant funding programs.

● (1645)

I found that the amendments I submitted for inclusion on the Order Paper for today were ruled out of order before they were printed, again because they did not deal specifically with the intent of the legislation before the House.

While we are dealing with the importance of public participation in the environmental assessment process I want to urge the government to do more to ensure a public participation funding program or an intervener funding program than has been done in the legislation in front of us.

The government responded in committee to the question of greater definition of public participation funding programs by stating that it will include guidelines and rules within the regulations that make the act operable. That and other reasons is what prompts the amendment on the table now.

What I am saying by moving the amendment is that the current regulatory process is inadequate, troublesome and lacking in public scrutiny. Members of the public and in fact the members of the House do not have the ability to examine in public, debate in public, discuss in public with a view to change, regulations once they have been dealt with, generally behind closed doors.

As witness after witness before the committee in the previous Parliament and before the committee in this Parliament indicated, it is the regulations which run the act and therefore the process, not the act itself. The regulations are as important as the act.

We have spent on environmental assessment legislation hundreds if not thousands of hours putting in place the proper wording for the legislation but we have not dealt at all with the regulatory process.

One of the witnesses before the committee, a man by the name of Brian Pannell from Winnipeg had some comments in this regard that I want to bring to the attention of the House before I proceed with my arguments. Mr. Pannell said: "On the law list, the law list remains substantially deficient. I can tell you that this law list has been worked on for years and it has always been a struggle to be relatively inclusive of the real substantial decisions that should be on there and there are still many decisions that should be on there that aren't because there are many departmental interests that are served by not having them there and I don't see an early resolution to this process".

The regulatory process takes place behind closed doors. Decisions are made about how the act will be run by people who study this very closely. To a certain extent the people in this regulatory process are doing a great job. The regulations are put in place and go before cabinet. Before those regulations can be published the cabinet makes decisions, makes deletions, makes additions, does whatever it wants to, not referring anything back to the regulatory development committee or whatever it is called, and the regulations are published. That is it. Everything is done and the operations of the act proceed.

Some time ago in dealing with the previous government's gun control legislation the government set a precedent by establishing a process by which regulations could be reviewed by members of Parliament. The government conceded, because the regulations concerned the addition of firearms that could be prohibited by order in council, not by debate, not by public discussion but simply by cabinet deciding that this or that firearm could be put on a prohibited list.

In this case we have regulations that can decide the future of environmental assessment, the process, how the participant funding program is going to operate, who is going to get funding under participant funding processes, which projects will be reviewed, which projects will not be reviewed, who can appear before panel decisions, who can sit on panels and where they are going to operate. All of these details about the decision–making process that will eventually lead to recommendations on projects are dealt with under regulations. As members of Parliament we and the public have no participation in that process before, in the middle of or after it is completed.

The point I am making is fairly simple. We are asking that when the regulation process is complete and the regulations are on the table that we set aside a period of time when members of Parliament or members of the Senate can respond to those regulations. We can say to the country that we do not want these regulations to pass until such time as we have had a chance to look at them. These matters can then be brought before committees or dealt with in any way that the government wishes to have them dealt with. Should public scrutiny allow those regulations to go forward, they can.

The government loses nothing in this process other than the fact that some of the regulations and some of the regulatory process is under the scrutiny of members of Parliament, the Senate and therefore the people of Canada, if we are paying attention to the needs and the interests of the Canadians who are concerned about these matters.

I do not consider this to be a significant amendment in terms of what it means to the government achieving its ends. I do see it as a significant amendment in terms of allowing for greater public participation on the side of the question that really matters: the operational and administrative side, the regulatory side.

I urge the government to carefully consider its concern and its stated support for public participation in the process. By supporting this amendment it will bring greater clarity to the whole regulatory decision–making process.

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak to Motion No. 4, the third amendment proposed by the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake. The proposed amendment relates to section 59 of the act which grants the governor in council authority to make regulations relating to environmental assessment and follow–up programs set up in the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

These regulations are an essential part of the act. They are the guiding principles which shape the environmental assessment process. Once again there is some merit to the proposed amendment but there are also many concerns which arise with this proposal.

Presently under the act, the regulations which guide the environmental assessment process are determined by governor in council which basically means the cabinet. Cabinet decides what the regulations will include. Members of Parliament outside of the inner circle of government are excluded from the process.

The amendment to the bill proposes to address this concern so that the regulation proposed under section 59 would be laid before the House of Parliament. This would allow for a more democratic process in the development of these regulations and would allow members of the House to participate in the decision–making process as regulations are proposed.

The hon. member also proposes that regulations are presented to the House at least 20 sitting days before the proposed effective date. The time line of 20 days would ensure that members have adequate time to comment on regulations and proposed meaningful amendments where necessary.

My concern with this proposal is that it would slow down the process. I have concerns that if every regulation were brought forward, the process would be far too time consuming and would in fact be unworkable. Members need to participate in decision making but this suggested amendment would grind the House to a halt.

• (1655)

For these reasons I cannot support and therefore oppose the motion.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Madam Speaker, we recognize that Motion No. 4 put forward by the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake definitely has some merit. While it will not gain our full support, it is far from worthless. It has the advantage of applying the concept of transparency to one of the most fundamental aspects of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, the regulations made under the Act.

I would like to remind my colleagues that on October 6, the Minister of the Environment announced in this House that the Act would be proclaimed and that its regulations would soon be published in the Canada Gazette. These regulations are actually one of the many shortcomings of this federal legislation. They confer great power and allow the federal government to give a wide application to its environmental assessment process, without any regard for assessment processes already established by the provinces.

The federal regulations have a major impact in Quebec. In view of the great power the federal government has seized to initiate federal assessments, as provided under the regulations, most projects covered by Quebec regulations are likely to be subject to the federal regulations also. Clearly, two processes could be undertaken for the same project, unless, of course, there was a bilateral agreement between the province and the federal government. So far, I think that only one province has signed such an agreement with the federal minister.

Federal regulations on environmental assessment reinforce and give further extension to the Act. That will lead to a duplication of assessment processes, an inability to meet deadlines under provincial processes, the possibility that provincial decisions could be challenged, some uncertainty and hesitation by developers in submitting projects owing to the dual assessment process and the subsequent decisions, a waste of time and money, the possibility of legal challenges for the results and decisions, if the two assessments reach different conclusions. These are serious consequences of regulations made under the Act.

Since the minister refused to amend her legislation to specify that provincial procedures, and more specifically those in Quebec, are comparable to the federal process and equally valid, so that projects subject to Quebec regulations would be subject only to provincial procedures, we now have two sets of procedures, which is very costly and very confusing for all concerned.

The federal legislative process is opaque to the point of being secretive. Regulations are churned out without any genuine debate by members. They are published and easily pass consideration by the Committee on Scrutiny of Regulations, without anyone being able to challenge the basis for certain regulations. The process makes absolutely no sense at all and is also dangerous because these regulations are often vitally important.

In this particular case, the regulations of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act mostly duplicate Quebec's regulations. It is most unfortunate that no Quebec members had a chance to look at these regulations before they came into force. It is also unfortunate that members have had absolutely no say in this respect. We find the same situation—not a very democratic one, in my opinion—with all other bills debated and voted on in this House. We can see the bills and study them clause by clause, but we never have that opportunity with the regulations.

If the NDP motion is adopted, it would have to be part of the general procedure for proposed legislation, so that at least elected members would be able to discuss draft regulations before they become official.

We support the main purpose behind this motion. However, we object to including the senators in a process to prevent the approval of draft regulations. The Senate consists of non–elected individuals, appointed strictly on a partisan basis. These are patronage appointments, and these friends of the government cost us $53 million.

• (1700)

As I said before, the motion's purpose, which is to give us a chance to examine the regulations and to amend or reject them, is entirely valid. The legislative system should make it possible for members to intervene in this area.

Therefore, I move, seconded by my colleague the hon. member for Terrebonne:

That Motion No. 4 be amended:

(a) in sub–clause (1), by replacing the words "each House of Parliament", with the following:

"the House of Commons";

(b) in sub–clause (2),

(i) by replacing the words "either House of Parliament under subsection (1), a motion for the consideration of that House", with the following:

"the House of Commons under subsection (1), a motion for the consideration of the House"; and

(ii) by striking out the words "fifteen Senators or", "the Senate or" and ", as the case may be,";

(c) in sub–clause (3), by replacing the words "both Houses of Parliament", with the following:

"the House of Commons";

(d) in sub–clause (4), by replacing each instance of the words "both Houses of Parliament", with the following:

"the House of Commons"; and (e) in sub–clause (5), by replacing the words "either House of Parliament", with the following:

"the House of Commons".

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Madam Speaker, I rise to further explain why I will have the pleasure to support the sub–amendment presented by my colleague from Laurentides.

To clarify where we are coming from with this sub–amendment to Motion No. 4 presented by the NDP member, I will say that the only thing we agree with is that we would be ready to support the motion presented by the member for Battlefords—Meadow Lake. Therefore, we would be pleased to support it. However, to be consistent with the positions we have taken since the opening of this Parliament, we cannot accept that non–elected individuals might take the place, even occasionally, of elected representatives.

We must point out that the Senate is composed of appointed members who are, as my colleague so skilfully demonstrated, appointed in a partisan way; they are government cronies. These appointees, who cost taxpayers $53 million a year, and who are supposed to be wise, have shown that this is seldom the case.

Therefore, according to the 1848 principle of responsible government which I explained earlier, decisions made here by democratically elected representatives of the people should only and always be discussed in this House. I should point out, for the benefit of all those present, that each one of them represents a federal riding, but that they also represent their provincial legislature, and that there is only one House in each province because their provincial legislature recognizes the authority of democratically elected representatives.

What we are opposing mainly is the fact that non–elected individuals could make decisions. We must therefore support the amendment to the amendment submitted by my colleague from Laurentides and make sure that we remove from the motion of our NDP colleague anything that could be interpreted as meaning that both Houses must be involved in the decision–making. Democratic decisions are made here, in this House, and anything not democratic, like the present proposal, must be rejected.

• (1705)

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to say first of all that I am a bit surprised at the Bloc Quebecois position. Despite explanations by the hon. member for Terrebonne, one cannot help wondering how the Bloc Quebecois can move an amendment to an amendment to a bill over which it is in total disagreement. It is a bit surprising.

Similarly, I would like to refer to remarks by the hon. member for Laurentides who keeps harping on the same old theme that the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act is some kind of absolute intrusion in prerogatives of provinces and more particularly Quebec.

I want to point out to the hon. member that the federal government has not only the right but the responsibility, as stated by the Supreme Court, to deal with environmental assessment, if only in such areas of exclusive jurisdiction as coastal zones, navigable waters, fisheries, national harbours, airports, the St. Lawrence Seaway, Crown lands, native lands, defence facilities, not to mention the shared jurisdiction on environment itself.

Indeed, I would point out to the hon. member for Laurentides, if she is interested in getting information, that joint assessments have been made for a very long time in Quebec concerning, for example, Cacouna Harbour, the St. Marguerite River more recently and the Lachine Canal very recently. There are instances of several projects assessed either by BAPE or, on rare occasions, by the federal government, when the project was essentially under federal jurisdiction.

As for the motion by the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, we are quite aware that under several acts of Parliament, regulatory systems are established independently of Parliament.

In the case of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, the regulations were subjected to one of the most rigorous and progressive procedures established by the Government of Canada. During the last election, we on this side of the House promised an in–depth review of the existing regulations—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry to interrupt the parliamentary secretary. We are debating the amendment to Motion No. 4.

Mr. Lincoln: May I speak to both at the same time? It is the same subject anyway.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Does the member have agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Lincoln: During the last election, we on this side of the House promised an in–depth review of existing regulations as well as ongoing consultation on the others. Some existing regulations have been reviewed thoroughly and substantially improved as many witnesses have recognized, in fact.

All the other regulations are subjected to the same in–depth analysis by all the interested parties.

[English]

I am very sympathetic to the member's suggestion, but the suggestion does not seem to recognize that extensive consultation has taken place, nor does it reflect the fact that the development of regulations is a much larger question than that contained in the regulations under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

If the member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake wishes to change the federal regulatory development process, the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act is certainly not the place to do it. For this reason the government will not accept this motion, nor the amendment to the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent to defer the vote to tomorrow at 5.30 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, a point of order. I wonder if you could seek unanimous consent to adjourn the House, having completed the legislation before us for today.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being 5.12 p.m., as there are no members available for the proceedings on the adjournment motion, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

(The House adjourned at 5.12 p.m.)

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I believe you would find unanimous consent, when the House gets to Government Orders today, for the Secretary of State for Multiculturalism and the Status of Women to put the following motion:

> That this House take note of the anniversary of the murder of 14 young women at l'École polytechnique on December 6, 1989 and the continuing urgent need for action to eliminate the threat of violence in society, including the threat of violence to women.

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 23 petitions.

COMMUNITY STORIES

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table in the House, in both official languages, a document entitled "Community Stories: Taking Action on Violence Against Women". The document contains the personal stories and history of the women applying for safety in their communities.

Today I will be moving: "That this House take note of the anniversary of the murder of 14 young women at l'École polytechnique on December 6, 1989 and the continuing urgent need for action to eliminate the threat of violence in society, including the threat of violence to women".

The Speaker: I understand that this will be the first order of the day when we get through the routine business, and it is taken as such.

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today, December 6, is the day that all parties in the House have unanimously proclaimed national day of remembrance and action on violence against women.

[English]

These young women were smart, ambitious and hardworking. They had much to contribute to their families and to their country. All this was stolen from them in a burst of gunfire.

Today, 14 red roses have been placed at the entrance of the Chamber. Each rose represents the life of a young woman, a life full of promise, a life full of dreams, a life cut short by a horrifying act of violence by a man who voiced the old hidden belief that women do not have the right to equal status in a man's world.

The tragedy was a catalyst for action and the rose has become a symbol in memory of the women who died. It appears on the YWCA buttons sold each year as part of its campaign to address violence against women. It appears on the Canadian Labour Congress lapel pin as part of its new campaign.

[Translation]

Every year, since 1989, increasing numbers of individuals and organizations have joined forces with women's groups and other community organizations in order to bring about social change. The Federation of Canadian Municipalities, the Canadian Union of Public Employees, the Quebec women's federation—many people are trying to make a difference in their community.

[English]

Our government is also a partner for change. Last week the Minister of Justice announced the government's intention to ban the type of gun that was used in Montreal. Firearms control is a life and death issue for women. In the new proposals anyone charged with criminal harassment such as stalking will temporarily be prohibited from owning a firearm.

[Translation]

A national firearms registry would have enormous advantages. When responding to a domestic violence call, police would know if there was a registered firearm at the address in question.

• (1010)

Last year, Statistics Canada reported that, based on the definition of violence in the Criminal Code, half of Canadian women have been victims of violence in their adult life, often more than once. Men they know pose more of a danger to them than strangers.

[English]

The foundation of the federal government's multifaceted approach to violence against women in Canadian society is legislation, giving protection under the law. We have made this a priority. It is part of the solution, clearly our part. We are also working in new ways to facilitate community action.

I am pleased to have tabled today the publication entitled "Community Stories: Taking Action on Violence Against Women". It chronicles the experience of 10 communities that took part in a demonstration project of a community kit on violence against women. Both community stories and the community kit are tremendous resources for grassroots action in our own neighbourhoods. They are a source of inspiration on what is possible.

There are many other excellent resources available today for increased safety and security for all women in the workplace, in municipalities and in relationships. Violence against women is simply unacceptable. We must work together to change attitudes and behaviour that give rise to these acts, to these terrible tragedies.

Gender violence does not just threaten women; it threatens their families, their loved ones and all of us. It tears at the very fabric of our society. We need to act not just for ourselves but for our daughters and our granddaughters. It is for their right to walk safely and earn fairly anywhere in our Canada.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is with a great deal of emotion that we are reminded today of a cold and snowy day, five years ago, when 14 female students of l'École polytechnique de Montréal were shot and killed by a young man who had a visceral hatred of women, and feminists in particular. These women, like many others, had families, friends, hopes. Such senseless acts have sounded a call, a heart–rending call, in Quebec and Canada, and even had an echo in the United States.

Violence against women must stop. The word was out before this tragic incident, but the atrocity of these murders created a new awareness of a reality experienced by a great number of women.

From then on, all forms of violence against women were to be seen under a much harsher light. For instance, a harder and more serious look was taken at one of the most revolting aspects of our society. Conjugal violence must stop and we must take all the necessary steps to stop it. Spousal violence is widespread in Quebec and Canada. The figures are alarming. Let me just quote a few here. This fall, Statistics Canada reported that 29 per cent of women who had been married or in a common law relationship were physically or sexually assaulted by their spouse at one time or another in their life together.

It is reported that 21 per cent of spousal assaults occur when women are pregnant. Physical abuse may or may not be accompanied by psychological abuse. The blows, injuries, death threats, and humiliations leave permanent psychological scars in women, as well as in the children who often witness and are themselves victims of the abuse.

Since the second half of the 1970s, homes for battered women have mushroomed. The care and services they provide unquestionably meet a fundamental need in our communities. However, the issue of funding is much thornier and the financial support they receive from the federal government is far from adequate. Funding programs for housing that used to help these shelters open up new places for battered women now have no budget. This government decided instead to offer public funds to private owners.

• (1015)

Last February's budget did not provide any financing for a campaign to address violence against women, despite the formal promise contained in the red book. Nevertheless, all provincial governments as well as the federal government must do even more to promote awareness and spread information in order to eliminate violence against women.

Another statistic involving women has to do with firearms. Firearms are the weapon of choice used in spousal homicides. Between 1974 and 1992, 42 per cent of women killed by their spouses were shot dead.

In this context, Bloc members, like most Quebecers and Canadians, eagerly awaited the bill on how the federal government would effectively control firearms. Unfortunately, the Minister of Justice was rather timid in announcing a policy statement on gun control. Surprisingly enough, despite the urgent need for gun control, this bill will be implemented over the next seven years until 2002.

We also fail to understand why all 4,000 AK–47 and 6,000 FN–FAL owners will be allowed to keep these weapons for the rest of their lives. All 555,000 Canadians who own .25 or .32 caliber handguns or 105–mm guns will also be able to keep them until they die.

Heidi Rathjen is to be commended for her determination and her work in the Coalition for Gun Control, which helped highlight the importance of controlling guns in Canada and Quebec. Her crusade will not be in vain.

The victims and survivors of the massacre at the École Polytechnique will live in our collective conscience for many years to come. We must not, however, forget that this violence still goes on on a different scale, often far from the spotlights and the cameras.

In 1993, 63 women were killed by their spouses, 49 by their legal or common law husbands and 14 by separated or divorced spouses. Another 63 roses could have been laid at the entrance to the House of Commons and in front of all provincial legislatures.

Every time an injured woman seeks refuge in a shelter for battered women, every time a woman decides to sue her abusing spouse, every time a woman leaves her home to start a new life, it is another step forward in the campaign to eliminate violence.

On December 6, 1989, 14 students at the École Polytechnique were silenced forever, but we cannot remain silent.

[English]

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute today as well to the 14 women who five years ago were brutally murdered at l'École polytechnique. We deplore such violence in our society and must make every effort to reform the criminal justice system so that tragedies like this are avoided.

On December 6, 1989 one of the worst nightmares in this society came to pass when one sick individual went into our schools and gunned down 14 young women. Crime is a terrible fact in our society that we must do our best to eradicate. It affects us all.

Not only was that murder deplorable but there have been several since, maybe not on that large scale, but certainly the fact is when anyone is murdered in this country it is too many.

It is reported that violent crime is on the rise. Since 1988 in the nation's capital alone, here in Ottawa total violent crime is up 75 per cent. Considering this alarming statistic, let us look together at a solution to the situation, not always look back in time but forward as to how we can avoid these things in the future.

We must be cautious not to give the impression that the problems of violence in our society only affect women. We need to be very careful that is not the only thing we talk about. They are not simply women's issues. All men must not be branded. Most Canadian men abhor violence. They do not condone it, nor do they want to be put on a guilt trip for one maniac who went crazy and committed such a deplorable act.

These issues affect all members of our society. Violence is perpetrated on many areas of our society, certainly violence against women but also men, seniors and children. The largest category of violent crime is male violence against other males. We have grandparents and seniors who are verbally and physically abused, and let us not forget the children. Our vulnerable children are being preyed on more and more.

The government pays lip service and expresses a sincere intent to address the issue of violence against women. The minister just said we need to act. However, on looking back at the legislative agenda of this government for the last year it seems that there has been very little action taken that will remedy the situation.

There needs to be fairness in the system. Sentencing for violent crimes needs to be fair. Recently in Surrey—White Rock—South Langley a father of two murdered his wife, put her back into bed, and after the crime he admitted to a friend what he had done. He was not convicted of murder one or murder two but simply of manslaughter. His defence was that his wife had threatened to spread a rumour that he was molesting his children. He was sentenced to five years in jail, but he served only two of them for killing his wife. This is intolerable.

I would hope that the minister would hear me when I say that we must have punishment in place for criminals that fits the crime. Unfortunately the government aims at the wrong people in society and at the wrong sector for getting tough with criminals such as someone who could kill his wife and simply serve two years of his sentence. That is intolerable.

If we want to truly stop the tide of violence in society we must start one small step at a time. We are willing to take that step. We are willing to make the commitment. We are willing to make the tough decisions that will protect our women, our children and our men. If we really want to make a difference and show Canada that we are truly sick and tired of senseless crimes the government should take action now to keep people from beating, raping or killing people, and then using the excuse that we have seen recently that they were simply too drunk to know what they were doing and so they get away with the crime.

If the Secretary of State for the Status of Women wants to safeguard women, children and men in Canada, surely she will use her influence around the cabinet table to get rid of the drunkenness defence. I urge the secretary of state to listen to Canadians and to push the Minister of Justice to introduce an amendment to the Criminal Code now. We have given our consent that we would let this be passed within 24 hours.

Mrs. Finestone: On what?

Miss Grey: "On what", the minister asks of me. Unfortunately she did not hear what I said. Let me reiterate it because it is that important.

Our party said that we would give unanimous consent to an amendment to the Criminal Code to get rid of the drunkenness defence immediately. If the minister is sincere, if she is serious about making sure that violence is not perpetrated on other people in our society, especially people whom they know and ultimately care about, surely we could pass that amendment now. That would be true action. I think nothing would speak louder than an amendment to the Criminal Code.

I urge the secretary of state to listen to Canadians and to push the Minister of Justice to introduce an amendment to the Criminal Code.

My colleagues across are saying "What about gun control?". Yes, gun control for the people who are abusing guns and making sure that those people pay the price. This needs to be done now.

An hon. member: What does this have to do with it?

Miss Grey: That was my question exactly: What does this have to do with it?

Since the Supreme Court ruled on the Daviault case, the drunkenness defence has been used successfully three times in a matter of weeks. If this government were serious about it we could have this passed by the Christmas break and I look forward to working with the government on bringing that in.

We look forward to making sure that justice not be put on hold. Our women, our children and our men expect nothing less from the government, from the secretary of state and from the Minister of Justice. They expect action now.

Ms. McLaughlin: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the House for unanimous consent to reply to the ministerial statement.

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, five years ago we rose in this House to commemorate the 14 young women who were killed in Montreal and today we must remember these 14 women, their families and friends, and also propose actions for a policy of zero tolerance of violence against women.

[English]

Five years ago when we stood in this House and sadly recognized and commemorated the tragedy of the Montreal massacre we all committed ourselves to action.

• (1025)

It is true that awareness of the issue has increased since that time. While there is never any positive aspect to the loss of such young lives, I think we can say that following that massacre there has been much more attention to the issue.

While there has been much condemnation there is still much to do. Far too little has been done. Sadly few steps have been taken which would actually end the violence; some have, but too few. I would say for example that the current social security review that is being undertaken does not address the question of violence but indeed does address the possibility of less funding under the Canada assistance plan for the provinces and territories which fund transition homes and those organizations which help who are under threat of violence.

As well we have seen several recent court judgments which excuse assault and sexual assault on the grounds of intoxication or the use of drugs. This is totally unacceptable. If we are to be committed to zero tolerance in our society, I join with others in this House to demand that government take action on this issue now. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that this party will support such immediate action.

As we remember those who lost their lives five years ago, we again recommit ourselves to real action. I call on the government to start today with that real action.

REGULATORY EFFICIENCY ACT

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–62, an act to provide for the achievement of regulatory goals through alternatives to designated regulations and through administrative agreements.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

Mr. Eggleton: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to inform the House that it is my intention to propose that this bill be referred to committee before second reading, pursuant to Standing Order 73(1).

PETITIONS

SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to table 586 signatures from all ridings in the province, including Saint–Maurice, the riding of the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

These petitions come from women's social action associations, better known by the acronym AFEAS, and from seniors' groups. The petitioners ask Parliament to ask the government to give up the plan for voice mail systems for seniors. I support this petition.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour this morning to present three petitions. The first is that the petitioners pray that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

● (1030)

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): In the second petition the petitioners pray that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously. They request that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide, or active or passive euthanasia.

The petitioners also pray that Parliament not amend the Human Rights Act or Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

It is my privilege to present these petitions this morning.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36 I would like to present two petitions signed by residents of the town of Westlock and the city of Fort McMurray in my riding of Athabasca.

The petitioners request that Parliament ensure the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be vigorously enforced and that Parliament make no change in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have two petitions from the ridings of Nickel Belt and Sudbury with over 600 signatures.

The first requires that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition from the same ridings with the same numbers asks that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

I support both petitions.

TOBACCO

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am pleased to deposit a petition today from residents of virtually every province from coast to coast in Canada.

The petitioners suggest that research conducted by Health Canada shows that the number of people, particularly teenagers, who smoke increases as the cost of cigarettes goes down. Tobacco products are clearly linked to forms of cancer, heart disease, stroke, emphysema, chronic bronchitis and many other illnesses. Given the fact that tobacco products contain over 4,000 chemicals of which at least 43 cause cancer in humans and that the use of tobacco products is directly responsible for the premature death of some 38,000 Canadians annually tobacco can rightly be termed a hazardous product.

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to remove the exemption for tobacco under the Hazardous Products Act.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I rise to present several petitions.

On behalf of Darcy Siggelkow I present three petitions. The first petition asks Parliament not to amend the human rights code or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would indicate societal approval of same sex relationships.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition prays that Parliament extend the same protection to the unborn child as that enjoyed by born human beings.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition asks that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have two additional petitions to present on these issues on behalf of Anne Pinkoski and Norma Wood. I present two petitions asking that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships.

TELEVISION PROGRAMMING

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition regarding enacting legislation to provide specific standards for acceptable content for CBC television programming.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Speaker: Shall the questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

REQUEST FOR EMERGENCY DEBATE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I wish to bring before the House an important matter requiring the urgent attention of the House of Commons.

• (1035)

Five years have passed since the murder of the 14 women at l'École polytechnique in Montreal yet violence does continue at alarming rates. More than half of all Canadian women will experience in their lifetime at least one incident of violence. Therefore I have put forward the request today for an emergency debate on this issue.

We have to date and this morning certainly acknowledged and given our condolences to the families of the 14 young women who were so sadly and tragically murdered five years ago. However it is incumbent upon this House to show its seriousness in this matter and have a true debate on this issue. The government should hear proposals of members of this House from all parties.

I urge that this motion for an emergency debate be accepted.

The Speaker: This topic indeed is a very serious one and I would make these points. This is a chronic matter for our society to deal with. As the motion stands now it is not in the strictest sense a matter for an emergency debate. However all this might be moot in view of the fact it is my understanding that in just a short while I will be reading a motion in orders of the day. All hon. members will be able to join in to make their views known on this very important topic.

I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33(2) because of the ministerial statement Government Orders will be extended by 20 minutes.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.) moved:

That this House take note of the anniversary of the murder of 14 young women at l'École polytechnique on December 6, 1989 and the continuing urgent need for action to eliminate the threat of violence in society, including the threat of violence to women.

She said: Mr. Speaker, I am most pleased that the House has unanimously agreed to address this issue of violence against women in our society. This issue has become pervasive and has created concern for the men and women in this House and of course many organizations, associations and groups outside of this House.

The House has accepted the resolution unanimously to acknowledge the issue of the women who were murdered unconscionably five years ago. That unfortunate circumstance has given us the excellent opportunity for us to look at this issue not from a partisan political perspective but more in the interests of the well–being of the women and children and the responsibility that women have for the future of our society, for the well–being of the children, for the education and for the community work that is needed and is often the role of women.

Women have many roles in our society. Not only are they the progenitors of the future, they also educate and train our children. They do a great amount of community based work and care for the elderly. As well women are in the workforce. Women bear tremendous amounts of stress and strain. The last thing they need is a lack of respect, understanding and appreciation of the multiplicity and the importance of their role for all of us in our society.

I am pleased to rise to speak on this topic. I am pleased there was unanimous approval in this House to proceed in this way. This morning in commemoration of the national day of remembrance and action on violence against women, I talked about statistics and the magnitude of the problem in Canada. I would like to put forward a fact sheet to which women and men can refer and which organizations and institutions can look at to take proper concerted action together so we can win the fight against violence against women.

• (1040)

In 1993 Statistics Canada conducted a national survey on violence against women. Approximately 12,300 women were interviewed. Only behaviours considered an offence under the Criminal Code of Canada were addressed in this survey. In fact, they were quite specific about what they were prepared to look at and include in the survey.

The survey included a wide range of behaviours such as the threat of imminent attack, attack with serious injury, unwanted sexual touching up to and including violent sexual attacks with severe injury. The findings are chilling and should advise us here in the House about our responsibility to represent, to speak for and to speak out in the interests of our constituents, half of whom are women.

In Canada 51 per cent of all women have experienced at least one incident of violence since the age of 16. Women are at greater risk from men they know than they are from strangers. Twenty–five per cent of all women have experienced violence at the hand of a current or past marital partner. In those cases weapons were used by 44 per cent of violent spouses. Twenty–one per cent of women abused by current or previous partners were assaulted during pregnancy; this is absolutely the most repugnant of the statements as far as I am concerned. One in six currently married women reported violence by their spouses and 39 per cent of those women said it happened more than once.

For sources of support that most women need and use, 51 per cent of women who ask for help turn to friends and neighbours and 42 per cent turn to family. Those figures come from the violence against women surveys in the Statistics Canada daily of November 18, 1993.

We also know how important are the homes for battered women, the transition houses and the groups that work right at the community base on these issues of violence. They enable women to leave their homes, take their children and protect themselves. They enable the women to get legal aid and some advice and counselling.

I sincerely hope that more work will be done with the batterers. If we leave them out there it will mean that some other woman is put at risk. We need to do work in that regard.

[Translation]

The other important aspect illustrated by this information on violence against women in Canada is that of women and firearms. On average, one woman is killed by a firearm every six days in Canada, often in a private residence and by someone she knows.

Firearms are the weapon of choice in spousal homicides. Between 1974 and 1992, 42 per cent of women murdered by their spouses were killed by bullets, 21 per cent were stabbed and another 21 per cent died from blows received.

During that same period, a married woman was nine times more likely to be killed by her spouse than by a stranger, and there were a total of 1,886 spousal homicides. Women were the victims in 76 per cent of cases. According to a study on domestic homicides conducted by the Department of Justice in 1992, only 18 per cent of firearms used by husbands who killed their wives were acquired illegally.

These are important facts to consider on a day like today and during a debate such as this one.

[English]

I would like to talk about this whole issue in terms of the human toll. The following testimonial is from a woman living in Canada today: "My husband struck me on our honeymoon. He killed our first child by kicking the four month old child in my uterus. My doctor asked me what I did and what I do to make him so mad. Our Anglican minister reminded me that I had married for better or worse. The lawyer wanted to know where I would get money to pay the fees. My mother told my husband where I was hiding".

• (1045)

The voice is a chilling one. It is an incisive call for change in the attitudes throughout Canadian society.

[Translation]

I want to point out two important realities for Canadian women. The first one is that we are more likely to be abused by an acquaintance, that is a spouse or a friend, as the hon. member from the opposition and I mentioned earlier. I feel it is very important for women to know that this is the reality and that they should take it into consideration before talking or making arrangements with anyone.

[English]

I just finished outlining some of the highlights of a Statistics Canada survey from last year. I did not outline the impact on the children who witness this violence and then become repeaters, carrying on this behaviour pattern into their own relationships with women. We find that half of the women reporting violence by men are known to them: dates, boyfriends, marital partners, friends, family and neighbours. It is very disquieting.

The second reality that I want to impress on the House is that violence and women's inequality are inextricably linked. Violence is a manifestation of women's inequality. In the words of another women: "When my husband stole a pizza he got a $100 fine. He beats me and sometimes he gets a $50 fine. I think this is awful. I am worth less than a pizza".

What messages do these words send to all women about our worth? How deeply entrenched are the old views that it is a man's right to control his wife and his daughters, that, as in past centuries, women are possessions?

Admitting that these attitudes exist is an important step in finding solutions. As I said earlier today, I am encouraged by the level of community action taking place across Canada. As a nation we are beginning to hear what women's groups have been saying for years, that violence against women is pervasive in Canada, that it is tolerated and that violence is the most deplorable symptom of women's inequality.

On behalf of the people of Canada I would like to extend our thanks to the women and to the grassroots groups that started the shelter movement, staffed the assault crisis centres and started self–healing circles. They were determined to get the public's attention. We must ensure that their voices continue to be heard and support the work and the undertakings they have made.

The government understands that violence against women results from complex inter–related factors. That is why we favour a comprehensive approach to this issue. I was asked by one of the members of the opposition to explain the question of drunkenness and the Supreme Court of Canada ruling which cited extreme drunkenness as a defence in a case of sexual assault. This defence has since been successfully used in several other lower court cases. I find this to be totally unacceptable. The women of our caucus and I have spoken to the Minister of Justice. The Minister of Justice is equally outraged. However, the charter and the Constitution speak before the courts.

The question is how to amend the laws of this land so they will not be found wanting when we go to the courts. This kind of abysmal, unacceptable behaviour can no longer take place and be accepted and certainly that unenlightened judges do not use proper defence mechanisms from my perspective.

I would like the House to know that the Minister of Justice intends to propose amendments which he has pointed out several times. He will present an amendment to the Criminal Code to deal with self–intoxication as a defence when the House resumes in February. This Friday, on December 9, he is holding discussions with groups that have a tremendous interest in seeing the reduction of violence and enabling us to move forward in our agenda against violence against women.

• (1050)

Some members of this House claimed that we did not take important measures. As I said before, our responsibility lies primarily in passing appropriate legislation, and I believe that, in this respect, we truly made critical choices on a series of actions which will ultimately be complemented by other measures later on this year.

I also think that it must be recognized that we have taken important measures. Let us take a look at the firearms control program. On November 30, the Minister of Justice announced a gun control program, an important step towards eliminating violence against women. The development of a national fire arms registry, the ban on some firearms and the relaxation of prohibition orders are all measures that can be beneficial to women and used to save lives.

The National Crime Prevention Council was set up in July 1994. Among other issues, this Council will study how women are vulnerable to crime. The Council is made up of 25 members, 14 of whom are women, who come from all walks of life. As for keeping the peace, in June, the Minister of Justice tabled Bill C–42, which contains more than 100 changes to the Criminal Code, including various provisions to improve our efforts to keep the peace. For example, the police and other stakeholders will be able to ask for a peace bond in order to protect women in danger.

The national screening system to identify individuals who have sexually assaulted children is the fourth part of our approach. Announced in November, this database will enable organizations and employers to check if a job applicant has a criminal record for sexual offences before allowing the applicant to work with children. I think that this is the fifth bill on sentencing reform.

[English]

I would say to members that the sentencing reform is an important piece of legislation.

[Translation]

Bill C–41 gives the courts the means to make a distinction between serious violent crimes and less serious non–violent crimes. This sends a clear message to society: violence against women and children will not be tolerated. The bill stipulates that evidence that a crime, including a sexual offence, was motivated by hate or that the offender abused a position of trust or authority will be deemed by the judge to be an aggravating factor for the purpose of sentencing.

I must say that the opposition's complaints are unfounded because we have made progress. We also looked at the issue of equality before the law. Take the court challenges program, for example. In October 1994, the government reinstated that program in order to provide funding for cases of national interest regarding equality rights or language rights under the Canadian constitution.

[English]

In giving this list I do not think there can be complaints by the opposition as to the undertakings of the government with respect to violence against women. The facts should speak for themselves. Certainly there are other issues to which I can point. These include the question of legal equality, which is the court challenges program I just talked about, and public education.

• (1055)

In April Canadian heritage, in collaboration with other federal departments and the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, launched a series of radio and television programs and ads in the first of a three–year campaign on violence in society. I want to thank the Canadian Association of Broadcasters for the undertaking. That is $10 million worth of publicity which we have enabled to happen. It will ensure that violence against women and children, violence in society and violence based on race, prejudice, hatred and bigotry no longer find a home in this country.

I just deposited in the House today a community kit on violence against women. It is to promote community action so that people in their own backyards, leur petit patelins, will take responsibility for auditing what is dangerous in their society and for undertaking collective community action to prevent violence and promote safety.

The community kit on violence against women was tested in 10 locations across the country. The stories tell us what took place, what was helpful, what was not helpful, and how the audit was a positive factor in small towns and regions and in larger cities.

We have published those stories and I think members would find them interesting reading. I advise members of the House to take a good look at this kit, take it back to their towns and villages and enable their constituents to take control of their own lives. We must control the violence that is inherent in our society and make sure that our women and children can walk the streets of our cities safely and can live in safe homes.

Over 2,000 projects have been funded across the country by Health Canada on child abuse, on violence against women and on senior abuse. The family violence initiative is now in its fourth year. It also funds the building of shelters for abused women and their children.

In June I met with my colleagues, the ministers of the status of women across Canada, in Regina. We discussed the whole question of violence against women. We discussed it from the provincial perspective and we discussed it from the federal perspective. We discussed what initiatives we each could take, collectively and collaboratively, to ensure that the lives of women and children were safe. We issued a Regina declaration on the rights of women subjected to violence. It calls on justice systems across this land to ensure the equal protection of women subjected to violence.

In November 1993 we received the Statistics Canada research which was very important. In April of this year Statistics Canada released data from a transition home survey. It revealed there was a 2 per cent increase in the occupancy rate from 1992 to 1993 by women fleeing from abusive situations.

Most women using shelters are aged 25 to 34. These women are in their child bearing years and are subjected to violence by aggressive men even when pregnant. They have children in their homes who are visibly upset and mentally disturbed by what they see, action taken against women as something acceptable within their society. Less than 10 per cent of shelters primarily served ethnocultural and visible minority women, although 41 per cent offered culturally sensitive services.

The Minister of Justice, the Minister of Health and I have conducted public consultations. We held consultations with women's groups on violence as well as on the budget and social security reform. This is a very important and effective means of understanding what is going on in our society.

[Translation]

During the first year of our mandate, I think we have given top priority to legislation aimed at better protecting women and children. The protection provided by law is the very foundation of personal and public security.

• (1100)

[English]

As we move to support the program that has been presented by my colleague, the Minister of Justice, on firearms control, I would suggest that we have an obligation to the women of the country. Women do not like guns. That is a pretty obvious understatement. Women are fearful of guns.

I do not have to argue that the issue of firearms control is one of crucial importance to women. Nationally women have already spoken out. Numerous women's organizations from across the country and from a wide variety of social and cultural backgrounds have come forward to support tougher firearms control laws.

If people want to own firearms then let them own them with responsibility. You have to get a licence and do various other things to own a car. For goodness sake, what is so terrible about doing the same thing to own a gun? We are not taking them away from people. Those people who object to firearms control should not object to having us know that they own a gun. It does not make any sense to have it any other way. Tighter restrictions on firearms are what we want and that is what we are responding to.

I would like to answer the Reform Party which is not very pleased with this. A poll conducted recently by Angus Reid revealed that as many as 70 per cent of all Canadians interviewed favoured tighter restrictions on firearms. Firearm control is also supported by Canadian teachers. In a joint statement two weeks ago the Canadian Teachers Federation and the Centrale de l'enseignement du Québec agreed that a series of measures, including the Minister of Justice's package on firearms control, was necessary to reduce violence in our society.

The Minister of Justice has consulted across the land from big cities to small cities to the towns and villages. He has met with all kinds of organizations. He has listened and he has adjusted, understanding the needs and the sport recreational aspects. He also understands what women have to say. Every one of us ought to support his measures.

We have also taken other legal measures. I think of how important the peace bond was in the amendments to the Criminal Code and the sentencing on abuse of trust. How many of us know about incestual relationships that have taken place? How many of us know of friends and children and particularly relatives whom we call on to babysit for us, who do not have a code of ethics and abuse that trust, teachers who have abused the trust, priests who have abused the trust? Abuse of trust and sexual abuse are not acceptable in Canadian society. We are moving on that bill.

We have established the national information system, the court challenges program. Other initiatives to improve the status of women, although not necessarily dealing with violence and abuse against women are equally important. There is the creation of the national breast cancer information exchange program, the establishment of the prenatal nutrition program and our work to help women achieve economic equality.

Economic equality gives women the freedom to move away from an abusive situation. If a woman is trapped with no money she fears leaving. Economic equality in our society tells women that their work is valued, that their contributions to society are honoured and respected. Therefore economic equality will help women care for themselves and their children, give them a sense of worth and a sense of independence, not merely out of the generosity of the heart of her husband, but because she contributes to his growth and development, to his success. She is deserving of a fair share of those earnings if she stays at home and raises children. Raising children in today's society is a value in and of itself.

I was very pleased to chair the task group on the treatment of child support. The government will be coming in shortly with a comprehensive package of guidelines for the courts. It will have an enforcement component and will look at tax treatment. This more comprehensive policy is long overdue.

We must find a way so that not so many children in our country are poor. Children are poor when their mothers are poor. That too is a violence against women. It is a violence against people in our society.

• (1105)

I would like to close my remarks by talking for a few moments about the Beijing conference which is coming up. In the international arena Canada is seen as very important and effective in addressing the concerns of women.

The machinery of government that we have set up to advise and counsel ministers on any kind of project, policy or legislation is seen as a very positive factor. The input our staff has made, because staff really equals service, and what we have been able to render in the international arena has been very important. We are not the only nation in the world seeking solutions to these issues. We can be proud of what we have done at the international level. We have played a leadership role in two key areas that I want to point out.

First was the adoption by the United Nations General Assembly of the declaration of the elimination of violence against women last December.

The second was the appointment of a United Nations special rapporteur on violence against women. That was an initiative of Canada as well. The rapporteur will report to the United Nations commission on human rights every year starting in March.

I had the pleasure of meeting the young woman who is filling that responsibility. We can have a sense of confidence that we are going to move forward on the international stage in this area.

In less than a year we will be meeting in Beijing for the fourth United Nations world conference on women. It has an enormous potential to act as a catalyst for change and progress on women's equality worldwide and particularly women's equality in China.

The role of the NGOs, the non–government organizations, has been very key, very different from Mexico and Nairobi. They have had a significant input into the preliminary documents we will be examining at that time. Ten key areas and key issues are of concern. It will look at women's struggles with poverty, with violence, with access to education and health, with access to power and decision making, to name but a few.

We want solutions to those problems right here for all Canadians. We do not have to wait until the UN world conference.

I encourage the women in the House to renew their commitment to women's equality today. I encourage them to speak out. The government intends to fulfil all its red book commitments with respect to the increase in funding for services for battered women. Public education campaigns will be ongoing and will enable behaviour modification with the goodwill and support of the men as partners in society. The options for removal of abusers from the home shall certainly be part and parcel of what we look at.

[Translation]

I am very happy to have had the opportunity here today to mention some of the things that make life more difficult for women. I look forward to working with our colleagues from the opposition and indeed with all Canadians, both men and women, who want to improve the lot of women, to prevent the increase in violence against women and to try to educate the public in order to eliminate this problem in our society.

The roses that all the members of the House placed in the hall on behalf of the 14 women indicate that the moment has come to rethink the society in which we live.

[English]

Let us remember. I thank all members of the House for the roses which were deposited outside in the hall.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Madam Speaker, I have several things to say to this government, in response to the motion tabled in the House this morning. I have no doubts about the hon. member's sincerity, and I am sure that, as a woman, she is more than aware of the problem of violence against women.

• (1110)

There is no need to repeat the latest statistics ad nauseam. Everyone knows them. Statistics can shock and move us, and for a few moments we are upset. We have a spontaneous urge to say: Something has to be done. What are governments doing about this? It does not happen quite that way in real life. So many times we are filled with anger and sadness as we read in the papers that another woman was slain by her spouse or former spouse.

Most people feel helpless to do anything about this phenomenon, and most people, unfortunately, do not feel directly concerned, and I will get back to this.

The fact remains that violence against women is a social problem and that society elects governments to give leadership and ensure its collective well–being. Politicians are very much aware of their role in this respect. That is why during every election campaign, politicians reflect and analyse and make promises. Of course, no politician would dare promise to deal with violence, once and for all. However, since they are very aware of the public's expectations, they promise action and funding to renew the hopes and obtain the trust of the voters.

As I said at the beginning of my speech, politicians are usually sincere. What happens after election day? Consider the present situation as an example. Since the situation exists here and now, people cannot accuse us of distorting the truth or letting the passage of time colour our perceptions.

The present government was very well intentioned. Like everyone else, it analysed the situation and made promises. It promised to make eliminating violence one of its big priorities. It found ways to do this. It would launch a massive public awareness campaign against violence. It would promote a community–based approach. It would introduce strict gun controls. It would tighten the provisions of the Criminal Code in order to eliminate spousal violence.

All this has a very direct and very specific connection with violence against women. Some progress has been made. The government will say it did not make any direct cuts in funding for shelters for female victims of violence, while other budget items were cut by 5 per cent.

The government will also say it experimented with the use of community kits. On the whole, it will say it is aware of the problems experienced by women who are victims of violence.

However, it has overlooked a number of things. It forgot about all the recommendations of the committees wich examined this problem, and met thousands of women and hundreds of agencies that worked with victims of violence. It forgot that they all reached the same conclusion: violence will continue as long as women are not treated as men's equals. That is the real problem. Women are unanimous in this.

This government could take a step towards equality and recognize that women, who are directly concerned after all, are perfectly capable of identifying the source of their problems, the symptoms and the solutions. If this elusive equality is ever to be achieved, the government will have to start by trusting our abilities, at least in this area. Women are adults. To stop being victims, they must be recognized as equal to men and treated as such in every respect and by everyone, governments included. This sounds so simple and so obvious that I am sure many of my male colleagues are thinking: Equality is already a fact, so what are they complaining about? What else do they want?

The answer is just as simple: Women want equality, and the government must help them, which it promised to do but did not.

Equality means equal rights. It means equal social, human and economic rights. Equal social rights means that unemployed women are treated the same as their spouses and not like economic stopgaps who work just to be able to afford a few luxuries like a fur coat every five years. It means a woman has the right to work, study and participate fully in the labour market.

• (1115)

Equality will not happen with this government which is preparing to treat working women as second–class citizens who depend on their husbands for a living and for whom the country should not invest its precious resources.

Equality means studying without accumulating a debt for a lifetime, if and when you can get a loan, because it is not so easy for women to borrow. How does this government expect women to be equal if they have to rely on men financially and on their husbands' bank account in order to get a diploma? It seems absurd! But that is exactly what this government is suggesting with its social reform. How on earth does the government intends to promote equality for women.

It is also hard to understand how this government can resort so much to rhetoric on equality and at the same time do so little to make it easier for mothers to have access to the workplace. Adequate day care services often are essential for women entering the labour market or taking occupational training. But what have they done in that area? They promised they would create thousands of new places in day care centres and even included this in the budget.

However, they robbed Peter to pay Paul. They made the creation of day care services conditional on the economic recovery. What a nice way to encourage job creation. What a perfect way to make sure women would stay home or rely on lower quality services for their children. This way, women can be accused of being bad mothers besides.

This government prefers to keep matters pending before the courts and pay their lawyers handsomely instead of paying their employees adequately and enabling them to improve their financial situation and become more self–sufficient.

Despite what women suggested, this government chose not to apply the Employment Equity Act to employees of Parliament, civil servants and employees of its many agencies and commissions and this same government talks about equality.

It is the same government which did not see the need to re–establish a committee which would thoroughly analyze problems experienced by women. How serious is the government about improving the living conditions of women, Madam Speaker? We have committees for everything, but not for promoting the cause of women. Fine proof of the real concerns of this government.

Equality also comes from fiscal justice, an area where the government does not really shine. How can it justify taking Mrs. Thibaudeau's case to the Supreme Court, when the decision brought some to parents, generally women, who receive support payments for their children. While the court was trying to restore some financial equity between the paying parent and the custodial parent, the Minister of Justice rushed to appeal, for fear of upsetting the Department of National Revenue. What a noble concern on the part of this government.

So women are left to fend for themselves. You will tell me that a committee is looking into the matter. Sure, and maybe in the same breath you will tell me that the committee will find solutions. The solutions are obvious to all, but the government spends its time and energy consulting. It is probably easier than taking action. Equality suffers, but who cares. The government's money is being saved and God knows that is the real priority.

Violence can take several forms.

● (1120)

It can be physical, and this is the most commonly recognized. It can psychological, and its consequences are just as severe, sometimes even more so. It could be financial and it could be emotional.

Whatever its form, violence is the result of inequality, whether physical or economical. It is the concrete expression of the perception that one person is worth less than the other, is not as important as the other one, in the eyes of society and the spouse.

To eliminate that perception, a tremendous amount of work must be done, first at the individual level, because that is where concrete results will be measured. However, as I said at the beginning, on the level of society as a whole, we need a government truly concerned about the problem, its consequences and root causes. All this government can do is make nice promises and hold public consultations. I urge it to take concrete action to help women achieve equality with men.

When I say equality, I mean equality across the board—social, personal, legal and financial equality. I mean a government which will take the concrete action needed to make equality between men and women possible and to impose it. Then we will see violence against women diminish some day.

I would like to tell you about an initiative taken in Quebec to mark the terrible tragedy that happened at the École Polytechnique. This initiative is co–sponsored by various communities: the business community, labour, the government, politicians, and associations.

I would like to read the message these Quebec partners signed. It is entitled "Never again".

> December 6, 1989 will remain forever engraved in our collective memory. On that day, 14 young women lost their lives at the École Polytechnique in Montreal, gunned down by a murderer who hated women. Five years later, we must turn our minds to the devastated families and their pain, to the sadness and the anger that overcame all of us, men and women alike.
> This tragic event shook our entire society. It revealed the truth that women are targets of violence on a daily basis, at work and in the street, in daylight hours as well as at night, in times of peace or war, regardless of the region or country in which they live.
> Through the efforts of individuals, groups, and public or government organizations, various measures have been taken to identify and oppose violence against women. But we all know that it persists.
> Each of us must be vigilant and condemn all forms of violence against women. We must commit ourselves collectively to building a non–violent world. December 6, 1989 must never return. NEVER AGAIN.
> Today we remember— in order to change.

This message appeared in several Quebec dailies; 76 associations and agencies, including the council on the status of women got together to commemorate, in a very special way, that tragic day when 14 young women lost their lives.

I would like to list the names of all the signatories to this beautiful message: Assembly of quebec bishops; Association des collaboratrices et partenaires en affaires; association of Quebec native women; Quebec psychiatric association; Association des ressources intervenant auprès des hommes violents; Association des sexologues du Quebec; women's association for education and social action; Association québécoise Plaidoyer–victimes; Avon Canada; Quebec bar association; Quebec teaching congress; congress of democratic unions; centre for interdisciplinary research on family violence and violence against women; Chambre des notaires du Québec; college of Quebec physicians; human rights commission; confederation of national trade unions; Quebec conference of regional health and social services boards.

Madam Speaker, the list goes on: Montreal council of women; council on the status of women; Développement québécois de la sécurité des femmes; Fédération des ressources d'hébergement pour les femmes violentées et en difficulté; Quebec federation of CLSCs; Quebec federation of catholic school commissions; Quebec women's federation; federation of Quebec nurses; Quebec federation of labour; Quebec family planning federation; Groupe d'aide et d'information sur le harcèlement sexuel au travail dans la province du Quebec; Le Devoir; Le Journal de Montréal; Le Protecteur du citoyen.

And there are others: Quebec says no to violence against women: Les cercles de fermières du Québec; Institut de recherche des centres de femmes du Québec; order of nurses of Quebec; Ordre des psychologues du Québec; Ordre professionnel des travailleurs sociaux du Québec; Regroupement des centres de santé des femmes du Québec; Regroupement des équipes régionales Espace; Regroupement des maisons de jeunes du Québec; Regroupement provincial des maisons d'hébergement et de transition pour femmes victimes de violence conjugale; Regroupement québécois des centres d'aides et de lutte contre les agressions à caractère sexuel; Relais–femmes; Réseau des répondants à la condition des femmes, ODM, diocese of Quebec; Service d'orientation et de consultation psychologique de l'Université de Montréal; Sûreté du Québec; Quebec government employees union.

And the list goes on: the union of professional employees of the Quebec government; The Gazette; the University of Montreal; the University of Sherbrooke; the University of Quebec in Montreal; Laval University; McGill University; Jacques Parizeau, Premier of Quebec; Lucien Bouchard and all members of the Bloc Quebecois; Louise Beaudoin, Minister responsible for Canadian Intergovernmental Affairs; Paul Bégin, Minister of Justice; Jeanne Blackburn, Minister of Income Security and Minister responsible for the Status of Women; Jacques Brassard, Minister of the Environment and Wildlife; Jean Campeau, Minister of Finance and Minister of Revenue; Guy Chevrette, Minister of Municipal Affairs; Rita Dionne–Marsolais, Minister of Culture and Communications and Minister responsible for Tourism; Jean Garon, Minister of Education.

And also: François Gendron, Minister of Natural Resources; Louise Harel, Minister of Employment; Bernard Landry, Minister of International Affairs, Immigration and Cultural Communities; Marcel Landry, Minister of Agriculture, Fisheries and Food; Richard Le Hir, Minister responsible for Restructuring; Jacques Léonard, Minister of Transport; Pauline Marois, Minister responsible for Administration and Public Service, President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for the Family; Serge Ménard, Minister of Public Security; Daniel Paillé, Minister of Industry, Trade, Science and Technology; and Jean Rochon, Minister of Health and Social Services.

That, Madam Speaker, is the list of all the people who endorsed the statement marking this sad anniversary.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): We are now into 20–minute speeches with 10 minutes for questions and comments at the end.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Madam Speaker, as I enter the discussion regarding violence against members of society, particularly women, I begin by pointing out how human life seems to have been devalued in our society. When I look at the changes of attitude that have occurred in this regard, I look at such things as abortion, euthanasia and mercy killings. I see a greater and greater acceptance of these measures which suggests an insensitivity toward human life that has led to a devaluation of human life.

Today marks an anniversary I am sure most Canadians wish did not exist. However, not to remember invalidates the lives that were lost as a result of a violent and vicious attack perpetrated because one male took out his fear, hate and frustration on a group of innocent young defenceless women.

The cause of this crime is at the heart of the debate on violence against women and other members of our society. Why are men attacking women? Why are husbands beating wives? Why is violence against women occurring at such a high rate, certainly a higher rate than before.

These are the questions we must attempt to answer if we are ever to eradicate or at least reduce violence.

• (1130)

Until we can answer these questions and until we can determine the causes of violence, we will continue to have a problem in this country which defies logic and a problem which threatens to destroy the strongest foundation we have, the family.

From 1981 to 1990 almost one half, or 48 per cent, of the women killed were killed by spouses or ex–spouses. A further 27 per cent were killed by acquaintances. Over the past 10 years 67 per cent of the homicides involving women occurred in the victims' homes. Spousal homicides amount to one out of every six solved homicides. According to statistics, over the period 1974 to 1992 a married woman was nine times as likely to be killed by her spouse as by a stranger. The rates of spousal homicide have remained fairly constant over a 19–year period.

These statistics reveal a shocking situation. Repeatedly governments in this country have neglected to address the issue which is the cause of crime. They have failed to determine, understand and do something about the causes of domestic violence. Harsher penalties, stricter gun controls and statistics gathering have done nothing to eliminate the rate of spousal homicide in this country, nothing to decrease the growing violence on Canadian streets and nothing to eradicate violence against women.

Fifty–two per cent of the spousal homicides in 1991–92 were attributed by the police to an argument or quarrel and a further 24 per cent to jealousy. What the statistics and police failed to reveal is what the argument or quarrel was about, why it occurred in the first place. I believe that finances and financial stress are at the heart of most domestic difficulties and arguments. Canadian families are under tremendous stress these days, stresses that are directly imposed on them by the economic state of this country and indirectly imposed on them by the fiscal and monetary mismanagement of this and previous governments.

With an unemployment rate of 10.8 per cent, which I understand has dropped recently to below 10 per cent, many Canadians are without a job and for those who do have a job, the volatility and uncertainty of the current job market means that no one has job security.

Years ago men and women could count on their job always being there. Job security is a thing of the past. We have not helped Canadians adapt to that situation. We have not helped Canadians adapt to many of the economic and social situations that have been rapidly destroying their way of life.

While banks reveal record profits, many Canadians are declaring personal and business bankruptcy because their debt load has become unmanageable given the relatively high interest and tax rates in this country.

We witness every day the impact financial stress is having on Canadian families. In 1991–92 statistics show that alcohol was involved in 37 per cent of slain wives and 82 per cent of slain husbands. Among perpetrators, 55 per cent of men and 79 per cent of women were noted to have consumed alcohol and 18 per cent of men and 13 per cent of women had used drugs.

I pause here to emphasize that we do not address the cause of the problems. So often we are told not only in ads in newspapers but on television to ensure that when you are drinking that you have a designated driver so that you can get plastered if you want. The only concern those ad makers and those who are paying for them have is simply to ensure that a person is not impaired as he drives home. No care or concern is given to the family situation when that drunk is dropped off at his home where he may go in and abuse his wife or his children. There is no indication that there is any interest in reducing the consumption of alcohol in this country which police and statistics indicate clearly is a direct contributing factor to crime and violence in this country.

According to statistics, alcohol was consumed by both parties in 41 per cent of wife victim cases and in 78 per cent of husband victim cases.

• (1135)

Alcohol abuse is induced by stress. We do nothing to help the alcoholic or solve his problem if we do not determine the cause of that stress.

Why are Canadians assaulting and killing one another? That is the question which must be answered if we ever hope to reduce violence in our society. This is true whether we are dealing with young offenders, wife beaters, child molesters or murderers.

Governments in co–operation with community and service organizations, churches, schools and Canadian families must find the answer to these questions. It is a monumental task but it is a task we must undertake because our traditional response to the problem of violence is not working.

In response to public appeals for preventive action the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General unanimously agreed on May 6, 1992, exactly five months after the Tories' gun legislation, Bill C–17, received royal assent, to commence a national study of crime prevention. The committee concluded:

> Traditional criminal justice responses while necessary are insufficient deterrents to acts that threaten public safety and security and the conventional crime control model fails to address the underlying factors associated with crime and criminality.

In other words the committee found that the gun control legislation, sentencing, additional police officers and law enforcement agencies, more prisons and an increasingly negative bureaucratic answer do not and will not solve the growing problem of crime within this country.

Presented to the committee were studies conducted in England, Canada and the United States. In relation to young offenders, these studies revealed that a minority of male offenders are responsible for the majority of all crimes committed.

The president of the Quebec Association of Police and the director of the Hull police force described to the committee research findings showing that 80 per cent of crimes are committed by approximately 20 per cent of the offenders.

Self reports and arrest records of offenders who have long criminal histories revealed to the committee that offending began when they were very young, that their offending became progressively more violent and that a significant proportion of persistent young offenders become the adult offenders of the future.

A criminology professor with the University of Ottawa told the committee that about 75 per cent to 80 per cent of incarcerated adults were persistent offenders in their youth. The committee heard that the level of crime in a society cannot be separated from the social, economic and political milieu in which it occurs. Social science research has identified many interrelated factors in the social environment of persistent offenders that contribute to crime.

Although the committee made a number of recommendations regarding crime prevention to the previous government based on its findings, the previous government did not introduce or even propose measures that demonstrated it was taking a leadership role in crime prevention.

We have a new government but the same approach to crime. We seem to be satisfied to deal with the symptoms of crime rather than to get at the cause of crime. Until the government of the day can identify the cause of crime, until it can identify the reasons for domestic violence and violence against women, we will continue to have this problem.

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I congratulate the secretary of state for her excellent presentation on a very important matter to all members who are going to speak on this very important subject.

I have one quick example to share with members about domestic violence. I spent about five years serving as a board member of the shelter for battered women in my riding of Mississauga South. It is called Interim Place. I am very pleased that Interim Place was able to arrange for additional funding and arrange for a second shelter to be built.

Members would be interested to know that in one month alone while I was on the board 80 women were turned away from our shelter because there were no beds left. There was no place for them to go with their children. That gives some idea of the magnitude of the problem we have in Canada. As the minister has stated, one half of all women will experience domestic violence in their lives.

I ask the member whether he would agree that because of the seriousness of the issue of domestic violence and the fact that there is presently a bill before this House, Bill C–41, which tries to identify aggravating circumstances of bias, prejudice or hate, that the matter of domestic violence or spousal abuse be included as a matter which would demonstrate bias, prejudice and hate and warrant a more serious sentence than the simple offence that was committed.

Mr. Ramsay: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I think it is important. When we deal with penalties for offences committed, I think that if the state wishes to stiffen penalties we can do that, but we all ought to stand equal before the law. The courts and judges ought to be left with the discretion based upon the circumstances to decide whether a more severe penalty should be imposed upon the culprit who through motivation of hatred or bias commits an offence against another.

I enforced the law for 14 years and I never saw an assault upon another person motivated by anything but anger, hatred or bias. I have never seen an assault conducted by a positive emotion of love or compassion. I have never experienced that. I have never taken anyone into court on that basis, and I have taken hundreds of people into courts for other types of offences during my service.

When I consider the hon. member's question and I look at Bill C–41, I ask myself why is it that we cannot leave this matter to the courts. Yes, enhance the penalties, make them stiffer. Surely when the court feels that mitigating circumstances indicate a more serious penalty ought to be levied, the court should have the discretion to do so.

Hon. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased and honoured to join in the debate this morning that this House take note of the anniversary of the murder of 14 women at l'École polytechnique on December 6, 1989, and the continuing urgent need for action to eliminate the threat of violence in society, including the threat of violence against women.

I find this debate particularly important because a year ago today I went to a memorial in Montreal. I spoke at the memorial for the 14 women. It is an experience that has left me with a commitment to society, a personal commitment to see that human beings show respect and dignity to one another that is deserved, a love, caring and commitment to work hard with all people in society.

We must work with men, women, families and communities, different levels of government, all the institutions in our country and with our children, toward a violence free society. It is a very difficult thing to do in this day and age when the world is seized with wars.

• (1145)

We have mass media with pervasive influence that shows violence and there is desensitization about the effect of it. We have an onerous task not just to make laws but to make it a state of mind. We have a commitment to deal with it in a very human way. It is not just an issue on one day of the year; it is a state of mind. It is the way we live. It is the way we relate to each other. It is the state of mind with which we approach the work we do as lawmakers, as legislators.

Recently I was unable to attend a conference in Vancouver and one of my female colleagues from the area replaced me as there were things that needed to be said that I felt very strongly about. These are some of the things that were said: "Our voices need to be added to the urgent debate about the challenges facing Canada's families. Violence is not an issue of one person or of one gender. It is an issue of humanity and it is an issue of all peoples".

I am especially pleased to speak to the vision of Canadian families living violence free. I am proud to be a member of a team that dares to dream, one that has faith in our capacity as individuals and as a nation. Our dream for the country was clearly described in our document "Creating Opportunity". It is based on the belief that each of us can be part of the solution.

I am particularly proud of my colleagues, the Minister of Justice and the Secretary of State for the Status of Women. It is not easy to seize particular issues that would help free society of those who would perpetrate violent acts and those who would take the opportunity not to do good. To roll that into a legislative agenda, to roll that into something that is accessible, fair and universal in approach, is very difficult.

I look at the different attempts by the minister to change the Criminal Code and to deal with a number of very contentious issues, controversial issues, such as gun control legislation. A very difficult agenda is set for these individuals. I appreciate the work they have done.

We are committed to changing the future and recreating Canada in a way that works better for all of us. We believe we can build a better country through stronger children and stronger families. People tend to focus on one issue or one aspect. Segmentation or compartmentalization of issues makes it easier, more manageable, but is not realistic.

We cannot separate the child and say the child is unaffected. We cannot say the spouse, the family, the grandmother or the community is unaffected when there is violence in a family or in a community. It does not work that way. It is pervasive. The power of things that go wrong, the negative things, is very influential on people, many of whom are young children in their formative years.

We are committed. Our vision stems from the simple but profound philosophy that everyone has the right to safe homes, safe streets, and a life free of violence. No one deserves to be abused physically, sexually, emotionally or financially. No one has the right to control another person by threat, coercion, physical intimidation or any other abuse of power and control. Child abuse and neglect, child sexual abuse, wife assault, spousal assault, other forms of violence against women and other people, and the mistreatment of seniors and persons with disabilities are serious abuses of power within families and relationships of trust and dependency with detrimental consequences for all of us. They shame us as individuals and as a society. Those are the people who depend on us the most. They have greater need and less capacity to care for themselves. They are the disabled, children and seniors. Those people do not deserve to be mistreated. They do not deserve to be treated with anything but kindness and generosity.

The costs of violence and personal suffering, social breakdown and direct government expenditure are incalculable. The hundreds of millions of dollars in social spending do not begin to pay the price of broken spirits and damaged lives, in some cases irretrievably damaged. Sometimes it starts a cycle that continues from one generation to another. It takes an enormous amount of effort to break that cycle or the silence. To correct those wrongs costs a lot more money and takes a lot more effort than if we are proactive and able to take preventive measures. We are paid back enormously for taking those steps.

The complexity of family violence requires a long term, co–ordinated approach to address the root causes. We must eradicate the conditions that contribute to family violence and provide the proper environment for young people to escape the vicious cycle associated with abuse.

Only when each and every Canadian lives without fear can we say we live in a violence free society. An important part of the solution is to influence the conditions of socioeconomic inequality that reduce vulnerability to family violence. It is not an excuse; it is a condition. Violence is inexcusable but there are mitigating factors. There are things beyond control, beyond the emotional, financial and social capacities of individuals who fall victim to becoming perpetrators.

We need to address sexism, ageism, ableism, racism and other isms. We need to assure adequate access for all to appropriate services before we can hope to make Canada a safer place. The federal government recognizes the need to treat these issues as fundamental social problems with widespread ramifications for our families, indeed our entire society.

I am particularly worried about young people as the Secretary of State for Training and Youth. We give our children an enormous gift when we teach them to care and to nurture properly, when we teach them to respect the dignity of other persons, when we teach them to treasure having children, having grandchildren and belonging to a family. They are not to be neglected or abused. They are to be cared for and to be taught. Good values and principles that presumably guide what we do, even in the House, should be passed on.

Each year the federal government directs millions of dollars to Canadian children and their families to ensure they have access to the necessary conditions required for optimal health and personal growth and development.

We have introduced a variety of preventive measures including the child development initiative, the child sexual abuse and family violence prevention initiatives, and building healthy aboriginal communities aimed specifically at providing protection for children and creating safer communities through social development and social investment.

A central consideration in these reforms is the security of children and their families. We are asking what people need in the form of rehabilitation and family support services, education, skills upgrading and training to take control of their lives. How can we help families succeed?

If we empower people with adequate means and opportunity, we are convinced that we will enable them to access education and employment opportunities that lead to healthy, rewarding, self–sufficient lives. As a result it will allow people to provide a better quality of life for their families.

In a perfect world that would be enough but life is more complicated than that. There are things beyond the control of lawmakers. There are things beyond the control of governments at all levels. There are things beyond the control of people of goodwill. These are the things we expect. However they do not stop us from working, continuing to push and believing there is a better tomorrow. We have to try harder for our families, for our children, and essentially for our community and our country.

When children thrive our society is renewed. By nurturing healthy youth, ensuring they are physically, mentally and emotionally well, educated and employed, we run the best chance of creating healthy families.

I guess we are successful in many people's eyes. We have jobs we are proud of and have managed to earn a living. We are honoured to represent the people. In the end society will not judge us on how well we do but on how well our children and our grandchildren do and what we contribute to our communities. How well our children and grandchildren do will be the significant judgment of us in terms of what we have contributed to society.

These efforts reflect a growing movement not only in favour of prevention but in support of fundamental, social, economic and cultural change. It is a movement toward investing in people. We have a lot to do but we have each other to do it. Canadians working together, dedicated to building healthier communities, are making a dramatic difference. Not only are we proving that families matter. We are demonstrating we can make improvements in people's lives by refusing to tolerate societal violence.

Let us talk about various forms of violence. Let us take a look at a 10–year old or 14–year old child. I have raised three children. I know what children of those ages are like. We wonder where the children are and whether we have hugged them today. All that comes to mind.

Let us take one city in our country which I will not name because it would not be fair. There is a problem in that city; it has 400 juvenile prostitutes between the ages of 10 and 14. That is not prostitution, that is juvenile or child sex abuse. It is a real problem. It is a form of violence that has been perpetrated upon our most helpless, our most treasured, our young people.

We have a responsibility. It is not only in one city. There is a problem in every city one could name. I make it my business to go to the source to see young people. We cannot do everything but we are doing some things right when we help those young people.

It cannot be done alone. It is not a woman's problem or a child's problem. It is everybody's problem and everybody's responsibility. As a caring and just society we have no option but to make families our priority. We owe it to our children and to ourselves. If the challenges are great, the promise of progress has never been better.

In 1994, the International Year of the Family, families have assumed their place on international and national agendas. Throughout the International Year of the Family the Government of Canada, in partnership with all sectors of society, has worked for the betterment of Canadian families. These partnerships have contributed to sensitizing Canadians to numerous and complex issues facing today's families such as family violence.

Most important, we must reinforce the principle that strong and healthy families create strong, healthy and productive societies. By building on this momentum we will recreate Canada together in a way that mirrors our dreams and hopes for ourselves and will achieve our visions for our children and our future.

It is interesting to note that in my riding of the Northwest Territories there are four women's shelters.

• (1200)

This coming weekend one of my tours of going to the source as I put it will be to Sutherland House which is a shelter for women. Oddly enough it is communities that care that establish these shelters. They try to help themselves by helping the victims, by helping the families and the children. Whether or not we like to admit it most of them are women and children. They are the primary victims who take refuge. They are the ones who have to leave their homes, their living rooms, their beds to seek shelter elsewhere.

Shelters have a 24–hour crisis line and apparently that is not enough. I have visited other shelters in communities such as Hay River. All these people have their own stories to tell but the big one is that we need to continue to work. We need to continue not to isolate people nor to blame or to point fingers. We need to join hands and work together. If we cannot stop these people who perpetrate violence, we can take measures that will help the people caught in those unhealthy relationships take the steps to get out, to make the commitment for a better life for a better tomorrow.

Thirty–nine per cent of all women in violent marriages have reported that their children witnessed the violence against them. This is interesting because shelter workers in my riding believe that at least one in four NWT women have been abused by their partners. The NWT rate of reported sexual assault is the highest in the country. Girls 7 to 18 years old were the complainants in 54 per cent of sexual assault cases in the Northwest Territories for 1988 and 1989.

In Canada women are assaulted an average of 35 times before the police are called to assist. In Canada one in three women will be sexually assaulted by a man at home at some time in her life. Twenty–nine per cent of all women in Canada who have been married or who have lived in a common–law relationship have experienced physical or sexual violence at the hands of their partner. In Canada 90 per cent of sexual assault crimes are not reported to the police.

According to the 1991 census there were 27,595 women in the Northwest Territories and 47.4 per cent of the population was over 15 years old. Forty per cent of all aboriginal peoples identified family violence as an important problem in their community. People on reserve and Inuit identify these forms of violence more than those who live off reserve and Métis. That is from the Canadian Institute of Child Health. It goes without saying that we definitely have a real problem but more than that we have to work on our commitment.

We have to remember that we have a commitment to our children, to societies and to ourselves. Each and every one of us whether we are men or women have a commitment to the kind of work we want to see out there. We want to see results. We have a commitment to our communities and to our country. In remembering those 14 women we can build something positive from this.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to my colleague, the Secretary of State for Training and Youth, and my friend, the member for Chambly, who is sitting behind me, said that sometimes the governing party's right hand does not know what its left hand is doing.

Violence against women will never stop unless and until we have complete and total equality. The Canadian government must start by setting an example. Complete and total equality begins in the cradle, of course, at school, in day care, in college, in university and finally reaches the work place.

• (1205)

When the government here can say that it pays its staff the same regardless of sex, we will say thanks. It will be a step in the right direction when our children will be completely safe everywhere.

For example, in Sherbrooke, in my region, there were three rapes in six weeks. My daughter, who is studying police science in college, was walking in the vulnerable area with a female friend. They were stopped by the police, who told them not to walk there. They asked why. He said that as good–looking girls, they were in danger of being raped.

You see, because they were girls, they were not allowed to walk on the sidewalk in a part of the city. That is equality.

Another girl told me that she was also walking, alone, it is true, and was harassed by two people in a car. She had time to take down the licence number. A few seconds later, a policeman passed. She signaled him and gave him the message. He told her: "You should not be walking here. It is a bad area. You are in the red–light district. Go and walk somewhere else." That is the kind of freedom we offer our women and girls.

The Secretary of State for Training and Youth said that she had raised three children. I too have three children, including two girls. I would not be proud if my two daughters were not able to find as good a job as my son, because of unequal treatment. I would not be proud of the government of my country, be it Quebec or Canada, where my children would not have access to equality.

Earlier, when the hon. member for Chambly alluded to double talk, I was reminded of the famous but tragic Thibaudeau case. Who is appealing Ms. Thibaudeau's case to the Supreme Court? The government opposite.

The social program reform will primarily hit spouses, because from now on the family income, that is the salaries of both spouses, will be taken into account. Double talk indeed. I cannot wait to see a government which will not resort to this double talk, a government which will act and act swiftly.

Here is the best example. Today marks the fifth anniversary of the tragedy at the École polytechnique, where 14 young women were killed in cold blood. The government started talking about firearms control. Some statement was made last week in the House, but things will drag on until 2002 or 2003 before the issue is settled. Tragedies such as the one which occurred at the École polytechnique could be repeated several times before tight and strict legislation is in place.

I was told last week that in some Montreal clubs, bars or taverns, it is easy to get very dangerous offensive weapons for a few thousand dollars. It is as easy to buy a firearm as a good used car.

• (1210)

I would like to hear the Secretary of State for Training and Youth, because she sounded really sincere earlier. I want to ask her if she is ready to stick her neck out by asking her government and cabinet to stop using this double talk once and for all and to do everything it can to ensure that women of all ages can truly enjoy gender equality.

[English]

Ms. Blondin–Andrew: Madam Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for my hon. colleague across the way to make the unreasonable demand of asking me to put my seat in the House on the line. There are other ways to deal with some of the serious issues he has brought forward.

Gender equality is not one that escapes me. I have been a working woman all of my life. I know the trials and tribulations of essentially what used to be working in a man's world. In a sense we are graced with the presence of many good working women in this House at many different levels and in many capacities.

Let me deal with some of the issues my hon. colleague has addressed. He talked about putting my seat in this House on the line for the equality of women and to bridge the pay gap between men and women and that sort of thing. It should be noted that we have taken great steps to have a more inclusive employment equity legislation put forward. We are working on it at this very time. He will be happy to know that it is mostly women who do a lot of the work on this legislation. It is not just for women, but for the disabled, visible minorities as well as aboriginal peoples who are also equally challenged.

The member talks about the full security of children being able to live above the poverty line. With social security reform it is becoming very evident that child poverty is one issue we are very seized with, but we cannot just wave the wand and expect all the problems to go away. It will become evident as will all of these proposals as the responses come back that child poverty is one of the concerns we share with my hon. colleague.

The other case he cited was a typical one. There is a process in place but I will not speak to it because it has already been advanced to a higher level. The member talks about the issue of income testing. The hon. member knows there is a process in place with regard to social security reform. The proposals are with the committee which is going across the country listening to people. People have expressed very loudly and clearly similar concerns about income testing. All those things will be ultimately considered.

A man sitting across the way should not ask a women to put her seat in this House on the line if he really believes in gender equality.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I would like to say it gives me great pleasure to stand and speak before the House on this issue, however I feel that the fifth anniversary of a tragic event is not really a time for celebration but one for reflection. It is the fifth anniversary of the massacre at l'École polytechnique in Montreal. I think all Canadians feel a sense of horror that anything such as that should ever happen in our country.

It was a tragedy when 14 young women were slain simply because they were female. I do not think there is anybody who does not feel the sense of outrage that gender should have been a factor in why anyone, male or female, would decide to end the lives of 14 young women.

In my one year as a member of Parliament I have met with dozens of parents whose children were slain. Children were slain because their murderers did not like the way they were wearing their hats. Children were slain because the murderer was intoxicated. Children were slain because they were walking down a busy street in the middle of the afternoon and just happened to run into the wrong person.

• (1215)

Parents are unanimous that the justice system must be changed. They want to know how it can be called a justice system when it calls for Robert Latimer to receive a life sentence with no hope of parole for at least 10 years for killing his disabled daughter in what some perceive to be an act of mercy.

Compare that with a man named Glenn Williams from my constituency who murdered his wife, the mother of four young children, the youngest six months old and still nursing. This man not only murdered his wife, but proceeded to clean up the house, clean up the murder scene, clean up the body of his wife, put her back into bed and call attention to the fact six hours later.

The murder scene gave no indication of what really took place. All that we have is the version given by the murderer, by Mr. Glenn Williams. While he was originally charged with second degree murder, he was instead convicted of manslaughter. He received a five–year sentence.

The law says that Robert Latimer will serve a minimum of 10 years for his crime. The same law says that Glenn Williams will only have to serve 20 months. The system itself is flawed. For the last 20 years society has put the emphasis on the rights of the offender rather than the protection of society. This has to change.

The number one priority of the criminal justice system has to be the protection of society. We will never eliminate all the violent crime from our communities, from our society. Crimes of passion, fits of anger will always exist. Unfortunately a lot of crimes are committed by people who choose to abuse substances. That will always be with us unless we are willing to deal with the situation.

People are extremely upset when crimes are committed by previous offenders. How many opportunities must an individual get to continually violate, abuse and commit violent crimes against another person? How many people should an individual be allowed to hurt?

At the Reform Party's last assembly we passed a resolution that would call for criminals who have committed their second serious personal injury offence to be automatically designated as dangerous offenders. That means these people would be subjected to indefinite sentences. If the parole board believes these people are still dangerous they would continue to be incarcerated. If they are perceived to be a minimum risk or a good risk for parole, they could be paroled and let free. They would always be subject to some kind of supervision for the rest of their lives, considering what risk they pose to society.

Right away members from the Bloc will probably call such a measure draconian. The fact remains that a recent poll by Léger and Léger showed that 76 per cent of Quebecers agreed with this position. Only 16 per cent were opposed. I am confident that if a poll were taken across the country we would see similar results. Most Canadians agree that serious offences by dangerous offenders should be considered in that manner.

Canadians are sick and tired of criminals being allowed to commit serious crimes over and over again. Take the case of Wray Budreo. This man has over 35 convictions for sexual offences against children over a 30–year period. For his last conviction he received six years. Only a public outcry prevented him from receiving a statutory release and he was required to serve the entire sentence. The day his sentence expired people were outside the prison gates protesting his release, with just cause I would suggest. The law said that he had to be released even though many considered him still to be dangerous and a risk to society. When it was learned that he was residing in Peterborough many of the residents were concerned about his presence until he moved to Toronto.

Mr. Budreo was upset with the attention he was receiving. He says he is not a threat and that he just wants to get on with his life. I hope Mr. Budreo knows himself well enough to be making that kind of assurance to society. I hope that he never commits another criminal offence. I hope no other child becomes one of his victims. But the odds are not in his favour.

Paedophiles like Ray Budreo cannot be cured. At the very best they can only be controlled. But because of our justice system we cannot even see that Budreo is being controlled. The justice system says there is nothing it can do to protect society, to protect other children from becoming his victims. It infuriates Canadians to hear that their justice system cannot do anything to protect them from this kind of violent offender.

There is something that we as parliamentarians can do and that is to enact legislation that is necessary to protect society. Some legislation may infringe on the rights of criminals but incarceration in itself can be considered an infringement on the rights of criminals. We cannot abrogate our responsibilities as lawmakers just because we fear court challenges. The people of Canada have entrusted us to enact the necessary legislation to protect them. I would suggest that we have an obligation to Canadians to do just that.

This thought, this concern, was reiterated by Justice George Finlayson of the Ontario Court of Appeal this past Friday. In commenting on the appeal of Keith Léger, the justice made the following comment: "If society wants paedophiles more tightly controlled then it is up to the Government of Canada to legislate—but certainly not up to the court to stretch existing laws to the maximum". I think with Léger that is what this trial judge did. That is where we are at. It is up to us to make the laws.

When the justice minister introduced his gun control package last week he said that his package has the support of the majority of Canadians. I am pleased to see that the minister acknowledges the importance of the feelings of Canadians. I would like to take it for granted that the minister will soon be introducing a bill that would reintroduce capital punishment. After all a majority of Canadians favour the reintroduction of capital punishment into our justice system.

Unfortunately it would appear that is unlikely to occur. I would like to suggest to the Minister of Justice that he cannot have it both ways. If he wishes to invoke the spirit of public support with some legislation then he should be doing it with all legislation. If his gun control package is good legislation because he has the support of a majority of Canadians then reintroduction of capital punishment would be an equally good measure because it definitely has the support of the majority of Canadians.

This is a deciding factor in distinguishing the difference between the two parties. For the Reform Party the will of the majority of Canadians has priority whether it conforms with party policy or not. With the Liberal Party public support is only relevant to those issues where the majority of Canadians happen to agree with it.

Let us not make any mistake here. The public are demanding that tougher laws be enacted in our criminal justice system. Right now the justice committee is considering Bill C–37 which deals with amendments to the Young Offenders Act. Nothing seems to stir up citizens more than seeing young offenders being dealt with with kid gloves after they have committed serious and violent criminal offences. If we condone or minimize the violent acts of our young people against others how can we stand in the House denouncing violence against women? It is one thing to bring in the reverse onus clause for 16 and 17 year olds but Canadians believe they should be treated as adults, particularly when they commit serious violent offences against others.

• (1225)

In my spring householder I asked the following question: "Should the age limit in the Young Offenders Act be lowered from the current 12 to 17 year olds to cover only 10 to 15 year olds?" With almost 3,500 answers the response was 91 per cent in favour. Ninety–one per cent of my constituents thought that the age limit in the Young Offenders Act should be lowered. I am sure that if the Liberals asked the same questions in their householders they would get similar responses.

Does public opinion still matter to the government, or will it try and evoke that parochial attitude that "it knows better"? How can it use one tragic, heinous crime five years ago to justify an attack against all men as being violent against women in general? Canadians are demanding protection from all violent crimes; against men, against women and against children.

In the face of this concern experts keep telling us that violent crime is not really increasing. They point to a number of surveys to justify their claim. I do not feel like getting into a statistical war but I would like to present one statistic. According to Statistics Canada, in 1971 there were 204 crimes of violence for 100,000 persons; in 1991, just 20 years later, that rate had jumped to 1,099 crimes of violence for 100,000 persons. That is a 500 per cent increase in violent crimes in the last 20 years. That is what Canadians are concerned about.

Twenty years ago parents had no problem with young children playing with their friends outside. Today young children usually play under parental supervision. Twenty years ago high school students did not have any fears walking to school. Today young people are encouraged to walk in pairs or in groups, not just girls but also the boys.

The danger of walking alone really hit home in my community on October 4 of this year. Sixteen year old Pamela Cameron, a young girl who had just moved to our community, had just left school, had coffee and muffins with some friends of hers at a muffin shop and was walking along the busiest street in our community in the middle of the afternoon to visit her boyfriend. She did not make it.

Two blocks from my constituency office at four o'clock in the afternoon, Pamela Cameron was murdered. She was pulled off the busiest road in my community into some bushes and brutally murdered.

For the next week or so while the murderer was still at large, the community was in absolute distress. There was such fear in my community that parents would no longer let their children walk to school by themselves. They were driving their kids to school. They were driving their kids to their jobs. They were not allowing their daughters and their sons out of the house.

Ten days later when the individual gave himself up to authorities and was charged with the murder, there was a tremendous relief in our community. Finally they could finally feel a little more comfortable. Then the sense of relief over the tension of the capture of the accused turned to anger when they found out that this accused had a criminal record and was considered to be a violent and dangerous offender when he was released from prison.

To the credit of my constituents they turned that anger into something very positive. They formed community groups that would be available to search for missing youngsters immediately. They began a campaign to support my private member's bill which deals with being allowed to keep dangerous offenders in detention after the expiration of their warrant. In one day at a local shopping mall they were able to collect 1,000 letters each addressed to the Solicitor General and to the Minister of Justice. They were able to come up with a petition with 6,700 names. In Milton, Ontario, where the young girl came from her older sister collected over 10,000 names on a similar petition, a community showing its support for a private member's bill that talked about dealing with dangerous offenders in a very serious way.

Something quite miraculous happened last week. Despite the fact that all members of the Liberal Party and the Bloc who spoke in debate were against the bill, last Thursday that bill miraculously passed second reading unanimously. I am not sure what happened but I would like to think it was the indication of the public that they were extremely concerned about violence in our society and they wanted this House to pass legislation to deal with the problem and to put the protection of society above and beyond the rights of the accused.

On this fifth anniversary of the massacre at l'École polytechnique we must pay special attention to violence against women. We as a society must clearly send a signal that domestic violence against women and children will not be tolerated any more than violence against strangers. Whether the violence originates with a spouse, another relative, a friend, a coworker, a boss or even a stranger it is a concern we have to deal with. Evolution has given males a physical strength, a superiority over females but our laws are supposed to level out the playing field.

Unfortunately for many years the law has been complacent with some forms of violence against women, especially spousal abuse. Even today while society publicly condemns the act, that the victim was the offender's partner appears to be a mitigating factor in these crimes.

We cannot continue to excuse violence against women or children. We must continue to address this problem. Whether it is through education, community intervention, treatment, or criminal sanction we have to repeat the message that violence is not an acceptable means of expression. It is not acceptable to abuse our spouses, our children or for that matter any other human being.

As the mother of four boys I find it difficult sometimes to encourage young boys who are rough and aggressive by nature to realize there are limits to that aggression. As parents it is our responsibility not only with our young boys but also with our young girls to get them to express their feelings of frustration and anger in non–violent ways.

Thank you for the opportunity to speak in this debate. I do hope we see a decided change in violence against all persons in our society over the next 20 years.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague on her fine speech and a lot of interesting statistics. I have no problem with a good deal of what she has related. The hon. member mentioned several sources of her material, some of the research that has been done and the sources of those. That is always worthwhile.

I would like to know which study determined that the majority of Canadians are now interested in returning to capital punishment. It seemed to me that was mentioned in the hon. member's speech and I am not questioning the validity of it. Perhaps she did not mention the source of that study. I would be interested in knowing what the source is and in asking for that I am not for a minute questioning the member's integrity.

• (1235)

Ms. Meredith: Madam Speaker, actually there have been a number of polls. I believe the first poll was taken in 1982–83 where about 80 per cent of Canadians supported the return of capital punishment. There was another poll done a couple of years ago where 76 per cent of Canadians wanted the return of capital punishment.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière–du–Loup, BQ): Madam Speaker, I have listened attentively to my colleague's remarks. I would agree with her that it is important to denounce the deplorable crimes that have been committed, but I would point out that it is also important, in the course of a debate such as the one here today, to look for the real causes of this situation. The violent behaviour we are seeing is often just the symptom of a situation created by society.

In this regard, I think that particular attention should be given to the reform of social programs and to how we intend to help all members of society live in acceptable conditions.

If our analysis went deeper, might we not conclude that people exhibiting aggressive, unacceptable criminal behaviour often turned to this behaviour because they did not have the same opportunities as others early in life? Perhaps our social programs did not provide access to adequate daycare for those who needed it, and thus did not truly attempt to eliminate child poverty.

Should we not be examining this aspect of the problem in seeking definitive solutions, rather than limiting ourselves to remedial and punitive action?

Of course we will always be faced with finding solutions to specific cases of unacceptable violence, such as the one that took place at the École polytechnique, but there are also all the other cases that arise.

Should we, as elected representatives, not be looking for long term solutions, rather than enumerating truly reprehensible situations, situations that are unacceptable? Our examination of the problem must go deeper and it must produce solutions.

I would put the following question to the hon. member: Is there, in the Reform Party program, the necessary compassion, the necessary acceptance of situations, and satisfactory proposals for improvement? Is everyone ready to implement the 1989 Parliamentary declaration against child poverty? Should the emphasis not be on prevention, so that we do not repeat the American experience, where more money is being spent on prisons that on helping people?

[English]

Ms. Meredith: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for the question. Certainly the Reform Party does support crime prevention but we cannot have crime prevention only and not deal with crime itself.

We believe the social programs should be directed to those most in need. In reality poor people commit crimes but so do rich people. Crime crosses all barriers. If the hon. member honestly thinks that to solve the problems of poverty is going to remove crime, I would suggest that he take a better look at who is committing crimes.

A lot of crimes are committed by people who come from the most privileged situations. I could go on and name a number of them we are all familiar with, from Thatcher in Saskatchewan to Huenemann in B.C. who killed his mother and grandmother because he did not want to share a $4 million estate.

Crime crosses all barriers. We have to deal with those problems we see in society that need to be addressed, poverty, illiteracy, those kinds of situations. We must direct that support to those most in need. We must not make it universal so that people who do not need the help get the help and the help that goes to those most in need is insufficient to look after the problem.

• (1240)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Madam Speaker, I listened carefully to the hon. member's presentation. I found it somewhat surprising that on a day when we are commemorating the murder of 14 young women that the member would be talking about reinstating capital punishment. That seems to be a contradiction in terms of the issue at hand. There are many criminal justice actions that can be taken.

Given the fact that part of the issues concerning the safety of women relate to their accessibility to information and support, does the Reform Party support core funding for women's centres? As the hon. member will know, every province and territory in this country provides that kind of support to women but we do not have core funding for women's centres. Would the Reform Party support that kind of proposal?

Ms. Meredith: Madam Speaker, I would not support core funding from the federal level. I do support funding from the communities where these programs are located. I would also support funding from the private sector in the local community and from the provincial governments. The support of these centres for the delivery of these services should be closer to the location.

Ms. McLaughlin: Madam Speaker, I must say I find the hon. member's response rather shocking.

It seems to me that what the member is actually saying is that women who are beaten and sexually and physically abused should rely on bake sales. If we are really serious about violence against women in this society the bake sale option is not good enough. Let the military have a bake sale.

Does the member support zero tolerance of violence against women? If so, how does she propose that simply by the government not taking any role to support women through women's centres and support services that this will happen?

Ms. Meredith: Madam Speaker, I would suggest that as a member of the House of Commons my role is to make sure our laws take spousal abuse and abuse against women seriously. When an individual murders his spouse he should get more than five years for manslaughter or a 20–month sentence of incarceration. Until our laws seriously take into account violence against women and give a sentence appropriate for the act we will continue to need transitional houses of all kinds.

Many of my colleagues probably support these transitional houses through our 10 per cent donations to charity. I am not for a moment suggesting that bake sales are the way to raise money any more than I would suggest that bake sales are the way for anybody to raise money. However there are ways through education and promotion where the community can and does support transitional houses for battered and abused women and children.

That is where the emphasis has to be placed. It is the community's responsibility to take ownership of the problem and get involved. They must stop expecting government to do it for them.

Ms. McLaughlin: Madam Speaker, can I be perfectly clear in asking the member, would she then say that she does not support nor does the Reform Party support any funding for transition homes through the Canada assistance plan?

Ms. Meredith: Madam Speaker, not knowing enough about it I cannot comment on whether or not I would support it. However, I would suggest that the Reform Party does support in many different ways, and I mentioned one through 10 per cent of our salaries being given to charitable organizations, that we do support charitable organizations such as transitional houses.

• (1245)

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Madam Speaker, first of all, I would like to note the contribution made by a former New Democratic member of this House, Dawn Black, who introduced the bill for the establishment of this day in memory of the 14 women from Quebec, to be observed throughout Canada every December 6 and known as the National Day of Remembrance and Action on Violence Against Women.

I think that it is very important to mention the names of these 14 women who died so tragically. Those who were killed must not be forgotten. The 14 victims were: Geneviève Bergeron, Hélène Colgan, Nathalie Croteau, Barbara Daigneault, Anne–Marie Edward, Maud Haviernick, Barbara Klucznik Widajewicz, Maryse Leclair, Annie St–Arneault, Michèle Richard, Maryse Laganière, Anne–Marie Lemay, Sonia Pelletier and Annie Turcotte.

I would like to quote from the brief by the Canadian Labour Congress and its status of women and human rights committee: "Imagine a world in which girls and women were safe in their homes, their schools, in the streets and in the workplace". Imagine, Madam Speaker.

[English]

All of us want to imagine what it would be like for all women and children to feel safe in their homes, in the streets and in their schools.

I will address several specific issues this morning. Many statistics have been given which I do not intend to repeat today. Rather, I will address several issues which I think are extremely important in specifically addressing the issue.

The first issue is that of gun control. It was for that reason in the previous Parliament my party supported legislation leading to greater gun control. It is still a question and more legislation will be coming before the House.

However I raise several points. In part I acknowledge the work of Yukon psychologist, Paula Pasquali. She raised some of these points as a woman and a psychologist who has worked tirelessly for many years on the issue of violence against women. She raised whether we are often talking about the wrong issue or asking the wrong question and whether we should be asking more specifically questions about safety. As Ms. Pasquali has noted, there is no doubt that some forms of gun control have certainly limited the accessibility of firearms to be used against women in the home, although we know it is still a great risk for many women because women have indeed been killed in the country.

She has proposed that we should also look at prohibiting individuals with a history of violence or threatening behaviour from acquiring firearms acquisition certificates and at taking firearms away from individuals who have been convicted of violent offences. We do not need any reforms to do that; we could do that under the existing Criminal Code.

One study funded by the Department of Justice found that police rarely seize firearms in homes where they respond to domestic calls, even though they know of their power to do so and are aware of the extent to which firearms are used against women. I would guess that firearms prohibitions are rarely ordered in cases of wife assault. This can be done under the existing law.

There is nothing radical about suggesting that firearms should be restricted for those who have committed violent crimes.

• (1250)

One argument put forward is that taking away guns from people who rely on them for hunting or trapping would take food off their table or take away their livelihood. In those cases there is clearly an argument that they should be required to store guns outside their family homes. I am talking specifically about people who have been convicted of violent crimes.

We should broaden the debate around gun control and not specifically relate it to the narrowness of it now. We should look very clearly at what it is we want to accomplish, which deaths and which crimes we are trying to prevent, and setting priorities. Should we be looking at more specifically violence in the home in addition to proposals that may reduce it through gun control? We also have to evaluate the current gun control act and look at how moneys could best be spent to eliminate violence in the home and the use of firearms in the home.

A second aspect of the criminal justice system of great concern to all of us is that we must insist that the system work to the benefit of women who choose to lay charges. There have been a number of studies. One recently completed in Ontario found that women were invariably disappointed with the response of the criminal justice system to assaults committed by the men with whom they lived. Many women do not want their partner to be punished but expect and need a system that will take effective action to ensure safety.

This Ontario study demonstrates that only rarely does the sentencing imposed accomplish the goal. Indeed Ms. Pasquali's own studies on sexual assault in Yukon do not give much hope unless there is a system in place which is clearly focused on the victim, on the needs of the victim, and on support for the batterer in terms of groups for batterers and so on.

In 1983 the Solicitor General of Canada issued a directive to the RCMP to lay charges and to the crown to prosecute charges of wife assault irrespective of the women's wishes. A lot of us at the time felt it was a good directive. Perhaps it is time to look at whether it has been effective for women. We should look at all laws that have been put in place to accomplish these ends.

A third issue in the criminal justice system I would like to address is the issue of those who have committed a violent crime getting a lesser sentence or being found not guilty on the basis that they were intoxicated by alcohol or had used drugs. The government should undertake to change the Criminal Code in this aspect. It has been a great shock to women across the country to know that in this day and age when the issues of violence have been so much addressed that this is still possible. It is totally unacceptable. I have received petitions from individuals all over the country who are outraged about it.

Services and the accessibility of services are very important. All women in violent situations live in fear. It has only been in the last 15 to 20 years that we have had a network of services: transition homes, hot lines, women's services and rape counselling centres. We have been able to say to women that violence is not acceptable, that they have an option. Society has taken on its responsibility. We as a society are responsible for the safety of our citizens.

I refer to the proposals of the Liberal member of Parliament from Hamilton—Wentworth who is saying that funding should be cut to interest groups. He cited in his comments in a number of places women's groups. Let me put forward a few statistics about what the priorities in society should be. We hear that society cannot afford some of the work support groups or advocacy groups do on behalf of women and children.

• (1255)

Why is it, many women must wonder today, that in 1992 the Canadian government gave a federal grant to Pratt & Whitney of over $54 million and in the same year gave the Canadian Day Care Advocacy $183,000? Why is it that in the same year the Canadian Marconi company received almost $10 million while the Canadian Research Institute for the Advancement of Women received about $250,000? Why is it that Spar Aerospace received almost $14 million that year and the Disabled Women's Network of Canada received just over $100,000?

Today of all days is the day to put to rest the mythology that it is not the responsibility of a government to address the safety of its citizens. To do so there must be local resources available for women and the federal government has a role in that.

In terms of accessibility I want to mention specifically rural areas of Canada. As many members will know, it is very difficult in most rural areas of the country for women suffering abuse to receive support services or often to receive legal or court services because of isolation. It is particularly important today to ensure that rural areas have a special focus in the planning done at the federal, provincial and territorial levels.

I can give two local examples. The Victoria Faulkner Women's Centre in Whitehorse, Yukon, has had to move three times in the last year. It is trying to offer services to women. It is one of a few services readily accessible to women in Yukon. It is shocking that this service cannot find a permanent home. Similarly in Watson Lake, Yukon, the Help and Hope Transition Home for Families is under threat and has had to shut down part time because of a lack of funding. It is through the Canada assistance plan funding for transition homes that territories and provinces receive partial funding for these homes.

We have not eradicated violence against women. I wish there was no need for transition homes for women who have been battered. However the need is there. Every day at the doors and on the phones of women's centres and transition homes across the nation, in every province and territory, there are people who are desperate for help. We cannot turn our backs on them.

This leads me to the social security review that barely addresses the particular issue. It addresses the Canada assistance plan. If the government were truly serious in its social security review about looking at all aspects of issues affecting families, it would have made a specific commitment to seriously address the issue of violence against women and children. It is not there, which is very disconcerting to many of us.

The issues of poverty and inequality relate to violence against women. There is no doubt that things like the NAFTA and the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement have adversely affected the working lives of many women. Often it is women who have felt the brunt of the negative aspects of these trade arrangements. It is women particularly who have felt the brunt of cutbacks to social services in every province and territory.

It was mentioned today by the minister in an extremely important speech that women were central to the training of children in our families and to family life. Yet we still have one in five children in the country living in poverty, which means they have poor parents.

• (1300)

This is a form of violence everywhere in the world but it is a form of violence we can do something about. We have been very good in the House, as we were in 1989, saying we want to eradicate poverty by the year 2000. Wanting is not good enough. We have to take action and we can do that.

There are many examples of inequalities. I gave some financial examples earlier where once again those who advocate on behalf of the interests of women received some government funding but nothing compared to the priorities in other areas.

It is absolutely essential that we commit resources and have resources available for these services. Accessibility is a problem that many immigrant women have, either accessibility to English as a second language or to support services. The responsibility we as a society have for each and every person must be taken seriously by the House.

The previous Reform speaker indicated that we could do this if we were a bit more charitable and had a few more bake sales I guess. I am not against it. In fact, almost all services for women do private fund raising. I have been involved in many of those efforts as I am sure other members have been.

The reality is that they need a certain amount of core funding to be able to continue their work. We cannot turn our backs and pretend we can go back to days of charity. There has been some progress and greater awareness since this day was brought into law.

It is absolutely essential that we recommit to specific actions to reduce violence against women, to eliminate violence against women. Zero tolerance must be the objective in everything we do. I do not believe it is simply what governments do, what this Parliament does. It is what we do as a society.

There are many specific actions we can take if we want to, it is clearly a matter of will. I would like to end by quoting a comment that appeared recently in an editorial in the Whitehorse Star which sums up this issue very well:

> A government's primary mandate is to serve its electors. It's difficult to pinpoint a more urgent role than helping to preserve these people's physical well–being from domestic criminals—if not their very lives.

I urge all members of the House to seriously address this issue in their constituencies and to support legislation which will help with the support services and ensure that we commit ourselves to zero tolerance on violence against women.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have a short question. I was interested in listening to the leader of the New Democratic Party speak on violence against women. She did not seem to be too supportive or think that the federal government should be involved more in the charitable aspect of dealing with the results of violence toward women, rather than dealing with the causes of the problem.

I know she would probably support measures regarding education that would relieve some of the problems about violence toward women. She did not really talk about what her party's position is on stricter sentencing and reform of the justice system so that violent acts are adequately punished. What is her position on a victim's rights versus a criminal's rights.

I would appreciate knowing what her party's position is on those very important matters that would prevent and discourage violence not only against women but against all Canadians.

• (1305)

Ms. McLaughlin: Madam Speaker, I would be happy to answer those questions. I believe I addressed at some length some of the criminal justice issues, both regarding gun control and the fact that people who have committed violent crimes should not have access to guns.

Second, it is very important that the government act very swiftly to change the Criminal Code by creating the new offence of criminal intoxication.

Third, obviously part of any kind of program of violence against women must deal seriously with those who commit that offence.

As far as victims' rights, that is exactly the purpose of my talk today. Victims have a right to have support, to have counselling, not to be a victim in the first place. We should put in adequate preventive measures and adequate resources both in rural and urban areas to say to women that it is not acceptable that they live in a violent situation. We have options.

There are people who can help women as advocates. There are transition homes. There are support services. The choice will remain with women because we have to respect the choices that they make. But in doing so, we want to prevent victims of violence. We can do it to a large extent with a number of the measures that I mentioned today.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Yukon how she feels about violence.

As kids we were always taught at home when we went to get the cattle out of the pasture not to wear red because it could infuriate the bull in the pasture.

I have seen so much violence in my own community. When you look into some of these cases there is always stress which had developed by actions on both sides.

How could we diffuse this? What could we do to prevent this in a number of cases? It is a matter of prevention, not putting on the red shirt when we know there is already a problem.

That is the big answer to our problems. Somehow or other we must discolour that red shirt when there are problems in the family or problems between husband and wife.

Ms. McLaughlin: Madam Speaker, I hope, and I will give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt, that he is not suggesting that women bring violence against themselves by their own actions.

I will take rather that the hon. member's comments are asking what we can do to assist those families who are having marital and family problems. I suggest we can do a fair number of things.

First, we can put in place economic measures that ensure that we decrease the amount of unemployment. Every study indicates that poverty and unemployment are contributors to violence in our society.

Second, it is absolutely essential that governments at all levels take responsibility for the safety of their citizens both in enforcing those measures already in place in the criminal justice system to deal with those who commit violent offences and to ensure that there is a core group of services available.

One can look for example at what some police forces have done across the country with their family violence prevention units. London, Ontario comes to mind. It has a very progressive program of going to a home where a call has been made, making sure that a social worker is present, that there is an option for ongoing counselling. It is not just a matter of one measure, it is a matter of several.

Finally, the attitude that our society has toward women is key to this. Denigration of women in any field will set the climate for the acceptance of violence. It is incumbent on each of us to ensure that the respect and dignity of both men and women is always in the forefront. In our position as members of Parliament we have a responsibility to ensure equal opportunities for women in every sphere of life.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Madam Speaker, today we commemorate the sad anniversary of the massacre at l'École polytechnique in which 14 young women died. Despite the horror and revulsion which we feel about it, this act is only a pale reflection of the violence women suffer. We should denounce this violence not only today but every day of the year.

What Marc Lépine did makes us all think, but it is just the tip of the iceberg. Violence against women is rarely so spectacular, fortunately. This violence takes many forms, some more pernicious than others. Women are victims of violence 365 days a year. Violence is insidious and affects every aspect of a woman's life.

The Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women defined violence against women as a complex problem which includes physical, sexual, psychological and economic violence against women and said that this violence depends on structures, values and social, economic and political measures that muzzle women in our society, promote discrimination on the basis of sex and maintain the inequality of women.

Violence is the weapon of choice for those who want to subdue and dominate. Men learned that a long time ago and use violence. Even today, we women are kept out and subjugated by an archaic macho attitude.

Our Catholic Church will not let us be priests but suggests that we do volunteer work. This is another way of telling us women that we are not educated, cultivated or even pious enough to have access to the upper echelons of a Church which is meant to be a reflection of society. From deacon to pope, the positions are all held by men who are often pretentious and full of themselves. Their authority over the faithful in general and women in particular is a good example of the masculine philosophy based on control and power. Do you really think that the Catholic Church would be in worse shape than it is now if the pope was a woman?

Unfortunately, the Church is not the only institution which treats women like that. Let us take a look in this House. In Canada, women account for 52 per cent of the population. However, if you count the number of women in the House of Commons, you will find 53 out of 295 MPs. Our great Parliament is very much a male stronghold. Over half of the Canadian population is represented here by barely one sixth of the total number of MPs.

Therefore, it comes as no surprise that the government takes so long to table legislation to ensure the safety and well–being of women. A Parliament made up of men proposes and passes male–oriented legislation, with the result that we are still waiting for the Minister of Justice to table concrete legislation on firearms. There is no need to rush: After all, for every man who dies during a spousal argument, six women are killed. I am convinced that if the figures were reversed, the process would have been speeded up.

Do you not agree that, if the Minister of Justice were a woman, we would have a bill to amend the Criminal Code and strictly prohibit the mutilation of female genitals? But the victims are women and the Minister of Justice does not even intend to amend the Criminal Code. Not only did the justice minister put on the back burner the idea of registering all firearms, he also refuses to table a bill to protect the innocent victims of a cruel and barbaric practice.

The Minister of Justice promised to do everything in his power to end such criminal activities. Either the minister only has the power to make promises, or else protecting young girls from mutilation is not one of his priorities.

• (1315)

The mutilation of female genitals is a form of violence against girls and violates their basic right to physical integrity. Will we have to wait until a similar practice is introduced that would mutilate male genitals for the government to make up its mind to act? If 52 per cent of the members of this House were women, I am sure these problems would already have been dealt with and legislation would already have been introduced, passed and implemented.

Last week, the Minister of Justice missed an excellent opportunity to show everyone he was concerned about the security of wives. It seems gun control is not the answer, because instead of tabling a bill, as he promised, he made a ministerial statement full of good intentions. Meanwhile, every six days, on average, a woman is shot and killed.

I can hear people saying that the lack of women in the House is our own fault, because we choose not to run for election. Nothing could be further from the truth. Some obtuse male chauvinists fail to understand what this means for a woman. These guardians of the male mystique cannot imagine that someone would hate the sparring at all–candidates meetings, that woman are fundamentally different in the way they live, the way they are educated and trained and in the way they act.

My answer to them is that I still hope that some day, this House will be truly representative of the population and that women will fill 52 per cent of the seats, in other words, have the representation they deserve.

[English]

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Madam Speaker, as we rise to speak in the House today certainly our first thoughts are for the families who five years later still live with the pain of losing their children, more specifically losing their daughters.

What stunned the whole country five years ago on December 6 was not only that 14 young people just beginning their lives lost their lives, but that women were specifically singled out to die on that day. Men were moved out of the way so that the women alone could be shot. As a mother of two daughters in that age group I can only imagine the pain those families still feel.

Today I want to talk about how we as women live in society and why it is so important that all people particularly men understand that. I want to talk about the feelings of powerlessness that are ours from the time we become conscious of ourselves as human beings. It is vital that everyone understand that women live their lives differently. That difference is vitally important to society. It is vitally important to us as women that decisions not be made only on the basis of who is strongest and most powerful.

I realize it is very difficult for many men to understand what this means to women. Most men have grown up knowing from the time they were little boys that they would be big and strong, that they would have important jobs. That is not the way little girls grow up.

Most women have grown up knowing from the time they were little girls of less than two that they would always be smaller than their male counterparts, they would always be weaker, would never be as important, would never account for quite as much in society. They would never have as much money and for many they would never have money of their own. Their job would be to clean up after everybody else. They would always be good little girls because if they were not daddy might get cross, or mommy might get cross because daddy did not like it.

This is why as we grow into women every day and every minute of our lives is regulated by the fact that we are women. We decide differently than men where it is safe to go at what time of day, whether we can go alone or whether we need to find somebody to go with us.

I doubt there is a man in this House who approaches his car in the parking lot at night with the same fear a woman does. It is important for us to understand this is why it is so important to women to have a different kind of society. That is why we need to find measures to equalize our treatment.

When I was teaching my 17–year old daughter to drive I taught her to lock the doors always when she was alone in the car, even in broad daylight, and never to get into a car at night without checking the back seat to ensure nobody was hiding there. What I was doing was teaching her fear, the same fear that I and every woman live with daily. When I taught my son to drive a year later it never even occurred to me to give him the same lessons because he did not need them.

This feeling of being powerless, of always having to be just a little bit afraid, is partly what leads to the kinds of violence we have become so much aware of. It is what leads to the exploitation of women in a number of different ways around the world. It is what leads to the exploitation and abuse of power over women as a universal phenomenon. It is why women tend not to report crimes against themselves as easily or as readily. They know that doing so immediately places them in a situation where they again are powerless. Others are in control and they can be hurt more.

The motion today is so important. It is an expression of this House that this matters to us as parliamentarians, as the leaders of our communities and our country. It reinforces our hope and determination to change it.

I recall a report a couple of years back on why women were not in engineering. I happen to be married to an engineer, I have a son who is an engineer, and I have a son–in–law who is an engineer so I know a fair bit about engineers and what great people they can be.

I also know a fair bit about engineering faculties at universities. There is a whole culture there that is ugly and offensive to the very nature of women. It is so totally a male macho culture that no woman is comfortable in it. There are things like the fortunately now gone greased pole at Queen's. Tell me what woman wants to be an engineer when part of the initiation process is to expose herself to filth and I mean that in the most vile terms, believe me.

Why are there not more women in politics? We will not have the kinds of laws that make it easier for women to get justice until we have more women writing laws. It is not that I would write better laws than any of my male colleagues in the House; it is just that I bring a different perspective to it, a perspective I think is necessary to complete our humanity when we create laws in this House and decide how to allocate our resources.

Bertha Wilson said it best when she talked about the difference between how men and women deal with laws and why the justice system is anathema to women. The whole idea of winning and losing that seems so fundamental to our justice system also seems to be fundamentally a male concept. It is a concept promoted by those who are bigger and more powerful, who always have an equal chance of winning. It is not a concept that women are comfortable with.

I am being very open and honest today about my feelings because this motion is also about feelings. It is about pointing out that women who have been violated can turn to the justice system that is supposed to be there to protect all of us. It is about having workplaces in which women are free from harassment.

• (1325)

I want to shock the House a little today. I want to read from a harassment case that has recently come to my attention. This is a young woman, 21 years old, a university student employed in a summer job. I have met with this young woman and believe me, any of us would be proud to have her as our daughter. The following is what happened in her first four days of employment in an office in this city:

> He sexually harassed me by hovering over me and by touching me in an inappropriate manner. He often touched my shoulders and on one occasion ran his fingers across my neck.

This is a mature married man.

> He often called me "hon" and "love". On one occasion he announced to the office that his wife was out of town for the weekend and suggested I babysit him at his home. On one occasion while helping me with a file that I had been organizing on my lap he took the opportunity to rub my upper thighs. When he asked if I understood what he had just done I said "yes", to which he added: "That is too bad. I was enjoying playing with your legs".
> On one occasion he said: "The problem with kids today is that mothers enter the workforce instead of staying at home to raise them properly".
> He told the following joke: What is the difference between a lawyer and a woman? To win a case a lawyer puts on his robe while a woman takes hers off.
> He sometimes cornered me and used his larger size to intimidate me. He came up behind me, swivelled my chair around, placed one hand on my desk, the other on my chair, so that I was trapped between his arms and asked me what was wrong.
> I saw him slap a female coworker's behind. I heard him discuss male colleagues getting lucky.

This is a 21–year old woman working in a government office enduring this. She was discouraged from making an official complaint. A year later she is still suffering from the emotional repercussions. She will not be told what action was taken against that harasser because his privacy is being protected. Yet we know that for the victim to know what action was taken is a critical part of the healing process.

I want to speak a bit about a piece of legislation that is currently before the House. Bill C–41 has had a lot of discussion. In my view it has had a lot of discussion on the wrong issues. Bill C–41 talks about making crimes committed out of hate especially heinous and subject to more strict penalties.

Bill C–41 says that if you commit a crime of violence against a woman because she is a woman out of hate, you will be punished more severely than if you commit the same crime for purposes of theft, whatever. I think that is good law because we cannot say that it is okay to hate people because they are women, because they are black, because they are Sikhs, because they are gay. Bill C–41 protects children against abuse by providing tougher penalties for people in authority who sexually or physically abuse children.

I want to support a bill that does that and I will. I want to challenge anybody who refuses to support a bill that provides that kind of protection against hate and violence in our society.

There are people who would pretend that violence is a society–wide issue and it is, but it is a different issue for women. It is a different issue for women because women have become the target of violence. I challenge any woman inside or outside this House to not remember even as a little girl when some man would rub up too closely against her deliberately on a street corner or a bus, or when she has not been accosted by some vile and foul sexual suggestions on the street.

• (1330)

I say to the men in this House that I do not believe they understand. I ask them to try to understand the gut wrenching caring that that kind of an incident causes. I do not think they understand how I feel when one member of Parliament stands in this House and calls a woman member of Parliament a slut. I do not think they understand how in the last week our concerns about violence have been belittled in this House by comments from the other side. I do not think they understand. I ask them to please do their best to try. It is one more way of saying to me and saying to women in this country: "You don't count as much. You don't matter as much".

We also have to talk about the economic equality of women. It very much is an issue of equality. As long as we refuse to give women the same opportunities to be economically prosperous based on their own abilities, talents and application of their energies, women will not be equal politically, equal socially and they will not be equal before our justice system.

I totally reject the arguments put forward earlier this morning by the member for Beaver River who said that violence against women is no different than violence against men. It is. As long as we refuse to face that, we refuse to face that women are killed by men who are close to them, who are their husbands, their lovers, their partners, because of the power relationship. Until we accept that we are not going to understand the problem. If you do not understand the problem you cannot solve it.

It is fine to say these issues affect all members of our society, as the member for Beaver River did this morning, but that is turning a blind eye to the specific and serious problems that this motion before the House today wishes to address and that is very specifically the kind of violence that is directed against women because they are women.

Yes, we have grandparents and seniors who are verbally and physically abused. We have children who are physically abused. That is a reflection of a society value that says: "Power, might and strength are the most important values and if you have those you have the right to abuse others". Until we recognize that that power relationship is why so many women die as a result of violent incidents, we are not going to solve the problem. We are not going to have a better society.

I thank the House for its attention today. I thank all those who gave unanimous consent to the debating of this motion. I regret in a sense that the motion had to be watered down to deal more generally with violence in society as opposed to only violence against women on this particular day just to ensure that unanimous consent would be given.

This is an important issue. It is an issue on which our government is working. As the Minister of Justice said very recently: "We have not done enough but we will do more". I believe this kind of debate strengthens our courage and strengthens our resolve to do more and to leave to our children and grandchildren a world and a country in which all are equally valuable. I say that on behalf of both the granddaughters and the grandsons I hope to have some day.

• (1335)

I think men too benefit from a society in which power is not the ruling dictate, in which equality and respect for all human beings regardless of whether they are men or women is a hallmark of this society, perhaps as in no other in the world, and that is a record that I would like to see this nation achieve.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to the remarks of the hon. member who just spoke. I have three girls myself. They are still young, of course, but they will grow up. I realize that Quebec has gone much further than the federal government with respect to equality between spouses and equality for women.

In 1990, for example, Quebec passed an act to encourage economic equality between spouses, so that when they divorce, or separate or one of them dies, the property acquired by the couple is divided pretty fairly between the two former spouses, the man and the woman. Canada lags far behind Quebec and several other provinces on this issue of recognizing spouses as equals.

I remain somewhat sceptical just the same. In a justified and justifiable outburst, the previous speaker mentioned women being in danger on our streets and everywhere, women being done an injustice.

I have a problem reconciling this with the fact that the hon. member herself and her colleagues recently rose in this place and brought the house down when the Minister of Human Resources Development tabled his famous bill amending the Unemployment Insurance Act. The policy statement says that from now on, entitlement to UI benefits in Canada will be based on family income. Unfortunately—and the Bloc Quebecois and I did not make this decision—women are hit hardest by such a measure. If the husband's annual income is, say, $55,000 and his wife earns $22,000, $25,000 or $28,000 per year, and becomes unemployed, she will not be entitled to UI benefits because her husband makes good money.

The hon. member opposite rose in this House to applaud this measure at the time it was introduced by the Minister of Human Resources Development. Personally, I find it is all too easy to act offended, to rise and say that the right hand does not know what the left one is doing or vice versa. Logic should prevail and one should rise once in a while, not only on days when we debate the status of women, violence against women or other such issues, and tell the minister that he is off the beam with his procedure.

It seems to me that the story changes depending on the circumstances. On days when we are dealing with women's issues, violence against women or matters affecting women directly or indirectly, they come here and denounce injustices. I agree there are some, but in the normal course of day to day administration, knowing that federal legislation concerning women is 30 years behind provincial legislation, I think that more could be done, besides such statements, to remedy the situation.

This concerns men and women alike, including fathers like me. I have three young daughters who will grow up to be women living in this society and I am not so proud of the legacy we are leaving them. In Quebec, there is an ad on television that says: "I myself am not affected by violence. I do not go out at night; I stay home. I do not talk to strangers; I stay home. No, I cannot say that I am affected by violence".

That is similar to the situation faced by women in Canada. My friend, the hon. member for Frontenac, said earlier that while walking in a somewhat disreputable neighbourhood in Sherbrooke, his daughter was asked by police officers: "What are you doing walking at night in a neighbourhood where you should not be?"

• (1340)

This does not happen only in Sherbrooke. It happens in Halifax, Edmonton, Calgary, and many other places. What are we doing about this? What steps did the Liberals take to address the situation? They gave us a nice gun–control policy to be implemented in the year 2003. It took Marc Lépine 20 minutes to go on a shooting spree at the École Polytechnique five years ago. How many more shooting sprees can we expect before 2003? When all you need is 20 minutes, it is anybody's guess.

I think that the government must translate words into action, show some backbone and try to do something so that women will feel after today's session that something was accomplished in the House of Commons today and that there is a political will to achieve justice for women. But no. All members of this House make big speeches but when the time comes to support or reject motions that go against women's interests, the party line comes before anything else, including nice speeches like the one that the hon. member just gave us.

I strongly disagree, because I do not want to see my three young daughters in 10, 12, 15 or 20 years treated even worse than their mother is being treated at this time.

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, frankly, today I do not feel like debating who does more for women—the provinces or the federal government. I think it is clear that all parties must do much more, especially for family welfare. Clearly, throughout Canada, a family's welfare depends on the woman and the man in the couple.

As for social welfare, yes, there is lots of room for improvement. I want to say that in Quebec, for example, the family has to take responsibility before someone can get welfare. That is not the case throughout Canada.

I really think, as my minister and I admitted, that we are not doing enough to improve the status of women and especially the conditions that cause violence against women. More must be done at all levels in every country in the world. I am convinced that with more women in Parliament, on both sides of the House, it will be easier to do it more quickly.

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to what the hon. member said, and I would like to give her the assurance that many men have thought and are thinking and learning about what is happening in society today.

Like the previous speaker, I also have children, two girls and one boy, and I want them to have the same opportunities in the years to come. That is why I think the government must send the right signals. You say you do not feel like having a debate on this today. I realize that the issue of violence against women is a universal one, but at the same time we are here to ensure that the appropriate measures are taken.

Without in any way blaming the government, we can at least consider what signals the government could perhaps send tomorrow morning. For instance, in connection with social program reform, could it suggest ways to fight poverty other than targeting poor parents and poor children, which does not provide any help for the middle class? There are all kinds of family support programs, but are they adequate?

• (1345)

And could the present climate of violence in our society be due to the fact that for the past 20 or 25 years, we have failed to provide equal opportunities for everyone? This is true in the case of women, the disabled and several other categories. And should the government not make this the spearhead of its action to eliminate child poverty by the year 2000, for instance? If it does, it may succeed in considerably reducing violence against women.

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, our objective is to improve the economic situation of women and children and, more specifically, to eliminate child poverty. However, to eliminate child poverty, we have to eliminate the mother's poverty first. That is one of the things we are trying to achieve through our social program reform, by putting more emphasis on training and providing more support for women with children and families with young children.

These are some of the things I personally and many of my colleagues have said to the Minister of Human Resources Development. Women and children should be—

The Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but her time has expired.

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond-Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, before expressing my views on this issue, I want to say that I regret that the Official Opposition was only informed yesterday of the motion tabled this morning in the House. I do hope that this late notice does not reflect a lack of concern by our society on the issue of violence against women.

It is with sadness, dismay and pain that I participate in this debate to commemorate the tragedy which occurred on December 6, 1989.

In Quebec, as well as in Canada, that tragedy put the issue of violence against women in the limelight. This episode, more than any other, forced our society to stop and think. Experts in every possible field analyzed the whys and wherefores of such horror. However, the answers are neither simple nor clear. Our society is suffering, and the result is that women and children are often the victims of violence triggered by this unhappiness and malaise.

More often than not, violence is insidious, sneaky and imperceptible from the outside. At other times however, it can be visible, unbearable, terrifying and very concrete.

Statistical data cannot accurately measure psychological violence. It is a form of communication between the tormentor and the victim which undermines the soul and kills self-esteem. In fact, even though current data on physical violence is overwhelming, it only represents the tip of the iceberg.

Just recently, in 1993, Statistics Canada gathered the following information: One woman out of two was a victim of at least one violent act since the age of 16; one in ten who lived with a spouse feared, at one time or another, for her life.

Other statistics released in 1991 by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women provide a clear and hard picture of the plight of those women who live in poverty.

• (1350)

In 1989, eight out of every ten women living on reserves in Ontario were victims of violence. In 1989, eight out of ten women inmates of federal penitentiaries had been abused before their incarceration. In 1989, four out of ten women with disabilities had been abused or raped. While weakness should spontaneously generate an attitude of protection and help, we observe paradoxical behaviour. The weakest are at the highest risk of violent treatment. How can this troubling reality be explained?

In a document on spousal violence and its effects on children, Beth Allen bore out the theory that children from violent homes are at greater risk of committing, or being the victims of acts of violence. It is as if witnessing violent behaviour causes violence to be incorporated in the behaviour pattern of the child who witnesses such violence.

While some may learn violent behaviour at home, the role played by mass media in trivializing this violence cannot be denied. Even the most horrible things end up losing any meaning when you are exposed to them every day. You become indifferent to the horror. Parliament has a major responsibility in this regard. Today, on the eve of the third millennium, do victims of violence speak more freely of the abuse they suffer?

It is currently estimated that one out of every four women who fall victim to violence will report these acts of violence to the police. Other figures are much more conservative, as they indicate that one woman in ten would report it. Perhaps these figures are more accurate. At any rate, fear and silence go hand in hand. Is this society prepared to let battered women be heard? The question has been put, but I am afraid that the answer is no.

In 1991, 270 women were murdered in Canada, a 33 per cent increase over 1988; 85 of these women were shot dead. Thirty per cent of women slain in Canada and Quebec in 1991 were slain with firearms which were generally used against them by people they knew. While the women of Quebec and Canada were confidently expecting a fair and reasonable gun control bill to be tabled, the Minister of Justice announced in a ministerial statement made on November 30, that we will have to wait until 1998 for the registration of firearms to start and until 2003 for it to be completed.

Mr. Speaker, I put the question to you: can this society afford to wait? Do these women have the time to wait? I am sorry that this government is not prepared to let women victims of violence be heard.

Let me tell you about another form of violence. I will do so in English. It should be painfully slow, as I am already a slow reader in French.

[English]

Generally, when we speak of violence against women we focus on physical and psychological damage inflicted by one individual against another. However, what of the more insidious ways in which women are subjugated? The wounds inflicted by society and borne silently can be felt as keenly as physical blows.

• (1355)

Allow me to illustrate my point with an example. There is a new medical industry in Canada growing and developing with a life of its own. A full year after the final report of the royal commission on new reproductive technologies, the federal government has not introduced a single measure to regulate the use or further development of these new technologies. As a result, we see women at Toronto's IVF Canada clinic selling their eggs to pay for expensive and unproven fertility treatments. We see women desperate for money renting out their wombs in surrogacy arrangements.

This is exploitation in its worst form because the federal government, I regret sincerely, turns a blind eye to it. Just as violence against women is the abuse of physical or psychological power, the exploitation of women's reproductive capabilities is the abuse of economic and political power. By not acting swiftly to regulate this industry and to put a halt to the most exploitive and ethically abhorrent new reproductive technologies, the federal government is demonstrating complacency in the form of violence against women. This lack of action can no longer be tolerated by the women of Quebec and Canada.

I will continue later.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on December 12, 1948 the United Nations Assembly adopted the Universal Declaration of Human Rights. Since then the world has witnessed great changes in the global order and an abundance of human suffering still exists.

Canada, a country composed of many cultures, has long been respected for its commitment to human rights. We must continue to use our influence to encourage other governments around the world to heighten their human rights' standards.

I am pleased that this government is addressing the issue of human rights at home by introducing programs to improve the treatment of people who suffer discrimination because of their race, sexual orientation or because of a physical or mental disability. Indeed, the increase in both hate crimes and hate propaganda is a disturbing trend.

As we recognize this week Human Rights Day we must continue to meet the many human rights challenges that we face in both the domestic and international community.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, beyond polls, yesterday, women's groups clearly expressed their opposition to the federal government's social program reform. Calling the human resources development minister's proposals discriminatory and regressive, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women firmly rejected the provisions to cut women's UI benefits.

Under these provisions, women's access to UI would be determined by spousal income, although women would, of course, continue to pay premiums. These measures are a direct attack on the financial independence that women have worked so hard to achieve in the last 30 years.

By completely disregarding the issue of fairness raised by his reform, the Minister of Human Resources Development is simply implementing a series of blind cuts at the expense of women, among others, dictated by his fight against the federal government's deficit.

[English]

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this morning our leader, the hon. member for Calgary Southwest, announced that as a caucus we are opposed to the inclusion of sexual orientation in the Canadian Human Rights Act on legal and human rights grounds.

He also made it clear that the Reform Party was against the recognition of same sex spouses and the extension of spousal benefits to same sex relationships as per the resolution adopted at our October 1994 party assembly.

Canadians across the country are concerned over the government's intentions to include sexual orientation in both the Criminal Code and the Canadian Human Rights Act.

The present course of action taken by the Liberals is not spelled out in their red book. It is presumptuous of them to say they have the mandate to proceed.

Canadians are further exasperated when they realize that no free vote will be held on the issue so that their concerns cannot be reflected democratically.

Our party is listening to Canadians in reflecting their concerns. Why are the Liberals afraid to do the same? Perhaps it is because their mandate is not based on listening to Canadians.

JOB FINDING CLUBS

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce, Ind.): Mr. Speaker, after 10 years of existence, the services offered by Job Finding Clubs have been modified following a change in the rules of the game by Human Resources Development Canada. The department requires that a large percentage of training referrals be UI recipients, thus closing the door to those left out of the statistics, who were the main users of services offered by Job Finding Clubs.

The goal is, of course, commendable: returning unemployed workers to the labour force as quickly as possible. But what are we doing for young people just out of school and for people without income, who would greatly benefit from job finding sessions but whom the government is now trying to exclude on the pretext that they are not counted in the official statistics? They are human beings with an urgent need to find work, and I think that the department should relax its rules.

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today many men and women across the land are wearing white ribbons to remind us that five years ago on this day 40 young women were tragically gunned down by a man at Montreal's l'École polytechnique, simply because they were women.

Sadly today little has changed. Women around the world still live in fear of violence by the hands of men they know and of men they do not know.

Much has been done to raise awareness of violence against women by Health Canada and other government and community agencies. The justice minister has, with his recent gun control proposals, moved one small step closer to protecting Canadian women but it is not enough.

It will never be enough until we women can walk the streets and be safe in our homes without fear. Yet there is still considerable denial by men of the cause and effect of this violence. Today the YMCA rose button and white ribbon campaign make a statement of remembrance and commitment.

I ask all men who love a daughter, mother, wife, partner or friend, to wear one of these symbols in solidarity with us. We need their support. The violence will not end unless they rise now and move positively to help us stop it.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today, December 6, is Canada's national day of remembrance and action on violence against women.

We mark this day to remember the December 6, 1989 incident in which 14 young women were tragically killed at l'École polytechnique de Montreal.

[Translation]

Violence against women is a sad reality that we must change. However, we cannot change it without the combined efforts of everyone in our society. Statistics Canada recently reported that 51 per cent of women in Canada had been assaulted at least once in their adult life. The problem is very serious.

[English]

We have to remember the events of December 6, 1989 and ensure that this kind of tragedy never happens again. We should strive to create a Canada in which violence against women and against all individuals will not be tolerated.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is the national day of remembrance and action to end violence against women.

We remember the 14 women who lost their lives at l'École polytechnique de Montreal. We remember all Canadian women whose lives were ended by senseless acts of violence, who were taken away from family and friends.

This year 15 women lost their lives to violence in my home province of Manitoba. These women are more than statistics; they are mothers, daughters, sisters, friends and neighbours.

As a nation we mourn their loss and the tomorrows they will never see. We as legislators mourn but remember that we also must act today to educate, to support and to protect. We must make a commitment to the women of Canada, to all Canadians and to ourselves to stop violence.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, five years ago, the murder of 14 young women at l'École polytechnique in Montreal moved and troubled all Quebecers and Canadians. Physical, psychological and sexual violence in many homes, sexual harassment in the work place, incest and genital mutilation are only some manifestations of this violence that millions of women experience daily here and in other parts of the world.

To end this cycle of despair, we must use all the available legal and financial resources, promoting awareness campaigns and education in the broadest sense.

This sad anniversary is an invitation to all governments to step up their efforts so that the events of December 6, 1989 will never happen again.

HIBERNIA PROJECT

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to deplore the fact that my native province, Saskatchewan, is not receiving its fair share of work on the Hibernia project.

With almost 3.5 per cent of Canada's population, we did not even get a shipbuilding contract. Our busy shipyards on the shore of Lake Wascana in Regina are ready to contribute. After generations of colonial exploitation by Ontario and Quebec, it is high time that they gave us our share of the gravy. We demand fairness. We must get down to work.

BANKS

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, when inflation is high bank profits are high. When inflation is low bank profits are high. When interest rates are low bank profits are high. When interest rates are high bank profits are high. Banks made over $4 billion in profits last year alone. No matter what the economy does banks are consistent winners.

The finance minister is looking for new sources of revenue to pay down the deficit. Why is he not doing the obvious and asking banks to pay their fair share of the deficit? Why does he continue to burden taxpayers and small business owners with high taxes and reduced services? Why are the banks getting a free ride? Why is he asking Canadians to continue to tighten their belts with social program cutbacks while banks pay no taxes on their profits? Is it because the banks gave over $700,000 to the Liberal Party's election fund last year?

The government must investigate the banks' profits to ensure consumers and small businesses are not being gouged and to ensure banks pay their fair share of taxes.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I just returned from a ceremony at the National Research Council of Canada to remember the young women who were murdered at l'École polytechnique de Montréal five years ago.

This ceremony was particularly moving because these young women were in the forefront of women in science and technology. They were students at one of our leading national establishments of science and technology, l'École polytechnique de Montréal.

Some of them were co–op students at the National Research Council that was remembering them this lunch hour.

Let us remember the young women of Montreal and work to remove all the barriers faced by young women in the future, especially those women in science, technology and engineering.

TRAGEDY AT L'ÉCOLE POLYTECHNIQUE

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, December 6, 1989, began like any other day, but by the time it ended, 14 female students at l'École polytechnique in Montreal had been killed by a man who could not accept women invading what he considered to be an exclusive male preserve.

[English]

Fourteen young lives were sacrificed, leaving 14 families, many friends and all Canadians in dismay. Violence against women is the most despicable act society has to face because it is an act of weakness.

In Vancouver a women's monument will be inaugurated in my riding of Vancouver East in the summer of 1995. "Marker of Change" by Beth Albert is comprised of 14 benches of pink Quebec granite. Each bench will bear the name of one of the women murdered at l'École polytechnique.

[Translation]

This monument will be an official declaration that women's lives are precious and that violence cannot be forgiven.

Today I would like to assure the 14 families and the many friends of the women killed on December 6, 1989 that we mourn their loss and that, like them, we will not forget.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. John Murphy (Annapolis Valley—Hants, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is the national day of remembrance and action to end violence against women.

It was five years ago today that 14 young women tragically lost their lives at l'École polytechnique de Montreal. Just as disturbing is that 51 per cent of all Canadian women have experienced at least one incident of violence by a man in their adult lives.

It is important that all Canadians reflect on what we can do to eliminate violence against women in our society. We can all make a difference in committing to a principle of zero tolerance. Whether through the support for services to victims, working with local transition houses, shelters, rape crisis centres or by raising awareness within the community we can send a message that such violence is not acceptable.

Violence against women is a reality of our society that must be changed. Let us all work together in the House to realize that change.

REFERENDUM ON SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this morning the Quebec Premier, Mr. Jacques Parizeau, made public the draft bill and the consultation process which will lead to the referendum on sovereignty.

What distinguishes this process is its clarity and openness. Indeed, 15 regional commissions will be set up to hold extensive consultations on Quebec's political and constitutional future.

In order to ensure that the debate is as extensive as possible, elected representatives from all political affiliations, as well as non–elected people, will sit on these commissions.

This approach will also ensure that the referendum issue is not debated only by political parties but rather by all Quebecers.

In conclusion, we hope that the Quebec members of the Liberal Party of Canada will respect this process and that they will accept the invitation of the Quebec government to participate in the consultation exercise.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today marks the fifth anniversary of the terrible massacre of 14 young women at l'École polytechnique de Montreal. Once again the families and friends of those who were murdered will suffer the pain and anguish of that tragic day.

Our hearts go out to them as we here and all Canadians pause to remember those loved ones who were so cruelly and senselessly taken from them. Although not part of this tragedy, in far too many cases the use of alcohol fuels the drive to abuse or kill.

Recently the abuse of alcohol has unfortunately been allowed as an excuse for violent action against women. We in this place must ensure that the young women we remember today have not died in vain. Something must be done and done quickly to reverse the message that violence will be tolerated if intoxicated.

Today let all members rededicate themselves to removing violence from our society in whatever form it shows its ugly face.

TRAGEDY AT L'ÉCOLE POLYTECHNIQUE

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is a day to remember and mourn the senseless killing, by a man, of 14 young women at l'École polytechnique. It is also a day to remember all the men, women and children who tragically lost their lives at the hands of armed people.

As parliamentarians, the memory of these innocent women reminds us that we must do everything possible to ensure that such violence does not happen again.

The new regulations on firearms tabled by the Minister of Justice are in response to the need to implement more stringent monitoring measures.

[English]

My sincere condolences to the families of the 14 Montrealers. I wish to let them know that their memory serves as a reminder to all of us that the status quo is no longer acceptable and that the government, through the Minister of Justice, has acted to protect the safety of all Canadians.

TRAGEDY AT L'ÉCOLE POLYTECHNIQUE

Mr. David Berger (Saint–Henri—Westmount, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, five years ago today, Canadians were shocked and horrified to learn that 14 young women had been killed at l'École polytechnique, in Montreal.

Last week, the Minister of Justice announced a series of proposals for better control of firearms. These proposals were well received by the families of the victims, which leads me to believe that this is a step in the right direction.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, five years ago today, fourteen young women lost their lives at l'École polytechnique in Montreal, slain by a murderer who bore a grudge against women. This tragic occurrence sparked a strong movement in favour of increased gun controls as well as an awareness of the pervasive violence against women in our society.

Would the Minister of Justice agree that five years later, the same type of weapon used by the murderer at the polytechnique can still be easily obtained on the market, and that being said, why is he content with a mere action plan instead of tabling legislation with teeth to regulate the sale and circulation of firearms, as he and the Prime Minister promised to do?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last week in the House, we announced what we had decided to do in connection with this government's policy on firearms. We have decided, for instance, to table a bill next February here in the House, to amend the existing legislation. We have three objectives. First, we want to make it clear that Canada does not want the gun culture that exists in the United States and that we need stricter controls on firearms for society in general. Second, we want to make changes in the Criminal Code to ensure that people who use firearms to commit crimes will go to court for appropriate sentencing, and third, we want to protect the public by introducing universal registration of all firearms and thus encourage compliance with safe storage requirements.

We announced what the government has decided to do with respect to firearms, including—

The Speaker: I am sorry, but the minister's time has expired. The hon. member for Roberval.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice is saying some very fine things, but will he admit that under the plan he has put forward, the owners of some 13,000 automatic weapons registered in Canada, including 4,000 AK–47s, which are military weapons, will be legally entitled to keep them until their death?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the firearm that was used by Marc Lepine in the tragic events five years ago today will, under the decisions made and announced last week by the government, be prohibited from future sale when the law is enacted and its power exercised.

We have also said that an order in council will be put in place January 1, a few weeks from now, to prohibit outright certain assault pistols and assault shotguns which will be confiscated from those who now have them.

Further, on January 1 next an order in council will be passed which will prohibit over 200 types of paramilitary and assault firearms.

• (1420)

It is true to say that those paramilitary firearms, as well as the prohibited handguns, will remain in the hands of those who now have them. However they may not transfer them. They may use them only until they die. They can surrender them to the police or they can disable them. That is the policy.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister knows perfectly well there are regular instances of firearms being in circulation when owners declare they have been stolen, lost or have otherwise disappeared. His regulations will not solve that problem.

Why does the minister not understand it is important to act now, considering that a large number of women, in Quebec for instance, have been killed by firearms since the tragic events at l'École polytechnique and that his action plan will have no measurable impact before the year 2003?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): May I emphasize, Mr. Speaker, that nothing is postponed about this plan. On January 1, less than a month from now, the order in council prohibiting a wide range of firearms will come into effect. In the calendar year 1995 we shall have legislation enacted through Parliament that will introduce the strong criminal penalties that we have announced.

On January 1, 1996 the registration system will begin. Through incitements to early compliance, we expect that the vast majority of firearms and their owners will be registered in the system in the early period after the introduction of that system.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

According to Canadian police and customs officers, prohibited weapons continue to flow into Canada. The vice–president of the Canadian custom officers union is of the opinion that the justice minister's plan of action contains no measure to stop gun smuggling from the United States.

Does the Minister of Justice not agree that the stricter control measures that his government announced last spring have had no effect to date and that his action plan will not be any more successful?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member. We made public last week decisions concerning stricter border control. The Minister of National Revenue, the Solicitor General and I announced last week that the Government of Canada will take steps to ensure that control is exercised at our borders.

[English]

The minister of revenue has announced specific changes in both operational policy and statutory amendments that will give us greater control, including insisting that all shipments of firearms coming to Canada will have permits issued in advance. Second, there will be enhanced supervision at the borders. Third, we will limit the points at the borders at which firearms may enter the country.

Along with universal registration, this will make a difference in cutting down smuggling.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Venne (Saint–Hubert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, can the Minister of Justice tell us if he plans to take as long to put in place measures to stop gun smuggling from the United States as to implement the registration of firearms?

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the changes in the administrative and operational practices at the border which were outlined by the minister last week will be effective immediately. Other changes in the statutes will be affected by the bill we will put before Parliament next February. As soon as that bill is passed those changes will be in place and will be effective.

May I encourage the hon. member opposite to join with the government in these important steps that we have taken for what I know is a common objective between us, a safer country. May I encourage her and her colleagues in that party to join with us in making these changes happen.

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the premier of Quebec today released a draft bill entitled an act respecting the sovereignty of Quebec.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

• (1425)

Mr. Manning: He also declared his intention to secure the unilateral passage of this bill by the Quebec assembly prior to any referendum.

The bill in question contains references to territorial boundaries, native affairs, federal social programs, citizenship, currency and international treaties, all of which are clearly under the sole jurisdiction of this Parliament.

Does the Government of Canada agree that the draft act respecting the sovereignty of Quebec is beyond the legal powers of the government and assembly of Quebec?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has every confidence that the people of Quebec, when given the chance to vote on the real question of whether they want to become a part of a separate country or whether they want to stay in Canada, will vote an overwhelming yes to Canada.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we too have confidence that the people of Quebec will make the right decision but that was not my question.

Does the Government of Canada agree that the draft act respecting the sovereignty of Quebec is beyond the legal powers of the government and the assembly of Quebec?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the question of the leader of the third party is as confused as the question of the—

Some hon. members: No, no.

Ms. Copps: The premier of Quebec has no right to put a bill before the people when the people have not chosen the route of separation.

We do not intend to enter the kind of slippery slope of speculation that the leader of the third party wants to take us down.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this debate between federalism and separatism will only be enhanced by people being presented with the facts.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister the question once more. Does the Government of Canada agree that the draft act respecting the sovereignty of Quebec is beyond the legal powers of the government and the assembly of Quebec?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that the leader of the Reform Party is playing Jacques Parizeau's game.

We do not intend to play that game. We intend to ask the people of Quebec a very clear question: Do you want to stay with Canada or do you want to separate? That is the question they will be voting on in the referendum.

BOSNIA

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of defence.

While the Conference on Security and Co–operation in Europe is meeting in Budapest, where the international community is endlessly debating how to make the Bosnian Serbs listen to reason, the Bosnian Serbs themselves continue to thumb their nose at the UN and the major powers. They still refuse to release their 309 detainees, including 55 Canadian peacekeepers.

Does the defence minister confirm that the 55 Canadian peacekeepers held hostage for 13 days have not been released, as the Bosnian Serbs promised, and is this not another proof of the bad faith of the Serbs, who do not honour any of their commitments?

Hon. David Michael Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have been informed that a meeting was held yesterday between the UN commander in Bosnia, General Rose, and the Bosnian Serbs.

The Bosnian Serbs have given General Rose assurances that all detainees would be released soon.

[English]

That means we have had assurances from the Bosnian Serb leadership, Dr. Karadzic and General Mladic, yesterday in Pale when General Rose met with them that all of the UN detainees—there are about 350 right now—will be released soon.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Serbs have promised several times to release the peacekeepers, but it has not happened yet.

• (1430)

Are we to understand that the Bosnian Serbs have not agreed to release the peacekeepers held hostage because the UN refuses to promise that NATO will not launch more air strikes against them?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do agree with the hon. member that it is very frustrating to have these continual assurances from the Bosnian Serbs. We had it on Friday when Mr. Akashi, the Secretary–General's representative, negotiated a deal with the leadership and only a few people were subsequently released. We hope that this latest negotiation will bear fruit.

With respect to the specific aspect concerning NATO air strikes, that framework was agreed to by NATO last spring. Canada is a signatory to that framework. Those air strikes can be utilized when and if the double key is unlocked, i.e., the commander on the ground advocates it and NATO agrees and of course the UN representative Mr. Akashi also agrees.

PROVINCE OF QUEBEC

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in replying to the leader of the Reform Party the Deputy Prime Minister said, and I paraphrase it, that we intend to ask a certain question and that is the question of the unity of Canada versus the separation of Quebec.

Shall we take from that response that it is the intention of the federal government to put its own question to the people of Quebec and to the people of Canada on the clear question of separation?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): The House leader of the Reform Party is on very dangerous ground when at a very crucial point in Canada's history he and his leader and other members of his party are more intent on attacking the federal government than on attacking the separatists.

What I said in response to the question of the leader of the Reform Party was that we will not be drawn into speculation. The supposed bill that was put before the people of Quebec today by the premier of Quebec is not legitimate because the question has not been asked. The key question and the question that we will ask and ask and ask again over the next number of months to the people of Quebec is: Do you want to separate from Canada or do you want to remain?

We are confident that by working with all members of the House, working with the Reform Party, working with the Conservative Party, working with the New Democratic Party, that the cause of federalism will succeed because Quebecers want to be a full participating partner in Canada.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I welcome two pieces of information from the Deputy Prime Minister. One is that she and her government will have a co–operative attitude with all federalist parties. The second is that she views the bill tabled today by the premier of Quebec as not legitimate.

Is it therefore the intention of the Government of Canada to make it clear to the government of Quebec and to Mr. Parizeau that this Parliament has the sole legal right and the sole jurisdiction in areas such as boundaries, native affairs, citizenship, currency, international treaties and federal pension programs? Is that the intention and does she intend to express that view clearly to Mr. Parizeau?

[Translation]

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what we will say to Mr. Parizeau is that if he really had the courage of his convictions, he would ask the real question, which is: Do you want to separate, yes or no?

Since he did not ask that question but tabled books and studies by commissions, he is not sure that he will win. We are convinced that Quebecers will vote to stay in Canada.

MIL DAVIE SHIPYARD

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. This morning, we learned that the deputy ministers of Transport and Industry of the Quebec and federal governments will meet right here in Ottawa tomorrow on the future of Quebec's last great shipyard, MIL Davie, which is threatened with closure.

Can the minister tell us what mandate he gave senior officials concerning what his government intends to do to help the MIL Davie shipyard?

• (1435)

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I explained several times here in the House, I think that the first thing is for MIL Davie to complete a business plan and have it accepted and supported by its shareholder, the Government of Quebec, and have it accepted by the employees of MIL Davie.

There are very difficult problems these days. We are prepared to discuss with the shareholder, the Government of Quebec, but there will still be several things to discuss. We are always ready to hold meetings like the one scheduled for tomorrow.

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question concerned the mandate.

Can the Minister of Industry confirm whether, in addition to a contract for building a new ferry for the Magdalen Islands, the question of benefits from the Hibernia megaproject will be discussed, following the flagrant injustice which the Hibernia consortium did to MIL Davie?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): As always, Mr. Speaker, the Bloc engages in demagogy. Is the hon. member prepared to accept that yesterday, when the member for Roberval spoke about a process of rationalization, he had the facts wrong? He misrepresented them when he said that most of the rationalization was in Quebec.

Is the hon. member ready to accept, first, that the Government of Quebec, as MIL Davie's shareholder, is responsible for taking a position on the business plan? Does the Bloc think that the Government of Quebec is unable to solve the problems of its company, MIL Davie? If they think so, do they think that the Government of Quebec is unable to handle the business of the province of Quebec?

SMALL BUSINESSES LOANS ACT

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government plans to increase the lending ceiling under the Small Businesses Loans Act to $12 billion. This money is available for fixed assets, not working capital.

The industry committee report "Taking Care of Small Business" identified working capital as the problem, not asset capital. In fact suppliers of funding for asset financing asked that the government not compete with them.

Why did the government not follow the recommendations of its own committee and address the working capital needs of small business particularly exporters, rather than increasing competition with the existing sources of asset capital at significant expense to taxpayers?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let us understand first of all the proposal we brought forward yesterday. It indicates clearly that in making the amendments to the Small Businesses Loans Act it is our intention to ensure that program is of no cost to the government.

In that sense the additional fees we proposed to charge and the cap on the interest rates will contribute to that. We have indicated we will work with all stakeholders to ensure that the changes we make continue to provide an effective program for small businesses to meet their needs and will not cost the taxpayers by way of calls on the loan guarantees.

I also want to emphasize for the hon. member that the reason we raised the limit is very simple. Over the course of the last 18 months the demand by small businesses for assistance under that program has caused it to reach its limit of $4 billion. That is how successful and popular the program is. I believe it contributed directly to the 400,000 jobs that have been created in this country in the last year.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, you do not have to be rocket surgeon to figure out that if you increase the rate, if you lower the amount that is available, if you make it easier for the banks to roll over their delinquent or their poorer loans, people are going to take advantage of it. The problem is that we are making it easy for the banks to get rich.

Canadian taxpayers now subsidize the Small Businesses Loans Act up to $100 million a year. The government proposes a 1 per cent fee to offset anticipated future losses. However, the industry committee recommended that small business loans guaranteed under the act carry an interest rate commensurate with risk.

• (1440)

What specific safeguards has the minister implemented that will ensure this does not become just one big subsidy program for the banks?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, you do not need to be a brain scientist to know that if you are going to get a government program right you really ought to consult with the stakeholders that are using it.

The member raises a serious question. I want to assure him that I share his concerns as he has expressed them about what could be done with the program.

The hon. member should know that we did commission a study of this program by Professor Allan Riding of Carleton University. His study indicated that the changes that were brought into effect in 1993 have actually resulted in increased loans at least 60 per cent of which were incremental to what would otherwise have been out there and were directly related to job creation.

That is why we believe the first priority should be to raise the cap so that the program continues to be as useful as it was to small business. We will make the changes. I understand what he is asking for. That is what we will endeavour to do in the changes. We do not want the program to be a subsidy to the banks.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Yesterday, the minister claimed that 96 per cent of Canadians supported an in–depth reform of social programs. The minister even had the nerve to claim that these 96 per cent supported his approach. However, he should know that Canadians do not support a social program reform which will be effected at the expense of the poor.

How can the minister claim that his reform is supported by a majority of Canadians when over 80 women's groups, including the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, clearly reject his UI reform because it is discriminatory and primarily targets women?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what I said yesterday was simply to repeat the results that were taken by a nationwide survey.

What is important to note is that when the survey is broken down by region as many people in Quebec support the social reform proposals of the government as in the rest of Canada. What is equally important is that according to the survey as many women support the programs for social reform as do men. There is absolute equality among genders in supporting our social reform proposals.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, when will the minister realize that his reform will make women more financially dependent on their spouses, since their eligibility for UI benefits as well as the level of those benefits will depend on their spouses' income?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Actually, Mr. Speaker, it is quite the reverse.

If one looks at the proposals for two tiers established by some income test the fact of the matter is low income women in poorer regions would be the major beneficiaries of that proposal. That is the point of debate. The facts and analysis being presented by the hon. member have no root whatsoever in the real analysis and evaluation. I would be glad to share that with the hon. member as it was contained in the unemployment insurance papers.

That is the point. Let us get away from mythology. Let us get away from exaggeration. Let us get down to the facts. The facts are that under our proposals for improved child care, improved working opportunities and improved benefits, women will be much better off in terms of gaining equal access to the workforce.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for the Status of Women.

It has been five years since 14 women, all student engineers, died at l'École polytechnique in Montreal. It has been four years since the all–party report on violence against women was tabled in this House of Commons.

Since none of the report recommendations have been implemented to date, could the minister tell this House when we might see action on the proposals contained in the document?

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I know my colleague has been very committed to the whole field of action against violence and was a very important member of that committee that deposited that report.

• (1445)

Violence against women and children is a question which we have addressed in our red book. It is a question to which this government is very committed. It is a multifaceted program which includes legislative action, educational activity and co–operative development with our federal, provincial and territorial partners as well as with police, the advertising industry, et cetera.

I think the Minister of Justice has brought in a very significant package that does answer many of the reports. The fundamentals and our first task in this House is to bring forward legislation that will set the guidelines, the yardstick, the measurement against which we will attend to people who commit and continue violence against women.

I say that the other role we have to play is educational.

Mr. Abbott: Time.

Mr. Peterson: More.

Mrs. Finestone: You are not the Speaker.

The Speaker: I was going to say once you sit down, you are out of the game.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Although employment equity already exists in practice across much of the federal government, the minister will soon legislate hiring in the public service based on race, gender and disability. The minister says that he does not believe in hiring quotas, but his legislation will instead require numerical goals.

Will the minister tell us the difference between numerical goals and hiring quotas in the fulfilling of the demands of the employment equity program?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows that was a clear commitment we made during the last election campaign, that we would reform the employment equity programs. I would remind hon. members we have over 170 members to prove just how many Canadians supported that mandate.

The importance of ensuring equal access and equal opportunity in the workplace is one of the primary objectives to ensuring a good effective economy as well as ensuring the rights of men, women and all those who have disabilities or are visible minorities.

I will be tabling legislation next week in co–operation with my colleague the President of the Treasury Board. At that time the hon. member will get a full view of what is presented in the legislation. I cannot pre–present myself. I think the hon. member should wait and see what the bill has to say.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the public service has always prided itself on the fact that it has always done its hiring based on merit and merit only. The managers who fail to meet these numerical targets, goals, quotas or whatever the minister may want to call them will inevitably be disciplined.

What will the minister do to ensure that the managers who are doing the hiring and firing in the civil service are doing it based on merit and merit alone?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that the public service of the Government of Canada has been subject to a series of guidelines related to employment equity going back to the previous Liberal government when the then Solicitor General who was responsible established a very good regime.

We want to ensure in the legislation that there is clear parity and balance between the rules that apply in the private sector and the public sector. This is something that was asked for by the public servants of Canada.

BOVINE SOMATOTROPIN

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Health.

I would like to remind the minister that the director of the bureau of veterinary drugs at Health Canada, and I think she should know this, the boss of the bureau that is examining somatotropin to advise the minister on the approval being sought for this drug, is lobbying on Parliament Hill to promote the advantages of this hormone.

How can the minister blatantly use her director's leave without pay as an excuse, as she did yesterday, to condone this conflict of interest?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the person in question has been on leave of absence for a year and a half. During his leave of absence, he does work for Health Canada and does not speak on behalf of Health Canada.

• (1450)

That being said, I am aware of the hon. member's concerns about this matter, and I have asked my deputy minister to look into the matter in order to give everyone the assurance that the conflict of interest guidelines for the Public Service have not been circumvented.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister guarantee that her director, who is on leave without pay and is lobbying on behalf of a number of drug companies, will not influence the recommendations of the bureau of veterinary drugs of Health Canada regarding somatotropin, since the director did not reveal his connection with the department?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I may remind the hon. member that bovine somatotropin has not been approved and that this drug will only be approved once the department's researchers have the assurance it will have no negative effects on either Canadians or cows.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the minister of agriculture defended commissioners of the Canadian Wheat Board by stating that they participated in public meetings by "discussing a broad variety of aspects pertaining to the marketing of western Canadian grain".

The minister also said: "None of the commissioners were actively involved in any campaign for the advisory committee". It seems curious that the minister did not see the article written by commissioner Richard Klassen in various farm papers promoting not a variety of views but one particular view on the Canadian Wheat Board.

Will the minister review the actions of Mr. Klassen and the other commissioners to see which commissioners violated the stance of political neutrality?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me not unusual that a commissioner of the Canadian Wheat Board would from time to time defend the policies and practices of the Canadian Wheat Board. That seems to be quite logical in the ordinary course of events of being a commissioner of the wheat board.

If the hon. gentleman has any specific allegation that he would care to make with respect to any kind of impropriety on behalf of any particular individual or commissioner associated with the Canadian Wheat Board, I suggest that he should bring that allegation forward specifically and not engage in these broad based innuendos.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, section 17(4) of the Canadian Wheat Board Act states: "It is the duty of the board to exercise direction and supervision over the administrative conduct of an election of members of the advisory committee". Therefore the role of the commissioners is parallel that of Elections Canada in a federal election.

Several commissioners by promoting the point of view of one group of candidates violated the Canadian Wheat Board Act. Will the minister call for the resignation of all commissioners who actively campaigned during the period leading up to the election of the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the short answer to the hon. gentleman's question is no because I have no information before me at the present time that would justify any of his allegations.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. Transport Canada has more than doubled the parking meter rates at Pearson International Airport terminals 1 and 2, hiking the rates from $3 per hour to $8 per hour.

Will the minister explain why such huge increases are being levied on the travelling public at a time when disposable income is on the decrease?

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I know that the member is concerned with the safe and efficient operations at Pearson as the minister is. I want to tell the member that the rates have not been changed since 1991 except for the changes necessary because of the Ontario tax changes. Also, the parking meters are provided at the most congestion sensitive areas of the airport and are only meant to provide short term parking for luggage and dispersing of passengers. If people want to park for longer periods of time then the parking garage at Pearson is only $3 per half hour. That is how we are going to deal with the congestion problems at Pearson.

FISHERIES

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

At the last federal–provincial Conference of fisheries ministers, on November 1, the Government of Quebec ask the federal government to transfer a portion of the fisheries management function to the province. Soon after, the minister of fisheries announced in this House that he intended to reorganize fisheries, stating that he was looking forward to pursuing productive exchanges and discussions with all the provinces, including Quebec.

Why has the minister not yet responded to the request from the Quebec fisheries minister, when he is about to table a fisheries plan that will affect the entire industry in the Atlantic zone? Why?

[English]

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member is absolutely right. It is a shocking thing that fully 35 days have passed since the Government of Quebec tabled a proposal that would radically alter the nature of the relationship between the federal government and the provincial government. This government has not yet offered a comprehensive response to this radical altering of the nature of the way in which we manage the marine fisheries and we have had fully 35 days to deal with it, to fully discuss it and implement it. It is a shocking, shocking thing and I will attempt to do better in the future.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in Revenue Canada's press release last week on gun control it was indicated: "The RCMP and Revenue Canada Customs are using resources allocated under the government's anti–smuggling initiative and will continue with stepped up measures to combat smuggling". Even the justice minister accepts the fact that there are thousands of guns coming across the border every month and yet the port of Fort Erie across from Buffalo has only interdicted six per month in the last year, six out of one thousand.

Does the revenue minister agree that both he and the justice minister are giving a false sense of security to Canadians with their ill thought out gun control legislation and the fact they will not be able to enforce the laws at the border anyway?

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member appears to be unaware that the proposals for gun control are extremely well thought out and in fact have wide support among the Canadian people.

Further, with respect to the border, I do not know where he gets these precise accurate figures on illegal weapons unless he himself is out there doing it.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. As she will know, in the last four years we have had two major reports on violence against women: one, the war on women which is a subcommittee of Parliament and, second, the panel on violence against women which cost over $11 million. She will also know that transition homes, rape counselling centres and women's centres continually struggle for adequate funding.

I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether her government is committed to ensuring through core funding the continuation of these essential services which help to prevent, to treat and counsel against violence against women and whether her government will do so through shared costing with the provinces and territories.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly assure the hon. member, knowing her own personal interest in this issue and the interest of her party, that we are going to do everything we can to live up to the commitments that we made in the red book to make Canada a fairer and a safer place for all women.

That is why we moved within the first year on specific legislation on gun control, a very strong package which could prevent the Marc Lepine massacre from happening again. That is why we are moving very soon on pay equity legislation, so the women in the public service get the equal treatment they deserve. That is why we will respect our commitment to core funding for transition houses, so the women of Canada can be protected from violence whether it comes from the streets, from their neighbours or sadly, from their own homes.

CORNWALLIS PARK DEVELOPMENT AGENCY

Mr. Harry Verran (South West Nova, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in South West Nova the Cornwallis Park Development Agency has been established to promote economic development since the government announced the closure of CFB Cornwallis.

Can the Minister of National Defence assure this House that the government remains committed to ensuring the economic viability of the Cornwallis community? Will the Department of National Defence work together with the Cornwallis Park Development Agency to render CFB Cornwallis property attractive to outside investors?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly give the assurances to my hon. friend from South West Nova who has worked very hard for the interests of his constituents after we closed the forces base at Cornwallis.

One of the things the government announced in the last budget was the establishment of the Lester B. Pearson Peacekeeping Institute. We want to make this a world class facility for trainers in peacekeeping techniques.

We hope to be able to divert more funding through bilateral arrangements with some of the eastern European nations and other European nations as a result of the readjustment of NATO infrastructure funds.

We are absolutely and totally committed to helping make that establishment a world class facility, but also to preserving many of the buildings on the site so that the hon. member and the local authority can market them and give that base a new economic life.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think upon reflection you will find that the Minister of National Revenue has accused me of smuggling guns. I believe that was exactly what he had to say.

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if there was any suggestion that the hon. member was smuggling guns I immediately would like to correct that impression. My question was only how does he get these accurate figures on the guns that are smuggled?

The Speaker: I take it that whatever was said hopefully is withdrawn and that no offence was intended.

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would like to share a thought on violence against children, a painful reality I have often been confronted with in my profession.

Even if our instinctive reaction of outrage tends to overshadow everything else when we are confronted with such unacceptable tragedies, I have learned from experience to read in this violence the signs of a society which is out of balance, a society in which social expectations of performance at any cost, family isolation, financial difficulties and psychological deficiencies play a major role. These are sick families.

As Fairholm wrote in a book published in 1990 and entitled "Child Abuse Prevention Program for Adolescents", children of all ages are abused. In every social, economic, racial and ethnic environment, there are adults abusing children under their care. All families and all children are vulnerable to this problem. Psychological violence is at the root of all forms of abuse or negligence, but we do not know how common physical neglect actually is. Is such ignorance tolerable? I do not think so.

In conclusion, I would like to go back to the events of December 6, 1989, exactly five years ago today. A light late afternoon snow is falling on the city, when horror suddenly strikes: 14 young women are gone forever, robbed of a promising future.

This tragedy affected me personally because I knew one of the victims; her name was Anne–Marie. In memory of all her sisters, I laid 14 white lilies near her grave. I thought for a moment of adding a red rose dedicated to Marc Lépine's mother, but I decided against it because the violence done to this woman in the evening of December 6 was beyond imagination. This woman died deep in her soul.

The Deputy Speaker: Dear colleagues, the issue we are dealing with is a very serious one, so I would ask my colleagues to hold their discussions outside the House. The hon. member may continue.

Mrs. Dalphond–Guiral: Mr. Speaker, I thought for a moment of adding a red rose dedicated to Marc Lépine's mother, but I decided against it because the violence done to this woman in the evening of December 6 went beyond imagination. This woman died deep in her soul.

I want to tell her today what I could not tell her on December 6, 1989: We share your pain in solidarity and we refuse to condone daily violence because it always erupts in the end, leaving indelible scars.

I say to the grieving families, particularly the three families in Laval, that they are in our thoughts and that this ultimate sacrifice has become the symbol of the campaign to eliminate violence against women.

[English]

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): December 6, 1989. Memories come flying of that night five years ago. I remember it very well. I remember it was cold and there was a lot of snow in Ottawa.

I remember the night particularly because the then Leader of the Opposition, the then member for Vancouver Quadra had a party at Stornoway for members of the Liberal caucus. I remember the fellowship, the Christmas cheer.

I remember a number of us going out for dinner after the party at Stornoway. I remember in particular there were more than a dozen of us in a downtown Ottawa restaurant waiting for the member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte, now the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. We were wondering what was keeping him and why he was holding up our evening. I can remember. So many memories like this are etched in our minds. I can see the hon. member standing ashen faced in the restaurant doorway coming to tell us he had just heard the news on the radio of the 14 young women at l'École polytechnique.

I remember many things and forget others. Hon. members know the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke has sat for many years in this House and is one of its senior members. He was sitting next to me and he said things like that do not happen in Canada. They are not supposed to happen.

• (1510)

I remember later that night back in my apartment the member for Saint–Laurent—Cartierville and I were riveted to the television set watching Ian MacDonald of CBC report from l'École polytechnique. I remember the flowers in the snow. In particular I remember a beautiful young student talking about her fateful meeting with Marc Lépine in one of the corridors at l'École polytechnique. She described how she saw him and she crouched down and how he pointed the gun at her and fired twice. Both times through chance and the incredible grace of God it misfired. She kept saying she did not know why she was alive and the others were not.

I remember most particularly from first hearing the news to today five years later realizing that in this instance women were culled from the crowd. They were singled out. They were stood against a wall and they were executed.

They were executed because in that diseased mind, and there is no question of that, they had raised themselves above the trench, if you will. They had taken a step away from the norm. They had gone into a non–traditional profession for women. They had dared to do something that in that diseased mind women were not supposed to do.

I want to say a very special word about two of my former colleagues in this House. I want to pay tribute most particularly to Dawn Black, the former New Democratic Party critic on the status of women. Through her efforts on a private member's bill she sponsored this day has become the day of remembrance and action.

I remember being in this House many times speaking and supporting Dawn and being supported by the other women I would like to pay tribute to today. There is the Hon. Mary Collins who was then the Minister responsible for the status of women. I also want to pay tribute to our colleague from Saint–Hubert from the Bloc Quebecois who also supported us very much on that.

I remember these things and I want all of us to remember these things. I remember the people I met when this terrible tragedy focused the debate and the battle against violence against women. One person I will never forget and to whom I would also like to pay tribute today is Suzanne Laplante–Edward, the mother of Anne Marie Edward, one of the victims. She would probably not want to be singled out. She would talk about herself as a parent and an activist but she has become a symbol as well. She would probably have preferred to remain the mother of an engineer.

What happened on that cold December night in Montreal galvanized all of us to a degree but we still have much farther to go. It is very true that violence against men and against children exists in our society. However it is not sensible to refuse to recognize that violence against women is a particular problem that exists in every cultural group, in every society, east, west, north, south, in every racial background. It is a tragedy and a horror, but it is there. Asking what about men and what about children does not take away from the fact that there is the peculiar and particular problem that in far too many cases women wake up in their own houses and are afraid. When we talk about fighting this problem it does not mean that we think less of the victims of other forms of violence. It does mean that we underline this problem as a special one, as one that needs special responses and special protections. I mentioned journalists before and I spoke about Ian MacDonald from the CBC. I want to say a word about Stevie Cameron. I doubt there is a woman who read the Globe and Mail that week that does not remember Stevie Cameron's incredible column that was entitled "What do we tell our bright and shining daughters?" She spoke for all of us, those who are the mothers of daughters and those who are not but who have a responsibility to all the daughters. She talked about issues of safety. She talked about bringing up young women so that they do not have to be afraid. She talked about the way we all worry about our young, whether they are ours personally or ours generically. I will always remember her words.

Just yesterday I looked at a plaque in my office with the pictures of those 14 young women. I think the average age was 22. There was one I remember looking at and saying: "Gosh she was quite old. She was 29". I think of the terrible waste that took place in Montreal that night. Those young women would have made such a contribution to their profession, to their own families, to their communities, to their province, to their country, to all of us.

Madam Edwards mentioned in her interview in the Montreal Gazette this morning that what was lost there was not just all that beauty, talent, youth and enthusiasm. As a country we lost some of our innocence and our naivete because, as my colleague from Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke said, this is not supposed to happen in Canada and suddenly it had happened.

We have many spirited debates about the question of gun control, about questions of violence, about how to deal with and how to make sure that what happened in Montreal will never happen again. If we are lucky never again will we see a mass murder like that. We all pray that we will not. The tragedy is that we do see this violence against women every day.

There is a badge that some of us are wearing today that says: "Never again, December 6, 1989". The tragedy is that it is still going on. The tragedy is that we have not yet come to grips with how to deal with the question of violence against women. The tragedy is that every six days a woman is killed in this country with a firearm. I did not make up that statistic. It is not false. It is there. The tragedy is that women are beaten, brutalized and abused.

Yes, others are beaten, brutalized and abused but on a continuum—I underline this and repeat this—there is a particular, horrible and deep–rooted problem in our society, right here in Canada, whether in British Columbia, Yukon, Nova Scotia, southern Ontario, whether in a city or on a farm, it can and does happen in every single one of our ridings. To a degree we are all frightened and struck by our helplessness in the face of this ghastly and unacceptable situation.

We are legislators. We are all here, every one of us, no matter what our political belief or background, because we want to do what is best for our constituents and for the people of our country. We have to legislate in the way we see fit. We have to understand that to root out this kind of horrible growth in our society, sometimes the surgery that has to be undertaken is radical.

• (1520)

If it means intervening and removing certain rights, whether it is the right to privacy, the right to have certain things in our possession, then I have to say that every single one of us has to understand that the problem is so severe and so ongoing and so all–pervasive that I fear we will all be judged very harshly if we do not take the steps necessary to cure it.

A year and a half ago the blue ribbon panel on violence against women reported. It was the summer before the election and part of my job at that time was to respond. I now think that to some degree my response was harsh. It was an expensive panel. As the hon. member for Yukon mentioned, it spent almost $11 million. To this day I have reservations about some of its responses.

However, one thing I did not make enough of at the time and I need to make something of today, and I know other speakers will also, is the committee very clearly stated the acceptance by the general population of the deep–seated problem of violence against women. I call it what it is, violence against women. It is not domestic violence, not spousal violence. Do not try to hide it behind words. It is violence against women. It is something that too many people in our society still do not accept. They think that it belongs to some strange subculture. There are some even in the House, and again I impute no motives but is just a lack of awareness, who think it is provoked, who think that there are reasons in a victimology that creates violence against women.

We all have to ensure that we understand the issue, and that we understand that to hit another person is wrong. It is a criminal offence. It does not deserve to be put in a special category because it happened in the home, because it was between husband a wife, because it was between two people who share a bed and a history that it is somehow different. It is violence. It is always a crime. It is never acceptable. There are too many dead bodies. There are too many injured women. There are too many scarred children.

This is Canada. The member for Renfrew—Pembroke—Nipissing said it five years ago tonight: "This kind of thing does not happen here". This kind of thing should not happen here. But we have a responsibility to do everything in our power as legislators to ensure that it does not.

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Because of the interest in this debate, I wish to inform you and the House that the government members will be dividing their time from this point on.

• (1525)

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to join in the debate and to follow the very moving and eloquent words of the member for Halifax. I am sure the House was moved in a very real and a very positive way five years ago when this tragic occurrence took place.

It is particularly timely to reflect on that. We are exploring violence in our society as we begin to discuss the impending legislation, Bill C–41, which is the hate law and the legislation to come on gun control.

All of these things are intermingled and mixed with the violence that seems to be pervasive in our society. When we turn on the television and see children's programs that are one violent scene after another, when we go to movies and see that they are based almost exclusively on violence can we wonder when it happens in our midst what causes it?

This incident was horrible to a degree that we in Canada had not ever seen previously. It was aimed not randomly but specifically at women. The action was taken by someone who could have lived next door to any one of us, by someone who could have been one of our children, someone who otherwise seemed to be normal and just like everybody else.

This happened to ordinary people who were identified specifically because they were women and the killer thought they were a threat to him. They were engineering students in an occupation that traditionally has not had a lot of women.

My wife and I have a daughter who is an engineer. We understand that females who are engineers are unique because there are not that many of them. This touches so many of our lives because of the very ordinariness of the people who were affected by it and by the fact that it happened in Canada. This kind of thing just does not happen in Canada.

It does happen in Canada. It happens all over our country. It happens with alarming frequency. It happens with randomness. Here in Ottawa we had a young man who had just finished university shot and killed by a random act of violence in a drive–by shooting by a young offender.

When we compare that to the horrific events of the l'École Polytechnique five years ago, we have to speak to all of the people who are victims of violence, not just those who were tragically killed that night. Barb Danelesko was awakened in her home. She is just as dead, just as gone from her loved ones as anyone else.

As a society and as a legislative body we need to get beyond the superficial and see if we cannot find out what are the underlying problems in our society that cause or will allow this kind of tragedy to happen. Violence against women is usually a domestic situation.

• (1530)

One thing that has puzzled me is that when there is violence in a domestic situation it is the women and the children who end up leaving the home and going to a shelter. The perpetrator of the violence is given a warning but usually that is about it. It is usually a male and he is usually allowed to go to work and lead a fairly normal life. What happens to the children? They end up being shunted about, torn from their home, torn from the things most familiar to them, torn from their friends and perhaps even torn from extended families if they are being stalked.

Why can we not throw the husband in jail? It is because the husband has rights. Society does not have rights. The children do not have rights. The wife who may well be dead does not have rights but the husband has rights.

The member for Halifax mentioned in her dissertation when she alluded to the question of gun control that sometimes in the greater good the rights of others need to be trampled. I believe in this reference she was speaking about firearms, and perhaps the rights of people to own and use firearms for the greater good have to be in some way restricted.

If we accept that as being true, surely in the interest of the same greater good the rights of husbands should also be curtailed. It makes absolutely no sense to me that society would have a situation where we protect the rights of an abuser or a husband, take the wife and the children from the home and put them into a shelter because we cannot in any way interfere with the rights of the husband. It makes no sense whatsoever. Why can we not throw him in jail for 90 days or 120 days, for a cooling off period?

Statistics show the vast majority of women are injured or killed as a result of domestic situations. However also in a vast majority of cases neighbours or friends know a disaster is about to happen. If we as fellow citizens, neighbours or relatives know that, why can we not intervene? Why can we not tell the police?

One of the underlying factors in domestic homicide is violence. If people are not getting along the chances of them being shot are greatly enhanced. Therefore it would be a good idea if the police very quietly and very gently said: "We know you are having problems. We do not want them to get worse. We know that you have guns. We want to remove these guns from your home for the protection of society and for the greater good. When the problems abate we will return them".

These laws are on the books right now. It would not require one new law. The police have the right to confiscate weapons if they feel and have good knowledge that there is the possibility of a crime being committed with the weapons.

We need to be cautious when we are promulgating laws that deal with violence in homes, violence in general or violence in society. We have a situation in the country where violence is really endemic in society. In my view we are now trying to put politics ahead of principle. The principle we as a nation should hold dear is that we will not condone or in any way allow violence to become the way to resolve disputes in our society. Whether it is father and son, husband and wife or brother against brother, we are not going to use violence as a means of solving disputes in society.

We all agree on principle. I am sure every member of the House would disagree with the statement of principle that we do not want violence to be the means by which we resolve differences. What happens in a society when we say that some forms of violence or violence directed toward some people is more reprehensible than others? In my view that happens when we start to introduce penalties associated with a defining characteristic of the victim rather than the principle that we should not be doing it. It is almost as though we make allowances for some forms of violence or violence toward some people because they do not happen to fit in to a protected category.

I know this is not the intent of the legislation. I know this is not the intent of the government. However it is the reality of the legislation and the government if not the intent. We have abrogated the principle of evenness and fairness to all and replaced it with the notion that crimes committed against a person of a particular gender or with a particular defining characteristic are more heinous than crimes committed against the norm. That just does not make sense.

It does not speak to the root problem in society, that we tolerate ever increasing levels of violence as a means of resolving disputes. We see that in our grade schools. We see that on television when we turn on the TV. I wonder how many people have ever seen "Power Rangers", the children's program that was banned in many places.

When children grow up watching an ever increasing level of violence that is accepted, tolerated and condoned, is it any wonder that we end up with a society that uses violence to resolve disputes? I am speaking directly to the question of domestic violence, which is the vast majority of violence in our society.

Another form of violence I would like to spend a few minutes speaking to this afternoon is the violence directed toward children. That violence is the passive violence of neglect. In Edmonton there is a home called the Youth Emergency Shelter which is pretty much run by a few professional, very capable staff members and a lot of volunteers. It is pretty much supported by donations. It has a tremendous reputation within the community.

In 1983 in a nine-month period the Youth Emergency Shelter in Edmonton comforted around 200 young people around the ages of 14 to 16. Last year it was 200 and some or about a 15 per cent increase in the number of people helped by the Youth Emergency Shelter. We talked to the people at the shelter and asked them why people came to them and what their success rate was in salvaging young lives.

If we are to use a prophylactic approach to violence in our community, it would make great sense to be far more interventionist in support of agencies like the Youth Emergency Shelter so that children and young people 13 years old, who certainly could not be called children, have a place to which to go and be welcomed without question. They do not have to go to the door, knock on the door and ask to come in because they have done this or that. All they have to do is show up. When they are there they have to abide by the rules. They are welcomed. They are fed. They are given warmth and love. An attempt is made when possible to reunite the young people with their families.

What often happens is that a situation between a parent and a child becomes desperate and reaches a pivotal moment. Words are said and perhaps even blows are exchanged. One thing leads to another and the child leaves the home. Even if it is not the case, many young people feel they just cannot go back, that they are not welcome.

In many cases all that is required is a cooling off period, an opportunity for the young people to give it a second thought and the parents to speak to someone who has had some experience in this regard. As parents we all perhaps think we are inventing every situation as it comes along, but I have learned through my association, limited thought it is, with the Youth Emergency Shelter and my long experience with the youth programs of the Rotary that none of us are going through a unique occurrence. It has always happened to someone else before and many of us are in exactly the same boat.

It requires someone with some skill, some compassion and motivation to be an intervener and to build a bridge between the parents and the children to get the children, where possible, back into the nurturing environment of their homes. As we know that is not always the case. From time to time the only hope for a young person is to get out of an abusive situation.

We could make a tremendous return on our investment in society if we were to ensure that those young people who could not go back to their homes had another place to which they could go where they would feel safe and secure. We could keep them out of jail and perhaps they could become productive members of society.

I have had an opportunity to share in the debate today. I did so recognizing that violence in society directed toward women is something that all of us, men and women, have a role to play in preventing or in some way ameliorating. As well we need to look at the complete and the broader picture of violence as a part of our society, in particular the passive violence of neglect and abuse of children at home.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Earlier I said that I would recognize the hon. member for Matapédia—Matane. Since the Minister of Justice is not here to take the floor, I recognize the member for Matapédia—Matane.

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it goes without saying that we must remember. I was at home when I heard about the tragedy at the École polytechnique. Even five years later, the memory is almost just as painful.

I spent my whole adult life as a high school teacher in a rural area.

• (1545)

Even in a comprehensive secondary school with 1,200 students, there was quite a bit of violence, so much so in fact that some children were persecuting each other in almost a tragic way.

When I first started teaching there was some violence, but it was more sporadic. However, toward the end of my career, it had become almost a daily occurrence.

Earlier, we referred to verbal abuse, which is very prevalent among young people. It is fine to describe that violence, and when we discuss violence, we forget about partisan considerations and think only about the victims, but we forget about meanness.

I have a question for this House: Why is there so much violence? It goes without saying that if a young boy is not loved, he will not like himself. And a young boy who does not like himself will develop a mean streak which he will express in various ways.

How does he behave? He hits, makes harsh comments, or hurls insults. It is said that violence generates violence. Gangs are organized: three against three, four against four, and so on. These gangs carry on their activities; they often use drugs and then they find weapons. There is practically no limit to what they will do.

How de we stop that? I believe there are several ways. By looking for the causes of violence, we will find the means to stop it. We feel that prevention is an excellent means to that end. In some schools, there is a lot more prevention than in others and violence has diminished considerably.

It is also true that where poverty and unemployment are a fact of life, crime tends to be more widespread.

The massacre of these young students was a tragedy, I agree. But two young people who make a suicide pact is also a tragedy. This happened in my riding two years ago, when two young people committed suicide. When you consider that these were intelligent, healthy youngsters, you wonder why they no longer wanted to go on living. Why did they want to take their own lives? There must be a reason. And I wondered how at sixteen, seventeen or twenty, you could consider suicide. Many of my students committed suicide, and every time I said to myself: There is a reason. There is a reason, because we instinctively hold on to life, as anyone who has been near death will agree.

If you are in good health and you decide to take your own life, there may be several reasons but we have to find the right one.

Other students are in prison, some of my own students whom I see from time to time. Apparently, at 15 or 16 they were like everybody else, just as open–hearted. So what happened? Why did it happen to him and not someone else? Maybe it was some experience they had in their lives or somehow they had reached the point of no return, with very unfortunate results.

I agree we need legislation on firearms but we need more than that. I think that starting with primary school, we must find ways to wipe out this petty violence that occurs year after year. How can a three or four year old child become so aggressive that he is almost ready to strangle his next door neighbour? If we take them at 25 and send them to jail, the cost to society is enormous. Sometimes they get out with new tricks, and some, although not all, become repeaters.

My main concern is not firearms. I agree that we should control guns. I could not agree more. It does not make sense to send people to prison for 20, 25 or 30 years, and turn them into hardened criminals. I am not saying we should not do that, that is not what I mean. My point is that we have to go to the root of the matter and find out the initial causes as soon as possible.

Some children go to primary school without breakfast or lunch and only have a snack for supper.

Some of my oldest students were saying that poverty did not exist or hardly. Once, during the holiday season at the school where I taught we made Christmas baskets. I told these older students who were big and tough and sure of themselves to come with me. They came, and the first house we went to we saw two cases of empty beer bottles, each with 24 bottles, and a man lying on a kind of chesterfield. The cupboards were bare and children were crying.

When we got back, these guys who were 16, 17 or 18 and pretty tough, said: Poverty does exist, and we should go and visit poor families more often. These kids had been in trouble before, some had been convicted of theft. They felt they were luckier than others, but it takes time to make them understand. They should have these experiences, otherwise they harden their hearts and lose their self–esteem, and then they will do anything to survive. They try to be tough and become marginalized.

So to come back to what I was saying, I am glad the Minister of Justice is here.

• (1555)

I want to ask the minister whether all the legislation we are going to adopt should not emphasize prevention. Prevention should take place at the earliest possible age, because once a person is 40 and has been in prison repeatedly, I am not saying nothing can be done, but it is certainly far more difficult.

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, let me quote the message published in Quebec newspapers today:

> Every citizen had to open their eyes and refuse to tolerate the various expressions of violence against women, from the smallest to the biggest, most obvious ones.

"Never again, Polytechnique!"

I have personally undertaken, as Minister of Justice, to put forward measures to counter violence.

[English]

When we are asked what the government is doing with respect to violence in society and violence against women in particular, a frank and direct answer must be that we are not doing enough.

We have taken certain steps and we resolve to take others. Working with the members of the House who have expressed so eloquently today their commitment to the principles we share and to the effort which we have embarked upon, I think we can truly make a difference through this legislation.

The steps we have taken include the changes contemplated in Bill C–42 to the regime of peace bonds which makes peace bonds easier to obtain from the court, which permit the applications for those protective orders to be made by police officers on behalf of women victims and which makes the enforcement and the consequences for the breach of such orders more significant.

I refer as well to the creation of the National Crime Prevention Council. I agree without hesitation with the comments made by the hon. member who spoke just before me about the importance of prevention in everything that we do. The National Crime Prevention Council which met for the second time in October has taken violence against women and children in Canadian society as one of its priority objectives during the coming months.

I refer as well to the family violence initiative, led by my colleague the Minister of Health, and the efforts that initiative involves to co–ordinate the actions of governments at all levels to address domestic violence toward women and children.

I refer to the announcement last week of the firearms control policy of this government and the very direct way in which it is intended to deal with domestic violence. Yesterday morning I had the honour of speaking in Edmonton at a breakfast organized to raise funds for shelters for women who are the victims of violence and for community services for such victims. I emphasized there one of the reasons why our firearms control policy is sensible. One of the reasons why universal registration is required is so that it will permit police the real tool to enforce prohibition orders where they are made in the context of a domestic dispute.

Nowadays, although prohibition orders are provided for by law, when the police officers arrive to enforce them they have no idea of what firearms are in that home. They must take the word of the occupant to determine what firearms should be taken away. That is simply not good enough. There should be a register. There will be a universal register of firearms and that will be overcome.

I can refer as well to the fact that I co–ordinate the efforts of nine ministers in the federal cabinet who work in a co–ordinated way to address the subject of violence in Canadian society generally. This includes the Minister of Canadian Heritage, for example, whose preoccupation in this context is with violence in broadcasting. It includes the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whose concern is for the incidence of violence in the aboriginal communities. Together, the nine ministers co–ordinate their efforts, working in a variety of ways to reduce and address the issue of violence.

• (1600)

Finally, on June 13, we tabled Bill C–41, to make a number of changes to the sentencing procedure. Under these proposals, abusing a position of trust or authority to commit a crime would be deemed to be an aggravating factor for the purpose of sentencing.

This bill is designed to provide women with further protection against the violence they suffer at the hands of persons in a position of trust.

[English]

That too will help, although none of these specific measures will be enough on its own.

There is a great deal more for us to do as a government. We must do a better job in the Department of Justice in testing and auditing the impact of all laws, particularly the criminal laws in terms of gender. What is the gender impact of changes we propose from time to time to the criminal law?

We must in the Department of Justice work harder and more urgently to resolve the issue that is getting worse by the month, dealing with the disclosure of confidential records in the course of criminal prosecutions, confidential records relating to female complainants that are subpoenaed from professionals who are treating the complainants, from confidants who may have heard the complainant make statements, from rape crisis shelters that may have helped the complainant immediately after the alleged event.

We have to find a way to resolve that issue, balancing on the one hand the right of the accused person to make full answer in defence, which is fundamental to the law, but at the same time the right of complainants not to be revictimized through the unwarranted invasion of their private affairs and what amounts to intimidation to prevent them from participating in the prosecution.

We must also grapple with the drunkenness defence in respect of which I am at work now to prepare legislative proposals for February. In many ways that is a woman's issue as well as a criminal law issue generally. It is no accident that the Daviault case involved allegations of sexual assault by a man against a women. It is no accident that the cases that occurred subsequently in other provinces too often involved allegations of violence by men against women.

As we address these challenges, as we face up to the fact that we are not doing enough and that we must do more, as we approach the remaining tasks with an enhanced sense of urgency and commitment, I urge all members of the House to participate with the government, to take on this societal imperative. Our daughters must grow up to inherit a different country, a country which expressly and as a fundamental matter of citizenship rejects violence in all forms and rejects violence against women and children in particular. That must be our goal and we must work together to achieve it.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any doubt that everyone in the House abhors violence, whether it is against women or against anyone else. There is no doubt about that.

I have heard a recurring theme here today. It is a theme, it seems to me, to make all of us feel guilty, especially men. This theme runs through the Canadian Human Rights Act, through the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and through other legislation that has been directed against men and in particular white men.

I would like to ask a rhetorical question of the minister. Is this fair? Is it not time to talk about violence against anyone as a serious matter? Is it not time to deal with the criminal who is committing the violence and deal to some extent with the potential criminals who are likely to commit violence? You do that best in a family setting. Instead of just trying to make men particularly feel guilty, is it not a better approach to deal with the criminals and with the crime that is committed and with prevention through the family?

• (1605)

Instead of putting forward legislation that is damaging the family, destroying the family, instead give the family fair treatment under our tax regulations, under our social program system and under other areas of law, particularly under the minister's control.

I have one further part to this question concerning gun control. If the gun control the minister is proposing prevents violent crime, will the minister take personal responsibility for any crime that is committed once these laws are in place? Will the minister, when realizing that this gun control legislation totally fails, take the next step which is confiscation of all firearms?

Mr. Rock: Mr. Speaker, I do not speak as I do because I wish to make the hon. member or any other person feel guilty. I speak as I do to make all of us together feel responsible for changing the way things are.

I do not single out white men or middle aged men or men with blond hair or any other subcategory of the population. What I am suggesting is that we must face the facts. Violence in all of its forms against anyone is unacceptable. However sometimes violence against particular groups in society is so predominant, so widespread, so ingrained in the culture that it has to be identified for particular action.

Let me tell members why I say that. In November 1993, Statistics Canada published a survey which was unique in all the world. It surveyed a huge segment of the population about violence. All members of the population surveyed were women.

They found, among other things, that over half of the women surveyed had been the victims of an act of violence committed by a man against them during their adult life. That is extraordinary.

What am I? I am a middle aged white Anglo–Saxon male. If members went out and surveyed the middle class, white, middle aged Anglo–Saxon males you would not find anything like that kind of statistic in terms of victimization of violence. Why do we not face the facts? We have a problem here. We have a problem.

The man who walked into l'École polytechnique with the Ruger Mini–14 five years ago today said something when he pulled the trigger. He said bring on the women. I want to get the women. He killed 14 of them and injured another 13. It was at random. He was not after white, middle class Anglo–Saxon lawyers. He was after women, so let us deal with the reality.

It is everywhere. May I ask the hon. member if he has seen the television programs recently, the rock videos on MTV or the commercials that peddle products? What is implicit in them is the victimization of women which is deplorable. Let's stop it. I am not doing that to make anybody feel guilty.

Of course I support the family. That is where we must begin. We must teach children from the beginning to treat other people as human beings first, not on the basis of gender.

In so far as gun control is concerned, yes, I strongly believe that those measures will help address, among other things, domestic violence. Do I say that such violence will never occur with these changes? Of course not, because we cannot make it a perfect world. But I firmly believe that they will help to make things better.

I urge the hon. member in closing to not feel guilty because it is not anyone's intention to make him feel guilty for what others have done, rather to join us in feeling responsible. Together as members of this legislature we can do something to make it a somewhat a better world.

The Deputy Speaker: There is about a minute left. I would ask the member and the minister to divide that minute between the two of them please.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I do not have much time therefore I will just say what I want to say to the Minister of Justice.

I listened to him talk about prevention. Prevention is a key element in cutting the violence in our society. I hate and despise violence as much as anyone in the House. I want to hear the hon. minister use the words deterrent, consequence and penalty more often so that I can have some comfort in my belief that more severe consequences for violent crimes is on the hon. minister's agenda.

• (1610)

Mr. Rock: Mr. Speaker, I will be brief in just saying that deterrence is an essential part of this. I am the person who introduced decisions last week increasing to four years mandatory minimum penitentiary time for anyone who uses a firearm in any one of ten serious offences, including robbery.

Mr. Thompson: No parole?

Mr. Rock: No, but we will discuss this in committee. I am the one who proposed—

The Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The time has expired.

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this matter today.

Geneviève Bergeron, Hélèn Colgan, Nathalie Croteau, Barbara Daigneault, Anne–Marie Edward, Maud Havernick, Barbara Marta Klucknik, Maryse Laganière, Maryse Leclair, Anne–Marie Lemay, Sonia Pelletier, Michèle Richard, Annie

St–Arnault and Annie Turcotte. These are the names of the 14 women whose lives were needlessly extinguished at the École Polytechnique five years ago.

It has always bothered me that the name of their assailant comes more readily to mind than theirs. Today and every future December 6 is now designated as Canada's national day of remembrance and action to end violence against women. Ceremonies, vigils and public actions will focus public awareness on the many far–reaching implications of violence against women. These involve the social, psychological and economic well–being of women, men and children across society and across Canada.

Tonight in my city of London a monument memorializing the 14 women and others who are victims of violence is being unveiled. The monument is inscribed: "The London Women's Monument was dedicated on December 6, 1994, the fifth anniversary of the Montreal massacre. It is a place to remember and reflect on violence, particularly violence against women, and all women and men who work to end it".

Women's rights are human rights. We must acknowledge that violence against women is often a byproduct of gendered social inequality and can be a rejection of women's progressive empowerment.

Change can be led by governments but the most effective change begins with individuals. All men and women can make a personal commitment to the principle of zero tolerance, that no amount of violence is acceptable and that women's safety is a priority. As individuals we can focus more on co–operation instead of competition.

Earlier today the four federal and provincial female London politicians, representing three different political parties, issued a joint statement speaking out against violence against women. Violence against women is a social issue, even though many see it only as a political issue.

As individuals we can decide not to laugh at women–hating jokes, just as we do not laugh at racial slurs. Violence against women is not a funny issue. As individuals we can listen and discuss women's experiences, their fears and the equality barriers they face. It is still much more comfortable to be dismissive or to trivialize the alarming statistics which we have now compiled. Denial has never solved problems. It is time now to speak out and challenge any tolerance of violence or sexist behaviour.

Where possible, individuals can give financial or political support to services for victims and survivors. Individuals can volunteer at local transition homes and rape crisis shelters and be supportive of municipal, provincial, federal and non–government initiatives in their own neighbourhoods and cities. Violence against women robs women of their self–esteem, their dignity and in too many cases it robs them of their life.

Since Statistics Canada conducted its first national survey on violence against women in 1993, which was the first of its kind worldwide, the gravity of the situation has been brought to light. According to this survey, as many as 51 per cent of Canadian women have experienced at least one incident of physical or sexual violence since the age of 16. Almost 45 per cent of all women experienced violence by men known to them, their dates, boyfriends, marital partners, friends, family, their neighbours.

A woman is shot every six days in Canada. Firearms are the weapon of choice for spousal homicides. During the period between 1974 and 1992, 42 per cent of the women killed by their spouses were shot. As shattering as these statistics are they only account for part of the problem since Statistics Canada defines violence as experiences of physical or sexual assault. It does not touch upon other dimensions of violence to which many women are subjected.

Three other areas identified in the 1993 report "Changing the Landscape: Ending Violence—Achieving Equality" are psychological violence, being violence that encompasses various tactics to undermine a woman's self–confidence; financial violence whereby a woman's access to employment or investment opportunities are curtailed by a partner or family member; and spiritual abuse in which cultural and religious beliefs are destroyed through ridicule or punishment. A wide range of indicators give evidence that this societal ill is pervasive and systemic.

As a result women from all walks of life are targets of various acts of violence. Not only are the causes and the forms of violence against women extremely insidious but so too are their effects. Violence scars not only women but also the children and the men around them. It marks the body but also deeply wounds the mind and the spirit of those affected.

As a result of having been abused a woman's physical and/or mental health may be at stake. Her chances of advancement in her working life may be jeopardized and her interpersonal skills generally deteriorate.

As well as having these devastating effects on the women concerned, such violence is proven to seriously destabilize the children who witness it. Boys who are brought up in an abusive household are more likely to become violent fathers and girls are more likely to become victims at the hands of their future partners. In fact women with violent fathers–in–law are three times more at risk than those women with non–violent fathers–in–law. We have to stop these cycles.

As in other issues such as poverty and crime there will never be one Utopian legislative effort. There are no magic wands that can instantly eradicate the scourge of violence against women.

As with all complex issues there must be interdisciplinary approaches.

First, we must state what we stand for. Canada has done this internationally by initiating the UN declaration on the elimination of violence against women which was adopted in December 1993. For the first time internationally we have the appointment of a United Nations special rapporteur on violence against women who will report to the United Nations Commissioner of Human Rights starting March 1995.

Next we look at all levels of government agendas and incorporate concrete concepts that will move us toward the goal of ending violence against women. This will of necessity include increased public education.

Last April the Department of Canadian Heritage collaboratively launched a three year radio and television campaign on violence in society. In October 1994 the court challenges program was reinstated to ensure funding for legal cases of national significance which clarify equality and language rights under Canada's Constitution.

The sentencing reform bill is now being studied in committee which would assist in providing different options to deal with crime, including violence.

Earlier this year in the House I spoke on another bill with more than 100 amendments to the Criminal Code, including provisions that would make peace bonds more effective. For example, police officers will be able to apply for peace bonds on behalf of the women at risk.

The National Crime Prevention Council was established in July 1994. It will address women's vulnerability to crime as part of its mandate.

I believe that the firearms control being introduced will also effect safety in our homes and in our streets. A national firearms registry, the banning of certain firearms, including the one used in the Montreal massacre, and more flexible prohibition orders, will benefit women and should save lives.

Last June the federal, provincial and territorial ministers responsible for the status of women adopted the Regina declaration on the rights of women subjected to violence which calls on the justice system to ensure the equal protection of women subjected to violence. In the same month the federal justice minister, the federal health minister and the Secretary of State for the Status of Women held a consultation with women's groups on the issue of violence against women. Further consultation will continue. I believe that it must be ongoing if we are to succeed in overcoming this problem.

I am grateful that members of this House have been offered this opportunity to speak on the issue today.

• (1620)

My wish and my hope is that the sentiments expressed within this House today will carry us forward each and every day in our jobs as legislators so that we are ever mindful of the situation of women who experience violence in Canada. I believe we are progressing and I am grateful for that. However, there is much that can still be done.

I hope that individual Canadians listening today will continue to do their part in their homes, in their communities, and in our ridings.

The Deputy Speaker: The Chair views this as a very serious debate and would indicate that I recognized a member earlier who was in fact not on the list. I had misread the list and recognized the hon. member from the Bloc and gave him the floor which I should not have done.

[Translation]

I was told that there was an agreement between the two parties. Because I made a mistake, the Official Opposition is now willing to let four Liberals speak one after the other. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Deputy Speaker: I am sure that, with this agreement, all the members who want to do so will speak this afternoon. I now recognize the hon. member for York—Simcoe.

[English]

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a letter from a woman in my riding by the name of Sally. Sally has given me permission to make her letter public. Sally's letter speaks to the impact of violence on women and the resulting poverty they face. The letter was prepared for our Campaign 2000 meeting. Campaign 2000 is an umbrella organization comprised of many drawn together to fight child poverty.

"My name is Sally and I am the independent parent of two little girls. I am also a financially challenged recipient of family benefits. While I am grateful for the assistance I receive, I will say that I have become discouraged by the system's lack of insight and insensitivity to the roadblocks faced by myself and others on the road to financial independence.

"When I first became aware of Campaign 2000, the word poverty was a difficult one to envision in relation to my situation. Visions of starving children in third world countries leapt to mind. However, over time it has become increasingly difficult for me to meet my children's needs and systems and bureaucrats turn deaf ears in a country such as Canada. I have come to the brutal realization that I do indeed fall far below the poverty line.

"In making the decision to leave an extremely abusive situation and needing to enter a woman's shelter, my life and that of my children changed abruptly two years ago, now reduced to relying on a system where $1,028 per month is to cover living expenses being accommodation, phone and utilities. Clothing and feeding myself and my two daughters becomes a hard lesson in the realities of life for far too many children in Canada. Food bank? I can only go once a month if I can get transportation. So, why not get a job? I have tried, but unfortunately I live in a rural area where one opening at a local store gets over 300 applications. Tough competition for a stay at home mom out of the workforce for seven years.

"Add in the problems of transportation and day care of an affordable nature and the picture becomes bleaker. So why not get some upgrading? Better your education. Again the obstacles of transportation, day care and waiting lists loom large.

"Support? For two years now I have struggled with a system of lawyers, legal aid and the family support person in trying to get some financial relief for my daughters. After this period I have succeeded in having $22,000 in legal aid liens placed against my home and an agreement from my husband to pay $100 a month support, that is $50 per child. Since this agreement in June of this year has been in effect and in spite of the fact that he makes $50,000 per year, I have not received any support from him.

"This person is also on probation for uttering death threats. Two provisions of his probation are (1) he must maintain his dependents. He has failed to do this. I have spoken with lawyers and his probation officer to try and enlist their help but my words fall on deaf ears.

"A second provision of his probation order is that he must seek and maintain employment. I'm now told he was laid off when he requested help from his probation officer in getting some relief. Despite that fact he still is seen at his work daily and despite that if he is in fact unemployed, that is the second breach of his probation. Still nothing is done.

"A third provision of his probation is that he remain 300 metres away from myself and my residence. He repeatedly breaks this provision. I have been again to his probation officer. I have been to her supervisor. I was told by a police officer that I was fabricating lies and thrown out of the police station by this officer. The police have been to my home repeatedly. One of the officer's comment was that until someone shows up with a bullet hole there's nothing that we can do.

"If you are wondering what the third provision has to do with poverty and the plight of my children, I'll tell you. The financial strain of repairing busted doors, windows, plumbing that's been drilled and cut, slashed tires, having a crowbar taken to the side of my vehicle and numerous other acts of vandalism begins to take its toll.

"The police have recommended doorbolts and deadlocks, expensive outdoor sensor lights. Well, for that you need money and hydro. A year ago in April after being unable to meet a payment deadline, the hydro to my home had been disconnected. It still remains so. Hydro tax–rolled my bill after running an original $800 bill up to over $1,700 with service charges and late payment charges. They also charged me for having their line and a hot water heater even though they cut their service off. They still come every three months to read a meter I no longer have and then service charge me.

"It was also explained to me that if I ever wanted Ontario Hydro back, I would pay for the lines to be reconnected plus they would require a $1,600 deposit. I would have phoned their head office, but in July of that same year Bell disconnected my phone for a $50 bill, despite the fact that they had required a $200 deposit from me, despite the fact that at that time I was in a women's shelter while the trial was going on against my husband. While he was out on bail he left his probation officer's office and came to my home to once again threaten my children and myself.

"In June of this year I received a call from the bank. Due to my husband's refusal to sign the mortgage renewal despite the court order that allowed me to reside in my home and add the fact that I'm on family benefits, I was told I had 30 days to vacate, despite the fact that I have faithfully paid the mortgage, taxes and now the hydro arrears. Another lawyer, another bill. I have one year to get this straightened out. Time is running out.

"I rely on your imagination and empathy to realize what effect all this has had on my two little girls. I say those magic words social assistance and watch human decency and respect fly out the window. Buy a car? Home improvement loan? Start a business? I can hear the bank manager's laughter still ringing in my ears. I almost gave up there and then.

"But I am here tonight because I owe it to my children to keep trying and hopefully one day someone will listen and changes will be made so my two daughters and all the other children in this nation of plenty will have a bright future.

"Thank you for listening".

It is my understanding that Sally is now in hiding away from her abusive and very violent husband. I hope that somehow someone will be able to get these words to her so she will know that her story has been told on the floor of the House of Commons.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we have just heard a very touching story. It is upsetting to me because it shows that the proper laws are not in place to protect this person or that they are not enforced. Either case is totally unacceptable.

The member should let the justice minister know this is totally unacceptable and demand that either the proper laws are put in place or that the laws that are there are enforced. I would like the member to comment on that.

Mrs. Kraft Sloan: Mr. Speaker, I think it is very clear that in Sally's letter she has outlined a number of situations of institutional abuse.

• (1630)

It is very difficult when women are placed in this situation and they go to those people they feel should be protecting them, for example the police, and their charges are dismissed. They are told they are troublemakers. Part of the problem with this has to do with overall societal attitude.

The Minister of Justice is very sensitive to these issues. I have heard members opposite say that we should be concerned about violence against all people. I totally agree with that but somehow violence against women is a special category and they are being made a special interest group.

We have to understand that until we address the issue of violence against women as a particular kind of violence and the kinds of intimidation it creates for an entire group within this society, namely women, we will never be able to address the problems of institutional abuse. No matter how good our laws are unless the attitudes, the understanding and the sensitivities that are related to this very complex and devastating issue are understood these matters will not be addressed.

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on this national day of remembrance and action to end violence against women I believe we should not only remember this act once a year but throughout the year.

This House is well apprised of the statistics relating to the violence and abuse against women. These numbers represent those incidents which have been reported, the ones we know about. However, the number of violent and abusive incidents which have not been reported are even more frightening. It is a tidal wave which must be abated.

When safe houses must be established in urban areas and police must begin escorting women to their homes to claim sometimes only the clothing on their backs or to visit their children, then it is a sad testimony to the state of relationship deterioration between men and women as well as the new face that family life in Canada is taking. When we must stand up in this House and legislate against indecent abnormal behaviour then the time has come for action not only on the part of government but also individuals and corporations, all who live within our communities.

Violence is not some strange enigma which explodes from the ground in random procession. Its seeds are planted carefully years and even generations in advance. The images of violence children are exposed to on television and in society at large and the subsequent lessons they learn from parents sets in motion a cycle of learning aggressive behaviour which is as precise as clockwork.

If through this cycle we instil in our children a low sense of self–worth or never help them to build a sense of self–esteem their lives are threatened. This is extremely counterproductive and increasingly dangerous as they grow older and develop intimate relationships because under the threat of having self–worth challenged they will either withdraw or lash out. Unfortunately more often than not the males in society are prone to lashing out with anger while females tend to withdraw.

More often than not pressures are exerted from poverty, communication breakdown, community decay, alcohol and drug abuse, barrages of messages in the media to possess or acquire material goods in order to be relegated upward from a non–person status. All of these contribute to the already overwhelming pressures of rearing children and making choices in this day and age.

All too often the metaphor that when soldiers are not fighting on the front they are fighting in the camps can be applied to this appalling situation of violence against women and children. Many good decent people who start off in a relationship with the best of intentions end up watching with shock and horror as their relationship decays into verbal and physical abuse as individuals either lash out with threats or actual violence.

Why is this? The pressures of everyday life and finances draw a family's attention away from its primary goal: the establishment of family, roots and future to each other's personal performance and contribution in the relationship. When self–esteem is challenged there is either a withdrawal into separation and divorce or again lashing out in anger.

• (1635)

It is not the function and purpose of this government to interfere in the personal lives of Canadians. However, I believe we have a responsibility and we must make a conscious choice for the future on behalf of the family and on behalf of women and children specifically.

Programs and policies must be developed which provide not only for zero tolerance but also give teeth that will allow law enforcement to implement changes. This must be set as a last resort for those who cross the line, who choose not only to brutalize but to exploit women and children as well.

We must also change our view and our bias of interpersonal relationships. The laws we write must encourage protection of both the immediate and extended families. We must allow for dealing with potential abuse through caring professionals. A sense of community and personal accountability must be developed in the inner cities.

Finally, we must not only begin to communicate but we must also listen. I would venture to say that the 63 women who were murdered in 1993 fell prey to a person who was already in a state of detachment and isolation. If only there had been in existence a network of people with whom these spouses could talk openly and honestly about their situation. We know that open and honest communication is not a prelude to murder.

Again there must be communication in our society not only among our peers but outside our comfort zone as well. Parents must start talking to their children, grandparents with grandchildren, men with women, and labour with management.

I fear that if the tide does not turn on this problem, if we do not start honestly communicating in a fashion that will solve rather than dissolve our relationships, then we as a society will be so distrustful that our internal growth will cease and Canadian families will continue to perish and die.

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to comment on my colleague's excellent articulation. I thank her for her thoughts. I would like to share a few of my thoughts by way of comment.

Violence against women in a real sense is an insult to life. It is an indignity to our core Canadian values. As well it is a challenge to peace, order and good government.

The incidents mentioned are staggering, but the real concern of course are the people who are affected the most: orphaned children, grieving families and the suffering of the whole community.

I congratulate the member for her participation. It is hoped that violence against women which happened in the past and continues to happen will not happen in the future.

Mrs. Brushett: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his comments. As he has said, this does go beyond women, men and children. It is a community. Life in my estimation is a process of human relationships. The process of living is developing and sharing those relationships. Those relationships are what accumulate to make up the family which in turn makes up the community.

I believe as the hon. member does that violence against any person is a violation of the dignity of human life. Human life is at the bottom of the foundation of all things we must respect in our communities.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Crête (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup, BQ): Mr. Speaker, when I heard of today's debate, I naturally thought about the victims at l'École polytechnique, but I also thought about all the other victims of violence, about the 300 and some women who have died in violent incidents since 1989, and about the thousands of women who face various acts of violence every day. It is important to see this situation, not necessarily as a particularly atrocious fact, but as a situation prevailing throughout our society, which has led to unacceptable behaviours and to which we must give priority so that Quebec society, Canadian society can be held up as an example of a violence free society.

• (1640)

Part of the problem we are facing can be found in this House today: all members are denouncing violence and saying that we must take the right measures to prevent such incidents from happening again in the future, but we encounter the same problem in society.

Violence is often a problem, partly because we do not talk about the reality, the fact that people are affected. Victims of violence are not allowed to speak out, so they can overcome their fears and get on with their lives after going through a period of violence. For example, violent men have few opportunities to express who they are and release this negative energy, so that they can clean up their act and allow the situation to evolve.

That is why, in considering what I expected from this debate, I thought a great deal about my children, my two daughters, Audrey and Maude, and my son, Renaud, because it is for them that we are trying to build a different society.

When we read stories about how violence is perpetuated, we see that some behaviours are often passed on from father to son or from mother to daughter and that even abusers are not necessarily aware of their violent tendencies. As I said earlier, we must hold a public debate on the subject and initiate a dialogue that will enable us to correct these situations.

Some specific ways to promote this dialogue are by supporting women's centres or groups that look after violent men, because you may have the best intentions in the world, but if you do not have the energy and resources needed for these discussions to go on, they will not take place and we will inherit the negative results, as we have for a long time, with tragic events like what happened at l'École polytechnique and all the tragic events that we learn about and which we hear reported as anecdotes; repression is suggested as the way to deal with them, but I think that repression is a last resort to prevent physical violence.

Of course, we must eliminate violence by properly controlling firearms and all other instruments of violence; we must control them to prevent a recurrence of events like those at l'École polytechnique. But at the same time, we must look further and see what is behind this event and find out what caused it.

We realize that conjugal violence and violence in general is a complex phenomenon because it involves not only poor families, middle class families or rich families. Domestic violence occurs in all classes of society and we must find ways to correct this problem.

Earlier, I talked about creating proper conditions. However, many people in our society have basic needs that are not met, for education, family income, child care, equity in social programs; also, the new types of families in our society do not have the support services they need. Single–parent families and blended families experience completely new situations to which our social programs are not necessarily suited.

I would also say that violence has a subversive aspect, a rather perverse aspect due to the inequality between men and women in terms of employment and career opportunities.

• (1645)

This perpetuates the feeling of inequality, and often allows some men to establish relations in which women are dependent, thus creating a situation which can potentially lead to violence. But there is not only physical violence; there are many other forms of violence.

Consequently, it is important to do prevention from the time a child is born, since the way that child will develop will influence, to a degree, his perception of things. We must ensure that families can give birth to children in acceptable conditions, feed them properly and provide them with all the necessary elements to grow and build their self–esteem, so as to help them develop respect for their fellow citizens, members of the opposite sex and friends, as well as relations based on mutual respect instead of dependency.

Clearly, we must launch an attack on several fronts. We are faced with a situation similar to that of child poverty, in the sense that a preventive and comprehensive strategy is required to end violence, but we also need ad hoc measures to deal with emergencies.

It is also important to look at what can be done during the various stages of a child's development to curb the tendency to resort to violence. Do we grant adequate maternity leave to all Canadian women, so that they can give birth in proper conditions? If these women are single parents situation, do they have adequate financial resources to live in acceptable conditions?

Later on, when a child is growing, does he benefit from adequate daycare services? Are there not people right now who would like to have access to such services to help their children develop in a proper environment? Do we not stereotype people increasingly?

Children born in relatively well off families that can afford privately funded quality daycare will receive a more stable education. These children will develop more self–confidence. On the other hand, there are those who are trapped in the vicious circle of financial dependency and can see no way out. So we have to work to ensure that equal opportunities become more prevalent, so that 20 or 25 years from now, changes will be noticeable, with less violence and fewer groups living in conditions conducive to violence.

Then there is school and career. If women go back to experiencing difficulty in finding employment and to being in a position of inferiority in the jobs that they do get, if they cannot have access to university careers, if we fail to eliminate stereotypes in that regard, we help perpetuate the existing climate.

On that subject, choices must be made—they are still under consideration—concerning the social security reform for example. Students could have to take full responsibility for their loans. This means that they will have much higher debts to pay off when they graduate. And it would be unfair to women who would choose to start a family.

Specific measures such as these do not have a direct bearing on dramatic acts of violence, but nevertheless add to the set of conditions which eventually lead to violence.

I would also like to see that, later in life, women who have grown up and become adults are able to start a family and have children in acceptable conditions, so that they do not find themselves in a situation where they themselves could become violent toward their children because we have failed to put in place an adequate social system to enable them to raise them in decent conditions.

This whole debate on violence is a societal issue and, perhaps it should also be pointed out, an individual issue. Because somewhere we have to take a good look at ourselves and at our own behaviour. I think that if this debate made all Quebecers or all Canadians take a moment of their evening to think about and discuss potential sources of violence in their environments, as well as individual behaviours which could be corrected, and the need to adapt, we could say that we helped reduce the opportunities for violence in our society. I think that this would be a good response to today's debate. It is up to each one of us.

This is also a government responsibility. A review is under way. The Minister of Justice spoke earlier about a series of measures that have been or will be taken, but important choices must be made regarding the resources to be allocated to the various programs, the approach to this problem, and I think that the results will show how successful our efforts were. This government must take concrete actions that will bring about some improvement in the situation and make our society better before the new millennium rolls around.

When we commemorate again in five or ten years the terrible event that occurred at l'École polytechnique, instead of talking about the negative side of the current situation, we will at least be able to tell all those who were made aware of the issue of violence by this event, all those who made a contribution, all the women who circulated petitions until a gun control law was passed, that the mission has been accomplished. We will have succeeded in reducing violence in our society, and this may be the best test.

[English]

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think this afternoon in this debate that many of us are in agreement. We in this House are very disturbed and share the sense of horror at the events that took place five years ago today. When we hear of these kinds of actions and hear about human suffering, we think of ourselves in those moments as one family, that it is one of our family who is suffering.

I want to ask the member a question. It seems to me that he mentioned that social conditions are very important to people who may become violent in their lives. I wonder what he feels is the role of the economy. Does he feel that a weakened or a stronger economy that may have some impact on these sensitive issues?

[Translation]

Mr. Crête: Mr. Speaker, I think that is an excellent question and I discussed it a little in my presentation when I talked about employment. Yes, I think that if this country had an active job creation policy for using our human resources to their full potential, it would mean that every man and every woman in our society could make his or her contribution to it.

• (1655)

An active employment policy would mean that we would care more about the whole social aspect, because our society now often tends to emphasize productivity as an end in itself, although Canadian society, despite its faults, has still developed some values like compassion.

In this day and age, we should avoid following the American model blindly; we see the results they have obtained in terms of violence. They are our southern neighbours and we can see it right away. I think that is what haunts us in actions like the terrible event at l'École polytechnique, as someone said in an article in Le Devoir today. The writer saw it as an indication of what we might see, which is more commonly associated with the United States.

I think that to counter that, to get back to the hon. member's question, yes, if the economy works well, if people work, if they pay taxes, we will be able to have a better distribution of justice. I think that is a contribution which this government could and should make in particular when it will have to adjust its reform of social programs to respond more closely to the representations made to it by many groups across Canada.

[English]

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, very quickly to the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup. He spoke with great integrity about women, the difficulty of developing careers and raising families, and the need almost to be a super human being, to do it all and to do it well with grace, dignity and respect for the children and family.

What role do you believe that men play in the lives of sharing some of the responsibilities of child nurturing and rearing so that some of that pressure is relieved from the women in our society?

The Deputy Speaker: Unless members want to hear from the Speaker I would ask them to put questions through the Chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Crête: Mr. Speaker, I have a great interest in this issue, considering that with our work schedule as members of Parliament, it might be very tempting to adopt the traditional role of the father. That being said, as a man, I can only pay tribute to the hon. member for her work with children.

One of the main things we can do is to act as men and parents who believe in a different model than the traditional one, a model based on respect for young girls and women, based on the belief that they deserve the same opportunities as men to develop their potential, and also based on real support in every day life, whenever possible.

In the case of families where both spouses are often together, I believe in sharing chores. It is also important—and that goes for every family—to discuss problems and other issues such as spousal abuse, because these things do exist. For example, if we witness this type of violence on TV, it may be good to discuss it for a minute, instead of quickly switching channels.

I also think that when half of the seats in this House will be filled by women, our institution will more balanced and will pass better laws which will take into account to an even greater degree what must be done to have new views on success and power.

The Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Malpeque—Trade; the hon. member for London West—Violence Against Women; the hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm—Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

• (1700)

[English]

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today I rise to commemorate the infamous day of December 6, 1989. The national horror is incomprehensible, for there are no simple answers, no easy inferences to be drawn. We have an atmosphere of our times which seems to reflect a violent society. It is seen that our crime rates reflect a national psychology. At times listening to what is put forward as fact in the House reflects a mood that could kill the soul, for we are so adversarial both in the House and in the community.

As a former worker in the criminal justice system, I dealt too frequently with both the offender and the offended. Violence lessens us all in society. We as a society are all responsible for the permissiveness in general and our lack of courage as a community to denounce perpetrators.

I concur with what has been said in the House today but, with due respect for this day, we must also recognize community trends. In the past crime was far from being an equal opportunity employer between the sexes, but the gap appears to be closing. Although five men were charged with criminal offences last year for every woman charged, a decade ago the proportion was seven to one. A similar trend is apparent in the United States where statistics show that the male:female arrest ratio in 1992 had declined to just over four to one.

Nowhere is the change more pronounced than in violent crime. In 1981 the ratio of men to women charged with crimes in this category which runs the gamut from threatening violence to cold blooded murder was almost nine to one.

People who specialize in the study of crime say that statistics may also reflect a democratizing trend in the application of criminal justice. Maybe it is the end of chivalry. Studies have found differences in the way the criminal justice system historically has treated men and women. For instance, in the U.S. the death penalty has been much less likely to be imposed on a woman.

Another possible explanation is that women are more likely to be charged today because society's growing intolerance of violence means that more people in general are being charged with low level violent crimes such as threatening.

To the extent that women commit less serious violent crimes, there would be a bigger percentage increase. Statistics indicate that 62 per cent of women charged with violent offences involve assaults at the lowest level compared with 55 per cent of men charged.

The fascinating question then is whether women are in fact becoming more criminally active. It is possible the trend is now surfacing in the newer data since there have been indications that the gender gap in crime is closing faster for young women.

A definitive answer would require following the police around and seeing under what circumstances they lay charges. There has been an enormous amount of discretion in the criminal justice system that has tended to screen out charges against women at the street level.

We really do not know what it means until we start looking at specific categories of crime. Does this reflect a real increase in violence or in property crime, or does it reflect a difference in the way in which our legal system processes crime? It is probably a mix of the two: some real change in behaviour and some change about how we count the numbers.

It is important to look at the numbers because our beliefs and then perhaps our legislative responses are affected by what we think is true. The veracity of statistics is fundamental to our beliefs which then brings action.

On November 19 of last year the news media across Canada led with the shocking results of a major Statistics Canada survey. "Fifty per cent of women report assaults", read the headline. "Ground breaking StatsCan survey finds violence pervasive". The findings on wife assault were horrifying: 29 per cent of women who had ever been married reported being assaulted by a current or previous husband. That would mean a staggering 2.6 million Canadian women have been the victims of wife assault.

Other news sources reported the story in much the same way. Maclean's magazine quoted a woman who "used to wake up with a knife at my throat. Maybe now people will believe it".

Women's groups expressed outrage. Social services groups said the survey proved how endemic violence is in our society. A federal cabinet minister pledged to meet with women's groups to launch a national campaign to combat violence against women. Commentators, male and female, cited examples of the dangers that women routinely face in daily life. We have heard many of those sentiments today in the House, but I must give at least a murmur of dissent and provide balance so we may move forward more resolutely.

The national survey was delivered with all the credibility of StatsCan behind it. Officials billed it as the most comprehensive of its kind ever conducted in Canada. It cost $1.9 million. It included 12,300 women and, the clincher, its finding included only physical or sexual acts that could result in criminal charges.

No one in the mainstream media did a critical analysis of the StatsCan's findings or compared them with the most authoritative work on the subject undertaken in the United States.

• (1705)

Let us start with the Criminal Code. A StatsCan survey says:

> Violence in this survey is defined as experiences of physical and sexual assault that are consistent with legal definitions of these offences and could be acted upon by a police officer.

This turns out to cast a very wide net indeed. It includes offences known in police jargon as level one. Examples could be a neighbour who yells a threat across the back fence or a stranger who makes a belligerent remark on the street. Any remark or gesture perceived by the person on the receiving end as a threat can qualify as a level one offence.

The most common form of violence, the survey says, is wife assault. In calculating the rate of wife assault it classifies many domestic encounters as violent that most people would not. These include behaviours that do not involve physical contact such as threats and throwing things. Then comes minor contact: pushing, grabbing and shoving. The survey summary, which is as far as most reporters read, lumps all these things together with actions that anyone would agree are clearly violent: beating, hitting with an object, choking, sexual assault or using a knife or a gun to threaten or injure. Throwing a plate has the same weight as a knife attack.

How many women who are or have been married reported incidents that are clearly violent? The answers: 11 per cent say that they have been kicked or hit with a fist; 9 per cent say they have been beaten up; 7 per cent choked; 6 per cent hit with something; and 5 per cent threatened or attacked with a knife or a gun. Because multiple responses are allowed there is a heavy overlap among those answers. They also refer overwhelmingly to former, not current spouses.

StatsCan borrowed its questions on wife assault from extensive U.S. surveys conducted by Richard Gelles and Murray Straus for the National Institute of Mental Health. This work is regarded as a benchmark. Unlike the StatsCan survey, it breaks out the results in a way that distinguishes between minor violence, no injuries or little intimidation, and severe violence, kicking, hitting and worse.

Messrs. Gelles and Straus found that domestic violence, mostly grabbing, shoving and hitting, occurs 16 per cent in U.S. families and that between 3 and 4 per cent of women have suffered at least one act of severe violence by their partners.

Wife assault is a national problem and a deep social evil in Canada. We should do everything to stop it, but this does not afflict nearly one–third of Canadian wives as some news reports said, 29 per cent as StatsCan said, or 2.6 million women.

No one, neither the surveyors nor the media, that reported their conclusions had any intention of misleading the public. They were conscientiously doing their job of spotting and documenting social change. However, if they had drawn a more reasonable conclusion from the violence data—rates of spouse abuse probably have not changed much in the past 30 years and most wives with abusive husbands get a divorce—there would be no real headlines and not much justification for their existence.

Instead the sensational findings dug yet another deep trench between the sexes with their inescapable implication that not just tens of thousands but millions of Canadian men are domestic thugs. Do members of the House really believe this? I do not. Most men were socialized from childhood to defer to girls in play and boys hitting little girls is more severely denounced. That was the character of our social history.

Finally, if we do not have an accurate view of the problem, how can we hope to arrive at the best policies to address it? Surely we do not need to exaggerate the numbers in order to make the case that family violence and violence against anyone is a corrosive social ill?

Surely we do not need to induce national moral panic in order to get attention and action, but many women believe that we do and so they may be upset. Many women believe that the StatsCan survey captures some larger psychological truth about the myriad subtle ways in which women continue to be devalued in the world. The trouble is that there are many important things StatsCan just cannot measure, and it should not try.

We know that more women than men are responsible for child abuse. In domestic conflict more women than men are likely to resort to using a weapon against a spouse. The conclusion about what men or women are doing is not the point. The point is that there is just too much violence. We must all collectively share responsibility for the violence on TV, movies and magazines. The media reflects ratings of what sells. The media are not totally to blame, for they reflect the worst aspects of our society.

The Montreal tragedy, remembered today, will not be forgotten. We can find a vision of a new Canada where a rejection of violence both overt and implied is how we will live.

• (1710)

We must denounce violence and the excuses for it such as intoxication defences or freedom of expression in the performing arts and the mass media. We especially remember today the loved ones of the victims of violence. We must all commit to live to a higher standard where conflict resolution and frustrations are kept under self–control. We each must resolve to live a kinder and gentler life that makes pandering to violence uneconomic for its sellers.

We affirm the positive and resolve to pass on to our children a clear sense of values that preclude thoughts of violence. I have a vision of Canada that we can build, where we can live in peace, restore broken relationships, yet strongly defend our ideals.

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I vowed I would never do this but I listened to the members across the way and I wondered if their lack of discomfort is really the issue.

I knew a young woman 25 years ago who was raped. She did not report it because 25 years ago women could run faster with their skirts up than men could with their pants down. I knew a woman 25 years ago who was beaten by her husband. She was sent to hospital. She did not report it because it was a shame that she had chosen that poorly and obviously she was beaten because she deserved it; she must have irritated him.

Because of our actions, because of the noise and because of the circumstances of today, women can do that. This woman was not included in that survey. I was that woman. As much as I realize that we have to get a balance, it is also an issue we must address. We must stand together.

Does the hon. member think that today's incidents are perhaps recurring more frequently or that we have now lost our shame and are able to report them?

Mr. Forseth: Mr. Speaker, I believe we are in a violent society. We must do everything we can within our own purview, within our own families, to make sure we do not act in a violent way. It begins in a small manner with even the frustration of being at a stoplight and thinking about the car next to you or the one that has cut you off.

I was trying to emphasize today that when we see statistics, let us make sure we have an accurate analysis of them so we can move forward resolutely with appropriate social policy.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, what I just heard is simply absurd. I think the hon. member of the Reform Party needs a good dose of real life.

He quoted statistics and figures, and meanwhile, some terrible things are happening, and the hon. member of the Reform Party does not see anything at all. I wonder whether people come and see him at his riding office and whether he ever had specific cases involving battered women and women who were unemployed and had children who did not get anything to eat for breakfast.

In my riding, I see this regularly. In my riding, we have two shelters for battered women and only 20 spaces altogether. We do not have enough locations to help these women.

I would appreciate it if the hon. member would tell me if in his own riding he sees these people and really tries to help them instead of trotting out figures and statistics like he is doing now, information that to me is absolutely irrelevant. I see what is going on in my riding, and I must say it is not a pretty picture.

When we have a recession like the one we have just been through, guess what happens? The crime rate goes up, and women and children pay the price. I cannot believe that everything is just fine in his riding because of these statistics. I hope that when he gets back to his riding on the weekend, his wife will forgive him for the speech he made here in the House.

• (1715)

[English]

Mr. Forseth: Mr. Speaker, here is another fine example of what I talked about, why we are so adversarial in this House, where someone's words are willingly twisted.

If it is an issue of personal credibility, I spent my career of 22 years in the criminal justice system dealing with those people most in need and in time of crisis when in conflict with one another, be it an offender or an offended.

I spent all Saturday night riding with the local police in my riding, looking at the difficulty of conflict resolution and the kinds of things they have to deal with.

If we in this House are going to deal properly with the issues of the day, the various studies that are bantered around by members of this House and as was mentioned today by so many speakers, the StatsCanada study, then we must look carefully and make sure we read and draw the appropriate conclusions from those studies.

Mr. Gordon Kirkby (Prince Albert—Churchill River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member made mention of the fact that there is a greater involvement of women in crime. He cited errors in the study done with respect to the incidence of violence against women. He stated that more women commit child abuse than men. I find that all of these statements are made to minimize and trivialize violent acts against women.

When we think about what happened a number of years ago on this day, we must remember today what damage violence against women in our society does and we ought not to speak in such a manner as to trivialize and minimize it and make it an excusable type of behaviour.

I want to ask the hon. member if he still feels that these types of remarks under these circumstances are justified.

Mr. Forseth: Mr. Speaker, the member gets a little emotional when he hears the truth.

Throughout the day certain statements were made and it is appropriate to provide a balancing alternate view without taking any of my words and twisting them to somehow diminish or demean the conflict and the social trouble we have out there and the level of violence which is unacceptable in our society.

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult for me to simply start into my text when I have been faced with the address we just heard in this House. I have to say that if education is the answer to many of the ailments in our society and if the problems we have are problems of ignorance, we need to spend a great deal more money and a great deal more time educating people so that attitudes such as those that were just reflected do not become prevalent in our society.

When I stand on this side of the House and I look across at so many middle aged, middle class white male faces and hear the kind of venom that was just spewed I have to react strongly.

One woman is shot dead every six days in Canada on average. On December 6, 1989, 14 women were wiped out with bullets in just a few minutes.

Others have risen in this House from the other quarters today to recognize these women, to remember their lives, to mourn them and in their name to look toward a time of hope when violence will be a thing of the past.

One woman is shot dead with a bullet every six days in our country. A woman is nine times as likely to be killed by her spouse as by a stranger. They do not just use bullets. They beat them, stab them and suffocate them.

• (1720)

Some want to talk about statistics. Some want to talk about women engaging in crime. Women are violated and abused because of an attitude in our society that suppresses women and that seeks to continue to suppress women even though it is 1994, even though we are moving toward the 21st century, even though women are in the political leadership of our country, in the business leadership of our country and in the parenting leadership of our country; even though women have struggled and continue to struggle to make the same salary as their male counterparts and even though women continue today to lead single parent families from a position of poverty.

Life is very simple on the other side of the House. Those members would like to arm us all. They would like to cut $15 billion out of our social programs with no priorities. They would like to suggest that statistics in the most comprehensive study that has ever been done on violence against women in Canada are eschewed because they do not like the sound of them. Life is not that simple.

We have tremendous problems in this country. We have people who want to help. They want to help women, children and yes, they even want to help white, middle aged, middle class men to have a better life. We do it by bringing prosperity to this country, jobs to this country, by observing the precepts of the Charter of Rights of Freedoms and by following the rule of law. We do it by treating other human lives with the dignity that they deserve and by remembering respectfully, very seriously and very intently the lives of women like the 14 at l'École polytechnique that were lost because our society is less than perfect.

This Friday evening I will return to Windsor—St. Clair and I will join former colleagues, colleagues who are also great and tremendous friends of mine in Windsor. We will have a little Christmas cheer but we are going to do so as persons joined, friends and colleagues united in a cause, a cause which is very important in my community which is the support and the perpetuation of the programs and the spirit of a place called Hiatus House.

Hiatus House is an interval home in Windsor, a transition home for battered women and their children. It is a home that, in spite of what my friends opposite think, is always full, always has a waiting list and does wonders in our community. Hiatus House operates under the guidance and direction of Donna Miller, executive director. I am proud to say that she is a friend of mine and I am also happy to tell this country, through this House, that she is a visionary as are many women and men who work in this field.

This is an incredible place. This is a place that pioneered transition homes in Canada. It pioneered special programs for the children of battered women. It has also pioneered a program called "Fresh Start" which is a program designed for the treatment of spouses who batter, of men who batter their wives and children.

It is a transition home that faces the ugly realities that these people live with and that tries so hard to put these people back together in one piece again, to break the cycle of domestic violence.

• (1725)

I am proud to stand today as the member for Windsor—St. Clair to talk about Hiatus House. I wish I could have spent more time at it but I felt compelled to comment on other things.

December 6 can never be forgotten by Canadians. It can never be forgotten because there are still Canadians who are oppressed. There are still Canadians who are repressed and there are still Canadians who are not white, middle aged, middle class males who make $64,000 a year.

As long as those people are suppressed, as long as our greater political and societal structure is such that there are people who are less equal, then I think we have an obligation to continue. I am proud to be part of this government. I am proud to follow a leader who believes in these principles and I am proud to be on this side of the House even if talking about those principles means that one has to be hackled.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I certainly appreciate what the hon. member was saying. I too helped to set up a crisis house. I donated money, time and energy to do that because I think it is important. We need to do more of that. It is too bad we have to have them.

She talked about the jobless, the economy, et cetera. We go back as far as the depression. During the time of the depression when the economy could not have been worse and jobs could not have been worse, amazingly enough on a per capita basis that was when there was the least amount of crime. That can be checked. If one denies it to be true, it can be checked. One will find that is the case.

I remember maybe 40 years ago when there was respect that was really taught. I was about that age when my father would have a fit if I did not show a little more respect, particularly to the opposite sex in terms of helping them when they needed it. Opening doors was a common practice and things of this nature. We did not swear in front of a woman because it was not an acceptable thing to do.

This violence against women is abhorrent. It really is, believe you me. I believe that. I am trying to figure out what in the world brought us to this point? What is it that has advanced us so far along the line that causes men to do the things they do to women? Please do not point a finger at me because I have not laid a hand on a woman in my entire life.

Ms. Cohen: Mr. Speaker, that is quite an opening. I am going to resist. I have no doubt that the member for Wild Rose believes everything he just said. I have no doubt that he abhors violence against women. The problem I have is this difficulty in seeing the bigger picture, this tremendous desire for the quick fix, for the simple solution that I see in his party's policies.

In the dirty thirties women were victimized in the same way, perhaps worse than they are now. The problem is that in the thirties the culture was such that they did not report it. They were afraid to. They thought it was their place to take this. They thought they had to put up with it.

Times have changed. Unfortunately some people have not changed with the times and some people refuse to accept that women have a place in society. We are not a special interest group. We do not want a privileged position. We just want to be equal.

Mr. Lee Morrison (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in the space of a couple of centuries women have advanced from being chattels to being real persons and now in the pantheon of the politically correct back to being mere victims.

I find this extraordinarily offensive and I think it demeans women. Women are people and should be treated as such. Violence exists throughout society. It is symptomatic of an alarming loss of civility, traditional values which have gone down the pipe.

Talk about women being victimized in the thirties. I am old enough that I can remember those times. Yes, spousal abuse went on in those days but when it did anyone who took part in that sort of activity was (a) socially ostracized or (b) stood a very good chance of getting the socks beaten off him by the abused woman's brothers, father, cousins, uncles and so on. This was commonly done.

You don't know; you were not there, madam.

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. In the pantheon of the politically correct, sir, may I say that I do know. I was there, and you are wrong.

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY ACT

The House resumed from December 1, consideration of Bill C–46, an act to establish the Department of Industry and to amend and repeal certain other acts, as reported (with amendments) from the committee.

The Deputy Speaker: It being 5.30 p.m., pursuant to the order made Thursday, December 1 1994, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of Bill C–46, an act to establish the Department of Industry and to amend and repeal certain other acts.

Call in the members.

• (1750)

And the division bells having rung:

The Deputy Speaker: The first question will be on Motion No. 1.

(The House divided on Motion No. 1, which was negatived on the following division:)

The Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

[English]

The next question is on Motion No. 2. A vote on Motion No. 2 also applies to Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6 and 7. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 2 obviates the need for a vote on Motions Nos. 3, 6 and 8. A negative vote on Motion No. 2 necessitates a vote on Motion No. 3.

[Translation]

The vote on Motion No. 3 also applies to Motions Nos. 6 and 8.

The next question is on Motion No. 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Richmond—Wolfe.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think that you would find unanimous consent to apply the vote just taken on Motion No. 1 to Motion No. 2.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 123.]

The Deputy Speaker: I declare Motion No. 2 lost. Consequently Motions Nos. 4, 5 and 7 are lost.

[English]

The next question is on Motion No. 3.

Mr. Solomon: Mr. Speaker, as the whip for the New Democratic Party caucus the New Democratic Party members present in the House vote yea for Motion No. 5.

The Deputy Speaker: We will come to that shortly.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent that the whips or representatives from each party could rise and indicate how their colleagues who had voted on the previous vote would be applied as voting on the present vote. In terms of Liberal members, Liberal members will be voting nay along with the hon. member for Beauce on Motion No. 3.

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois members will be voting nay on this motion.

[English]

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, the members of the Reform Party who are present today will vote yea unless there are those who wish to vote otherwise.

Mr. Solomon: Mr. Speaker, the members of the New Democratic Party who are present today vote no on Motion No. 3.

• (1805)

Mrs. Wayne: Mr. Speaker, as the whip for the PC Party, all PC members present tonight will be voting nay.

(The House divided on Motion No. 3, which was negatived on the following division:)

The Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

The House resumed from December 2 consideration of the motion that Bill C-59, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and the income tax application rules, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the order made Friday, December 2, 1994, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on second reading stage of Bill C-59, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and the income tax application rules.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I wish to seek unanimous consent to apply the vote just taken on the concurrence motion to the motion on Bill C-59.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent by all members in the House?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 126.]

(Bill read the second time and referred to committee.)

CANADA GRAIN ACT

The House resumed from December 5 consideration of Bill C-51, an act to amend the Canada Grain Act and respecting certain regulations made pursuant to that act, as reported (without amendment) from the committee; and Motion No. 1.

The Deputy Speaker: The House will now proceed to the taking of deferred divisions on report stage of Bill C-51.

The first question is on Motion No. 1.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. You would probably find unanimous consent that the whip or representative of each party indicate how their colleagues are voting.

Liberal members will be voting nay on Motion No. 1.

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe: The members of the Bloc Quebecois will vote yea, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, you will find that the Reform Party members will vote yea to this unless there are those who wish to vote otherwise.

Mr. Solomon: Mr. Speaker, members of the New Democratic Party vote nay on Motion No. 1.

Mrs. Wayne: Mr. Speaker, nay.

Mr. Bernier (Beauce): Nay, Mr. Speaker.

The next question is on Motion No. 4.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent to apply the vote taken on report stage Motion No. 2 of Bill C–51 to the motion now before the House.

The Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 128.]

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find consent to apply the vote taken on report stage Motion No. 1 of Bill C–51 in reverse to the motion now before the House.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

The Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

It being 6.30 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–216, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act (jury service), as reported (without amendment) from the committee.

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Hon. members will note on the Order Paper that the recommendation from His Excellency the Governor General has been provided for this bill in order to permit the House to consider its final passage without conflicting with either Standing Order 79(1) or section 54 of the Constitution.

The government is pleased to have this opportunity to take the unusual step of obtaining a recommendation for a private member's initiative, which is entirely within the spirit and the letter of our program of parliamentary reform.

I must caution the House however that this individual case has been examined by the government carefully and it is only because Bill C–216 fits with the existing fiscal framework that the government has been able to take this opportunity.

The House should not consider this case as a precedent. It is highly unlikely that there will be many cases that lend themselves to this kind of accommodation. In order to maintain strict control over expenditure the government will insist on the strict enforcement of this order and in the other place of the constitutional principle that no expenditure may be voted by a parliamentary motion or bill without the explicit recommendation to this House by His Excellency.

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur, Lib.) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 130.]

Mr. Arseneault moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

He said: Mr. Speaker it gives me pleasure to rise tonight to speak on third reading of this private member's bill.

I would like to commence by thanking all my colleagues from all parties who have supported me. It has been a four–year battle. It started four years ago in December and we are in December again looking at third reading.

I thank my hon. colleagues on this historic occasion. I am looking for their support at third reading. We hope to conclude third reading this evening.

[Translation]

I have the honour and the pleasure to rise in this House to speak on a private member's bill which I sponsored to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act.

As you know, section 14 of this act prevents unemployed people who have to do jury duty from collecting UI benefits.

[English]

I have spoken on this issue for the last four years. I could go on. Other members have spoken on the issue. I think we should put it to rest this evening. I will now rest my case to my colleagues and would ask for their unanimous consent to pass the bill at third reading.

[Translation]

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to pass this bill on third reading?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Bellehumeur: Is this a continuation of the debate, Mr. Speaker?

The Deputy Speaker: I thought we were ready to adopt this bill. Is there some misunderstanding with the member who wishes to rise on a point of order?

Mr. Bellehumeur: There was an amendment by the Reform Party, but it is not up to me to raise this point of order.

The Deputy Speaker: It seems the hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm has the right to make his speech.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I prepared a few notes because in any case, I was going to support the hon. member on this bill as the Bloc Quebecois did when the hon. member for Mercier spoke to this bill. At the time, we agreed with the hon. member's initiative regarding this legislation. I think there was an oversight. Earlier we had comments from the government.

I think these comments are in line with our own support for the hon. member's bill, in other words, I believe that at the present time, we are penalizing people who would be able to perform a duty that is extremely important in our judicial system, and I am referring to jury duty. A person on unemployment insurance was either penalized, in other words, did his jury duty but was not entitled to receive unemployment insurance benefits, or the judges, considering this particular situation, rejected such people for jury duty.

However, thanks to the hon. member's amendment, and he is to be commended for making this proposal, the situation will be rectified.

I believe that in previous debates, we stressed the usefulness of jury members in our judicial system, and I should add that the jury system is a provincial matter, in other words, the province has jurisdiction over the administration of justice at this level.

I believe that as legislators, in the House, we have helped accelerate and simplify procedures and assist those responsible for the administration of justice. I think that Bill C–216 is entirely in line with this attempt at simplification and helping people fulfil their jury duties.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I would like to mention something that happened in the judicial district of Joliette, in connection with the selection of jury members. In a murder case, after seeing about 300 to 400 potential jurors, the lawyers had rejected practically everyone, so that the sheriff finally rented a bus and had the bus stop in various streets in the municipality of Joliette, pick up anyone who looked like they were of age and take them by bus to the court house to be selected as jurors.

My point is that people do not exactly go out of their way to do jury duty, and I think that if we can simplify things and help people, if there are people on unemployment insurance who could do jury duty, I think we should let them, and Bill C–216 is a step in the right direction.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bellehumeur: That being said, I will be delighted to support Bill C–216.

[English]

Mr. Hugh Hanrahan (Edmonton—Strathcona, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I stand before my hon. colleagues and my constituents today to discuss Bill C–216, a private member's bill that changes the rules of the unemployment insurance program to allow unemployment insurance claimants to collect unemployment insurance benefits while they are serving on a jury.

Essentially, Bill C–216 if passed would change only six words in the Unemployment Insurance Act. These changes include the removal of the word "or" in section 14 and include the words "or engaged in jury service" in the same section.

The question that needs to be addressed is why are we spending all this time discussing these six words. The answer to this question is simple. If these six words were changed, the initial intention of the Unemployment Insurance Act would have been pushed even farther from its original purpose.

Section 14 of the Unemployment Insurance Act states clearly: "A claimant is not entitled to receive benefits for any working day for which he or she is unable to prove capability to work and availability for work or is unable to prove incapability because of prescribed illness, injury, or quarantine. A claimant engaged in jury duty is considered unavailable under section 14 of the act and is therefore disentitled from benefits".

This statement makes it indisputably clear that the framers of the original unemployment act saw that the UI system was not to include those individuals who were called to do their civic duty and perform jury duty.

The Reform Party unequivocally supports the return of the Unemployment Insurance Act to its original function, an employer/employee funded and administered program to provide temporary income in the event of unexpected job loss.

This has been our policy since the late 1980s. Canadians are tired of supporting habitual and seasonal abusers of unemployment insurance. Many people would say that Bill C–216 would become another case of abuse of the great Canadian social security system as it could lead to employers laying off employees who must serve jury duty so that these individuals would be able to collect otherwise uncollectable unemployment insurance.

The potential for abuse is alarmingly clear. When the unemployment insurance system is not used as it was initially designed, Canadians suffer because the present inequities in the UI system which have developed permanently lower disposable income of those who hold full time jobs in regions of some economic strength.

It permanently depresses the rate of job creation among all the firms whose costs are increased by the UI payroll tax. It subsidizes the immobility of labour in ways that seriously hurt the younger generations as parents do not face the incentives they should to move to regions where private sector job opportunities are much more numerous and diverse.

According to the figures provided by my hon. colleague for Restigouche—Chaleur, the implementation of this amendment to the Unemployment Insurance Act, the changing of only six words, would add in the neighbourhood of $2 million to $3 million to the unemployment insurance claims. A $2 million to $3 million tab would be absorbed by employers and employees across the country. They are already losing nearly 40 per cent of their pay cheques through one type of taxation or another.

• (1835)

I truly question the willingness of Canadians to absorb this sum of money, especially when considering our fiscal situation where we as a nation are nearly $535 billion in debt and are paying nearly $40 billion in interest payments annually to service this astronomical debt.

It is for this reason that if employers and employees who pay for the UI program had a say in how their money was being spent, I do not think they would agree to provide benefits to claimants while they are serving on a jury.

The law is simple, clear and concise. If a UI claimant is serving on a jury they are not available for work and therefore not entitled to unemployment insurance benefits. For too long now the fundamental insurance principles have been compromised so that unemployment insurance is seen more like a form of welfare than a form of insurance.

In the words of Tommy Douglas: "We are not interested in paying able bodied people merely because they were not able to find work. We proposed social aid for those who are unable to work because they were crippled, aged or mentally ill. Those who are able to work would participate in public work projects".

Welfare and unemployment insurance are not a right in Canada and furthermore unemployment insurance is exactly what the name indicates. It is an insurance program and not a seasonal employment or special compensation package.

Workers should only be entitled to unemployment insurance provided they qualify and meet certain obligations. One of these obligations is that they are ready, able and willing to work; work immediately, not tomorrow or the next day or the next week, but immediately.

As I mentioned earlier the unemployment insurance program must be returned to a true insurance program. We should look at other insurance programs to see how they operate and perhaps we as a government could learn a lesson or two from the private sector. Perhaps our national unemployment insurance program should indeed be based on a user pay system such as household or automobile insurance where the more we use our insurance the more our premiums increase and, conversely, the less we use our insurance the less our premiums become.

This type of user pay based system is not solely for employees. It would also relate back to employers as those employers who regularly lay off workers would also have to pay higher premiums as well.

It is clear that this bill is taking us down the wrong direction. We should be looking at ways to make the unemployment insurance as well as government programs sustainable and self–sufficient. Bill C–216 is not even close to achieving this goal or even starting us down the right path.

I want to state clearly that while there may be a problem of fair compensation to individuals who serve on a jury regardless of their employment status, we do not believe that minor changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act is the way to accomplish or change this inequity.

We are not the only ones with this view. In fact a few of our supporters include the policy experts at the department of unemployment insurance and research branch of the Library of Parliament. The department of unemployment insurance comments that the problem is not with the UI rules but rather the poor compensation provided for jurors. The Library of Parliament wrote: "The primary issue in this matter seems to be adequate remuneration for jury duty and that is the responsibility of the provinces rather than the employers and employees who contribute to the unemployment insurance program".

Ultimately then, rather than adjusting the Unemployment Insurance Act the Reform Party proposes that judges should use their discretion to excuse UI claimants from jury duty as has been done in the past. Again, I think it is crucial to state the obvious which is those who serve on jury are perhaps not fairly compensated. On this point I am sure all of us in this House can agree.

• (1840)

As my hon. colleague from Yorkton—Melville stated in the House it is inexcusable that jurors are asked to work for days, weeks, and in some cases even months for $15 or $20 a day. I believe, as does the Reform Party, in equality and fairness and above all common sense. For that reason it is clear that this issue of appropriate compensation for jurors must be addressed.

However, we also believe in decreasing overlap and duplication between governments. Essentially we believe in staying out of the provincial arena and the issue of juror compensation falls 100 per cent under provincial jurisdiction. For these reasons we will be unable to support this bill.

Finally, I would like to move:

That the motion be amended by striking out all the words after the word "That" and substituting the following:

"Bill C–216, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act (jury service), be not now read a third time and that the order be discharged, the bill withdrawn, and the subject matter thereof referred to the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development.

The Deputy Speaker: The Chair should indicate that the motion is receivable.

Mr. Arseneault: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I beg to differ. I do not want to challenge the Chair on that but the matter has already been referred to the resources development committee and it came back without amendment. I would say that the Reform Party is stalling for time with private members' business and I am very concerned with that.

Mr. Silye: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. That is just a matter of debate.

The Deputy Speaker: Colleagues will appreciate that the bill as was indicated by the member for Restigouche has gone to committee, has been gone through clause by clause, and has come back.

To the hon. member for Restigouche, the motion proposes to discharge the bill and refer the subject matter. Therefore the amendment would appear to me to be in order.

• (1845)

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, since this private member's bill was first introduced various things have come up which probably would now make it necessary for the bill to be referred to the committee again. One major thing that has come up is that the Minister of Human Resources Development ordered a review of some of the programs under the Department of Human Resources Development including unemployment insurance.

As there are no members of the Human Resources Development committee present since they are presently holding hearings in Quebec and across the country, it is only in order that we allow the bill to be referred to committee again.

The bill is contrary to true insurance principles. The minister made the point that the changes he is proposing would bring the Unemployment Insurance Act back to a true insurance act. It would very much change what we are doing here, and that is why I am supporting the amendment my colleague has made.

If we are to return unemployment insurance to true insurance principles there are various matters in the bill I would like to address that should be referred back to committee to be corrected. If the members opposite would listen to what I have to say, they would agree with that.

If the bill were passed it would be the first time in history that a private member's bill would require the government to spend more money, in the neighbourhood of $3 million. I think members opposite would agree and would probably oppose it for that reason.

As I have mentioned, the people on the Human Resources Development committee are not here now to present what they are hearing in the consultations across the country. I have been travelling with the committee for three weeks and there have been many presentations that would run contrary to the spirit of the private member's bill. For that reason we should be delaying it.

They will be going against the wishes of their Minister of Human Resources Development. The report that will come down in February will indicate that. It would be wise to refer this back to the committee and let it have another look at it.

Some of the things we are hearing that would run contrary to the bill are the following. The people who are coming before the committee as witnesses would like to see reduced the duplication that is presently taking place between the federal and provincial government.

The bill actually does the opposite. It infringes on an area of provincial jurisdiction, that is the area of justice. Even as the member who proposed the bill admitted, the problem is not with unemployment insurance. The problem with serving on duty as a juror falls on the justice system. It should not fall on the unemployment insurance system.

Another thing we are hearing is that the unemployment insurance system should be run more as a true insurance system and should be economically viable. It is not. It should be financially sustainable; we are hearing time and again that unemployment insurance should be self–financing.

Many people are telling us that we need to go back and establish it on true insurance principles. The bill is contrary to that and is why it should be referred back to the committee. The committee now has new insights from what it is hearing from Canadians and would like to probably evaluate the bill with regard to them.

I have a couple of more points. The consultations indicate that Canadians should be treated more equally across Canada. The bill does not do that. Self–employed people would be discriminated against under the bill. They would not be eligible to be compensated by unemployment insurance. They could be sitting beside somebody else on a jury and would not have the same access. There is an equality problem in that regard.

• (1850)

It will open up the system to more abuse. The Minister of Human Resources Development has stated explicitly that he would like to reduce the amount of abuse. Costs will escalate at a time when we cannot afford it. In fact we would be approving a history making government expenditure of $3 million because of a private member's bill.

Would it be possible to somehow look at the bill, send it back to committee and see if some of these things could be addressed? I believe it is and for that reason I am supporting the motion. I hope members opposite and members of the Bloc will support it as well.

The people from whom we are hearing in this consultative process are saying that we have to reduce the number of opportunities for abuse, not increase them. For that reason I support what my colleague has put forward.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, originally I did not intend to enter into the debate. It was my intention from the beginning to rise and pay tribute to the member for Restigouche—Chaleur for bringing forward his private member's bill.

However I must admit that I am appalled by the remarks made by the two previous speakers from the Reform Party. I did not think it was possible for members of Parliament to be so meanspirited.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The words just used characterizing the Reform Party are not parliamentary. I would ask the member to withdraw them.

The Deputy Speaker: I have researched the matter. It was a minister who used those words and she was required to withdraw them. I would invite the member for Winnipeg—St. James to withdraw those words immediately.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I am more than happy to withdraw them if they are unparliamentary. How do I convey my disgust? Is that unparliamentary as well? I am left absolutely disgusted by the remarks.

The Deputy Speaker: The member has withdrawn the offending words that have been ruled within the last two weeks as being unparliamentary. I would ask the hon. member to continue his speech.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I am more than happy to continue with my speech.

What is the intent of the private member's bill? Its intent is to remove an injustice, to remove a wrong. These people are ready, willing and able to work. They happen to be on unemployment insurance. They have been mandated by the state. They have been mandated by the government. They have been obliged by society to serve jury duty.

It is not their fault. It is not abuse as suggested by the previous speakers from the third party. They are following the duty imposed upon them by the Parliament of Canada. They are not at fault. These are good people. They do not want to violate the Unemployment Insurance Act, but they have benefits owing to them. They are obliged to serve on the jury but in the process they have to give up their benefits, their compensation.

In the name of fairness and justice surely we cannot ask them on one hand to serve on a jury and at the same time to give up their unemployment insurance compensation. It is wrong. It is an injustice. The intent of the bill is to remove that injustice, to correct that wrong.

Do we not have the compassion or the decency to show these people that we care for them? On one hand we want them to follow the law of the land and to serve on juries and at the same time we should not take away their unemployment insurance benefits, their compensation. If parliamentarians cannot understand this simple concept, this simple piece of justice then I do not understand what is going on.

• (1855)

In conclusion all I want to say is this piece of legislation is justified in the name of fairness. The arguments brought forward by the previous speakers are red herrings. This has been examined by the committee. There are no more questions. We should be settling this now in the name of justice.

I pay tribute to the member for Restigouche—Chaleur. He has done the right thing. In the name of justice and fairness and in the name of God let us pass this bill now.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to speak for long but I hope to speak a little more calmly than the previous speaker did. A number of points he brought forward actually reiterate what my colleagues are trying to do in having this subject matter referred back to committee.

We must view this in light of the review of all of our social programs and proposed reforms to be introduced hopefully later and not that much later in this Parliament. We are going to be looking at the unemployment insurance system and hopefully reviewing it with a view to making it a true insurance program. Also when we are talking about jury duty we may be talking about other jurisdictions such as the provincial jurisdiction as it affects the criminal justice system.

There are so many complications and so many other angles to this whole situation which have not been adequately presented both in this House and to the committee nor for the provinces to have their input. This underscores the fact that before we hastily implement this private member's bill which will cost taxpayers some money and which will broaden the scope of unemployment insurance rather than narrow it to its original function, it would be wise not to bind the hands of the government and the Minister of Human Resources Development on proposals that will have to be undone at a later date.

I speak on behalf of rational Canadians who want to look carefully and make wise decisions rather than rant uncontrollably and emotionally without having put one's facts together ahead of time in order to make smart decisions rather than foolish ones. We have seen past Liberal governments build up the unemployment insurance program and our social safety net to the point that we have to look at reform, restructuring, redirecting them back to their original purposes so that they can help those Canadians they were supposed to help.

Certainly if people are called to jury duty and there are some financial implications, that needs to be looked at. I do not think my colleagues in the Reform Party are saying this is not a valid issue to bring forward in the House. We are saying that perhaps unemployment insurance is not the correct vehicle to deal with this issue. Also a precedent is being set where a private member's bill is going to cost taxpayers dollars. That is why the Secretary of State for Parliamentary Affairs had to get up and make rather an elaborate statement to the House.

This is a precedent setting incident. We need to look a lot more cautiously in the light of the total deficit of $540 billion. Every penny must be accounted for. This House has to take more responsibility over that expenditure. We should not hasten to make short two minute speeches and try to slip these bills through without proper consultation and without proper debate in the House.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

• (1900)

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) the deputy whip has asked me to defer the vote until tomorrow at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

Ms. Catterall: Mr. Speaker, I think that given the way the votes are planned for this week you might find unanimous consent in the House to further defer the division until Thursday at 5.30 p.m.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Hermanson: Agreed.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

Adjournment Debate

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I think that for the adjournment debate I will give some background to put things in context. On September 20, 1994, I questioned the Solicitor General of Canada regarding everything that had gone on in the Bristow and McInnis affairs, the infiltrations of political parties and unions, the investigations of the Canadian Jewish Congress in Toronto and Montreal. The questions were very clear.

In particular, we asked the government to establish a royal commission of inquiry to shed light on the whole matter. I also asked who controlled the monster that the Canadian Security Intelligence Service seemed to have become, since no one seemed able to control it anymore or to identify those really responsible, the people committing public funds, taking action. There does not seem to be anyone responsible for it in Parliament.

We rarely obtain any answers to this question, as you well know, and so we turned to SIRC, the Security Intelligence Review Committee. Since September 20, there have been discussions in the sub–committee, witnesses have been called, the CSIS inspector is conducting an investigation, the Sub–committee on National Security has heard witnesses, and so on. And now, on December 9, we are told, SIRC will be submitting its report to the Solicitor General of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, you know that we have our reservations about SIRC, stacked as it is with political appointees, the majority being Conservatives who are looking into activities that were conducted in the 1990s by Conservatives. One cannot be judge and jury at the same time. Our reservations notwithstanding, we are looking forward to reading SIRC's report very attentively.

What I am asking the Solicitor General of Canada this evening is that he submit the complete text of this report to the Sub–committee on National Security, with no deletions, in its entirety, so that we ourselves, given our solid representation on the sub–committee, may judge whether the work has been done properly, whether SIRC has carried out its mandate, which is to reassure us that it has looked into what was done in the cases I mentioned earlier, with respect to Bristow and anything to do with infiltration activities by CSIS.

• (1905)

What I am requesting, and I hope that we are going to obtain it, is an unaltered copy so that our representative on the Sub–committee on National Security can question people and obtain satisfaction in this matter.

I think that it is extremely important, given that we have not been able to have a royal commission of inquiry established, that we at least be able to examine this report in its entirety.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in 1984, when the CSIS Act became law, Parliament achieved two very important objectives. First, it created a civilian security intelligence agency, accountable through the Solicitor General to Parliament, and ultimately, to the Canadian people.

Second, in support of an additional measure of control and accountability for the activities of this agency, Parliament created an external review body—the Security Intelligence Review Committee, or SIRC.

SIRC has the legislative mandate to perform two kinds of functions. The first is to act as an administrative tribunal to hear complaints against the security service. The second, relevant to the issue before us, is to review the performance and activities of the Service.

Section 38 of the CSIS Act authorizes SIRC to review how CSIS performs all its duties and functions. More specifically, under section 54, SIRC can investigate any matter relating to CSIS's activities and then provide the Solicitor General with a special report of this investigation.

SIRC is entitled to obtain any information, including documents, reports and explanations from CSIS and the Inspector General to carry out its responsibilities. Clearly, SIRC has the authority and enabling powers to properly fulfil its mandate.

In conclusion, it would be in no one's interest, and certainly not the Canadian public's, to establish another review body to do what SIRC is already authorized to do.

Therefore, I would suggest that we put this suggestion of a royal commission to rest and await the report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee.

TRADE

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the question posed to the Minister for International Trade was prompted by concerns expressed from a number of agricultural organizations that Bill C–57, an act to implement the World Trade Organization, was deficient and needed to be amended.

My question focused on one area of concern, namely the issue of tariff levels and supplemental quotas on supply managed commodities. However, there are concerns in other areas as well: clauses referring to the Western Grain Transportation Act and comparisons to the United States implementation legislation.

There is absolutely no question in my mind that the U.S. implementing legislation has more teeth in it and retains a greater degree of political control.

On November 28 the minister responded to my question concerning the issues of tariff levels and supplemental quotas on supply managed commodities by stating that amendments to the Customs Tariff Act, et cetera, would be introduced "if necessary".

The minister did not respond to my satisfaction or to the industry's satisfaction by either stating that there was no cause for concern or that given these concerns legislation to amend the act would be forthcoming.

According to a paper prepared for the standing committee on agriculture by the research branch of the Library of Parliament on Bill C–57, the issue of supplemental quotas was outlined as follows, and I quote: "Even though this clause 109 of C–57 may appear necessary to allow additional imports in the case of emergencies, it is not clear what the tariff would be on those supplemental imports".

The research document continued further by stating that: "It has been mentioned that artificial shortages can be created that would necessitate supplemental imports that could displace domestic products permanently. So far officials have not been able to give an appropriate answer on the level of the tariffs affecting the supplemental imports".

In testimony before the international trade committee, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture echoed those concerns as well.

• (1910)

This point must be addressed. As I said in previous debates, a situation could occur in which a processor shorted the demand. For example, in hatcheries the hatcheries control the purchase of the breeder birds so it is not difficult for them to plan to be short and need supplementals.

As a result of shorting needs, they demand supplementals. The manufacturer would apply for same and would be granted tariff free supplemental import permits and that would go a long way to breaking the supply management system.

The question remains why has the minister not introduced the appropriate amendments to the Customs Tariffs Act to address the concerns expressed. My grave concern as well is that if these amendments are not encompassed in legislation and are just encompassed in regulation it becomes very easy for some minister down the road who does not support supply management to the extent that this government does to allow that little weakening in terms of the legislation to see the supply management system destroyed over time.

The only other point I want to make and question the minister on is that Bill C–57 contains no provisions to ensure that exporters of grain have any warning with respect to when the cap on volume or the cap on expenditures under the WGTA and the new requirements of the GATT will be reached. This result could be that commitments and sales made by the Canadian Wheat

Board at a set price could well be negatively impacted if the caps are attained prior to the movement of grain involved.

How will this issue be addressed and what would be the impact on the marketing of the Canadian Wheat Board, its ability to market at top dollar and access supplies? I raise those questions to the minister out of a deeply felt concern.

[Translation]

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade, Lib): Mr. Speaker, the government has stated that the new tariff rate quota regime for agricultural products will include provisions for supplementary imports for various purposes. All stakeholders in the supply managed areas have agreed such access is necessary. However, legimitate questions have been raised as to the terms on which access for the specific purpose of preventing a market shortage should be allowed.

On the one hand, it is said that processors are increasingly able to control the level of production, especially in the poultry sectors, and so can artificially create a market shortage if they know they have guaranteed access to supplementary imports in such cases. Since this would reduce returns to primary producers, some argue there should be a higher duty on such supplemental imports than the one provided for within the tariff rate quota, so as to discourage such behaviour.

On the other hand, poultry and egg processors argue that they must guarantee price and supply to their costumers if they are not to lose contracts. They point out that their industries—including producers—face competition from other food products, and irregularities of price or supply will cost everyone market share.

There are also many misunderstandings about what is involved in the supplementary access scheme envisaged in Bill C–57. Perhaps I can dispel some of them.

First, current and prospective provisions of the Export and Import Permits Act enable supplementary imports but do not impose them. The government has no intention of letting in additional quantities at duty rates below the "high" MFN rate where this would be against the Canadian interest.

Second, imports for market shortages are not "within access commitment" under the proposed legislation, and will not result in permanent increases in market access. On the contrary, such imports are and will be let in at the discretion of the government.

Third, nothing in Bill C–57 prevents the government from examining the issue and introducing new rules.

• (1915)

In fact, Bill C–57 basically rolls the current system of supplementary access over in order to furnish an immediate means of allowing supplementary imports for a variety of reasons, including enhancing export competitiveness.

Finally, the situation calls for careful analysis and broad consultation. Should the government determine that additional duties on supplementary imports of supply managed products are advisable, we will take all appropriate measures to institute such a system, including legislation, if necessary. However, changing Bill C–57 to effect this would short–circuit the consultative process, and is not in the government's plans.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to elaborate on a previous question that I put to the Minister of Justice on December 1, 1994 in the context of this day being recognized as a national day of remembrance and action to end violence against women. I asked what measures are being implemented to ensure that women are protected from violence.

On this day of solemn commemoration we are invited to recognize the many women who have died as victims of violence and abuse and we are reminded that thousands of others live every day in danger and in fear. For this day to take on its full significance I would like to see this House act even more comprehensively.

Until recently the issue of violence against women was hidden within the private sphere and as such was generally ignored or trivialized. Fortunately we are coming to realize that violence against women is in clear violation of human rights. It robs women of their self–esteem, dignity and in some cases their life.

Since Statistics Canada conducted its first national survey on violence against women in 1993, which is the first one of its kind worldwide, the gravity of the situation has been brought to light. According to the survey, as many as 51 per cent of Canadian women have experienced at least one incident of physical or sexual violence since the age of 16. Almost 45 per cent of all women experience violence by men known to them, their dates, boyfriends, marital partners, friends, family or neighbours. Whereas a woman is shot every six days in Canada, firearms are the weapon of choice for spousal homicides. During the period between 1974 and 1992, 42 per cent of the women killed by their spouses were shot.

As shattering as these statistics are they only account for part of the problem since Statistics Canada defines violence as experience of physical or sexual assault. It does not touch upon the other dimensions of violence to which many women are subject.

Three other areas were identified in the 1993 report, Changing the Landscape, Ending Violence, Achieving Equality. They are psychological violence which encompasses various tactics to undermine a woman's self–confidence; financial violence, whereby a woman's access to employment or investment opportunities are denied by her partner or family members; and spiritual abuse in which the cultural or religious beliefs are destroyed through ridicule or punishment.

A wide range of indicators give evidence that this societal ill is pervasive and systemic. As a result, women from all walks of life are targets of various acts of violence.

Not only are the causes and the forms of violence against women extremely insidious, but so too are their effects. Such violence scars not only women but also the children and the men around them. It marks the body, but it also deeply wounds the mind and the spirit of those affected. As a result of having been abused a woman's physical and/or mental health can be at stake. Her chance of advancement in her working life may be jeopardized and her interpersonal skills generally deteriorate.

As well as having these devastating effects on the women concerned, such violence is proven to seriously destabilize the children who witness it. Boys who are brought up in an abusive household are more likely to become violent fathers and girls are more likely to become victims at the hands of their future partners.

Canada has played a leadership role internationally in initiating the UN declaration on the elimination of violence against women, recognizing the urgent need for the universal application to women of the rights and principles with regard to equality, security, integrity and dignity of all persons.

The red book called for a justice system that will work to ensure safe homes, safe streets. While other ministries of this government will play important roles, I ask the Minister of Justice today, how does he intend to address this very important issue of ending violence against women?

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today marks the sad anniversary of the murder of 14 young women at l'École polytechnique in Montreal.

The government recognizes the devastating effects of violence against women and is striving to improve its response to help victims and to stop the offenders. As examples of the work being done in the Department of Justice to address the issue of violence against women let me mention the following.

The new firearms initiatives will provide a clear and effective response to try and prevent women from being killed by guns. Bill C–42 proposes amendments to the Criminal Code which would allow police and others to apply for a peace bond on behalf of a person at risk. Bill C–41 proposes sentencing reforms and would make abuse of a position of trust or authority in the commission of an offence an aggravating factor in sentencing. Dealing with violence against women remains one of the government's highest priorities in the justice area.

At the end of the week consultations will take place with women's groups on how to respond to the Supreme Court's decision to allow defence of extreme drunkenness, where a man had sexually assaulted a woman while intoxicated. The Minister of Justice has already indicated his intention to respond to the problems arising from the Daviault decision and is looking at a criminal intoxication proposal.

Dealing with violence against women remains one of the government's highest priorities in the justice area.

The Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m. Good evening to all.

SAINT JOHN WEATHER OFFICE

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, I have recently been informed that Environment Canada has decided to move the Saint John weather office to Fredericton, New Brunswick.

I believe this change will have a wide–reaching negative impact on the city of Saint John. Because of the government's decision the Saint John city works department supervisors who plan snow removal for the next day will have to base their decision on a forecast from Fredericton which is 60 miles inland or else rely on the local forecast that may be five hours old.

Having up to the minute forecasts is critical to the Saint John works department, schools, the airport and our port. Saint John has a reputation for having its own unique weather. For example fog which can occur without warning and certainly is undetectable from Fredericton, New Brunswick.

I ask the Minister of Environment for safety's sake to reconsider this decision and return full meteorological service to Saint John, New Brunswick.

VIOLENCE

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in this House we remembered the fifth anniversary of the tragic death of 14 young women at l'École polytechnique in Montreal. We strongly emphasized the need to end violence against women.

All violence is an assault on the sanctity of human life and the thief of personal dignity. Whether this violence occurs in the home or on the street, whether it is directed at men, women or children, it abuses the soul and violates the body.

Human beings have the potential for immense noble acts while at the same time we can be immensely cruel. By a single word we can make our neighbour feel like a king or a pauper. By a single act we can create life or destroy it.

I call upon all members of this honourable House to enhance their efforts to end not only violence against women but violence against all people.

MICHEL TREMBLAY

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last Saturday, the Mouvement national des Québécois et Québécoises presented one of Quebec's most noted authors, Michel Tremblay, with the 1994 Silver Medal.

A prolific writer, Michel Tremblay is one of a short list of Quebec playwrights whose works are played on all five continents.

Approximately 100 artists from Quebec paid tribute to the recipient in a skilful production directed by André Montmorency.

At the end of this magnificent evening, Mr. Tremblay impulsively, and with characteristic generosity, dedicated his award to our leader, Mr. Bouchard.

Louise Laurin, the president of the movement, said that the tribute being paid to Michel Tremblay that evening was in recognition of the generous contribution of the author to the development and dissemination of our culture. Thank you, Michel Tremblay.

PEACEKEEPING

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the defence review has acknowledged that Parliament needs to have criteria in place for peacekeeping missions, criteria like when should a mission be undertaken, what are the goals for our peacekeepers and more important, when should Canada withdraw.

The lack of criteria has resulted in the distressing capture of 55 courageous Canadian peacekeepers in the former Yugoslavia. The government dithers on while the UN mission becomes the laughing–stock of the world and our soldiers are held hostage by armed forces intent on finishing their war and not contributing to peace.

Today I will introduce a private member's bill called the peacekeeping bill. It would require the government to pass a resolution in this House before a peacekeeping mission starts. The resolution would lay out the goals, duration and maximum cost of the mission. Once the resolution expired, troops would be withdrawn or a new resolution passed to continue the mission.

A peacekeeping bill would allow Parliament to ask the hard questions before peacekeeping missions begin and help to secure the lives of our peacekeepers.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION ORGANIZATION

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is the 50th anniversary of the International Civil Aviation Organization, ICAO.

As the only United Nations agency with headquarters in Canada, it covers the bilateral international accords governing landing and access rights and passage through air space, control of aerial piracy, illegal diversion of aircraft. It also covers issues of hostile military action against civil passenger aircraft as with the Korean Airlines incident of 1983 and the Iranian airbus incident of 1987.

As a former director of the McGill University Institute and Centre of Air and Space Law, I salute ICAO and its mandate for the freedom of the air and politically secure and economically viable international air transportation.

DRUNK DRIVERS

Mr. John Maloney (Erie, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I recently spent two days at the international border crossing at Fort Erie in my riding. I observed the operation of our hardworking customs and immigration officers and discussed various issues with them.

After spending some time observing the procedures on the primary inspection line during the evening shift I became concerned about the lack of sobriety of motor vehicle drivers returning to Canada from the United States.

The public fully expects that our Canadian roads are to be protected from drunk drivers and are of the opinion that our customs officers have the right to detain such individuals. The reality is that our customs officers have no such authority. The inability of our border personnel to lawfully detain suspected intoxicated drivers or demand that they submit to a breathalyser test is unsatisfactory.

• (1405)

I ask the Minister of Justice and the Minister of National Revenue to reconsider the powers of our customs officers with a view to correcting this unacceptable situation.

JUSTICE

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the recent decision by the Supreme Court of Canada that drunkenness is a defence for rape has led to cries from Canadians for a change in these laws. These cries have grown louder in recent weeks as we have seen a number of cases in which individuals have successfully used the drunkenness defence to escape conviction for the horrendous crime of sexual assault.

I have been contacted by a number of my constituents who are upset and disillusioned with the Supreme Court of Canada's decision. I share their concerns and their outrage.

On behalf of my constituents I would like to inform all members of this House that the people of Brampton support the introduction of new legislation which will ensure that individuals who commit a serious crime serve the time, whether or not they have consumed alcohol.

It is up to every member of this House to ensure that the outrage which Canadians feel is promptly translated into new legislation.

INTERNATIONAL CIVIL AVIATION ORGANIZATION

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the international civil aviation organization, or ICAO, the only UN agency based in Canada and one of its oldest components, is celebrating its 50th anniversary today in the presence of the UN Secretary–General, Boutros Boutros–Ghali.

Based in Montreal, like more than 30 other international organizations, including the International Air Transport Association and the secretariat for the Montreal Protocol Multilateral Fund on Substances that Deplete the Ozone Layer, ICAO exemplifies the vitality of Quebec's chief city internationally.

It is this internationalism that the federal government was forced to recognize last winter by allowing the head office of the NAFTA environment committee to be based in Montreal. Dynamic, cosmopolitan and open to the world, Montreal will make a proud chief city in a sovereign Quebec.

SEXUAL ORIENTATION

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there has been much debate about sexual orientation and issues concerning the rights and status of gays and lesbians in our society. I believe that there are two parts to this issue. The first is a matter of discrimination and the legal rights of the individual; the second is group rights.

I personally support the addition of sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination in the Canadian Human Rights Act providing that sexual orientation is defined as homosexuality, heterosexuality or bisexuality.

Canadians must decide whether or not they want to give same sex relationships the same rights and benefits as heterosexual relationships. Personally, I do not support granting gay and lesbian couples the same status as heterosexual couples with regard to marriage, adoption and common law rights.

A spouse should continue to be defined as a member of the opposite sex and the family defined as those related by blood, adoption or marriage.

EAST TIMOR

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, today marks the 19th anniversary of the Indonesian invasion of East Timor. Since 1974, over 200,000 people, one–third of the population, have died in the genocide. Recent reports indicate that the repression continues with acts such as shutting down key media outlets, banning trade unions and arresting union leaders.

At the recent APEC summit, Canada managed to secure a number of important contracts but the silence on human rights abuses was deafening.

The situation in East Timor received international attention during the APEC meeting, but with the international spotlight gone the Indonesian government can continue to repress the people of East Timor.

It is imperative that pressure be put on now. Canada should end its arms sales to Indonesia and support an international embargo. We should put pressure on the Indonesian government to release all political prisoners, in particular Xanana Gusmao, leader of the independence movement. Canada should support independence and self–determination for the people of East Timor and show full respect for UN Resolutions 389 and 384.

PARTI QUEBECOIS

Mr. Paul DeVillers (Simcoe North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Premier of Quebec tabled his so–called draft bill on Quebec independence. The object of this exercise is to rush Quebecers into an empty debate on what an independent Quebec state would look like, without even knowing if they are in favour of this ill–advised venture. This bit of trickery amounts to putting the cart before the horse.

Given the fragile mandate which the Parti Quebecois received in the last provincial election, I can easily understand why the separatists do not dare ask the only question that counts: Do you want to stay in Canada, yes or no?

Despite the games being played by the Parti Quebecois, I have no doubt that Quebecers will choose to remain and continue to grow in Canada.

RADIO STATION CJEM

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, radio station CJEM in Edmundston, New Brunswick, is celebrating the 50th anniversary of its founding; it started broadcasting 50 years ago.

Under the direction of its founders, CJEM has been a source of relevant information and entertainment for the local population since December 4, 1944. CJEM was also the first French–language radio station in the Maritimes, which illustrates very well the vitality and creativity of the people in my riding and their interest in promoting the French fact.

I extend to them my sincere congratulations on their 50th anniversary and wish them continued prosperity in the years to come.

CHILDREN FOR PEACE

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am proud to rise to thank over one hundred children from my riding who sent me drawings, as well as messages of peace, hope and friendship.

These touching messages come from pupils in grade two at École Saint–Paul, Maria, in grade four at École Père–Pacifique, Pointe–à–la–Croix, in grade one at École Bourg, Carleton, and in grade four at École Bois–Vivant, New–Richmond. Their drawings convey messages such as: "Every child has a right to be protected", "I want children to live in love", and "Let us make sure fewer children die very young".

It is my hope that these messages will inspire all young Canadians, at a time when we are debating the gun control issue and on the day after the sad anniversary of the killing of 14 young women at Montreal's École polytechnique. Fortunately, these drawings are a source of hope for a better future.

DRAFT BILL ON SOVEREIGNTY

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Quebec Premier unveiled his proposed sovereignty plan to Quebecers. The process is characterized by a deep respect for the democratic principles in which Quebecers firmly believe.

The fact that those who patriated the Constitution in 1982 without Quebec's approval and those who concocted the Charlottetown referendum without any mandate from Canadians are now criticizing a transparent and legitimate process is confirmation that cynicism never killed anyone.

In 1990, the Parti Quebecois agreed to participate in the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, even though the Liberal government had no mandate and the conditions were far from equal for all involved. The difference is that the PQ had convictions and a vision to propose.

Today, the sovereignists are in control. They want to invite all Quebecers to participate in the process. The federalist parties are free to boycott it. As for us Bloc Quebecois members, we will listen to Quebecers and build a country that reflects who we are.

WESTERN ECONOMIC DIVERSIFICATION

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, western economic diversification boasts about how many jobs it has created since the Tories invented the program in 1987.

Forget about the millions of dollars in write–offs and grants. There is one shining star that western diversification can trumpet about and he is Iain Williamson. Who is he, the Liberals might ask. He is a man who some would define as a real entrepreneur. He saw a unique opportunity created by federal government largesse.

Williamson wrote the book entitled: Your Guide to Government Financial Assistance for Business in Manitoba. You guessed it. He writes about finding taxpayers' money for your business. If you run a small business and are in receivership or default of a loan, don't worry, be happy. Just apply for the small business financing program.

Yes, the Liberals should be proud that they have created one good job by giving Williamson lots to write about.

Mr. Wayne Easter (Malpeque, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the election last week of the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee was a clear victory for those supporting the principles of orderly marketing.

Ten out of eleven candidates running won for the pro–board side. That is the highest number of candidates on the pro–board side ever elected. It comes at a time when promoters of the open market dual marketing system so–called were sowing seeds of misinformation on the board and trying their hardest to undermine orderly marketing. Some even supported tactics of breaking the law. It goes to show that the rhetoric and publicity tactics of the anti–board groups are just that, rhetoric but no substance and little support. Every wheat board permit holder had the right to vote in this election. The evidence is in. Congratulations. The government must now continue to support and strengthen the Canadian Wheat Board.

SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Vancouver South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of small business owners in Vancouver South I congratulate the Minister of Industry for the bold measures which he has introduced for Canada's small business community. Through those measures outlined in "Building a More Innovative Economy" the minister has managed to strike the necessary balance between less government and better government; less government in areas like regulation, taxation and paperwork, and better government in areas like procurement, trading opportunities, business training and transportation.

I hope that a careful reading of the minister's plan will demonstrate to all members of this House that a vibrant economy is built on a well thought out and proactive plan. It can never be achieved through a simple minded slash and burn policy as promoted by members of the Reform Party.

During the election campaign we promised to make small business the centrepiece of our economic strategy. With the release of this plan I am proud to see that this government has kept yet another election promise.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

DRAFT BILL ON SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday, the Premier of Quebec announced his government's approach to the referendum and invited Quebecers to a wide–ranging debate on their political future. The Deputy Prime Minister called the draft bill on Quebec's sovereignty a fraud and an illegitimate, undemocratic manoeuvre.

How can the Deputy Prime Minister call this draft bill illegitimate when it fully respects the provisions of Quebec's referendum law, the same one under which referendums were held in May 1980 and in October 1992 on the Charlottetown Accord?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in our opinion, neither the form nor the content of the draft bill presented yesterday complies with Quebec's referendum legislation, which requires parity among the parties. As Mr. Johnson clearly showed yesterday, Mr. Parizeau's law does not provide for regional commissions where the various parties are represented equally. As for the substance, once again, they talk about the process even before the consequence of the process leading to separation has been put to a referendum.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, are we to understand that the federal government refuses to participate in the process initiated by the Government of Quebec because the Prime Minister of Canada and his government have nothing to offer but the constitutional status quo, which they know is rejected by a very large segment of Quebec's population?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what we have to offer is a federalist option which is clearly supported by most Quebecers.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Massé: It is clear that well over 60 per cent of Quebecers oppose separation and it is also clear that if they are given a clear, honest question, the great majority of Quebecers will support the federalist option.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, you will agree that it is harder and harder to define what the federalists are proposing, since the Prime Minister talks about a fixed status quo and the federalist spokesman in Quebec, Daniel Johnson, talks about renewed federalism.

How can the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs justify his government's refusal to get involved in this debate? Are they so afraid of presenting Quebecers with a real debate on the two options: sovereignty or their status quo?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, speaking of returning to models from the past, we can very well ask the opposition why they talk about economic association.

That being said, the federalist option is not only closest to what Quebecers want but is also the one we intend to defend when the referendum will be called. There must be not only a separatist option but also a federalist option. The federalism which we propose is flexible; it is a federalism that works. In the last year, it produced 63 agreements between the federal government and the various provinces, including 8 with Quebec. What the opposition shows us is that it is not prepared to co–operate for the good of Quebec through proper relationships between the federal government and the government of Quebec.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

In response to the draft bill tabled by the Government of Quebec yesterday, the Deputy Prime Minister stated, and I quote:

[English]

"We do not intend to play that game. We intend to ask the people of Quebec a very clear question: Do you want to stay with Canada or do you want to separate?"

By saying this, she implied that the federal government might again conduct its own referendum to ask Quebecers to decide on their political future.

Could the Deputy Prime Minister tell us whether her government still intends to conduct its own referendum on the sovereignty of Quebec, thus bypassing the National Assembly?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what I said yesterday and what I am saying again today is that if the Premier of Quebec intends to be frank with the people and if he is not afraid to act on his principles, the referendum question in Quebec will be quite straightforward: Do you want to separate from Canada, yes or no?

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister has therefore not excluded that possibility, although the federalist leader in Quebec, Daniel Johnson, made it quite clear yesterday that it was up to Quebecers and Quebecers alone to answer this question, in a process initiated by the National Assembly of Quebec and not by the federal government.

Nevertheless I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if by excluding any federal participation in the consultation process, she means that a federal strategy is already in place and will be limited to spending tens of millions of dollars to sing the praises of Canada, as was the case in 1980.

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in fact, the only political party that is not playing fair at present is the Parti Quebecois.

[English]

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Quebec government began to put forward in legislative terms its vision of a sovereign Quebec. Canadians are now expecting the federal government will be putting forward in clearer terms its vision of the federalist option which can be used to counter separatist sentiments in Quebec and to challenge discontented federalists across the country.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister share briefly with the House the essence of the federalist option with which the government proposes to counter the narrow separatist vision?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and the Government of Canada will pursue the option that we have pursued for the past year and that is challenging the status quo, being prepared to move on areas like social policy reforms in areas that are desperately needed; being prepared to move to get our financial house in order so that we meet our 3 per cent of GDP objective.

We propose to convince Quebecers that Canada is a pretty good place by providing good government.

• (1425)

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if the government is not prepared to be visionary at least it must have given some thought to the principles that would guide its reactions to separatist initiatives.

For example, the charter says that Canada is founded upon the principle that recognizes the supremacy of law. If that principle is to guide federal government reactions then at least it should be willing to put forward an opinion on the legality or illegality of separatist initiatives.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister at least tell the House as a bare minimum what principles will guide federal reactions to separatist initiatives?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the guiding principle of the Government of Canada is that we have an obligation to all the people of Canada to keep this country together and we are going to fight very hard to ensure that every Canadian shares in the wealth and the greatness of the greatest nation on earth.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the inadequacy of the Deputy Prime Minister's response simply illustrates our concerns. It would appear that the federal government after having had a year to think hard on this issue is making up its responses as it goes along.

Do these half baked political answers actually represent the best thinking of the national government on the most profound challenge that a federal administration can face?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is the intention of the Government of Canada to support the objectives of this great nation at every turn. It is the objective of the Government of Canada to encourage all opposition parties that believe in Canada to work with us in building this great nation. Do not work with the opposition, whose sole objective is to destroy it.

BOSNIA

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Faced with the bitter failure of the efforts deployed by the international community to bring to an end the conflict in Bosnia, France and the United Kingdom went one step further today towards a pullout of troops from Bosnia, when they asked NATO and the UN to examine the conditions of an eventual withdrawal of their contingents of peacekeepers.

Is the Deputy Prime Minister in a position to report on the progress of the ongoing negotiations and tell us whether the Canadian government is also contemplating the pullout of its own peacekeepers?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has made it clear that we are not prepared to withdraw our troops from the former Yugoslavia unless the arms embargo is lifted.

We believe the situation is extremely volatile. We believe that we, the members of UNPROFOR, the United Nations in ex–Yugoslavia, continue to discharge our mandate.

We are concerned with reports from some of our allies about a precipitous withdrawal. Obviously, and this has been raised before in the House by other members, NATO has plans that are being worked on should there require a withdrawal of forces. At the moment that is not Canada's position.

Next week there will be the regular defence planning committee meeting in Brussels which I shall attend, as will General de Chastelain, chief of the defence staff, and some of these questions will be explored in greater detail.

[Translation]

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of National Defence not recognize that the potential withdrawal of UNPROFOR peacekeepers from Bosnia would be, as mentioned earlier, catastrophic, both in military and humanitarian terms, for the government forces and the civilian population of Bosnia? Can he tell us what alternative Canada intends to propose to the member countries of the contact group?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we share the hon. member's analysis. The Prime Minister has been quite explicit on the point that if the United Nations forces were to leave Bosnia and Croatia in light of the conditions of the last few weeks this would cause a great deterioration of the situation and we believe the bloodshed would be considerable.

• (1430)

That is the reason why Canada has steadfastly maintained that the only way out of this morass is for the warring parties to agree to continue negotiations, whether that be done through proposals submitted by the contact group or others or under the auspices of the UN in general.

The only way out of this situation is for the international community to negotiate with the warring parties in Bosnia and Croatia so we can bring some kind of stability to the region.

REFERENDUM ON QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last night, on the TV program Le Point, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs said that if the referendum question in Quebec is not an honest question on Quebec separation, the federal government would consider holding its own referendum and asking its own question. He said: "I imagine that we would then have to ask that question ourselves".

Can the minister confirm to the House that a referendum is indeed an option for the federal government?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, although the federal government does not want to hold a referendum in Quebec, the referendum question must be a clear and honest question whose results will be meaningful. In our opinion, there are only two options: flexible federalism and separation. We expect the referendum to ask that question.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I asked a question on options and I take the minister's answer to be "yes".

[English]

The minister will know that the matters raised in the Quebec sovereignty bill are of deep concern to all Canadians and through this Parliament are under the jurisdiction of all Canadians. Will the minister confirm for the House that the government's referendum options include the option of a national referendum?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat my answer.

The federal government does not want to have a referendum in Quebec. We expect the referendum that is going to be held in Quebec will be a fair referendum that will ask the question clearly. That question is: Do Quebecers want to separate or do they want to stay in Canada?

REGISTERED RETIREMENT SAVINGS PLANS

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

While the minister accuses the Bloc Quebecois of creating a climate of uncertainty on RRSPs, last Friday the Financial Post mentioned that the minister is considering imposing a one–per–cent tax on the assets of $500 billion held in pension plans and RRSPs.

Will the minister confirm that imposing this hidden tax of five billion dollars on assets in pension plans and RRSPs could eventually reduce by 24 per cent the value of these retirement funds?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I did not make any comment regarding a tax such as the one described by the hon. member. As the hon. member knows, I have no intention of making any comment or taking any action before the budget. However, I am here to accept representations and I do accept the hon. member's.

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly not suggesting such a tax, quite the contrary.

Since the government is borrowing more and more abroad and Statistics Canada tells us that the personal savings rate is at its lowest level in 23 years, does the minister not agree that taxing RRSPs and pension plans would significantly hurt savings and investments?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is no question that the level of savings in Canada has to go up, if we are serious about promoting a growth–based economy. One of the best ways to achieve that is to have political certainty, and it is my hope that we will have such certainty before long.

BOSNIA

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, a week ago the Minister of National Defence said this about Bosnia: "We in Canada believe that obviously those detained should be released, that the hostilities should cease, there should be a ceasefire and that the Sarajevo airport should be reopened". He then hoped that the combatants would get down to meaningful discussions and negotiations within the next few days.

• (1435)

The minister is zero and five. Will the government stop wringing its hands and hoping for miracles and call for the multilateral withdrawal of UN forces from Bosnia?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I answered that a little earlier and the Prime Minister has answered it. No.

We continue to remain extremely concerned about the plight of the 55 Canadians detained in Bosnia. We had assurances as late as yesterday that the Bosnian Serb forces will be releasing those people detained, including the Canadians. We hope they will discharge their promises at this particular time.

The reasoning the hon. member is using is not shared by the government. We are not wringing our hands. The deputy minister of foreign affairs was in Belgrade yesterday and gave a very stiff message to the president and foreign minister of Yugoslavia, as it is constituted in Belgrade.

Our Prime Minister has also been very forceful in demanding the return of the Canadians who are being detained.

When the Prime Minister returns later this evening we will be having further discussions with him. Perhaps we will be able to clarify our position and mollify the hon. member somewhat.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the complete failure of the CSCE summit in Budapest and the failure of the Prime Minister to even state his position during the Bosnian debate proved beyond a shadow of a doubt that Canadian and UN peacekeepers have done their best. However the situation is beyond their mandate. The government wants a negotiated peace. But it wants what it cannot have.

At what point will the government accept that no negotiated settlement is forthcoming and pull out our troops?

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have answered the specific question and so has the Prime Minister.

However, I take great umbrage. The hon. member has criticized our Prime Minister representing Canada in an international forum where he made Canada's position absolutely clear. I resent that.

ETHICS

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Health.

Two weeks after we heard that the Director of the Bureau of Veterinary Drugs at Health Canada was lobbying on behalf of a number of pharmaceutical companies, the Minister of Health seems unable to say whether the behaviour of her official complies with the government's code of ethics on conflict of interest. I will give the minister a chance to give us a clear answer.

Could the Minister of Health tell us whether Mr. Ritter's behaviour violated the government's code of ethics on conflict of interest?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I said before in this House, I asked my deputy minister to look into the matter, and I am sure she will give me a report very shortly. When she does, I will be happy to share all the facts with the hon. member.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister has been aware of this for two weeks. What kind of reassurance is this supposed to give the public, when Mr. Ritter, the lobbyist, was seen yesterday at the Bureau of Veterinary Drugs of Health Canada, the Bureau whose director he continues to be, Mr. Speaker?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I said before, I am waiting for my deputy minister's answer. If the hon. member has any information that might be useful, he should get in touch with the department, and he is welcome to do so. That is how we run things here.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, recently at the United Nations, Canada abstained on a resolution asking the International Court of Justice for an opinion on the legality of the threat or use of nuclear weapons.

In light of the minister of state for foreign affairs recent statement to the UN General Assembly in which she advocated strenghthening the human rights and environmental functions within the United Nations, can she assure the House that when the same resolution comes to a vote in the General Assembly, Canada will no longer abstain but vote for nuclear responsibility and support the resolution?

• (1440)

Hon. Christine Stewart (Secretary of State (Latin America and Africa), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it was in the General Assembly that Canada abstained on the resolution to which my colleague refers.

It is very important to stress that Canada's goal as a nation is the elimination of all nuclear weapons worldwide. We are trying to develop incrementally a consensus around the world on this issue. In the meantime, we will work very actively internationally to try to enhance a nuclear non–proliferation treaty and a comprehensive test ban treaty.

We consider this is very important for all the same reasons but including the protection of the environment and humanity.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, despite warnings from the OECD and the IMF about the need for deeper spending cuts, ministers, like the Minister of Justice, continue to lay legislative proposals before the House without a cost analysis or projections.

Will the finance minister agree, given our current financial situation, it is inexcusable for any minister to present any program or legislative initiative to the House without an analysis of the cost to the taxpayers?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can respond on behalf of myself by saying that the government examined the cost implications of every element of its firearms control program.

In accordance with the ordinary parliamentary process those matters will be examined in detail before the relevant committee of the House.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. The government continues to give fuzzy answers. Now is not the time for fuzzy answers, particularly on spending or taxation.

Will the minister calm concerned Canadians and state clearly that there will be no new taxes or tax increases in the February budget? The choice is the minister's: Santa or Scrooge.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have stated on many occasions in the House that I am not going to comment on matters that will be brought forward in the budget. That is the answer to the member's supplementary question.

However, in response to his first question that basically said that one should provide for the impact of one's recommendations or one's legislation, I say that people in glass houses should not throw stones. Why is it that Reform Party members, when they come down with their studies, refuse to show the impact of what they are recommending? Is it because they know what those recommendations would do to the Canadian people and to the Canadian economy?

COLLÈGE MILITAIRE ROYAL DE SAINT–JEAN

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

Last week, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs turned down an invitation from the mayor of Saint–Jean who was hoping to resume discussions on the future of the Collège militaire de Saint–Jean, on the basis of his proposal. The minister has yet to respond to a letter sent to him on December 2 by his Quebec counterpart, inviting him to delegate officials for the purpose of resuming negotiations.

Does the lack of a prompt response from the minister mean that the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs is still refusing to delegate officials from his department to resume discussions on the basis of the proposal by the mayor of Saint–Jean?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are now considering the proposals made by Minister Beaudoin and Mayor Smereka.

I think we should remember that a federal proposal was tabled, and signed and accepted by the Government of Quebec, a proposal in which the federal government offered $25 million over five years to cover the transition period.

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since time is of the essence and, as of January, employees have to decide whether they will accept a transfer, how can the minister justify the delay in dealing with the matter of the Collège militaire de Saint–Jean? Is that his flexible federalism?

• (1445)

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find it difficult to take this question seriously, since we have on the table an offer dated July 19 that was signed by the Government of Quebec, and since September 12, the Government of Quebec has refused to budge. We have a situation where for months the Government of Quebec has undermined the financial security of the teachers at Saint–Jean and has prevented the Collège militaire royal de Saint–Jean from remaining open. The uncertain economic climate in the Saint–Jean area is being caused by the PQ government which, so far, has refused to implement an agreement that was duly signed.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

Consideration by the Alberta government to use the notwithstanding clause of the Constitution to refute the impending new federal gun control legislation underscores the absence of any real consultation between the federal justice minister and provincial officials, in spite of assurances to the contrary by the minister.

As the opposition to his proposals begins to mount, will the Minister of Justice reveal which provincial attorneys general he consulted with and had the support of prior to November 30?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, consultation was engaged in continuously with officials in the offices of every provincial and territorial attorneys general, every one of them.

Let me add in response to the hon. member's question that consideration of invoking the notwithstanding clause in relation to the legislation reveals nothing more than a profound misunderstanding of the nature of the clause and the Constitution.

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the minister.

The provincial justice minister states that Alberta is not prepared to pay the estimated half million dollar cost of establishing a registry in the province and therefore Ottawa would have to foot the bill.

What is the overall estimated cost for the national registration of rifles and shotguns? Who is going to pay for a registration system that will not reduce the criminal use of these weapons?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the premise upon which the question is based is fundamentally flawed.

The introduction of a national registration system will not only enhance community safety, but it will choke off one of the important sources of supply for criminals getting hold of guns.

In terms of the cost, the provincial attorney general in Alberta is reported to have referred to the sum of $500,000. He did not indicate how he arrived at that sum.

Last week we published as a federal government our estimate of the cost. We fully expect that to be a very reliable estimate in all the circumstances.

ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

A Russian pipeline oil spill into the Arctic river system is rapidly becoming a major international ecological disaster. The region of the spill has no fish population to speak of and the deer population has declined by 30 to 50 per cent.

What is the government doing to protect the Arctic from the devastating results of the oil spill?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member will know, because she is the vice–chair of the environment committee, that immediately upon learning of the bill I was in touch. It happens to be a very significant issue for the Arctic environment.

We wrote to the Government of Russia to see if we could be of assistance. The initial offer was declined. However we did receive contact via the United Nations last week that the Russians are interested in having international expertise. A ten person team including two Canadians are leaving today to go to the oil spill site to see if we might be of assistance to prevent potential devastation in the virgin Arctic.

REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

While the Liberal government has been dragging its feet for over a year on the issue of new reproductive technologies, women are selling their eggs to the IVF Canada clinic in Toronto. It is increasingly clear that the commercialization of human genetic material, embryos and foetal tissue is growing in Canada.

Since new reproductive technologies are evolving much more rapidly than the government, can the Minister of Justice admit that several recommendations in the Baird report can be implemented quickly to regulate some embryo research practices and the sale of human gametes or eggs, as is happening at the IVF Canada clinic in Toronto?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. I am sure that the Bloc Quebecois member understands how complex the issue is and that she and her Bloc colleagues can appreciate the jurisdictional questions involved.

We are doing our job. We met with more than 40 groups, as well as representatives of the various provincial governments. We are preparing both a short–term and a long–term plan that will consider not only the technologies themselves but also sexual and reproductive health, because it is a matter not only of technology but also of prevention of infertility. We must do all we can to prevent potential problems.

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Health seriously believe that the reasons she has just listed are sufficient to justify her department's delay in producing the report that the Minister of Justice needs to take action in this very urgent matter?

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is passing strange that members of the Bloc Quebecois will on the one hand say: "We want a separate country; we want to do everything by ourselves", and on the other hand when it suits them will say: "We want you to impose your will on the provinces". If they want us to impose our will on the provinces in relation to new reproductive technologies, we will be glad to, but that is not the way the government normally operates.

We work with the provinces and the stakeholders. We have done a considerable amount of work and we will continue to do that work to address these very complex issues.

JUSTICE

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on Friday I asked the Solicitor General about the escape of Ian John Hutton from a halfway house in Vaughan, Ontario. It was apparent that the minister had not been informed of Hutton's unlawful absence.

Could the Solicitor General explain why a murderer, who is classified on CPIC as being violent and an escape risk, could be unlawfully at large for four days without the minister or the media being notified?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this matter was put in the hands of the police. It is their responsibility to have this person returned to custody.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

When I asked the minister on Friday why a murderer who was classified as being violent and an escape risk was serving his sentence at a halfway house, the minister replied that it was a serious matter.

Given the fact that the seriousness of the matter has been compounded by the non–notification of the escape, is the minister prepared to hold a public inquiry into the matter?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is a matter based on a decision made by the parole board which operates at arm's length from the minister and from the House of Commons.

I will be happy to draw the hon. member's comments to the attention of the parole board.

BANKS

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Mr. Minister, not only have the six largest banks made record—

The Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to direct his question through the Chair.

Mr. Solomon: I apologize, Mr. Speaker.

My question is for the Minister of Finance. Not only have the six largest banks made record profits of over $4 billion, but they are also holding Canadians for ransom with high interest rates.

• (1455)

A study done by his own department points out that the top four banks hold 53 per cent of depositor assets. Inflation is at an all–time low, yet we are still being stung with a high interest rate policy that will stifle our economy and add to our debt.

Will the Minister of Finance direct the finance committee to hold a full investigation into bank practices and profits to ensure the banks pay their fair share of taxes?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is certainly the intention of the government that the banks pay their fair share of taxes. As the member knows, in addition to the normal corporate tax there is an additional large corporation tax imposed upon the banks. In addition to that there is a tax on the capital of all financial institutions.

We are obviously very concerned about the health of the economy. There have been extensive committee reports involving the banking system. I thought the industry committee came up with a very good report this year. The finance committee has as well looked at these issues. Unfortunately I am not in a position to direct the finance committee, but I obviously would be prepared to co–operate with it in any way, shape or form.

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the minister.

If the minister will not direct the Standing Committee on Finance to investigate and make a recommendation to the House of Commons, will the minister give assurances to the House that the Department of Finance will ensure that the banks are at least paying their fair share of taxes on the huge profits they are earning and that they are not gouging consumers with high interest rates on loans, mortgages and agricultural and business loans.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, again I am sure the hon. member knows that according to the rules of the House I cannot direct the finance committee. In fact I can tell it very little.

I can assure the hon. member the Department of Finance will certainly make sure that the banks live up to proper business practices and that the banks pay their fair share of taxes.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Ms. Shaughnessy Cohen (Windsor—St. Clair, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

Although it is 1994 it seems that the Stone Age has returned to certain quarters in the House. We have listened to the Neanderthal ramblings of the third party on social programs, women and violence, and employment equity.

Will the President of the Treasury Board please explain slowly, so that our friends opposite will understand, why it is only fair to apply employment equity to the public service?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, employment equity was established by a Liberal government over a decade ago in the public service.

It was established because we wanted to ensure that the public service reflected the kind of population Canada has today and that it would remove unfair barriers to women, to aboriginals, to visible minorities and to the disabled from being able to gain employment in the public service. We wanted to make sure we created a level playing field.

For those who are concerned about reverse discrimination, let me point out that over half the employees of the public service are able–bodied males and half of all hirings in recent years have been able–bodied males.

The bottom line is that the merit principle is a cornerstone of hiring in the public service.

SEXUAL ORIENTATION

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. We have learned that the justice minister will not be tabling the bill to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation for what he calls strategic reasons. And yet this was one of the commitments made in the red book, and repeated by the Prime Minister. The Minister of Justice had promised to take action by the spring, then by June, September, the fall, and now he is talking of another postponement.

Are we to understand that the Minister of Justice is completely paralyzed by the Flintstone wing of his party, which systematically opposes any bill to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation?

• (1500)

[English]

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will be happy to know that both this minister and the government are moving quite freely, thank you very much. We are not paralysed by anything in this connection.

I want to take this opportunity to emphasize the commitment of this government in that regard. As I have said, as the Prime Minister and the Deputy Prime Minister have said, this government is committed to the introduction of amendments to the Human Rights Act to add sexual orientation as grounds on which discrimination is prohibited. I think it is not so much a question of timing. It is a question of principle and commitment and that bill will be introduced in this House.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the health minister has just said that this government works together with the provinces.

My question is for the justice minister. The legislative assembly of Saskatchewan has voted unanimously to oppose any further gun controls and he has had a letter to this effect. The chief law enforcement officer for the province of Saskatchewan is concerned about how he will be able to enforce gun control laws which the majority of voters in the province know are unfair and unnecessary to control violent crime.

The minister said he has consulted. He should be aware he has a major problem. Has he taken a head count of all of the justice ministers in this country to find out which of them support his proposals and which do not?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we do not govern by head count. We govern by what is right.

This government's assessment of what is right was demonstrated last week in writing when I tabled our decision document in the House of Commons. That is this government's assessment of what is right.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I am sure all hon. members will want to hear the response of the minister.

Mr. Rock: In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I want the hon. member to know that I have a decent respect for the opinion of my provincial and territorial counterparts but in the final analysis this is a matter for this federal government to deal with.

We are showing leadership on the issue. Our decisions were announced last week.

The Speaker: I have a question of privilege, followed by a point of order. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on a question of privilege.

PRIVILEGE

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a very important question of privilege that touches on my ability to represent my riding in this House.

Yesterday all hon. members received, I believe from Your Honour, a book entitled The Prime Ministers of Canada. It is a green book presented by the House of Commons and the National Archives of Canada.

I was appalled when I opened the book and read on the page describing my distinguished predecessor, Sir John A. Macdonald, that he represented three constituencies at various times: Marquette, Manitoba; Victoria, British Columbia; Carleton and Lennox, Ontario.

Everybody knows that Sir John A. Macdonald was the member for Kingston. He was first elected as the member for Kingston in 1844 and he served in the legislature of the United Canadas until Confederation. From 1867 until 1891 he was a member for Kingston in this House except—

The Speaker: I knew that. I am not sure it is a question of privilege but I am sure that he does have a grievance and I undertake to have a look at the book and if I can do anything at all to change it I will do so.

If it is necessary I will get back to the House but I think I would like to let that matter sleep. If the hon. member wants to see me later in my chambers I will be there.

POINTS OF ORDER

PARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I beg your indulgence to raise a point of order which touches on a ruling made by the Chair in debate during private members' hour last night.

• (1505)

I want to assure you off the top, Mr. Speaker, that I intend no disrespect toward you. I seek only explanation and clarification.

In debate last night I used the word "meanspirited". That word was ruled by the Speaker as being unparliamentary. I must say that I was surprised but I withdrew the word immediately.

Mr. Speaker, I am looking for guidance and clarification from you because I do not find the offending word in Beauchesne's and I wonder whether we have wandered unintentionally into territory where there is undue restriction on expression in this House.

I appreciate that the Chair made similar rulings on November 23 and November 25 past, but my examination of those rulings leads me to believe they are based more or less on context. In other words, I do not see "meanspirited"—

The Speaker: The hon. member is referring to a ruling that I made in this House with regard to the word "meanspirited". As a general rule I do not take time to explain all of the decisions I make. However, I was hoping in ruling out the word "meanspirited" to lower the tone of words being used in Parliament.

The hon. member is absolutely correct, the word does not appear as unparliamentary in any of our books we look at for words that are unparliamentary. However, from time to time words are added to it. In my judgment on the spirit in which the word was used, I thought if it were withdrawn it would make for better debate in the House.

As for the ruling made by our Deputy Speaker, this was in keeping with his responsibilities. The context of the word, the context in which it is used many times and the tone of the word sometimes make that decision for us.

With respect to my hon. colleague, I would prefer that the word "meanspirited" not be used in our vocabulary as we go back and forth. It is not my intention in any way to restrict debate in this House. I would hope that all members would give enough latitude to the Chair to see to it that at least in debate with one another we would use words where possible that are less offensive.

I thank the hon. member and I would hope that he would respect the decision we had made earlier with regard to this word.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on the same point of order to reiterate what my friend has said. The words that Your Honour just used—I say this with the greatest respect—are clearly indicative of what Your Honour meant when you ruled this out of order in Question Period on November 23. Question Period is a different time when there is no opportunity for discussion. However, on two occasions since then the Deputy Speaker has chosen to state that this word is out of order because of the ruling on November 23.

While the word may be one that in certain circumstances could cause disorder in the House and may therefore not be permitted, it is one that has been used in this House for a long time. I do not understand why it is automatically out of order now whenever it is used.

I think the point the hon. member was seeking to make is while it may have been out of order in Question Period on November 23 and Your Honour has given a reason why that was so and that is accepted, to say the word is therefore unparliamentary on all other occasions is taking a word which is not a particularly nasty one when compared with the others in Beauchesne's which I could read at length that have been ruled to be unparliamentary—

The Speaker: Order. We are going on here. I am going to permit an intervention by the member for the Reform Party and then I would like to go from there.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was present in the House when this incident occurred. I point out that the term "meanspirited" does indicate some motivation. I can also assure you that there was some irrational emotion by the member who used the term. I support the Speaker in his determination.

• (1510)

The Speaker: Order. The decision has been made. The Speaker who made the decision was acting within his responsibilities. In view of what has gone on with that, I would let that decision stand and I would like this matter to be closed now.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

WAYS AND MEANS

NOTICE OF MOTION

Hon. Douglas Peters (Secretary of State (International Financial Institutions), Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 83(1), I wish to table an explanatory note, a notice of ways and means motion to amend the Excise Tax Act. I ask that an order of the day be designated for consideration of this motion.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table in both official languages the government's response to 37 petitions.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

Hon. Ethel Blondin-Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to section 9 of the Employment Equity Act, I have the great pleasure to table on behalf of the Minister of Human Resources Development, in both official languages, the seventh annual report to Parliament on the Employment Equity Act.

It is also my pleasure to announce that the Minister of Human Resources Development will introduce shortly legislation to amend the Employment Equity Act.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–294, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (public access to information from audits of charities and non–profit organizations).

He said: Madam Speaker, this private member's bill calls on public access to the audits by Revenue Canada of charities and non–profit organizations which presently are not available for public disclosure.

The principle behind this is that non–profit organizations and charities are responsible to the taxpayer because they do not pay taxes. Therefore, there should be full accountability to the public. That is the intention of this bill.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

PEACEKEEPING ACT

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–295, an act to provide for the control of Canadian peacekeeping activities by Parliament and to amend the National Defence Act in consequence thereof.

• (1515)

He said: Madam Speaker, it is my privilege to introduce this bill the short name of which could be called the peacekeeping act.

In recent months both the defence review and the foreign affairs review have pointed out the need to have peacekeeping criteria established in advance of peacekeeping operations.

Recent unfortunate developments in the former Yugoslavia have reinforced the necessity to establish these criteria now while our excellent peacekeeping reputation remains untarnished.

The private member's bill I have introduced today requires the government to pass a resolution in this House before a peacekeeping mission starts. The resolution would lay out the goals, the duration and the maximum cost of the mission. Once the resolution expired troops would be withdrawn or a new resolution passed to continue the mission.

A peacekeeping bill such as this would allow Parliament to ask the hard questions before peacekeeping missions began. It would also help to secure the lives of our peacekeepers.

PETITIONS

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Paul Szabo (Mississauga South, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present a petition to the House signed by Canadians from southwestern Ontario including my own riding of Mississauga South.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation. I concur with this petition.

Mrs. Rose–Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have the honour and privilege to table three petitions duly certified by the clerk of petitions and signed by the constituents of Lambton—Middlesex.

In the first petition the petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the human rights act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mrs. Rose–Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Madam Speaker, in the second petition the petitioners pray that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mrs. Rose–Marie Ur (Lambton—Middlesex, Lib.): Madam Speaker, in the third petition the petitioners pray that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have with me today eight sets of petitions from the people in my riding of Port Moody—Coquitlam and across the province of British Columbia on the need for amendments to the Young Offenders Act.

These petitions are a follow-up on the huge outpouring of support for changes to the Young Offenders Act which was demonstrated in a rally held in my riding on September 25. These are part and only part of nearly 15,000 signatures collected from concerned Canadians.

This is an issue that will not go away. It is the responsibility of Parliament to respond to these legitimate concerns. It is with this directive that I table these eight petitions containing some 7,000 of those signatures.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the House to present a petition from residents of British Columbia including many from my riding of Cariboo—Chilcotin.

The petition calls upon Parliament to refuse the justice minister's anti-firearms proposals and insist that he bring forth legislation to convict and punish criminals rather than persecute the innocent.

YOUNG OFFENDERS

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am also pleased to present a petition from the residents of Quesnel, British Columbia. The petition calls for Parliament to enact strong legislation against crimes of violence committed by youth.

I am happy to concur with both of these petitions.

• (1520)

SENIORS

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies, BQ): Madam Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36 I would like to present the following petition: We, the undersigned, residents of Anjou, Montreal and the surrounding area, want to bring to the attention of Parliament the following facts: whereas senior citizens are naturally more at a loss when faced with the technology of voice mail boxes; whereas senior citizens are entitled to appropriate service, particularly as it regards their income security enquiries; therefore the petitioners pray and request that Parliament ask the government to abandon its plan to implement voice mail boxes for senior citizens. I concur with the petition, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have a petition that received very extensive support in my riding. It reminds the government that maintenance and use of firearms is currently heavily controlled under existing legislation in this country. It calls upon Parliament to institute legislation to protect the peaceful private ownership, maintenance and use of such firearms, including but not excluding such events as controlled hunting, sport shooting and the collecting of firearms.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour of presenting four petitions.

In the first petition, the petitioners pray that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by the born human being to the unborn human being.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Madam Speaker, in the second petition the petitioners pray that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada pertaining to assisted suicide be enforced vigorously. They request that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

KILLER CARDS

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the third petition asks to amend the laws of Canada to prohibit the importation, distribution, sale and manufacture of killer cards in law and to advise producers of killer cards that their products destined for Canada will be seized and destroyed.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the fourth petition asks Parliament not to amend the human rights code or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the privilege of presenting two petitions to the House. Both petitions were signed by nearly 100 of my constituents, mostly from the Lloydminster area.

The first petition wants to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the majority of Canadians believe that the privileges which society accords to heterosexual couples should not be extended to same sex relationships. They request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include it in the prohibited grounds of discrimination.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the second petition draws attention to the House that the majority of Canadians respect the sanctity of human life. They ask that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

I would like to indicate that I support the petitioners in their request to Parliament.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I would like to put forth the following petitions. The first petition is from people in my riding of Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca requesting that Parliament refuse to accept the justice minister's anti-firearms proposals. They insist that he bring forth legislation to convict and punish criminals rather than persecute the innocent. I concur with that.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): The second petition is from people in my riding of Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca. They request that Parliament ensure that the present provisions in the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously, and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia, which I would like to say I do not concur with.

• (1525)

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): The next petition relates to enacting legislation providing for a referendum of the people binding upon Parliament to accept or reject two official languages, English and French, for the government and people of Canada. The acceptance or rejection of the proposed amendments would be determined by number one, a majority vote of the total votes cast in the whole of Canada together with two, a majority vote in a majority of provinces with the territories being given the status of one province. I concur with this petition.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): The last two petitions I will put together. They are from constituents of Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

The petitioners request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

I concur with these two petitions.

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have a petition to present today from 227 members of my riding.

Basically the petition prays and requests that Parliament not amend the human rights act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or homosexuality, including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I have two petitions to present to the House today.

The first is a petition from members of my constituency against euthanasia and doctor assisted suicide.

I have not made a decision personally on this matter and will continue to present both sides of the issue.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): The second petition in part asks for amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. I strongly agree with this.

DANGEROUS OFFENDERS

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to table a petition with the signatures of 668 of my constituents. It calls on the government to introduce legislation which will ensure the post-sentence detention of child sex offenders who are likely to reoffend upon release. This brings the total number of signatures I have tabled in the House calling for such legislation to 6,840.

Canadians are concerned about the safety of their children. It is time we introduced legislation which responds to this very real fear.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am also tabling a petition from residents of Brampton South which calls on the government to take action with respect to excessive noise caused by aircraft using runway 24R at Pearson International Airport.

These residents have suffered a great deal because of the noise and are asking that the necessary changes be implemented so that it stops immediately.

HOMEMAKERS COMPENSATION

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton, Lib.): I have a third petition to present in support of compensating spouses working in the home and caring for preschool children.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am pleased to present two petitions from my constituency of Prince George—Bulkley Valley and specifically the town of Vanderhoof, B.C.

The petitioners pray that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

I am pleased to say that I personally support both of these petitions.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I rise today to present 203 signatures not only of people from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt but of like minded people from all across B.C. including North Vancouver, Langley, Surrey and Burnaby.

The petitioners are opposing the anti–firearms legislation that the justice minister is pursuing. Therefore the petitioners request that Parliament refuse to accept Mr. Rock's anti–firearms proposal and insist that he bring forth legislation—

• (1530)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I would ask that the member not use the minister's name but refer to him as the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Hart: I apologize, Madam Speaker. The petitioners request that Parliament refuse to accept the justice minister's anti–firearms proposal and insist that he bring forward legislation to convict and punish criminals, rather than persecute innocent law–abiding citizens. I agree with my petitioners.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be able to present a petition signed by 210 citizens of my riding and elsewhere in Canada praying that Parliament amend the human rights code to include sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions that are identical that oppose euthanasia and doctor assisted suicide, both of which I endorse.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Madam Speaker, another petition asks that Parliament expand further the Canadian Wheat Board's monopoly powers to include all grains and oilseeds, and a petition that strongly supports the Canadian Wheat Board's monopoly powers in marketing wheat and barley for export.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have another petition from constituents of Saskatoon—Dundurn wherein they ask that the unborn child's rights be protected by Parliament.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Morris Bodnar (Saskatoon—Dundurn, Lib.): Madam Speaker, this final petition opposes the amendment of the Canadian Human Rights Act to include the words sexual orientation, a term that is undefined.

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition calling on Parliament not to amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, would you be so kind as to call starred question No. 54.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Starred question No. 54.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I would ask that the answer to starred question No. 54 be printed in Hansard as if read due to its length.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Text]

Question No. 54—Mr. McClelland:

With respect to those individuals who have already been compensated by the Government of Canada because they contacted the HIV virus as a result of tainted blood transfusions, (a) what is the government's policy concerning the spouses of individuals with HIV and (b) is the government considering compensation for the spouses who unknowingly contracted HIV from their partners?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health): The question of including HIV–infected spouses was given very serious consideration by the government at the time the extraordinary assistance plan was being developed. The terms of reference of the plan remain unchanged.

Only those directly infected with HIV as a result of having received contaminated blood are eligible for assistance but spouses of such persons are ineligible.

The plan was developed in consultation with the Canadian Hemophilia Society and representatives of non–hemophiliac HIV–infected blood transfusion recipients. The plan, which provides $120,000 tax free, is an exceptional response by the federal government.

When the government established the amount payable, it did take into consideration factors such as support of spouses and children. At this time no compensation for spouses is contemplated by the government.

In addition to the assistance already provided by the federal government, a multi–provincial and territorial assistance program was announced in September 1993. It provides financial assistance for life for the person directly infected as well as assistance for spouses and children.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would ask that the notice of motion for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

DEPARTMENT OF INDUSTRY ACT

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.) moved that Bill C–46, an act to establish the Department of Industry and to amend and repeal certain other acts, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. David Berger (Saint–Henri—Westmount, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am glad to have the attention of the minister while I speak and I thank him for being here. I am also happy to see that the spokespersons are here for the opposition parties.

[Translation]

I am pleased to participate in the debate at third reading of the bill to establish the Department of Industry. Those who have followed the debate know that this bill concerns the organization of the Department of Industry. The minister and the department have been given a broad mandate: industry, science and technology, consumer and commercial affairs, communications and investment. All are brought together under the responsibility of a single department and a single minister.

• (1535)

The bill, as I was saying, concerns the organization of the department and the responsibilities it has been given. It is a housekeeping bill, if I may use that expression.

It is perhaps more important to know what the department will be doing. What is the minister's vision with respect to economic development? He made an important statement earlier this week that answers this question and gives us an idea of where he is headed. In his statement, he says that the government does not accept that Canadians must choose between high unemployment and stagnation of their incomes. Nor does Canada want to accept the American approach of low unemployment and a large number of low–paying jobs. But neither do we want to adopt the European approach, which is characterized by a relatively low number of low–paying jobs and a rate of unemployment that is chronically very high. The government believes that we can move forward on both fronts, employment and income, at the same time. In other words, the government would like to create good jobs that pay well. This is an objective to which all Canadians would give their approval. But you will agree that it is not so easy to put into practice.

In his statement, the minister observed that although Canada is a large trading nation, it has not yet acquired a large trading mentality, particular with respect to small and medium size business.

The report of the Special Joint Committee reviewing Canada's Foreign Policy, which was also tabled in the House a few weeks ago, is even blunter. It reads: "Canada is a trading nation but has not yet proved itself to be a nation of traders".

We are reminded in this report that only one in ten Canadian manufacturing companies exports and that automotive, natural and energy resources trade account for three quarters of our total exports. The picture is brighter for trade in services and high–tech products, but 25 per cent of total trade in these industries is done within three companies. Furthermore, exports to the rest of the world, outside North America, account for less than 10 per cent of our exports.

In short, the natural resource industry is doing well. It has its ups and downs, but for the time being, it is doing well. The current price of resources on the world markets is high. The automotive and automotive products industry is also faring well, in southwestern Ontario in particular, but in Sainte–Thérèse, Quebec, as well. While high technology is somewhat successful, we have a substantial trade deficit in that area. This means that we import far more high–tech products than we export.

• (1540)

To sum up, we have not managed to put in place the fully developed structure of an industrial economy. As everyone knows, the wealth of Canada comes mostly from its natural resources. So, if we want to get somewhere, we need to know where we stand so as to determine where we need to go from here.

I think that we will also have to take a realistic view of the role of small and medium size businesses in the Canadian economy.

[English]

While it is true that many jobs have been created by small and medium size businesses over the last 10 years, they are not the be all and end all of our economy. Many small and medium size businesses exist because of the existence of large companies. They are suppliers to these large companies.

Second, as I have already noted, few Canadian small and medium size businesses are exporters. Small and medium size businesses contribute only 9 per cent of total exports and less than 8 per cent of manufacturing exports.

Third, the contribution of small and medium size businesses to manufacturing in Canada is anaemic. In 1990 manufacturing firms with less than 100 employees were responsible for only 32 per cent of manufacturing employment.

In Japan I understand that small and medium size businesses account for 75 per cent of manufacturing employment. That is quite a difference, 32 per cent in Canada of manufacturing employment accounted for by small and medium size businesses versus 75 per cent, over twice the proportion in Japan.

In the report that the industry committee tabled several weeks ago on financing small and medium size businesses, we referred to the role of such businesses in today's economy. We referred to the significance of these businesses. We remarked that globalization requires a rapid response capability in design, production, marketing and other activities. We added that flexibility, innovation and technological capability are critical. This applies to all firms regardless of their research intensity or the nature of their product. It applies just as well to firms in the traditional sectors of our economy.

As a result, finely subdivided, highly specialized linear production processes are no longer advantageous and the large, traditionally structured firms do not achieve the best results. We noted that small, knowledge intensive firms are moving into the vacuum.

However, we noted that in Canada we have few new competitors. New competitors are the firms which are characterized by managerial and technological capability, by flexibility in their production processes, by the emphasis that they place on developing and nurturing their human resources. We need more new competitors if we wish to maintain our high standard of living.

The industry committee made a number of recommendations which relate to such new competitors, to those Canadian firms that have set themselves national and international goals. Our whole focus on venture capital is the solution only for firms with growth potential. Therefore, our focus on venture capital is directed to those firms.

• (1545)

We also made, for example, a recommendation that the government establish a limited working capital guarantee for small and medium size business exporters, again because of the importance of exports to our economy and because of the fact, as I mentioned earlier, that so few Canadian businesses and small and medium size businesses are exporters.

[Translation]

Recently, two young men came to my riding office and asked me to help them find work here in Canada. They are both doctoral students in the same field, engineering. One of them wants to do research in robotics. They approached me independently a few months apart. One came to see me in September, perhaps, and the other more recently, in October. By coincidence, one of these students is from Saint–Henri and the other from Westmount, the two parts that make up my riding. I must say that the riding also covers all of downtown Montreal, but those are two important parts of my riding.

These two young men applied to the Canadian Space Agency, but unfortunately opportunities are limited now. They have looked all over. They applied for work in the private sector, in Quebec and elsewhere in Canada. Unfortunately, they have not had the desired success. One of these young men recently accepted a job in Philadelphia and I was told that the other might go to Detroit.

I was told that many of their engineering classmates from Concordia and McGill universities had to go to work in the United States.

I firmly believe that the Canadian government is on the right track by emphasizing employment and growth. However, it is regrettable that the Government of Quebec does not have the same priorities. Once again, we will waste so much energy debating existential questions instead of dealing with the real needs of Quebecers.

The Canadian government must stay the course. We must continue to emphasize the economy and growth with the policies which have been announced since the last election, following the direction taken by the industry committee and with the same priority for growth and jobs that underlies and is in fact the main theme of the action plan tabled this week by the Minister of Industry.

• (1550)

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Madam Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take part in this third reading debate on Bill C–46. Since my colleague for Saint–Henri—Westmount said that Quebec is a province, a region that cares more about existential issues than about job development, I rise to examine sections of this bill which provide precisely for job creation and development.

At this third reading stage, I would like to go into the details of the regional development concept. I want to base my speech on two distinct approaches, which are the key factors of the regional development problem in Quebec.

The dynamic policies of regional development in Canada are based on the concepts of growth and development. Both these concepts continually bring the central government in Ottawa into conflict with Quebec and its regions: it is the Quebec government versus the centralizing Canadian federation.

Let us ask ourselves what regional development is really about. First of all, let me remind the House that Canada is composed of four main regions: the West, Ontario and Quebec, in the heart of the country, and the Atlantic Provinces. Each of these four regions has its minister responsible for regional development. What should be examined is the impact the concepts of economic growth and development have.

In its 1989 report on social and demographic development, the social affairs council describes its approach as follows: "Growth is a quantitative measure of the increase in a society's wealth." That is how the increase in the gross domestic product per capita, for example, is presented. "Development implies a kind of growth that does not create inequality and is aimed at giving all individuals, wherever they live, the same opportunities for fulfilment." This is a major difference between the two concepts of growth and development.

In this perspective, regional development originates in each of Quebec's regions and is based on a dynamic of balanced economic growth among the regions. The member for Saint–Henri—Westmount knows Quebec very well. He knows that there are sixteen regions and that regional development means a balance among these regions. This notion of development versus growth underscores the federal government's approach with regard to regional development.

Indeed, given how all the federal government's regional development policies have evolued over the last 40 years, one can say objectively that the federal system has favoured growth as measured by economic output over development and the structural changes it involves.

The economic dimension, that is favouring a particular area or industrial region in order to stimulate Canada's gross domestic product, is clearly given priority over the structural dimension in most of what the federal government does in the regions. This approach, this federal involvement in regional development, will have an extremely detrimental effect in the long run on the development of our regions, in Quebec. That is the point I want to make.

I would like to start by reviewing a number of Quebec's demographic characteristics tied in with the economic problems faced by peripheral regions. Let us keep in mind that Quebec's share of Canada's population has been eroding steadily, down from 30 per cent at the beginning of the century to 25.8 per cent in 1986. The problem in Quebec is due mainly to the acceleration this trend. It took exactly 70 years from 1901 to 1971, for its share of the total population to decline two points but a mere 15, from 1971 to 1986, to drop two more.

• (1555)

In the regions, it has dramatic effects and the federal government's regional development policies are partly responsible. In Quebec, more communities are loosing population than growing. In Quebec, more regions are declining than growing.

Between 1971 and 1986, the number of young people in communities with declining populations fell by 43 per cent and that of adults by 9.5 per cent, while the number of seniors increased by 24 per cent.

Over the same period, in communities with growing populations, however, the number of young people remained more or less the same, while the adult population of childbearing age increased by 49 per cent. This means that when they leave their community, young adults take with them their reproductive potential, causing a further decrease in the birth rate.

The communities, mostly in peripheral regions, that experienced a substantial decline in population between 1971 and 1986 are also those with the highest rate of unemployment. Basically, a decline in population spells social problems.

In April 1994, for example, the rate of unemployment in the Gaspé and the Magdalen Islands was 27 per cent; in the Lower St. Lawrence region, 17 per cent; in Saguenay—Lac–Saint–Jean, 15 per cent; in the Laurentians, 16 per cent; in Lanaudière, 16 per cent. An analysis of rural depopulation over a 15–year period shows that people are moving to major centres of economic growth with significant impact on Canada's Gross Domestic Product, which determines smaller communities and regional development in Quebec.

This is demonstrated by a historical overview of federal involvement in Quebec's regional development and the impact of these policies on Quebec's dynamics in this area.

In the 1960s, despite some valid initiatives, federal efforts as a whole lacked a global development strategy and co–ordination among the various departments involved. The departments operated sector by sector, each pursuing their own goals, without co–ordinating their actions regionally and correcting regional disparities. In the early 1990s, this attitude became a trademark of the federal government's regional development efforts in Quebec.

The Liberal government's current dismantling of VIA Rail networks in the regions shows that this Crown corporation did not receive the mandate to promote Quebec's regional development. There is only one criterion: profitability and economic growth and not regional development and people's well–being.

Such an attitude to regional development threaten the infrastructure of outlying areas, speeds up the depopulation of outlying municipalities and aggravates regional underdevelopment.

Let me give you another example: The disappearance of local post offices and of some local CBC TV stations shows the same disregard for regional development and the priority given by Ottawa to profitability and sectoral economic growth. There is a lack of global vision. They are busy saving the furniture while the house is burning down.

In the late 1960s and early 1970s, the need to co–ordinate the federal government's regional development initiatives in Quebec led to the creation of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. The department focused its efforts on several economic growth centres, hoping that their development would extend to disadvantaged regions.

At the same time, the Higgins–Martin–Raynauld report commissioned by the department, on which the federal government's new regional development policies are based in part, concluded that Quebec's economic difficulties lie in the weakness of its only growth centre, Montreal.

• (1600)

The purpose of the study which led to this report was to define the main development objectives for the province of Quebec, simply from the perspective of territorial development. What this report has to say about the approach to development is important. It says that growth centres have an attractive force that drains human, financial and managerial resources from the outlying regions and that this process feeds on itself. The policy is to invest in the major centre and bring people, money and resources in from the outlying areas. Some kind of development! How can you be more centralizing?

Further on, the report says that no territory can become a development centre unless it was first a satellite—so it must have grown—and that being a satellite should have no pejorative connotation because it is the only way to strengthen a territory's competitiveness. That is the federal approach, philosophy and thesis for developing Quebec.

Further on, the report says in the same vein that much more important today are the innovations related to technological progress, concentrated in the relatively large and dynamic cities which are the centres of development. As far as this report is concerned, and it remains an important document in the evolution of federal policies and of the Liberal philosophy of regional development, even though the report is old, Quebec's economic future will be mainly determined by the competitive position of Montreal compared to the economic space dominated by Toronto and other regions dominated by big cities elsewhere in the world.

Unfortunately, the Government of Quebec is just as ignorant about some outlying communities and at times even denied their existence.

Influenced by the liberal line of thought which promotes megaprojects and seeks to build momentum for economic growth, sometimes by expanding large urban centres, the Quebec government decided, in the mid–sixties, to concentrate in regional centres the public services provided by various institutions, so as to reinforce the natural poles of economic attraction. At that time, a Liberal government was in office in Ottawa, while another Liberal government was controlling Quebec's destiny. The growth of Quebec cities over the last 15 to 20 years would have been stronger without this concentration of public services in natural poles of economic attraction.

Unlike communities which did not provide such services and which experienced a decrease in population, the centres offering these services experienced a population increase. So, the development of some 16 Quebec regions, that is the structural planning of fringe areas, necessarily included the setting up of important services, as well as the development of a stable economic infrastructure adapted to the need of the community for a dynamic economic activity of its own, generated by local people instead of being subjected to the remote interests of a centralizing pole.

Again, the influence of this liberal and centralizing federalism is responsible for the delicate situation of most remote regions in Quebec, as well as for their demographic and socio-economic underdevelopment.

The seventies saw the emergence of general development agreements between Canada and Quebec, the second generation of ERDAs which, incidentally, will expire a week from today, on December 14. However, these agreements all suffer from the same deficiency, that is the lack of a development policy based on eliminating the structural problems which impede regional growth. This problem is an inherent part of the federal regime, which helps maintain and even increase regional disparity, and which also jeopardizes the evolution and the survival of a whole nation.

The unilateral patriation of the Constitution in 1982 was, to a degree, a form of federal interference in regional development.

• (1605)

This was undemocratic, since Quebec has yet to endorse the Constitutional Act of 1982. It was a show of force against Quebec, by the federal Liberals and their friends from the other Canadian provinces, to increase, among other things, the federal spending power in Quebec, so as to control its regional economic development. In the eighties, Ottawa increased its interference in regional development matters, thus showing more clearly than ever its enormous potential for developing parallel structures and for generating duplication, which costs Canadians and Quebecers dearly, and which also accounts for their indebtedness.

This disastrous federal policy on regional development in Quebec continues to apply. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion was replaced by the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion. They are very good at inventing new structures and duplicating what has already been done. DRIE was to focus industrial policy on economic growth strategies. Unfortunately, and this was to be expected, the department was dominated by sectoral concerns, so that industrial development got more money than regional development.

Today, legislation to establish the Department of Industry is about to be adopted. We are now on third reading. Bill C–46 provides that the Department of Industry has the power to "initiate, recommend, co–ordinate, direct, promote and implement programs and projects in relation to regional economic development in Quebec". In other words, the department will go on investing and having an impact on regional development in Quebec, but its activities will not be part of a comprehensive approach to deal with the structural problems of the regions.

The federal government should withdraw from regional development in Quebec, since it tends to ignore the process for the development of regional structures, initiated by Quebec and its regions through its regional county municipalities, its regional development secretariat and its regional economic development councils. As a result, the federal government has a negative impact on regional development in Quebec and on the general development of Quebec's potential.

In Bill C–46, the federal Liberal government has irresponsibly ignored Quebec's clear–cut and traditional claim to sole jurisdiction over regional development. Furthermore, with its total lack of concern about duplication and overlap, the federal Liberal Party helps waste public funds, and it has done so by creating and putting in place structures that Quebec has already had for more than 20 years.

The approach taken by the federal Liberal government, with its two–fold obsession with developing the industrial centres of Quebec's metropolitan areas while ignoring the rest of the province, and with spreading the federal centralist gospel right and left, without a co–ordinating policy, has not only proved to be disastrous for the development of the regions but in many cases has been an obstacle to Quebec's attempts to decentralize socio–economic responsibilities to the regions.

As a distinct society, Quebec has a creative and innovative potential for regional development that, in terms of its perspective and emphasis on long–term solutions, goes well beyond anything the federal government has been able to do in the West, Ontario, Quebec or the Maritimes with its regional development policies.

In response to invasive federal policies and intent on saving Quebec society from regional underdevelopment and eventual cultural assimilation, since the two go together, in 1979 Quebec passed the Act respecting land use planning and development, Bill 125, and created regional county municipalities. These regional centres were to become a vehicle for involvement at the grass roots level.

In Quebec, decentralization of decision–making powers, together with a planning approach that differed substantially from the federal government's growth policies, were subsequently seen as essential components of a regional policy for the year 2000.

• (1610)

At the same time, in an unprecedented spirit of planning and development, the Government of Quebec divided its territory into 16 administrative regions. These are strategically important to Quebec. They are based on geographic, economic, industrial and cultural components in which we find the only real actors responsible for Quebec's development. And this is something that the federal government cannot and does not want to understand, because acceptance of the principle of decentralization is fundamentally at odds with the federal Liberals' idea of centralization that has come straight from Trudeau.

Regional county municipalities, or RCMs, are groupings of municipalities with a combination of economic, cultural and social activities reflecting their proximity, and the movement of people to the places where they work and live. Administrative regions have called upon these RCMs to define development thrusts setting forth the whole range of problems being experienced by these regions with respect to employment, and social, educational and cultural development.

These diagnoses were used to develop a strategic plan for each RCM. The government in power must listen to and recognize the work already accomplished through the expenditure of public money, and the investment of resources and skills.

Take the example of the Eastern Townships, a region that includes seven RCMs. These local bodies analysed and pooled their strategic development plans, and then gave priority to the major development thrusts and development projects, in line with the regional decentralization policy of the Quebec government.

These priorities, which are determined by the particular environment, reveal areas where correction is required, where development is indicated. Thus, by promoting the development of human resources, training and manpower, research, technological development and the linkage of businesses, the decisions made locally have an influence on the economic development of the whole country.

We have to go back to the real make–up of the country, beyond the administrative regions, and focus on the sub–regions and the local communities, assess successes and failures and rethink development. That is what the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois have being working on in their joint plan for a sovereign Quebec. Regional economic development must be coupled with a social development policy to provide every citizen with an equal opportunity to achieve their full potential in a healthy and challenging environment, wherever they live in this huge area. A growing majority of Quebec players, we hope, will be able to pull along in their wake all of Quebec, and Quebec society, through its regional players, fully supports the decentralization proposal put forward by the new Quebec government.

So, at the third reading stage of Bill C–46, the Bloc Quebecois, the Official Opposition, objects to the domination exercised by the Department of Industry and the powers assigned to the minister, relating to regional development in Quebec. We definitely denounce the new powers and duties of the Minister of Industry to formulate and implement policies, plans and integrated federal approaches in Quebec, as stated in Clause 9(a) of the bill.

We also denounce the power to lead and co–ordinate the activities of the government of Canada in establishing co–operative relationships between various agencies of the government of Canada and Quebec. The government has the gall to have the legislation provide that the minister may deal directly with certain bodies in Quebec, going over the head of the Quebec government and National Assembly, and going as far as identifying municipal bodies, which come under provincial jurisdiction. Incredible!

This bill shows how stupid and wasteful it is to want to interfere like that, further compounding duplication and overlap.

• (1615)

Essentially, Bill C–46 reflects the federal government's resolve to take over regional development in Quebec and set it in a Canadian perspective of economic growth and efforts to bring the federal deficit down, a perspective that greatly hinders the enfranchisement and development of the people of Quebec.

The only option acceptable to us is the structural development of our regions through the decentralization program developed by the new government of Quebec. It is therefore by leaving the current federal system that we will achieve our goal as a society, a society destined to really develop structurally, all over its territory, and one looking towards the next century and open to the world.

The Official Opposition's position on this bill is no to the federal government and yes to Quebec.

Mr. David Berger (Saint–Henri—Westmount, Lib.): On a point of order, Madam Speaker, I wonder if there would be unanimous consent to let me ask the member a short question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Mr. Berger: Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the member how he can speak on industry for about 30 minutes without even mentioning small and medium size businesses or even mentioning the word business.

His whole speech concerned the administrative structure. Does he not recognize that the Government of Quebec is quite free to structure itself as it wants, to create regional county municipalities, which have already existed for many years under the federal system, to set up its own decentralization plan, to plan as it wants? The federal government has absolutely nothing to do with these internal decisions of a province.

Does he not admit either that almost all government subsidies were or will be abolished for budgetary reasons and because we recognize that these subsidies are ineffective?

Once again, I am amazed that his speech dealt only with the administrative structure and that he did not even mention business; his speech was almost a Marxist treatise. His approach contrasts sharply with what the Minister of Industry said here earlier this week, when he said that the Canadian government recognizes that it is up to the private sector and not the government to create jobs. What the government can do, however, is to make the climate favorable for job creation by business.

I think that the member has absolutely no idea that it is business which creates jobs and not all the wonderful structures which he would like to set up.

Mr. Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe): Madam Speaker, I think that the hon. member was more interested in making comments than in asking a question.

At the beginning of his speech, the hon. member himself said that this was a housekeeping bill. This piece of legislation sets out the directions given by the minister with regard to the power to take action. I referred to the bill, to the powers the minister gives himself by addressing regional development directly without going through the National Assembly, by allowing himself to negotiate and deal directly with Quebec structures, including municipalities which come under provincial jurisdiction.

• (1620)

The basic question in this case is clearly one of jurisdiction; the bill determines federal jurisdiction over regional development. The hon. member knows full well that according to all analyses of the federal government's regional development initiatives in Quebec, results are quite negative compared to all regional development.

When Quebecers talk about business, they mean small business. The hon. member knows full well that Quebec's strategic plans also include everything that goes with it, all the structures needed to finance small business. He knows very well that Minister Paillé's latest program is a vigorous small–business support program aimed at helping Quebec entrepreneurs start their own businesses and create jobs, since we know that small businesses do create jobs.

Although the hon. member is well aware of that, he tried to insinuate that we were all talk and no action—since it took him a long time to put his questions, allow me, Madam Speaker, to respond to all the matters he raised. In my opinion, he merely showed that Quebec's regional development program is currently ahead of anything that the Department of Industry may suggest in this area.

I want to add that when talking about this—as the hon. member pointed out—we should try to define the real needs instead of raising existential questions. Is the hon. member willing to admit that to do so, we must start by asking those involved to define their real needs? Regional county municipalities, regional development councils and a regional development secretariat were put in place to define the real problems and needs of the regions, instead of commissioning Price Waterhouse to conduct various studies here and there.

Local people are defining their own needs. They developed strategic plans, and I remind the hon. member that the government itself has just produced a series of reports evaluating Quebec's regions when Quebec issued such reports just last year. This duplication of regional analysis is a waste of energy and public funds.

Quebec is capable of developing itself.

[English]

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to participate in the debate. I did not reckon to stand to debate this bill. I want to recognize the chairman of the Standing Committee on Industry with whom it was a pleasure to work during the last number of months. I look forward to continued work with him. There are times when we need to recognize good work that is being done.

We also want to recognize that this bill is probably one of the most significant pieces of legislation that has appeared before the House.

It has been interesting to watch the progress of the bill. I am pleased to acknowledge and to recognize that Reform was able to achieve certain amendments in committee. This shows there is a role for the opposition even though we do not have as much influence as we would like to have. However sometimes good sense does prevail and even the government side recognizes common sense.

It has been a pleasure to address the House on several occasions on different parts of this bill. To date, I have spoken more specifically to its particular aspects. This afternoon, I wish to look at certain other aspects. For example, I have spoken in the past about the need to curb the power of the minister to dispense public funds with impugnity, to intervene in the economy and to pick winners and losers.

I have spoken of the need to eliminate regional development as an economic tool of not only this minister and his department but of the government as a whole. I have spoken of the need to curb the powers of centralized economic planning that the bill imparts to the minister and to the cabinet. I have spoken about the disappointment, and even to this day, the lack of efficiencies realized in the amalgamation of the four departments that came together last year to form this new industry department.

• (1625)

I have spoken of the lack of vision that the bill represents because in reality it is nothing more than a rubber stamp of Tory policy set by Prime Minister Campbell last year.

I have spoken about the confusion created by having responsibility of aboriginal economic matters in this department and not in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I have spoken about the need to provide for interface between departments, for example with Heritage Canada and the Department of Communications.

I have spoken about the confusion over technical and spectromanagement and who is really in charge. I have spoken about Heritage Canada and neighbouring rights and the questions of overlap and jurisdiction.

I have spoken about this and more in the time I have had, only to scratch the surface. Today we will look at some of the fundamentals, the principles and the challenges that are involved with this department and the future that it faces.

Where are we now? Bill C–46 puts into effect the machinery for the new Department of Industry. In my opinion this is the most important department in government. Why? Because in effect it constitutes the engine that will bring about the economic growth and development of our country.

By that I mean it is the department that is directly responsible for shaping the way businesses, both large and small, function in our economy. The department is responsible for science and technology. It is responsible for directing research and development. It is responsible for shaping a good chunk of the regulatory field under which business operates. It is, in conjunction with the Department of Finance, responsible for establishing the banking environment, both public and private.

In short the department influences most of the important economic levers in Canada and for that reason I call it the most important department in government. It allows Canadians to achieve their most fundamental goals, that is the acquisition of food, shelter and clothing. It helps to structure the economy so that we can work to provide ourselves with these things.

Under the new law this department is both powerful and weak. It is powerful because the authority granted to the minister under the bill allows that minister the opportunity to intervene directly in the marketplace through various instruments and actually have the power to pick winners and losers.

It is powerful because of the financial consequences of some of its actions. It is powerful because of its control over small business through the various programs that are geared to that sector.

Yet under the bill the department is also a weak one. For example, the department has a very poor record of success when it comes to its more famous interventions on behalf of certain businesses and sectors, Canada's well known corporate welfare recipients such as Bombardier, de Havilland, SNC, MIL Davie, and others.

The department is weak because it has not been successful in achieving its goal of revitalizing regional economies through its regional development programs. It is weak because of the inefficient path it sets for science and technology investment. It is also weak because it has great difficulty resisting the urge to micromanage Canada's economy on a sector by sector basis.

It is also confusing in the number of responsibilities the department carries. May I just give a brief list of what some of those are. It is not a complete list.

Based on this bill and what is in the main estimates, this department is responsible for a variety of quasi and independent agencies and tribunals which include the following: the office of the federal chief negotiator, internal trade negotiations; the office of the chief scientist; the Canadian aboriginal economic development program; Canadian Workplace Automation Research Centre; the Defence industry productivity program; the Canada scholarships program; the Information Highway Advisory Council; the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology; the Industrial research assistance program; the remnants of Investment Canada; the Canadian Network for the Advancement of Research Industry and Education, commonly known as CANARIE; the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council; the Federal Office of the Regional Development—Quebec, which requires an order in council to pass these responsibilities to yet another minister, the Minister of Finance; regional development in northern Ontario under FEDNOR; the network of centres of excellence, the National Research Council; the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council; the Standards Council of Canada; the Canadian Space Agency; the Communications Research Centre; Statistics Canada; Emergency Preparedness Canada; the Bureau of Competition; the Copyright Board of Canada; and more. It is pretty clear from this admittedly incomplete list that the minister has a wide range of responsibilities which makes it difficult for the department to develop and keep a clear focus.

• (1630)

What is the bottom line? The bottom line is a challenge to create a Department of Industry for the end of the nineties and into the next century that is efficient; that makes the right decisions for the economy when needed; that is administratively sound; that is co–ordinated properly and carefully with a concerted focus on providing the best service for the least cost as its private sector clients are required to do; and most important and above all, that is fiscally responsible and uses available dollars in a way that produces maximum possible return for the taxpayer while exposing that same taxpayer to the minimum possible risk.

This fiscal emphasis must recognize the fundamental tenet that the marketplace is the best equipped to do something and to help business operate. The marketplace should be allowed to proceed without undue interference from government.

In short, the role of government should be to set the department in such a position that its mandate is to establish and maintain a culture which rewards entrepreneurship, innovation and research, and that it ensures a level, competitive and honest marketplace. That is the way in which the department should be organized.

Where do we go from here? In terms of small business we should recognize that it is probably the single most important sector in the Canadian economy. Why? It is because it creates the lion's share of new jobs in the country. We all know that when people are working, the country and taxpayers benefit most.

The government's approach to small business should be based on sound fundamental principles. The government's own recently published paper by its small business working committee stated a set of principles for growing small businesses. It said that the government should have the following priorities.

The government should be removed from the market to let it function freely rather than seek to influence or distort it. The government should restrict its own activities to fulfilling gaps not currently served by the private sector. It should do so on a temporary basis until the private sector can take over. It should redesign the taxation system as a vehicle for economic development rather than its current narrow role as a generator of tax revenues. It should focus on helping small businesses access the information and intelligence they require. These are four very significant foundation setting principles given to the government by one of its own committees.

I have spoken before in the House about the report of the Standing Committee on Industry entitled "Taking Care of Small Business" in which the government could find much in the way of directing its activities to actually influence our economy to reach the goals that need to be reached.

I focus now on the other sector of business, large business. Government can rely on the same principle enunciated just a moment ago. I would encourage government to refrain from undue interference through grants, contributions, subsidies and bail outs of large and small businesses.

It may seem harsh to some on the government benches, but if the free market decides that a company should fail as a result of its own activities then the government has no business intervening to save it. It is just that simple.

We have too many examples of corporate welfare in Canada which highlight how wrong a policy of intervention can be. Certain names in the corporate community are synonymous with government largesse. For this past taxation year alone, based on the public accounts, we are reminded of how extensive the problem is. I want to give some examples.

• (1635)

Bombardier received from the federal government a little over $21 million; SNC Lavalin received over $1 million; Boeing received $3.7 million; Litton Systems, over $4 million; Pratt & Whitney, $36 million; Canadian Marconi, $10,750,000; Apotex Pharmaceuticals, $3.3 million; and de Havilland, $81,350,000. That is just a short list; the list goes on for pages. It is the tip of the iceberg and is only for last year.

It is easy to understand why companies would take advantage of government largesse. They would be crazy not to do so. If we are dumb enough to give it to them, they are smart enough to pick it up. The point is that government should not offer it in the first place.

Big business also must reverse its attitude that government's role is to pay to ensure its survival and must stop reinforcing that notion. A good product or service, a sound knowledge of the marketplace and an efficient business plan will ensure survival and jobs on a permanent or long term basis without an expenditure or burden on the taxpayer. Let the marketplace decide.

I focus now on the area of science and technology which requires a very significant and comprehensive overhaul. The Auditor General cited in his report this year how poorly the government had done with respect to spending $7 billion. He made several useful recommendations in this area.

He said that priorities needed to be established, including what is the need, what is the opportunity and what is the potential payback. This will require co–operation among all stakeholders. Overall performance must be monitored, according to the Auditor General, to measure success and provide a framework with indicators for that performance. When that is established the program can go ahead with some success.

Then he went on to say that our science and technology strategy should be appropriate, should be balanced and should be workable. He then said that parliamentarians—that is those of us in the House of Commons—have no basis under the present arrangement on which to assess whether the government's expenditures on science and technology reflect Canadian needs and opportunities and to hold the government accountable for results. Implementing his recommendations as soon as possible should therefore be a critical priority for the government.

These are some of the items that need to be looked at in terms of getting the department to work at the cutting edge of economic development in the next century.

Some members of the government respect and appreciate these approaches. The minister's parliamentary secretary, for example, is forward thinking in many ways. He is the leading proponent of some very positive changes in Canada's taxation system. His flat tax proposals have generated much interest with academics and economists alike. Many of my colleagues including myself on this side of the House find his ideas intriguing and worthy of considerable study with likely implementation. We hope he can convince his colleagues that it is the proper way to go.

In addition, there are two ministers for whom I have a lot of respect: the ministers of industry and finance. They both seem to have a good grasp of what needs to be done and what the direction should be for the future. I believe their personal philosophies tell them we cannot continue with business as usual. We require some radical shifts in our fundamentals. Unfortunately the two ministers appear to be having some difficulty with their cabinet colleagues, some of whom are still pursuing the thinking of the past that put us into the mess we are in today. This is reflected in the strategies released by them.

What is the government attempting to do now? I would like briefly to look at this point on a couple of fronts. First is the orange book that was delivered on Monday morning. The minister released the government's new industrial strategy in an orange coloured book. The report was praised by the Globe and Mail and others for its sound forward thinking principles. However many business groups have said that it is short on detail. The content seems to be based on the old thinking that we know does not work any more.

An example is the government's proposed increase in the ceiling for the loans it guarantees under the Small Businesses Loans Act. It is well known that some of the banks are using this program to grant loans to businesses that would otherwise qualify. That is not the purpose of the act.

If the free market were allowed to operate and prevail, as I have suggested, there would be no need for such a program. Businesses that were sound would be considered a secure risk by the banks and receive their loans. Those that were not would not get a loan and would not require the subsidy. This is as it should be. The government should not be encouraging the banks to lend by assuming most of the risk on the taxpayer's back rather than the operation of the market forces.

Banks in Canada show a profit of over $4 billion, referring to the big chartered banks, for this year. They should be accountable for the risks they make and not depend on the taxpayer to underwrite their small business loans.

Moreover the orange book fails to address the most pressing problem identified time and time again by businesses, that is the business of overbearing taxes. We are overburdened with taxes and that is true of business. The way to address the tax burden problem is to reduce spending which in turn will allow us to curtail the deficit, begin to deal with the debt and in turn reduce onerous tax levels, interest rates and the cost of doing business. That creates jobs.

If the government really wanted to lay out a comprehensive, coherent, industrial strategy for the coming century, it would focus its energy on creating a climate for entrepreneurship. It would create an environment in which the free market could work and would stay out of it to the greatest degree possible.

Some positives in the orange book include the government's commitment to reduce the paper burden, that is to get businesses off the government payroll and back working for themselves as they should be. The paper also recommends expanding our foreign trade horizons, a natural for building more business.

Now I come to the restructuring which was also a positive part of that book. The minister has indicated in the House that his department faces up to a 50 per cent reduction in its overall budget inside of the next two years. I wish him much success in his endeavour and will help in whatever way I can.

Coming back to the Auditor General, I have a few more words about what he said. The government spends $7 billion each year on science and technology research, $6 billion directly and $1 billion in tax credits. The Auditor General concluded that there was a lack of overall government–wide leadership, direction and focus on results and accountability for implementing desired changes. It is gone; it is not there. Then comes his most shattering statement. He said that Industry Canada, the department, was not well positioned to provide effective leadership among departments with science and technology responsibilities. That is the Auditor General's conclusion. I fail to see in this reorganization how that will be resolved.

The science and technology consultations that were conducted under the Department of Industry produced nothing but the regurgitation of the same problems identified 30 years ago. The orange book industrial strategy shifts the money around and increases the government's liability in favour of the banks. The reorganization was dreamed up by Kim Campbell and others. It does nothing to deal with the problems identified by the Auditor General.

In conclusion, I return to the principles enunciated earlier. We know the foundation needs to be an efficient, administratively sound and fiscally responsible department that encourages a sound environment so that business can build and support itself. Our science and technology policy must have an eye to the needs and opportunity for potential advancement.

I encourage the minister to move ahead with aggression, courage and success as he reduces his department, as he makes it fiscally responsible, and as he gives it the direction to meet the needs of business and the needs in terms of science and research so we will become the economic leader in North America that we could be. We have tremendous talent in our people. We have tremendous resources. This department could marshal the resources and bring it together so that all of us benefit. I wish him good luck and Godspeed.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Landry (Lotbinière, BQ): Madam Speaker, as the assistant to the Official Opposition critic on regional development, I am pleased to address Bill C–46.

Back on September 26, I had the opportunity to express my strong disagreement with this piece of legislation, since it does not recognize Quebec's jurisdiction over its regional development. That bill was unacceptable in its original form. Yet, this House rejected the amendments to clauses 8, 9 and 10 proposed by the opposition critic on regional development. These amendments read as follows:

> That Bill C–46 be amended by replacing, in Clause 8, line 23, in Clause 9, line 22, and in Clause 10, line 36, with the following:
> with the approval of the Lieutenant Governor in Council of Quebec where such powers, duties and functions relate to regional development in Quebec—

We simply asked that Quebec have control over its regional development. Who, if not Quebec, is in the best position to develop policies in that sector? Certainly not the federal Minister of Industry, although he could, through this legislation, have the authority to set up such policies and exercise control over Quebec's regional development.

The previous government wanted to streamline federal bureaucracy with this bill. The current government admits to looking for ways to eliminate duplication and overlap. Is it just paying lip service to the idea? It looks like it, since Bill C–46 would allow the federal government to intervene at will in Quebec.

This government is ignoring, or pretending to ignore, the efficient regional development programs which have been in place for a long time in Quebec. Incidentally, the new Quebec government has developed a dynamic regional development policy which will be implemented by the stakeholders and which takes into account the fact that trade liberalization eliminates trade barriers and exposes regional economies to stiff competition.

The Quebec government devised a new sharing of responsibility between itself and the regions, including the Quebec union of municipalities, as well as the Quebec union of regional county municipalities and local municipalities. As we have already explained to this House, RCMs will become decision–making centres for Quebec's socio–economic development. These RCMs will be designated as independent and multi–purpose political authorities.

Municipal councils will have to rely more on participation. Under the authority of the RCM's board, sectoral commissions will be delegated various powers, depending on the sector concerned. Regional delegates were appointed to provide direct liaison between the regions and the Premier.

The Quebec government also developed a sectoral development policy which puts the emphasis on the agri–food, fisheries, forestry, energy, recreation and tourism sectors. But what about the federal government? Has it demonstrated an ability to develop programs which take into account already existing provincial and regional policies? The answer is no, Madam Speaker.

No, because the federal government has never been able to reach a consensus where regional development is concerned. No, because the priorities of the Liberal government differ from those of the provinces and the regions. Let us decentralize the funding and the decision–making authority! Then, the regions would be able to develop according to their own priorities.

With this bill, the federal government is trying to control the economic development of Quebec. The government party is digging in its heels and the results are duplication and overlap.

People do not seem to understand the situation; either we have not been able to explain it to members opposite well enough or they are not listening. We all remember the three little monkeys: see no evil, hear no evil, speak no evil. The government is following the advice of the first two monkeys too closely; it should pay more attention to the third one. Several commissions have clearly stated in their reports that the federal government is impeding our regional development.

In its report, the interdepartmental working group on regional development, set up by the Quebec government in 1991, when the Liberals were in office, I might add, examined the issue of the proliferation of regional development initiatives.

• (1650)

The working group came to a very clear conclusion: confusion, duplication and overlap.

Confusion in terms of regional divisions: the federally defined regions do not match Quebec's administrative regions. Frequent confusion concerning regional officers, since there are too many government officers.

Duplication of structures: regional advisory bodies, economic development organizations, creation of program management committees to reconcile all the various types of initiatives.

Duplication that leads to operating costs that are high compared to the amount of money actually spent on development.

The Bélanger–Campeau Commission, also established by Quebec's former Liberal government, draws conclusions that are equally clear. If Quebec assumed responsibility for existing federal programs without any reduction in services, there would be annual savings of $289 million in spending related to the collection of customs duties and taxes, $250 million in manpower and $233 million in transportation and communication costs.

A study indicates that 67 per cent of federal programs overlap provincial programs to some extent. This study, conducted by Germain Julien and Marcel Proulx, tells us that overlap accounts for 65 per cent of government spending, excluding the public debt and unemployment insurance. This represents $67.5 billion and 45 per cent of personnel or 114,000 full–time employees for 1991 and 1992.

What is the origin of this overlap? Seventy–six per cent is attributable to the authority to legislate in shared areas and 24 per cent to federal spending power in areas under provincial jurisdiction.

We know all too well the consequences of these overlapping programs: increased cost of government action when it would be more economical to give one government exclusive responsibility for services provided at both levels.

Redundancy in programs: irrational use of personnel and equipment by both levels for similar activities.

The exorbitant cost of co–ordination: officials meet hundreds of times a year to check whether they are offering the same services, to harmonize program objectives and to ensure they are compatible.

Reduced effectiveness of government measures: how many times have we seen measures that are put in place by two levels of government cancel each other out for lack of consensus on objectives and priorities. Of course, no one wants to make concessions.

An additional burden on the target population, which has trouble finding its way through the labyrinth of government programs, especially when there is duplication.

Turf wars that make governments act irresponsibly. And who pays for all this? The taxpayer.

In spite of these factors, the Liberal government insists on passing legislation like Bill C–46 which dismisses out of hand Quebec's policies on regional development. The government says that it wants to eliminate duplication and overlap and then introduces a bill in which it maintains its hold on regional development.

Unlike Quebec, the federal government does not consult but implements policies from coast to coast. Consider the changes made within the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec. The new focus targets four areas: exports, new technologies, entrepreneurship and catalyst projects. According to the government, that is what the directors of SMEs want.

However, every region has to identify its own priorities. In our region for instance, these include tourism and culture. It will not be easy to get approval for these projects, since proposals for a cultural centre in my own riding have just been turned down. The federal government refuses to consider the specific needs of each region. We have developed instruments, including the CRD, the Conseil régional de développement, to promote regional priorities. The government could have consulted to harmonize its actions.

• (1655)

All this duplication and overlap is very costly. Why should we believe today that the Department of Industry will be able to reduce waste? When reading Bill C–46, I see, like everybody else in this chamber, that it maintains the status quo—an expression dear to the Prime Minister—between the mandates and the grouped departments.

Quebec's demand for exclusive jurisdiction over regional development is nothing new. Since the Quiet Revolution, it has been constantly restated. These are not whims, contrary to what the Prime Minister said. Since then, Quebec has had governments of every political stripe, but its demands have remained the same. Federal interference is still ubiquitous, and the regions are no better off as a result.

Let us recall why the Department of Regional Industrial Expansion disappeared in 1987: the regions were not involved in the funding request development and review process. The money that could have been used to fund excellent projects was instead given to useless ones. Industrial development was favoured at the expense of regional development. Since then, we have been living the same nightmare. If the federal government believes its general agreements have improved the situation, it is quite wrong. There may be no complaint from western Canada and the Maritimes which received $630 million and $1.2 billion respectively, whereas Quebec received $165 million. Is this fair? Regions can and must do more than simply supply domestic and foreign markets with raw materials.

It is the processing industries which create jobs and develop local resources. If we do not look after them, regions become more and more dependent. The federal government refuses to acknowledge that its approach to regional development are wrong. Yet, studies clearly show that the economic base is eroding, the social fabric is unravelling, the depopulation of rural areas is continuing, and young people are moving out of the regions.

All Ottawa is doing is regionalizing its operations by setting up regional structures. It might increase visibility, but it certainly does not improve efficiency. As we already said, federal interference causes duplication and inconsistency. The result is an administrative mess which slows down economic development in the regions and makes them the big losers.

The federal government's scope is so broad that it cannot correctly target the particular needs of a given region. As far as we can tell, FORD–Q is not free to make its action fit any total vision of local development.

It would be so simple for the government to promise to accept the priorities set by the regions, in order to maximize the impact of measures initiated by regional leaders in Quebec. Going along with the priorities set by the regions is one thing, having a third party role in the financing of regional development projects is another.

On this point, the rise in administrative costs and the squabbles with the provinces should convince the federal government that duplication between the two levels of government is damaging. This is why we insist so much on the need to decentralize budgets and decision–making. The future of the regions lies in the decentralization of power towards regional decision centres.

The government is not proposing anything to redress the imbalance in funding. While federal regional development funding has increased 50 per cent in Quebec since 1983, it jumped 300 per cent in the West and 250 per cent in the Maritimes.

• (1700)

Based on figures from the Federal Office for Regional Development—Quebec itself, the federal input in regional development is inequitable. Quebec's per capita share is $230, compared to $240 in Western Canada and $920 in Atlantic Canada.

Master agreements were mentioned earlier. The per capita results are catastrophic for Quebec in that regard as well, with $64 spent in Quebec in 1987, compared to $431 in Atlantic Canada and $259 in Western Canada.

The government could restore equity by cutting expenditures, as the Auditor General said, by eliminating tax breaks such as family trusts and the waste from duplication and overlap caused mostly by infringing on provincial jurisdictions, as mentioned earlier.

What would these billions of dollars be used for, Madam Speaker? This money could be used to restore equity in the amounts received by Quebec from the federal government for regional development. Quebec does not want its regional development to be built only on an industrial vision dictated by the Department of Industry in Ottawa.

Quebec has had its fill of inconsistent federal initiatives and policies. Why is it that the Quebec government has realized that the regional stakeholders are the only ones who grasp the real needs of their respective regions and the people across the way have not?

This bill is far from putting to rest the concerns that regional development organizations and all stakeholders have. The government must change course. We want Quebec to have exclusive control over the development of its regions.

We want to repatriate, in the form of tax points, the budget allocated to local development. We want decision–making and spending powers to be decentralized to the regions. This is a must for the economic development of Quebec. It is also a major component of our people's plans for sovereignty.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for London—Middlesex—Refugees; the hon. member for Mackenzie—Canadian Wheat Board; the hon. member for Berthier—Montcalm—Bovine somatotropin.

[Translation]

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to the speech delivered by the Bloc member for Lotbinière, which was full of statistics—my congratulations to your researchers.

I find it very hard to understand logically how one can make such a wide–ranging speech in the House while demonstrating to this House that there is a lack of logic in Quebec on the subject of duplication.

The regional county municipalities that were created in Quebec in the last decade add another level of government, thus increasing administration and other costs and generating inefficiency. They then tell us that duplication must be reduced.

On the other hand, I agree that in the last nine years, the hon. member may have felt that the previous government did not look favourably on Quebec's demands.

• (1705)

Naturally, since our government's first year in power, we put in place a process to eliminate duplication. We said that before asking, or requiring each province to put its house in order, the federal government would start by putting its own house in order, thus eliminating duplication in all the various departments. The process is well under way. Public consultations on industry, finance and social programs were held at all levels before we started putting our house in order.

I also find it a pity that the member for Lotbinière does not admit that maybe Quebec should eliminate duplication among levels of government which may not meet the needs of small communities. We know that normally, the larger communities in a group or collection steer the ship.

The member also raised a very interesting point, that the federal government should withdraw from provincial jurisdiction, and he mentioned forestry, for example. Today, there is a very interesting article in which the president of the Quebec farmers' union, the UPA, demands that the federal government not withdraw from programs that subsidize agriculture in Quebec.

So are people talking to each other in Quebec? Are you members from Quebec listening to what your constituents are asking for, like continued federal participation in programs?

Considering the various federal programs which assist development in Quebec, I think that the member's speech should seriously be revised because it is quite illogical.

Something else you mentioned—

Mr. Landry: Ask the question.

Mrs. Ringuette-Maltais: You will have your question. You had your speech, so I will ask my question.

He said that processing industries are a priority for the regions. I agree, but if the primary industry for developing natural resources in these regions is not a priority in the first place, how can you develop a manufacturing industry in that field?

So the question is this: How can the member, in concluding his speech, ask for a transfer of tax points, when yesterday he wanted to withdraw completely from this beautiful country?

Mr. Landry: Madam Speaker, how much time do I have left to answer? I would like to know before answering—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): You have five minutes left.

Mr. Landry: Thank you.

I am very pleased to give an answer to the hon. member. First, I want to thank her for confirming that my figures are accurate. I might add that she could not have said that they were not. In any case, I am very pleased because it confirms that we are telling the truth.

I could mention other examples, other incidents which have occurred in the context of the federal government versus Quebec or the United States. I agree that we have a free trade arrangement, but still. Earlier, I referred to the Federal Office of Regional Development. Where did it invest in industry? It invested many hundreds of thousands of dollars. Some people asked me not to raise this issue. The office invested hundreds of thousands of dollars in a given Quebec industry, yet the federal government simply turns around and, for a comparable or similar price, buys in the United States.

• (1710)

I can tell you about this issue because I was involved in it. I said: Wait a minute; did this industry have an opportunity to bid? We are talking about a Quebec industry from my region, in which the federal government invested—listen to this—hundreds of thousands of dollars for research and development. If the federal government does not buy in Quebec but buys elsewhere in Canada, I say fine.

These are examples of duplication and mismanagement. I am telling you about what I know to be true, about what is really going on. The figures I mentioned are the actual figures.

I want to say something further about the industrial situation. In my riding, we have what is called BDCs, business development centres, which can also be found, I am sure, in other ridings as well. With $5,000, I can create a job. And if some people can deny this, I will listen to what they have to say, but I know that with $5,000, I can create one job. At the federal level, the infrastructure program needs $100,000 to create just one job. Did you hear that? With $5,000, I can create one job, but the federal government needs $100,000 in its infrastructure program to create just one job. This is quite a difference. In fact, it is a $95,000 difference to create just one job, since we go from $5,000 to $100,000. I thought I would just mention these figures.

Madam Speaker, you are indicating that I have two minutes left. I will take what time I have left to stress how important Bill C-46 is.

I do not want people to think that I criticize all the time. That is not my role. My role is to make suggestions, to ensure that there is some openness, but you, on the other side of the House, also need to show that you are open–minded. That is how we will be able to harmonize some of the various programs and initiatives.

The hon. member said earlier that I was very good at quoting statistics and that she could not deny these figures. I know she cannot deny them, I am not crazy!

Do you understand what we want? The hon. member recognized earlier that for the last nine years the situation has not been fair. I said so myself earlier. I always come back to the same example: it is important for a father with three or four children to treat them all equally. By treating his children fairly and equally, he avoids creating any type of quarrel.

I used some figures earlier. I understand what Quebec wants. I have seen other industries in Western Canada receiving millions of dollars in subsidies to gain access to Quebec's market, while Quebec's own industries were not receiving one penny for exactly the same products.

Madam Speaker, on the issue of fairness, let me give some advice: Render unto God what is God's and unto Caesar what is Caesar's, and everybody will be happy.

[English]

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to rise in this House today and speak to the third reading of Bill C–46, an act to establish the Department of Industry.

Given that this act gives the Minister of Industry powers relating to trade and commerce in Canada, consumer affairs, competition, and restraint of trade, it seems only appropriate to discuss a very major impediment to growth in the economy, the interprovincial trade barriers. This act gives jurisdiction to the industry minister to deal with the very serious situation that exists in trade between our provinces.

When Canada was created out of four British colonies in 1867, the founding Fathers of Confederation had one purpose in mind. They believed that if they united they could resist being pulled into the American sphere of influence and would retain their distinct cultural heritage.

There were two strategies to implement this which they saw as essential to resisting American pressures. The first was a unified military which could better defend the borders of Canada and which did so. The second was free trade between the provinces. It was believed that the free flow of goods and services would strengthen economic, political and cultural ties east to west instead of north to south. It is quite obvious in which strategy we failed to accomplish our objectives.

• (1715)

The fact is that trade in many goods between Canada and the U.S. today is freer and easier than the trade between provinces. For generations we have allowed the inefficiencies of small, protected regional markets in many goods and services to constrict the economy, hurt our political and cultural objectives and cost us jobs.

The United States is a good example of a country where wide open commerce between jurisdictions, negotiated and enforced by a national government has led to greater prosperity for the whole nation.

We are a trading nation and we have spent great energy concentrating on our external trading relationships which account for 25 per cent of our economy. The Americans count on exports for about 8 per cent of their economy yet they are a more prosperous nation. There is certainly a lesson for Canada in this. We must become much more focused on reducing barriers when it comes to domestic trade.

The Minister of Industry and the Prime Minister recently sat down with provincial counterparts to discuss eliminating some barriers. Unfortunately very little was agreed to and the status quo of small, inefficient and protected industries continues to reign.

A renewed effort is needed and if some parties are resistant to the movement the federal government should consider using some of its powers to force agreements into place. As the Prime Minister stated during the first ministers conference, thousands of new jobs will be created and this will benefit all Canadians regardless of region.

There is over $146 billion worth of trade happening between the provinces. There are also over 300 barriers to interprovincial trade in Canada and each one costs jobs, money, growth, and competitiveness. This has hurt the province of Ontario and indeed all Canadians directly. These barriers are a problem that can be solved. Even small improvements in reducing barriers can mean big gains for the country. It is time for us to get serious about dealing with them.

I am going to examine a few examples of barriers that exist to internal trade in Canada and the effect they have on Ontario and the country as a whole. The first barrier that comes to mind is one that has a large effect on employment in my riding.

There is a modern brewery in Simcoe Centre that employs hundreds of Canadians. Over the years this brewery could have employed more people, expanded its operations and become efficient enough to compete with major American brewers. This did not happen because its market has been restricted by trade walls enforced by provinces in an attempt to protect their local brewers. The protectionism that insulated and sustained these inefficient brewers for so long could now be the death of many of them.

International trade pressures are forcing small breweries out of business. Brewing is a $9.6 billion retail industry in Canada so even small reductions in production costs due to greater economies of scale will produce better prices for consumers in a much more competitive economy.

American brewers are gaining more and more access to our domestic beer market through the GATT, NAFTA and the free trade agreement. They will force out those who cannot compete. For example, a single brewery in Colorado Springs, Colorado produces all the beer under a particular label for the entire United States, a market of some 250 million people. How can we expect breweries that produce only enough product for a few million consumers to compete? It is extremely difficult to compete with that economy of scale.

Another barrier that may be less obvious to my constituents but affects them directly is the variation in provincial trucking regulations. Since each province has different size, weight, and licensing requirements there is a lowest common denominator that takes effect in interprovincial trucking. Truckers take a load that is the smaller and lighter of the two provinces' requirements and therefore a more expensive load. This ultimately hurts consumers who will have to pay more for the same products.

I believe that all Canadians wish to see this type of waste done away with and receive the most efficient and economic value possible for their hard–earned wages.

A barrier of major importance that must be dealt with quickly is the barrier each province erects when conducting its own government procurement. The provinces have a long history of purchasing from within their own borders regardless of cost. This raises the cost of purchasing, raising government expenditure and raising taxes. It also costs jobs in other provinces because the most efficient producers cannot sell outside their own provinces.

• (1720)

Some jobs may be protected locally but just like the brewing industry, these local producers are insulated and inefficient. The higher taxes affect all Canadians and cost in total more jobs than protecting the local industry will save. This hurts Ontario as it hurts all Canadians.

The industry minister attempted to achieve a deal on this important subject over the summer but due to the short–sightedness of some provinces, the agreement ended up being window dressing only. It is important that he make it a high priority to get the provinces back to the table and remove these barriers to competitiveness.

Interprovincial barriers to trade and financial services creates once again a higher cost to consumers, costs financial institutions their competitive position and costs Canadians jobs. It also affects another major employer in my riding which finds restrictions on selling its services outside Ontario.

Trust companies for example find barriers to trade in the different regulations that each province sets up. Much like the trucking industry a lowest common denominator approach must be taken to selling services in more than one market thereby increasing costs. A standard set of regulations for all provinces would eliminate administrative overhead, produce more competitiveness, lower costs for consumers and again ultimately create more jobs.

A further barrier to trade is the restriction placed on various types of labour mobility between provinces. This is of particular concern to an area such as Ottawa–Hull which straddles a provincial boundary but still affects people in my riding and indeed all Canadians.

Many of us are familiar with the dispute that erupted earlier this year between Ontario and Quebec on the issue of construction jobs. This was one of many barriers that prevented professionals and labourers from offering their services across Canada. This means competition is reduced and will result in higher costs in taxes for consumers.

Fortunately, Ontario and Quebec managed to resolve their differences on this single issue to the benefit of both. However this is the exception rather than the rule. It is time for us to sit down at the bargaining table and eliminate the many other barriers that are still in place.

It is important to reflect on the statements that have come from this government on the recent GATT agreement. The finance minister estimated that the economy would grow .4 per cent as a result of the implementation of this freer trade agreement. Estimates by the Fraser Institute on the effect of removing interprovincial trade barriers range from 2 to 6 per cent.

In other words, with GATT we spent seven years and millions of tax dollars to negotiate with 120 foreign countries an agreement to open up trading, yet we have an opportunity to realize five to fifteen times the economic benefit by negotiating among only ten provinces. Unfortunately this government has only given a very half–hearted effort to this point.

The bottom line is that interprovincial trade barriers mean lost jobs for Canada, higher taxes and product cost and a less competitive economy with which to face the world.

It is within the substance of this bill and the industry minister's mandate to reduce and eliminate all barriers to interprovincial trade and make Canada as competitive as it can be. The speed with which this minister takes action on this important issue will indicate to Canadians how serious the Liberals are about their promise of jobs, jobs, jobs.

We have an opportunity here that should not be missed. We can improve the economy. We can create jobs here in Canada and indeed hone our edge to be more competitive in the global market we are competing in today.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Call in the members.

• (1725)

Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) I have been requested by the chief government whip to defer the division until a later time.

[Translation]

Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until 5.30 p.m. tomorrow, at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

[English]

It being 5.30 p.m. the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on the Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

BANKRUPTCY ACT

The House resumed from October 25 consideration of the motion that Bill C–237, an act to amend the Bankruptcy Act (priority of claims), be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Boudria: On a point of order, Madam Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent that any division bells called on the private member's item now before the House later this day be deferred as well until tomorrow at 5.30 p.m. There has been consultation with the whips of all parties to defer that vote until that time. I think you would find that consent if you were to seek it, Madam Speaker.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Madam Speaker, this bill provides that in cases of bankruptcy wages be paid as a first priority, up to a limit of $9,000 for each worker.

The present Bankruptcy and Insolvency Act passed in 1992 by the Conservative government maintains the preferred claim status for wages when an employer files for bankruptcy. It covers wage–earners by giving them preferred creditor status for wages earned during the six months previous to the bankruptcy, up to a limit of $2,000.

Wage claims rank fourth in the priority of preferred claims. Since claims of secured and preferred creditors must be paid first, there is not always enough money left to cover wage claims. Workers suffer the consequences.

Progress on that issue did not lead to a fair solution for workers. The problem has been dragging on since 1980, when the Standing Senate Committee on Banking, Trade and Commerce mentioned three possible solutions. The first was to give absolute priority to wage claims by putting them first, before those of any other secured creditor. That is exactly what the hon. member for Portneuf suggested today and I want to commend him for that.

Therefore, for almost 14 years now, this House has been analyzing the possibility of amending this legislation which is unfair to workers. For 14 years, by not addressing this problematic issue, this House has shown that it does not give a hoot about the interests of workers and what they produce.

Why hesitate so much on this single issue? Because we have to choose between the workers and the banks. That is the choice we have to make.

Why have we not made any progress? Because successive governments have not had the courage to come to the defence of the most disadvantaged in our society.

We are talking here about a ludicrous situation that has been going on for years. The struggle in this area has been tough. It took 40 years of fierce fighting to have the Bankruptcy Act reviewed in 1992. Extensive consultations were held with the stakeholders and people concerned because many divergent interests were involved.

Undeniably, some social choices are at the basis of such a bill. Unfortunately, and we must be clear on this, each time it has been proposed, the idea of giving first priority to wage claims has always been defeated by the banking lobby. This is obvious in all the documents dealing with this sensitive issue.

Some members claim that this bill would cause a rise in the unemployment rate, since according to them, lending institutions might reduce the amount of credit available to businesses if employees were given absolute priority over other creditors.

Of course jobs must be protected, but one can hardly argue that the success of an SME depends on whether it can avoid paying employees the wages, leave and pension fund contributions they rightly earned.

We must also consider the precarious situation facing employees who have no way to recover wages in arrears. We cannot endorse the principle of protecting the banks and letting employees who earn a modest wage fend for themselves.

Of course bankruptcy is an unpleasant situation and it always means someone will have to pay. In this instance, the House has the option of identifying four preferred creditors and deciding which creditor will be first in line to be reimbursed. These four creditors are: the government, suppliers, lenders and employees.

The House must now decide which of the four is best able to absorb the loss resulting from the bankrupt individual's lack of assets to reimburse each creditor. Who has the most to lose and who is the most vulnerable? Is it the government? Is it the suppliers? Let me explain my point of view.

For the government, despite the dismal state of its finances, the loss would be negligible, compared with the national debt.

As for the suppliers, they can claim losses due to bad debts and thus reduce their taxable income.

I am not worried about the lending institutions. They can consider bad debts as an incentive to improve their follow–up in the future, which should increase their sense of responsibility to society instead of encouraging them to ignore their customers' problems the way they do now.

Finally, we have the employees, who have no way of absorbing the losses they suffer following a bankruptcy. In fact, under our existing legislation, employees are forced to absorb these losses. They have no alternative, no way out.

This is not intended to be an exhaustive analysis of the subject, but employees are not only penalized by being unable to recover their salaries but also because they will not be reimbursed for expenses incurred during their period of employment: food, transportation and accommodation, in some cases.

Why up to $9,000? Because even when employers pay their employees wages every week or every two weeks, in some cases where substantial amounts well in excess of the $2,000 guaranteed thus far may have accumulated. Money owed to the employees in excess of this ceiling is not reimbursed and they have to absorb their loss.

• (1735)

In my view, this bill is a tool to motivate workers, a tool to foster productivity. Workers will be encouraged to take chances and accept compromises to help their SME go through rough times, if they are assured that at the end of the day, they will get their salary or their investment back, that is to say that they will recover their outlay before the government, banks and suppliers.

This is a far cry from the present legislation which makes workers bear the brunt of the losses by paying them back last, while we know full well that they do not get one extra penny when business is booming.

The government, by refusing to amend this unfair act, is applying double standards more than ever. I believe that amending the act and putting employees at the top of the list of preferred claims would be a matter of basic social justice, but it would seem that fairness is not a priority for the Liberal Party.

I will draw a parallel with the family trusts the Liberals are intent on protecting. This is another example of double standards where the rich are favoured at the expense of the poorest members of society.

Just as banks are protected by the Bankruptcy Act which makes sure that they are paid before the employees, the rich are protected once again through family trusts which make it possible for them to be granted a tax exemption for up to 80 years. This is a tax loophole available to the rich, while there is talk of taxing RRSPs, a plan designed for private sector employees who do not have a generous pension plan.

I repeat, this is a case of double standards.

It must be said: maintaining family trusts and the Liberals' refusal to change the order of priority of claims guaranteed under the Bankruptcy Act, serve only one purpose: to protect the wealthiest members of society.

Indeed, the family trusts the Liberals are steadfastly defending are not used by middle–income families. In this respect, I would like to quote the findings of a study by Ernst and Young which showed assets averaged $47 million in a random sample of 121 family trusts.

I repeat, Madam Speaker, this is a blatant case of double standards.

[English]

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I oppose this bill to amend the Bankruptcy Act because it would result in inefficiencies and an unfair burden on the general public.

I can understand the motive behind the proposed legislation. Why should banks, funeral businesses and accounting firms be paid out of the proceeds of a bankrupt firm before workers who typically have fewer resources than these enterprises?

The new law presumably would reduce profits of these firms without any dire social consequences while it would prevent the misery for the families of workers who can ill–afford to lose income they have earned. However, this view is shortsighted.

In a free society and under current law funeral businesses and accounting firms do not have to take business for which they are not paid. The proposed law does not envisage changing this condition. Therefore when an estate is to be dissolved and it is clear that if after the payment of labour there is no money left for funeral expenses and accounting services, who will do this work?

I see only one answer to this question. A government will have to undertake the task or at least pay for it out of general tax revenue. People have to be buried, accounts have to be settled to meet the requirements of property laws that have existed for centuries.

Under either approach the public ends up paying for these services. Therefore, the proposed legislation will enrich workers of a bankrupt company at the expense of the general public. I do not see the fairness of this outcome, especially because the wages earned by workers in different occupations and industry tend to compensate them for all kinds of risks in the first place. I will return to a discussion of this proposition in a moment.

Let me now turn to the not so obvious consequences of ranking secured loans below wages. This rule will increase the interest rates which lenders charge to businesses for loans for the purchase of tangible assets. This is not a malicious plot of capitalists. By doing so lenders will simply meet their fiduciary responsibility.

I venture to guess that none of us in this House would be very happy if our savings in a bank or credit union were used to lend to risky borrowers without proper risk premium and collateral. We would be very unhappy if the fiduciary holders of our money did not pool risky investments and did not make sure that on average interest earned on the pool minus payments for bankruptcy losses is equal to what they could have earned by investing our money in secure government bonds.

This is of course what lenders to business do. Therefore any government legislation like the one proposed which increases the rate of loss from loans requires an increase in the interest rate charged to all members in the pool of risky loans. One rather obvious consequence of this action is that borrowers' profits are reduced. They will try to raise the cost of their services and products to compensate for this reduction. This can be done only to a limited extent, otherwise they would have already charged higher prices before the interest costs went up.

To the extent that they succeed and get higher prices, the money which goes to workers first in line in a bankruptcy proceeding comes from the general consumer. I see no fairness in this. A less obvious effect of the higher loan rates to business is that some firms will not be started at all. As a result the demand for labour and the wage rate are lowered.

In addition, the average amount of capital held by business will be smaller. Therefore, labour productivity and wages will be lower. In effect, the rest of labour is forced to pay for the income earned by the workers in a bankrupt firm indirectly through higher interest rates charged by lenders. I see no fairness in this.

Finally, it should be noted that the probability of bankruptcy of firms can be predicted to some degree by the characteristics of an industry, a firm or the personality of the employer. Workers are smart and know how to look after their own interests. They enter employment contracts considering their pay in light of a wide range of conditions, including the risk of their employer going bankrupt. The idea of buyer beware is relevant to goods and services as well as the sale of one's labour.

The vast majority of workers therefore will accept employment where the risk of bankruptcy exists only if their wages reflect properly this condition. Otherwise they will find employment elsewhere. They will continue to stay with a company only if they feel their wages properly reflect the risk they are taking.

The motives for doing so are complex. I certainly would not hang around and work for a company about to go bankrupt and unable to pay me wages owed unless the prospective benefits are fully worth it.

I would postulate that the wages of workers, everything else remaining the same, are higher the greater a firm's risk of bankruptcy. The proposed law would remove or significantly lower the risk of wage losses from such events. This would encourage such workers to accept employment in such industries at lower wages. They would therefore on average be no better off than they were under the present law, except that the efficiency of the economy would be reduced because there would be an over expansion of risky firms and industries and a job and output reducing tax on the rest of the workers.

There are always some people who do not obey the principle of buyer beware or who have poor judgment about the prospect of a company's bankruptcy and ability to pay owed wages. I think the number of these people is small. I have confidence in workers.

• (1745)

Canadian workers are not dumb or unaware of the functioning of markets. Helping those few through the proposed legislation is very indirect and costly for reasons just discussed. Help for them should come through education and the publication of relevant information. Unions could play an important role in this process. They have the resources and are driven by the right humanitarian motives. Those who cannot be reached by these direct methods and who need help have to be taken care of by existing systems of private charity and public aid.

In sum, the present law regulating the order in which obligations of estates are settled in the case of a bankruptcy or death have existed for centuries. Institutions which have survived for so long should never be changed without very good cause.

They may appear to create injustices for some, but closer examination of their effects typically will reveal that serious unforeseen consequences are likely to arise if they are changed. The long survival of such institutions strongly implies that past efforts to improve them have failed.

I believe that my analysis of the indirect effects of the proposed change in the bankruptcy law support this view of the sociobiological evolution of institutions. I urge members of this Parliament to vote against these proposed changes.

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the purpose of the bill before us today is to move employees from fourth to first place in the legal order of precedence when a bankruptcy occurs. If it was passed, this bill would provide that when the assets of a bankrupt person or corporation were divided, the first people to receive payment would be employees instead of other people like funeral directors, lawyers and administrators, and secured claimants.

Funeral expenses, legal and administrative fees are not the main obstacle presented by this bill. Those who currently have the first right of payment are secured creditors, which is a broader and more significant category involving mortgage holders. These secured creditors are the ones who would suffer most from the enormous changes the bill would bring about in our financial system.

What are we really talking about when we speak of the order of precedence in the Bankruptcy Act? We are describing levels of risk. The one in first place on the order of precedence is taking the least risk in the case of bankruptcy, because the first one will be the first one paid out.

We know that all business ventures do not succeed. Some make it but some do not. When an employee or a lender enters into a contract with a business person, the risk of business failure is always there. The place one takes on the order of precedence will determine just how much risk one is willing to undergo.

Employees are now fourth on the list, so employees bear more risk than some others. This means they should carefully consider whether they want to give their time to a business they suspect might fail. The hon. member who spoke previous to me already pointed out that they are smart enough to make that decision already. It goes without saying that if lenders were moved lower in the order of precedence, they would have to consider more carefully than they do already whether or not to lend money to a business.

If we change the order of precedence on a broad, nationwide basis, we are making a determination about risk and who should bear it. We are also making a statement about what is most necessary in society for the efficient functioning of business. Given that we all want private enterprise to flourish, we must make the rules in such a way as to facilitate the most efficient way for all Canadians and the marketplace to prosper.

Government could put up all sorts of artificial and unnecessary barriers to the free functioning of the marketplace for one political reason or another at the expense of the efficiency in the marketplace.

For instance, the environment is important so the government could pass a zero emissions law for the auto industry, stating that automobiles could not pollute at all. In this impossible example it is obvious that the auto industry would immediately grind to a screeching halt. I merely want to demonstrate that in considering what laws to pass, governments must strike a balance between the efficiency of the market and the kind of business it wants to foster.

From that example let us move back to the matter at hand. If an employee was first on the order of precedence, the employee would be taking the least risk in the case of bankruptcy and the lender would have to incur more risk than before. This consideration of greater risk would have inevitable efficiency results in the marketplace. I want to describe what they might be.

• (1750)

Certainly there would be one positive result, namely that of paying back employees who were not paid full wages or severance pay if a person or corporation went bankrupt. This would be nice for the employees. Employees are important and necessary actors in our financial system and deserve due consideration. But this is the only positive effect I have been able to think of in this bill.

This scenario is directly analogous to the auto industry I was just talking about. I maintain that the passage of Bill C–237 would have a harmful effect on employment in general in the country. It would make small business less efficient and slow the pace of economic activity across the nation. Just like a zero emissions policy in the automobile sector would do more harm than good, I am convinced that the sum total of harm caused to employees would be vastly greater than the losses they now suffer as a result of being in fourth place on the order of precedence.

The first harmful effect a change in the order of precedence would cause would be a reduction I believe in the overall employment in Canada. A company which needed, for example, $1 million and wanted to employ 25 people would not be able to compete for funding with a company that also wanted a $1 million loan but was only going to employ 10 people.

The risk would be much reduced if there were fewer employees to pay out before the lender received his or her share. This would cause businesses to shy away from labour intensive enterprises and move toward enterprises involving technology even more than labour. People would become less important players in our financial markets as a result of this change and machines would become more important.

The second effect we would feel at a national level would be more important. It would have a direct impact on foreign investment. Capital is very mobile on a global basis and foreigners invest in our economy all the time. If another country had laws that would guarantee them less risk than Canada could, then their money would tend to flow out of Canada and into other safer business enterprises around the world.

Canada depends a lot on foreign capital. We cannot afford to send foreigners a message that they are not welcome here. The loss of their financing would mean less investment and fewer businesses. Again this would have a direct, more serious negative employment effect across the country.

The final effect would be the most serious of all. If lenders had to undergo more risk than they do now in lending they would be forced to think twice before lending at all. This would mean that more marginal business ventures would have a harder time raising capital. When they wanted to borrow money they would have to pay a risk premium, in other words, a higher interest rate for that money. This would mean that many businesses simply would never get off the ground because they would not be able to afford the interest payments on their loans.

Government currently plays a role, unfortunately, by lending to marginal, more risky businesses through agencies like the Western Diversification Fund and the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency. But the capacity of governments to do so in the future is being vastly reduced by government debt. Therefore government in this case would not be able to take up the slack in this area of the market.

We all know that many innovations never succeed but a few pay off handsomely. Innovative entrepreneurs are important in our economy and Bill C–237 might discourage them from taking risks. Their ideas would never see the light of day if access to risk capital were reduced.

It is obvious that fewer people would be employed as a result of this restriction on lending capital. What employees gained in wage security they would lose in job security. The old adage that you cannot get something for nothing is truly relevant here. What little you might have gained in one sector of the economy you would lose far more in another. Bill C–237 would have a detrimental effect on employees.

As usual, government meddling with the marketplace would have the most detrimental effect on small businesses. I would remind members that over 97 per cent of all firms in Canada have less than 50 employees. Small business is the engine of economic growth and we want to keep fueling that engine, not choke off its fuel by unnecessary government restrictions such as the one we contemplate here today.

The argument is that we need to be kinder to employees. Somehow we need to make them more secure. But is it really a kindness to give them that kind of security and then throw them on the dole? What kind of effective security is that? It is security for some but it is unemployment for others.

As I said a few moments ago we will all be more prosperous if private enterprise flourishes in Canada. That is a given. All we need to do is discover what rules to set in place that will make this happen. I would remind members that the rules in the Bankruptcy Act are not arbitrary. They represent the interests of people acting in the marketplace over generations of litigation and thousands of cases of business relationships.

• (1755)

I have stated adequately my clear opposition to this motion. It is not because I appreciate workers less than the member for Portneuf. The rules of business should maintain the overall efficiency of private enterprise because the security of private enterprise ensures job security for Canadian workers.

In my opinion, the order of precedence assigns risk in a way that benefits business efficiency. In that way it serves the public interest. It should, therefore, remain intact.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Before recognizing the hon. member for Portneuf, I would like to say that pursuant to Standing Order 44, no member, unless otherwise provided by Standing or Special Order, may speak twice to a question. It says:

> 44.(2) A reply shall be allowed to a member who has moved a substantive motion, but not to the mover of an amendment, the previous question or an instruction to a committee.

Therefore, the hon. member for Portneuf has the right to reply.

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Thank you, Madam Speaker.

Debate on Bill C–237 that I have had the pleasure of introducing is drawing to a close. My Liberal and Reform colleagues showed no real willingness to redress the obvious injustice towards unpaid workers who assume part of the burden of their employer's bankruptcy.

Here is what the Liberals and Reformers argued. First, banks would be reluctant to lend money to companies.

Second, these same banks would lose patience more quickly when a company was experiencing difficulties.

Third and final argument, such a super priority for wage claims would be unfair to other creditors, including the Crown.

I will start by disproving the first argument. You know as well as I that generally speaking employees have no say in the way their employer runs his business. An employer can mortgage the company using his employees' salaries and wages as collateral. All creditors give legal consent for the money they loan to a company, but not employees. They have no say in the matter. Yet, their salaries, the fruit of their labour, is put up as collateral for other creditors. This is clearly unfair.

Moreover, the government does not get a penny out of unpaid wages. If salaries were to become a super priority, they would be paid to employees and the Department of Revenue would get its share. This disproves argument number 3.

The second point, that banks would be less patient with businesses in difficulty, is an interesting argument since banks are responsible for ensuring that the business to which they lend money is solvent. Banks are well placed to see if a business is able to pay its employees' salaries. If a bank lends to a business that is not able to pay its employees, it means that this institution agrees to let the workers bear the risk of the loan. Such an attitude would be both unjust and unacceptable.

Bill C–237 would force banks to be more responsible in this regard, which is highly desirable, you will agree.

This brings me to the first point. Is it true that this bill will affect the financing of businesses? I remind you that suppliers retain a right of ownership on unpaid supplies. The granting of that right in the past did not affect companies' access to funds.

• (1800)

We should also note that the industry committee recently tabled a report on the Small Businesses Loans Act. Here we have a good opportunity to illustrate the interdependence and complementarity of two measures: Bill C–237 corrects a problem for workers and the committee report enhances business financing. Consequently, the argument that business credit could be restricted does not hold any more. That did not happen in the case of a similar measure concerning suppliers and besides, the Small Businesses Loans Act could provide for that.

May I remind you that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry said in the second part of the debate on this bill, on October 25, that "until we have the banks acting more progressively and until their attitudes change toward small business, this bill should be defeated".

That is the main repugnant reason why some Liberals objected to this bill. That is also the main reason why all bills advocating the super priority of wage claims have failed for more than 20 years. Not for practical or economic reasons, but simply because we should wait for the banks to change their attitudes.

Well, I say no. Our workers have been subjected for too long already to the financial institution lobby. Over the past 20 years or so, in parliamentary committees, advisory committees and a stunning amount of legislation, banks have been used as an excuse to reject any piece of legislation on the priority status of wage claims, and every government has given in to the powerful banks.

In closing, let me repeat the arguments for this bill. First of all, this measure is intended to protect the driving force behind our economy, the workers. Next, the principle of priority for wage claims is one that makes up for the injustice done to workers by giving them the rank to which their work give them an indisputable right.

Moreover, this proposal will ensure that salaried employees will have better chances to be paid and paid more quickly. Let me add that the superpriority will allow them to be paid without any cost to the taxpayers. In fact, the government will get its share.

Besides, it is obvious that the risk that this superpriority would restrict credit for businesses has been deliberately exaggerated. That will not be the case. Finally, need we point out that it is not up to the workers to guarantee, with their wages, and without their consent, financial decisions made by their employers.

In its red book, the Liberal Party claims that it is committed to the principle of social solidarity, and I quote from page 73. It is stated that many of the laws and policies that previous Liberal governments enacted remain the basis of our system of social support, "through which we pool our resources to create programs that benefit all Canadians and help to sustain people through difficult times".

Therefore I ask the government members to fulfil that commitment in supporting Bill C–237 so that it can be referred to a committee where it will be improved before coming back to this House, so that the public can be better served.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Pursuant to the order made earlier this day, the recorded division stands deferred until 5.30 p.m. tomorrow.

• (1805)

Ms. Catterall: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. Given that we seemed to have disposed with Private Members' Business a bit early, I think if you would ask you would find there is unanimous consent in the House to call it 6.30 p.m. so that we could proceed with the adjournment proceedings.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Madam Speaker, in this post–adjournment period I wish to reopen a question that I put to the minister of agriculture on Monday. I asked him whether there would be any changes in the government's policy toward the Canadian Wheat Board.

I asked this because during the election the Prime Minister was quite clear that the policy of the Liberals was to support the board. In the election that was quite important. There was a small group of farmers demanding a dual marketing system which would have had the effect of breaking the ability of the board to put prices on grain for western farmers.

Since that time the elections for the advisory committee have occurred. That election was openly fought between people who supported a strengthened board and those who wanted the board to either disappear or have very limited powers. As it turned out, 10 of the 11 positions on that advisory board were filled by people who supported a strengthened board. This is actually the strongest electoral situation the advisory committee has been in since it was first brought into being back in the mid–seventies when I happened to be a member of it.

The turnout was one of the heaviest that there has been. We have to remember this is a mail out ballot. A lot of the ballots never get opened. They get lost in the pile of mail that comes home. On average just over 46 per cent voted. This was one of the higher turnouts. In the two eastern provinces the turnout was considerably higher than in Alberta where it was just over a third of the farmers who actually voted.

I note that some of the board's detractors are saying that this does not tell anything because the turnout was not very high. I want to point out that even in Alberta where the return was only about 36 or 37 per cent, that is higher than the U.S. congressional elections which just changed the whole outlook of that Congress. It is higher than the normal presidential elections in the United States. Forty–six to 48 per cent which is what most of the provinces had for a turnout was much higher than we see in most municipal elections and occasionally in provincial elections. I do not think we can argue that this was not a legitimately elected group.

There are some special problems that face the board at the moment and I think this newly elected group should be utilized by the minister to look at some of those problems. New grains are something rye producers in particular have shown they are willing and ready to have included in the board's jurisdiction. The advisory committee should be given that as a question to look at.

It could also be asked to provide opinions on how to integrate organically produced grain and perhaps the question of grains milled on farm or by the owner of the grain, which is something organic producers particularly want to have looked at. This is a special niche market. The board has been occupied in developing these special situations.

• (1810)

I wanted to raise these in the post–adjournment debate because I think the minister is aware that there are many more things that the wheat board could be doing and I wanted to know whether the Prime Minister's assurances during the election campaign that he supports the board meant a stronger board, an expanding board, or simply a status quo kind of board. I hope the result of the elections would give the minister the assurance that farmers are behind an expanded and growing wheat board.

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the hon. member's interest in and concern for the Canadian Wheat Board is noted and appreciated. I am pleased to have this opportunity to respond to his remarks in greater detail than I would be able to do during the course of Question Period.

The member makes reference to the most recent election of the Canadian Wheat Board's producer advisory committee and the proper interpretation to be placed upon the results of that election. The committee consists of 11 members. In the most recent election results 10 of those 11 members were identified very much as pro–board candidates who opposed any weakening of the Canadian Wheat Board, opposed the concept of dual marketing.

While this election was not a direct plebiscite about marketing systems, and while the overall producer participation in the voting was only about 40 per cent, I think it is fair to say that the vote results show an important level of producer support for the Canadian Wheat Board. I do not think it would be fair to say that the vote is the be all and end all. I do not think it would be fair to say it is the absolute last and ultimate word. It is one very important piece of evidence which is clearly supportive of the Canadian Wheat Board.

Over the course of the last year or so a controversy has been brewing among western Canadian farmers about the Canadian Wheat Board and this notion of alternative marketing systems. It is a subject upon which different groups of farmers hold profoundly different opinions. So far there has not been a rational, full, frank, objective opportunity for farmers to discuss all of those alternatives and to have a face to face analysis of the situation in a frank and logical way.

That is why I plan to carry through on a commitment that I have made to provide farmers and all interested stakeholders with that full, objective, logical, rational forum and mechanism within which to examine the alternatives, have all of those alternatives subjected to examination and cross–examination so there can be that full analysis with the full participation of the farmers. I am confident that in that process the Canadian Wheat Board will do very well.

REFUGEES

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to elaborate on a question I put to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration on November 24, 1994. I asked what action the Canadian government is taking to ensure the human rights of Vietnamese refugees in southeast Asia.

On December 12, 1948, the year in which I was born so it is close to my heart, the United Nations Assembly passed the universal declaration of human rights. On Friday of this week the world celebrates International Human Rights Day.

I have a number of constituents from the wider area of southeast Asia and the concern has been raised with me and other members in southwestern Ontario that constituents of ours are very concerned about the safety of some of their family members in their original homelands.

Since 1988 Hong Kong has granted refugee status to Vietnamese who proved justified fear of persecution at home and I understand that since 1991 refugees have voluntarily been returning to Vietnam. The Hong Kong government is now operating a program of forcible repatriation to encourage the 24,000 refugees remaining in camps there to leave by 1996. That is the cause of the very real concern a number of Vietnamese Canadians share about the safety of their loved ones back home.

There is no question there have been incidents of violence and assault against these refugees. In September of this year the Government of Hong Kong admitted quite candidly that 142 Vietnamese refugees were injured in a forced repatriation operation. There have been serious allegations and questions about police brutality since the repatriation program began earlier this year.

This deplorable situation has been brought to my attention by leaders of the Vietnamese community both in my own city and in southwestern Ontario, and indeed by certain segments of the media in southwestern Ontario. I share their concern. Quite frankly Canadians generally would share this concern. We do not want to see human rights violations such as these going unanswered.

I certainly applaud the actions of our own new government and of previous governments of various political stripes in being a leader in the world in accepting refugees from virtually every part of the world. We know that is true and we are all as Canadians rightly proud of that record. However there is a situation here which needs to be addressed.

I am pleased to follow up my question to the minister this evening with this statement and to explore a little further the answer the minister gave to me in the House.

I would like to put a question to the parliamentary secretary. What other initiatives can Canada take besides accepting refugees? What other initiatives, either publicly or through appropriate diplomatic channels, does the government foresee might be taken to stop violence against Vietnamese citizens forcibly repatriated against their will?

Mr. John English (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his question and for the concern he has shown for the situation of Indo–Chinese boat people throughout southeast Asia.

As the minister has already stated, Canada has also played an important role in the development of the comprehensive plan of action in 1989. Under this international agreement Indo–Chinese asylum seekers are screened under U.S. auspices.

Persons who are determined to become convention refugees are eligible for resettlement in a third country such as Canada. Persons who are found not to be refugees are expected to return to their country of origin. Most of the people who remain in the camps in Hong Kong have been determined not to be refugees and are expected to repatriate to Vietnam.

The non–refugees have been offered voluntary repatriation to Vietnam under United Nations supervision with an additional inducement of reintegration assistance paid by the international community.

Since the inception of the CPA in 1989 Canada has contributed $9 million for maintaining the camps and for returnee programs; 60,000 have returned voluntarily. Unfortunately approximately 50,000 Indo–Chinese remain in the camps in southeast Asia, the vast majority of whom have been found not to be convention refugees after examination under the CPA.

The international community and Canadians expect that humane methods are used to ensure the safe return of these people to their own countries. However in a removal situation, particularly when the individual being returned is not co–operative, some force unfortunately has been employed.

Canada's response to the Vietnamese refugee crisis has been exemplary. During the first 10 years of the Indo–Chinese movement from 1979 to 1988 over 79,000 Vietnamese were resettled by Canada from the camps of southeast Asia. Since the implementation of the CPA in 1989, Canada has resettled over 19,000 Vietnamese refugees from the camps of southeast Asia. In addition, under regular immigration programs directly from Vietnam, Canada has resettled nearly 50,000 Vietnamese.

I congratulate the hon. member for London—Middlesex for raising this important question and for his concern.

BOVINE SOMATOTROPIN

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Madam Speaker, before asking my question this evening, I will briefly review the situation to show what led the Official Opposition to raise this issue.

The whole thing started when we learned that the director of the Health Canada Bureau of Veterinary Drugs, who had been on leave without pay for about a year, was lobbying on the Hill to convince some government members of the merits of the hormone called somatotropin. You will remember this hormone stimulates milk production in cows. This issue raises many questions.

The main question is: How can the minister allow the director of the bureau currently examining the possibility of releasing this hormone for market to "pressure" his colleagues or at least try to convince them of the merits of this hormone while on leave without pay?

He is still the director even though he is on leave without pay. Let us be clear on the principle of leave without pay. The person on leave whithout pay does not lose his or her seniority, and continues to be entitled to his or her insurance plan, pension, disability insurance and everything else.

Even if this individual is on leave without pay, he knows the staff of this bureau. We find the minister's inaction on this rather deplorable.

This week, I wanted the minister to tell us why she did not respond before and what she intends to do about this director who, in my opinion, is unduly lobbying certain members of Parliament, in view of his previous functions.

I would like the minister or her parliamentary secretary to tell us whether her departmental staff feels that this is normal and what action they will take immediately to stop this activity, so that the health department can have some credibility with the public. This department has extremely serious responsibilities, and I do not think that we should play around with such things.

I would like the parliamentary secretary to tell us what the Department of Health intends to do about that.

[English]

Ms. Hedy Fry (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Health, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has raised a couple of statements with regard to the presentation of the person involved to a parliamentary committee, it is my understanding, at the request of the committee.

It is also my understanding from what we know of the issue right now that the person spoke only of issues that were public information. There was nothing spoken at the parliamentary committee level that was private information.

Second, the person did not have anything to do with the BST file within the Department of Health. Third, as the hon. member well knows, the person was also not working and was on leave of absence from the Department of Health at the time.

More important, the issue is being investigated. We cannot go on hearsay or on misunderstanding of issues. The issue is being investigated by Health Canada at the moment. As soon as the investigations have been finished and thoroughly looked at, the minister will be reporting to the House of Commons.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

PRIVILEGE

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD

The Speaker: I have a notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I am going to allow the question of privilege because yesterday, in reviewing the blues and what was said, I found that perhaps I acted a little hastily in cutting off the member. I am going to allow some additional information to be put on the record.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was seeking to make the point that a publication of the House, admittedly in conjunction with the National Archives of Canada, contained a substantial error in that it failed to mention in the list of constituencies for Canada's first Prime Minister the fact that he was the member for Kingston.

I raise this point in some seriousness. I know it was treated with a bit of merriment yesterday afternoon. This particular Prime Minister was identified closely with the Kingston community. He represented Kingston in either the legislature or in this House from 1844 until 1891, with the exception of a nine–year break between 1878 and 1887 when he represented other constituencies in this House.

He was substantially raised in Kingston. He practised law in Kingston from the age of 19 in the 1830s until 1873. For over 40 years he practised law in Kingston. As I have indicated, he represented that community for a very long time and made a very substantial contribution there. He was buried in Kingston and there are countless statues and monuments to him in Kingston.

To have Kingston omitted from the list of his constituencies is really a shocking omission. With the greatest respect, of all the Prime Ministers in the book he probably had a closer connection with his community and is known to have had that connection with his community of Kingston than all the other prime ministers had with their communities.

My point is that this book ought to be repaired and replaced. It is frankly misleading, particularly to students who I am sure are going to be the principal users of this book. I see that it has a foreword with Your Honour's name on it, it does not have a signature, and another by the national archivist.

From the point of view of accuracy, I think it would be very wise to have the book reprinted. It is an excellent book and a fine publication. It is wrong in this particular. It is a serious enough error that it ought to be corrected.

The Speaker: I do take the hon. member's intervention seriously.

• (1005)

My name is associated and therefore the House's name is associated with this publication. That is the reason I permitted the extra information to come on to the record. I will review everything that has been said and, if necessary, I will get back to the House with a decision on this matter.

Also I would like to take a few minutes of the time of the House. In reviewing the blues yesterday and in fairness to all members I want to make a couple of points clear with regard to unparliamentary language.

Something may be unparliamentary in our language today and it may be parliamentary tomorrow. All that to say that no one word in and of itself is always unparliamentary. It is rather the context in which the word is used, the tone in which the word or words are delivered and if there is disorder in the House.

If any one of these things occurs, it is incumbent upon the Chair to interpret what is going on in the House. To say that your Speaker is going to at all times make decisions that are acceptable to all members of Parliament would be hoping for the impossible.

The Chair should have the latitude and will take the latitude to ensure that if a word is used in its tone, in its meaning, in perhaps the disorder it causes in the House then the Chair will intervene at that point. He or she may rule a word unparliamentary.

I want it clear to all members of the House that even the word liar is not always unparliamentary. It will depend in the context in which it is used. However, if one member calls another member a liar, that is clearly unparliamentary, and I wanted that to be understood.

To the interveners yesterday, the hon. member from Winnipeg who rose to make the point, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands who made an intervention and the hon. member for Kindersley—Lloydminister who all contributed to the discussion on a point of order, I have taken all your suggestions into account. I want you to have a general feeling of what the Chair and the person in the chair will be looking for when it comes to unparliamentary language.

I hope that this is acceptable to the House and that it will give general directions with regard to the words we are to use in our debates and also in question period. I thank you for your indulgence.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to certain petitions.

[English]

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

JUSTICE AND LEGAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs.

Pursuant to the order of reference of Tuesday, June 21, 1994, your committee has considered Bill C–37, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code. Your committee has agreed to report it with amendments.

The committee considered the bill for three months, heard 42 witnesses and made 28 amendments. I want to thank members of the committee and witnesses for their contributions and co–operation.

The phase two examination of the Young Offenders Act will take place in the new year.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the fourth report of the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration on Bill C–44, an act to amend the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Customs Act, with amendments.

• (1010)

FINANCE

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to place before the House today, in both official languages, the 10th report of the Standing Committee on Finance entitled "Confronting Canada's Deficit Crisis: Building Our Next Budget Through Consultation".

Briefly the report is the result of an unprecedented seven weeks of intensive consultations and study involving members from all three parties. I take this occasion to thank members of the committee from all three parties who brought such diligence to this undertaking.

I also thank all those who have worked with us. Far too often they have not been recognized for what they have done. I talk not only of the many witnesses who appeared before us, often on very short notice, but particularly members of the Library of Parliament who worked with us, especially the clerks to our committee, Christine Trauttmansdorff and our chief clerk, Martine Bresson, and all the people of their staff who have been working 24 hours a day over the last week in order that we could meet this deadline.

We have been extremely well served as parliamentarians by these very devoted public servants.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, like my colleague, the chair of the finance committee, I wish to thank the staff, and especially the office of the clerk, for the excellent job they did when the committee was preparing its report and during the committee's public hearings.

Remember that the Official Opposition tabled a dissenting opinion as an appendix to the report of the Liberal majority. Why a dissenting opinion? First of all, because the Bloc Quebecois, the Official Opposition, is convinced that the measures supported in the Liberal majority's report do not reflect the vision and the views of Canadians expressed at the public hearings.

Second, there is the prospect of an increase in taxes across the board for all Canadian taxpayers. We cannot support this proposal and we are particularly wary of the statement that the increase will be only temporary.

Third, the Liberal majority's report announces a series of tax increases or at least the prospect of tax increases which will again affect a middle class already taxed to the hilt since 1984.

Fourth, the report, and this is our main grievance, launches another attack on social programs by proposing cuts in addition to those already announced in the last budget.

Fifth, the report ignores the fact that more jobs can also mean more tax revenue and, in the end, an improvement in the state of Canada's public finances. For all the reasons I just mentioned, readers will see the Official Opposition's dissenting opinion appended to the report.

PETITIONS

VOICE MAIL

Mr. Maurice Dumas (Argenteuil—Papineau, BQ): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the privilege to present a petition from 649 members of social organizations called AFEAS—Associations féminines d'éducation et d'action sociale—and of golden age groups.

Whereas the elderly are usually less familiar with the technology of voice mail but still have a right to proper service, especially for their enquiries about income security, the petitioners pray and call upon Parliament and the government to give up the plan to implement voice mail for seniors.

[English]

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and privilege today of presenting, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a petition signed by many residents of my constituency, specifically from the communities of Marcelin, Rabbit Lake, Hafford, Blaine Lake, Krydor and Leask.

The petitioners state that a very vocal minority of citizens are requesting Parliament to institute a dual marketing system of wheat and barley for export.

• (1015)

The petitioners therefore request that Parliament continue to give the Canadian Wheat Board monopoly powers to export wheat and barley. They also request that Parliament expand further Canadian Wheat Board marketing powers to include all grains and oilseeds.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure today to rise to present a petition on behalf of 458 citizens who ask that the Parliament of Canada protect and take care of human life and human dignity; that physicians should not be working to end lives but to save them.

The petitioners do not want the Criminal Code of Canada changed in any way to suggest that assisted suicide be made legal or countenanced by the state in any way.

I concur with my petitioners.

MINING

Ms. Roseanne Skoke (Central Nova, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I present a petition containing 100 signatures from residents of Nova Scotia petitioning this honourable House to keep mining in Canada.

Canada's mining industry is the mainstay of employment in over 150 communities across Canada, an important contributor to Canada's gross domestic product and total exports and a cornerstone of our economic future.

Therefore the petitioners call on Parliament to take action that will grow employment in this sector, promote exploration, rebuild Canada's mineral reserves, sustain mining communities and keep mining in Canada.

I concur with this petition.

RIGHTS OF GRANDPARENTS

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36, I would like to present a petition signed by residents of the community of Westlock in my constituency of Athabasca.

The petitioners request that Parliament amend the Divorce Act to include a provision similar to article 611 of the Quebec Civil Code which states: "In no case may a father or mother without serious cause place obstacles between the child and grandparents. Failing agreement between the parties, the modalities of the relations are settled by the court".

They further ask for an amendment to the Divorce Act that would give a grandparent who is granted access to a child the right to make inquiries and to be given information on the health, education and welfare of the child.

I present this petition and support the petitioners.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present a petition to the House on behalf of 199 signatories. It is sponsored by the Responsible Firearms Coalition of B.C. which prays and requests that Parliament refuse to accept the anti–firearms proposals of the Minister of Justice and insists that he bring forward legislation to convict and punish criminals rather than persecute the innocent.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present five petitions to the House. I have petitions with 976 signatures opposing further gun control.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there are 906 names opposing amendments to the Criminal Code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms that include consideration of same sex relationships.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there are 163 signatures opposing assisted suicide.

ABORTION

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have 128 signatures opposing abortion.

PORT OF CHURCHILL

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, there are 127 names requesting that the port of Churchill be recognized as a permanent, major port facility.

I respectfully submit these petitions with my support.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by 210 residents of the city of Toronto protesting discrimination against persons living in same sex relationships.

The petitioners call on Parliament to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and to adopt all necessary measures to recognize the full equality of same sex relationships in federal law.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

• (1020)

[Translation]

The Speaker: Honourable members, today being the last alloted day for the supply period ending December 10, 1994, the House will now proceed as usual to consider and adopt a supply bill. Considering recent practice, does the House agree that this bill be now distributed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—PROCESS INITIATED BY THE GOVERNMENT OF QUEBEC

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte-Marie, BQ) moved:

That this House enjoin the government to recognize the legitimacy of the democratic process initiated by the Government of Quebec in order to allow Quebecers to chart their own political and constitutional future.

He said: Mr. Speaker, there will be a referendum on sovereignty in Quebec. That referendum will be preceded by a broad democratic consultation throughout Quebec.

Federalists, both in Quebec City and in Ottawa, refuse to take part in that consultation process. But before we discuss the reasons why federalists refuse to participate in that debate, we must put that process into perspective, explain its nature and verify its legitimacy, since federalists are questioning its legitimacy.

First of all, let us make it clear that federalists, headed by the present Prime Minister, are in a very bad position to talk about legitimacy, respect for democracy and clarity. Remember that the present Prime Minister was responsible for patriating the Constitution in 1982. Remember also that there was absolutely no consultation when the Constitution was patriated. There was no referendum. The Quebec National Assembly was against that patriation. The opposition leader in Quebec city and Liberal Party leader, Daniel Johnson, denounced that patriation.

Just recently, during the election campaign in Quebec, it was again the present Prime Minister, with the hon. member for Sherbrooke, who was responsible for the demise of the Meech Lake Accord, through the Charest report, and with the help of Clyde Wells, from Newfoundland, and the help of the present member for Churchill, in Manitoba, who is sitting in this House today.

Quebecers do not need any advice on democracy from the current Prime Minister because the process proposed by the Government of Quebec is entirely legitimate, clear and democratic.

In fact, that process derives directly from the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, which we should not forget. This commission said there were two options: renewed federalism and sovereignty. However, a referendum was held in Quebec as well as in all other parts of Canada on renewed federalism Charlottetown style. The Charlottetown Accord was rejected by Quebec-ers because it was not enough for Quebec and by the rest of Canada because it was too much for Quebec. So only one option remains: sovereignty.

That is the rationale behind the Bélanger–Campeau report, which was signed by Robert Bourassa, Daniel Johnson and all the members on that commission, except the current Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The Government of Quebec must act upon the Bélanger–Campeau report. The question is how. With the proposed consultation process. I have difficulty understanding why the federal government is opposed to such a consultation process since that is all we have been doing here for over a year.

The Committee on Human Resources Development is holding consultations everywhere in Canada, the finance committee just did the same; the Minister of Justice consults left and right without proposing anything concrete to this House. All these consultations are being held without a clear plan, without a bill. They consult for the sake of consulting. On the contrary, the Government of Quebec's initiative is based on a bill, a draft bill which is clear and specific and proposes a plan. To me, this is democracy, this is consultation.

Federalists tell us that there is only one option, a plan for sovereignty. What an amazing discovery, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, it is a plan for sovereignty because a pro–sovereignty government was elected in Quebec in September. What is surprising about a government proposing a plan to achieve its option? The opposite would have been surprising.

As I recall, Meech and Charlottetown were federalist projects. We were not scandalized, we knew that federalists would propose a federalist option to us. It seems logical to me, although the Charlottetown proposal was not all that clear. When the referendum campaign was launched, we did not have the text. There is no need to recall the incredible series of events before we could obtain those texts; in fact sovereignists themselves had to publish the Charlottetown Accord. This time, the texts are there and clear.

You will recall that sovereignists took part in the debate, first on Meech from 1987 to 1990 and then on Charlottetown in 1992. This was not our option but we played our part as elected representatives. Every day in the House, we present our views on bills we are against even though we know from the start that they will be passed. The government has the majority. We are in the minority, the Official Opposition, but nevertheless we express our disagreement, we try to convince people that the bills do not meet the needs of the population as a whole. This is the essence of democracy. We do not take part in debates only when we agree or when we are sure to win. Otherwise democracy would have no meaning. The democratic way is to take part in a debate where the majority expresses its views and so does the minority who also has rights and must express its opinion.

They also tell us that there is no parity. But, Mr. Speaker, was there parity in Bélanger–Campeau? There was no parity in that commission, neither among elected representatives, who were mainly federalists because at that time there was a federalist government in Quebec, nor among non–elected people. You only have to look at the results of the votes that took place at the Bélanger–Campeau Commission. The federalists won. Of course, we already knew it would be the case but we used it as an educational campaign. We were not afraid of expressing our ideas.

Was there parity in Meech and Charlottetown? And let us not forget all those committees on Charlottetown: the Spicer Commission, the Beaudoin–Edwards and Beaudoin–Dobbie committees, where there was no parity. Members of the Bloc were not even invited.

An hon. member: You did not even exist back then.

Mr. Duceppe: Yes, we existed. We were here at the time of Spicer, Beaudoin and company, but we were not invited.

At the Charlottetown conference held after Meech, after having stated that he would never be one of eleven, Mr. Bourassa found himself one of seventeen. Is this the idea of federalist parity, one of eleven, or one of seventeen? How high will it go? Is this the parity we are being proposed?

Sovereignists nevertheless took part in the debate on the Meech Lake Accord. In Quebec, from 1987 to 1990, the PQ, which was the Official Opposition, took part in this debate, in the Bélanger–Campeau Commission and in the Charlottetown exercise, always as a minority. Were we, from the Bloc Quebecois, given parity in this House? We were eight out of 295 to oppose Charlottetown. We were sitting right by the curtain, in what they called "the lobotomy corner". It would seem that only those without any brains could see the truth. We debated Charlottetown. We took part in the debate. There was only one option in this: renewed federalism, which is now called flexible federalism. Why not federalism in search of itself while we are at it?

This is the option they give us. But we had another point of view. Need I recall the results of Charlottetown? We were eight out of 295, but it was rejected in Quebec and rejected in Canada, which proves that democracy must prevail over parity. The majority rules, and commissions follow this pattern. Beyond the numbers there are the ideas, and they succeed if they are good. But then, you need to have ideas.

• (1030)

The bill is entirely consistent with the law governing referenda in Quebec. Those who argue the contrary should at least be honest enough and serious enough to read that law on referenda in Quebec before spreading falsehoods. It would improve the level of the debate. Need we restate that the legislation will not come into force before it is approved in a referendum?

Finally, Quebecers will be called upon to debate the bill before it is put to a vote in the National Assembly. Elected representatives, before they vote, will have to take into consideration the opinion of the people. Now, I am addressing the Reform Party which has been talking about direct democracy for a year in this House. Granted, what the Government of Quebec is doing is not direct democracy, but it is a very interesting consultation process. Yes, we are going to consult Quebecers in all regions before studying the bill in committee, in Quebec City. The bill cannot come into force before a referendum, and even then, another year will pass before sovereignty really takes effect.

It appears to me that this process is very close to democracy. I must say that I do not understand why anyone would be opposed to this process, unless they are afraid to present their ideas to the people.

The process is clear, open and democratic. The decision belongs to Quebecers and nobody else. This is called the right to self–determination, in this case the self–determination of the Quebec nation, a right, need we remind you, recognized by the Conservative Party at its Toronto convention in August 1991, a right recognized by the New Democratic Party as early as the 1960s, and a right recognized especially by the present Prime Minister, who mentioned it in his autobiography. By participating in the 1980 referendum, he recognized in practice the right of Quebecers to decide their own future.

In this regard, I commend the hon. members for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine and for Mount Royal for acknowledging yesterday that the decision would have to be made in Quebec by Quebecers. It is much to their credit that they set themselves apart from the rest of the Liberal caucus.

Indeed, the decision must be made by Quebecers, in Quebec, under the direction of the National Assembly and in accordance with the law governing referenda in Quebec. On this point, the PQ and the QLP, Jacques Parizeau and Daniel Johnson, agree totally. The process is clear.

Why then turn it down? Because federalists have no other option to offer. They cannot even agree among themselves. The former Premier of Quebec, now Leader of the Opposition, Daniel Johnson tells us that status quo is unacceptable. "I will never accept the 1982 Constitution". However, the present Prime Minister considers this Constitution the high point of his career. These people will find themselves under the same umbrella. That is the rub.

As far as the so–called third option presented by the member for Sherbrooke is concerned, well, he would rather not talk about it. That is the rub. They refuse to have a debate. They refuse to crisscross Quebec and have a debate with the citizens of each region. That is the rub.

What is the government proposing? To understand what the Government of Quebec is proposing, we must go back to the Charlottetown Accord. At that time, every party in this House, the Conservatives, the NDP, the Liberals, the Bloc Quebecois, as well as the PQ and the Liberals in Quebec agreed on one thing: the political structures in Canada and Quebec are inadequate in view of today's economic challenges. Everybody agreed on that point. That is the reason why Charlottetown came about. Charlottetown was voted down for the reasons we know: Quebec thought it was not enough, the rest of Canada believed it was too much.

But the structures have not changed since. Canada is no more prepared than Quebec to face the challenges of the modern economy, no more prepared than they both were in 1992. Nothing has changed, yet Canada has to change and so does Quebec.

That is what Quebec's proposal is about. We suggest having two sovereign countries, sharing a common economic space, as all modern countries do, with full participation in international organizations. This brings to mind GATT and NAFTA. On this subject, let me remind you that had it not been for Quebec, there would have been no free trade agreement, because the rest of Canada was against free trade with the United States. It is Quebec that, to a certain extent, imposed free trade on Canada as a whole in 1988.

This proposal shows respect for Quebec's English–speaking minorities, much more respect than French–speaking minorities are shown across Canada. Before coming and telling us about the dangers of sovereignty, Bob Rae should look after having washrooms installed in Kingston high schools. That is the primary duty of any good government. This proposal recognizes the rights of aboriginal nations. Quebec was the first province to do so, as early as 1985, and this draft bill goes much further than any existing Canadian legislation, but we will come back to this later.

Some say there will be no common economic space. Does this mean that there is no room for negotiation? That is what Bob Rae told us, and he is facing an election in the near future. Did he think about the 100,000 jobs in Ontario that depend on the Quebec market? Did he think about the $1.8 billion surplus Ontario businesses make in their commercial transactions with Quebec? Is he going to tell them: "Forget about it, my friends. It is gone, a dead loss"? I doubt it. Did he think about the Auto Pact? Will Bob Rae go to Oshawa during his election campaign and tell the auto workers: "There will be no common economic space. We will not negotiate with Quebec. We will no longer be selling them cars. Let them make their own or buy from Michigan. My friends, we are choosing unemployment out of patriotism"?

Bob Rae can go ahead and tell them that. We will see what comes of it. He will probably not be around to discuss the issue. But we will see where the debate will lead. I am told that he will not be there. I agree with you for once. At any rate, this is where we stand. We want a dispassionate debate and we urge the government to support this process. The hon. members of this House who are from Quebec in particular are invited to express their views, put forward objections, demonstrate in what way our option is dangerous. That is what they have to do: to discuss the implications.

The Government of Quebec and the sovereignists have never been afraid to discuss. Never, ever have they been afraid of the democratic process. And I will close on this. I hope, with respect to federalism, both in Quebec City and in Ottawa, that this government will now show us that it can and will take on the challenge of democracy.

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member and I think he said that one reason he is for separation is that the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords failed. I wonder what the position of the Parti Quebecois and the PQ government was on these two accords.

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, I recalled Meech and Charlottetown because they are actual facts which show that this system cannot be reformed. The PQ government was against Meech and against Charlottetown, clearly. It said so and we attended many committee hearings and took part in these debates both here and in Quebec City to explain our stand. We were not afraid of it. Besides, we were right and we won. But we were against those accords. It shows one thing, that we won against all the federalists put together. I think that the member of the Reform Party voted with the eight members of the Bloc Quebecois then, so maybe we were nine.

• (1040)

There were 286 members convinced and captivated by the Charlottetown Accord. We saw the results. This shows the impotence, not because people cannot change things but because these things cannot be changed. There are two realities. Quebec is not better or worse than the rest of Canada, it is simply different, just as Canada is different from the United States. If I asked all hon. members whether Canada should be a sovereign country separate from the United States, they would say yes. Does this mean that they have contempt for the United States because Canada wants to stay sovereign? No, certainly not.

Neither do we have contempt for Canada. We want to become sovereign for ourselves and have better ties with our Canadian and American friends and all countries in the world.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am sure that my reply will come as no surprise to the opposition member. It is no.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Massé: And let me immediately assure the member that nothing will convince my government to recognize the legitimacy of the process initiated by the PQ government.

The member will agree that many of us have serious problems with the process announced by the PQ government. Let me begin with the leader of the Official Opposition in Quebec City, who aptly labelled it a "misuse of democracy". And for good reason. The Quebec government is asking its citizens to help draw up a constitution for a separate Quebec before they have even had their say on the issue of separation.

I understand why the Premier of Quebec is taking this route. If he asked his fellow citizens the real question, in fact the only legitimate question, "do you want to separate from Canada, yes or no?"the answer would be no. From where he sits, the best approach is to use cunning, and if in the process he flouts democratic principles, so what.

As stated by the member from Sherbrooke, the Premier of Quebec knows his French well. According to the Petit Robert, being cunning means acting slyly to deceive someone for the purpose of doing him harm.

The Quebec media have been no kinder in their assessment of the PQ strategy. An editorial in Le Soleil was headlined "The anesthetization of a people" and spoke of the "misuse of our parliamentary institutions and the misappropriation of public funds for partisan purposes".

According to La Presse, "what is unacceptable is that this bill will be passed by the National Assembly before being put to the people via a referendum. Things are being done in the wrong order". The journalist concluded that we are witnessing a "mockery of democracy".

In today's Le Journal de Montréal, Michel Auger pointed out: "Although the majority of Quebecers still wonder why they should become independent, their government says the only thing left to decide is how it should be done". He went on to say: "In fact, it is quite clear that according to their terms of reference, these commissions would be able to consider one option only: the one chosen by the government".

And in concluding: "Before asking Quebecers to draft the declaration of sovereignty, the government should consider those who have yet to be convinced of the need for sovereignty".

And again in today's Le Soleil, Gilbert Lavoie commented: "Although the strategy may seem clever to those who devised it, its weakness is that it underestimates the political savvy of Quebecers which has been borne out on several occasions". He went on to say: "The government's initiative will disappoint Quebecers, because the Pequistes have preferred strategy over substance". And in concluding: "The trap is so obvious that one would have to be very myopic indeed not to see it".

• (1045)

Even in Le Devoir, under the headline "The stratagem is too obvious", Pierre O'Neill started his article by pointing out that: "Through academic eyes, the consultation process started by Premier Parizeau is viewed with some scepticism. Political scientist Vincent Lemieux feels that the Pequiste initiative lacks legitimacy. 'I think the stratagem is too obvious', commented the Laval University professor yesterday, the man to whom Jean–François Lisée, political adviser to the Premier, referred in 1993 as the Galileo of Quebec politics".

In Wednesday's La Presse, Alain Dubuc comments: "This pretence of democracy is disturbing. It excludes, for all practical purposes, those who are opposed to sovereignty and turns these commissions into clubs for friends of the PQ, which may attract the attention of the media for a while, at public expense, and maintain temporary the illusion of almost unanimous support for the yes side. This whole strategy, which the Premier himself referred to as cunning, has its own limitations. Manipulation can backfire. Referendums, both here and elsewhere, have shown that if there is anything citizens cannot abide, it is manipulation by politicians".

Michel David, also in Wednesday's Le Soleil, pointed out: "When Mr. Parizeau used the word stratagem two weeks ago, Daniel Johnson immediately concluded it was a scam to fool Quebecers". Mr. David went on to say: "In fact, they pulled a fast one: members of the Premier's staff confided yesterday that the text of the draft bill on sovereignty had been ready since last March. Within the PQ, members had been polled on each section. Each individual section was supported by the majority. In other words, Mr. Parizeau knew well before the election campaign what question he would ask, once he was elected, but he said nothing to the voters. Why, if the case is as clear as he says it is? What about the relationship of trust?"

I could go on for several minutes, quoting people from coast to coast. No one is being taken in by the Quebec Premier's chicanery. Not the media, not the other provincial premiers, not those of us here in Ottawa, not the Quebec Liberal Party and, unfortunately, to the great dismay of our friends opposite, not the citizens of Quebec.

Mr. Serré: Quebecers are not crazy.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Massé: But it would be more useful to ask ourselves why Quebec's separatist government is so intent on using trickery. The answer is simple. If it played fair and square, if it "put everything on the table", as the Quebec premier has said time and time again, if it went to the people and asked them to decide once and for all, I am convinced that the great majority of Quebecers would opt for Canada.

And this is understandable. Canada is one of the greatest, if not the greatest, countries in the world. Do not take my word for it, just ask the United Nations. I know that certain words are taboo for separatists. Federalism is one. But sooner or later, the connection will have to be made between this political structure and the quality of life we enjoy. For is it pure chance that the four oldest federations in the world—the United States, Switzerland, Australia and Canada—are also among the world's richest countries?

Mr. Duceppe: And the USSR?

Mrs. Ringuette–Maltais: Are we taking about democracy or not?

Mr. Massé: I think, rather, that federalism is better suited than almost any other political structure to the modern challenges facing societies today.

• (1050)

We all know that the dual phenomenon of market globalization and the economic revolution shaking the world's industrialized countries requires of each country that it develop to the maximum its potential and its wealth—the things that make it distinct—but also that it be able to act effectively on the international scene, and that is what Canada has done.

We rank seventh among the world's industrialized countries and we enjoy the highest standard of living. Over the past 30 years, we have had the second highest economic growth rate among G–7 countries, behind Japan; among OECD countries, we rank seventh.

Over the past 30 years, we have had the highest rate of job creation among OECD countries and the highest increase in employment per capita. Canada's continued exceptional performance is related to the maintenance and increase of the federal system's effective operations. Federalism permits a central government that efficiently manages activities of international scope—trade, stock markets, environmental protection, international communications.

Not only does this sound international management benefit the members of Confederation, but, within the federal system, economies of scale can also be achieved in implementing national programs and infrastructure that the constituent members alone could not offer their citizens. Just think of the postal service and the armed forces.

I know that my colleagues on the other side of the house do not share this point of view. For them, Confederation is a dead end, and they want out. But the people of Canada and Quebec instinctively know that, in the new world order, influence on the international scene is important. This influence is directly linked to whether or not you play a role in international forums. You have to be where decisions are made and standards are set. Canada is not a superpower, but it is the world's eighth largest exporter and importer. We are thus doubly entitled to membership in the Group of Seven. No province or regional group could aspire to membership in this forum. I repeat, Mr. Speaker: None. But together, as part of Confederation, they are all members.

Nothing will be said about these benefits of federalism in the consultation that the Government of Quebec wishes to undertake with its friends. Likewise, nothing will be said about the fact that, within Canada, Quebec is part of a Pacific Rim country.

To quote the Prime Minister of Canada, "membership has its privileges". When you consider the dazzling growth of Asian economies, which are very appropriately called the dragons of the East, it is understandable that the separatists do not dare to mention this. The only way they could do so would be to ask Quebecers if they want to give up another benefit of Canada.

It is true that the separatist ministers have already waived these benefits in their surrealistic description of Canada. The Quebec Minister for Restructuring has thus neglected—intentionally or unintentionally—to include the equalization payments that Canada makes to Quebec: $3.7 billion in 1993 and about $3.92 billion in 1994–95.

Quebecers' attachment to Canada is not just a matter of benefits and dollars and cents. The people of Quebec built this country. They shaped it and continue to do so. This country is French to the depths of its heart and soul. From sea to sea, French Canadians know that they can deal with their federal government in their own language.

• (1055)

Bilingualism is enshrined in this country's very Constitution, which can be amended only with the consent of all legislative assemblies. This, in effect, gives Quebec's National Assembly a veto. In the same way, the Canadian Constitution guarantees Quebec three of the nine judgeships on the Supreme Court. No other province has such guarantees. When you consider the increasing impact of this court's decisions, you realize that the soul of Quebec will continue to influence and define Canada as a country for a long time to come.

I confess that listening to the current Premier of Quebec makes me smile sometimes. Not often, but sometimes.

I could not help noting how he went about demonstrating Quebec's know–how in his speeches to the Chamber of Commerce of Montreal and the Canadian Club in Toronto, and even his address this week. No one has ever doubted this know–how. But when I hear him mention Céline Dion, Denys Arcand, the Cirque du Soleil, Bombardier, Lavalin and a host of others, I cannot help telling myself that all of them have succeeded within Canada, some of them with direct or indirect assistance from the federal government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Massé: Mr. Speaker, the ancestors of the people of Quebec were among the first Europeans to set foot on Canadian soil. They built this country with their daring, ingenuity and courage, and not even a premier will hoodwink them into throwing in the towel and pulling out of Canada. The men and women of Quebec received this country as their heritage and want to pass it on to their children.

The motion before the House is contrary to Canada's historical roots. It would have us, the people of Quebec, forget our origins and our ancestors, and disregard 127 years of shared history which have resulted in raising us to the rank of one of the best countries in the world.

I will thus vote against this motion out of respect for history, and out of duty to my children and to democracy.

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have some comments to make in response to the speech by the hon. member opposite.

He harshly criticized the Quebec government's draft bill, which he has a right to do. However, his very federalist and quite ordinary speech, except for the first part in which he used the word "astuce" in French, only referred to the status quo, something which we have been hearing here in this House for some 20 years and which Quebecers are sick and tired of listening to.

We looked up the definition of the word "astuce", because it may be the only interesting point that you raised at the beginning of your speech. Forgive me, Mr. Speaker, I should address my comments to you.

The word "astuce"in old French means this:

> Ability to deceive others in order to harm them or get something out of them.

I agree. Rather than the old French definition, the hon. member opposite should use the modern–day definition, which is "ingeniousness and inventiveness".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Deshaies: Mr. Speaker, the opposite of astute is crude and unintelligent.

I would like us to use current terminology to describe Quebecers as ingenious and inventive.

• (1100)

As the hon. member opposite pointed out, Quebecers have shown inventiveness through companies like Bombardier, artists like Céline Dion, etc. Yes, Quebec wants to chart its future, and Quebec's draft bill is a way to do this.

To return to the old definition of "astuce", the federal government may not be in a position to teach Quebec anything. In 1982, when the Constitution was patriated unilaterally, the federal government deceived René Lévesque during the night of the long knives. Was it a federalist scam? We should really talk about it.

One fact cannot be denied. Quebec citizens sent a 54–member majority to the House of Commons, and they knew about our allegiance. My hon. colleague would surely like to tell me that all those who voted for the Bloc Quebecois may not have been sovereignists, sovereignists and separatists.

Mr. Serré: Separatists.

Mr. Deshaies: Sovereignists or separatists, whatever. If you want to use the old terminology, that is your choice.

Sorry, Mr. Speaker, I am getting carried away.

The people who voted for the Bloc Quebecòis were also fed up with the current federal system, because of mismanagement by the central government. According to a poll, 66 per cent of Quebecers reject the status quo or the current federal system. The hon. members opposite might reply that federal Liberals offer flexible federalism. Allow me to question this flexibility, when Quebec and several other provinces are still waiting for this flexibility, promised in every election, after 10 years under Tory governments and the 10 years before that under the Trudeau government and others.

What is important to me and to all the people in the riding of Abitibi, who ask me when they will receive information on the sovereignty plan, is that the draft bill is a way to receive this information. People want to know more about the grounds on which their decision will be based.

I have a question for the hon. member opposite: What about the need to address Quebecers' needs, to give them information, and not just federalist rhetoric? Why should they stay in the federalist system, why?

Mr. Massé: Mr. Speaker, first of all, the hon. member opposite questions the use of words. I thought that I had read enough editorials written by contemporary French Canadians from Quebec. They are experts in using the pen and the dictionary. They were not caught up in words. They saw the ruse behind the lack of democracy and called it secretive and a show of democracy. Public opinion in Quebec is clearly that Mr. Parizeau's proposal is not democratic; whether it is called sneaky, a sham or secretive, it is still unacceptable.

Second, speaking of federalism and flexible federalism, our country has evolved over 127 years with relatively few changes to the Constitution, but with tremendous changes affecting the jurisdiction of the provinces and the federal government and with continuous adjustments to a changing economic, political and social environment. We can continue to evolve within the present Constitution and we do continue to evolve, making very considerable changes that affect jurisdiction, the way the country is governed and our social programs, provided that we know how to act as partners.

That is true federalism. History shows us that it has worked and provided solutions and given Canada the highest standard of living in the world.

• (1105)

This did not happen by accident or despite the federal system, on the contrary. The reason Canada, including Quebec, is one of the best countries in the world, maybe the best, is its federal structure, which year after year has proven to be good for Canadians, good for Quebecers and adaptable to change. It will help us adjust to the economic, political and social changes now going on in the outside world.

Third, although there are 54 Bloc Quebecois members in this House, let us not forget that we, Liberals, form a government which is perceived across the country as an efficient and honest government. This is evidenced by the fact that, for the last three months, public support in the polls has been maintained at an all–time high of 63 per cent for any government in the 54 years that such polls have been conducted.

In Quebec, while our leader enjoyed relatively low support, somewhere around 20 per cent, during the election campaign, that support has climbed up to 47 per cent in recent weeks, the same as for Lucien Bouchard. This means that Quebecers themselves have a favourable opinion of the way the federal government is working on their behalf.

As for mandate, it is clear that Mr. Parizeau, and he said so himself dozens of times during the election campaign, was not elected with a mandate to achieve sovereignty: He was elected to provide a new government and, really, to create jobs, just like us. The fact that Mr. Parizeau's party received 44 per cent of the popular vote is tantamount to a rejection of sovereignty. It is totally undemocratic to table a draft bill which takes for granted that sovereignty has already been accepted as a goal by Quebecers, since the facts show that the contrary is true.

By introducing its draft bill, the Parizeau government is trying to fool Quebecers; it is using a ploy which is both a scam and an undemocratic measure. This is a view shared by us, by our government and by the majority of Quebecers and Quebec editorialists. I am convinced that when the time comes for Quebecers to choose between separation and flexible federalism, they will opt for the latter.

In conclusion, the motion tabled by the opposition clearly does not respect the democratic spirit of Canadians, including Quebecers, and it must be rejected.

The Speaker: There are approximately 60 seconds left in the debate, or 30 seconds for each side. The hon. member for Chambly.

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, can the hon. minister explain in what respect the Charlottetown process was more democratic that the one proposed by the Quebec government? In the Charlottetown process, I remember that we were even asked to vote on unwritten agreements, and, in the third round of the 1992 referendum, when the government realized that the house was on fire, they had to hurriedly write up the infamous Charlottetown accord, where they asked Canadians, and Quebecers in particular, to vote on something which did not even exist in concrete terms.

We kept hearing: "Trust us, because we know, we feel, and we tell you what is right", but nothing was written up. In what respect was that process more democratic than the present one? I would appreciate an answer from the minister.

• (1110)

Mr. Massé: Mr. Speaker, the motion before the House attempts to determine, rather it states the Bloc Quebecois's position on democracry, based on what Mr. Parizeau did. In fact, what he did is clearly undemocratic because his bill takes for granted an answer to a question which was never asked, and because this regional commission procedure is really a joke, as it recreates fifteen yes committees. That is the unanimous view of Quebecers and that is clearly why these are undemocratic proposals.

[English]

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to address the Bloc motion that the House enjoin the government to recognize the legitimacy of the democratic process initiated by the Government of Quebec in order to allow Quebecers to chart their own political and constitutional future.

The motion raises two essential questions which I would like to deal with one at a time. The first question is: What is the so–called democratic process initiated by the Quebec government? According to the draft bill tabled by Mr. Parizeau in the Quebec assembly, the process consists of the following.

First, the publication of a draft bill, a bill which is clearly illegal in terms of the Canadian Constitution, followed by additional steps designed to legitimate this illegal act;

Second, a period of information and participation for the purposes of approving this illegal bill and drafting a declaration of sovereignty which will form part of its preamble;

Third, discussion of this illegal bill respecting the sovereignty of Quebec and its passage by the National Assembly; and Fourth, approval of this illegal act by the population in a referendum.

In other words, what we have here is a process designed to attempt to give democratic legitimacy to an illegal act of the Quebec assembly. So far we note that the federal government has been extremely reluctant to point out the illegality of what is proposed. I was hoping the minister might do that today. I am convinced that if some other province such as the province of Alberta were today to table an act in its legislature completely out of its own jurisdiction such as, say, alternative gun control legislation and attempted to legitimize it by a process such as this, it would not take the federal government 30 seconds to make clear the illegality and unacceptability of what was being proposed.

I suggest that even within Quebec if a portion of that community, say the Mohawk Nation through its elected council, were to table such a bill and attempt to legitimize it by such a process, the Quebec government would be the first to declare such an act and such a process illegal and illegitimate.

The second question is the bigger question: What are the generally accepted tests of democratic legitimacy and how does the so–called democratic process initiated by the Quebec government stand up to those tests? The first test is the rule of law.

In free countries democratic legitimacy refers to the general acceptability of a process in the political community. A process is considered legitimate if it is supported by the constitution of a political community, in other words whether or not it conforms to the rule of law. In Canada this means that all proceedings relating to constitutional change, even an attempted secession, must take place within the rules established by the Constitution of Canada. That means that constitutional change of any kind should take place by the means of a formal amendment to the Canadian Constitution. Acts which are clearly unconstitutional are also clearly illegitimate.

In this case, virtually every clause of the act respecting the sovereignty of Quebec is clearly unconstitutional, notably the declaration of sovereignty in section 1, the undefined rules of constitution making in section 3, the territorial provisions in section 4, the citizenship rules in section 5, the treaty rights assumed in section 7, the alliance rights assumed in section 8, the assumption of the ability to overrule federal laws by the provincial assembly claimed in section 10, the removal of the authority of the Supreme Court of Canada in section 12, and the assumption of the right to make appointments to federal bodies in section 13.

Each of these sections is therefore illegitimate, as is the act as a whole.

• (1115)

If the Government of Quebec wishes to proceed with constitutional changes, including one as drastic as secession, there is a way to do so. That is through a formal amendment to the Canadian Constitution. The Government of Quebec has not chosen that route. Both the route it has chosen and the process it employs do not meet the test of the rule of law.

The second test is direct questions on real options. To be legitimate direct democracy must ask direct questions. The question posed in the act respecting the sovereignty of Quebec is indirect and misleading. It does not ask the straight simple question: Should Quebec secede from Canada, yes or no? Instead it asks: Are you in favour of the act passed by the National Assembly declaring the sovereignty of Quebec? The key provisions of the act however do not go into force until after the referendum is approved.

Section 16 of the act states that section 2, to negotiate an economic association with Canada, section 3, to write a constitution for Quebec, and section 15, to negotiate a division of the assets and debts of Canada, do not go into effect until after it is too late for the voters to change their minds. This is clearly illegitimate from the standpoint of direct democracy. It is even illegitimate compared to Levesque's 1980 question which promised to provide a completed package which would then be submitted to voters for their further approval at a second referendum.

The draft act itself which is at the heart of the process is also filled with misconceptions and misrepresentations. There is the misconception that an economic association with Canada will automatically be attained and agreed to by Canada. There is the assumption that Quebec will retain the boundaries it has within the Canadian Confederation at the time the act comes into force. There is the assumption of dual citizenship which is entirely beyond the capacity of even a sovereign Quebec to grant and the assumption that Quebec shall assume the obligations and enjoy the rights arising out of treaties to which Canada is a part. All of these are misconceptions and misrepresentations which cannot be legitimately promised by any Quebec government, sovereign or not.

The draft bill is a hollow shell with the content to be provided only after the shell has been approved by the public. To use a more down to earth metaphor, the draft bill is a blank cheque which the Government of Quebec seeks to induce the Quebec electorate to sign.

For a process that claims to be democratic, to be legitimate it must also provide opportunity for all the options which might potentially gain majority support, including those that are repugnant to the proponents and managers of the process to be considered. Yet clearly all options for reform within federalism are precluded under the act respecting the sovereignty of Quebec. Only within the constitution of a sovereign Quebec will reforms be considered so everybody, including those who oppose secession, are forced to participate in the process of writing a declaration of independence even if they are not in favour of independence.

The referendum process itself, including the Quebec referendum law, does not provide for adequate consideration of all the options. In particular Quebecers will only be presented with a choice between status quo federalism and sovereignty. The principal alternative option, namely a complete rebuilding of the federal system from the bottom up, is not assured even a fair hearing let alone consideration.

The third test is of democratic legitimacy, inclusiveness and non–coercion. Democracy must be inclusive allowing all who are affected to vote, but the interests of the people in the rest of Canada in whether or not their country will be torn asunder are not even acknowledged. What is legitimate about declaring arbitrarily that democratic self–determination is the exclusive right of the people of Quebec constituted as a single arbitrarily defined collectivity?

The process defined in the draft bill in no way shape or form acknowledges that the people of Canada also have a right to choose their national future. Nor does it deal adequately with the democratic rights of the people of any region of Quebec, many of whom might choose to secede from Quebec and remain a part of Canada.

In addition to all this, the process proposed by the draft bill is essentially coercive. As I said, all options for reform within federalism are precluded under the act respecting the sovereignty of Quebec. Only within the constitution of a sovereign Quebec will reforms be considered.

• (1120)

Even groups that have no interest in broader constitutional questions will be forced to participate in the process of developing an act of secession for fear that if they do not their interests will be left out of the Quebec constitution. As each new group joins in, all those who are left out will feel increasing pressure to join in, thus driving the process toward the inevitable conclusion of separation. This is not democratic consent at all but forced consent which is a charade of democracy.

All the polls to date indicate that a majority of Quebecers do not want to secede from Canada if given a clear choice on that question. The separatist Government of Quebec obviously does not accept that opinion. It has put together a process designed not to give fair and legitimate recognition to majority opinion but to create majority support for a minority opinion.

In conclusion, the bottom line is that the process as proposed by the Quebec government and supported by the Bloc does not meet the great tests of democratic legitimacy. It is not in accordance with the rule of law. It does not ask direct questions on real options. It is not inclusive and it is coercive.

Obviously therefore the process should be rejected by all democrats in Canada whether in Quebec or outside it and regardless of their constitutional opinions and preferences. Obviously the House should defeat the motion.

The proposed bill and processes are also extremely revealing with respect to the character of the current Government of Quebec. All democratic governments, including the Government of Quebec, should be held accountable to respect the rule of law and the basic criteria of free democratic processes. If a government does not respect those processes and uses illegitimate processes to induce its own population to support illegal acts, how can any member of that society be assured that such a government will not do the same thing again at some future date, disregarding both the rule of law again and using illegitimate processes again, this time to manipulate its own people against their will?

The federal government as the government with responsibility for the peace, order, good government and economic well–being of all Canadians has a responsibility to make clear the illegality and illegitimacy of what the Government of Quebec proposes. The federal government has a responsibility as a bare minimum to refute the misconceptions concerning economic association, sovereignty association and dual citizenship which are at the heart of the Quebec government's bill and process. We assume that the federal government will be discharging these responsibilities in the course of this debate and in the days ahead.

The federal cabinet ministers make frequent reference to wanting to avoid playing Parizeau's game, but Parizeau's game is to take initiatives, including illegal initiatives, and assume that the federal government will do nothing but fume and sputter. It is time for the federal government to stop playing Parizeau's game and begin discharging its responsibilities for preserving the peace, order, good government and economic well–being of Canada and all Canadians.

[Translation]

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Madam Speaker, first of all, I want to emphasize the following point: federalists seem to have been caught unawares and to be panic–stricken. They use everything, every false statement they can think of, to try to show that the process initiated by Quebecers does not meet their standards.

The leader of the Reform Party started by saying that he thinks that the Quebec government's draft bill is illegal. I am sure that the Premier of Quebec had everything checked out before initiating this process. In fact, we are confident that the bill is in accordance with Quebec's Referendum Act.

Second, federalists have been talking all morning about democracy. This has me very puzzled. Federalists are now trying everything to convince Quebecers, especially federalists, not to take part in this process. If democracy is being abused, it is by the federalists who are trying very hard to ensure that Quebec federalists do not take part in this democratic experience.

If we were dealing with an extremely complex draft bill, comprised of hundreds of clauses that the average citizen would have a hard time understanding, they might have good reasons to be concerned. But the draft bill is made up of just 16 very straightforward clauses that only set out the definition of sovereignty that is generally accepted in Quebec. So, this definition does not take anyone by surprise, except the federalists who still think that they can convince Quebecers by making empty speeches on the beauty and the sheer size of Canada.

For the last 50 years, Quebecers have been trying slowly but surely to show that they do not feel at ease within the Canadian federation. They have been expressing their feelings in a very special and original way, by creating brand new political parties that can be found nowhere else but in Quebec. Here are a few of those parties: the Action libérale nationale, the Union nationale, the Bloc populaire, the Rassemblement pour l'indépendance nationale, the Rassemblement national, the Parti Quebecois and the Bloc Quebecois. Why have Quebecers felt, for the last 50 years, the need to have their own tools to promote Quebec's interests? Obviously because the big parties, the Liberals and the Conservatives, federalists by definition, have never been able to get in touch with the soul of Quebec. So do not talk to us about democracy!

Federalists also seem to have forgotten some important historical events. I would like to remind them that 14 countries were present at the Madrid Conference in 1880. In 1920, 47 countries were represented at the very first general assembly of the League of Nations. In 1945, representatives of 50 countries witnessed the signing of the Charter of the United Nations, in San Francisco. In 1990, there were 175 countries and it is estimated that in 5 or 10 years, the number of countries will reach 200. This goes to show that nations have understood that sovereignty helps to correct inequities. By becoming sovereign, smaller nations reach the same level as bigger countries. This is essentially what Quebec wants.

In conclusion, I would like to put a question to the leader of the Reform Party: Does he think that the people of Quebec are a nation?

[English]

Mr. Manning: Madam Speaker, the short answer to the latter question is that I believe Quebecers are a distinct people. I do not believe that automatically conveys a right to establish an independent state by illegal means. I will answer some of the other points the member raised in the order he raised them.

We do not shy away from the legitimate use of the democratic process to settle the most profound questions, including the question of secession. We believe those processes should be in accordance with the rule of law, they should ask real questions about the real issue and they should present all the options.

The option we are most concerned about in Quebec that is not being considered, and maybe we are having difficulty communicating it to our Bloc friends, is that there is a legitimate third option. It is not the hon. member for Sherbrooke's third option.

All across the country there are people who want to rebuild federalism from the bottom up in a much more profound way. Meech Lake and Charlottetown were top down. That is what was wrong with them and that is why we rejected them.

All across the country there are people who want to rebuild the federal system from the bottom up. We believe that the process which has been suggested here and the process which has been followed in Quebec for the last 30 years have not given that option a legitimate opportunity for expression, nor does the process outlined in this act.

● (1130)

There are two more points arising from the member's comments. He suggested that sovereignty is a legitimate and principal means of dealing with inequality. I question him. Does the member actually believe that the way to deal, for example, with inequalities within Quebec is that if someone feels unequal the way to cope with that is to declare themselves sovereign and independent from the framework in which they feel the inequality?

That principle can be preached here in defence of Quebec's attempts to secede. I doubt very much whether any of the members would agree to it if it was put forward by someone in Quebec as an argument for addressing their inequality and seceding from Quebec.

My last point is on the question of legality. I would challenge the Bloc members to table in the House a legal opinion from any respected constitutional authority saying that the bill that has been tabled in the Quebec legislature is within the legislative competence of the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Laurent Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry, BQ): Madam Speaker, my comments are not necessarily for the Reform Party or the Liberal Party. My comments are aimed specifically at all Canadian federalists.

We are being accused of proposing an undemocratic process to Quebecers. Contrary to what we are used to on the Canadian political scene, this is an exciting project in democracy, since not only will Quebecers not have something forced on them by elected representatives in their ivory tower but they are all invited by Mr. Parizeau to take part in the process. And this is what democracy is all about.

So it is totally wrong to pretend that the process initiated by the Parti Quebecois is undemocratic. On the contrary, the proposed process could not be more democratic, since all Quebecers, federalists, liberals or conservatives or whatever will be able to get involved. This project is 100 per cent democratic, since all Quebecers will have their say.

I see that my time is running out. I will come back to this later today because I absolutely want to give further insights into the federal government's sharp dealings with Quebec in the last 40 years or so.

In response to my question, I would like the leader of the Reform Party to tell us what democracy is to him. Is it a decision made by a prime minister or is it a decision coming from the grass roots?

[English]

Mr. Manning: Madam Speaker, I thought I made myself clear as to what I consider democracy to be. The heart of it is the consent of the governed and democratic processes have to meet certain basic fundamental tests no matter where we talk about democracy in the world.

Those tests are as follows. They must conform to the rule of law. Second, they must ask real questions about the real issue, not indirect questions. Third, they must present all options and allow equal opportunity for all options. Fourth, the processes must result in getting the consent of the governed.

[Translation]

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Madam Speaker, before beginning my speech, I would like to advise you that from now on, members of the Official Opposition will make 10–minute speeches.

When I hear the big guns of federalism call undemocratic the process to consult the people announced by the Premier of Quebec, Jacques Parizeau, on December 6, when he presented the draft bill on Quebec sovereignty, I seriously worry about the political maturity of the federal Liberals and the Official Opposition in the Quebec National Assembly.

• (1135)

I have the rather startling impression of being in front of a class of teenagers who refuse to grow up. Let me explain. Any psychologist can tell you that magical thinking is one characteristic of adolescence. A classical example is a teen–age girl who knows the facts of life but is convinced that she cannot become pregnant because that happens only to others. I am sure that all hon. members could put a face or a name to the young girl in my example. Everybody knows perfectly well that magical thinking cannot prevent the oldest reproductive technique in the world from working efficiently. The number of unwanted pregnancies among teenagers proves it beyond question.

No, Madam Speaker, magical thinking does not make it so, no matter what the Deputy Prime Minister and the premiers of Ontario and New Brunswick, all long–time allies of Quebec, may think. The announced process is highly democratic.

It is unreasonable to claim that the draft bill presented by Mr. Parizeau is unfounded, undemocratic or a fraud or that the Quebec government is trying to win the referendum by deceiving people, because those incisive comments and others like them will never be powerful enough filters to make something democratic, undemocratic.

The hon. member for Sherbrooke used Le Petit Robert to give us a definition of the word "astuce". Everybody was impressed by his "cleverness". Since he is an experienced and I might even say a clever politician, I thought I could do the same thing and look up the word "democracy" in the dictionary. Here is what I found:

> Political doctrine according to which sovereignty must belong to the people.

My world goes beyond the dictionary. Patrick Watson, a renowned journalist who was even chairman of the CBC, wrote: "Democracy consists of verbal exchanges. It favours discussion over force, deliberations over mood swings, good reasons over powerful weapons, consensus over conflict, peace over war, co–operation over competition".

It seems that supporters of the status quo or, if you prefer, supporters of "flexible" federalism, have chosen force, mood swings, powerful weapons, conflict, war and competition. What is sad for democracy is to see that democratically elected men and women have rejected discussion, deliberations, good reasons, consensus, peace and co–operation.

The draft bill on Quebec's sovereignty contains 17 clauses. Clause 10 stipulates that existing federal laws that apply in Quebec shall remain in force until amended or repealed by the National Assembly. Is it undemocratic to ask the approval of Quebecers to have, in a sovereign Quebec, laws that meet their needs?

Is it undemocratic to ask them if they are sick and tired of all these endless jurisdictional quarrels over health, education, income security programs, manpower training and social security? The process that the Government of Quebec has launched is very democratic. In the end, the people's sanction will replace the royal sanction. This process is certainly as democratic as the federal government's consultation process on social reform.

The objective pursued by this government of cutting social programs at the expense of the unemployed, welfare recipients, women and students in order to contain a huge deficit, is simply not acceptable to the people of Quebec. The debate proposed by the Quebec government will give them an opportunity to say so once again.

Instead of creating jobs, the federal government chooses to cut left and right. The federal government is unable to make the proper diagnosis; it does not deserve the confidence of the people of Quebec since it is unable to administer the appropriate medicine.

In the area of education, the federal government is innovating by proposing to reduce the federal contribution to post–secondary educational institutions, and by way of compensation it is encouraging our young people to go into debt. There is no question of giving Quebec full jurisdiction for occupational training despite the clearly established labour–management consensus on that. Since the federal government runs the unemployment insurance program, it makes the decisions on manpower training programs. Never mind the inefficiency, the red tape and the waste of taxpayers' money!

The proposed social security reform, especially as regards the Canada assistance plan and child tax benefits, is equally unacceptable for Quebec because it maintains, indeed even increases, federal encroachment on Quebec's areas of jurisdiction. Quebec will never accept being subject to national standards—not today, no more than yesterday and certainly not tomorrow.

Is it unreasonable to ask the people of Quebec whether they believe that the Quebec government is able to take on all the responsibilities in these areas of jurisdiction and to make its own laws in these areas?

It would be unreasonable and undemocratic not to listen to what the people of Quebec have to say on that subject. Clause 10 of the draft bill on Quebec sovereignty will give them an opportunity to express themselves democratically.

Clause 11 clarifies a particularly sensitive point. Many of us remember the horror stories told to our senior citizens by the federalist werewolves in 1980, that if they voted yes they would lose their pensions.

Today, nobody would buy these statements made in bad faith. Since bad faith is hard to eradicate, the government wisely saw fit to specify as follows: "Pensions and supplements payable to the elderly shall continue to be paid by the Government according to the same terms and conditions".

I am almost tempted to say that I would not be surprised if Quebecers considered that clause useless, because in 1994 fear is completely out of the picture. Democracy also means being free from fear.

Quebec is a distinct society, and for a long time democracy in Quebec has been just as healthy as it is in any other jurisdiction. Quebecers know it, and they are rightly proud of it.

I will conclude by quoting Patrick Watson: "Through referendums, citizens do much more than choose their representatives; they govern themselves. But, if the referendum process does not include a civic education program or public education meetings, rich and influential people will use it to manipulate voters".

The process outlined in the draft bill on Quebec sovereignty puts the issues on the table and lets all citizens discuss them. I regret that federalists in Quebec will not participate, but I am sure Quebecers will get a better understanding of what democracy means, because their sensible, thoughtful and enthusiastic participation will prevent "rich and influential people" from manipulating voters, because the process set out by the Quebec government will let them govern directly.

• (1145)

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the speeches made up to now. As far as I can see, there is not much consistency in the speeches made by members of the Bloc today.

Earlier this morning, we heard a member of the Bloc Quebecois inform us that it is because of Quebec that NAFTA was signed. However, we all know very well, and it is quite clear for me as a member from New Brunswick, that the government of Quebec has been reluctant in recent decades to liberalize trade between the Canadian provinces.

How can they say, on the one hand, that they support free trade with the United States and Mexico and, on the other hand, that they are extremely reluctant to liberalize interprovincial trade?

The member said earlier that Quebecers will have a clear and definite choice. In the process which has started, where is this clear and definite choice? There is none because the working paper presents only one option to Quebecers. Where is the overall plan Mr. Parizeau promised the people of Quebec? Where is this overall plan? Maybe we will keep the Canadian dollar. Maybe we will have Canadian passports. This plan is full of maybes. It is not with such proposals that Quebecers can make an enlightened choice. We cannot make an enlightened choice on the basis on uncertainties.

This is duplicity. I remember reading, and I read a lot, all the history books about Quebec when Quebecers stood up and opposed the dark age of Duplessis. I am also convinced that they will say no to the undemocratic dark age of Parizeau.

My question is as follows: Since the suggested process accepts only the separatist position, how will it inform the supporters of independence of the risks which will threaten them for generations? I am not asking this question and making these comments in a partisan way. I am making them because of the strong roots I have in Quebec and because I am concerned about the present and future well–being of Quebecers.

Mrs. Dalphond–Guiral: Madam Speaker, I wish to thank the government member for her comments. I must admit I did not understand when she said right out that Bloc members' statements were inconsistent.

I failed to understand because in fact there were two speeches and some comments. Obviously no one will support the undemocratic philosophy advocated by our political opponents. Why not admit that NAFTA came about largely because of all the efforts made by Quebecers? I am thinking here particularly about the present Quebec Minister of International Affairs, Bernard Landry, who insisted so much on the necessity of free trade for Canada and of course for Quebec.

• (1150)

In response to the question raised by my hon. colleague who is wondering how in God's name we will make Quebecers aware of all the incredible risks that lie ahead for them, I say this: The best way to inform Quebecers about these so–called risks—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Order, please. I would ask the hon. member to be brief.

Mrs. Dalphond–Guiral: May I go on? Thank you, Madam Speaker.

How can Quebecers be informed about these so–called risks if people will not sit at a table and take part in the consultations which will be held by the provincial government? The debate is open.

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Madam Speaker, today, as a member of the Bloc Quebecois and as a member of Parliament representing Quebec, I am proud to answer the call of the Premier of Quebec.

The Premier of Quebec has asked us to mobilize our resources, organize consultation meetings and prepare for the Quebec of the future. Today, I would like to focus on two specific points in order to deal with the questions that people are asking, including the questions asked by the hon. member of the Liberal Party who spoke just now.

What does the draft bill have to say about currency and the apportionment of debt or, as it says in the bill, apportionment of property and debts? I will start with the first item: currency. What criteria will be applied to determine the currency to be used in a sovereign Quebec?

Sovereignists were part of the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, although it was organized by a party in power that, as we have seen throughout, was clearly of the federalist persuasion. The commission did a number of studies, and the two points I want to discuss with you, currency and apportionment of property and debts, were examined in–depth by the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, a commission that enjoyed considerable recognition and credibility in Quebec and was accepted by the entire population.

This commission listed the criteria to be considered, and I will mention the five principal criteria: economic interdependence, minimizing uncertainty, maintaining the same economic space, the stability of a dollar that is broader based, and trade with other countries that do not use the same currency. All these criteria lead us to conclude that it would be better for Quebec and Canada if we used Canadian currency in Quebec.

The hon. member who pointed out that the bill was not clear may wish to listen to section 6, which refers to currency. The draft bill says: "The legal currency of Quebec shall continue to be the Canadian dollar".

A large number of Quebec's exports go to Canada. Many businesses in Quebec and Ontario or elsewhere in Canada, in New Brunswick and the west, that export their products would be better off if we had the same dollar, which would simplify transactions and avoid the additional cost of using a different currency. This would prevent much of the uncertainty that would otherwise be caused by Canada's currency being more narrowly based and the use of a new currency in Quebec.

Therefore both parties would benefit from having the same currency. It would greatly facilitate negotiations on the sharing of assets and the debt if the debt were calculated in the same currency. Therefore a monetary union is clearly desirable.

However, the Quebec Premier said that he wishes to hear the opinion of Quebecers on that matter. Being from a border area I hope and I am convinced that people in my riding and region will express their views on the currency they wish to use in a sovereign Quebec. Many of them will certainly prefer to keep the Canadian currency.

I can see my federalist friends jotting things down and preparing to say: "What guarantee do you have that you will be able to keep the Canadian currency?" Nothing prevents Quebec from doing so. I can hardly imagine the Prime Minister asking the Bank of Canada to print on bank notes: "This note is legal tender everywhere in the world except in Quebec". How would that look? How would it be interpreted? How would he explain to businesses that from now on it will cost more to do business? Because for many people doing business in Quebec is profitable. They do not do it for charitable reasons but because it is profitable. How will he explain to Canadian businesses who export to Quebec that he is adding to their costs on a mere political whim?

Madam Speaker, it cannot go that way, good sense will prevail.

That would considerably alleviate uncertainty while facilitating agreements between Quebec and Canada in areas where they share common interests. Instead of looking for differences, we would be looking for common points.

If there is uncertainty, it is not about the decision that Quebecers will make. If there is any uncertainty, it is in the way Canadians will react to the answer Quebecers will give through a democratic process. The uncertainty lies in the response Canadians would give if Quebecers chose to become masters of their own destiny.

• (1155)

I also want to say a few words about how the assets and liabilities would be shared. I will not mention the legal aspects of the issue, which would clearly favour Quebec; things are very clear concerning assets, much less so concerning financial commitments to creditors. In any case, out of respect and concern for commitments made in the past, the draft bill states: "The Government may conclude, with the Government of Canada, any agreement relating to the apportionment of the property and debts of Canada, and to any matter susceptible of facilitating the application of this Act".

Out of respect for commitments made in the past, Quebec can and must agree with Canada on the apportionment of assets and liabilities. Many people mention the apportionment of the debt, but there are also properties on Quebec territory. These will become the property of the Quebec government. Quebec's share of the assets and debts will have to be established. Again in this case, the findings of Bélanger–Campeau will be used as a basis for negotiations, even as a very firm negotiating position since this is a serious study.

I remind you that we already pay for the national debt. Some people ask how we are going to pay for that debt, as if Quebecers did not already pay their share of that debt! Each year, we pay $30 billion in taxes to help finance programs and pay interest on the debt and the government continues to borrow on our behalf. Now, Quebec would only be responsible for a share of the debt and the interest that is still to be defined, which is normal. I will come back to this. But we already pay for that. People realize this will not be an additional burden. On the contrary, Quebecers might have to pay less, as we will explain to them.

Using a method based on an evaluation of the assets found in Quebec—and there are various methods to calculate our share—the Bélanger–Campeau Commission came to the conclusion that our share of the debt was 18.5 per cent of the total.

Since our share of the Canadian economy, of the gross domestic product, is a little over 23 per cent, this means that our share of the debt would be even lower than before in relation to the GDP. This is an interesting factor for Quebecers. Moreover, Quebec would have total control over its fiscal policy. We would be able to invest in the more productive sectors, stop receiving welfare and focus on the more productive sectors. This is a very interesting aspect for Quebec's future.

In closing, Madam Speaker, I would like to remind you briefly of the events that led us to the decision the Premier of Quebec made today.

Let us look only at the last four years. On June 22, 1990, the Meech Lake Accord failed. On June 20, 1991, the Bélanger–Campeau Commission was established to examine the possibility and consequences of Quebec's sovereignty. On October 26, 1992, the Charlottetown Accord was rejected. On October 25, 1993, 54 sovereignists were elected to the Parliament of Canada. On September 12, 1994, 77 members of a sovereignist party were elected to form the government of Quebec. On December 7, the Premier of Quebec tabled a draft bill asking the people to define what would be in the preamble to Quebec's Constitution, to define their commitment to Quebec, to define the values they cherish right now and the values they want for the future. This draft bill asks the people to help in shaping the Quebec of tomorrow.

As a young Quebecer, I must tell you that participating in shaping of the Quebec of the future is the finest challenge that my generation has been issued, and it is with pride and dedication that the members of the Bloc Quebecois will accept this challenge. Our answer to the Premier of Quebec is: Bravo! At last we see the light at the end of the tunnel. We support your process and we will build the Quebec of tomorrow.

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased with what the Bloc member who just spoke said about economic integration in particular, because of what it means for the people of Quebec and Ontario.

• (1200)

I represent an Ontario riding. We Ontarians realize that our future and our economy are closely tied to Quebec. Quebec is our best market, our number one economic partner. So, it is only normal that the party opposite talk about the connection between Ontario and Quebec, about the close economic ties that will always exist between us.

The question is: how will we plan our future together? We see it as part of a federal system. You are considering keeping the Canadian dollar as legal currency. I ask you: what is the point of continuing to use the Canadian currency in an independent Quebec? If that is what you want, so be it. At present, in this House, you have a Prime Minister from Quebec and the Minister of Finance, also from Quebec, ensuring that you have some control over this currency. If tomorrow, from an Ontario point of view, you will have an independent Quebec, why are you planning to keep the Canadian currency? It may be a good idea, but then, it must made quite clear to the people of Quebec that the rest of Canada will insist on controlling its own currency, while Quebec, if an arrangement is negotiated, will hold only 25 per cent of the voting power under a possible arrangement on a common currency.

Today, you have some control over this currency. Tomorrow, you will only have an interest, with the rest of Canada, with the others, and yours will be a minority interest. So, when you say that what you do in Quebec will be determined democratically, bear in mind that whatever you do affects the rights and interests of other Canadians who, like me as an Ontarian, have respect for Quebecers and have this to say to them: "Yes to democracy. Yes, Quebecers have the right to decide their future democratically, as long as this is done with full knowledge of what is at stake".

Let us not lose sight of the facts amid this pile of hypotheses, hypotheses that are not at all correct and that you have selected. If you are really democratic, include us in the process, so that the people of Quebec can see, so that they have a chance to see whether these hypotheses are realistic or not. That is the problem with your process. That is why your process is not democratic.

I will conclude with a word on an entirely different matter, which nontheless is related to the democratic process. In Ontario, we have a strong French–speaking minority which has been campaigning for many years for its survival. Bear in mind also, in your democracy, when you make your choices, what will become of the French language in Ontario.

Mr. Brien: Madam Speaker, I will respond to some of the points raised by the hon. member, whom I wish to thank because he seems to be interested in participating in the consultations and to have a constructive point of view. I urge him to participate in the consultations. He should put pressure on the members of his party and express his fears about the currency so that we can arrive at an even wiser decision.

It would be interesting if he got involved in a great democratic process instead of boycotting it. Just a short word on the French–speaking minority in Ontario. I hope that, as an Ontario resident, he will continue to press his provincial government to treat its francophone minority the same way we will treat the anglophone minority in Quebec.

However, he said something that was inaccurate. Although the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance are from Quebec, they do not control monetary policy, as we have seen in the past. Remember when Toronto faced inflation and an overheated economy? What happened? They implemented an inflation–fighting policy that hurt all of Canada.

Very briefly, if he believes that we will have no more influence on monetary policy, let me tell him that whether we print our own currency or use another one, selling off all our Canadian dollars on the market would cause a major decline in the value of the Canadian dollar.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Sorry, but the hon. member's time is up.

[English]

Mr. John English (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak in the debate on the opposition motion and indicate why I cannot support the motion.

I cannot do so because I believe that together we are a great nation, a strong, vibrant and wealthy nation that is inclusive, a nation and a society that knows how to accommodate French and English, native peoples and cultures from the four corners of the world.

• (1205)

Quebec within Canada has accomplished an extraordinary amount. To quote Mr. Parizeau:

[Translation]

"—what our people has accomplished in 30 years is remarkable."

[English]

To go further into the speech he gave on December 6, he talked as the minister did earlier about the accomplishments of Quebec, a society which lacked a ministry of education that now has a technology so advanced that it exports the majority of it, a society which did not have a business culture, which:

[Translation]

"—has produced internationally renowned industrial and financial giants. A society which was said to be without a history and without a literature now has its own films, singers, dancers, writers who travel the world."

[English]

It is an extraordinary accomplishment. In his speech of December 6 Mr. Parizeau said that the preamble to the declaration would be a declaration:

[Translation]

"—like the American Declaration of Independence of which we still hear echoes more than 200 years after it was written."

[English]

Exactly. I had a chance to look at the Declaration of Independence of the United States following Mr. Parizeau's comments. I read from that declaration:

> When in the Course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bonds which have connected them one with another, and to assume among the Powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

What are the causes? The Declaration of Independence goes on:

> Prudence, indeed, will dictate that Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shown, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed.

The Declaration of Independence has the advantage of listing the causes for separation and for breaking the bonds, indicating why there was respect for the opinions of mankind. The causes are listed:

> The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of absolute Tyranny over these States.

Canada has not been tyrannous and with due respect to the official opposition it has not said it is. The Declaration of Independence declared that the facts should be submitted to a candid world and we ask for these facts. What were their facts? The King of Britain, and I quote:

—has refused his Assent to Laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

In Canada despite the power of the federal government to have disallowance of legislation of the provincial legislatures, it has not been used in the case of Quebec in recent times. Indeed it has not been used over the last half century.

> He has forbidden his Governors to pass Laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his Assent should be obtained— He has dissolved Representative Houses repeatedly, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people.

No legislature in Canada has been dissolved.

> He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their Public Records for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

There may be a point there. I think you will agree, Madam Speaker, that whatever the complications and burdens that members suffer, it is not so unusual and uncomfortable that it represents a great burden. It goes on:

> He has kept among us, in times of peace, Standing Armies with the Consent of our legislature.

We have heard recently from the official opposition that rather than complaining about standing armies within the province of Quebec, we hear the request that existing institutions which represent the Canadian military be sustained in that province. It goes on:

> For cutting off our Trade with all parts of the world:

We heard earlier today the official opposition speak about the importance of the free trade agreement with the United States, indeed taking some credit as a province, not as a party obviously, for having that particular agreement sustained in the Parliament of Canada. Far from cutting off trade, we have increased the possibility for Quebec, not only through the free trade agreement, but also through the WTO, recently approved. It goes on:

> For depriving us in many cases, of the benefits of Trial by Jury:

That has not been done.

> For transporting us beyond Seas to be tried for pretended offences:

Or:

> For taking away our Charters, abolishing our most valuable Laws and altering fundamentally the Forms of our Governments:

Canada is not tyranny. Separation would be weakness. If we would be weak and not just as a country, the weakened soul as a society, separation would enfeeble all of us.

• (1210)

Out of alliances come strength. Out of separation comes disintegration. Out of inclusiveness comes tolerance. The success of our history to date is proof that it is not necessary to break up a country to satisfy our mutual aspirations.

Since this is our national Parliament, I assume that all of us here have the best interests of the country at heart. I sometimes forget that the agenda of the official opposition is not in the best interests of the whole country but rather the separation, the dissolution of the country.

Where else in the world would a country and a political system be sufficiently flexible to tolerate an official opposition whose only goal is the breakup of the country? That is not tyranny.

Only in Canada, you say? Absolutely, and that is true. The presence of the official opposition of the Bloc Quebecois in Parliament speaks louder than any words. It is a living expression of Canada's deeply rooted and unshakeable commitment to democracy. Our political system respects the wishes of Quebecers and demonstrates that our system can accommodate the expression of the views represented by the official opposition which we hear daily in this assembly. If the opposition truly had the interest of the constituents at heart it would use its presence in Parliament to take every opportunity to strengthen not to diminish the gains acquired over the generations.

Approached constructively this Parliament could be used to further the interests of Quebec. Instead of taking this opportunity to secure Quebec's place in Canada, the official opposition too often undermines Quebec's strong place in Canada as a full partner in the country.

As the official opposition the Bloc has a responsibility to assist in the governance of the country. Its obligation not just to Quebec but to the rest of the country is to work constructively to build a greater and even stronger nation.

As the opposition the Bloc has a legitimate role to play in ensuring that the government does not overlook the interests of anyone. It could keep a watchful eye on the interests of Quebec and at the same time help build something larger. It could ensure that as the country goes from strength to strength, Quebec is along enjoying the benefits too.

We heard earlier today comments about the status quo but surely in Canada, in Quebec, everywhere in the world there can be no status quo today, as the member for Rosedale indicated a few moments ago.

Status quo is to stop growing. To stop growing is to stagnate. There can be no status quo in the modern world. Since its inception Canada has been a nation that has changed. We are changing today. We are changing in the life of this Parliament. For example an historic breakthrough occurred when the first ministers of this country agreed on a process to begin the elimination of internal trade barriers, an agreement that was of great importance and will be built upon and is supported I believe by members opposite.

We did not need, it must be said, a constitutional amendment to do this. When common sense and our own self interest told us that it no longer made any sense whatever to be part of the largest free trade bloc in the world and still maintain internal barriers which are an obstacle to prosperity, we found a way out. In the same spirit we will find a solution to other problems. For example the two territories and eight of the provinces have signed action plans with the federal government to reduce overlap and duplication in a host of areas.

Yesterday the minister of Indian affairs signed a milestone agreement with the native peoples of Manitoba opening the way to full self–government. This is the product of negotiations and a willingness to come to an agreement. It was not necessary to rewrite the Constitution and this is not preservation of the status quo.

What we are offering Quebecers and Canadians is not the status quo. We are offering a country in evolution that is gearing itself to prosper in the next century. In that next century we expect and we hope that Canada with Quebec will play an even more prominent role. It is obvious to everyone that current political, economic and technological developments around the world are leading to an era of globalism where individual nation states play a lesser role. The previous speaker for the Bloc paid attention to that very concern.

Countries which are not integrally tied into a larger alliance are going to be bypassed. This is not the time to set up borders. It is the time to bring down borders.

• (1215)

The Europeans, for example, have come to realize that the nationalist balkanization of the continent will not be sustainable in the future. They are moving inexorably toward the creation of a European federation. They have a long way to go but the development of the federation is now in sight. Last evening I heard a Frenchman and a German speaking to each other, talking about the common cause co–operation which they have built. I thought to myself, what an extraordinary accomplishment this is, for two nations that have literally killed millions of each other's citizens in the twentieth century, within living memory of many French and Germans. But they have accomplished a lot and that is what they emphasized to each other.

They still have a long way to go but the development of the federation will take place and is taking place. Canada, we must remind ourselves, is light years ahead of the Europeans on this count; it is one of the oldest and most successful federations in the world.

In conclusion, the adventure we have had together in building the country is the best guarantee we have that once again, together, we can continue to build a country for ourselves and for our children that is envied in all the world.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member's speech. I must tell him that, contrary to what he said, the Official Opposition is playing its role of watchdog regarding the government's activities and the legislation tabled in this House.

So far, that is for a year now, the Bloc Quebecois has done all that was necessary to provide the government with the necessary tools to stimulate employment, but the government did nothing. I think that we do play our role very effectively.

Also, after 35 years of constitutional failures, do you not believe that the time has come for Quebec to get the powers it needs to control its destiny? This is what Mr. Parizeau is inviting us to do with his bill. He is inviting all Quebecers, including people in my riding of Chicoutimi and in my region of Saguenay—Lac–Saint–Jean, young and old, regardless of their political affiliation, to participate in this debate, which is as important for the rest of Canada as it is for Quebec.

I must recognize that the hon. member was the only one this morning, from the government side, who did not question the legality of the proposed draft bill, and he deserves credit for that.

The member referred to the federation of European countries. I should point out that these countries are also sovereign nations. Quebec simply wants to have the powers it needs to become the country Quebecers want.

I have a question for the hon. member. Some Liberal MPs from Quebec said that the federal government should abstain from holding its own referendum in Quebec.

The hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine told us that, in his opinion, this was a Quebec referendum and that it was up to Quebecers to decide their constitutional future within the federation.

Does the hon. member agree with these two views?

• (1220)

[English]

Mr. English: Madam Speaker, several points and several questions have been raised. I will try to respond briefly to them.

In talking about the role of the official opposition, I did not comment precisely on what was being done in this Parliament. I was encouraging the members to work together with all parties to strengthen the Canadian nation. There are many opportunities to do so; in committees, in Parliament and in the legislation that is brought forward. By working together we could face the many challenges we all admit this country is facing. The role the hon. member suggested of monitoring or supervising the process that occurs here I think is a limitation on the possibility of what a parliamentarian can do.

The hon. member and his colleagues would do well to consider the greater possibilities that reside in this Chamber, possibilities that can lead to a strengthening of the interests of all Canadians and Quebecers as well.

The constitutional failures of the last 30 years were discussed by the hon. member and he asked were these not sufficient proof of the need to consider separation. In Mr. Parizeau's declaration of December 6 he opened with comments about what had been achieved apart from the Constitution.

I would like to talk about what Quebec and Canada have achieved apart from the Constitution but in terms of what Quebec has achieved according to Mr. Parizeau. He said:

[Translation]

"Together, we have made the past 30 years a unique period in our history."

[English]

This is extremely important in the view of the premier of Quebec. In the 1960s a vigorous cultural life was built in the province and a modern state was built. In the 1970s the democratization of education of the society occurred. In the 1980s:

[Translation]

"—in spite of a severe recession, we attained economic power—"

[English]

He goes on to talk about the widening of Quebec's presence within the world.

Rather than focus on the limitations and the failures, following on the words of the prime minister of Quebec, one could look at the accomplishments of our country which are truly magnificent. They look to the future. They look to the importance of co–operation and they also point to the necessity of keeping the country together.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I recognize the hon. member for Terrebonne. You have about two minutes left to make some comments and ask a question.

Mr. Sauvageau: Madam Speaker, how much time do I have left?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Two minutes.

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have a few moments to elaborate on the comments made by my colleague from the government party.

I also want to thank my party for letting me speak on what I see as a fundamental issue and I want to remind my colleagues that this issue is the one and only reason all of us, in the Bloc Quebecois, have entered public life.

So, today's debate is extremely significant, even though the time at our disposal is limited. In the little time I have, I want to invite the people in my riding of Terrebonne, the people in the Lanaudière region, to take part in the consultation process. Contrary to what we were told earlier, the people in favour of our project are invited to participate in order to examine in depth our position and to show their support. Those who are against are also invited.

Finally, I want to ask my colleague a question related to what his leader said in 1990, during a brunch where 800 Liberals were gathered. His leader said that the Liberal Party of Canada would propose a new social contract and a major constitutional reform. He made that statement on October 28, 1990. Where do things stand now?

• (1225)

[English]

Mr. English: Madam Speaker, the situation that exists in Canada is not one where we are satisfied with the status quo. We are changing the country. We have social security reform. We have a major budget coming forward. We have programs in the area of foreign affairs. We have programs in many areas that will affect very much the way the country is organized and the way it functions.

We are not committed to a federalism that is static. We have a flexible federalism. That is the kind of country we intend to work with.

[Translation]

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Madam Speaker, it is with great pleasure and pride that I rise today to speak on the motion presented by my colleague for Laurier—Sainte–Marie: That this House enjoin the government to recognize the legitimacy of the democratic process initiated by the Government of Quebec in order to allow Quebecers to chart their own political and constitutional future.

On September 12, 1994, in Quebec we finally did elect a separatist government which clearly puts its option on the table and asks all Quebecers to take part in a huge democratic operation. This is totally new! It is a clear, simple and open process where nothing is hidden. Liberals from the provincial and the federal levels have claimed that they will not take part in this process, which they consider illegitimate.

The Prime Minister and his friends protest and try to minimize this process initiated by the Quebec government and its impact. Federalists try to ridicule and trivialize the process. This is too bad, since they thus demonstrate a lack of respect for the duly elected Quebec government.

Their reaction appears normal to us and was rather predictable. For once, they are not the ones to set the agenda and the final result of this vast democratic operation will not be a new kind of federalism but rather sovereignty for Quebec, the creation of a new country.

I really wonder what federalists expected of a sovereignist government. Did they think that the Parti Quebecois would ask Quebecers if they would like to have renewed federalism or, as the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs recently put it, flexible federalism? Come on! Be serious and show some respect for the Quebec government! I am sure that once you will be over the shock, you will want to sit down with us and express your point of view. Mr. Parizeau has extended an invitation to you and it would be in your interest to accept it. Besides, I see today that, thanks to our motion, you have already entered the debate and this is a good sign.

I would like now to touch on a sector that Quebec's sovereignty will help simplify and make more efficient and effective, that is, job training. For years there has been a consensus in Quebec that job training has to be under exclusive provincial jurisdiction. Employers, unions, workers as well as social and economic groups all agree: Quebec must have all powers for manpower training. Everybody agrees that federal programs and budgets must be repatriated in order to develop a consistent and intelligent manpower training policy.

For years the federal government has turned a deaf ear to Quebec's request in this respect. It systematically refuses to give Quebec what it is asking for. It hides behind national objectives and its responsibility for unemployment insurance to intervene in an area under provincial jurisdiction.

This intrusion by the federal government has created two manpower networks in Quebec. A vast number of federal programs overlap and duplicate provincial programs. According to André Bourbeau, a former Quebec minister, this situation wastes some $275 million a year of taxpayers' money in Quebec alone.

In 1991, in a policy statement on manpower development, this former Quebec Minister of Manpower, a Liberal and a federalist, said: "For many years Quebec has claimed control over policy instruments that influence the job market. This means that the Government of Quebec and its economic partners are demanding that laws, budgets, institutions, programs and services related to manpower and to the job market be under one authority. Quebecers with an interest in the job market recognize almost unanimously that manpower policies must be developed by those who are closest to the various areas of the job market." What has the federal government done to respond to these rational demands from Quebec? Nothing! It has rejected them out of hand.

Meanwhile, Quebec's workers and employers are suffering as a result of this situation. Indeed, the double system is cumbersome, slow and complex. Workers and employers do not need that. They need the exact opposite. They need training that is effective, fast and convenient.

An employer or a new company looking for workers cannot afford to wait around for years until these people are trained. As soon as companies announce their requirements, the training system must be able to provide a quick response. This kind of efficient and quick response is particularly important, considering the new technologies being used. And the same applies to workers. They must be given the means to acquire training without being penalized.

Recently, I was given an example of this lack of flexibility in the training system by one of my constituents. This person wanted to take an 18–month course in office automation. The Canada Employment Centre told her she could not do that because the federal government had only approved 12–month courses. Many workers who want to get off unemployment or welfare are faced with this kind of situation which makes no sense at all.

In Quebec, we want to make the system more flexible, and we want to make it smarter. Today, we cannot do that. The federal presence prevents us from making these crucial improvements in the system. Today, the federal presence is paralysing the entire system. In 1993, Canada ranked twenty–second and last, and I repeat, twenty–second and last among developed countries because of its very poor level of in–house training. This figure is not often mentioned by these people across the way. It is a little embarrassing, I suppose.

Let us consider briefly why people no longer know where to turn. The federal government is interfering in this area with 27 programs in addition to Quebec's 25. The federal government interferes by maintaining 100 Canada Employment Centres, although Quebec has put in place la Société québécoise de développement de la main–d'oeuvre. The mandate of the SQDM was originally to establish genuine one–stop counters in all regions in Quebec.

I am referring to genuine one–stop counters for Quebec, not a façade like we saw in the Canada–Saskatchewan agreement which, in fact, subordinates the province's jurisdiction to the federal authority. In other words, the kind of one–stop counter that even Daniel Johnson, Quebec's Liberal leader, criticized and rejected.

Today, the SQDM acts more like a manager of federal funding, without any real say over how it is spent. The lack of co–ordination between the two networks means that the unemployed are not getting the kind of service they need. In an internal memo, the federal government revealed that, in the spring of 1993, close to 25,000 unemployed workers, although they had been referred to a training program, could not be accommodated.

Quebec sovereignty will make it possible to clean up the sorry mess the federal government put us in. The federal lack of willingness to give Quebec what we have been demanding for years in this respect, worse yet, its increasing encroachment on our turf is the last straw which will make people vote yes, very soon.

Then, we will be able to put in place the system we have been yearning for for so long, an intelligent system which will efficiently meet the needs of the labour market. Bye bye, dirty old federal machine which has not had an oil change in years.

To conclude, I invite all the people in Laurentides, in my area, my riding, to participate in the regional committees which will hold hearings in February. For the first time, Quebecers will have the chance to say clearly and freely what kind of society they want and whether or not they want a sovereign Quebec. Individuals and groups of all allegiance, join us to have a democratic look at the sovereignist option. Express your point of view, voice your fears, suggest improvements; the committees which will crisscross Quebec will welcome you and want to hear from you.

At the end of the day, Quebecers will decide if they want their own country, a country which will reflect their aspirations, a country in which they will be fulfilled.

The process the Government of Quebec is offering us is unique. It is democratic, it will make it possible for each and everyone to be heard.

I will never stop fighting to establish the country of Quebec. I will do so with strength and vigour, because my most fervent wish is to hand down to my children a country called Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a couple of comments on the member's dissertation.

I am very concerned about my fellow Canadians in Quebec. I am concerned when I look at their financial situation in Canada today. The government of that province does not seem to want to address the real problems facing the people of Quebec. I look at a province that has the highest per capita deficit on a provincial basis of all the provinces in Canada: $9,400 for every man, woman and child in the province of Quebec, a debt which is 40 per cent financed not only outside the borders of Quebec but outside the borders of Canada.

These people in the international trading environment are looking very closely at Quebec, at the debate that is going on here today. As the province of Quebec goes out to refinance its debt on the international marketplace it is going to find fewer and fewer people interested in investing in that province. I am very concerned that the average person in the province of Quebec is going to start watching their lifestyle and their standard of living decline.

I note also that the last election in the province of Quebec was basically on the matter of bring us good government. I am concerned with the premier of that province who was a finance minister during a period in time of Quebec's history that drove up the deficit higher than any other administration: 285 per cent during his administration of that system.

I simply want to ask: What is going on here, what is happening? The day after separation no new day, there will be no change. The reality is that we are talking about transferring powers from Ottawa to Quebec City. I do not know how that helps people in Chicoutimi.

The reality is that people want control of their own destinies. Our government has been spending a lot of time discussing social policy review and other areas that affect federal legislation and it is going to the people, it is talking to the people in the streets on how they want to control those aspects of their lives. Creating new embassies all around the world is a duplication of expenditure and a cost to the people of Quebec.

My colleague often talks about Canada as a hypothetical country. To me the state of Quebec is an illusion. People will not be any better off; they will be worse off.

We have some common things, the people of Quebec and the people of the rest of Canada, common things that unite us. One of the major ones is our proximity to the United States and the economic power that country wields on this side of North America.

• (1240)

I think it has always been in our best interest, as a united country and as a united people, to be part of a culture which is both French and English.

I would like to ask my colleague how she thinks things are going to be so magically different.

[Translation]

Mrs. Guay: Madam Speaker, the scare campaigns do not scare Quebecers any more. We have been subjected to them for over 30 years, but they do not work anymore. Quebec has all the tools necessary to take charge of its affairs. For years it has asked for the powers needed to assume responsibility and develop.

At the present time, business is expanding as never before and faster than in any other province. Quebec is very active on the various markets. When it takes on all the powers of an independent country, I am sure it will develop very fast on all markets: the Quebec market, the Canadian market, the international market, as well as the American market. I am not worried about that.

Once we take back our powers, the $275 million wasted annually on manpower training, as I mentioned, will be invested in training for us, training for our people, for the development of Quebec. I do not fear any kind of collapse the day after the referendum is won, nothing like that will happen. On the contrary, a new country will be born and we will move ahead economically.

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Madam Speaker, as you may have guessed, I proudly welcome this opportunity to take part in today's debate and to join my colleagues in deploring the fact that federal members who represent Quebec here in Ottawa have refused to take part in what is probably the most legitimate democratic process ever initiated by the National Assembly.

Quebec is a democracy. Quebec has one of the oldest parliament in the world, and the entire history of Quebec's nationalism is entwined with the history of democracy. Earlier, I was appalled to hear the hon. member for Hull, who is responsible for the federal government's referendum strategy, trying to discredit the initiative tabled by Mr. Parizeau's government a few days ago.

One thing is clear. History tells us that very few nations have had a chance to write their own constitution. Consider George Washington, Jefferson, Madison and all the great thinkers who helped to draft constitutional texts, and who did so because they were members of the elite. They did it because they were members of the educated class.

What we are saying is that in our quest for sovereignty, we want to have the broadest possible democratic base. This is an opportunity for all Quebecers, regardless of their social class, political allegiance or personal wealth, to come forward and say what kind of constitution they want and what kind of society they want to live in. Because that is what a constitution is all about. A constitution says what we are and what we want to be.

By giving all Quebecers a chance to take part in this democratic process, the Premier is saying to the National Assembly, to Ottawa and to the world: We see sovereignty as part of a quest for democracy. We cannot plan our future, we cannot make this wonderful plan for sovereignty a fact without the participation of all Quebecers.

As many journalists and opinion–makers have pointed out, the situation we have today is different from the situation in 1980. There is no federalist leader with any credibility, and we can hardly expect the present Prime Minister to be able to inspire the federal troops.

• (1245)

In a democracy, the best way to fight against something is to propose something better. There is no other way. Therefore, the best way to oppose sovereignty in 1994 is to show that federalism can be attractive. If the Quebec federalists, whether the hon. member for Saint–Léonard, the hon. member for Saint–Henri—Westmount or any other member from Quebec, believe in their option, they will come forward and address the 16 regional commissions in order to tell us why, in 1994, Quebecers should stick to federalism. They will be welcome to defend their option. But the truth is that federalism does not get anyone carried away.

When the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, with his big ego, suggests that we talk about flexible federalism, we all know that flexible federalism depends on the deficit. But right now, that deficit is so high that the Minister of Finance cannot even watch himself spend. That is the situation. That is why federalists cannot come and sit at a table in good faith and propose a plan for renewed federalism.

We spoke earlier about the economic accomplishments of Quebec, but what makes it special also stems from its deep respect for every component of democracy. I want to draw your attention to the fact that the draft bill tabled before us says something crucial, something all members representing English Canada should keep in mind. Section 3 of this draft bill says that we will draft a constitution which will include a charter of human rights and that—and I will quote section 3—"The constitution shall include a charter of human rights and freedoms. It shall guarantee the English–speaking community that its identity and institutions will be preserved. It shall also recognize the right of Aboriginal nations to self–government on lands over which they have full ownership."

The scope of a section such as this is not well understood. We are saying to the English–speaking people, at the beginning of this debate: Your community is essential to our future. It is with the 900,000 anglophones in Quebec today that we want to think about the future, and we are telling them: In our sovereignist project, we will give you all the place that is rightfully yours.

This is not new because you will recall that, as early as 1967, René Lévesque distanced himself from a segment of the nationalist movement that did not want to recognize the right of the English–speaking community to public schools funded by the government.

We are saying, at the beginning of this debate, to the English–speaking community as well as the aboriginal people, who are our two most important minorities: Not only will you have a place in a sovereign Quebec, not only will we recognize all the rights that are yours today, but we also want you to take part in this democratic process that is taking place.

In this regard, I think that Quebec is probably a better example of democracy than Ottawa. As for the eleven Aboriginal nations who live on the territory of Quebec and form a community of almost 55,000 people, let us not forget that René Lévesque, that great democrat—and I must say that very few members opposite have the courage to quote from the Referendum Act, a tool he left us to consult people—and his government, back in 1985, allowed the eleven Aboriginal nations to be recognized all together for what they were. We want these rights to be entrenched in the next constitution of Quebec.

Remember that Quebec has experienced that constitution. There is a misunderstanding about the revolutionary nature of what is happening. We are about to recognize the right of our two major minorities to participate in the development of the constitution, while throughout our history, we were forced, as Quebecers, to accept a constitution about which we had never been consulted. It is absolutely outrageous to hear Quebecers and Canadians being told that the process is rather undemocratic because the people will be consulted.

• (1250)

From the Treaty of Paris to the Union Act and up until 1867, Quebecers were never consulted. We want to make up for that, we want as much people as possible to participate in the movement towards democracy that is getting under way. We repeat today, as Premier Parizeau said, that in the next constitution, we are going to recognize the right to self–government of Aboriginal nations, who were in fact the first people to occupy this territory. Such recognition shall be exercised in a manner consistent with the territorial integrity of Quebec. We say to aboriginal peoples that they will have the right—and this right will be entrenched if they so wish—to their traditions, their cultures, their lands and their language. We say to the English–speaking community that we want them to have a public school system, from preschool to university, which is giving them full participation in Quebec life.

In conclusion, I want to say that if federalists still have beliefs, if federalists still believe in intellectual integrity, their place is before the 16 regional commissions which will travel throughout Quebec, because if their option is good enough to convince Quebecers, as they argue, they have to put themselves through this consultation test. It is not by refusing to take part in a democratic process that these people will be able to revitalize an option that is stalling but still has the right to exist.

Mrs. Pierrette Ringuette–Maltais (Madawaska—Victoria, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a few comments and then ask the hon. member some questions.

First, I would like to make a correction. When my hon. colleague refers to English Canada, he refers at the same time to the protection of minorities in Quebec. I am a francophone member of Parliament and a Canadian and I come from New Brunswick which is not part of English Canada or French Canada, but of Canada.

The hon. members across the floor emphasize the importance of being honest and open and say it is all a matter of choice, but I could show you here that the first page of the draft bill is entitled: An Act respecting the sovereignty of Quebec. They do not even have the courage of their convictions. Once again, they talk about sovereignty when in fact, the objective is the separation of Quebec. We are asked to get involved in what is proposed on the first page of the draft bill.

Allow me to turn to the second page. This draft bill sets out the political objective. As a member from the Bloc pointed out a moment ago: Come on, we have elected a PQ government in Quebec. I hope you were not expecting us to offer a clear choice between federalism or separation to the people of Quebec. This is what she said and it is obviously what they have in mind here.

They say that this bill suggests that Quebec will become a sovereign country democratically. How can they talk about democracy when they have already made up their minds about all the issues to be debated, how they are going to proceed, how to use the currency, share the assets and divide the debt? This is not a clear choice. They are not showing the people of Quebec what the real situation is now and what it could be tomorrow. We are invited, in my case as a so–called member for English Canada, a federalist—

Mr. Lebel: Not you.

Mrs. Ringuette–Maltais: Are you not inviting me?

Mr. Guimond: No.

Mr. Lebel: No, you are not invited.

Mrs. Ringuette–Maltais: You are not inviting me. Therefore, you do not want Quebecers to know exactly what they are getting into. Thank you very much for not inviting me to participate.

Mr. Guimond: You have nothing to do with that!

• (1255)

Mrs. Ringuette–Maltais: You are going to have to decide at some point. You will have to!

I wish to stress that the document I read, the document before me, calls for the participation of the people, presumably only those of the same political stripe, since I was just told that I do not have the right to take part because I am a federalist. Yet, Mr. Parizeau says I do have the right.

An hon. member: You do not know how to read!

Mrs. Ringuette–Maltais: Madam Speaker, it is obvious—

An hon. member: She does not know how to read!

Mrs. Ringuette–Maltais: —that this document is undemocratic and does not lead to a debate on the options. It is indeed a dictatorship in disguise.

As I mentioned earlier, when Quebecers stood up, they rejected the Duplessis regime, they said no to dictatorship. I am convinced that Quebecers will make a sound decision when asked a clear–cut question, not one like this, which is only propaganda.

I wish to tell the members of the Bloc that, even if they do not want me in Quebec, Madam Speaker, my roots are in Quebec, Quebec is part of Canada, and I will go there whenever I please. Therefore, I think we should stop here because the members of the Bloc are just showing their fellow citizens that they no longer want anyone else. They want to remain isolated. Something I regret.

An hon. member: I have a question, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry, but time is up and I really cannot extend it.

Mr. Ménard: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. It was up to you to monitor the member's speaking time. You know very well that the process we are in—

An hon. member: Enough of that!

Mr. Ménard: I am not talking to you, I am talking to the Chair. It was up to you to monitor the speaking time—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Order, please! I am giving the hon. member 30 seconds.

Mr. Gagliano: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. The 10–minute period is for questions and comments. The hon. member chose to comment, therefore there was no question. You cannot change the rules every time a member complains.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The hon. government member is absolutely right. The time has expired.

Mr. Duceppe: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. You recognized the hon. member for Hochelaga—Maisonneuve. You do not have to take orders from a government member. I think that the—

Mr. Ménard: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I respect your decision not to continue debate. As you are independent, I hope you are not going to let your decision be influenced by the hon. member for Saint–Léonard, who would have been better advised—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Resuming debate. The hon. Secretary of State has the floor.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, I rise in this debate to speak against the motion introduced by the hon. member for Laurier—Sainte–Marie.

Mr. Ménard: On a point of order, Madam Speaker. I want to be heard.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I was under the impression that you had understood that there was no time left. Following comments from both sides of the House I came to a decision. My decision is clear. The Secretary of State has the floor. The issue is closed. The Secretary of State has the floor.

Mr. Ménard: On a point of order, Madam Speaker.

• (1300)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): One moment, please. Order! I will not accept threats from anyone.

Resuming debate, the Secretary of State.

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, as I was saying, I rise to speak against the motion of the member for Laurier—Sainte–Marie. The Bloc Quebecois members are trying to use the same tactics as their colleagues from the Parti Quebecois; it is quite normal, both parties are separatist.

Both are trying to make Quebecers believe that the process they are putting forward is clever. Being clever and sly has nothing to do with democracy. Democracy does not resort to clever tricks. When I read the motion by the Bloc Quebecois, I was reminded of Mr. Parizeau's own comments boasting that he had found a clever way to convince Quebecers of the validity of the separatist ideology.

In turn, the Bloc members are resorting to Mr. Parizeau's clever trick. They are trying to make us believe that the process he started is democratic. When I read the motion, I came to the conclusion that this House cannot, in a million years, endorse such a trick. This House must not support a process which does not lead to the real question. This House must not support a motion which is trying to hijack Quebec's established and legitimate consultation process. This House, this bastion of democracy, must defeat the motion by the Bloc Quebecois.

It is also obvious that the process advocated by the Parti Quebecois and its mirror image, the Bloc Quebecois, was conceived to deliberately disguise the real debate, to lead Quebecers away from the real question, from the debate on the question the Parti Quebecois itself put forward on many occasions. This question, the real one, the one the Parti Quebecois had committed itself to put to a vote, was to clearly ask Quebecers whether or not they wanted to separate from Canada.

However, the Parti Quebecois, and by default, the Bloc Quebecois, preferred to skip this step. According to Mr. Parizeau, the people of Quebec should not be asked if they want to separate from Canada. They must not be asked to vote on a clear and simple question as part of the process set in motion under the referendum act. No, that would be too democratic and not shrewd enough.

Mr. Parizeau decided instead to force the people of Quebec to take part in a process, the outcome of which is already known, one that offers only one option and they are required to make a profession of faith for separation in order to take part in this process. Let us not delude ourselves. Parizeau has no intention of letting Quebecers who do not think like him influence his process and its outcome. He has clearly stated that it would be difficult to change his mind about certain aspects of his draft bill. How are we to believe that the process will be democratic then?

• (1305)

How could a federalist who does not share the separatist ideal feel free to express her concerns to a commission mandated to consider the basis of a sovereign Quebec, separated from Canada? She will not even be given the opportunity to question separation or discuss the issue. She is invited to share with Mr. Parizeau her views on the choice of a currency, her citizenship, and the future of Quebec apart from Canada.

Where will federalist Quebecers find a forum where they can exercise their right to speak and put across their fundamental opposition to separation? They will quite simply have no forum, because the Parti Quebecois just does not want to hear what they have to say.

As we say in French, the PQ has no use for anyone who does not share its opinion. The Parti Quebecois has already decided the future of Quebecers. The PQ and Bloc members are the only ones who know what is good for the people of Quebec. They have charted their future without even consulting them.

In the interest of the people of Quebec, the Parti Quebecois will take Quebec out of Canada. Too bad for Quebecers who believe in federalism and object to separation. Too bad for you, if you wanted to express your concerns and fears about, or rejection of the separatist option. Just do not be afraid.

The Parti Quebecois is telling these people that there is nothing to be afraid of, since it has all been decided: economic association, currency, legislation and so on. All they have to do is vote on a bill that has already been passed by the Pequiste majority. They do not even have to worry about the desirability of separation because, as far as they are concerned, it is a done deal.

The Parti Quebecois says that it is the only option, that there is nothing else. Such is the democratic process PQ style. Everything has already been decided in advance. It is as though your neighbour Gilles woke you up on Saturday morning to tell you: "You are moving. The decision has already been made. You have no choice. If you want, however, we can discuss the size of the moving van you will need".

No one could describe this as an open approach allowing all viewpoints to be heard. You could not even object to your moving; it would be a done deal.

Like your neighbour Gilles, the opposition member is asking us to say: "No problem. Even though I have always been against moving, it does not matter. I will move. Let us now discuss the size of the van".

Such is the democratic logic of the motion they are asking us to adopt. Not only is the process rigged but there is an additional obstacle. Federalists are not allowed equal representation on the commissions advocated by PQ members. They are not given access to the same resources and do not have as much time to speak as the separatists. The process advocated by the PQ goes against the very spirit of the Referendum Act.

René Lévesque, who was a proud believer in fairness and parity, would be ashamed. Those who define themselves as his heirs are now subverting the basic principles underlying Quebec's tradition of consulting its people. How can they ask us today to ratify a process that flies in the face of democratic principles?

The PQ process is forcing people to conclude that separation is inevitable, that Quebecers no longer have a choice. I am denouncing this bluff by the Quebec government, just as I reject the motion tabled by the Bloc Quebecois.

Nowhere is it said or written that Quebecers must separate from Canada, and that to fully realize their future, they must create a new country. Quebecers already have a country, a country that they built, that belongs to them, that reflects their culture, their language, their achievements, a country where they are free to grow without constraints. This country is Canada.

Quebecers were directly involved in building and developing this country. They did more than preside over its birth. They are responsible for it and contribute to its growth. They are essential members of this country.

The opposition's motion asks us to presume that Quebecers want to break their ties with their country, to reject a country that they built and which belongs to them, without asking them whether or not they want to take that road.

In all conscience, I cannot support this motion. I cannot vote for a motion which is contrary to the spirit of a citizen's most basic right in this country, namely the right to free expression of his opinion.

I call on all members of this House to vote against this motion, to vote no to the trickery which subverts the democratic process, to vote no to the ruse which hides the real debate. That is why we must defeat this motion, out of respect for democracy.

The proof of all that I just said is in the press release from the Premier of Quebec when he tabled his draft bill. I would like to quote the third paragraph of this press release from the Premier who tabled a draft bill on Quebec sovereignty this week. Here is what it says, in the third paragraph: "A vast process of information and participation will get under way to give all Quebecers an opportunity to take part directly in the discussion which is beginning. The people can comment on the plan, discuss it and propose improvements—" Madam Speaker, it says "propose improvements", not propose changes, only improve it.

Again I quote from the same press release from the Premier of Quebec, this time the fourth paragraph: "Through this process, Quebecers will also be asked to draft a Declaration of Sovereignty".

Nothing is said about asking people whether they agree that Quebec should separate from Canada. We are presented with a plan. The Government of Quebec and the Bloc Quebecois think that Quebecers agree on separation. However, according to opinion polls, the majority, at least 60 per cent, are against separation. Although the government was elected on the promise of being a good government and holding a referendum on separation later, it is proposing a bill as if it had received a mandate to trigger this mechanism leading to separation. It is quite clear.

When we say that not only Liberal members in Quebec City and Ottawa do not want to participate, even important groups in Quebec that took part in the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, which my colleagues opposite in the Bloc Quebecois have mentioned repeatedly this morning, like the farmers' union, the president of the Quebec City Chamber of Commerce, the president of the employers' council and the president of the Quebec manufacturers' association said that they would not participate in this process because it is undemocratic. They would have taken part if it had been something like the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, but not in a process like this. We are not the only ones. We do not want to participate. We participate fully in Quebec life. We want to take part in a debate where people can express themselves and make points for Canadian federalism and for separation. Once Quebecers have made their decision, then their government can table draft legislation like this and tell them: You have voted for separation. Here is how we will proceed.

What is Mr. Parizeau doing right now? He is skipping the basic step, because he has already initiated the process, without even securing a mandate to separate. The answer is no, a categorical no, and we will fight the process all the way to prove it. That answer is certainly the one Quebecers will give Mr. Parizeau, and here in the House, we say no to the Bloc members.

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Madam Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to thank the hon. member for Saint–Léonard for participating in the current debate taking place in Quebec, this in spite of his views. He is acting like a true politician, as well as a solid and honest man, and I commend him for that.

However, I find that the hon. member is too easily outraged. I guess customs change with the times. Government members have been using the word democracy all day.

But remember the unilateral patriation of the Constitution. That was not the work of angels. It was done in 1982, by the Liberals opposite. Back then, they were proud of their democracy. The current Prime Minister, who is from Quebec, was the one behind that dirty job on Quebecers. What happened? It is very simple. They did not try to shaft Quebec. With his typical smile, which has become his trademark, he said: But we still got them, did we not? Just like a kid who did something bad.

The Liberals were not scandalized back in 1981. I remember Mr. Lévesque saying to these people, the day after the night of the long knives, that their rejoicing at Quebec's expense would end some day. Indeed, that rejoicing just might end very soon.

We mentioned the patriation of the Constitution. It goes without saying that this was not Canadian federalism's finest hour. René Lévesque was not impressed; he was no more impressed than the hon. member for Saint–Léonard is now when he talks about being forced to move.

At the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, the Bloquistes and the separatists did not have the upper hand. Yet, you were not upset by the undemocratic structure of that commission. You remained very quiet. Who took part in the 1982 coup, the unilateral patriation? At the time, you had relegated democracy to some dark place where the sun does not shine.

Madam Speaker, such a figure of speech is not unparliamentary.

Quebecers, including the hon. member for Saint–Léonard, are invited to a sort of summit. They are asked to give their views on the issue. Anything can be amended in this draft bill, which contains 17 clauses.

The preamble will be decided by Quebecers. I do not remember being consulted on the preamble of the Constitution and the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, in 1982. Democracy works only if you agree with the Liberal Party. Then it is democracy at play and the Liberals can have anything done to Quebec, usually by a Quebecer, because it does not look quite as bad. In fact, we know who their hatchet man is; he is not here today, but we know who he is.

It is now up to Quebecers to speak up and even draft the preamble of this historic draft bill.

• (1320)

Maybe he did not realize it, but the hon. member for Saint–Léonard just scored a point for the federalists. I congratulate him on it, but I wish he would not say that the process is undemocratic. I think the members on the other side of the House should be the last ones to talk about democracy.

Look what they did to democracy in the famous Bill C–22 on Pearson Airport; look what they do to democracy in Bill C–62 which was introduced so innocuously and which the government will use to give away huge chunks of federal operations to its friends, probably the same people who were involved in the Pearson Airport deal. Since the government can no longer subsidize its friends, it gives away chunks of government operations. Democracy? I say to the hon. member for Saint–Léonard that this has nothing to do with democracy.

I want to know something. You know that democracy also includes the right not to get involved. Some communities may decide not to take my advice, not to get involved, and not to contribute to the process. If they choose not to take part, it will not make me cry. I will respect their right, because it is their most basic right not to get involved.

But I still want to stress that they are welcome to participate in this debate, if they live in Quebec, of course. I hope that members opposite will have the magnanimity to respect their cultural communities, especially French–speaking communities outside Quebec, which will not be included in the debate either.

To conclude, I just want to say that I am deeply offended to hear our process being called undemocratic, especially by some of the big names in the Liberal Party who were here in 1982.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, this morning, the hon. member mentioned all the amendments proposed to the Constitution in the last 30 years. He spoke of the patriation of the Constitution, the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, etc., but not even once did I hear the hon. members of the Bloc speak of the 1980 referendum. There was a referendum in 1980 on the issue of sovereignty and people—

Sorry. It seems someone did talk about it. Well done! Unfortunately, I was out of the House at the time.

In 1980, Quebec's sovereignty–association with Canada was proposed and the people said no. Now, we are in favour of this type of consultation. We say to the Quebec government: Ask the question! If the answer is yes, go on with the process you have started this week! What is undemocratic and what you refuse to acknowledge is that you have skipped the most important step.

There was an election in Quebec and this issue was raised during the election campaign. As you will remember, your leader corrected Mr. Parizeau on this, during the big meeting held in Joliette. He was speaking of the Parti Quebecois's strategy because nothing was being done. He would not introduce a bill in the National Assembly without holding a referendum first. And now he tables a draft bill in the National Assembly and once this bill has been voted on, there will be a referendum.

No, that cannot be. First, they must get a mandate from the people. They must ask Quebecers if they want to secede or not. Can you honestly answer this question today? Do Quebecers really want to secede or not? Do you have the mandate? That is the question. We do not think you have that mandate.

Ask the question and if the answer is yes in the referendum, you may then initiate—and I use the word on advisedly—the process announced this week by the Quebec government.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The hon. member for Terrebonne has 30 seconds for questions or comments.

• (1325)

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Madam Speaker, I would have a question to ask the hon. member on the subject of democracy. I would like to know if he can comment on this quote from page 181 of the book Straight from the Heart: "The voice of Chief Justice Bora Laskin wasn't the only thing that wasn't clear; the majority judgment itself seemed rather ambiguous. It stated that the unilateral action of the federal government was legal but offensive to the traditional convention of getting provincial consent for constitutional amendments." Did my hon. colleague participate in that action?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The hon. member has just 15 seconds.

Mr. Gagliano: Madam Speaker, I think that the hon. member is confusing apples and oranges.

Some hon. members: No, no.

Mr. Gagliano: It is simple. Why do you not have the courage to ask the question? Ask the question!

Ms. Catterall: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to inform the House that members of the government will divide their speaking time.

[English]

Mr. Stephen Harper (Calgary West, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am rising today to speak to the following Bloc motion:

> That this House enjoin the government to recognize the legitimacy of the democratic process initiated by the Government of Quebec in order to allow Quebecers to chart their own political and constitutional future.

In so doing, let me be clear that I will be opposing the motion as I believe will be every member of the Reform Party. The motion is truly a test of our commitment to federalism in the most fundamental sense.

The motion talks about a democratic process. Is this a democratic process? The hon. member for Calgary Southwest, the leader of the Reform Party, has spoken on this point earlier. I will repeat some of his points but let me be emphatic in saying it is essential to say those things.

We are talking about a referendum. That is democratic. Before a referendum the bill proclaiming sovereignty or laying out sovereignty will be passed. It will be passed by a government elected by a separatist minority. It will be developed in stages which predefine a separatist outcome in a process completely dominated by separatists and restricted by separatist options. The question to be asked will be lengthy. It concerns a whole bill. It will contain ambiguities and outright falsehoods.

The PQ government running this process has a very clear interpretation of the results. A yes counts; it is binding. As the leader of the Reform Party said, it is binding on those large unresolved items in the question. A no does not count. A no means we will just try again—some democracy.

The key of legitimacy is whether something is legal. This assumes that only the Quebec assembly, for this particular bill we are discussing, has sole jurisdictions in areas where it clearly does not. Articles 1, 10 and 13 reserve all powers now part of the Canadian state that require the consent of this Parliament to change and in many cases provincial legislatures strictly to the Government of Quebec.

Article 4 would allow the province to alter boundaries. It says it is not altering boundaries but it is a significant alteration to declare interprovincial boundaries to be international boundaries. Under our constitutional law that is a significant alteration.

Article 5 would authorize the Government of Quebec to pass laws regarding the use of Canadian citizenship.

Articles 7, 8 and 9 authorize the ascension of Quebec to Canadian interests and Canadian treaties, which are not just the business of this Parliament but also of our treaty partners, our internationally recognized fellow nations.

Article 11 authorizes the Government of Quebec to pay pension plans which are clearly under the jurisdiction of this Parliament and the Constitution, in some cases constitutional amendments that have been arrived at unanimously.

Article 12 would strip the Supreme Court of Canada and all other Canadian courts of their judicial authority to hear cases related to law. Article 16 would bypass all the legal amending procedures of the Constitution of Canada.

[Translation]

When I talk about legitimacy, I must say that, in my life, legitimacy has two parts: a political project and a political relationship. The first element is the democratic process, which is mentioned in today's motion. It is not a true democratic process, but there will be a vote, and the result of a vote cannot be ignored. I think this is important.

It will be a historic vote, and I hope it will be the beginning of an irreversible process if the result is yes or, more likely, no.

Legitimacy is made up of two other elements which are not mentioned in this motion. First, the interests of others in the political project or relationship. Their economic, fiscal, political, constitutional, social and international interests, as well as their preferences. This does not only apply outside Quebec. There are also the interests of foreign countries, of the Parliament of Canada, of other provinces and even those of hard core federalists in Quebec, in short, anyone who has the right to stay in Canada.

Second, and perhaps more important, there are the rights established by existing political and legal relationships, such as the treaties, laws, constitutions and powers of other governments here in Canada and in other countries. Our words should not be misinterpreted. It is not merely a wish, it is more than that. It is the duty of the Parliament of Canada, of the members of this House, whether they represent the Reform Party or another federalist party, to protect the interests and the legal rights of Canadians. Rights that are recognized by the international community, legal and necessary rights that all Canadians enjoy, in Quebec as in all other provinces.

The legitimacy of a unilateral process like the one proposed by the Parti Quebecois in Quebec cannot be recognized. I am not a Quebecer nor do I pretend to be one, but if I were, I would be proud to be a Quebecer, proud of my history, of my language and of my society, just as I am proud to be an Albertan. It is a choice I have made, not only as my province of residence, but also as a way of life, a vision.

I can understand Quebec's nationalistic policy which, like all nationalistic policies, has to lead to independence. I can understand this feeling, but I cannot share it.

We have to recognize that, in today's world, nationalism has its obligations just as it has its dreams. No group, no continent, no country, nobody can ignore the legitimate interests of others, but that is what the Parti Quebecois and its allies from the Bloc want to do.

This is nothing to be proud of. I think it is a shame and I sincerely hope for the benefit of Canada that the vast majority of Quebecers will recognize the irresponsible and dangerous nature of the unilateral process proposed by the government of Quebec.

[English]

Mr. Alex Shepherd (Durham, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened very intently to the member's dissertation. I am surprised in some real ways that the Reform Party has in a sense fallen into the trap of discussing a hypothetical case of the separation of the province of Quebec. What I do believe we should be doing is not being part of that program. What I would like to ask the member concerns some real issues that do occur and exist today in the province of Quebec.

• (1335)

Quebec has a massive per capita debt, a provincially formulated debt of over $9,400 for every man, woman and child in that province. Quebec's deficit is financed 40 per cent outside not only its borders but also the borders of Canada. Could the member reflect on what this debate is going to do and what it is going to cost the people of Quebec?

Mr. Harper (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I would like to say a couple of things relative to that.

First, obviously this debate and the economic uncertainty that all this will cause will probably lead to no change whatsoever and is already costing us a great deal. It will cost Quebecers in terms of their bonds which already have a tremendous risk premium on the international market as well as the bonds of Canada which are affected indirectly. All of this uncertainty has cost us.

We know the cost it has caused Quebec over the past generation. When I was a boy, and it was not that long ago, Montreal was the major city in Canada. Today that is not true; it is Toronto. A lot of that is thanks to these developments that have occurred in the province of Quebec and this particular separatist debate.

I should be clear that in no way excuses the lack of action on the fiscal situation at the federal level. That is just as serious for Quebecers and for other Canadians and has also impacted negatively on the Government of Quebec.

Second, the member says that we are raising hypothetical scenarios. My speech and the speech of the leader of the Reform Party today were not on the hypothetical issues of separation, but on the real issue of the separatist process that is now under way in Quebec and which is the subject of this motion.

One cannot ignore the sentiments that exist in Quebec or ignore the process that is actually under way. That process is extremely dangerous and misleading. It affects the vital interests of this Parliament that is the responsibility of not only all members here but our responsibility to Canadians. We should be defending those interests much more than we are doing and defending the legal rights of the people we represent to not see this kind of a process go ahead without our participation.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Madam Speaker, first of all, I would like to know, even though we cannot put a question to the previous speaker rather than to the hon. member for Calgary West, first, what is the national debt per capita, and second, what percentage of that debt is in foreign hands? He will surely have an opportunity to answer those questions when he speaks next.

Instead, I will direct my question to the hon. member for Calgary West, whom I congratulate for his French and for his relatively good understanding of the position of Quebec up till now. For my part, I do understand his position. He speaks clearly.

However, when the Liberal members or the Reform members talk about the legitimacy of the process initiated, I would tell you that in a democratic system, everyone can legitimately consult everyone else and have his say. Our draft bill will only be accepted once a referendum, where everybody in Quebec will have the opportunity to vote for or against it, has been held.

As far as legitimacy is concerned, I would like to remind my hon. colleague of a few processes that we have witnessed in this House and that were not exactly models of legitimacy. When the current Prime Minister of Canada was Minister of Justice and was taking an active part in the unilateral patriation of the Constitution, he said, and I quote from Le Droit of November 2, 1981: "The intent of my government is to move ahead with the patriation of the Constitution; and even if there is no agreement with the provinces, we will do it". Even without an agreement with the provinces: talk about a model of democracy!

Moreover, I recall that the Supreme Court had ruled that, all in all, this was legal but unconstitutional. So, I would like to ask the hon. member for Calgary West what he really thinks about it. Does he really believe it is undemocratic, in a so–called democratic system, to consult people about a social vision? I remind him that the majority of the members from Quebec in the House of Commons are sovereignists and the majority of members in the Quebec National Assembly are sovereignists, and people know it.

Mr. Harper (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my answer is that we have to consult the people of Quebec, federalists as well as sovereignists, and people from outside Quebec too, I think. But we must have a real consultation process where the result is not predetermined and where all the available options are discussed. That is not the case in this process.

I would also like to talk about the repatriation of the Constitution in 1981. Someone said today that that process was undemocratic. Clearly, we do not have enough democracy in Canada today. Every day, Reformers call for direct democracy mechanisms. It is a necessity. However, under the law, the Supreme Court decided that patriation was legitimate. This question was put to the Supreme Court. Obviously, it would not have been legal or constitutional to decide to ignore all the provinces. But, in effect, a strong majority of provinces and their legislatures supported that constitutional amendment.

A government here, dominated by Quebec and the Prime Minister from Quebec decided to adopt that Constitution. Indeed, Quebec did not have a veto then, and still does not have one. And why not? We know why. It is because Mr. Lévesque, before the decision, had renounced his veto in an accord signed with the other provinces. This explains the process by which the Constitution was adopted in 1981.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Madam Speaker, I would like to make a comment. The reason we have a consultation process is that we want to avoid being blamed for not consulting. Had we asked Quebecers whether they want sovereignty without telling them what it means, we would have been blamed because we had presented an option without spelling out its meaning. In order to avoid being blamed, and rightly so, for such action, the Quebec government decided to explain its proposal, and to give the people an opportunity to amend it. Once people know what they are voting for, they will decide through a democratic referendum whether they are ready to take one last step and say yes to Quebec sovereignty, with full knowledge of the facts.

Mr. Harper (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, on this issue, I am in full agreement with the Prime Minister and my leader. The question that should be asked of Quebecers is this: "Do you want Quebec to separate from Canada?" There are two aspects to that question. The first one is the desire to separate. But a desire is just that, a desire. All details would have to be negotiated afterwards. You cannot table a bill setting forth these details in the National Assembly, because it is outside its constitutional jurisdiction. The second aspect is separation. We know why the P.Q. government prefers the word sovereignty. We have seen the polls. To Quebecers, sovereignty appears less dangerous, less clearly defined. That is why that word is used instead of the real one.

• (1345)

[English]

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I begin by saying how extremely disappointed I am with my friends in the Parti Quebecois government in Quebec and their Bloc Quebec allies here in Ottawa. I say friends because while I disagree with their main political option, I have always respected them as reasonable and honest men and women.

I expected the Parti Quebecois government would proceed with the referendum on independence but certainly not in this undemocratic manner. Both the proposal that was announced in the Quebec National Assembly the other day and the process are contrary to the democratic principles usually followed not only in Quebec and in Canada but throughout the western world.

The process and the proposition are undemocratic on four grounds. First, the law is being tabled and passed first and then the consultation comes afterward. In other words they are putting the cart before the horse. That is certainly not what is usually done. It is not what we did in this Parliament when amending the law on the goods and services tax. We commissioned a committee which held wide ranging hearings, travelled the country and collected views. Now the government is preparing a law.

We are doing the same thing with the reform of our social security laws. We did the same thing with respect to defence and external affairs. Very important changes are being made to our policies and our laws but first we consult and bring in the law afterward.

Second, the Parti Quebecois government did not get a mandate from the electorate of Quebec in the last election to put forward such a law. It only got approximately 44 per cent of the vote and many of those who voted for the Parti Quebecois voted for them in order to have a change of government.

There are two principal parties in Quebec: the provincial Liberal Party and the Parti Quebecois. Many people were dissatisfied with the Liberal Party and voted for the Parti Quebecois for a better way of governing. That was the slogan that was on the signs: "For a better way of governing", to deal with economic and social problems.

Even among the 44 per cent that did vote for the Parti Quebecois many voted for a better way of government and not for the law that was tabled in the National Assembly the other day. It is true that during the election campaign Mr. Parizeau spoke about a referendum but he certainly did not speak of a referendum that would be preceded by a unilateral declaration of independence.

Third, in discussing the non–democratic nature of these proposals, the regional commissions that the Quebec government intends to set up are loaded in favour of the law and the principles behind the law. The premier of Quebec has invited MNAs from the Quebec National Assembly and members of Parliament to participate in the commissions. Added to those commissions will be other members who will be appointed by the Government of Quebec and favourable to its position. The chairs of those regional commissions will be persons who will not be elected members of Parliament or MNAs but, and I am referring to the words of Mr. Parizeau: "will be people who will be able to build consensus" toward the proposal that he tabled in the assembly.

In other words the goal of the chair or those regional commissions will be to build consensus toward the principle of a unilaterally independent state of Quebec.

The dice are loaded with respect to those regional commissions. They are undemocratic. That is why many groups, not just political parties, will not participate in the regional commissions. Their goal is simply to improve on, to build on, what has already been tabled in the Quebec National Assembly as a draft bill.

• (1350)

Fourth, the process is dishonest and misleading because it pretends to keep the best of both Canada and Quebec. It is a bit like the sovereignty association question in the last referendum in the early 1980s. For example, the draft bill provides for economic union with Canada, for keeping Canadian citizenship, for keeping the Canadian dollar, for maintaining Quebec's position in NAFTA and in NATO, for maintaining Canadian pensions and for maintaining the same territory which Quebec now has, but which it did not have at the time of Confederation.

It is a sort of having one's cake and eating it too, getting out of Canada but remaining in Canada. On those grounds as well the process is undemocratic, confusing and misleading for the ordinary voter and the ordinary citizen of Quebec.

The opening clause of the draft constitution states that Quebec is a sovereign country. That is a universal declaration of independence in the sense that it refers to an entire country. It is misleading for the people of Quebec because all provinces are now sovereign in provincial areas of jurisdiction. It was decided by the Privy Council many years ago that all provinces were sovereign in their areas of jurisdiction just as the federal government is sovereign in its area of jurisdiction.

I want to say a few words about the legality of this process. There is no provision in either the Constitution of 1867 or the Constitution of 1982 for any province to secede unilaterally. No province has that right legally. They no more have that right than would the federal government have the right to expel unilaterally a province from Canada.

Can one imagine if we passed a law in this Parliament and confirmed by the Senate to throw Quebec out or Prince Edward Island or British Columbia out, without going through the process of our amending formula. It would be considered outrageous if we even attempted to do that. Even if the federal government should try to do it with the support of a few other provinces it is unacceptable.

It is unacceptable that any province should leave unilaterally without the agreement of the other provinces because we have come to share so much together. If it requires an amendment of the Constitution to transfer a number of powers from the federal government to a provincial government—let us say to transfer manpower training or pensions or unemployment insurance or other things—then certainly it requires amendments to transfer all of the powers.

There are various views on this, but I would say at the very most for a province to secede it would require the amending formula which states that you need seven out of ten provinces, representing 50 per cent of the population in order to make such an extreme amendment to the Constitution. But at the very least, it would require the consent of the province in question and of the federal Parliament.

Some people would say that we should not talk about the legalities of secession, we should talk about the politics of it. Even politically and morally, the present government of Quebec has no political or moral mandate to introduce and pass the type of law which they tabled in the National Assembly the other day. They got only a little over 44 per cent of the vote and even then all those who voted for them did not support that option.

I understand my time is up. I had much more to say on this subject. However, we should reject this motion before the House today. We should certainly reject the bill that is in the Quebec National Assembly at the present time.

• (1355)

I would recommend again to my friends, whom I respect, that they go back to the drawing boards and come up with something that is more suitable, in accordance with our democratic process and then we can all decide it in a proper way.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Madam Speaker, thank you for giving me this opportunity to speak in this debate. In fact, I would urge all my constituents in Québec–Est, the riding I represent, to take part in the consultation process initiated by the Government of Quebec which, I would like to point out to the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, is an entirely democratic process.

I think we can say that never in Quebec's history has there been a more democratic and more open process to consult Quebecers to find out what they really want. I must say I do not appreciate the use of the word "immoral" by the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce in referring to the process initiated by the Government of Quebec.

Mr. Duceppe: He should talk about the War Measures Act.

Mr. Marchand: To imply that this is immoral is an insult to the intelligence of the members of this House.

What is immoral about wanting to consult and wanting to know what Quebecers want, what is wanted by people who have been deceived and whose rights have been violated for over a century? How can the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce say that this process has no legitimacy or is unlawful, when this Parliament has for years violated its own Constitution? It has shown no respect for its own Constitution or for the rights of the provinces.

The trouble with Canada was that the federal government failed to respect the rights of the provinces. If at the federal level in Ottawa, we had at least respected our own Constitution, perhaps we would not have the problems we have today, and I am referring to this failure to respect the rights of the provinces and the rights of francophones outside Quebec. Did anyone mention this? Can anyone in this House say that their rights have not been violated by this Constitution? What about the lack of political will on the part of the federal Liberals, which has been going on for some time, to make Canada's provinces abide by the Constitution?

What I find particularly galling is that the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, who is a member from Quebec, did not say a single word in French in his speech. Is it too much to expect of a member of Parliament for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce to speak French when dealing with a matter of such importance, and I am referring to the sovereignty of Quebec?

I also want to say it is unrealistic to consider a third option, as the Reform Party did earlier, it is unrealistic to consider a third option when we realize that since 1980, every possible avenue has been explored to find an alternative to sovereignty and all attempts in this respect have been unsuccessful.

The Speaker: Dear colleague, I believe that you have about a minute left. You may continue after Question Period, if you wish.

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I will have an opportunity to respond to that question?

The Speaker: Yes, you will have an opportunity to respond to the question after question period. As it is now two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to statements by members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

Mr. John Cannis (Scarborough Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, last week I had the pleasure of joining the hon. Minister of Citizenship and Immigration at a special citizenship and reaffirmation ceremony presided over by Dr. John Brooks, a member of the Order of Canada.

I congratulate the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, the Queen Victoria Public School Children's Choir and all the volunteers for putting on such a splendid, well–organized event.

As I was congratulating the new citizens, one individual thanked me for coming and whispered to me: "God bless Canada and please do whatever you can to keep it together".

I was deeply moved by his words. As the son of an immigrant I would like today to echo his words in this honourable House. God bless Canada. I would also like to assure this new Canadian and all Canadians that this government, this party, will work relentlessly to make our country proud, prosperous and above all, united.

REFERENDUM ON QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Quebec sovereignty issue is again at the centre of debate.

In the 1980 referendum campaign, Prime Minister Trudeau said that a "no" to the referendum meant a "yes" to renewed federalism. We know the rest: exclusion of Quebec from the Canadian Constitution, failure of Meech Lake, failure of Charlottetown.

This time, federalist leaders promise a "flexible federalism", at the same time we learn that the federal government refuses to pay $282 million in transfer payments owed to the Quebec Treasury.

The rest of Canada no longer wants to hear about the legitimate demands of Quebec. As for Quebecers, they have had enough of the status quo. The positions are clear. Why the false pretences? Quebecers will soon have to choose between sovereignty and fossilized federalism. We are confident of the outcome.

OKANAGAN WINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to salute an industry which has risen from the ashes to become a world leader. I refer to the Okanagan's flourishing wine industry. Today any respectable wine cellar is incomplete without a selection of the very fine vintages coming from the Okanagan Valley.

Among our world class estate wines we include Le Compte Wines, Sumac Ridge, Lang Vinyards, Wild Goose Vinyards and Gehringer Brothers. All have won an impressive collection of international medals for their wines. Many of these wines have been judged the best in the world at competitions such as the Intervin International in New York and the International Wine and Spirit Competition held in London, England.

In the south Okanagan estate wineries floundered with government subsidies but have flourished without government subsidies and government interference. Free enterprise and competition nurtures excellence. There is an important lesson in the Okanagan wine industry. I salute the entrepreneurs of the Okanagan wine industry and the people of the Okanagan. Indeed all Canadians are justly proud of you.

JOANNE DAVE

Mr. Jag Bhaduria (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville, Ind. Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is with great sadness that I rise today to pay tribute to my dedicated executive assistant, Joanne Dave, who passed away last week. She died after suffering severe head injuries in a car accident.

Joanne was a devoted assistant who never accepted an adverse response to a constituent query. She was so dedicated to her job that she would not stop until she got the best possible result for any constituent. She was much more than a highly competent employee; she was also a friend for many years and was always there to assist me in every matter.

Many members in this House who have met Joanne through her work will concur with me about everything I have stated. To her husband Pankaj, her three children Shilpa, Neha and little Chiku, I offer my deepest sympathy. She will be remembered fondly by all who have known her.

CANADIAN PEACEKEEPERS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I know that members on both sides of this House welcome the news that the Bosnian Serb army has now released 55 Canadian peacekeepers detained in the Bosnian town of Ilijas.

If these brave men and women are listening today, I want them to know that Canadians are very proud of the important work being done in this shattered region. We know very well this war could have claimed thousands of lives more if it were not for the Canadian peacekeepers.

We also know the war lords in this conflict would love the UN to pull out of the former Yugoslavia. Canadians are not quitters. We will not carelessly abandon innocent civilians at their moment of greatest need. I ask that all members join me in this salute to the brave Canadians serving in the UN peacekeeping operations.

EDUCATION

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as Canada moves into the 21st century no field of endeavour is more vital to our continued success as a nation than education.

I would like to recognize the efforts of Canada's teachers throughout our nation at all levels of education. Their vital role in preparing young Canadians to become full active citizens should never be underestimated.

There is an appreciation from most Canadian students and their families of this reality. Today I am pleased to welcome to Ottawa from my riding of London—Middlesex staff and students of Regina Mundi College where I taught at one time. They are a good example of the very important interest that our educators and our youth have in the future of this our great Canada.

THE LATE JACK ELLIS

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my deepest sympathy to the family and friends of the late Jack Ellis, member of Parliament for Prince Edward—Hastings from 1972 to 1988.

On Thursday, December 1, Jack Ellis died of a sudden heart attack at his home in Prince Edward County in Ontario. Those of us who knew him as a friend and colleague will know that Jack's public career was one of selfless commitment and fierce pride in his work. His sudden death will leave our community with a profound sense of loss as to the tremendous potential for further service which has been left unfulfilled.

In the Quinte area Jack was a longstanding public figure with a tremendous record of success. Following his retirement as member of Parliament for Prince Edward—Hastings he continued to work tirelessly on some of his favourite community oriented projects and was always a strong voice representing the interests of a region.

Only his commitment to family and his loyalty to his friends had the potential to surpass his devotion to public service. In this sense he was a complete professional with the values that are treasured the most in political life.

There will be a memorial service for Jack tomorrow in Belleville. I know that all members of this House will join with me in extending our most sincere sympathies to Jack's wife Wally, his children, family and friends on their sudden and unfortunate loss.

Mr. Réjean Lefebvre (Champlain, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Quebec university presidents announced that they will not participate in federal hearings on social program reform. Denouncing the federal project, they said that they agreed with the Government of Quebec, that education was strictly a provincial matter.

Unanimously, Quebec university students opposed the federal reform. They condemned it saying, and I quote: "When they choose a country, students will remember that the federal government increased their tuition fees and their debt load against the will of Quebec".

Yesterday, the National Council of Welfare denounced the federal proposal to create two classes of unemployed, and urged the government not to widen any further the gap between rich and poor.

The Bloc Quebecois demands that the minister go back to the drawing board. He said the reform was prompted by public opinion. Yes, Quebecers and Canadian want a reform, but not the one he proposes.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the justice minister plans to force legal gun owners to register their firearms with the federal government. The majority of constituents in my riding of Cariboo—Chilcotin are strongly opposed to this plan.

Canadians have told this justice minister many times that a gun registry will not work. Legal gun owners have been very responsible in the care, use and storage of their firearms. One constituent of mine, John Ross of 100 Mile House, said: "Past governments have made much ado about the gun control legislation they have passed. In reality, they have only placed additional responsibilities and restrictions on the honest, responsible gun owners".

All a gun registry will do is frustrate legal gun owners and swell the government bureaucracy while leaving criminals untouched.

I call on all Canadians who are against registration and the other unnecessary proposals to write to the justice minister at the House of Commons, Ottawa, Ontario, K1A 0A6, no stamp required.

HIGHWAYS

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge the government to give serious consideration to increasing support to our national highway system.

Currently of the $5 billion collected as federal fuel tax only about 10 per cent of the revenue is invested in the Canadian highway system. This is simply not enough. More than a third of the 24,000 kilometre national highway system in Canada does not meet minimum standards. Ensuring that the national highway system meets the standards established by the Minister of Transport would result in the creation of 200,000 direct construction jobs as well as a number of secondary benefits for those industries which rely on the road system like tourism and transportation.

• (1410)

Not only will there be economic advantages, I believe the revitalization of our transportation infrastructure will also result in reduced highway fatalities, loss and damage to property, as well as reducing congestion and lowering vehicle operating costs not only in my riding but in ridings across the country.

Again, Mr. Speaker, I urge this House to support the renewal of the national highway system in Canada.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Saturday, December 10 is World Human Rights Day.

[Translation]

As Canadians, we can be proud of our contribution to the international community on the issue of human rights and on the development of international standards to which we adhere.

[English]

This said, we must also be ever vigilant that our human rights respect international standards and ensure the right of all Canadians to live free from discrimination in this country.

A recent decision of the United Nations human rights committee ruled that sexual orientation is protected by the equality guarantees of the international covenant on civil and political rights, a document which Canada helped prepare and which binds us.

Let us in remembering World Human Rights Day recognize that it is our duty to ensure that our laws in this country are amended to eliminate all forms of discrimination, including any based on sexual orientation.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY

Mrs. Jane Stewart (Brant, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, earlier today the Standing Committee on Finance tabled its report on the first ever pre–budget consultations. As a member of that committee I could comment on several aspects of the report. But as the sole female member I feel compelled to highlight the necessity of understanding the gender impact of budgetary measures.

We recommended a 12 per cent cut in government operations, but will we ensure that the positive impact of employment equity initiatives will not be lost as we pare down our public service? We suggested a 10 per cent reduction in international aid, but will we be sure that our women in development programs are not disproportionately cut?

There are those who say this strategy is too expensive, but I say the government must take the initiative and ensure that systemic discrimination is not perpetuated nor created. We insist on this in the private sector through employment equity legislation. We can expect no less from our government.

CANADIAN PEACEKEEPERS

Mr. Laurent Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is with great relief that we learned this morning that the 55 Canadian peacekeepers taken hostage by Bosnian Serb forces two weeks ago had been released. However, we are still extremely concerned about the eventual pull–out of all peacekeepers from Bosnia, at a time when NATO is speeding up preparations for such a move.

If the humiliation the Bosnian Serb forces are inflicting on the international community were to lead to the withdrawal of peacekeepers from Bosnia, it is quite certain that we will face a significant upsurge in fighting. Consequently, we have every reason to fear the impact of such a decision on the Bosnian civilian population which would be completely left to its fate. It is high time for Canada to show leadership and push for the United Nations to be reformed as quickly as possible in order to recover the credibility the UN lost in this horrible conflict.

FOREIGN AID

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this House will be asked to vote later today on $1,143,285,750 worth of spending. Five hundred and twenty–seven million dollars of this spending is to help reduce the debts of heavily indebted countries because of multilateral agreements Canada undertook in the past.

Some of these heavily indebted countries are much less indebted than Canada yet Canadian taxpayers are asked to relieve their debts. This is absolutely insane.

I call upon the Minister of Finance to commit to this House that such ludicrous agreements will not be undertaken in the future. Furthermore, will the Minister of Finance abide by the motion passed by the Standing Committee on Finance on December 1 which states that any agreement to relieve the debt burden of other countries is studied by the finance committee prior to the government making any such commitment?

SOCIAL PROGRAM REFORM

Mr. Bernard Patry (Pierrefonds—Dollard, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, consultations undertaken by the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development, following the minister's tabling of his discussion paper entitled "Improving Social Security in Canada", are being held in Quebec this week.

• (1415)

We learned recently that the Conseil du patronat du Québec had polled its members on the best way to finance post–secondary education. The results of this consultation are published in the December issue of the CPQ newsletter.

We learn that almost three respondents out of four, 74 per cent to be more exact, believe that the federal government should fund students directly through loans and bursaries. This is yet another proof that the social program reform launched by our government truly meets the expectations and aspirations of the population.

RONALD EDWARD ARMSTRONG

Mr. Andy Mitchell (Parry Sound—Muskoka, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to pay tribute to the late Reverend Ronald Edward Armstrong of Windermere in my riding of Parry Sound—Muskoka.

Reverend Armstrong was killed in a tragic plane crash recently, bringing to an end a life dedicated to the service of others. Besides his work at several parishes in Ontario during the past 30 years, Reverend Armstrong will be remembered for his outstanding contribution to the people on the Island of Bequia, St. Vincent and other Grenadine Islands.

Reverend Armstrong, who founded and directed the Bequia Mission, was instrumental in establishing a school for handicapped children and adults, a workshop for the handicapped and he arranged for the sponsorship of underprivileged children so they could attend school.

Reverend Armstrong was a great humanitarian and a great Canadian. We all share the loss with his wife June, four children and grandchildren.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[Translation]

DRAFT BILL ON QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, in the same disarray as the speakers for the federalist cause, the Prime Minister tried to minimize the consultation process announced by the Government of Quebec and at the same time confirmed that he did not intend to participate in it. He also mentioned the possibility of the federal government holding a Canada–wide referendum on Quebec's constitutional future.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Does he admit that holding a Canada–wide referendum on Quebec's constitutional future means denying Quebecers the right to decide their own future for themselves?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we want only one thing: a referendum as soon as possible in Quebec, under Quebec's Referendum Act, where they will not play tricks but be honest with the people and ask Quebecers whether or not they want to separate from Canada.

If they do that, we will solve the problem quickly and no longer hear about it. I hope that instead of the unnecessary complications which the Bloc members are now raising, we will take the question seriously and stop talking about the Constitution and separation and all work together on creating jobs and economic growth, which is what Quebecers want above all.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how does the Prime Minister reconcile what his Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs said about the possibility of flexible federalism with his own statement refusing any constitutional reform?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not very complicated. Right now, the Minister of Human Resources Development is making a fundamental reform in Canada without changing the Constitution. That is what we want: fundamental reforms.

Enough time has been wasted consulting people for years. We wasted seven years discussing constitutional changes and ended up with exactly the same situation and the federal system we have today. It was wonderful to see Mr. Parizeau say in his statement how we have advanced in Canada. He was talking about the progress Quebec made within the Canadian federation. Why change that? If we could do so well, we will continue to do even better by remaining in the best country in the world, Canada.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, everyone will have understood what the Prime Minister means by flexible federalism: the provinces bend and the federal government invades their jurisdiction.

How can the Prime Minister be indignant and get all hot under the collar about the $2 million which Quebec will spend on consulting its citizens when his own government is getting ready to spend $35 million on tourism advertising to promote his beautiful Canada, $7 million more for promoting Canadian unity and $6 million more for the Privy Council and its federal strategy on the referendum?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what is absolutely outrageous in the Parti Quebecois's proposal now is that they want to create 15 "yes" committees financed by the state. They proposed having 15 committee members, of whom 13 would be appointed by the party in power and two by the opposition parties. Since they are not confident in their cause, they want the PQ campaign to promote their cause in their ridings to be paid for by the taxpayers of Quebec.

We will go to Quebec and make speeches and it will not be paid for by the taxpayers of Canada. We will tell Quebecers that we do not want trickery; we want the truth, a clear, short, unambiguous question: Do you, in Quebec, want to separate from Canada, yes or no? It is as simple as that.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after wasting one year in the fight against the deficit, the Liberals now propose, in a report to the Minister of Finance, to increase the tax burden of all taxpayers by imposing a temporary surtax which could bring in over one billion dollars, to be used to reduce the deficit. By the way, the last temporary tax was the income tax of 1914, which has now been in effect for 80 years.

Will the Prime Minister pledge to reject the proposal made by his members to impose a surtax which would be in direct contradiction with his own election promise not to increase the tax burden of Canadians during the first two years of his mandate?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the committee travelled across the country. It then made recommendations to the Minister of Finance who will review them. When the minister tables his budget in February, we will see which of these recommendations he intends to follow. The remarkable thing about the Bloc members who sat on that committee is that they could not make a single specific recommendation. They shied away from their responsibility to make decisions and recommendations. They speak eloquently, but they do not have the courage to take a clear stand.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, not only does the Minister of Finance not read his letters before signing them, but the Prime Minister does not read the documents tabled by the Official Opposition. If he did, he would know that we made ten specific proposals to implement real streamlining and saving measures to improve the government's finances. I am not talking about measures which would hurt the unemployed and the poor, but about real saving and streamlining initiatives.

How can the Prime Minister, or his government, consider imposing such a surtax on Canadians who honestly pay their taxes, when this government has yet to act, or even show the political will to recover over $6 billion dollars in unpaid taxes from the wealthiest Canadians? Is this his definition of justice? Is this his definition of fairness?

[English]

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we said that we will reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP by the end of the third year of our mandate and we will do it.

He can make all the speeches he wants. We have a clear program. It is well documented, it will be met and it will be realized. He will see that we can do it.

QUEBEC

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the federal government's reaction to Premier Parizeau's draft bill on Quebec sovereignty has been unfocused and even confusing.

The Prime Minister is quoted as saying his strategy is to win the referendum battle but he does not say which referendum, having dismissed Mr. Parizeau's referendum plan. The government seems very reluctant to comment on the illegality or legality of what is proposed or to point out specific flaws in the Parizeau plan.

• (1425)

Section 5 of the draft sovereignty bill states Quebec citizenship may be held concurrently with citizenship of Canada or any other country.

Does the Prime Minister accept this position, yes or no? If he does not, why does he not say so?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has not listened to me a lot over the years. I have always said that they cannot impose a situation unilaterally. Citizenship of Canada will be determined by the Parliament of Canada not by the Parliament of Quebec.

Mr. Parizeau's proposition is funny. He wants to keep all the good things that Canada has provided for Quebec. Quebec should stay in Canada. That is my answer. I am from Quebec and whenever I travel around Canada I am comfortable in every part of the country.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Prime Minister's answer. We had trouble getting that type of answer yesterday and the day before.

The Quebec government has also stated that in the event of a vote for sovereignty in the upcoming referendum, an economic association with Canada would be maintained. Again, the statement is completely presumptuous, without regard for the position which the government and the people of Canada might take on such an association.

Does the Prime Minister concur with the position that an automatic economic association between Canada and a separate Quebec should be assumed? If he does not, why does he not say so?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not a big problem. It is evident that the people and the Government of Canada will decide. For example, the PQ wants to keep the Canadian currency. Monetary policies will be decided by this Parliament and it will have absolutely no voice. Nobody will be able to get up here and ask the Minister of Finance what is right or wrong with the monetary policies of Canada.

Of course certain countries have used the currency of other countries. Not long ago I discussed that with some French African countries that depend on the franc. When Paris decided to lower the value of the franc used in Africa, it had nothing to say, it just paid the price.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, for the first time in a year I actually think we are making progress in Question Period.

Section 7 of the proposed sovereignty bill states Quebec shall assume the obligations and enjoy the rights arising out of treaties to which Canada is party. This statement is not only presumptuous but also clearly unconstitutional.

The federal government has the sole role to negotiate and sign international treaties and many have their own provisions for who joins those treaties.

Is not section 7 of the proposed sovereignty act beyond the power of the Quebec government? If it is, should not the federal government say so now?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to debate what is in this project of law. We can have a long debate on that. The question is a very simple one.

They should have the honesty to ask the Quebec people first: "Do you want to separate, yes or no?". To play games like that will lead nowhere. It is just a sign that they are afraid to be honest with the people and ask a very simple question: "Do you want to separate from Canada, yes or no?".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Despite a healthier economy and rising tax revenues, the federal government, like the previous Conservative government, is preparing to add to the tax burden of all Canadians, because it has shown itself totally unable to reduce federal spending, to eliminate unjustified tax privileges like the ones for family trusts and to take whatever measures are needed to collect more than $6 billion in unpaid taxes.

• (1430)

Will the Prime Minister acknowledge that, instead of introducing a surtax that could jeopardize the economic recovery, he should have the courage to end duplication, waste and inequities in the tax system?

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Finance, I would like to thank the committee and its chairman, the member for Willowdale, for the excellent work done this fall on reviewing the budget.

All members of the committee worked very hard hearing the representations from Canadians. All three parties made an effort to put forward their own ideas. On behalf of the minister, I would like to also thank the other two parties for putting forward their ideas.

The Minister of Finance has made it quite clear that during this process we will not be commenting on any specific proposals from any sources. We will just simply continue our consultation process until the budget is announced in February.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister.

Does the Prime Minister acknowledge that, by recommending cuts of $3.4 billion in social programs, government members on the finance committee are confirming the government's shameful objective of reducing the deficit at the expense of the unemployed, welfare recipients and students?

[English]

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the opposition knows full well that under the leadership of the Minister of Human Resources Development that the process of consulting with Canadians continues. The government will make a decision in the coming year as to how to deal with each of the items in the budget.

TAXATION

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the finance committee report recommends increased taxes on gasoline, lottery winnings and corporations. Most incredibly, it suggests increasing taxes on income.

Canadians told the committee clearly that they do not want higher taxes. They are taxed to the max. They want smaller government. Reform's proposals show that the deficit can be eliminated by spending cuts alone.

Is the government going to accept the recommendations of its finance committee and increase taxes, yes or no?

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows as he participated in many of these meetings that we heard a variety of opinions from Canadians concerned about the government, taxes and about the integrity of our programs. The Minister of Finance will take these into account as he makes up his mind.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today Stats Canada noted that during the last 23 years Canadians' taxes increased nearly 50 per cent while their income remained constant. Now there is the prospect of even higher taxes on gasoline and lottery winnings. The Liberal credo seems to be: If Canadians like it, tax it.

Is the minister seriously planning to raise taxes on the use of cars and the dreams Canadians buy with their lottery tickets?

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the member is a great fan of Stats Canada he should be quoting the tremendous rate of economic growth in this country under the leadership of this government.

The member will know full well that everyone is concerned about the high level of taxation for Canadian families, just as we are with the integrity of all of our programs.

PEARSON AIRPORT

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. According to the Globe and Mail, in 1990, while he was practising law, the Prime Minister advised the Matthews Group, a partner in the Pearson Development Corporation, on the privatization of Pearson Airport. This consortium is now demanding $440 million in compensation for the cancellation of the airport privatization contract.

Considering his previous professional relations with the Matthews Group, a partner in the Pearson Development Corporation, can the Prime Minister confirm that he has not taken part, since he was elected, in any Cabinet decision concerning the Pearson Airport nor been involved in any way in this issue, so as to avoid any apparent conflict of interest?

• (1435)

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, there is no issue on that group.

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, what is the assurance of the Prime Minister worth, since Bill C–22 proposes a discretionary process to provide compensation for the cancellation of the Pearson Airport contract, which could benefit the Matthews Group he advised as a lawyer?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, never as a lawyer, did I have any discussions about Toronto Airport with any of these people. Besides, I am the one who proposed cancelling this project. Not only is there no conflict of interest, but I am the one who axed the whole thing.

BOSNIA

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party caucus and indeed all Canadians welcome the good news of the release of the 55 Canadian hostages held by the Bosnian Serbs. Yesterday the French foreign minister called for a withdrawal of its peacekeepers in Bosnia. This only makes public the growing realization that this is a political, not a military problem and that peacekeepers cannot do their job in the current environment.

My question is for the Prime Minister. Now that Canadians have been released, will the government align with France's position and use this opportunity to withdraw our troops?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to pay tribute to the soldiers who acted with calm and courage. They know they are involved in an extremely important mission which is to help the poor civilians who are trapped in this terrible situation by providing them with food, medication and so on.

I was at a discussion in Budapest. The situation is very bad. The President of Bosnia was pleading with me to try to keep our troops there because they are considered the best. Canada has no political interest in the area. I said to him that our interest was not political, that our interest was in peace and to help the civilian population.

We have a mandate until the month of February. In January cabinet will review that. I would like to point out that we had debates in this House of Commons. Members of the House were consulted and the great majority were in agreement that we should be there to help the civilian population. We will review the situation in January. Of course not only Canada has troops there. There are others and we have to consult them too.

I have to say again that we are all very proud of the way the Canadian soldiers behaved. I was delighted to hear the President of Bosnia tell me that the Canadians are the best there.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in reaction to the French government's call for a withdrawal of peacekeepers from Bosnia the Prime Minister said: "Probably they want to reassure their own people". Those are the Prime Minister's words.

I ask the Prime Minister: Does this government wish to reassure Canadians now that the hostages are free by moving to withdraw our troops?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I said that it is very important for everyone to plan to make sure that if there is a situation, for example the lifting of the embargo, we said we were to go. If there were to be some other disastrous situation we have to have a plan ready to make sure our troops can be evacuated. We have been working on that for many months.

We have been in contact too with NATO and the UN to make sure the plans are ready if evacuation is needed. I hope it will not be needed, but it is very good to do the planning now in case we have the need later.

MIL DAVIE SHIPYARD

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

The MIL Davie shipyard, the only other bidder for an important Hibernia contract, has clearly been wronged by the Hibernia consortium's decision to award the contract to Saint John Shipbuilding without a call for tenders. The Canada–Newfoundland Board, the Minister of Natural Resources and the Prime Minister have all admitted that. The Hibernia consortium has itself ignored the Prime Minister's directive by flatly refusing to review its decision.

• (1440)

How can the Prime Minister explain that, despite the clear directive issued by him to the president of the consortium, Mr. Ken Hall, Hibernia has refused to redress the injustice to which he has himself so strongly objected?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I made a complaint last week. I was in Newfoundland yesterday. The people who had been awarded the first contract lost it for productivity reasons.

I think the company should not have acted in this way. I have said it clearly, but since we own only 8.5 per cent of the company's shares, we cannot force it to change its decision. I still think it is a bad decision for both the Newfoundland shipyard and the Quebec shipyard.

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the Prime Minister admit to his inability to force Hibernia to respect his decision when the federal government is investing over $3 billion of taxpayers' money in this risky venture?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I said earlier, the Canadian government has funded 8.5 per cent of the total project.

SHIPBUILDING

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. Will the minister ensure that federal contracts for new ships and the major repair of ships are done in an open, transparent manner? Will all interested parties such as private companies and those owned by subsidized provinces be required to compete by rules as set forward in the proper business supplier–customer manner?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that first, it is the government's policy where it does have shipbuilding requirements to meet them from Canadian yards. Second, as the Prime Minister himself has stated very clearly in this House and elsewhere, that should be done through a clear, transparent, open bidding process.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for ACOA.

The country is on its knees financially and the minister stands on a soapbox in Atlantic Canada making noises about ending ACOA's role in handing out grants. Yet at the same time he says ACOA will be involved in providing venture capital to businesses, a function already performed by the Federal Business Development Bank.

Can the minister explain how this move will serve to level the playing field for businesses in Atlantic Canada when it is clear to everyone that taxpayers' dollars will be spent foolishly through a political body?

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was anticipating an apology from the hon. member today. Yesterday in a press release he made the ridiculous suggestion that a linkage may exist between a third party contribution to Liberal election campaigns and the receipt of ACOA assistance. I want to say to the hon. member that is patently false. I hope he will do the honourable thing and apologize to the minister of fisheries and myself when he joins his feet in a moment.

With regard to the question he has asked, the Atlantic venture capital fund we are proposing is to be done in co–operation with provincial governments as well as the private sector.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, am I supposed to join my feet now?

I do not think this government gets it. In 1992–93 alone ACOA wrote off over $50 million in bad debts. When will these Liberals learn that governments know very little if nothing about running business? Does the minister know the difference between a grant and a loan that is not repaid at taxpayers' expense? If these loans are all going to be repaid, why not let FBDB or the banks fill the role? Why do we need two government agencies to provide the exercise?

• (1445)

Hon. David Dingwall (Minister of Public Works and Government Services and Minister for the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thought if the hon. member would join his feet perhaps now he can keep his mouth shut.

The fact of the matter is, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: I would encourage all hon. members to address others with a little more respect on both sides. I call on the hon. minister of public works.

Mr. Dingwall Mr. Speaker, as I said in my first answer, I was anticipating an apology because of the assertions that the hon. member made.

The House should be aware that the reference to the minister of fisheries and myself is patently false. The House should know that when the chief of staff of the office of the leader of the Reform Party ran in the last federal election, he received from a contributor not one, not two, but $8,000 from Clearwater Fine Foods. That particular company received financial assistance from ACOA both before and after the election.

I think the hon. member owes the House an apology.

The Speaker: Both the questions and the answers are ranging far afield today.

CUSTOMS BROKERS

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue. The Department of National Revenue is about to implement, in January 1995, new regulations which will penalize the small customs brokerage firms. They will require surety bonds of up to $10 million for the goods they clear through customs.

Given the very negative impact of that decision on the existence of small customs brokers, does the Minister of National Revenue intend to answer their demands in the near future?

[English]

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the problem relating to the failure of these customs agents to which the hon. member referred is a serious one because the moneys they take in which are due to the Government of Canada is lost in many cases when the companies go bankrupt.

In addition, there are some major problems with respect to the amount of capitalization that some of these companies have. This means that assets are very few and slight even though the individual who may own the company may have other assets of considerable worth.

We have therefore instituted, in co–operation with the Association of Customs Brokers, a new scheme to provide adequate insurance for those who might be faced with financial difficulties. This scheme has been accepted by the association and accepted by the department. I believe it is a beneficial scheme to make sure that the problems that arise, in particular for the customers of customs brokers, will not reoccur in the future.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows very well that members of that association, including the large American companies, have the right to one vote for each office they operate in different districts. Therefore, the process is totally undemocratic.

Does the Minister of National Revenue recognize that if the proposed regulations were to be implemented in their present form, it could force several small independent customs brokers out of business and that would mean several thousand jobs lost for Canadians?

[English]

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when new measures are introduced with respect to insurance provisions it is always possible that some people will be in such financial position that they will be unable to obtain insurance, whether through their association or outside it. That is a possibility.

However, I would assure the hon. member that the system put in place was developed by the customs brokers. We are attempting to assist so that there will be some self–regulation and self–policing in the customs brokerage industry. Therefore the risks to the public of Canada and in particular the risks to the individual customers of customs brokers will be dramatically reduced.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, section 8 of the public accounts details an endless list of payments made to interest groups, everything from $73,000 for fashion design to $54,000 for World Food Day Association.

The government has been in power for over a year but it has made no cuts to interest group funding. Thirteen months later, $50 billion deeper in debt, and the government still has not made any announcement.

Will the President of the Treasury Board please tell the House and all Canadians why we still have not had any cuts to interest group funding, and when will he act?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the answer I give is similar to the answer that the finance minister and the parliamentary secretary have given.

This is all part of the process leading up to the budget. In fact, it is part of the program review process. Special interest group funding, I can assure the hon. member, is under examination, as is every program and service, as we attempt to get our spending in line, to get our deficit down to 3 per cent of GDP.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadian taxpayers are upset, the Reform Party is upset, even Liberal backbenchers are upset about the gross waste of taxpayers' money.

Why is the President of the Treasury Board not upset about this waste of money? Why is he not acting now rather than waiting for the budget which is several more months and several hundred million dollars later?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, while my hon. friend and the third party is talking about the matter, we are acting. The matter is fully under review. Consultations are going on with various departments on all aspects of spending, including interest group funding.

CRTC

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry. He will no doubt recall that a recent decision by the CRTC to allow for a rate increase in local telephone rates by provincial companies may result in a $72 a year increase for local subscribers.

That decision is being appealed by marketplace competitors. But it is important to understand that such a decision by a non–elected body constitutes a de facto tax imposition, especially on those who are little able to meet such costs and who rely on these telephones for safety, for social security and social contact.

Is the minister going to do something about this, and how soon?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the member indicates, a number of groups have appealed the decision of the CRTC–9419. They petitioned the governor in council to review that decision.

It is under consideration by me. I will be making recommendations to cabinet in due course with full consciousness of the implications involved and the time that the decision will take effect.

ETHICS

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

The minister has still not seen fit to speak to the Director of the Bureau of Veterinary Drugs following the interventions of his official with some members of Parliament. Acting as a lobbyist for some pharmaceutical companies, Mr. Ritter still has access to the Health Canada office and the minister has not yet responded to that.

Will the minister finally admit that Mr. Ritter is indeed in conflict of interest under sections 6(a), 6(b), 26, 42(b), 42(c), and so on, of the Conflict of Interest and Post–Employment Code for Public Office Holders, and will she immediately take the disciplinary action necessary to correct this unacceptable situation?

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I said in the House yesterday, my officials continue to look into this question. When their investigation is complete, they will be reporting to me. I will be pleased to share the findings with the hon. member.

• (1455)

I want to clarify a few points. The person in question is not on leave as the director of the Bureau of Veterinary Medicine. He will not be returning to that position if and when he returns to Health Canada.

As concerns the review process for BST, scientific considerations are absolutely the only thing that will have any bearing on the approval process.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

Is the Prime Minister willing to do what the Minister of Health should have done a long time ago, that is to immediately apply section 33 of the Code which provides for disciplinary action, including dismissal of officials in conflict of interest, if appropriate?

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have said and I will repeat again that the officials in my department are reviewing the situation. When they have finished their review they will report to me and I will be pleased to share the findings.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in 1990 in Fredericton, New Brunswick, gasoline from a leaking Petro–Canada underground tank migrated under the neighbouring house of the Curtis family.

The gasoline fumes in and around the house during the past four years have caused the Curtis family to lose their home, lose their family business and most tragically of all, it has caused permanent mental and physical damage to the Curtis' seven year old daughter.

What is the environment minister prepared to do about this environmental and human disaster?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind the sensitivity of the issue and the fact that obviously the brain damaged child is in very serious condition, what I would like to do is take a look at all the circumstances and report back to the House.

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's answer.

My supplemental is for the Minister of Natural Resources. During this four–year nightmare for the Curtis' Petro–Canada has treated the family like criminals. When the spill occurred in 1990, Petro–Canada was a crown corporation and is now a company in which the government owns over 70 per cent of the shares.

Does the minister condone the bullying manner of Petro–Canada and will she intervene on the Curtis' behalf to ensure Petro–Canada is financially responsible for the additional medical treatment and care required for the Curtis' daughter?

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I do not condone bullying, if that is what happened in this case. I do not know whether that is the case, but I assure the hon. member that I will take this matter under advisement. I will investigate it and report back to him and this House.

LATIN AMERICAN SUMMIT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who tomorrow will be attending the Latin American summit in Miami.

I want to ask the Prime Minister if he will assure the House that at the summit he will raise two specific issues. First, will he raise the issue of the exclusion of Cuba from the summit and the continued illegal and immoral blockade by the United States of that country.

Second, given the very critical situation is Chiapas, Mexico will the Prime Minister urge at the summit an open dialogue and a peaceful, negotiated, non–military settlement in Chiapas?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on the question of Mexico we have already mentioned many times to the authorities there that we want them to negotiate a settlement with the people of that province. I am informed that the dialogue is going better than it was some months ago. But I will press the issue with the newly elected president if I have the occasion.

As far as Mr. Castro and Cuba not being present are concerned, we would have had no problem seeing him there. It was decided that he was not to be invited and I was not the one inviting people to that summit.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of immigration.

The minister of immigration recently announced that it was the intention of the minister to increase the number of business class immigrants coming from India.

• (1500)

My concern is that according to a story in the Globe and Mail, this increase will come from around Bombay and will not include areas such as Punjab. This situation is of grave concern to the many constituents in my riding of Indian descent. What is the basis for the new business immigration strategy?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with respect to the immigration plan that this government tabled on November 1, two key operative measures describe our business immigration: first, to promote it aggressively in a balanced way across the globe; second, to diversify. Seventy–five per cent of all business immigration comes from Asia and we think that is good, evidenced by the recent trip by the Prime Minister and a Canadian delegation.

However, we would also like to diversify in other areas of the world that would like to take advantage of the business immigration program. We identified such examples as western Europe, eastern Europe and the Middle East.

With respect to India, we all know that the majority of immigrants are coming from the Punjab through the New Delhi office. Other countries of the world are also in southern India.

It is not a question of simply excluding individuals, it is also being present in southern Indian where I think the recent trip of the minister of trade showed that Canada could reap some tremendous economic benefits and also continue to have the programs through New Delhi servicing Indians who wish to make Canada their home.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I rise with the customary question for Thursday. Would the government House leader tell us what the order of business will be until the end of this session?

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Madam Speaker, today we are going to continue with the Bloc opposition day and there will be votes on supply at 5.30 this afternoon.

Tomorrow we are going to call third reading of Bill C–51, the grain bill, and Bill C–56, the Environmental Assessment Act amendments, followed if possible by report stage of Bill C–52, the Department of Public Works and Government Services reorganization.

On Monday we will take up where we left off on Friday and follow this business with report stage of Bill C–44 with respect to immigration. On Monday as well we expect to introduce legislation regarding employment equity. We intend to propose that this bill be referred to committee before second reading pursuant to Standing Order 73(1).

This will both meet the legislative requirement for a parliamentary review of existing legislation and provide the House with the most broad possible opportunities for updating the law on this matter. Subject to progress on other legislation, we would like to add this matter to the business for Tuesday.

On Wednesday we intend to deal with report stage of Bill C–53, the Canadian Heritage reorganization bill. On Thursday we will deal with third reading of that bill.

That completes my weekly business statement.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY—PROCESS INITIATED BY THE GOVERNMENT OF QUEBEC

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I want to reply to the member for Québec–Est who questioned my remarks just before Question Period.

The hon. member said that he and the Quebecois people were insulted by my remarks which attacked the Parizeau proposals as undemocratic.

I want to make it very clear that I made no attack on the people of Quebec, whom I respect. My remarks were directed at the Government of Quebec and the Bloc Quebecois. Neither the Parti Quebecois nor the Bloc Quebecois is one and the same as the people of Quebec, although sometimes those members believe they are.

I said that the Parizeau proposals were not democratic because first, they were putting the law on independence before the National Assembly first and they were going to consult and have the referendum afterward. Second, they had no mandate from the electorate because they only received 44 per cent of the vote.

• (1505)

Third, their regional commissions were structured to favour the independence option and were not neutral. Fourth, the proposals were fuzzed, unclear and misleading.

As to my use of French in this House, when I speak in Parliament I usually use my mother tongue which is English, which is my right.

[Translation]

When I talk with my constituents, I use their language, whether French or English, and that is my right also.

Mr. Laurin: Madam Speaker, on a point of order! We were of the opinion that the hon. member had a minute left when he was interrupted for question period. At that time, the Bloc Quebecois member had the floor and the Chair said he would let him finish and allow an answer from the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce. But you went directly to the answer, without giving the minute to our party.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The clerk will correct me if I am wrong, but I had understood that there was one minute left for the answer of the government member. I will give the minute left to the hon. member for Québec–Est.

Mr. Marchand: Madam Speaker, I want to go back to what I said earlier about the statement made by the hon. member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce because I find it insulting for all members of this House when he says the Quebec referendum was unethical.

How can he, who was a member of the Trudeau cabinet, say that a process such as this one was unethical? In 1980, Mr. Trudeau came to the Paul Sauvé Arena and promised Quebecers he would amend the Constitution. Then he deceived Quebec by limiting its powers and creating the problems we have now.

Not only that, and I will conclude with this, the hon. member was also part of the Trudeau cabinet in 1970 when—

[English]

Mr. Allmand: Madam Speaker, not only was I not in the Trudeau cabinet at that time, but I voted against the Constitution of 1982.

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am sure that many Canadians watching the events of the past two days must be experiencing a deep and visceral reaction as the new Government of Quebec and its separatist allies in this Chamber finally launched their desperate push to realize their dreams and tear Quebec out of Canada.

Some Canadians must be feeling a sense of concern and anxiety about the future of a country we cherish. Some Canadians must be feeling a sense of dismay, of déjà vu. Are we ever going to put these issues behind us or are we condemned to regular flare–ups of a national unity crisis like a bad toothache?

Some must be feeling deep frustration, a sense of wanting to get involved, to have a say, to make a difference. The frustration comes from seeing the separatist politicians trying to hijack a great and successful country. The frustration comes from having to hear the kind of nonsense spouted by the separatists, nonsense about how simple and easy separation would be, nonsense about how Canada does not work and especially nonsense about how Canadians in other provinces feel about Quebec.

The separatists are already presenting us with a wide array of distortions. Their rhetoric will get louder and louder and more and more extreme as they draw closer to their day of reckoning. They will be trying to tell Quebecers there is no place for them in Canada, no recognition, no accommodation. They will be telling Quebecers other Canadians want them to leave or no longer care one way or the other.

They will ignore the nearly 1 million francophone Canadians who live outside the boundaries of Quebec, whom they intend to cast overboard, to sink or swim.

• (1510)

They will be telling Quebecers our partnership has reached a stage of irreconcilable differences, that it is time to divvy up the assets and to get on with our separate lives. They will be telling Quebecers it would be a painless breakup, while telling the rest of Canada that we cannot get along anymore, but by the way, we will still need the use of your dollar and open access to your markets.

It is hard to know how to react, to laugh at the absurdity and the contradictions of the separatist project, to cry at the tragedy of so much talent, time and energy being wasted chasing a totally unnecessary leap into the unknown, or to get angry at the dishonesty and the contempt that permeate the separatist arguments.

There is so much that is absurd, the prospect of soldiers in the new Quebec army lining up to be paid in Canadian dollars, the idea that Quebec needs independence to choose its own immigrants side by side with promises by the PQ of unrestricted mobility of labour with the rest of Canada.

It is strange to hear the lamenting about how there is no room for Quebec in Canada when we can look around this city and see Quebecers occupying the highest offices this country has to offer. It is strange to hear Mr. Parizeau vaunt the accomplishments of Quebec at every opportunity, waxing eloquent and quite rightly so about the social, economic and cultural progress Quebec has made these past 30 years.

He does not even blush and acknowledge that all of that progress took place inside Canada. It came through hard work and partnership between Quebecers and other Canadians and through partnership between two levels of government. It is strange to hear the separatists denounce the rigidities of a system that gave Quebec so many tools and the French language and culture a secure home.

There is much that would be saddening if the separatists ever had their way, the dismembering and discarding of a model of governance that points the way to the world of the future. The future does not belong to microstates, it belongs to partnerships of communities sharing their sovereignty to pursue a better life for their citizens.

It is sad to see the separatists' headlong race back into the past. There is much to provoke anger. The separatists will denigrate and belittle accomplishments of Canada. They will play fast and loose with the truth. They will show contempt for anyone who does not share their vision or their zeal.

To laugh, to cry, to get angry, I urge my fellow Canadians not to give in to an emotional reaction, to realize what is going on here. This is the beginning of an increasingly desperate and panicky assault by the separatist movement. They have one shot at making the case to break up Canada. They know deep down they carry an enormous burden of proof and it is starting to rattle their nerves. As they get more and more rattled, they are desperately trying to put their opponents on the defensive and it is not going to work.

There is an overwhelming consensus that it is time for Quebecers to make a decision. In 1995 we will come to a fork in the road and we will take one path or the other. It is that simple. The stark clarity makes some people uncomfortable. That is understandable, but there is no longer any use denying that the fork in the road is here in front of us.

I share in the consensus that the time has come for a decision, but I want that decision to last and to be accepted gracefully by the separatists. For the decision to stick it must be seen by Quebecers and by Canadians in every other province as a clear result on a clear question after a fair and full debate. It should come at the end of the process used twice before, the Quebec referendum law. That is what the Parti Quebecois promised in order to get elected, albeit by the narrowest of margins. That is what it is morally and politically obliged to deliver now.

The resolution is misleading because it ignores the reality that Quebec's future is Canada's future, that after two centuries of partnership, of building a political, social and economic union together, Canadians in other parts of the federation would be indifferent or unaffected by a decision by one–quarter of its members to leave.

Other Canadians have a right to talk with Quebecers about that decision, about the options they have. We want Quebec to stay. We want to get back to what all of us Canadians do best, working out practical solutions to real problems, innovating and adapting, bending and compromising, adjusting and changing. We have always found the ways to live together, to work together, to build together. We have found ways to acknowledge and indeed to cherish our differences and at the same time realize how much we share. We have had a successful federation in this country for 127 years. We have woven together an economic union, a sharing social community and a democratic political union so well that too many of us have forgotten what we have to lose.

Why federalism? It is disarmingly simple. Federations allow communities to come together under peaceful and democratic political structures to share the benefit of social and economic co–operation while retaining the very high degree of local control over issues that matter most to local communities. It is a simple idea like most great ideas. It is an idea that has worked in societies that are on the surface relatively uniform, societies like Germany, Australia, and the United States.

It is a particularly important idea in societies where communities based on language, religion or ethnicity live side by side, societies like Switzerland, India and, yes, Canada. It is a great idea but it is constantly under attack. All over the world there are politicians who promote difference, who offer people false hope that their lives would suddenly improve if walls went up with other communities.

Some of them sit in this Chamber. Federalism gives local communities the scope to exercise control over many aspects of their lives, especially in matters close to the cultural vitality and the social development of the community.

Federalism enables communities to co–operate with their neighbours and to work together in pursuit of common goals. Federalism is a way to pool resources, talent and energy in pursuit of these goals. Federalism provides a framework of peace, order and security and allows communities and individuals to live side by side.

Federalism creates a common identity and a purpose that can transcend differences without replacing local identities and local communities. Federalism provides the structures of an economic union but places them under the control of a democratic legislature. Federalism provides the basis for a sharing community, for a redistribution of wealth from richer to poorer regions and from richer to poorer citizens.

Federalism allows minority groups to exercise democratic control over their communities and to tailor laws and government services to meet their own needs and preferences while at the same time exercising a powerful voice in the legislature and executive that serves the community as a whole.

It is true that some of these benefits can be realized by partnership between small and independent nation states. Around the world there are military alliances, trade agreements, various forms of co–operation and mutual assistance but a closer look shows there is a common striving in many parts of the world to move beyond security pacts and free trade.

The extra element to the sharing community and democratic control over matters of common interest are the bonds that are the most difficult to forge and the most vulnerable to being cut. A successful federation is a whole that is much stronger than the sum of its parts.

It involves at least two or maybe three strong levels of government and a natural tension between them. It involves disagreements and compromises. Running a federal system of government is a noisy, sometimes messy, affair. Sometimes it is frustrating, especially to those who seek quick fixes and bold dramatic gestures.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry. The hon. member's time is up.

[Translation]

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux–Montagnes, BQ): Madam Speaker, the debate that is taking place here today is historic and I expected a higher level of debate from the other side. I see that our colleagues opposite consistently select for their statements examples and quotes that support their position, while omitting examples and quotes that are unfavourable to it.

For example, this morning, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs went through newspapers from coast to coast, he said to show how editorial writers were all against the sovereignist solution that we are advocating. Except that one article in Le Devoir, which is also somewhere between those two coasts, as far as I know, and on the front page, which is hard to forget—

• (1520)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Order. The hon. member must respond to the comments of the member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Mercier: I am getting there, Madam Speaker, but since we are discussing generalities, it all takes time.

The hon. member gave a general defence of the federal option, and my answer was that the general arguments we have heard lack consistency. May I proceed, Madam Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All right.

Mr. Mercier: So I think that should interest the hon. member. In Ottawa, according to Jean Dion's article, the first salvos that were fired stressed the undemocratic nature of the Parizeau plan. It is all very convenient, now that the government is headed by Jean Chrétien, a man who does not want to talk about the Constitution, so that the federal government can no longer argue, at it did in 1980, the case for renewed federalism to accommodate that unruly province. This deals with the objections we just heard.

Next, in a reference to prosperous federations, they say: Switzerland is prosperous, but the USSR was not. Brazil is not. Russia is not. These are federations, which proves that a federal system is no guarantee of prosperity.

Third, who or what determines the quality of our lives, Madam Speaker? People, Canadians and Quebecers, not the federal system, determine our standard of living. I am told this country has the highest standard of living in the world, Madam Speaker. When you cut a cake in two, are the two halves smaller than they were before? Not as far as I know.

For instance, Norway and Sweden were one country until 1904–05, when Sweden accepted Norway's separation. Did Norway and Sweden become impoverished after they were separated? They are among the most prosperous countries mentioned.

What about the G–7? They say we will not be part of the G–7. Well, we could not care less, because you do not have to be big to be prosperous. The Grand Duchy of Luxembourg, with a population of 300,000, has an unemployment rate of 2 per cent. We would not mind that.

That being said, I remain convinced that sovereignty is the best choice for Quebec's future, and I invite the people of Blainville—Deux–Montagnes to take an active part in the debate that starts today.

[English]

Ms. Bethel: Madam Speaker, there are several aspects that I would like to respond to. I want to make it absolutely clear that we are not defending federalism. The record of federalism in this country is clear to all Canadians.

The hon. member talked about the quality of people. I think that is where federalism's greatest gift lies. It does not matter in this country which province we live in, which city, which community, which neighbourhood. This country cares for all of its people.

We have provided education, social programs and economic prosperity through good times and bad times. We do not determine that on where we live. It is available to all citizens. Those who live in the inner city of Montreal are feeling the same pain as those who live in Edmonton East inner city neighbourhood. Federalism can deal with that in a fair and equitable manner.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am particularly pleased to debate this motion on the legitimacy of the consultation process on Quebec sovereignty, released this week by the Right Hon. Premier of Quebec, Mr. Jacques Parizeau.

Mr. Parizeau is known for his honesty, his candour and his humanity. He has a reputation for saying what he is doing, and exactly what he says. He is proving it this week, intelligently, skilfully and competently.

• (1525)

We are proud of Mr. Parizeau. We can only be proud of our Premier and glad to be associated with such an exciting process, a highly democratic process.

I have been an avid observer of the political scene from a very early age, but especially so since 1987. I followed with interest what led us to the Meech Lake Accord. This accord was the last attempt of our fellow Quebecers who still believed, then, that Quebec had a place within the Canadian Confederation.

It was also the last attempt to make up for the affront perpetrated by the present Prime Minister of Canada and his team, in 1981, during the night of the long knives, which led to the unilateral patriation of the Constitution. That was, to use some now famous words, the last attempt to make Canada whole, to have federalist Quebecers sign the Canadian Constitution with honour and enthusiasm.

I lived through the second phase, the one which led to the failure of Meech. I observed it closely, but with much sadness, especially when the report of the special committee studying the proposed companion resolution to the Meech Lake Accord, better know as the Charest Report, was published.

The Charest report, named after the member for Sherbrooke, reduced to next to nothing what was already considered as the bare minimum, the entrance door allowing Quebec to try, one last time, to take its place within the Canadian federation, a springboard for Quebec to get all the powers, all the tools it needed in the areas of social programs, the economy and also culture.

The tabling of this report burying the Meech Lake Accord sadly put an end, an emotional one for most of my fellow citizens who still believed in that country, to a saga which had started with the "beau risque" as a hopeful initiative.

Quebecers remember this report tabled by the present member for Sherbrooke who was then minister responsible for the committee which really killed the Meech Lake Accord.

Those were days of sadness, emotion, and grief for me, but I was proud of what happened after. I was very proud to see MPs from Quebec, seven of them at the time, who were eventually joined by an eighth one, the member for Saint–Hubert, resign because they disagreed with the government foiling the final attempt, putting an end to the "beau risque". They took a stand and I take this opportunity to salute them.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Loubier: They took a stand and all Quebecers were proud of them. They stood up against this attempt by Canadian federalists to enslave a whole people, my people. I repeat, the member for Sherbrooke was there among them, and the present Prime Minister was in the hallways with his walkman, and often with a walkie talkie, to give instructions, in order to block the approval of any distinctive status, or to put an end to any attempt to give a distinctive status to Quebec.

Among the eight who stood firm, who fought to the end for the interests of Quebecers and also to preserve their dignity and pride, there was the present Leader of the Opposition, our leader and friend—my best friend. I want to extend my affectionate greetings to him and his wife, Audrey, and his two children, Alexandre and Simon. He is the reason why, at the time, I was moved very positively by what was happening, because the Quebec people had just acquired a great leader. Quebec had just acquired a new leader, who was standing firm with six of his colleagues, and later on with a seventh one. We are proud of that.

After that, Madam Speaker, as you will recall, there was a lot of constitutional turbulence and commotion. Remember the Beaudoin–Dobbie report, the Beaudoin–Edwards report, the Spicer commission and Charlottetown. These documents were supposed to fulfill the aspirations of Quebecers, after they were betrayed by the rejection of the Meech Lake Accord.

We took part in all these debates. We are sovereignists, but we took part in all these debates. Why are Quebec federalists, the Leader of the Opposition in the Quebec legislature, including federal members from Quebec, Liberals and others, refusing to discuss ideas, to discuss federalism, while we took part in all federalist debates which led to the adoption of those reports aimed at one thing only. They were a smoke screen used to make Quebecers believe that a reform, even the slightest reform, was possible so they could have their place, a real place which they would be proud and honoured and willing to occupy.

Why do federalists refuse a process which is eminently democratic, open, allowing for the exchange of ideas, like the one announced by the Premier of Quebec? Why? Because they are afraid. They are afraid of their ideas because it is impossible to defend a rigid status quo that prevents the normal economic, social and cultural progress of the people of Quebec. During Question Period, I heard the Prime Minister say that it is within Canada that Quebecers have developed. Acutally, we have done so despite Canada.

Remember all the efforts and energy we have had to spend since 1964, the days of Jean Lesage, in order to patriate powers that we considered essential to our development. Madam Speaker, look at what we have been doing in the last seven years in particular. We have done nothing but that, try to develop, try to develop employment, to stimulate our economic growth with powers which are presently in federal hands and which Quebec is being denied. Is that what you call harmonious development within the federal system?

No. If Quebecers have become what they are today, if their businesses are so dynamic and their workers so skilled, it is because at one point in time we decided to take charge of our own affairs despite all opposition and despite the federal system that tried to paralyse us, to keep us down and even to use force to prevent us from developing our collective wealth.

Remember Bill S–31. There was the Bélanger–Campeau Commission. We also participated in the Bélanger–Campeau Commission. And if I have one reason, as an economist, to be proud of the work accomplished there, it is for one particular aspect of it: it put an end to all the economic bugbears and showed us that Canada's threat, not to allow Quebec goods and services into Canada, was empty.

With Ontario alone, the net balance of trade between Ontario and Quebec is over $3 billion; that is, Ontario sells Quebec $3 billion more of goods and services than Quebec sells Ontario. Would Ontario close its border? Bélanger–Campeau stifled this kind of nonsense. It also put an end to scare tactics like saying Quebec would lose its milk production.

When even the president of the UPA contradicts the current Leader of the Opposition in Quebec, who said "You will lose your quotas, and your share of milk production", that is something. So, I would urge you and every citizen, regardless of ethnic origin, language and political affiliation, to take part in this democratic process. I am sending out a special invitation to the English–speaking community. I would have a short paragraph to read them, if I may Madam Speaker, in their language.

[English]

"Anglophones and francophones of Quebec are still democrats and it is as democrats that I invite you today, most sincerely, to take this friendly hand we are extending to you, to help solve the question of importance to you and to join with us in building together the kind of country that we want to live in. Do not forget the future of Quebec is yours. The future and prosperity of Quebec is also in your hands. I am asking you not to remain on the sideline of your evolution and participate in the process proposed by the prime minister of Quebec".

[Translation]

I also send out a special invitation to the people of my riding of Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot to participate in this eminently democratic process, as well as all interested organizations and individuals throughout Montérégie.

• (1535)

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have been listening with interest to this play that the Bloc Quebecois has been performing for us since this morning. The problem is that I still do not know whether it is a tragedy or a comedy. It may be a tragicomedy.

The draft bill proposed by the separatists is a monumental deception. The Bloc Quebecois should be ashamed of associating with this undemocratic process.

I always felt that the leader of the Bloc Quebecois was a great democrat and I am convinced that, from his hospital bed, he must be upset by the PQ flouting the democratic process in Quebec. He must also realize that the PQ has just made a strategic mistake that will cost the separatists dearly. This bill insults Quebecers' intelligence. It is a bomb that will explode in the separatists' faces.

I have more confidence in Quebecers' integrity and intelligence. I am convinced that they will detect Mr. Parizeau's deception through the smoke screen he has put up. This process reminds me a little of a somewhat unscrupulous insurance agent who showed up at our house. He told me that I certainly needed insurance and that he would sell me term or permanent insurance. I asked him who had told him that I needed his insurance and I threw him out the door.

The leader of the PQ shows the same attitude by telling Quebecers in his patronizing manner: "I know what is good for you. You want independence, you want separation. Now, do you want separation with or without the Canadian dollar? With or without Canadian citizenship?"

I think that Quebecers will say no, not only to the PQ's and the BQ's separatist option, but also to the separatists' deception and manipulation.

Mr. Loubier: Madam Speaker, I have three comments to make following the hon. member's intervention. First, I want to ask him to show a little more respect for my leader and to remember that he has been involved in the referendum strategy for the last three months. Consequently, my leader certainly supports and endorses the process unveiled by Mr. Parizeau.

I also want to tell the hon. member—who was almost slanderous when he alluded to the honesty and integrity of sovereignists—that we were not afraid, as I said earlier, to participate in the debate proposed to us by the federalists. Is it because, unlike maybe 1980 or shortly before, the federalists are running out of arguments to convince us to stay in Canada are thus unable to publicly debate this issue?

We are offering you a forum: Why not use it to discuss the issue, instead of hiding behind your desk and making comments which are almost disrespectful, if not downright slanderous? I also ask the hon. member to be careful when denigrating Quebec as well as the wishes of a whole nation. My colleague, the hon. member for Témiscamingue, told me that you both represent neighbouring ridings and that yours benefits immensely from that proximity. Indeed, many people living on the Quebec side cross the border into Ontario, to shop in the member's riding. Again, the hon. member should be careful when making comments.

We have common interests, as evidenced by this activity between the two ridings. So, let us be careful. We must respect the will of people, and we must also respect an eminently democratic process. All Quebec federalists should participate in the consultation process.

• (1540)

If they do not want to move, then they should tell us, because the house is falling down. However, these federalists should come up with arguments to support their views. But do come to sit and talk. We are open, and we are very cool, calm and collected.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am very honoured and proud to take part in today's debate on the motion put forward by the Official Opposition. As you know, this motion deals with the draft bill on Quebec's sovereignty which was introduced by the Quebec Premier on Tuesday.

How exciting it is to discuss the draft bill that was introduced by the Quebec government and that sets forth a clear and responsible process which will let Quebecers from every walk of life take part in the debate on this plan for Quebec's constitutional future. To my knowledge, this is a unique process. I do not know that many countries in the world where the people are asked to express their opinion on a draft bill. This openness may be another distinct characteristic of Quebec.

The Quebec government wants the people of Quebec to express their views on the significant issues related to sovereignty. Discussions on significant issues related to the sovereignty proposal will be held in every Quebec region. During these consultations, Quebecers will have the opportunity to say what they expect from a sovereign Quebec.

Another issue will be raised in the debate on the draft bill. I am talking about Quebec citizenship. I would like to say a few words on this. The draft bill sets conditions for becoming a citizen of sovereign Quebec. If you examine clause 5 which deals specifically with this issue, you will see how generously all Quebec citizens will be treated.

It is refreshing to see that a sovereign Quebec would not use the same approach as the Canadian government with regard to citizenship. Quebec is showing openness and generosity by saying that it will give Quebec citizenship to all Canadian citizens domiciled in Quebec, without any restrictions. That is much different from the position of the present government which refuses to do the same thing, as indicated in the report published last spring by the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration. The committee recommended that the new Citizenship Act stipulate that a Canadian citizen who voluntarily or officially acquires citizenship of another country, other than by marriage or in other circumstances such as adoption, shall cease to be a Canadian citizen.

In contrast, the draft bill on sovereignty stipulates that, and I quote: "Quebec citizenship may be held concurrently with citizenship of Canada or of any other country." Quebec would not be the first country to adopt such a policy. France, Great Britain, the United States, Italy and Switzerland, just to name a few, are among the countries whose residents can have dual citizenship.

Canada and Quebec have always been known as generous and welcoming states. As a matter of fact, Canada has recognized and accepted the principle of dual citizenship for a long time. Why this change by the federal government? Why should a Canadian citizen lose his or her citizenship if he or she acquires citizenship in another country? This restrictive policy has to be denounced. By any chance would that policy be meant to deny Quebecers the right to keep their Canadian citizenship if they so wish? Madam Speaker, this is a federalist ploy.

• (1545)

The draft bill also proposes that once Quebecers have voted in favour of sovereignty, any citizen residing in Quebec will automatically be considered a Quebec citizen. It is nice to see there will be no distinction between Quebecers of many generations and those recently arrived. For instance, the new citizen coming from Africa or Asia will have the same rights as all old–stock Quebecers. Quebec has always been free from prejudice against new citizens from foreign countries.

I would like to quote a Quebec poet, novelist and essayist, a resident of Laval East, Fernand Ouellet. I would also like to take this opportunity to congratulate him on the Ludger Duvernay award he received in November. Mr. Ouellet said: "My ancestors came from Paris, Champagne, Normandy, Poitou, Brittany and the Basque country. Very early, they were exposed to people of various ethnic groups and showed their willingness to live with others. A Norman from Bayeux would naturally marry a Basque girl from Bayonne or a Breton from Quimper. That is how our nation was born."

Quebec is a land of immigrants. Our roots are French, Anglo–Saxon, Irish, Italian, Greek, Latin American and American. Our traditions, our customs and our art were always influenced by the input of immigrants who enhanced the cultural heritage of Quebec.

In future, this openness will remain and even increase. Quebecers are people who reside in Quebec and who like to live there. Quebec citizenship will include all those who live within Quebec's borders and who wish to take part in its development.

Madam Speaker, please, I would like to continue without all the silliness and insulting remarks.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Order, please. I would ask the hon. member to continue.

Mrs. Debien: Madam Speaker, the draft bill adds that when the Quebec people have voted for Quebec sovereignty, every person who was born in Quebec or who was born outside Quebec and whose father or mother held Quebec citizenship will automatically be a Quebec citizen. These provisions are totally in keeping with what is done in many countries, including Canada.

Finally, the section of the draft bill also proposes, and I quote: "Quebec citizenship may also be acquired in the manner determined by the National Assembly." As in all sovereign and normal countries, newcomers will acquire Quebec citizenship under a legal framework, with regulations, and Quebec citizenship law will be applied according to clearly defined administrative procedures.

The federal government recently decided to close up, to become more suspicious and to see plots everywhere and systematic attempts at abuse coming from other countries. Quebec is opting for a much more positive approach to newcomers who want to live in Quebec. Quebec wants to join other nations at a time when challenges in trade, openness and globalization await us.

In closing, I would like to say that this draft bill proposes a thoughtful and analytical approach in which all Quebecers are invited to participate. I hope that the people of Laval East, whatever their political affiliation and their ethnic origin, and all groups and organizations from our area will come and participate in a highly democratic process to define the future of Quebec. The sharing of ideas and the opportunity to express them is what democracy is all about.

• (1550)

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to what my colleague from Laval East had to say. I cannot help thinking that ever since I was elected to this House, the members opposite have been criticizing us and telling us that the status quo is unacceptable. With the draft bill that is proposed, I wonder what choices Mr. Parizeau, the members of the Bloc Quebecois and the members of the Parti Quebecois really have to offer Quebecers. We are being offered the same Canadian passport. We are being offered the same Canadian dollar. We are being offered the same international treaties. As well, they say in the draft bill that they want to be a member of the most important organizations in the world such as the UN, GATT and NAFTA. Quebec and Quebecers already have those privileges. What more do they want?

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): To become masters of our own destiny!

Mr. Discepola: To become masters of their own destiny? They already have control over their own tax system and their own legislative system. They have full control over education, language, culture and immigration. They have all that within Canada.

To meet the requirements of the Referendum Act, which is the authority on which all referendums and plebiscites are held in Quebec, it is clear that there have to be two parties: a yes and a no side. Is that democracy? The so–called democracy that we are being offered in that draft bill? Where are the two parties?

Clause 1 provides that Quebec is already a sovereign country. What other choice is there for those who do not want Quebec to be sovereign? Where is the consultation process? Do they really want to know what other people think? I wonder where democracy stands when 13 members of the 15 commissions proposed are separatists and only two of them are federalists. Is that democracy?

Mr. Boudria: That is Parizeau–style democracy.

Mr. Discepola: Quebecers are offered an alternative. They should have the courage to ask the question correctly instead of writing 18 sections and after that asking the real question that is required by the Referendum Act, yes or no. They should find it in themselves to ask the relevant question: Do you want to separate from the most wonderful country of the world, yes or no? But do they have that kind of courage?

Mrs. Debien: Madam Speaker, at times I have the sneaky suspicion that Liberal members have not read the bill.

An hon. member: They cannot read.

Mr. Boudria: It takes only five minutes.

Mrs. Debien: They must have skipped some parts. This draft bill says that there will be a period of information and participation during which the bill can be improved. What does that mean? It means that we can listen to opinions, we can entertain proposals for amendment, and that is precisely what we expect from the Liberals. But they do not want to. They are stuck on the status quo.

How can they come and talk to us when they are mired in the status quo. They skip stages too. Improvements will be made, maybe even changes. Everyone is invited to take part. There will be a debate in the National Assembly and then this bill will be approved by the people in a referendum.

• (1555)

They forget that. They forget to acknowledge that there will be a referendum on this draft bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry, but the hon. member's time has run out. I recognize the hon. whip of the government.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am happy to take part in the debate this afternoon. Since this morning, I have been listening to the comments of the members opposite. What are they asking us? They want the House to enjoin the government to recognize the legitimacy of the so–called democratic process initiated by the Government of Quebec to allow Quebecers to choose the political and constitutional future of Quebec.

We should ask ourselves, if this is the wish of the Bloc Quebecois, why was that motion not introduced in the Quebec National Assembly in order to ask the National Assembly to do precisely what that motion proposes, because what has been introduced in the National Assembly is certainly not, in my opinion, democratic and most of all it will not allow Quebecers to choose their political and constitutional future.

The proposal introduced in the National Assembly is a sham and the members opposite know it. Why is it a sham? Because everything has been structured and organized in such a way that almost all participants are supporters of separation, excuse me, sovereignty as the members opposite would say, because they are afraid to use the real word and they do not have the courage and the conviction to say what we all know.

But we intend to tell the truth to Canadians, those who live in Quebec and the others, about what Quebecers are being told by the Parti Quebecois or by the minor league of the Parti Quebecois in Ottawa, the farm team, the Bloc Quebecois here in town. The members of the farm team and those of the Parti Quebecois want us to believe that they are the real defenders of Quebec.

An hon. member: It is certainly not you!

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, someone just said: "It is certainly not you". I was born in Quebec, I am Franco–Ontarian by adoption and I am proud to say that as a Quebecer, which I am, I can represent a riding in Ontario, in the Parliament of this country, because it is my right as it is the right of every Quebecer to be a candidate from coast to coast and to represent Canadians.

Members opposite want to deprive me of that right, they want to deprive Quebecers of that right and we should not forget that. Members opposite claim to defend not only the rights of Quebecers but those of francophones outside Quebec.

Madam Speaker, let me read an excerpt from the November 1993 issue of The Hill Times. In this article, the member for Quebec was interviewed, and she said:

[English]

"Bilingualism is only an issue in Quebec", said Ms. Gagnon. "People in Manitoba and Ontario don't really worry about speaking French, they just speak English. I don't expect to convince them to understand our position but I think we have to develop a sense of mutual respect."

[Translation]

My colleagues, the members for Nickel Belt, Cochrane—Superior, Timiskaming—French River and elsewhere, are well aware that Bloc members converted recently, perhaps after the member for Québec–Est, a Franco–Ontarian living in Quebec, spoke to his colleague, as I am a Quebecer living in French Ontario.

• (1600)

The sort of thing we see today, where a French–speaking Ontarian can represent a riding in Quebec City and a Quebecer like me represents a riding in Ontario, really reflects what Canada is all about. And I am proud to belong to this great country.

Members opposite are telling us: "We want a separate country"—sorry—"a sovereign country".

Some hon. members: Separate.

Mr. Boudria: All right, separate. It is true, after all. But with all this, they want a Canadian passport. A big cheer for the Canadian passport. They want the Canadian currency. A big cheer for the Canadian currency. They want all the other benefits. They want to be part of the trade agreements negotiated by Canada on behalf of us all. A big cheer for our trade agreements that we managed to negotiate so well. Do you know the best way to keep all these benefits? It is to stay within Canada. It is as simple as that.

Of course, life could be better in this country, but compared to what? Residents of other countries of the world would do anything to be able to come here to Canada. Why? Because they know it is the best country in the world.

[English]

Everyone knows that, including the members across the way. They know the truth. They know what it is like.

[Translation]

Today, they do not have the courage to put the real question to the people in their province. They know that, in the last provincial election, separatists only got about 0.5 per cent more votes than the opposition, although quite a few federalists voted for them. What does it mean? It means that close to two thirds of Quebecers are against separation; at least 60 per cent of them are against what is called sovereignty because the people across the way do not have the courage to call a spade a spade. We know all this, so do Quebecers.

Why is it that all the Quebec organizations which voiced their opinion in the last few days condemned the initiative taken by the head of the Quebec government? Why did so many of them condemn it? One of my colleagues is going to list many of these groups. They condemn it because they know that these consultations are a sham. They know that the consultation process is pure make–believe and that the results are predetermined.

Let us look at the draft bill. It states that Quebec is a sovereign country.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Boudria: The members opposite can beat their own drum. By doing so and by gazing at their own navel, as they are doing today, they might end up believing that Quebecers agree with their statements. This is not the case. No matter how hard they beat their own drum, it will not make their wish come true.

[English]

Members across the way say that the monetary policy of Quebec should be dictated in another country and they say this in the name of sovereignty. How does one become sovereign by having another country dictate one's monetary policy? That is what they are advocating.

[Translation]

They are advocating the use of the Canadian currency in a foreign country. What the members opposite want is to deprive Quebecers of the opportunity to have, in this House of Commons, a finance minister coming from their own province and who could influence the monetary policy; they want to make sure that the Prime Minister of Canada does not come from Quebec to head this country's policy, a policy they will have to adhere to under their phony draft bill.

• (1605)

What the members opposite are doing is shooting themselves in the foot, as the member for Nickel Belt so elegantly put it. That is the real truth. Quebecers will not be fooled. I am the thirteenth generation of Boudrias born in Quebec. Thirteenth! Out of all my ancestors and descendants, my son is the first Boudria to be born in Ontario, the fourteenth generation in Canada.

However, Quebec and the rest of Canada are his country just as Quebec and the rest of Canada are my country. This is our country and it will remain just that!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I read the motion today asking this House to recognize the legitimacy of the democratic process initiated by the government of Quebec. I have listened to speeches by the Bloc Quebecois members trying to tell us what they intend to do and ignoring whether or not it is legitimate. I have listened to the members of the government who are telling us how good federalism is while avoiding the issue of whether or not what the Bloc intends to do is legal and legitimate.

The way I see the process is that they intend to introduce a bill in the legislature of the province of Quebec that is going to trample all over federal responsibilities. They are going to debate a bill in the legislature of the province of Quebec that is outside their jurisdiction. They are going to vote on a bill that they have no mandate to vote on. Then they want to dress it all up with some false legitimacy measures by holding a referendum.

It is presumptuous in the extreme for them to think that this bill would be endorsed by the rest of the people in Canada. For them to think that by declaring that these are the conditions the rest of Canada would in any way support, and I think the process is a fraud, I think is illegal, illegitimate and immoral.

I would ask the previous speaker, as a member of this government, why he does not stand up and acknowledge and tell the people of Quebec that this entire process that is being proposed by the government of Quebec is as I said, illegal, illegitimate and immoral. The process is deceitful and a sham. Tell the people of Quebec that is the way it is.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I did not think there would be any doubt after my speech that I did not like the process very much. But if it needs to be repeated for the member across the way, I am certainly willing to do so in the time that is left.

We are not just debating legality here. Constitutional experts can argue until all the cows in Glengarry come home as to whether or not there is a constitutional provision, implicit or otherwise, for a province to secede from the rest of the country.

Mr. Discepola: Are those cows from Vaudreuil too?

Mr. Boudria: That is not the point. The point is to keep this country together and it is the duty of all of us, in all our speeches, in all our comments and everything that we do. We should all speak in favour of Canada the way the Prime Minister does, lauding the virtues of living in the greatest country in the world, Canada, not whether or not there are six constitutional experts who say there is such an implicit power. Five would say otherwise or the reverse. What difference does that make? That does not make any difference if a country is trying to split itself apart. What we need is the intestinal fortitude to state that this is a great country and to work together to keep the country together, this great country of Canada. That is what is important, not the rest of that nonsense.

• (1610)

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ): Madam Speaker, I wish to make a few comments in response to the speech by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I am told I have one minute left.

I would simply like to say to the hon. member that once Quebec achieves sovereignty, he will be allowed to keep his Quebec citizenship if he so desires and if his country, Canada, allows him to. I want to add—I will come back to this later—that we have no lesson on democracy to learn from representatives of the Liberal government and certainly not from representatives of the Reform Party.

Let me refresh your memory with three examples. Quebecers were never consulted on the Constitution of 1867. And what about conscription which the federal government imposed in Quebec after promising—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Order! Sorry to interrupt the hon. member but his time is up. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell has 30 seconds to reply.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I will try to be quick. In fact, the hon. members opposite have much to learn. The separatists have much to learn, if they think that they can deceive the Quebec people with phony consultations on such a contrived bill. It will not work, Madam Speaker. You will see, we will keep this great country together!

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Madam Speaker, this is for me, as a Canadian and a Quebecer by choice, a very sad day. It was 35 years ago that we chose Quebec and Canada. For 20 years now, I have been following Quebec's politics. About 15 years ago, I took part in the first Quebec referendum, where Quebecers indicated they did not want anything to do with sovereignty–association as it was called then, with separation as we would say today. They reasserted their sense of belonging to Canada and to our federation.

Over a year ago, I was elected to this House through a democratic process, but we now see for the first time ever a government that will decide unilaterally not to respect our democratic process. I agree with the Leader of the Opposition in Quebec who said that this is not a consultation process, but rather a propaganda campaign, a subterfuge, an illusion. He added that the issue will be how, and not if, sovereignty will be achieved.

After promising to represent everyone, the leader of the Parti Quebecois has initiated a process which excludes Quebec's federalists, that is the majority of Quebecers. If the government really wanted to find out what everybody thought about its proposal, it would not have launched a consultation process that takes into account only one side of the issue.

The president of the Quebec Chamber of Commerce himself has stated that he disagrees with these consultations. He said that the government will have to rethink the whole process. He added that, given the current situation, with only representatives of the Bloc Quebecois and the Parti Quebecois sitting at the table, there would not be a balance in the views expressed and that it would make him very ill at ease.

The president of the Quebec manufacturers' association also decided not to take part in these consultations, because he thinks the draft bill is a sovereignty proposal and does not examine every possible option for Quebec.

• (1615)

Moreover, the presidents of the Quebec farmers' union and the Conseil du patronat also refused to take part in these consultations. These four examples clearly demonstrate that the PQ leader is not everybody's premier and that he only seeks the participation of separatists in this debate.

If he really was everybody's premier, he would have asked the clear and simple question that everyone can understand and answer: "Do you want to remain inside Canada, yes or no?" Unfortunately, this is not the case because he knows that the answer to this question would be no.

Finally, two of Quebec's most distinguished political scientists, Léon Dion and Vincent Lemieux, also severely criticized the PQ's breach of democracy. As reported on December 7, 1994, in La Presse, Mr. Dion said: "The process makes me very ill at ease. In such consultations, the public is often won over to a cause even before the process starts. In this case, it is Mr. Parizeau's cause."

The PQ leader continues to call himself everybody's premier and encourages everyone to take part in these consultations on the future of Quebec. At the same time, though, this draft bill does not include Quebec's cultural communities.

Last week, following many statements by members of the PQ government and their representatives, I rose here to ask the government to reaffirm unequivocally that members of cultural communities are, in fact, full citizens of our country. This draft bill confirms that the Parti Quebecois does not consider members of cultural communities as first–class citizens of Quebec.

Can the leader of the PQ government invite the cultural communities to build a new Quebec and then ignore them completely in his plan? Nothing is forcing the Parti Quebecois to subject Quebecers to an agonizing process. As my colleagues pointed out, Quebec is sovereign in all the areas under its jurisdiction. Quebecers live in one of the best countries in the world, a country they have built, a country they have chosen, just like my parents did. That country has evolved and Quebecers are part of this evolution.

Personally, I believe, as the Leader of the Opposition in Quebec said, and he will lead the campaign against separation before the next referendum in that province, that the process announced yesterday by the PQ government can only be democratic if it meets the following three conditions.

First, the process should be based on consultation, not on propaganda. The proposed process in unacceptable since it leads to a foregone conclusion. The solicited advice and discussions have one single purpose: to draft a declaration of sovereignty based on the proposals and suggestions that only supporters of separation will be interested in formulating.

Second, the approach used should focus the public debate on the real issue. The PQ is asking the people to discuss the content of the declaration of sovereignty instead of the advisability of separation in order to avoid the real question: is it in the best interests of Quebecers to separate from the rest of Canada? Not only is the desire of the Parti Quebecois to avoid this question dishonest, but it also shows that the PQ is afraid to hear what the answer of the majority of Quebecers to such a clear question would be.

Third, the process must be fair. In keeping with the spirit of Quebec's legislation on public consultations, both sides should have equal opportunities to put forward and explain their viewpoints. In practice, this means that both sides should have the same number of seats, the same resources and equal time.

• (1620)

Will Quebecers have an opportunity to make a decision on a clear question in the coming referendum? I doubt it.

The question proposed by the Parti Quebecois would ask the people of Quebec whether they are in favour of the Act passed by the National Assembly, which would define the features of Quebec sovereignty. It is a blank cheque the PQ government is asking for, because it knows very well that whole sections of the sovereignist plan would have to be negotiated with its partners in the years following the referendum.

Given these factors, and since I chose Quebec and Canada as my country, this is a very sad moment in the history of Quebec and since the democratic process is not being respected, I will vote against the Official Opposition's motion.

Mr. Maurice Bernier (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead, BQ): Madam Speaker, first of all, I would like to tell the hon. member for Saint–Denis that her remarks about cultural communities, which she said are disregarded by the PQ government, are not only false, but also disrespectful to the PQ government and to the people of Quebec, a community that is not self–centred, but, on the contrary, quite open to immigration and newcomers. Let me give her just one example. One of her co–nationals, Nadia Assimopoulos, chaired the executive of the Parti Quebecois in the 1980s. That is a telling example of the openness of Quebecers to cultural communities.

I would also like to comment on the so–called undemocratic character of the PQ process. I would like to remind the hon. member for Saint–Denis, as I set out to do a few minutes ago, of four events in the history of Quebecers that were instigated by the federal government, and ask her to consider whether they were democratic or not.

The first one is the Constitution of 1867. Quebecers never got a chance to have their say on that Constitution. Then, there was the conscription crisis. In 1940, the Mackenzie King government, which had made an electoral commitment not to impose conscription, reversed its position by holding a referendum in which 70 per cent of Quebecers voted against and 70 or 71 per cent of Canadians outside Quebec voted for conscription. Despite his previous commitment, Liberal Prime Minister Mackenzie King imposed conscription on all Quebecers.

More recently, the Trudeau government decided to proclaim the War Measures Act in Quebec and proceeded to arrest hundreds of people, and search the home of thousands of honest citizens. As a result, 20 people waited for months for charges to be laid against them.

• (1625)

Is that the Liberals' idea of democracy? Those people have the nerve to teach us lessons in democracy. The last event is the patriation of the Constitution in 1982. The current Prime Minister was one of the main players in what was a tragedy for democracy, when they shoved down Quebecers' throats a Constitution they did not want. If that is what they call democracy, my Liberal colleagues and the hon. member for Saint–Denis do not know what they are talking about.

Ms. Bakopanos: Madam Speaker, every time a member of the opposition rises, it is to give us a history lecture—that is not interesting. Thank you very much, we have all read the history of Quebec and Canada. This is why Canada was chosen twice as the best country in the world to live in—including Quebec and Quebecers.

I would also like to say, just in passing, since he brought it up, that a compatriot of mine told me that she quit the Parti Quebecois because she was not a separatist, she never supported separatism and she does not share that vision of society.

[English]

An hon. member: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. We would all like to hear what the hon. member is saying.

Mrs. Bakopanos: Would you like me to repeat it in English?

[Translation]

If we have interpretation again, I would only like to repeat, as I said earlier, that I do not need a history lecture. I know the history of Canada.

[English]

I know what the history of this country is, the greatest country in the world. I want to repeat it.

[Translation]

I want to repeat that my parents chose to come to Quebec and Canada, and I am proud of it. I want to stay in a united Canada and I will fight for it. The Bloc Quebecois also has many history lessons to learn because history shows us that Quebec and Quebecers have really been quite well served by Canadian federalism.

We enjoy one of the best standards of living, we live in one of the best countries in the world. We really have a quality of life which is the envy of the world, and this is due to the unity of our country, to federalism which benefits Quebec. I wish to repeat that Nadia Assimopoulos, of whom you spoke, resigned from the Parti Quebecois because she was not in favour of the separation of Quebec. She is not a separatist, and never was.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the question to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment is as follows: The hon. member for Yorkton—Melville—Gun control.

[Translation]

Mr. Nic Leblanc (Longueuil, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am pleased today to speak to this motion which reads as follows:

> That this House enjoin the government to recognize the legitimacy of the democratic process initiated by the Government of Quebec in order to allow Quebecers to chart their own political and constitutional future.

This motion was initiated by the Government of Quebec. Of course, what we are witnessing here today is an attempt to discredit the Government of Quebec, to claim that it is undemocratic, that it does not know what democracy is and that it does not respect democracy in Quebec.

At the outset, I have to say that I, as well as other Quebecers, are clearly shocked to hear the Quebec Liberal Party, the federal Liberal Party and the Reform Party declare that Quebec's proposal is illegitimate. Need I remind you, Madam Speaker, that the Parti Quebecois is one of the most democratic parties of all time. The Parti Quebecois was democratically elected and forms the government.

The Parti Quebecois has a tradition of parliamentary democracy. It is one of only a handful of parties in which members elect their leader by universal suffrage. It has passed laws governing the way in which political parties are financed. It is the only party in Canada to have done so to ensure that each and every Quebecer can make a contribution to a political party and that the government that is elected is free to act. It is not a party controlled by the big interests or by the big unions. When the government makes a decision, it is made freely No other government in Canada can make such a claim.

The Parti Quebecois is responsible for passing of the Referendum Act. It participated in the work of the Bélanger–Campeau Commission which, of course, was set up by the Liberal Party of the day. It participated extensively, intelligently and regularly in the commission's work. Moreover, the outcome of the commission's activities was very positive for Quebec. The Parti Quebecois also took part in the Charlottetown debate. It never refused to participate in this process. This, despite the fact that the federal government was proposing renewed federalism, a kind of draft project. We participated even though we were opposed. We were also involved in the 1992 referendum, as I just mentioned.

The Parti Quebecois has also taken an innovative step by introducing legislation to establish a permanent voters' list. Why then is the federal government refusing to co–operate with the party in power? It is all rather incredible. In my opinion, the main reason why the federalists do not want to take part in this democratic debate is that they have nothing more to say. It is that simple. They have nothing to offer.

Over 35 years ago, Mr. Duplessis used to say we should get what belongs to us from Ottawa because we were cheated out of our areas of jurisdiction. That was back in 1936. I have a cassette tape in my car. I often listen to it, and I can say the speeches of today are exactly the same.

Mr. Lesage said: Masters in our own house. Mr. Johnson, Sr. said: Equality or independence. Mr. Lévesque said: Sovereignty–association. Mr. Bourassa tried twice to improve things. He passed Bill 150 and gave it up later on. What a disgrace.

We have been talking about this for a long time. The subject is definitely not new, at least not for me. In 1984, when I was elected with the Progressive Conservative Party, we talked about decentralization and accountability.

The then Prime Minister, Mr. Mulroney, did all he could to give some dignity back to Quebecers. You will admit he paid a steep price for that. He tried to give Quebecers fairness, not privileges, but legitimate rights that they had been asking for, for decades. Mr. Mulroney's Progressive Conservative Party was completely thrown out of Canadian politics by English Canada. There are only two members left. Why? Because Mr. Mulroney tried to give Quebec some form of legitimacy. That man ruined his political career to fight for the little legitimacy Quebecers need to develop further. This is the main reason why his party disappeared, and it is a well–known fact.

In 1984, while I was campaigning in my riding, Mr. Lévesque, who was my MPP at the time, sent his people to support me. It really happened. Mr. Lévesque talked about the "beau risque" in those days. He said: The Tories seem well–intentioned, we will give them the opportunity to grant Quebecers the legitimacy they have been requesting for so many years. He said: Let us give Mr. Mulroney a chance. I just explained to you what happened to Mr. Mulroney for trying. In 1990, when the Meech Lake Accord failed, when the present Prime Minister of Canada made sure that it failed, it was just because he wanted to get into power and to win the election here in Ottawa. He won his election, but winning that way, on the backs of Quebecers, is not an honour. That is exactly what is going on.

Today, they are trying to tell us that the Parti Quebecois is not credible, that its bill is not legitimate. We know very well that what they are trying to do is strictly an excuse, because they do not know how to justify why Quebecers should stay in this federation. This federation is costing Quebecers an enormous amount of money. I will give you an example. It is an easy one that everyone knows, but they just need to be reminded. Quebecers are not naive. They are not drawers of water any more. They have been out of there for a long time. Quebecers are intelligent people. They are educated, they understand things. They understand very well that the Canadian federation has put a huge debt burden on their shoulders. Quebecers make up 25 per cent of the Canadian population. That means that the federal government is creating a debt of $10 billion a year for Quebecers, without their permission, because they are still a minority in this country.

Canada has an accumulated debt of $550 billion and they are trying to convince us that this Canadian federation is good, that the country is rich. When we look at whether a country is rich or poor, we must also look at its debts. When they say that Canada has the highest standard of living in the world, we must remember that it is a standard of living that was bought on credit. Each year, we borrow money to buy food. If a family borrows every day to buy its groceries, it will maintain its standard of living but one day, it will go bankrupt. Canada is on the verge of going bankrupt.

Just on the subject of money and the economy, we Quebecers do not want to be on this sinking ship. We must take hold of our destiny to be more efficient, to be more successful and to preserve our standard of living. To say that Canada still has the highest standard of living in the world is pure hypocrisy. It is crazy to think that.

That standard of living has been bought on credit and they still keep doing it. The government does not have the courage to cut spending, because of the coming referendum. They continue to borrow on the backs of Quebecers to maintain an artificial standard of living. We built an artificial economy and we make people believe that the Canadian economy is doing well. It is pure hypocrisy. What we are going through is terrible. It is a disgrace. It is worse than the Second World War. If we continue on this road, Canada will be totally bankrupt in a few years. We are starting to feel it a little more every day.

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I must admit there is hope, since the hon. member of the Bloc Quebecois has said publicly that he was a member of the Conservative Party. Anyone who has the courage to admit that will certainly have the courage some day to admit his mistake and realize that his separatist strategy will not work. By that time, there will probably be no reason for his party to exist, and to do penance, he may have to join the two members of the Conservative Party and stay in purgatory for a while before he crosses the floor and joins the Liberal Party.

It bothers me to put my question to the hon. member of the Bloc, because I realize the Bloc Quebecois does not represent the majority of Quebecers.

• (1640)

It bothers me, because it is like asking the driver of a limousine to sell me his boss's car. However, since they speak for Mr. Parizeau, I will ask them the question.

Last year, when we were elected as members of the Parliament of Canada, it was a big surprise for members of the Bloc Quebecois when they heard I spoke French, although I come from northern Ontario. An even bigger surprise for most Bloc members was the fact that, in northern Ontario, we have institutions for francophones: we have our own schools, universities, colleges and hospitals.

So I will put the following question to Mr. Parizeau, through his messengers: Since you claim to defend the interests of francophones outside Quebec, will francophones outside Quebec have a role to play? Do you intend to set up another committee consisting of thirteen members of the Parti Quebecois and two others, perhaps a Franco–Ontarian and a Franco–Manitoban, to convince us that this is the way to go? How are you going to defend the rights of francophones outside Quebec? Are you going to say the same thing Mr. Lévesque said when he came to Sudbury, in my riding? He told Franco–Ontarians at Laurentian University: It is too bad for you, franncophones living outside Quebec, but we have too many problems in Quebec to have time to deal with yours. That is what Mr. Lévesque told us in Sudbury.

So do not tell us you defend the interests of francophones outside Quebec but tell us what role you think we will play in this debate?

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): First of all, Madam Speaker, I must say that I am proud to have been with the Conservatives for six years. It is not because I am against private enterprise. I am in favour of a suitable environment for the private sector, in order to create jobs. I think that party did a good job in this regard, even though it did not have the guts, no more than the Liberals today, to cut spending. I would have wished that they cut more spending.

Nevertheless, in 1990 I had the courage to resign, because I realized that there was nothing more to expect—

An hon. member: After Meech.

Mr. Leblanc (Longueuil): Yes, after Meech, of course. It was no longer possible to defend the interests of Quebec in Ottawa from within a federal party. It is not possible. To do so, you have to be free to speak. And the only way to speak freely on behalf of Quebec is to belong to the Bloc Quebecois, of which I am one of the founding members. This is why we can now speak freely on behalf of Quebec.

We are the legitimate representatives of Quebec, since we won 54 seats out of 75. I consider that a strong legitimacy. Quebecers trust us and that is why they voted massively for us, especially French Canadians, I mean French–speaking Quebecers. Unfortunately we have not succeeded yet in rallying allophones and anglophones to our cause. I understand and respect their position.

Regarding French Canadians outside Quebec, I must say that we made more statements and asked more questions regarding the interests of francophones outside Quebec than the Liberals ever did when I was sitting as a Conservative. What we want to do is help French–speaking communities all over North America.

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Madam Speaker, to begin, I would like to go back to what my colleague for Longueuil was saying. Along the same line, this morning, I read an article on the cost of sovereignty. The problem is that it did not mention the cost of federalism.

In fact, we are forced to recognize that, for the past 25 years, we have seen the centralizing policies of the federal government turn a thriving country into one which is deeply in debt.

• (1645)

No matter how loudly the Prime Minister claims in this House that we live in the most comfortable country in the world, our credit card bill is up to $550 billion. The end of the month is going to be something else!

I would have liked to have had the time to mention all the disgraceful, useless expenses, all the waste originating on Parliament Hill and in various departments. Unfortunately I have only ten minutes. Therefore, I will focus on overlapping, duplication and the cost of federalism in general.

Let us look at the various programs the federal government implements in Quebec and which compete, in one way or another, with those Quebec is already offering because they are more in tune with our specific needs. Believe it or not, out of 221 federal programs and 244 Quebec programs, 197 either overlap or duplicate another. That means that we could get rid of 197 federal programs and Quebec would be better served for it.

First, we are faced with redundant administrative activities. As part of their mandate, well–meaning federal civil servants are doing exactly the same thing as their provincial counterparts acting in accordance with their mandate specific to Quebec. We pay twice for people who do a good job, but who do it twice. Once would have been enough since the job was well done.

There is worse. There is competition between various programs. Because, of course, the federal government wants to outdo the provincial government, it favours quantity over quality; the quantity of dollars it borrows, spends and, unfortunately too often, wastes. Occasionally, it resorts to conflict. We do not agree on targets. The federal program goes one way, while Quebec—and Quebec knows its constituency well and structures its objectives accordingly—goes another. Therefore, efforts and funds, instead of being pooled, are once again wasted.

At times, the programs are in direct conflict with each other. Instead of one going one way and the other one, the other way, they run counter to one another. How often—and the public is aware of this—do lawyers go to court to make representations on behalf of the federal government and object to representations on behalf of the Government of Quebec, whose lawyers are paid by Quebec taxpayers? It is our money that is financing this legal squabble. Duplication, overlap, waste.

That is not all. Think of the poor citizens. I mentioned the 221 federal programs and the 244 provincial ones. Ordinary people are completely lost. When you make an application to the federal government, you are asked whether you have already applied to the provincial government. If so, you have to wait for an answer from both the federal and the provincial governments. But the provincial government is waiting for the federal government to deal with the issue, with the result that the people are kept waiting and waiting and waiting, while the meter is ticking away on both sides. Such a waste!

Finally, I must say that, on top of all that, is an unquantifiable factor—unquantifiable because this is money that we never see—and that is opportunity cost. While these programs shoot each other down or wander one way or the other, the public waits. And while the public is waiting, we let opportunities go by, right under our very nose. All this to say that there are lengthy delays and some people get so totally discouraged that they give up projects they could have completed otherwise.

• (1650)

A case in point is manpower training. Two years ago, there were 25,000 people on a waiting list for training, but the federal government did not agree with the provincial government on required courses. Even the Quebec Liberals said that Quebec knew what the needs were.

We are still waiting. Do you think that these 25,000 people who were looking for training are still waiting in line? No, they are no longer eligible, because they do not qualify for UI benefits any more. They are now on welfare and programs are shutting them out. It is a disgrace.

The costs of federalism? Let us say quickly that federal institutions definitely lack the flexibility required to compete internationally. In fact, the federal system is inflexible by definition, despite what a certain minister may say, as demonstrated by the many failed attempts to reform it.

Everything has been tried. We are not blaming the federalists. They tried everything. Mr. Lévesque, with the "beau risque", deeply believed in it. Mr. Bourassa tried until the last second to find some accommodation. It did not work. The system is inflexible, cast in concrete. Yet, international competitiveness requires great adaptability.

I will close by addressing remarks made by some of my colleagues opposite, which I found almost insulting. We are talking about democracy, about the democratic process. We are talking about the question. You will agree with me, Madam Speaker, that if the finance minister's next tax increase was the subject of a referendum, you know very well that the people would vote against it and that this tax increase would never ever see the light of day.

That would be democracy. But it will not happen that way. It will happen through phony consultations, through passage of this tax measure here in this House. Canadians will see tax increases of up to $120 billion, $125 billion, $130 billion, who knows?

The Government of Quebec is now following a process whose conclusion will be decided by the people. The people will be able to say yes or no. That is democracy. That is how it should be done and I would urge my colleagues opposite to do the same when dealing with important issues. Our Prime Minister says that the question that should be asked is: Do you want to separate from Canada?

I submit that Mr. Parizeau is asking an identical question and here is why. The Prime Minister's question essentially is this: Do you want to separate from the problem? What Mr. Parizeau says is this: Do you want to adopt the sovereignty solution? Everyone is entitled to his or her opinion. Mr. Chrétien is entitled to his; he can keep his problem. Yes, Madam Speaker, everyone is entitled to his or her opinion. However—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I would just like to ask the hon. member not to refer to the Prime Minister by name.

Mr. de Savoye: Thank you, Madam Speaker. You are quite right and I conclude by saying that I am convinced that after a clear, vigorous debate, Quebecers will make a historic decision with clear minds.

Mr. Nick Discepola (Vaudreuil, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the member for Portneuf made a speech on the costs of federalism, but he forgot that all the costs always entail benefits as well. His colleague from Saint–Hyacinthe, who sits on the finance committee, himself estimated the costs of overlap and duplication at $3 billion. Even Mr. Le Hir, the PQ minister, estimated the costs of overlap at $3 billion.

But in the magic formula, they always tend to forget one thing: Quebec receives $4 billion in equalization payments and Quebecers collect $1.2 billion in unemployment insurance.

• (1655)

In their bill, will they say that Quebecers must cover 25 per cent of the national debt, as the member just said, which amounts to $550 billion and the costs that it will entail? Will they tell them that milk producers will lose their protection and that it will cost all milk producers millions, if not billions, of dollars?

By chance, the member's calculations overlooked that Mr. Parizeau himself had said that all federal civil servants would keep their job and would be protected. Add that to the calculations and we get into the real debate on the costs of federalism versus the costs of separatism.

Mr. de Savoye: Madam Speaker, I am glad that the member opposite is giving me a chance to set the record straight. First of all, Quebec has 18 per cent of federal civil servants and we pay 25 per cent, so we save 7 per cent there. We must look the figures in the face.

Looking at the balance between what Quebec pays and what it gets, we see that Quebec pays roughly $28 billion to this federal government here in Ottawa and gets about $28 billion back. That seems fair and equitable, but there is a very big difference. While Ontarians get their money back in federal contracts, research and development and other ways, we Quebecers get our money back partly as unemployment insurance and that is unacceptable.

The cost of duplication and overlap may be $3 billion but that is only a small part of it. The real cost is the opportunity cost; while things are happening under our noses, nothing is being done. Opportunities are slipping away from us and they could amount to tens of billions of dollars. With an ability to act responsibly, debt problems would disappear.

I have been told many times that the Government of Quebec will not be a better manager than the federal government. Totally false! For example, it costs the federal government $170 a year to process an employee's pay while it costs the provincial government $70. Here alone, it costs us about 40 per cent of what it costs the federal government. I am not the one saying that; it is the Auditor General. Yes, we are more efficient and I am really eager to be able to prove it to the whole world.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have two quick questions. The hon. member spoke of overlap and duplication. After one year, 60 or so programs no longer seem to overlap or duplicates one another. Was he aware of that? Is that not the direction in which we should be heading? I think that could be a solution.

I wish to mention something else. For the sake of honesty, would it not have been much easier to simply ask Quebecers what they wanted: to stay in Canada or to separate? Honestly, it would have been much better to do this than to use such a vague, fuzzy, imprecise word as «sovereignty».

Mr. de Savoye: Madam Speaker, a glass is either half empty or half full. We prefer to say that the glass is half full. And we will start by filling it. As for instances of overlap, you know as well as I do that sovereignty is the best way to eliminate them all.

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the Official Opposition and the government of Mr. Parizeau are trying to convince Quebecers and Canadians that Quebec's separation is unavoidable, that federalism adversely affects development in that province, and that the consultation process recently announced is eminently democratic. At a time when countries want to unite together, including European nations, Quebec wants to separate.

I wish to take this opportunity to correct certain facts and denounce some exaggerations and overstatement by those in favour of separation.

Is Canadian federalism really an obstacle to Quebec's development? I usually do not agree with Mr. Parizeau's views.

• (1700)

However, I must say that I think he is absolutely right when he says that Quebec has achieved a lot over the last 30 years.

In his speech, Mr. Parizeau mentioned, among others things, that in the 1960s Quebec was a modern state with a dynamic cultural life, that in the 1970s it had become a leader in democratization and education, and that in the 1980s Quebecers had taken the reins of economic power and greatly increased their international presence.

Mr. Parizeau is absolutely right when he says that Quebecers should be proud of these exceptional achievements.

But where I do not agree with him and those who support separation in general is when they say that Canadian federalism is hampering Quebec's development. How can they make such a claim when the facts show unequivocally that Quebec made tremendous progress over the last 30 years, while being a part of Canada?

Indeed, it is within the Canadian federation that Quebec's quiet revolution got started and that companies such as Bombardier and Cascades were able to penetrate world markets. It is also within the Canadian federation that the work and talent of Céline Dion and the Cirque du soleil gained international recognition.

Make no mistake. I am not trying to tell you that Quebecers became so successful strictly because of Canadian federalism. What I am saying is that it is wrong to claim that federalism has impeded Quebec's development.

Is Canada really unable to recognize Quebec's specificity?

In his speech, Mr. Parizeau said that the failure of the Meech Lake Accord indicated English Canada's refusal to recognize, even symbolically, that specificity. This statement does not seem fair to me.

The Canadian federation recognized even before Meech and continues to recognize Quebec's specificity and to preserve the French fact, and not just symbolically. Let me give you some examples.

Even in 1867, the Constitution Act guaranteed the use of French in Parliament and in courts. The Constitution Act of 1982 reinforced this guarantee and made French one of the two official languages of Canada by recognizing its use in all institutions of Parliament and the government of Canada. Also, the Canadian Constitution allowed Quebec to pass language laws to promote French in Quebec.

Under the Canadian Constitution, Quebec has jurisdiction over education and has a justice system based on the Civil Code, the only one of its kind in North America. Control over these two areas is crucial to preserve and enhance Quebec's specificity.

Three out of the nine judges appointed to the Supreme Court must come from Quebec. None of the other provinces has such a guarantee.

For any issue relating to education and culture, Quebec can opt out of any Constitutional amendment to transfer provincial powers to the federal government and get full financial compensation.

Four consecutive immigration agreements have progressively increased the role Quebec plays in this area and let the province choose its immigrants and facilitate their integration into Quebec society. The Leader of the Official Opposition himself publicly recognized the merits of these federal–provincial agreements on immigration. Let me remind members that the other provinces do not have the same rights as Quebec does in the immigration area.

According to the economic development agreement reached by Prime Minister Pearson and Mr. Lesage, then Premier of Quebec, during the 1960s, Quebec was able to create its own pension plan and set up its own deposit and investment fund.

At the international level, Ottawa–Quebec framework agreements allow Quebec to sign agreements directly with France and Belgium and, pursuant to yet another agreement, Quebec has its own seat at the Francophone Summit, something other provinces do not have.

All these examples show how biased and full of half–truths the separatists' rhetoric is.

Canadian federalism is not so centralized or centralizing that it negates or irons out regional and provincial differences. In fact, Canada is one of the least centralized countries in the whole world. Canadian federalism is not against promoting the French fact. On the contrary, it contributes to the French influence in North America.

• (1705)

To conclude, I want to say that the PQ option troubles me a lot as it does most Canadians, especially francophones outside Quebec.

In British Columbia, most francophones are not only troubled but sad. Like me, they feel betrayed. In 1980, I fought with petitions and letters, etc, from Vancouver, to keep Quebec inside Canada. On the night of the referendum, I was extremely happy and, the next day, I gave the wives of eight Quebec police officers visiting Vancouver a rose and a note of thanks.

I hope to be able to do the same next year, on the night of the referendum. This time, if Quebecers say no, I will give roses to my colleagues, the women of the Bloc Quebecois.

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Madam Speaker, I have been listening to the federalist members of the House and it is as if they were trying to win the championship for overstatement. They call the process proposed by the government of Quebec a fraud, immoral, illegitimate and illegal. They call it a farce. We are criticized for not asking a clear question. Yet, as my colleague from Portneuf said, the question seems perfectly clear to me: "Are you in favour of the Act passed by the National Assembly declaring the sovereignty of Quebec?" I think that is crystal clear: "the sovereignty of Quebec".

In fact, they are criticizing us for referring to a bill in which Quebec's sovereignty is defined. If you recall, Madam Speaker, in 1980, we were criticized for not defining our project. Now that we define it, we are criticized for it. We even go further by asking Quebec's population to participate in defining the sovereignty project. We asked Quebecers to help define the project. But still, we are told: How can you ask federalists to participate in writing a declaration of independence?

I would say that our federalist colleagues are afflicted by two diseases: schizophrenia and amnesia. Schizophrenia because they have not yet realized that there is no federalist government in Quebec City any more, but a sovereignist government, and that the majority of members representing Quebec ridings in this House are also sovereignists. They are hit by amnesia because they refuse to acknowledge that when the Parti Quebecois formed the Official Opposition in the National Assembly, in spite of its political option, it recognized that a federalist party was in power and took part in the various initiatives introduced by that government.

Members will remember that the Parti Quebecois spent hundreds of hours studying the Meech Lake Accord in the National Assembly and in committee, that it took part in the parliamentary committee which studied the federal government's offers that led to the Charlottetown Accord. Members will also remember that sovereignists participated in the Bélanger–Campeau Commission which proposed two alternatives, not ten but two: sovereignty and a last chance for renewed federalism. That last chance failed; it was the Charlottetown Accord. It failed miserably.

So, in keeping with the conclusions contained in the Bélanger–Campeau Commission report, which was signed by the Liberal Party in Quebec and the present Minister of Foreign Affairs, we are now moving toward the second alternative, which is sovereignty, since the first one failed.

It is now our turn to ask our federalist colleagues to take part in the process. Why are we doing this? For two simple reasons: first, because the question will be submitted to Quebecers for approval very shortly and, if the answer is yes, federalists should help define what a sovereign Quebec should be.

Second, the draft bill refers to an economic association with Canada; our federalist colleagues claim it is not possible. We want to keep the same currency; our colleagues claim it is not possible. We want to keep our citizenship; our colleagues claim it is not possible. We want to conclude international agreements; our colleagues claim it is not possible. We want them to explain to us why it is not possible, and that is exactly why we are asking them to take part in the work of these commissions.

• (1710)

In conclusion, I would invite the people of my riding of Verchères to attend the hearings of these commissions and also the people of the beautiful region where I live when I come to work here, the Outaouais region, who are particularly concerned about the consequences of the debate that will take place.

Mrs. Terrana: Madam Speaker, I do not think there is a question. Still, I would like to say something about the Charlottetown Accord. This agreement was rejected not only because of Quebec but also for a lot of other reasons, because the agreement proposed to Canadians was too vast, too complicated, and even people conversant with the issue could not understand the whole package in the Charlottetown Accord.

I think that is why it was rejected, because Native people say the same thing, everybody says the same thing, namely that the Charlottetown Accord was rejected because of its complexity. I am talking about separation, not sovereignty. In British Columbia, everybody talks about separation. I am sorry, but I found Quebec in Canada on my arrival here; I think it is a great country and that we should stay together, especially since Quebecers have contributed much to Canada and because Quebec provides a dimension that Canada needs.

[English]

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, neither the Act of Union of 1842 nor the British North America Act of 1867 nor the Constitution Act of 1982 defines an orderly breakup of our great country. In the face of this fact, the reality is that all the many viewpoints put forth by the separatist forces in the absence of precedent are in many cases inaccurate projections about the way things will be in a sovereign and separate Quebec.

I believe Canada will accept separatism if it is the result of a clearly worded referendum on the issue and reflects the will of the majority of Quebecers. But whoever said outside of Quebec that sovereignty association was a negotiable option? A new and better Canada requires four strong foundations. It needs four principles to stick to.

First is responsible spending. Irresponsible government spending by this Liberal government, the massive debt it continues to add to and excessive taxation it proposes to put forward have weakened the financial foundation of the old Canada. We need to rebuild the new national home on the principle of financial responsibility. The federal government must balance its budget and keep taxes in check.

Second is the equality of provinces and citizens. Our old Canadian home is built on the fault line which separates French and English rather than on the solid ground of what all Canadians have in common. It is undermined by the linguistic, cultural and constitutional policies that do more to divide us than to unite us. We need to rebuild our national home on the principles that all Canadians will be treated equally regardless of race, gender, language, culture, creed and that all provinces have the same powers and responsibilities over their own destinies.

Third is democracy. Our old Canadian home is built on a system that serves the political elite and only allows your input at election time. We need to rebuild our new national home on the principle that you will have more say in how the national household is run. Elected officials will be accountable all of the time, not just at election time.

Finally, a criminal justice system is the fourth principle, that is more effective, leaving less interpreted for judges, that recognizes victim rights over criminal rights.

The reality of the consequences of Quebec separation will in many ways be very costly for all Canadians. Bloc Quebecois members claim that federalism has not, cannot and will not work. They point to the failures of the Constitution Act, and the Meech Lake and Charlottetown accords as sufficient proof. While I agree that these constitutional efforts represent failure, they failed everyone, not just Quebecers because the wrong people were negotiating the right things the wrong way, top down.

What the premier of the province of Quebec is presently doing by first introducing a draft bill, passing it in the legislature of Quebec first and then going to the Quebec people is making the very same mistake. It is a top down approach. It is something that may not be accepted by the rest of Canadians in Canada. Therefore, it is imperative that when Quebecers and the provincial Government of Quebec look at this issue that they address it on the basis that the simpler the question the better.

If Bloc Quebecois members are questioning why the federal government is refusing to participate in the discussions that will go across the province, it is because it has no solution. It is waiting for other people to step forward and the Reform Party is trying to fill that gap.

I believe that in the province of Quebec the voters should be asked first, then a bill drafted and negotiated. Then the people of Quebec will have the legitimacy to begin negotiations with the rest of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): It being 5.15 p.m., it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the Business of Supply, pursuant to Standing Order 81(17).

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Call in the members.

(The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare the motion negatived.

Mr. Harper (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, we have just had a very important vote, historically and for the unity of Canada and Quebec. Where is Jean Charest?

SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (B)

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.) moved:

That supplementary estimates (b) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1995, laid upon the table Wednesday, November 2, 1994, be concurred in.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent that all members who have voted on the previous vote, plus I understand some who will indicate so in a moment, be deemed to have voted on the question now before the House in the following manner: Liberal members voting yea.

Mr. Duceppe: Madam Speaker, Bloc members will vote nay.

Mr. Silye: Madam Speaker, members of the Reform Party present this evening will vote nay, unless there are those who wish to vote otherwise.

• (1745)

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, I want to indicate on behalf of the New Democratic Party members present, the member for Burnaby—Kingsway and myself, that we would vote nay on this motion.

Mr. Bhaduria: Madam Speaker, I will be voting yes.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

(Bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mrs. Maheu in the chair.)

The Deputy Chairman: House in committee of the whole on Bill C-63, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1995.

(Clauses 2 to 6 inclusive agreed to.)

(Schedule A agreed to.)

(Schedule B agreed to.)

(Clause 1 agreed to.)

(Preamble agreed to.)

(Title agreed to.)

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Chairman, we are working very diligently. I have a question with respect to rules for the President of the Treasury Board.

Could he give an assurance the bill is in its usual form and that there is no change of votes in the bill?

Mr. Eggleton: Madam Chairman, I can give the assurance that the form of the bill is the same as passed in previous years.

(Bill reported.)

● (1755)

Mr. Eggleton moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent to apply the vote just taken on the main motion for second reading to the motion now before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 135]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare the motion carried.

When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Eggleton moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent to apply the vote just taken at report stage of the supply bill to the motion now before the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 135]

(Bill read the third time and passed.)

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I think you would find consent for the House to proceed now with the motion on Bill C–46, the Department of Industry motion for third reading.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Do we have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

The House resumed from December 6 consideration of the motion that Bill C–216, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act (jury service), be read the third time and passed; and of the amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to order made Tuesday, December 6, 1994, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on Mr. Hanrahan's amendment at third reading stage of Bill C–216, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act (jury service).

The question is on the amendment.

As is the practice, the division will be taken row by row starting with the mover and then proceeding with those in favour of the amendment sitting on the same side of the House as the mover to my left and then those sitting on the other side will be called.

(The House divided on the amendment, which was negatived on the following division:)

CRIMINAL CODE

The House resumed from October 26 consideration of the motion that Bill C–226, an act to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I think you will find that there is unanimous consent for the following: if a recorded division is to be taken on the motion before this House this evening, that it be deferred until next Tuesday, at 5.30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise tonight to speak to the bill tabled by the hon. member for York South—Weston, which would delete section 745 of the Criminal Code. This section gives an opening to those sentenced to life imprisonment in Canada because they were found guilty of murder.

The purpose of the bill is simply to delete this section of the Criminal Code. When I read a bill like this one, I always feel embarrassed, because there are two aspects to be considered in such situations.

First of all, we should put ourselves in the shoes of the victims and their families, who went through the horrible tragedy of seeing loved ones murdered. We say to ourselves: It is quite normal for people found guilty of such crimes to go to prison for the rest of their lives, since it was the sentence handed down by the court, the jury, the judge.

Yet, other considerations must be taken into account. First, Parliament put this provision into the Code following the great debate held in the mid–1970s on the abolition of capital punishment in Canada.

As you know, Canada abolished the death penalty in 1976 following a great debate in Canadian society. Those opposed to doing away with the death penalty demanded that lawmakers see to it that the people convicted of first– or second–degree murder in some circumstances be incarcerated for life.

However, Parliament introduced into the Criminal Code a provision allowing those who have served 15 years of a life sentence to apply for parole to the Chief Justice in their province.

A whole process is then initiated to review their applications. A jury is empanelled to represent citizens and hear the application.

• (1825)

This is not an automatic process, therefore, in that the application is reviewed. When making its determination, the jury must take into account the character of the applicant, his conduct while serving his sentence and the nature of the offence for which he was convicted.

The members of the jury represent Canadian citizens and they must make a decision based on the information provided by prison authorities. They must decide whether to reject the application, accept it at a later time, or let the applicant be paroled. In other words, this provision in our Criminal Code does not mean that those who serve life sentences can be set free after 15 years.

Why did Parliament introduce this provision in the Criminal Code? I believe it was felt, rightly so—as this was the prevailing philosophy back in the seventies and still is—that after a person has spent 15 years in jail, it might not be a bad idea to see if he should be paroled.

This has nothing to do with erasing a past mistake or offence: It is simply a matter of providing the possibility of serving one's sentence outside, instead of being kept in jail. The whereabouts of a person released on parole are still monitored and the parolee must still meet a number of conditions in order to continue to qualify for parole.

I think that the lawmakers were right to include this provision in the Criminal Code. They believed that after 15 years, a person who had committed a horrific crime could change, after thinking about we he had done and after receiving counselling from professionals while in prison. Of course, there are many people who believe—and this is somewhat the reasoning behind the motion of the hon. member for York South—Weston—that if a person has committed a crime and been sentenced to a certain number of years in prison, he must serve out his full sentence. He did what he did, the person must be locked up and a rigid approach must be taken.

However, this mind–set seems to be characterized by vengefulness and the belief in an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth. It is an approach that denies the possibility that human beings can change and improve, that under certain circumstances, they can adopt a different attitude, and once released, they will no longer necessarily pose a threat to society.

In closing, I would like to say that since this provision was first introduced into the Criminal Code, of all the applications received, 128 have been deemed admissible. Of the 128 inmates concerned, 71 have actually applied for parole. Of course, many realized that because of their conduct and the nature of the crime they had committed, there was no chance at all of their being granted parole. Of all the applications received, only 43 have actually been reviewed. Some were turned down, some saw their sentences reduced, and some were given a conditional release.

I think it is fortunate that under our Criminal Code, individuals can take advantage of an opportunity like this one. It is not very permissive. Canadian citizens who are on the jury still have the right to consider the case and to pass judgment on behalf of society. We then have an opportunity to consider the individual's potential for rehabilitation and ability to make a valid contribution to society.

I think Canadian society should be proud of having such provisions in its statutes. It shows we are not a closed society, not an intrinsically punitive society, and that we still provide certain opportunities for offenders who have served part of their sentence and who have rehabilitated themselves.

I think everyone will agree it is normal for people who have committed a crime to be punished, and no one in my party wants to make it easy for these people, but I think it is important to have a provision on the books that shows we do not give up entirely on people who have the potential to be rehabilitated.

Consequently, I will vote against the bill, because I believe that in Canada, this is a valid and useful provision to have in the Criminal Code.

[English]

Mr. Paul Zed (Fundy—Royal, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise today in this House to call for the repeal of section 745 of the Criminal Code. I speak today from my own beliefs and most important, the beliefs of the many constituents of the riding of Fundy—Royal.

My riding has been concerned about the implications of section 745 for many months. Fundy—Royal residents have firm beliefs about justice. That sentiment can best be summed up in a few words: A life sentence should mean jail for life, or at least for 25 years. Under the present law that potentially has been in jeopardy.

A petition campaign spearheaded by Constable Evan Scott of the Rothesay Regional Police in Rothesay, New Brunswick calling for the repeal of section 745 has been both welcomed and endorsed throughout New Brunswick. I gave the petition my support in a May 17, 1994 letter to the Minister of Justice.

In the letter I expressed my view that to allow a judicial review for persons who may receive parole after 15 years for first degree murder, the worst possible crime in the Criminal Code, is unacceptable. I feel it is imperative to our judicial system that once an individual has been found guilty by his peers for a heinous crime that the sentence provided by the judge should be carried out in its entirety.

I have chosen to speak on this bill today because I have examined the issues surrounding the section introduced in 1976. I have balanced the merits of those arguments with the values of my constituents and I find that the present legislation is unacceptable.

The facts are staggering indeed. A criminal serving a 25 year sentence can be given a 40 per cent reduction in his sentence. Seventy–two per cent of the applicants under this section were allowed to walk out under early parole. Over the next 15 years there are approximately 600 killers who are eligible to seek early parole.

Anyone can submit an application irrespective of the brutality of the crime and at public expense these applications are permitted to be made. Therein lies part of my problem with section 745. Can we imagine the financial cost to the public purse if each of the more than 600 convicted murderers in our prisons today filed for a reduction in their parole eligibility?

• (1835)

Imagine with that large number of cases the series of precedents which could be created. Section 745 could become an impressive mechanism that further restricts the rights of victims.

For example, in the Queen v. Swietlinski, Judge O'Driscoll declared the victim impact statements inadmissible in a section 745 procedure because they were intended to assist in the earlier sentencing process. Therefore they were not relevant to the issue before the jury considering the criminal's application.

Public attitudes have changed since 1975. Today society overwhelmingly affirms that victims, and in the case of a murderer, the victim's family, should have a greater influence in the parole system. This belief is representative of the notion that crime affects society and the victim's family. It is no longer sufficient that the criminal's sentencing and parole be treated independently from the suffering of the victim's family.

When section 745 was drafted its primary concern was how to integrate the convict back into society as quickly as possible. The procedure to determine whether a convict deserves an early parole eligibility is much easier for the convict than a regular trial.

Let me share some examples I find troubling. The jury only needs two–thirds majority instead of 100 per cent agreement. Most of the evidence presented in the hearing comes from those who seek the convicts early release, not the victim's family.

It appears to me that the process is structured in such a manner that the welfare of the victim's family is completely ignored. If I had to choose between this system and one that gives consideration to the victim's needs to believe that justice has been done I would choose the victim's rights every time.

A thorough examination of section 745 warrants that hard questions be answered. Who is the Criminal Code supposed to protect? What is in the best interests of society? I think public confidence in the legal system is of the utmost importance in any democratic society. Is the Criminal Code to be weighted in favour of rehabilitation or the principle that a sentence for serious crimes must be implemented in full? Will criminals now realizing their opportunity to shorten their sentences by 40 per cent subvert the rehabilitation process? Will the public begin to regard 15 years as a life sentence? If this occurs the public wrath should be furious. Let us forgo that process and repeal section 745.

In closing I share the concerns of my constituents in Fundy—Royal, New Brunswick. The current method of determining a convict's eligibility must correspond with what is reasonable. Other members of this House have called for the repeal of section 745. They have often cited the high profile cases of Clifford Olsen who savagely raped and murdered 11 young children.

There is a case which occurred within my own riding. Less than two weeks ago a man who admitted he shot an innocent victim in the back 16 years ago was before a jury explaining why he deserved a reduction in his parole eligibility. When I heard about this case I hardened my resolve. I thought about the family of that victim.

For his family and for the thousands of family members who will be in a similar situation as over 600 convicted murderers apply for early parole eligibility over the next 15 years, I ask and urge that section 745 of the Criminal Code be repealed so that justice can be done and a life sentence will mean at least 25 years.

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I would like to thank my colleague for his speech and also for producing the numbers. That will save me some time. I am here to support the private member's bill of the hon. member for York South—Weston to abolish section 745 of the Criminal Code.

Something rather strange happened to me a while ago. I had to cross the floor and was in the government lobby. One Liberal friend saw me there and said: "Oh goody, you have seen the light". Well, I have some bad news for him.

• (1840)

I am really happy that some people from that side of the House have seen the light. They have seen the light to such poor legislation and are bringing forward a bill of this type and finding support for it even though it was a piece of legislation that was brought in a few years ago by the very same party.

This section of course allows convicted murderers to apply for a review to lessen their period of parole eligibility. It gives them a process to return to society before serving their entire sentence.

Some of those speaking to this bill have their own opinions on why a convicted murderer should serve a life sentence for killing an innocent victim. Many would admit life should be life, or we in this House should bring back the death penalty. I would challenge the government of the day to seriously consider having a referendum to let the people of this nation decide whether we should have the death penalty.

We are not here to argue that stand. We are here to argue why 25 years in prison should be the minimum penalty for taking another life and how 25 years is just retribution for inflicting untold grief upon the family and friends of a victim of such a heinous crime.

People have free choice. That free choice may include kidnapping, robbery or murder, taking another life. Notice the emphasis is placed on their choice to kill an innocent victim.

When a murderer is convicted in court, the presiding judge decides from the evidence heard what the sentence should be. The judge listens to all the evidence. In a case that clearly demonstrates that the murderer had no concern for human life and no remorse for executing an innocent victim the judge knows a life sentence is just. In those circumstances, the judge knows 25 years without parole is the right sentence for the crime.

I hear from the friends and families of murder victims how they become members of an exclusive club, a club whose only requirement for membership is having one of their own murdered. These club members cannot apply for a reduction of the life sentence given to them for their loved ones. The sentence which entitles them to be members of this exclusive club is indeed for life. Every day for the rest of their lives these club members will suffer. They will be filled with sorrow and will wonder what they could have done to prevent the loss.

Those who murder do not have to serve a similar sentence. They are still alive. They still enjoy the company of others, the benefits of good food, excellent health care and recreation facilities. All this is paid for by the average hardworking taxpayers like those they killed. The only hardship murderers must endure is their restricted access to society. Yet section 745 gives murderers a chance to reduce their separation from law–abiding citizens. That is not justice.

That exclusive club has an annual fee. The fee is paid on every birthday, every Christmas, every occasion that family and friends gather. The memory of the murder victim continues to haunt their thoughts. They simply cannot apply to have their memories reduced. These club members will shed tears where there should be warm embraces and pleasant thoughts of times gone by and times to come. They receive no sentence reduction whatsoever.

These club members are reminded every day of their loss, but that is not the only punishment this current justice system inflicts upon the survivors. This current justice system punishes the survivors further. The friends and family of a murder victim must endure further heartache when murderers apply for early parole. When murderers apply for early parole after 15 years they bring back all the terror and heartache that entered the souls of the family members at the time they were first told of the death.

Why do we continue to punish those who are victims of crime and those who are innocent? I have listened to what a section 745 hearing inflicts upon the survivors. They say they are once again forced to revisit the abyss, to relive the nightmare and all the pain and horror that goes with it. When a murderer applies for a section review of this nature, that is exactly what happens. What more needs to be said? What more evidence needs to be stated that section 745 must be repealed?

If Canadians look at the record of the Parole Board rulings, Canadians see patronage appointees who have little concern for murdered victims or their survivors. These appointees are notorious for listening to bleeding hearts who say the murderer has changed, he has remorse or he has found God and is intending to care for orphans and the elderly now.

These appointees hear reports from psychologists or psychiatrists who have spent a minimum amount of time with the murderer and have decided the murderer has changed. If there is one thing for sure I have learned since becoming a justice critic it is that the worst psychopaths know how to work the system. They know how to con political appointees who only want to follow the mandate of a bleeding heart government. These bleeding hearts believe anyone can be rehabilitated or can feel true remorse for the most heinous of crimes.

All that is needed to believe any political appointees can be conned is to remember that one out of three is given early release by past appointed employees of the Parole Board and one out of three returns to prison.

Section 745 must be repealed so the members of this House can say to the survivors of murdered loved ones they have been given a life sentence, the least we can do is give the murderer 25 years without parole. The most we can do is offer Canadians some minor peace in the knowledge that those who have committed the vilest of crimes will not have early parole.

Let this House recognize the eternal sacrifice of those murdered and eternal pain suffered by their family and friends. Let this House support this bill to end section 745.

In conclusion, I would like to point out one thing that was sent around by one of the members from the Liberal caucus as to reasons why we should not repeal this. It states: "The Liberal Party has never advocated a system of justice based on revenge.

We do not adhere to an eye for an eye or a tooth for a tooth, principles espoused by the Reform Party".

I resent that kind of a statement. What we are calling for is not revenge, it is called justice, something this government has not a clue about and it has demonstrated it year after year in all the legislation it has brought forward.

I do believe that if this government wakes up and realizes there is such a word as revenge, and if we do not start providing justice to our society, revenge is exactly what we can look forward to. It had better wake up to the fact that Canadians are not happy with this justice system. If it does not believe me turn around and ask, it will find out or stand on any street corner in any city in this country and just ask them how they feel. I do not believe that is the Liberal way so I do not think we will look forward to seeing that happen.

Please, I ask everyone here to seriously consider the victims. Remember the victims. Do not vote to keep 745.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise this evening to support the private member's bill put forward by the member for York South—Weston.

Bill C–226 would repeal section 745 of the Criminal Code of Canada. Section 745 allows prisoners given a life sentence for such crimes as first and second degree murder the opportunity to apply for early parole after serving only 15 years of their life sentence.

I want to give a little background. Section 745 was introduced in 1976 by the Solicitor General of the day who currently sits as the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce. Section 745 was part of Bill C–84 and this bill also abolished capital punishment and established two categories of murder, first and second degree. Both categories of this horrendous crime carry minimum sentences of life imprisonment.

Let me be clear. When Reformers and millions of Canadians speak of life imprisonment for despicable crimes such as murder, it must mean life imprisonment.

A number of states in the U.S. have taken the right steps. They have abolished parole boards to ensure that criminals serve their entire sentence no matter how small or how large their crime.

• (1850)

Here in Canada we maintain parole boards which increasingly come under fire for releasing dangerous criminals into our society. We maintain section 745, giving murders, people who commit horrendous crimes in our society, the opportunity to apply for early parole.

As well, as I understand it their chances of being successful under section 745, under that appeal, are pretty good. As of May 1994, 60 applications have been heard under this section and 43 of these 60 have received some form of early parole. That is about a 72 per cent success rate. That is absolutely unacceptable in Canadian society.

It is my opinion that if the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce, who introduced Bill C–84, had his way ruthless killers would be out walking the streets after serving only 15 years.

The member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce argues that keeping someone in prison for 25 years serves little purpose. For a crime as heinous as murder, I and millions of Canadians say that 25 years are not nearly enough.

In addition to the member for Notre–Dame–de–Grâce there are many other bleeding heart Liberals in this government who contend that 25 years—

Ms. Clancy: I am proud to be one.

Mr. Harris: There are many other bleeding heart Liberals in this government who contend that 25 years in prison is a form of cruel and unusual punishment and that section 745 gives the prisoner some hope or something to look forward to after he has completed 15 years of his sentence.

To them I say what about the cruel and unusual punishment of the victim? To them I say what of the cruel and unusual punishment inflicted on the victim's family or the victim's community? What of the cruel and unusual punishment that is inflicted on society as a result of the fear that is created from the knowledge that ruthless killers are out early and walking the streets? What about that cruel and unusual punishment? They do not speak of that when they talk about letting prisoners out early, about letter murders out on to the streets.

The second chance that section 745 awards to criminals is denied to the victims and the victim's families. They do not have a second chance to undo a vicious crime such as murder.

In a statement to the House on October 4, I brought to the attention of all members the fact that the Supreme Court of Canada had recently allowed a first degree murderer another chance at early parole under section 745 because during his first hearing the crown consistently and improperly appealed to the jury's passions. Does that mean the crown was describing the vicious crime this person had committed? This is improperly appealing to the jury's passions.

It would do well for the bleeding heart Liberals opposite to listen to this. This man was convicted in 1986 for stabbing his victim 132 times—are you listening over there—and using five different knives in the process. Because of section 745 it is possible that this vicious killer will be out walking the streets after serving less than 25 years.

In this specific case I would not hesitate to go beyond simple repeal of section 745. I would reinstate capital punishment for this kind of crime. At very worst this government, this House, should recommend that such a vicious criminal spend the rest of his life behind bars.

• (1855)

On July 5, 1994 the government created a national crime prevention council, no doubt at great expense to Canadian taxpayers. This council reports to the Minister of Justice on various crime prevention strategies. I would hope that this council would take note of the proceedings here this evening and consider advising the minister to abolish section 745 in the interests and safety of Canadians and our communities, and to bolster the sagging confidence level that Canadians have in the criminal justice system in this country.

I would hope also that the bleeding heart Liberals present here tonight are listening to the speeches from their own colleagues and from members of the Reform Party. I would hope that this council would listen to the pleas of millions of Canadians who are crying for a reinstatement of the death penalty for crimes such as murder.

There are some major problems with the procedure in the way applications are heard under section 745. For instance, under this section hearing the criminal cannot be subject to questioning regarding his offence. Give us a break in this country. However, he can give oral evidence as to his successes and what a good person he has been while in prison.

There have also been cases in the past in which Correctional Services Canada has used the Privacy Act, if you can imagine, to deny the crown information relating to the criminal's behaviour in jail. This amounts to suppression of information which could have a profound effect on whether that person should be out.

Last but not least, it is the taxpayers who are paying for these appeal hearings. In the light of these costs, it is absolutely incomprehensible that the bleeding hearts in this government would continue to support section 745.

The continuation of section 745 is simply not acceptable to the victims of ruthless killers in this country. It is not acceptable to the Canadian people. I hope that the bleeding hearts in this government, in this Parliament, will for once listen to the voice of the Canadian people.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Accordingly, pursuant to the order made earlier this day, the division stands deferred to Tuesday, December 13, at 5.30 p.m.

Mrs. Stewart: Madam Speaker, I would like to suggest to the House that we view the clock as reading 7.07 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Madam Speaker, yesterday I addressed a very simple question to the Minister of Justice. I do not think the seven million gun owners out there will be very pleased with his response.

The minister dismissed opposition from the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta justices ministers, saying:

> I have a decent respect for the opinion of my provincial and territorial counterparts but in the final analysis this is a matter for this federal government to deal with.

As I said in my question yesterday, the legislative assembly of the province of Saskatchewan has voted unanimously, all three parties, to oppose any further gun controls. The chief law enforcement officer for the province of Saskatchewan has written to the minister expressing his government's opposition. He is concerned about how he will be able to enforce gun control laws which the majority of voters in the province know are unfair and unnecessary to control violent crime.

In September the minister told over 10,000 law-abiding, responsible gun owners that he is not interested in making laws by taking a head count and yet he continually refers to bogus polls, which is a head count, to support his biased view that the majority of Canadians actually support his useless, ineffective gun control proposals.

A Ph.D. with 30 years of experience who teaches an honours research design and analysis course at Concordia University described an Angus Reid poll on gun control as fraudulent, saying his students found a dozen fatal flaws in the five questions asked in the minister's favourite poll and stated: "Any student who submitted such biased questions would fail the course". This is what the minister is appealing to.

When a Gallup poll asked a well worded question, 69 per cent of the respondents felt passing more severe laws over legitimate gun owners would have very little influence on criminals. This is the exact opposite view expressed in the minister's oft quoted poll.

If the minister is going to govern by polls then he must ensure that the polls ask fair and unbiased questions. Further, if he really believes in implementing laws which reflect the will of the majority, he should at least allow the members of this House to have a free vote on the gun control proposals.

Frankly, I do not think the minister is a big believer in true democracy or direct democracy. I think his answer to my question yesterday proves that specifically.

I specifically asked the minister if he had taken a head count of all the justice ministers in this country to find out which of them support his proposals and which do not. The Minister of Justice answered "we govern by what is right", referring to the Liberal gun control proposals tabled last week in the House of Commons. He dictated that this is the government's assessment of what is right.

What have Canadians learned from the minister's reply? We learned that he has indeed consulted "with officials of every provincial and territorial attorneys general ministry" but that he does not care what they think. He is going to do whatever he thinks is right, not what the majority of Canadians think is right, not what the provincial justice ministers think is right even though they are the ones who have to enforce these ineffective gun control laws, not what the police on the street think is right, not even what the provincial legislators think is right, and certainly not what the majority of our municipal governments think is right.

His only justification for this intrusive and costly bureaucratic, make work project is that he and the Liberal cabinet think it is right. If Canadians thought for a moment that registering their rifles and shotguns and confiscating guns from law–abiding firearms owners might actually reduce violent crime and stop criminals from acquiring guns, they might actually support him. But they do not.

They know criminals do not obey any laws, especially gun control laws, and criminals will always be able to get their guns.

In conclusion, unfortunately democracy and majority rule take a back seat to what the Liberals think is right. Frankly, I fear a government that will not listen to the people a lot more than I fear a law–abiding citizen with a gun.

I ask my question again: Has the minister taken a head count of all the justice ministers in this country to find out which of them support his proposals and which do not and could he share the results of this head count with all Canadians?

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to have the opportunity to respond on behalf of the Minister of Justice. While there were a number of comments in the hon. member's intervention that I could answer I shall somehow find the fortitude to resist.

I am certain that all Canadians support the initiatives of the government that enhance the safety of our communities, whether those communities are urban or rural. The criminal and accidental misuse of guns is just as prevalent in the rural areas of Canada as it is in the urban areas.

Studies show the homicide rate in rural areas is 50 per cent higher than in the urban environment. In Saskatchewan, for example, between 1989 and 1992 there was an average of 5.1 suicides by firearms for every 100,000 residents compared to the national average of 3.8.

The legislation that will be introduced in the new year will not prevent farmers and ranchers, hunters or target shooters from using their firearms for recreational pursuits, in the case of ranchers for predatory control purposes. The minister has made this very clear during his extensive discussions and consultations with firearms' owners and users in all areas of the country.

The government's first objective, supported by all firearms interest groups, is to increase criminal sanctions for the use of firearms in the commission of crime. Second, and receiving broad support, are moves that will be made to control and penalize the illegal trafficking and smuggling of firearms. The last major objective is to address the ownership and use of all firearms in Canada.

I believe, this side believes, the government believes that our gun control law is accepted by a great number of Canadians. I am so glad to see the new politics from these gentlemen.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5) the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA GRAIN ACT

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (for Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.) moved that Bill C–51, an act to amend the Canada Grain Act and respecting certain regulations made pursuant to that act, be read the third time and passed.

Mrs. Georgette Sheridan (Saskatoon—Humboldt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C–51 this morning, an act to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Bill C–51 represents a consensus among Canada's western grain producers and the grain industry. This bill contains the changes to the Canada Grain Act these communities have told us they need.

There are four key elements to Bill C–51. The first is to renew Canada's commitment to quality and therefore reinforce the uniqueness of the Canadian quality control system. The second is to eliminate the obligation for government to set maximum elevator tariffs. The third is to improve the financial protection available to grain producers. The fourth is to reduce the exposure of taxpayers in the event that licensees of the Canadian Grain Commission fail financially.

• (1005)

I will now give some detail on these four particular aspects beginning with commitment to quality. Bill C–51 renews this commitment to quality. When we talk about quality, what we mean are the measurable characteristics that end users of these products tell us they need. Bill C–51 restates the need to meet the requirements of end users through visual and other quality determination methods. Until instrumental means are developed to rapidly and efficiently determine quality, visual methods must still be relied upon.

Grain quality, which is the primary reason for Canada's success in international markets, is more important than ever given the post–GATT climate in which freer trade rules reduce the role of export subsidies. Our competitors are going to have to become more like us. For this reason it is important that Canada preserve its tradition and widely acknowledged leadership in this area.

On the issue of maximum elevator tariffs, Bill C–51 provides that the Canadian Grain Commission will no longer be required to set maximum elevator tariffs. Tariffs are the charges grain elevator operators levy for their elevation, storage and cleaning services.

In the absence of maximum tariffs, elevator operators will be able to decide what to charge for their services. Operators will also no longer be required to provide the commission with 14 days notice when changes to tariffs are to be made. These measures will provide companies with more opportunities to be flexible and competitive.

Removing the obligation of the commission to set maximum tariffs is being done at the request of the industry. Elimination of the maximums should encourage more capital investment by elevator companies and result in a more flexible and competitive elevator industry.

Producer reactions to this provision have been mixed. Some do believe there is a risk that companies will charge excessive tariffs unless they are regulated but we are convinced that Bill C–51 addresses these concerns. There are safeguards within the bill and within the structure of the industry.

For example, the majority of primary and terminal elevators are owned or controlled by producers through the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, the Alberta Wheat Pool, the United Grain Growers, and the Manitoba Pool Elevators. These operators are responsible to their producers, so it is expected they will consider the interests of producers when setting these tariffs.

Some may argue that the corporate interests of producer organizations will override the producers' interests. It would be presumptuous for government to tell producers they are incapable of directing their own organizations. I am very much convinced that producers know what they are doing and they are in the best position to determine whose interests their organizations will serve.

In the unlikely event that producer owned elevators are not able to protect their producers Bill C–51 does include some legislative remedies. Specifically for a two–year transition period the Canadian Grain Commission will have the power to immediately establish maximum tariffs by order if the investigation of a complaint from an elevator user finds that a particular tariff is unjustified. The two–year period should be sufficient for the industry and producers to adapt to a deregulated tariff environment.

The commission will continue to have the power to set maximum tariffs by regulation as a last resort if elevator operators set tariffs that are excessive. Furthermore, the commission will continue to investigate complaints and to mediate disputes.

However, if the past behaviour of Canada's elevator companies offers any indication of their future actions they will behave responsibly. The recent experience where the commission issued an order which removed elevation tariff ceilings for terminal elevators for the current crop year has shown this. Limits on these maximums were removed to allow operators to recover overtime costs, enabling the industry to deal with backlogged orders. The resulting tariff increases were modest and responsibly applied.

It is significant that the tariffs companies are charging for their other services are below the ceiling established by the Canadian Grain Commission.

The next point has to do with the licensing and security provisions contained in the bill. The Canadian Grain Commission plays an important role in helping maintain the integrity of grain transactions and thereby protecting the interests of grain producers.

The Canadian Grain Commission licenses elevators and grain dealers and holds security posted by licensees. This security which is mandatory for all licensees is intended to help protect farmers against losses in case a licensee defaults on payments to farmers.

In the past the industry viewed this security as insurance to cover licensee liabilities only up to the amount of security posted.

• (1010)

However, in 1990 the Federal Court found the CGC liable in the case of the bankruptcies of two former licensees. In both cases the security held by the Canadian Grain Commission was insufficient to cover the licensees' obligations to farmers and the government had to pay the shortfall in security which was approximately $3.8 million.

The payments that resulted from these court decisions came out of general revenue, more specifically out of taxpayers' pockets. We feel it is important to change the act to protect taxpayers from further payments by clarifying the government's responsibility in any further bankruptcies. This view is shared throughout the grain industry with which the licensing and security provisions of Bill C–51 were thoroughly discussed.

The new licensing and security provisions are as follows. There is currently a one–year limit on security. The act will allow the time limit to be prescribed by regulation and it is the government's intention to fix this period at 90 days. The change is based on one of the major recommendations flowing from consultations. That recommendation was that farmers should take more responsibility for their transactions. This includes promptly pricing grain on delivery and cashing payment documents.

The vast majority of those consulted agreed that security is not intended to help farmers speculate on rising grain prices. By limiting their time to claim the act will place the responsibility on farmers for promptly obtaining payment and cashing documents.

Another provision is that farmers will have 30 days to notify the CGC of a licensee's failure or refusal to pay. If the CGC is notified promptly of a default, it can investigate a licensee that is potentially in financial difficulty and may be able to prevent the licensee from incurring further liabilities.

The onus will be on farmers to determine whether they are dealing with licensees. This is because the CGC only holds security posted by licensees. If farmers want to be eligible for security they will have to ensure they are dealing with a licensed organization. They can do this by contacting the CGC or by monitoring regular CGC advertisements in the farm press.

Farmers will have to hold prescribed documents to be eligible for security. Security posted by licensees applies only to cash purchase tickets, elevator receipts and grain receipts. To be eligible to claim against security farmers must obtain one of these prescribed documents. Only licensees will be entitled to use them. This will prevent non–licensees from misleading producers about their licensing status.

Security available to producers will be limited to the amount held by the commission. If the security held is less than total liabilities, the monies will then be shared on a pro rata basis. Government will not be liable if the security held is not adequate. The commission will monitor companies to make certain their security is adequate to cover their liabilities.

Finally, Bill C–51 will enable the commission to set by regulation the percentage of losses that would be covered by security. The government intends this will remain at 100 per cent of any losses. These are very important provisions that will resolve some of these long outstanding issues.

There is another point here that should be discussed that has to do with special crops. When Bill C–51 was reviewed by the agriculture committee some members and witnesses expressed the view that Bill C–51 should be held back until issues of specific concern to some members of the special crops industry could be addressed in the legislation.

The answer to the problem does not lie in holding up this bill. Rather, the answer is to proceed with developing legislation that is geared to special crops. What does special crops mean? This refers to products such as canary seed, sunflower seed, mustard seed, lentils, buckwheat, beans, peas, corn, safflower seed, soy beans, triticale, fava bean.

At one time special crops played a relatively small economic role when compared with other Canadian grains such as wheat, barley, oats, canola and so on. However, the industry has grown significantly, particularly in western Canada where special crops have grown by about 30 per cent in the last 10 years.

Special crops are regulated under the Canada Grain Act. This act was designed to regulate an industry largely devoted to the bulk handling of cereal grains. Many industry participants have observed that because special crops differ significantly in terms of handling and marketing the act does not meet all the needs of the special crops industry.

This general assessment has some merit. Over the past several years the Canadian Grain Commission has consulted widely on this issue, mostly through the special crops initiative which was conducted by a committee of special crops producers based in the three prairie provinces. These reviews have confirmed that the special crops industry operates differently than the sector of the industry that handles the major grains and that legislative changes are needed to address these special needs.

• (1015)

These reviews have also consistently underlined the need expressed by producers to have access to companies which are licensed and to financial security should those companies default on their payments to the producers.

The commission has examined numerous suggestions and a combination of suggestions that have come forward from participants in the special crops industry. Some suggestions had to be rejected because they were administratively complicated and unduly expensive.

More consultation is planned because the commission wishes to determine which regulatory option is most acceptable to special crops producers and the industry.

The commission recently circulated a discussion paper which outlines options and it will be holding discussions with the special crops industry in western Canada over the next two to three months. From these discussions will emerge recommendations for legislation in 1995.

The conclusion to be drawn from all of this is as follows. First, a special crops industry has special needs which must be addressed. These needs are being addressed in a thoughtful and timely fashion. Second, because the needs of the special crops industry will be the subject of legislative proposals, the minister of agriculture intends to bring it to the House in 1995. We should not delay the passage of Bill C–51. Delays will aggravate problems C–51 is designed to overcome.

In conclusion, we should all thank the many people who have been involved in one way or another in the development of Bill C–51. They include many members of the multitude of Canada's producer and industry organizations, staff of the Canadian Grain Commission, Agriculture Canada and many members of the House, all of whom have contributed to make this bill a success in addressing these issues.

Mr. André Caron (Jonquière, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–51 under consideration today is an administrative bill. It is designed to make the operation and administration of the Canadian Grain Commission and the grain industry more efficient.

Canada's reputation for grains of constant and reliable quality is commonly recognized as Canada's winning card on international grain markets. The Canada Grain Act will be amended a number of ways by the bill before us, to strengthen the role played by quality in the Canadian grain industry.

Under the provisions brought forward today, the Canadian Grain Commission, which is responsible for administering the Canada Grain Act, will no longer have a duty to set maximum elevator charges. We know that these charges are fees levied by elevator operators for the handling, cleaning, storage and drying of grain.

This deregulation of maximum charges will be introduced in stages. There will be a two–year transition period during which the commission will retain the power to set rate ceilings by regulation. During and after this transition period, the Canadian Grain Commission will act as an ombudsman, investigate complaints and try to settle them. Following the transition period, the Canadian Grain Commission will retain the power to set maximum charges by regulation, as required.

This enactment will give elevator operators more flexibility in setting their prices, enabling them to compete. It will also encourage much needed capital investment.

Bill C–51 will lift the requirement for grain to be hauled from province to another exclusively by common carrier. This will benefit the producers, in our view, by giving them transportation options that could help them cut their marketing costs.

The Canada Grain Act, 1912, established the Canadian Grain Commission mainly to look after the interests of grain producers. Their protection remains the main focus of the act and several of the proposed changes are designed to ensure this protection. Among the amendments is one giving the Canadian Grain Commission the power to take measures against companies making illegal use of the grade names established under the Canada Grain Act.

• (1020)

The bill also requires licensed grain dealers to use the official grade names established under the Canada Grain Act in all their dealings with producers.

There is also a provision allowing the Canadian Grain Commission to suspend primary elevator operation licenses when surpluses exceed the allowed limits. A surplus is the difference between the quantity of grain stored in the elevator and the amount that should be there according to shipment records and receipts.

The bill also contains provisions giving the Canadian Grain Commission the authority to require operators to fully insure the grain stored in their elevators. Finally, it requires eventual licensees to provide specified financial data proving their solvency.

Under the bill, the Canadian Grain Commission would license elevator operators and grain dealers and hold security posted by licensees, to help protect farmers in cases where a licensee defaults in its payment to a grain producer.

After the bankruptcies of two licensees who had posted insufficient security, the courts ruled that the shortfall should come out of general revenue or, in other words, out of taxpayers' pockets. The bill before us proposes several amendments intended to clarify the respective responsibilities of the Canadian Grain Commission and of grain producers and to protect taxpayers against future disbursements.

These amendments include a provision that protects producers by regulation during a fixed period following grain delivery to a licensee. Should producers not try to obtain payment during this period, they will not be eligible for reimbursement out of the security posted by the licensee, in case the licensee goes bankrupt, of course. Based on the consultations which the Canadian Grain Commission held with producers and industry stakeholders, the statutory period will be 90 days.

The bill also contains a provision requiring the grower to notify the Canadian Grain Commission within 30 days if a grain company has not met its obligations.

It also contains a provision making the grower responsible for determining whether he is dealing with a duly accredited company. Since accredited companies are the only ones that have to provide security to the Canadian Grain Commission, claims against the security will not be valid if a grower deals with a non–accredited company.

We also find a provision requiring the grower to obtain documents authorized by the Canadian Grain Commission from grain dealers and other Commission licensees.

The bill also contains a provision allowing the Commission to set a limit on the protection afforded by the security. The Commission could not use this regulatory power without the approval of the Governor in Council. At present, the protection is total—100 per cent—and will remain so in the foreseeable future.

There is also a provision explicitly limiting the Canadian Grain Commission's obligation to the amount of the security provided by the companies which it accredited. This provision exists to make the protection which the growers enjoy closer to the security provisions commonly found in other sectors. It is similar to the limits set on the amount guaranteed by the government when financial institutions fail.

I realize that I went quickly, but for these reasons, I will support Bill C–51 presented by the government.

[English]

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak at third reading of Bill C–51 which amends the Canada Grain Act.

The Canada Grain Act regulates grading and inspection of grain, maximum tariffs on handling charges including elevation, cleaning, drying and so on. The act also restricts in some cases transportation of grain. It is involved in licensing of businesses dealing in or handling grain and also in the security requirements of these companies.

The Canadian Grain Commission oversees the act. It is made up of appointed commissioners who seem, for some reason, to turn over to some extent after an election.

Today I will discuss the changes to the Canada Grain Act which are proposed in Bill C–51. I will discuss these changes under three headings: first, excessive power moved to the hands of the minister and to cabinet; second, maximum tariffs on handling charges; and third, bonding and licensing. As well as these three main areas I will speak briefly about a few other areas which I think are of particular interest.

I will begin with the excessive power moved to the hands of the minister and cabinet under the changes made in Bill C–51. In this bill an increased amount of legislative action is given to the governor in council which is the formalized constitutional body through which the federal cabinet exercises executive power. The executive instrument of the governor in council is known as an order in council which represents delegated legislative power as permitted under specific acts of Parliament.

This delegated legislative power gives cabinet, or really the minister, the ability to enact subordinate legislation by order in council or by regulation. Power delegated through enabling legislation is so common that the law is effectively formed by administrative bodies rather than by Parliament as it should be.

The legislator's role should be to pass the initial legislation authorizing certain agencies to devise, promulgate and supervise regulations as may be deemed necessary to give full effect to a particular act.

Too much power is continuing to be centralized in governor in council. In this bill, clauses 2, 4, 9, 15, 33 and 35 are examples.

How can the Liberals reconcile this with their red book promises of more open and more democratic government? Why are they formalizing control in cabinet? The argument that was presented when this question was raised is that the bill only legitimizes the authority that is there anyway.

If the government is serious about moving to a more open and less interventionist style of government, why did it not remove these powers rather than just formalizing what was there anyway?

This expansion of the scope and use of governor in council power which has occurred at the expense of the power of the legislature or Parliament is largely a result of the increasing complexity of modern government. However this delegated legislative power may involve matters of administrative routine right up to matters of major political and economic consequences. A wide range of issues are dealt with by the order in council power.

Such legislation is so extensive that Parliament can do little other than conduct random checks and investigate only some apparent abuses. The decisions made by cabinet or governor in council are based on informal procedures and the deliberations are secret. This amounts to little more than government by cabinet decree with no accountability.

In this bill there are an increasing number of areas for which the Canadian Grain Commission will now require governor in council approval. Conceivably the Liberal government under the revised act would be given the ability to covertly affect the interest of an individual farmer, a farm group or a grain dealer, for example, which is not operating according to its wishes. Dare I suggest this change opens the door to pay–offs for political favours or punishment for political foes. This is the type of thing the governing Liberal Party campaigned against during the election.

In two cases in this bill there is a movement toward less ministerial control. This bill states that the Canadian Grain Commission will have the power to set the salaries for the members of the eastern and western standards committees which have 26 members and the grain appeal tribunal which is made up of three members. This is in clauses 4 and 6 of this legislation.

Currently the salaries of members of these committees are fixed by governor in council at a $125 honorarium per day for non–government participants and $10 per sample for the grain appeal tribunal. The commission will now be setting the salaries for committee members in order to better reflect the reality and provide the Canadian Grain Commission with additional flexibility to make adjustments without having to go to order in council.

The second area I would like to talk about briefly this morning is the setting of maximum tariffs. Clause 14 and some following clauses eliminate over two years the requirement for the Canadian Grain Commission to set maximum tariffs charged by grain elevators. Instead the Canadian Grain Commission is provided with the discretion to decide whether or not it wishes to regulate this aspect of the grain industry while eliminating the requirement that elevator operators have to give advance notice to the Canadian Grain Commission of changes to elevator charges. Tariffs are fees charged for handling, cleaning, storage and drying of grain, that type of thing.

Removing these tariffs is a positive step. My concern though is with the grain companies that own primary, that is the country elevators, as well as terminal elevators. It is very common in the grains industry for companies to own the farm elevators that farmers ship directly to as well as the terminal elevators which are responsible for receiving the grain in port position and loading it on the ships. Those grain companies may lower the tariffs in the country elevators which is good, but they may at the same time raise the tariffs in the terminal elevators to make up for the cut rates in the country.

This would be fine if only these companies were dealing through their terminals. However these terminals are semi–public terminals by law which means that companies and individuals other than the owners are allowed to ship grain through the terminal.

I am afraid these changes may cause an increased rate at the terminal. The smaller companies which are provided an opportunity by law to deal through the terminals may be squeezed out of business. The rates could be raised beyond that which is reasonable.

Just to make this very clear, there is a provision in place which allows the Canadian Grain Commission to set a maximum in cases where the rate is raised too much. That provision is there and I will talk a bit about that in a minute.

The irony is that while I am concerned about this happening, the positive result from this type of action could be that the small companies may decide to improve the direct hit loading. That is simply loading directly from rail car to ships which started in the port of Vancouver and they may actually expand this to increase the competition. I see this as something positive.

The other positive thing that may result from this is more grain movement through the United States and through American terminals so that Canadian farmers have another option when there is a disruption in grain movement within Canada. That would encourage settlements by those in the grain handling industry, including the companies that own the business and labour. Settlement may be encouraged if they know there is competition so that they cannot stop the flow of grain.

I touched on my concern before about the Canadian Grain Commission or order in council maintaining the power to set the maxmimum tariffs. By getting rid of the maximum tariffs it gives the grain buyers more authority to penalize people who put grain in terminals and do not move it quickly enough. This is in clause 14 of the bill. I believe this is a good move. However, since we know that government wants to increase and not decrease the authority of the Canadian Wheat Board for example, cabinet just may choose to reverse these penalties in cases where the Canadian Wheat Board is affected.

• (1035)

Could the ability to invoke governor in council authority be used in the future by government to give even more power to the central selling desk of the Canadian Wheat Board to further regulate the grain sector? This is a legitimate concern.

With the present legislation the terminals do not have the power to penalize the Canadian Wheat Board for dumping grain for which they do not have an immediate buyer. All other shippers of grain must have a buyer ready before they can move the grain to port. The Canadian Wheat Board is the exception.

We have found over this past year that the Canadian Wheat Board moved grain into terminal position for which it had no buyer. This was the case particularly in Thunder Bay. Without the ability of the companies that own the terminals to raise the tariffs, this put them at a disadvantage because they could not move the grain due to the terminals being plugged with Canadian Wheat Board grain. At least now the law provides for them to raise this rate, but it also provides for the minister to say: "No, this is out of line. We are going to lower the rate".

That overriding power concerns me. I understand there is some need for that because in a business where there really is not enough open competition there could be a rise in tariffs which is not justified. There is a balance. It is tricky to find the balance, but I am just expressing some of my concerns.

The third area I want to talk about today is bonding and licensing requirements and the proposed changes under this piece of legislation. A major change in the bill involves the clear legislative removal of any responsibility on the part of the Canadian Grain Commission and therefore the taxpayers, above the level of the bond that is posted by the Canadian Grain Commission to a licensed company. In the past, courts have required the Canadian Grain Commission to cover losses above the bond level.

Companies buy bonds to protect the customers they do business with against losses up to the bond level if they go out of business. In the past the courts have determined that somehow the Canadian Grain Commission and therefore the taxpayers have a responsibility to cover losses above the level of the bond.

However in at least two cases over the past years taxpayers have also been forced to cover losses for companies which have not been licensed under the Canadian Grain Commission. Therefore, there is no responsibility on the part of the Canadian Grain Commission or the taxpayers. The Auditor General was very critical of the bailouts of these two companies which seemed to be politically motivated.

With the changes that are made in this area there is no doubt at all that farmers will not be protected above the level of the bond. The courts will not be able to determine that taxpayers should somehow be held responsible for farmers and grain companies through funds from the Canadian Grain Commission.

The Canadian Grain Commission does however monitor these bonds to try to determine whether the licensed companies are operating within the level of the bonds. This is a very difficult thing to do and it is very expensive. It is a function which does offer some degree of protection. At the same time while the monitoring is there, the grain commission is not responsible if the monitoring is ineffective. That is a concern.

Once again the Canadian Grain Commission has the power but does not take the responsibility for its mistakes. It has the power to refuse to licence a company, to require expensive insurance and bonding. It spends the money to perform these functions, but again the only protection is provided by the companies and the protection is only up to the level of the bond. It is important that farmers know this.

For this reason I believe that elevators and grain dealers should have the right to choose to opt out of this licensing and bonding requirement. This was the reason for my first amendment to Bill C–51, Motion No. 3, which was debated and defeated at report stage. That amendment would have allowed individual elevator companies, grain dealers, to choose to opt out of the licensing requirements under the Canada Grain Act.

It is very expensive and very difficult for some small companies to provide the bonding and insurance the Canadian Grain Commission may require. In those cases these companies could have chosen to opt out.

The protection we offered to farmers and people doing business with these companies is that on the premises there would be a sign very clearly stating that the place of business was not licensed under the Canadian Grain Commission. As is done in other areas with this type of body, on the front of every contract it would have been required to clearly state that the company you were about to enter into a contract with was not licensed under the Canada Grain Act. That was the protection for farmers.

As well, the amendment would have provided the flexibility so that when a company did opt out it no longer had to meet any of the requirements of the Canada Grain Act. This amendment would also have allowed companies, if they chose, to use the grading and inspection services that the Canadian Grain Commission provides, of course at a cost as is done now.

There are a few other points that I want to raise. One further clause in this bill authorizes the Canadian Grain Commission to suspend licences of primary elevators where overages exceed allowable limits.

Overage is just a difference between the amount of grain an elevator has in store compared to the amount it should have in store when looking at the records of shipments and receipts of grain. This is to offer some protection that in fact companies are paying their customers for what has been brought in and put through the facility.

Another clause confirms the authority of the Canadian Grain Commission to require operators to fully insure the grain in their elevators. It requires that prospective licensees provide specified financial data which demonstrates their financial viability.

What they are talking about here is a little bit closer monitoring of the bonds. While it is impossible to make sure that a company is operating within the bond level, it was pretty clear from what happened in the past when companies failed that the monitoring was not as good as it should be.

A further step in this bill involves movement of grain within Canada. This may surprise some people although people who are knowledgeable in the grain industry know this, the legislation seems to grant free movement within the eastern division or within the western division, a line drawn just west of Thunder Bay. This is in clause 25 of this bill. My question is: Why should there be any restriction to interprovincial trade and grain in this country? Yet, there is.

This legislation will allow free movement within the eastern division or within the western division but not between the two divisions. This seems absurd. To add further to that under the Canadian Wheat Board Act it is still against the law to transport grain from province to province even within a division. This seems absurd when you consider we are moving to more free and open trade with the world.

A further change requires that licensed grain dealers use the Canada Grain Act grade names in all of their transactions with farmers and grant the authority of the Canadian Grain Commission to act against companies which illegally use them. This has almost been a normal practice in the industry and this change only legitimizes what is already happening.

My concern is that dealers do not have the right to operate as unlicensed businesses. They may apply to the Canadian Grain Commission which may choose to grant them the right to operate without a licence but it is not a right. Of course my amendment which was defeated at report stage would have provided this as a right.

I believe that farmers and dealers in the industry want a change which will allow a dealer to operate as an unlicensed dealer and choose to deal in either ungraded grain or grain which has been graded by the Canadian Grain Commission. They want the choice. Because farmers are paying for the majority of the operating costs of the Canadian Grain Commission, they should be provided with the choice.

• (1045)

In conclusion, one witness in committee referred to the bill as the reregulation of the industry. The time has come for an open and honest evaluation of the role of the Canadian Grain Commission to determine what functions it should perform and how it should perform them.

The evaluation must determine what farmers want in areas that affect them and what others in the industry want in areas that affect them. The role of the Canadian Grain Commission should be to provide no more or no less than what is wanted by players in the industry.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I reiterate the statements made by my hon. colleague from Vegreville. He made a very good speech on what this change to the grain commission act really is. I will add a few comments.

As members of the standing committee on agriculture know very well, I am not a big friend of the Canadian Grain Commission. I was very close to the issue when Grandin wheat was smuggled into the country and put the reputation of our milling wheat at stake. The way the grain commission acted on the issue was really appalling. Not only did it not try to keep the grain out of the country but it more or less showed the smugglers, as I call them, how to get around the rules and regulations to bring it in and fill their pockets with wheat that was really not suited for our area.

It makes me wonder: I see a bill like this one that says deregulation and then I see it is probably open to loopholes whereby small players could be put out of business in a very short time.

When I look at small elevator companies with no terminals, I wonder how they will be able to compete with a very low tariff in the country. When grain is shipped to the terminals of larger players they can be hammered with the tariffs and put out of business. That is not fair. The grain commission was put in place to see that everyone was treated equally, small players or big players.

Why would large grain companies be worried about exporting grain if their terminal charges were so high they actually made more money by keeping it there than moving it once or twice during the year? It is a deterrent to exporting grain outside the country.

We have small players in the grain industry like small seed cleaning plants. They are really the entrepreneurs in the special crops industry. They were the people who put at risk the bit of capital they had by experimenting with lentils and with peas. These small players are going to be licensed and regulated to a point where they cannot exist. I received a call from a small seed plant owner one day who said: "Jake, to enforce the new regulations in the act it will cost me $20,000 extra for doing my books". A chartered accountant will now do his books which were always done by him and his family.

The accounting and the bonding are putting these small players out of business. Every farmer knows the reputation of the seed plants in their areas. They have been in business for years and have never defrauded anyone of a single dime. They are now going to be put out of business. That is wrong.

Another thing that is wrong is that grain commissioners are paid by farmers; 90 per cent of their wages are from farm receipts. However what input do they have in who the commissioners are? This is a point in our democracy that must be changed. When a player pays he should also have the right to know whom he is paying.

Clause 4 of the bill also bothers me. It would permit the Canadian Grain Commission rather than the governor in council to fix allowances paid to members of grain standards committees and grain appeal tribunals, removing the set of rules as far as payment is concerned one step further from the House. Before it was the governor in council and farmers who had some input. Now it is to be removed from the governor in council and given to commissioners to set wages for grain weighing tribunals or grading standards people.

This is not very effective nor what farmers want. I do not think it saves the taxpayer money. I would equate that to putting the fox into the chicken coop instead of outside the door. It is dangerous and should not be allowed to happen.

Clause 21 of the bill really bothers me. Under the clause process elevators, unlike primary elevators, would no longer have to perform weighovers to determine whether there is an overage or a shortage, a discrepancy between the amount a grain elevator has in store and the amount it really paid for. This is to recognize that process elevators are not required to account for grain delivered by producers.

Why should process elevators be treated any different from primary elevators? These are the elevators that are processing the special crops. These are the process elevators that really turn over the dollars, where the big bucks are. Very little overage or a shortage can increase their profit margins and it is all coming out of the pockets of farmers. It will open the door to more corruption and more lost revenue for farmers. If we want a bill that is fair to everyone, it should be on a basis where primary and processing elevators are treated exactly the same.

My colleague touched on another item I do not like. Public carriers will only be able to transport grain in the west, not into the east or vice versa. It is another regulation that will hinder value added processing companies.

Just this week a small miller in Manitoba tried to export to another province. He will be able to do so under this act into Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and B.C. However he cannot go into Ontario and compete with the bigger processors or the millers. The country should be shared by everyone. We have agreed to the establishment of the World Trade Organization but we do not have free trade in our own country.

There is so much to be said about the government that we could probably talk all day long. One of these days in the House, especially when we are not debating this bill, I will mention to hon. members what the old red combine did to my farming operation. We could probably debate a few matters outside this bill.

• (1055)

When I commented in the standing committee that there should be a revamping of the Canadian Grain Commission I was not very far off. Farmers will very much support that idea, just like they supported the idea that the Grain Transportation Agency should be done away with.

It amazes me that we can debate bills in the House and agree in committee 100 per cent, Liberals, Bloc and Reform, but legislation does not get passed. I would suggest very strongly to the House that if we want the farming industry to stay in business we will have to start making real deregulation, not superficial.

As far as I am concerned the bill is giving the grain handling system the chance to increase its revenue without considering what it will cost farmers. We will not have the free movement of grain we should have. The bill will give us competition, but the competition will be limited. The amount of tariff that can be charged will be set by larger players with no regulation. That really bothers me. We have to start realizing that the primary producer should be protected by bills like this one, not the major players, the processors or the grain handling system.

My colleague did a very good job on the other issue that is wrong with the bill. I wholeheartedly suggest to members across the way that if western Canada does not get a few fair shakes in some of these bills, maybe we will start seeing more grain moving to the south, which will be detrimental to the country.

I am a Canadian. I like rules and regulations that benefit Canadians, but my children and my neighbours' children who are farming need to survive and have a profit. If we do not start drawing up bills to protect the farming industry, we are in big trouble.

With that I will close my remarks and turn the debate over to someone else.

The Deputy Speaker: It being 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

THE CANADIAN BOUQUET

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, June 4, 1992, I informed the House of my constituent Mr. Michael Reynolds and his contribution to Canadian unity, "The Canadian Bouquet".

The painting is a collage of the provincial and territorial flowers of Canada. This picture of beauty and unity is symbolic of the greater unity of the people of Canada. A pledge of unity was also drafted and accompanied the nearly 25,000 prints sold to raise money for charity.

The pledge reads:

> We the people, for love of country and in recognition of 125 years of Canadian Confederation, make this pledge. Until the seasons cease to change, each new spring will bring forth the flowers of "The Canadian Bouquet" in a united Canada.

Today more than ever Canadians must reaffirm their commitment to the very best country in the world. This pledge and print aim to serve that purpose.

YOUTH ENTREPRENEURIAL PROGRAM

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, business and industry are the engines that drive economic growth in Canada. For this reason it is of utmost importance to encourage the traditional Canadian entrepreneurial spirit.

This week I was delighted to present awards to the winners of the youth entrepreneurial program in the Carleton—Charlotte region of New Brunswick. This program was sponsored by the Carleton Regional Development Commission in partnership with ACOA and the provincial department of advanced education and labour.

Eleven university students presented their options for new businesses and from these presentations, three winning business plans were selected.

I offer congratulations to the winners: Lisa Gionet, Nancy Martin and Simon MacInnis. I extend my appreciation to all participants and the organizers for the event.

There is a new confidence in Canada, and the government's jobs and growth strategy is working. The Canadian entrepreneurial spirit is alive and well once again.

HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Vancouver South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, December 10 is International Human Rights Day. I would ask all my colleagues to take some time tomorrow to remember the numerous areas of conflict around the world and the men, women and children who are victims of human rights abuses on a daily basis.

As parliamentarians, we have a responsibility to increase general awareness of human rights abuses occurring globally and raise these issues in the House.

I hope that in the coming new year all parliamentarians will continue to work together in bringing human rights violations to the forefront and in spreading the message that these violations are unacceptable.

Parliamentarians can make a difference when they collectively speak out on human rights no matter where they occur.

SOCIAL PROGRAM REFORM

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this morning I want to give you another example of flexible federalism or, rather, federalism which ignores the legitimate proposals of a group of students.

Yesterday, the students' federation of the University of Ottawa was invited by the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs to a public consultation on the social program reform. The minister remained silent throughout the hearings and did not take any notes. Moreover, the minister's assistant led students to believe that the discussion was being recorded. A verification revealed that no recording was made. This illustrates the federal government's real idea of what public consultation is.

Is this the kind of federalism that the government wants to propose to Quebecers and Canadians? Flexible federalism is nothing but federal indifference. The government is more interested in imposing its already set ideas than in discussing issues with the others concerned.

PRE–BUDGET CONSULTATION

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in a report tabled yesterday, Liberal members are paving the way for a new tax increase affecting all taxpayers, thus reneging on the election promise made by the Prime Minister not to raise taxes.

Besides recommending this possible surtax, the Liberal majority on the finance committee proposes to increase the tax burden of the middle class by imposing a new tax on gasoline and by giving the Minister of Finance full scope to tax RRSPs and pension funds in particular.

Moreover, by recommending additional cuts of $3.4 billion to social programs, the Liberal members on the finance committee confirm how despicable the Axworthy reform is, since it seeks to reduce the deficit on the backs of the unemployed, welfare recipients and students.

Faced with these unacceptable recommendations from the Liberals, the Bloc Quebecois, in a dissenting report, proposed ten progressive and specific recommendations to reduce the deficit and create jobs.

DRAFT BILL ON QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, during the debate on the Quebec referendum process, Bloc Quebecois members were quite surprised by the lack of historical perspective shown by Liberal members as a whole, and more particularly Quebec Liberal MPs.

While they all were quick to condemn the regional consultation process on the draft bill regarding sovereignty, calling it illegitimate and undemocratic, they conveniently forgot that, in 1981, there was no consultation and no referendum, in spite of the nearly unanimous opposition of the Quebec National Assembly to the new Constitution.

• (1105)

They also forgot that the Meech Lake Accord was rejected in 1990 without a referendum and that the parliamentary process leading to the Charlottetown Accord in 1993, which was unequivocally rejected by the people, was flawed.

Obviously, members opposite have a short memory. And yet they are the ones who took part in the unilateral patriation of the Constitution through an undemocratic process.

CHIROPRACTIC PROFESSION

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, 1995 marks the 100th anniversary of the founding of the chiropractic profession. Few people know that the study of this profession was founded by a Canadian, Mr. Daniel David Palmer, born at Port Perry, Ontario.

Today its practice is used worldwide. In fact many members of this Chamber, including myself, use its services.

I would like to extend to all members of this honourable profession a happy anniversary. I would also like to let them know that I share their disappointment over the decision of Canada Post not to commemorate this achievement in the medical area.

FIRST NATIONS SELF–GOVERNMENT

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Wednesday, December 7 was an important day in the history of Canada and our relationship with the First Nations people.

It was on this day that the dismantling agreement was signed by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and Grand Chief Phil Fontaine that heralds the beginning of self–government. I am pleased this initiative is taking place in my home province of Manitoba.

This agreement will give the First Nations the authority, the responsibility, and the accountability to govern their own affairs.

I was proud to attend this historical event, proud to be part of an initiative that represents co–operation, mutual respect and trust between the government and the First Nations of Canada.

I applaud the minister and the First Nations for their commitment to finding common ground on which self–government can be built in Manitoba and ultimately in Canada.

HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we celebrate the 46th anniversary of International Human Rights Day.

The world has since shown greater respect for freedom and human dignity. The Berlin wall has collapsed, the iron curtain has been lifted, apartheid has been abolished, and dictatorships have been overthrown.

At the same time we note with sorrow that citizens of other nations continue to live in oppression, or are forced to wage bloody wars to secure freedom.

We shall not despair. New tools for dialogue are emerging. Trade missions have built bridges of understanding and respect for one another. Canada is proud to have its International Centre for Human Rights. As a nation we should be proud of our leadership in this field, doing our utmost to promote peace and justice throughout the world to secure human dignity for all.

GOVERNMENT OF CANADA

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on November 29 a Manitoba Liberal member of Parliament stated in the House that the Liberal government cares about Canadians and cares about the economy.

Let me tell you about this caring government. This caring government continues to support the gold–plated pension plan while denying Manitoba cattle producers fair compensation for their depopulated herds. They spend $45 million needlessly backtracking grain and deny an FSAM II payment to an eligible farmer due to a postal mix–up.

This government provides crown corporation executives with $300,000 interest free loans while the Farm Credit Corporation forces farmers into receivership due to compounded interest.

To top it off, this caring government is talking of increasing gasoline taxes and taxing lottery winnings.

Care indeed. My foot.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Ted White (North Vancouver, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was recently visited in my constituency office by Barbara Mayer and Doreen Armitage, both of whom suffer from fibromyalgia, a chronic rheumatic disorder involving widespread pain and profound fatigue.

Headaches and irritable bowel are also among the approximately 35 other symptoms making diagnosis very difficult and complicating disability compensation claims for sufferers.

The degree of fibromyalgia can vary from very mild to extremely disabling. Doctors have no effective treatment and it is often difficult for patients to convince others of the true state of their health.

• (1110)

Two–thirds of the sufferers are women and up to 5 per cent of the population may be affected. Unfortunately it is only in recent years that the disease has started to receive attention so there is a serious lack of research funding.

For this reason I urge all members to do whatever they can, financially or otherwise, to support research initiatives connected with fibromyalgia.

NORTHERN TAX ALLOWANCE

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the solution to our growing debt is not to increase revenues but to reduce government expenditures.

Northerners use a greater percentage of their disposable income for the bare essentials of food, shelter and clothing than do Canadians living further south. Northerners must pay more for food because it has to be trucked over longer distances. They pay more for fuel to heat their homes over the longer, colder winters. They pay more for medical care and education when they send their children south to specialists or universities.

We know the Minister of Finance is looking for easy tax grabs to fund continued overspending. Although it does not begin to compensate for all the differences, the northern residence deduction helps offset some of these additional costs.

On behalf of all northerners I ask the Minister of Finance to carefully consider the positive impact this tax deduction has provided toward assisting northerners to meet their basic needs.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to express my thanks to the minister responsible for ACOA for the new course he is charting for Atlantic regional development.

The beginning of a Team Atlantic, the end of grants to business, and the focus on job creation are the solutions that Atlantic Canadians are searching for.

While the government is offering new direction, the hypocrisy and noise of members of the Reform Party shines through. In their desperate attempt to attack ACOA they have resorted to spurious innuendo, untruths and distortions not only on the agency's record but on ministers of the crown.

I say shame on the party that promised before the election to do politics differently. Some difference. In its usual way the Reform Party has resorted to American style smear campaigns. It just goes to show it is out of touch, out of mind and has nothing to offer Atlantic Canadians.

DECADE OF THE WORLD'S INDIGENOUS PEOPLE

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq, Lib.):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

[English]

Mr. Speaker, tomorrow Canada will welcome the start of the United Nations International Decade of the World's Indigenous People.

The goal of the decade is to strengthen international co–operation for the solution of problems faced by indigenous people around the world. Canada fully supports this goal and the theme of the decade: "Indigenous People: Partnership in Action".

The Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is co–ordinating the federal government's domestic efforts to mark this decade. Preliminary discussions have been held with aboriginal groups to obtain their views. A national conference is being organized for early in 1995 to set out Canada's preliminary action plan for the decade.

We look forward to the development of this plan as well as the development by the United Nations of a comprehensive world program of action.

I encourage everyone to support the goals of this important decade.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, one of my colleagues recently stood in the House and admitted that she was beaten by a man.

A member of the Reform Party tried to connect this to the tragic situation five years ago in Montreal at l'École polytechnique by saying: "Let's not bring disrespect to that day by trying to use it for an inappropriate political agenda".

What is more appropriate than women saying in the House and across the country that abuse against women and children is not acceptable and they are not going to stand for it?

What better testimony to these 14 young women than the courage of the women of Canada in the support of abolishment of abuse against women? What is more appropriate than members standing individually and collectively to abolish violence against women in this country?

TAXATION

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance keeps telling us that his government is ready to listen to Canadians.

Witnesses told the finance committee that Canadians are taxed out. Reform listened to this and recommended that there be no new taxes. The government members on the other hand recommended a billion dollar gasoline tax.

• (1115)

I am hard pressed to remember anyone who came before the committee and said to tax gasoline.

Canada's business, academic and opinion leaders appeared before the committee and said that 3 per cent is not enough. They said that we have to stomp out this deficit. We have to kill it before the next recession.

Reform heard the message and recommended the budget be balanced in three years. The Liberal members continued to stick with the 3 per cent target.

A fair question is who was really listening to Canadians? It certainly was not the government members.

As the Minister of Finance finalizes his plans for the next budget I can only hope that he listens better than his Liberal friends.

STATUS OF THE ARTIST ACT

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, on June 23, 1992 Bill C–7, an act respecting the status of the artist and professional relations between artists and producers in Canada, received royal assent.

The government repeatedly promises to reform social programs and the economy to meet the needs of the new economy. The Liberals say they are committed to restructuring and encouraging stable growth in the areas of self–employment and small business. Yet when it comes to action to implement a model to empower the self–employed worker the government has done nothing.

The legislative and regulatory approach in the Status of the Artist Act is nothing less than a crucial step and the foundation for this new self–employment based economy. The approach to labour relations in this act has the approval of the 2.3 million workers in the Canadian Labour Congress.

On Wednesday, more than two years after the law was enacted, more than 500 cultural workers rallied in Toronto to push the government for action. When will this government show its commitment to these small business entrepreneurs and the people who elected it?

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

DRAFT BILL ON QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday during the debate on the Official Opposition's motion to recognize the legitimacy of the process initiated by the Government of Quebec to determine its political future, government members repeatedly referred to Quebec's initiative as illegitimate, illegal and undemocratic, while during Question Period, the Prime Minister referred to it as raising unnecessary complications.

How can the Prime Minister refer to the process initiated by the Government of Quebec as raising unnecessary complications, when it is essentially based on two components, a draft bill and a very comprehensive process providing for genuine consultations with the people of Quebec?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in addition to the opposition in Quebec City, there is also the government right here, the federal Liberal Party, as well as a steadily increasingly number of people in Quebec who realize that this is not a normal process, that the dice are loaded and that 13 out of 15 committee members will be appointed by the government.

We have a "yes" committee, financed by a government that is not financing any "no" committees. They do not need any committees or studies. Let them ask an honest question, no stratagems to confuse people but an honest question: Do you want to separate from Canada, yes or no? Not more than two lines, and the answer will be clear: Canada will win!

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the Prime Minister question the process initiated by the Government of Quebec, a process initiated by tabling a draft bill, when a similar procedure was used in 1980 by the Liberal government of Pierre Trudeau which included the Prime Minister, a government that tabled a resolution in this House to initiate the unilateral patriation of the Canadian Constitution?

Why, when he was a member of that government, did the Prime Minister feel that tabling a resolution was acceptable, and why now, because the Government of Quebec is involved, does he no longer feel that this procedure is acceptable? Let him explain that, Mr. Speaker.

• (1120)
