Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are only asking them to be honest with the people. In 1980, all observers accused the government, and especially Mr. Morin, who was in charge of the step–by–step process, of hiding the question in a maze of 114 words.

The government's draft bill uses 1,645 words to try and hide the truth from Quebecers. The truth is, they are all separatists but do not want to be labelled as such. They are all for separation but say they support sovereignty. Be honest. Say what you are. Say you are separatists and want separation. The people will vote, and Canada will survive!

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is absolutely incredible to hear the Prime Minister criticize the Government of Quebec for setting out its plans for sovereignty in reasonable terms, when he and his colleagues keep saying in this House: Go ahead and tell us what your plans for separation are. Tell us what kind of Quebec you want. Tell us what kind of country you want. Today, however, the Prime Minister says: Make the question short. Do not bother to explain.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier: If the Prime Minister takes this matter seriously, he will have to answer this question: How can the he question the legitimacy of the consultation process, when it is basically the same one used by the Bélanger–Campeau Commission that was set up by the previous Liberal government, a process in which the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs was a participant? It was all right for the Bélanger–Campeau Commission at the time, but not any more.

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, turning up the volume does not make it a good question.

Mr. Speaker, when appointing the Bélanger–Campeau Commission, the leader of the government at the time consulted the opposition. Everyone was fairly represented. It was not 13 against 2.

Second, among the statements in the 1,645 words the draft bill contains, one says there will be an economic union with Canada. That is not up to Quebec to decide. Canada will decide. It says they will keep their Canadian citizenship. This is not up to the Government of Quebec to decide. The Parliament of Canada will decide. It says they will use Canadian currency. The Parliament of Canada will determine interest rates, not the Government of Quebec.

So in a bill like this one where all the decisions will be made elsewhere, people should at least have a say, before concluding that one can become independent and stay in Canada at the same time.

I am glad to see there has been some progress. This is the first time the word separation was used by the hon. member for Roberval. Bravo. At last the truth is out.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): I too, Mr. Speaker, have a question for the Prime Minister.

The referendum debate has been initiated and the people of Quebec will soon be deciding their future democratically. In his autobiography, the Prime Minister says that he and others like him are betting on democracy, that they will set out to convince the people of Quebec to remain within Canada and win, and if they are not successful in their attempt, they will abide by the wishes of the people and go along with the separation.

Does the Prime Minister still stand by what he said in his biography and does he still recognize that the people of Quebec have the right to leave the Canadian federation if such is the democratic choice they make in a referendum?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I made myself quite clear: all we want is that a referendum be held as soon as possible, with a plain and clear question.

• (1125)

We all know what is going to happen. That is why they are trying to dilute their proposal with 1,600 words, when the honest question to ask would be: "Do you want to separate from Canada, yes or no?"

I do not even have to answer a hypothetical question. There is no doubt in my mind that Canada will win. Come on!

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is three questions behind answering mine.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Debien: Contrary to what the Prime Minister thinks, and considering that the consultation process gives the people of Quebec every chance to express their views not only on the content of the political proposal, but also on the referendum question, does the Prime Minister not recognize their right to decide themselves the wording of the question that they will have to answer in the referendum on their political future?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Quebec federalists have the right to have a say in the wording of the question, so that it is plain and clear. The rest of Canada is also entitled to a question that is plain and clear.

Just think of the number of people who are presently refusing to participate because of the ambiguity, the trickiness; they are trying to trick people, they are using gimmicks. The Conseil du patronat, the Quebec chamber of commerce, the Quebec farmers' union, the Quebec manufacturers' association, and every federalist party in Quebec—and even Mario Dumont—do not want to participate because they do not want gimmicks, they want the truth, period.

TAXATION

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Finance committee report which was tabled Thursday contains a number of proposals and recommendations for possible tax increases, taxes on gasoline, on lottery winnings, on businesses and on cigarettes.

The deficit reduction surtax that is introduced would hit everyone who lives and breathes. Just to make good and sure that the report did not miss anybody the committee suggested going after dead people too by introducing an inheritance tax.

Will the Minister of Finance distance himself from this grab bag of potential taxation measures and commit to tabling a budget which does not increase taxation?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that I will not comment on individual suggestions. He also knows that the government's budget will come down when it presents the budget.

I would like to take this occasion to congratulate all members of the finance committee. They heard over 650 witnesses. I would like to also congratulate the witnesses who came forth and testified. I believe that the majority report will provide a very valuable contribution to the debate. An enormous amount of work went into it.

I would like to congratulate our members on our side of the House. At the same time I would like to compliment the members of the opposition and the third party who put a great deal of work into their efforts. I assure members I will look at each and every suggestion.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, we appreciate the minister's comments with regard to the process. In that Liberal majority report there is a very important item. There is an indication that we could potentially have a $1 billion tax grab by an increase on gasoline taxes.

One of the comments he raised as a challenge to the committee was when he said in determining which areas of the tax system should be scrutinized more closely, several principles have been adopted. Initiative should help make the economy more efficient. Initiative should improve the fairness of the system and broadening the tax base is preferable to rate increases.

Does the proposed gasoline tax satisfy any one of these three principles?

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): He was a minister. That is why his questions often make sense, unlike the vast majority of his colleagues.

• (1130)

I think what the committee attempted to do was really deal with the unfortunate fact that when a government makes cuts, as the member will know from his previous experience, those cuts do not show up immediately, there is a lag time which must be taken into account.

What was said in the report is that therefore certain tax actions may well be required. That is part of the balance and it is obviously the kind of thing the Minister of Finance and the government will have to take into account.

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, one of those potential tax measures that may have to be taken in light of what the minister said is the deficit reduction surtax that could be used in an emergency contingency arrangement.

As Reformers we believe that if there is any kind of a contingency plan in place it should be for expenditure reduction, not for tax increases.

My question to the Minister of Finance is, having heard the anti–tax sentiment of a majority of the witnesses who appeared before the finance committee, can he support at this time increasing taxes in any way on every single Canadian before one dime is cut from the government's $1 billion boccie, incorporated infrastructure program as an example?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I understand, the members of the third party are going to be submitting their suggestions as to that whole segment of government spending that has not been dealt with yet in their report.

I hope when they do that they will deal first with the impact of those particular cuts. I also hope that in terms of both segments of their report they will deal with the timing as to when the cuts will take place so that it can be dealt with on a rational basis.

The member is nodding. I am sure they will do that and I look forward to receiving that report.

In terms of the infrastructure program, having gone across this country, having talked to mayors in municipalities across this country and to all the Canadians who went back to work and seeing the effect on productivity of the very important reports, that infrastructure program is an essential part of the Canadian recovery.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General.

Several months ago, the Solicitor General asked the Security Intelligence Review Committee to look into the allegations involving Grant Bristow when he worked at CSIS. Mr. Bristow is accused, among other things, of creating the Heritage Front and of inciting its members to racist violence.

Does the Solicitor General promise to table the review committee's report on the Bristow affair with the Parliamentary Committee on National Security before we adjourn for the holiday season?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I just received SIRC's report this morning. It is a very bulky report. I must review it and see what I can do about making it public in the light of the relevant legislation. I intend to make public as much of this report as possible, and I will make the necessary decisions as soon as possible.

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Douglas Christie, a B.C. lawyer who defended members of the extreme right in 1989, has accused CSIS of inciting violence against Jews and of interfering in his clients' trials.

Can the Solicitor General tell us if the recent investigation by the review committee also dealt with Mr. Christie's accusations?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I just received the report about an hour ago. I did not have time to review it. However, I think that SIRC knew about Mr. Christie's allegations and I look forward to reviewing this report because, as I just said, I intend to make public as much of it as possible.

[English]

Earlier this morning I received the report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee on the allegations involving the Heritage Front. It is a very comprehensive and bulky report. I have not had time to review it. I intend to do this as quickly as possible. Once I complete this review I will be able to make decisions about how much can be made public in the light of the relevant legislation.

It is my intention to make as much of this report public as possible because of the interest in its contents, as much as I can in the light of the legislation that deals with this matter.

IMMIGRATION AND REFUGEE BOARD

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it was announced about an hour ago that Mr. Schelew, vice–chair of the Immigration and Refugee Board, had chosen to resign rather than face a judicial inquiry into his conduct. Government counsel accepted his resignation and recommended to the judge that the inquiry be halted immediately, saying that no public interest would be served by pursuing this matter further.

Given the allegations of widespread irregularities in the IRB, why did the justice minister not recommend that the inquiry be expanded to include the entire operations of the IRB and what led to this investigation in the first place?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will understand that the inquiry was directed under a section of the citizenship and immigration act which defines the proper ambit of the inquiry.

Under that section a judge appointed for that purpose is directed to inquire only into the allegations with respect to a particular member of the board and is confined to making recommendations with respect to what should happen as a consequence of any findings. That is by statute. The terms of reference for the judge in question were dictated by statute and were provided accordingly.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Immigration and Refugee Board has lost its legitimacy and credibility. I ask the minister again, in light of what he just said, given that inquiry is done with, will he now order a new inquiry to continue to get to the bottom of the allegations of impropriety in the IRB? If not, why not?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the premise of the hon. member's question is completely untrue. The legitimacy and the integrity of the board are not in question in these proceedings.

As to the broader question, this government has confidence in the process. In the final analysis it will be up to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration to come to his own conclusion about the broader matter which has been raised here today.

INCOME TAX

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in the finance committee's report, the Liberal majority suggests that the Minister of Finance increase the tax burden on all Canadian taxpayers by levying new taxes, including a temporary surtax which alone could raise at least over a billion dollars for the federal treasury.

Can the Minister of Finance promise in this House to reject any proposal for new taxes or charges that would affect mainly the middle class, including this ridiculous idea of a surtax?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I just said, I repeat that I promise to read and consider carefully the suggestions in the majority report. I also intend to read the minority reports from the Bloc Quebecois and the Reform Party.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, why does the minister not immediately rule out these suggestions for new taxes and why does he not make a solemn commitment to immediately attack the real issues, namely family trusts, tax shelters, the $6 billion in unpaid taxes, waste and duplication? That is what people came to tell the finance committee. They did not come to say to raise taxes, to cut social programs further, to attack the unemployed, the poor, students and seniors. Had he been there, he would have understood right away.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member knows very well that in our last budget, we closed a great many loopholes and I must say that we really began to act in many fields, even on the suggestions which the member just mentioned.

That being said, I read the Bloc's report carefully and perhaps I would like to ask a question myself, Mr. Speaker. I definitely noted that the Bloc picked up Richard Le Hir's suggestion about $3 billion in duplication and overlap. Am I to understand now that Richard Le Hir is the big economic thinker for the separatist movement in Canada?

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, on Wednesday the Minister of Justice dismissed opposition from provincial justice ministers saying: "We govern by what is right". Reformers are getting calls from the police on the street saying that registration will not work.

If the minister will not listen, why is he consulting? Is his only justification for the registration of 10 million to 20 million firearms that he and the Liberal cabinet think it is right? Can he tell Canadians why he is ignoring such convincing and credible opposition to his proposals?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the first place the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police has been asking for this measure for the last dozen years.

The other point may explain why the hon. member is receiving complaints. Last night I received a petition from a colleague of the hon. member in his party, a petition signed by people who oppose registration and other features. The petition decried government legislation that would ban rifles and shotguns, impose a $100 per gun registration fee and put limits on the amount of ammunition that will be available for sale. Those have nothing whatever to do with the proposals that we have put before this House. I would sign that petition.

I am here to say that people should be honest with the Canadian people about what these proposals are all about.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, if this government would come clean and explain exactly what registration is all about and what it would accomplish, we would not have these difficulties.

The chief inspector and registrar of firearms in the state of Victoria in Australia recommended that its firearms registration be abolished after three years of trial in the 1980s because it did not control the criminal misuse and irresponsible use of firearms. If that were clearly communicated we would not have this problem.

Does the minister have measurable objectives and what will he do when his registration system fails to reduce violent crimes? Will he abolish it like Australia did, or will he ban even more guns and place more restrictions on law–abiding, responsible gun owners?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, when Canadians want advice with respect to their health they consult doctors. When we want to know how to reduce the crime rate in this country we speak to the police. The police in Canada, not in Australia, have for a dozen years been asking this government for gun registration. I suggest we take the advice of the experts and put registration in place.

BOSNIA

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question was for the Prime Minister, but I will put it to the Deputy Prime Minister.

While the international community continues to drag its feet regarding the measures required to bring Bosnian Serbs to their senses, and now threatens to withdraw its peacekeepers, Canada does not seem to be making a significant contribution to the peace process. Yet, the Minister of National Defence clearly said that it was a shame that Canada was not part of the contact group, adding that he hoped the Prime Minister would raise this issue in Budapest.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell us if the Prime Minister raised this issue in Budapest, and will she confirm that Canada is still not part of the contact group?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during his visit to the CSE conference in Budapest, the Prime Minister had a number of bilateral meetings with leaders from many countries, including those of the contact group.

We have been assured that our views are being fully heard by the members of that particular group and that our input is valued. I think that goes some way to addressing the concerns that I outlined last week.

[Translation]

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, are we to understand from the minister's answer that Canada is still a powerless actor and is content to be a mere onlooker, at a time when negotiations are deadlocked? Is it not time for the Canadian government to propose concrete solutions to convince the Bosnian Serbs to accept a peace plan?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, events of the last week have shown that the efforts to achieve peace in the former Yugoslavia have broadened beyond any five countries that are now in the contact group. A number of countries are involved. I think the statements made by the Prime Minister publicly and the representations made by the Minister of Foreign Affairs and the Prime Minister privately should assure Canadians that Canada's voice is being heard.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Glen McKinnon (Brandon—Souris, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development has asked that an environmental assessment panel be appointed to conduct a public review in the Lac de Gras area of the Northwest Territories. The proposed review would focus on the environmental and socioeconomic effects associated with the BHP Minerals Canada Ltd. diamond mine.

Would the minister please tell the House when this panel will be appointed?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the question from the member for Brandon—Souris. I wish to inform the House that earlier today I announced the appointment of a four person independent panel to conduct a full public review of the BHP diamond mine proposal.

The panel will start its organizational work immediately. It will make sure that all interested groups, individuals, parties and organizations will be provided with the opportunity to participate. It will ensure that any decisions on the BHP proposal are only made after a full open and fair consultation and consideration of environmental and socioeconomic effects.

Mr. Hugh Hanrahan (Edmonton—Strathcona, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Liberals have stood in this House and repeatedly stated that after an intense and lengthy consultation process they have compiled a list of handguns, the primary use of which could only be in the form of criminal activity.

My question is for the Minister of Justice. How is it possible that the Shooting Federation of Canada that facilitates the rules and regulations of this type of firearm to be utilized in shooting competitions like the PanAm games and the Olympics was never consulted by anyone from this Liberal government over the practicality of banning these types of firearms?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I met with representatives of that federation on more than one occasion. The most recent meeting was in my office here in Ottawa within the last six weeks.

Second, all of the international legitimate competitions using handguns were considered. The conclusion to which we came was not that the handguns proposed to be banned are primarily used in crime as the hon. member stated. We concluded that the handguns proposed to be banned are not used in legitimate competition. If they have no legitimate use then the logical question is: Why are they in the hands of Canadians?

Mr. Hugh Hanrahan (Edmonton—Strathcona, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when we telephoned the organization in question it said it was never consulted. It also suggested that because this particular gun is used by many people in the Olympics and in the PanAm games this puts the PanAm games in jeopardy because a full length of programs cannot be offered.

Could the minister comment on the validity of those statements?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would be happy to speak with the hon. member and tell him about the particulars of my meetings with the shooting federation.

The hon. member did not mention a particular handgun in the course of his question, but if he has a specific calibre or model of handgun in mind I would be happy to discuss it.

I can say there is a handgun which is specially registered. A .22–.32 calibre interchangeable barrel is used in international competition. We have already made it clear that firearm will be permissible because it is indeed used in that sort of competition.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. A few weeks after the Prime Minister's pompous economic mission to Asia, it is important to bring up the sad story of Tran Trieu Quan, a Canadian businessman held prisoner in Hanoi for over eight months without any charges being laid against him. This case could help us better understand the new attitude of a government that considers respect for human rights less important than trade relations.

Are we to understand that if the Prime Minister took such a timid stand for human rights in Asia, it was because of his inability to protect the fundamental rights of this Canadian prisoner in Vietnam?

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I want to thank the hon. member for raising this very importance issue. I want to assure him that the Canadian government has raised the issue on several occasions, not only with the Vietnamese government, with whom we have had further talks, but also with various organizations such as the United Nations.

I have noted his question and will get back to him as soon as possible, on this specific case.

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, seeing that the Canadian government is unable to resolve the Quan case and obtain guarantees for the safety of Canadian businesspeople, how can the Deputy Prime Minister pretend that business executives will accept such risks in their future trade relations with Asia?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of International Trade explained quite clearly, the Prime Minister himself raised the issue when he was in Vietnam and he is pursuing the matter.

That being said, it should be emphasized, as indeed we did before the Prime Minister's Asian tour, that I have personally reviewed every comment made by the Premier of Quebec when he was the host of the governor of a Chinese province and, each time, he adopted the same policy as the Government of Canada.

He stressed the issue intensely in private, but did not make public statements. The Premier of Quebec never made any public statement on human rights in China.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the hon. Minister of Justice.

The Minister of Justice has stated that any new firearms legislation will apply equally to all Canadians. On the other hand, the Minister of Justice and the government have also made assurances that special gun control provisions will apply to Indians living in self–governed areas of Canada.

Will the Minister of Justice today clear the air and tell this House if the government indeed is considering special firearms provisions for Canadian Indians?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can say in response that we emphasized in the material tabled last week that there will be principles which govern firearms in Canada. They will be universal, invariable and will apply to all. We also emphasized that in their application we shall demonstrate a flexibility which reflects the unique circumstances in various regions of this country, including aboriginal communities where for example some people hunt for sustenance.

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, just as background, Bill C–34 permits self–governing bands in the Yukon to control or prohibit the possession and use of firearms. On October 4 the hon. Minister of Justice did say he would consider special legislation and will show respect to the Indian nations. Canadians are confused about the justification of statements like this when they consider themselves as responsible firearm owners as anyone else in the country.

Would the minister clarify the issue today and tell Canadians if there will in fact be equality in the application of the new firearms legislation, or will special legislation regarding the use of firearms be extended to Canadian Indians in Canada?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the principles will be universal and invariable.

I visited the Northwest Territories to speak to the residents about firearms. I visited a remote community and was told that there are eight official languages in that territory, 75 small communities, some of them hours apart. It became clear to me, as it should be to all of us, that the universal principles in their application to such communities must be flexible. We are not proposing special legislation but flexibility in the application of universal principles to the reality of local circumstances.

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Georgette Sheridan (Saskatoon—Humboldt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Yesterday Canadians were distressed by reports in the Toronto Sun that the department of immigration is browsing for technology to produce the new permanent resident's card in the United States. Say it ain't so. C'est incroyable. Surely it cannot be true that our hon. minister has become a cross–border shopper.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rush to reassure the hon. member that it ain't so. Indeed the minister is not only not cross–border shopping, he has been browsing and shopping where he should, in Canada.

Two contracts have already been issued to Canadian companies. The first was awarded to Datacard Canada Inc. of Mississauga in the amount of $3,209,714 over a three year period. The other was awarded to Security Card Systems Inc. of Markham, Ontario in the amount of $1,608,500 over a three year period. I thank the hon. member for the chance to clear up this base canard.

GLIDING SCHOOL

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence.

In September, cadet staff asked for a feasibility study on moving the Saint–Honoré gliding school in the Saguenay region to Saint–Jean. At a meeting on Wednesday, cadet leadership confirmed to me and to the safeguard committee that the requested study had been completed and that it could be sent to us if permission was given.

Since a decision on this move must be made in the next few days, can the minister declare an appropriate moratorium, ask the department to provide a second assessment of the two sites, especially with respect to safety, from the Department of Transport so that the best possible decision can be made, and have the feasibility study sent to us?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the specific case the hon. member has outlined this morning. I will certainly get him the details.

The hon. member should know that as a result of the white paper, with the reduction of the reserves from 29,000 to 23,000 there will be some major changes as to how the reserves work in Canada. This may affect a number of communities across the country.

No decisions have been taken. We are working on a plan of action to be fair to the cadet movement which we want to enhance and also to the reserves in general. Certainly we believe decisions that are taken must make operational sense.

I will get an answer for the hon. member and will communicate with him directly.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, domestic violence is a serious problem in need of remedy, but increased gun control is not the answer. Less than half of all spousal homicides are committed with guns, whether they are registered or not. Domestic violence has been studied for over 20 years. It has been studied to death and there has been no action.

My question is for the justice minister. What specific plan does he have to address the root causes of domestic violence other than ineffective gun registration?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, every six days a woman is shot to death in this country. Seventy–five per cent of the female victims of homicide are killed in their home by somebody they know. By a margin of two to one the weapon of choice for such murders is a firearm. In 80 per cent of those cases that firearm is a rifle or shotgun legally owned. I cannot accept the premise of this question that gun control does not at least in part address the tragedy of domestic violence.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice on the eve of International Human Rights Day.

• (1200)

For over eight years, since March 1986, a series of justice ministers have stood in the House and solemnly affirmed their deep commitment to amend the human rights act to end discrimination based on sexual orientation.

In view of the fact that this minister has promised repeatedly to table this amendment by the end of the year, this month, how does he explain to lesbians and gay men that he may join previous Conservative ministers in breaking this promise and giving in to the Neanderthal McTeague 46 in his own caucus.

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I regret the hon. member's reference to the Liberal caucus. The commitment of the government to the implementation of that amendment is unquestioned.

Just the other day in the House I had the opportunity to reaffirm it. The Prime Minister, the deputy Prime Minister and this party stand firm with that commitment.

As I also said the other day, the question of timing is not the one that should be central. The question is one of principle and on that we are firm.

BAUSCH AND LOMB

Mr. John Godfrey (Don Valley West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, recent newspaper articles state that the company Bausch and Lomb has been misleading buyers of contact lenses. It appears that the company's short, medium and long term use contact lenses sell for $10 for the short term to $200 for the long term. The problem is they are all the same contact lens.

What can the Minister of Industry do to protect consumers against such deceptive marketing practices?

Hon. John Manley (Minister of Industry, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first may I assure the member that I am very concerned with the published reports that were in the newspaper this week.

I have been advised that the Ontario College of Opticians is ensuring that their customers are aware of this. It is important that opticians make sure their customers see clearly the difference between these types of lenses and their cost.

The bureau of competition policy, which administers the laws with respect to misleading advertising, dealt with over 10,000 complaints of various sorts last year. As yet it has not received a complaint concerning this matter. They are very attentive to the situation and will deal with it accordingly.

I also have the honour to table the 54th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs on how to promote more direct involvement by citizens. This report is a follow–up to the order of reference tabled in this House on February 7, 1994.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I rose during the item of presentation of Private Members' Bills. I have a bill.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to revert to presentation of Private Members' Bills?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Robinson: Mr. Speaker, I have given notice to the table that I seek to introduce a bill that would repeal the provisions of the Criminal Code in section 43.

• (1205)

The Deputy Speaker: If members will be kind enough to give us a moment, we will get the correct forms.

PETITIONS

SERIAL KILLER BOARD GAME

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have several petitions I wish to table this morning. The first one is a petition signed by a group of Canadians asking that the serial killer board game be banned.

With this new tabling today, the total number of petitioners is now 118,756.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition signed by 861 people who would like to state their disagreement with any provision to remove portions of the Criminal Code that would permit assisted suicide.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions from Canadians asking that Canada not consider amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions urging Canadians to set aside their differences and to work toward the betterment of the economy and the future of all Canadians.

ABORTION

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of petitions asking that abortions not be permitted in Canada. These are Canadians living in the province of Nova Scotia.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the next petition is from residents also living in Cape Breton. These Canadians ask that Parliament not permit the aiding and abetting of suicide or any other form of euthanasia.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): My final petition, Mr. Speaker, is also from people in Sydney, Nova Scotia. They do not wish to see the phrase sexual orientation included in the Canadian Human Rights Act.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am tabling three petitions on behalf of residents in the riding of Carleton—Gloucester.

[English]

The first petition calls for Parliament to ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be retained without changes and enforced in order that Parliament not sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or euthanasia.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition asks that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the last petition, which was circulated by Mrs. Rita Curley and others, calls for Parliament to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

TOBACCO PRODUCTS

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have a large number of petitions from the Northwest Territories, Ontario, Manitoba and Alberta.

The petitioners note that tobacco products are clearly linked to many forms of cancer, heart disease, stroke, emphysema, chronic bronchitis and many other illnesses; that the use of tobacco products is responsible for the premature death of some 38,000 Canadians annually, and therefore that tobacco can rightly be termed a hazardous product.

The petitioners call on Parliament to remove the exemption for tobacco under the Hazardous Products Act.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have several petitions to present this afternoon. The first petition asks that the protection enjoyed by born human beings be extended to unborn human beings.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition deals with assisted suicide.

• (1210)

The petitioners ask that the prohibition of assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

WITNESS PROTECTION PROGRAM

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition has to do with the witness protection act. The petitioners pray that Parliament enact Bill C–206 at the earliest opportunity to provide the statutory foundation for a national witness relocation and protection program.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the fourth petition deals with not allowing the amending of the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

Mr. Werner Schmidt (Okanagan Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, finally, petitioners request that Parliament refuse to accept the anti–firearms proposal of the Minister of Justice and insist that he bring forward legislation to convict and punish criminals rather than persecute the innocent.

The last petition represents a number of constituencies, including some petitioners from Okanagan Centre. The other four petitions are all from constituents of Okanagan Centre.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Glen McKinnon (Brandon—Souris, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36. I have the honour and privilege to table three petitions duly certified by the clerk of petitions and signed by constituents of Brandon—Souris.

The petitioners pray and request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act, or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Glen McKinnon (Brandon—Souris, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, certain petitioners of Brandon—Souris pray that Parliament enact legislation providing for a referendum of the people to accept or reject two official languages, English and French, for the government and the people of Canada.

SERVICE CLUBS

Mr. Glen McKinnon (Brandon—Souris, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the signatories of the third petition recognize that with cutbacks to services to communities, families and individuals in order to balance budgets, more than ever there is a need for service clubs in all communities.

In recent years memberships of service clubs throughout the country have been declining. In these times of monetary restraint service clubs would find it easier to recruit new members if the financial factor could be alleviated.

The Brandon—Souris petitioners pray that Parliament act immediately to amend the Income Tax Act, allowing the members to deduct their membership dues from their taxable income in the same manner as union and professional dues.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. John Godfrey (Don Valley West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to present a petition this morning asking Parliament to act quickly to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and to adopt all necessary measures to recognize the full equality of same sex relationships in federal law. It has my support.

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to rise today to present a petition with over 1,000 signatures from my constituents who pray that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian

Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or homosexuality.

I concur with the petition.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present five petitions dealing with the subject of doctor assisted suicide.

The petitioners are opposed to any legislation that would permit doctor assisted suicide because it demeans the value of human life.

Therefore the petitioners call on Parliament not to enact any legislation that would allow doctor assisted suicide.

EUTHANASIA

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition which is signed by petitioners from my constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway including the Seton Villa seniors residence as well as residents of Port Moody—Coquitlam and a number of other constituencies.

The petition calls on Parliament to amend the Criminal Code to ensure the right of all Canadians to die with dignity by allowing people with terminal or irreversible and debilitating illnesses the right to the assistance of a physician in ending their lives at a time of their choice, subject to strict safeguards to prevent abuse and to ensure that the decision is free, informed, competent and voluntary.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of citizens of Winnipeg North Centre and elsewhere in Winnipeg I wish to present the following petition.

We the undersigned citizens of Canada draw the attention of the House to the following—

The Deputy Speaker: Order. The member will know that we do not encourage the reading of petitions. Please give a summary of it rather than read the wording.

• (1215)

Mr. Walker: Mr. Speaker, it deals with the decriminalization of assisted suicide or legalizing euthanasia and asks that Parliament continue to reject euthanasia and physician assisted suicide in Canada.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have three sets of petitions to present.

The first one deals with the Young Offenders Act. The 44 petitioners ask that Parliament review and revise our laws concerning young offenders by empowering the courts to prosecute and punish young law breakers who are terrorizing society.

SPOUSAL COMPENSATION

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from 33 petitioners. It is with regard to spouses at home and is in response to the private member's bill of my colleague from Mississauga South which asks that we compensate spouses working in the home and caring for preschool children.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): The third petition has 57 signatures and is presented by Mr. Norman of Nepean. It is on assisted suicide.

It asks that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise to present a petition from residents of Halifax West. They request that Parliament not amend the human rights legislation to include the phrase sexual orientation.

The Deputy Speaker: We will now revert to Private Member's Bills for which unanimous consent was given earlier.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway, NDP) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–296 , an act to amend the Criminal Code (protection of children).

He said: Mr. Speaker, I thank members of the House for their consent to introduce the bill at this time.

The purpose of the bill is to repeal section 43 of the Criminal Code allowing corporal punishment of children by parents and teachers.

Condoning corporal punishment can lead to physical and psychological injury and death of children, contributes to violence in society, and is contrary to both the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child.

Section 43 allows punishment causing bruising and contusions. It allows children to be struck with belts and other objects. It is the relic of a bygone age and has no place in a democratic society that respects and values children.

Finally I would urge the section be repealed as part of the recodification of the general part of the Criminal Code. Several European countries have ended the legal approval of corporal punishment. I urge our government to uphold the rights of children and repeal this harmful and discriminatory section of the Criminal Code of Canada.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Mac Harb (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would ask that all the questions be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Shall all the questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CANADA GRAIN ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–51, an act to amend the Canada Grain Act and respecting certain regulations made pursuant to that act, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to speak to third reading of Bill C–51, the Canada Grain Act amendments. At the same time I express to the minister of agriculture my continuing support for the Canadian Wheat Board. I point out to him, as I know he is aware, the results of the recent wheat board advisory committee elections.

The minister must know by now that wheat board supporters won 10 of 11 seats, or perhaps I should say the supporters of dual marketing lost all but 1 of 11 seats up for election. As far as farmers and grain marketing are concerned it would appear that farmers think the Canadian Wheat Board is doing a fine job of marketing western grain and want it to continue doing a successful job.

It is incumbent upon the government to accept the wishes of the western farmer as expressed by this vote, which was virtually a referendum on the issue of the future of the Canadian Wheat Board, and begin issuing statements in support of the board.

This week in the House of Commons the minister of agriculture was given the opportunity to congratulate the elected members of the advisory board and to declare his personal support for the work of the board. Instead, he chose to repeat the line that he must continue consulting with farmers.

Let me quote the minister from the December 7 edition of Hansard, as reported at page 8784. He said:

> I do not think it would be fair to say that the vote is the be all and the end all. I do not think it would be fair to say it is the absolute last and ultimate word. It is one very important piece of evidence which is clearly supportive of the Canadian Wheat Board.

I appreciate the acknowledgement of the evidence in front of the minister, but I believe the minister must accept the wishes put before him. Therefore I say the consultation must now be concluded. Farmers have had the best opportunity they will ever have to declare support for the board and they have taken it. They support the board. They have demonstrated they support the board. The minister must not now only acknowledge it; he must act on it.

Today, however, we must also deal with the government's amendments to the Canada Grain Act. I express my support for the act and the amendments before us today, although there are additional amendments that could be made to further strengthen the act and how it applies to farmers.

Basically the latest changes in the grain act were proposed in response to changing industry conditions and as a result of producer group recommendations. They also reflect the findings of the federal government's 1992–93 regulatory review that supported deregulation and a more market responsive grain industry, a review I have taken some issue with.

Primary producers are becoming increasingly vulnerable to exploitation by various trading interests as protective legislation is systematically deregulated. Deregulation represents the transfer of power from the public to the private sector. A loss of public power means a loss of sovereignty, a loss of opportunity for redress when something goes wrong. The more deregulated the industry the more vulnerable we become and therefore ironically the more regulated we need to be. What a situation.

As members are aware the Canada Grain Act is administered by a special operating agency, the Canadian Grain Commission. Its services are provided to clients on a cost recovery basis. It is responsible for establishing and maintaining grain quality and for regulating the grain handling system.

The bill before us is designed to deregulate elevator operation charges, provide more flexibility to producers in moving their grain, and tighten licensing and liability provisions. It gives grain producers the primary responsibility for securing payment for their grain shipments from elevator operators and grain dealers licensed by the commission. It also imposes greater responsibility on licensees of the commission for making such payments.

According to some who have studied the bill, it attempts to find a balance between promoting competitiveness and at the same time maintaining quality. On the one hand, in attempting to streamline the inspection process the amendments reduce the regulatory power of the grain commission. On the other hand, the grain commission is able to prescribe more activities in its role of protecting producers and grain quality. The grains industry in Canada has a long and arduous history.

The bill in front of us is the latest in a long list of amendments that have come before parliamentarians over the years in many different attempts to improve the movement and storage of grain.

For the record it is important for us to take a look at that history. Members of the House may find it interesting to note that the need for legislation was first recognized by a private member of the House and first presented as a private member's bill in 1898. Farmers represented a great power in the House of Commons at that time. When the private elevator companies were accused of cheating in weighing, grading and deducting for weed seeds, discriminating as to whose grain they accepted and of price fixing, it did not take long for Parliament to act.

A royal commission was appointed in 1900. Later that year, on the eve of a general election, Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government enacted a majority of the commission's recommendations. The 1900 Manitoba Grain Act established a grain commission to license elevators, to bond elevator agents and grain buyers, to approve handling tariffs, to inspect records and to settle disputes.

Is it not interesting that the need to regulate came at a time when the grain trade was dominated by competition from many grain companies growing like crazy and operating in a completely unregulated marketplace?

Deregulation is a direction the previous Tory government wanted us to take and it seems to be the direction the current government wants to continue. However it is a direction fraught with danger and all of us must proceed with a great deal of care.

The first amendments to the Manitoba Grain Act came in 1902 in response not only to a good crop but to apparent blackmail from the railways that were not supplying grain cars to the elevators for the movement of grain.

Another royal commission was called in 1906 in response to allegations against the grain companies. This commission verified the allegations and recommended 50 additional amendments to the act. These amendments include making elevator companies liable for damages for weight frauds, requiring samples of all bins to prevent grading fraud, paying farmers for the commercial value of screenings, and authorizing the grain commissioner to order equitable distribution of cars and to dismiss agents for fraudulent practices.

Then again in 1908 Parliament gave the grain commission full control of the cleaning, binning and shipping of grain from the terminals and the power to inspect terminal records and receipts.

The point of all this is that in the unfettered marketplace of the past farmers were being exploited or taken advantage of every time they turned around. If there is anything to be learned from our history, it is that farmers standing together with the help of their elected officials ensured that they received better and fairer treatment from the corporations then dominating the marketplace.

In continuing to look at our history we see that the farmers' need to take on the elevator companies and the railroads did not end in 1908. There were more amendments in 1912 and again in 1919 after the war when complaints over the handling and purchasing of grain again resurfaced.

Another royal commission was established in 1921 because the complaints against the corporation persisted. More changes were made and finally in 1930 things stabilized. The Canada Grain Act continues to be the basis of Canada's reputation in the world wheat market as a supplier of reliable, clean and consistently graded grain.

However, the political and economic struggle over grains did not end with the Canada Grain Act. The same forces which worked for greater farmer control in handling, storage and transportation also worked for control and fairness in marketing. The Prairie Co–Operative Pools were created in the 1920s and, finally, in 1949 the Canadian Wheat Board was formalized with monopoly control over marketing of western wheat, oats and barley.

Whatever changes are considered to the way in which grain is treated, it is very important to review history and take only those steps that acknowledge the lessons learned along the way.

Today in agriculture there are numerous changes taking place not only within Canada but around the world. The government we are facing seems to be pushing farmers again into a world of a more market oriented privatized industry where the corporations dominate and the farmers must compete not only against other countries but against themselves to participate in the marketplace.

In our fights to maintain a vision of a strong agricultural community with populated and productive rural areas, we find ourselves having to give up those things which make us strong.

• (1230)

The Crow benefit is under attack. The Canadian Wheat Board is under attack and certain protections offered by the Canadian Grain Commission are being discussed.

Just as in 1898 the farmers of Canada and the communities they support today need the support of the Parliament of Canada to ensure they are, each and every one, treated fairly in the marketplace.

There is a tremendous opportunity in the world today both for the export of bulk quality Canadian grain and in the process or value added sector. Canadian producers have to remain in the game through whatever tough times we have to face in order to be here when those opportunities come knocking at our door.

I urge the minister of agriculture to ensure Canadian farmers remain in the game. Give us the opportunities we need to stay on the farm, to reap the rewards of the opportunities coming our way in the future. Give us the opportunity to continue to ship to port under the terms of the Crow benefit. Give us the opportunity to continue marketing our grain under enhanced, not reduced, powers of the Canadian Wheat Board and give us the quality protection we need under the terms of the Canada Grain Act to ensure our reputation in the world marketplace is protected.

I believe the amendments put forward before us today in Bill C–51 allow us to provide some of the protections that are needed. That is why I will support the bill at third reading. I want to ensure the direction the government is taking in agriculture is changed to ensure that each of the farmers, each of the producers can continue to do the work they want to do for their families and their communities. I urge the government to take a strong look at our history and the value of the product coming off the farm to the future of our country.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I felt I had to respond to the hon. member who has just spoken. My response is with regard to the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee elections. I would like to talk briefly about the tradition of these elections, what has happened in the past, what the real issue was in the election this time and about some new abuses that came into the voting this time.

The tradition of the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee elections is that there is a very low turn out at the elections, this year under 40 per cent. The reason is that this advisory committee really has no power whatsoever in terms of the operations of the wheat board. It has no power so people tend to stay away when it comes time to vote.

These elections in the past have been won in the garbage cans of post offices. There is no personal identification involved in the voting in these elections. There was not in the past, I am not sure about this last election. People who support a particular position strongly have gone to the garbage cans and picked out numerous ballots and mailed in a good number of ballots. I have seen this happen. I have talked to others who have seen it happen and have been involved in it. That is the type of process that has taken place in the voting in the past. To my knowledge this has not been taken out this time, but I cannot say that for a fact.

There were some new abuses added to the election process this time. This is very important to point out. The board of commissioners, the commissioners who are government appointed, not elected, is supposed to oversee the election process. Therefore it plays a role very similar to Elections Canada in a federal election.

In spite of that fact these same commissioners including the chief commissioner, Lorne Hehn, were out campaigning for those who were in favour of maintaining the Canadian Wheat Board monopoly—

Mr. Penson: Trying to protect his $175,000 a year job.

Mr. Benoit: Out trying to protect his job.

We will see any monopoly and people involved in a monopoly out to try to protect their job and their personal interest. That is understandable except when this body is the body in charge of the administration of the election.

This should never have been allowed to happen. It was very improper behaviour on the part of those commissioners and I believe they should do what is right and step down because of that.

This kind of abuse is totally unacceptable in any kind of election, whether it is an important election or not. What this has shown is that there is a great concern on the part of these commissioners and those who supported maintaining the wheat board monopoly that things would not go their way. I think this is the reason that the commissioners, against all past tradition, have decided to get involved this time.

Because of this involvement the issue changed from the issue of dual marketing versus monopoly, which was never the issue in this election. The real issue because of the way this was presented by the commissioners and others was. Do you want the wheat board or not? All of the candidates involved in this advisory committee election want the wheat board. To my knowledge they all support the wheat board. Yet that was the way the issue was presented by the commissioners and by others and through the farm media.

This election was to determine whether farmers wanted the wheat board or not, except all of the candidates running wanted the wheat board. I believe probably 70 per cent to 80 per cent of farmers want the wheat board maintained.

That is not the issue that is important here with regard to the wheat board. The important issue is whether the wheat board should be run by an elected board of directors or by government appointment. That is the key issue, should farmers get some control over their organization, the Canadian Wheat Board. Farmers pay the total operating cost of the wheat board. The board supposedly exists for farmers. Why on earth will this government and others not allow them to control their organization?

The advisory committee has no power and therefore is pretty much unimportant in this whole process.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I have heard the hon. member's speech before. I did not hear a question in what he put. However, I do have a couple of comments to make in response to the hon. member for Vegreville.

I could not help but think as he was speaking today and as I have heard him say in this House recently since the advisory board elections were completed that when you lose on substance you appeal on the basis of process.

In this case the Canadian Wheat Board advisory elections, at least in my part of the country where I had the great opportunity to talk not only to the candidates running but to many of the farmers responding, were very much discussed on the basis of support for the monopoly powers and enhanced powers of the Canadian Wheat Board or dual marketing.

Again, even in my own area the debate on the farm and in the coffee shops was not concerning itself with process but on substance. In the end when the ballots were counted the substance of the debate I think was quite clearly heard in that those who support the monopoly and enhanced powers of the Canadian Wheat Board were successful.

The member for Vegreville indicated that in some cases less than 40 per cent of farmers voted. Certainly this is not a low number in terms of wheat board elections. This is a very good turnout in terms of the history of the Canadian Wheat Board advisory elections.

I believe that every farmer had the opportunity to express an opinion and certainly those who did not quite often, as we know in politics, represent those who are satisfied. Only when those who are disgruntled vote in large numbers do we recognize the protest in their voices.

A turnout of 40 per cent in which the majority supported the Canadian Wheat Board indicates that those who did not vote would also likely support the wheat board.

I was concerned that the member for Vegreville indicated that he recognized improprieties in the voting. I am sure that on behalf of the minister of agriculture and all Canadians I would ask the member to name those he knows were involved in the improprieties and ensure that the elections are conducted fair and square and that those who are aware of the improprieties and problems that may exist within the system bring them forward to those who can act on them.

Mr. Benoit: Mr. Speaker, first of all, concerning the 40 per cent, I only referred to that to show that it is not regarded as a valid body that is being elected.

Does the hon. member feel that it is all right for the commissioners who are responsible to oversee the election, as Elections Canada is in a federal election, to actively campaign on behalf of one side in this election? It twisted the issue from an issue of dual marketing versus single desk marketing. They did it from their massive coverage in farm papers and local papers by twisting it instead to an issue of if you let the monopoly break the board will disappear, it will be destroyed.

I would like to ask the member if he feels it is all right that the commissioners campaigned in that way.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, very briefly, the message that the Canadian Wheat Board commissioners brought forward is the message that I was also discussing in my constituency and so were the candidates who were running for the advisory committee.

I did not see the Canadian Wheat Board commissioners bringing forward any new information to the debate.

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to rise today to speak on Bill C–51, the amendments to the Canada Grain Act.

This bill covers also the Canadian Grain Commission. It is designed to reduce the Canadian Grain Commission's responsibility in a couple of areas. Today I would like to focus my attention on government control over the whole grain industry, including that by the Canadian Grain Commission.

We have one of the most controlled industries in the world, the grain industry. No other industry I know of has the level of government control this industry has. As an active farmer, I believe this is not in our best interest. I am going to be pointing out some of the reasons for that later.

We also have a body, the Canadian Grain Commission, heavily controlled by the federal government but does not have the funding from the federal government. In other words, 92 per cent of the budget of the Canadian Grain Commission comes from producers. Only 8 per cent comes from the federal government, yet it wants to maintain in effect exclusive control. I do not think that is a good thing. We also have the same thing with the Canadian Wheat Board where it is a producer funded body and yet the Canadian government maintains control and I believe not in our best interest.

I understand the need to maintain standards. Canada is one of the most reliable exporters of grain. It has a very high quality and we have maintained a very good standard, one that could easily be done by having the Canadian Grain Commission have exclusive control through an elected board of directors rather than appointed as they are now by the federal government.

If producers are paying the bill they should have control. They should have an elected board of officers. This could easily accomplish the same goals of trying to maintain very good standards in order to maintain our customers abroad.

This bill reduces the responsibility of the Canadian Grain Commission in a couple of areas. Setting upper limits on tariffs is one area where it is going to be backing off on controls. The other is reduced payment of losses to the level of the bond of the Canadian Grain Commission on the companies that are required to post a bond.

The Canadian Grain Commission by maintaining this system of bonds must maintain and monitor that these bonds are actually effective. When a grain company is required to post a bond, if it fails the Canadian Grain Commission's liability is only to the level of the bond.

I have information from some industry people that grain dealers who post a bond only have to get back to that level at the end of every month. It is not uncommon for smaller under capitalized grain dealers to be four or more times over exposed to their bond level.

What message are we sending out to producers? That these people have a bond which may be up to four times less than what is really required? We should be sending a message of buyer beware. They should check out these companies and see what their reliability is and not give a false sense of security to producers when they are dealing with companies by believing that there is a bond in place to take care of the problems should the company fail.

In the past there have been cases where companies have failed and there has been heavy exposure by the taxpayer. That is not in our interests either. We need a situation whereby producers deal with companies based on their merit and historical performance. Let them know they have to check out these bonds. It does not have to be done by the Canadian Grain Commission. A false sense of security is being put in place.

My main concern is that the regulation of our whole grain industry is far too high. I talked about the Canadian Grain Commission but it also applies to the Canadian Wheat Board. The previous speaker talked about the Canadian Wheat Board and how important it is. I agree. We are also calling for a democratic election to the board of the directors of the wheat board rather than appointments to the board. This would bring responsibility back to this body which is very badly needed.

In this heavily controlled industry, including the Canadian Wheat Board, a farmer who is producing his own wheat is required to establish a mill on his farm to grind it into flour. The farmer has to buy his own wheat back through the Canadian Wheat Board and apply for permits to do that. This is ludicrous in a time when people are looking for opportunities to expand their business. This is the kind of heavy handed tactic we would see in Russia.

The Western Grain Transportation Act is another area of overregulation in the industry. It is a heavy government hand where it is not required. Grain is being shipped to Thunder Bay, back to Regina and then south across into the United States. It is called backtracking. It costs the taxpayers hundreds of thousands of dollars to continue this practice just to qualify for the Crow benefit. It is absolute nonsense. We would have expected this type of thing in Russia 10 years ago.

These are the kinds of controls we see on the Canadian grain industry. As a grain farmer I know others believe this is very much a business where we can compete very well by government getting out of our faces and letting us get on with our job. We will find the markets. We will find the most effective way of getting it there at the lowest cost.

As long as we have a heavily regulated industry like we have in the three areas I can think of offhand, the Canadian Grain Commission, the Canadian Wheat Board, both of which by the way are undemocratic, and the western grain transportation authority, it shows that we have some serious problems. In fact we do not even comply with the new World Trade Organization regulations. There is a better system outside of our country than there is internally. Things have to be resolved.

I want to take a moment to talk about the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee and the recent elections. The member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake talked about how this was a very important body. That is not how it is regarded in my constituency nor is it generally throughout the industry.

The Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee is just that. It is an advisory committee. It has absolutely no authority and no power. In the industry it is really seen as a very minor player in the whole scheme of things. It is seen as a public relations exercise for the Canadian Wheat Board. If the government put as much stock in the idea of having elections for the Canadian Wheat Board directors as it does for the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee then we would be getting somewhere.

We have to apply the same principle. How can there be an elected advisory committee and not an elected board of directors of the wheat board? I think some of the reason is that the Canadian Wheat Board commissioners do not want to open up the books, which is something that should be required. Let producers see what is happening in the Canadian Wheat Board, see if there are any inefficiencies taking place or any areas where we can make some changes.

Producers do not want to get rid of the Canadian Wheat Board. What I have heard from many constituents is that they want to open up the board and have it elected, effective and accountable. That is the most important thing.

When members talk about how important this election was to the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee, that is certainly not what I am hearing throughout the country. Less than 40 per cent of farmers voted in this election. It was actually one of the higher ones, but generally it is not regarded as an effective board. People just take it as a joke and that is the reason we are not getting good turnouts. If we had an election for Canadian Wheat Board commissioners themselves I think we would see a very high turnout.

I will close by saying that with this heavily regulated grain industry in Canada we have to ask the question: Who is asking for this? It is certainly not the farmers I am listening to. People are saying to open up the process. These producers want to do more than grow grain. They want to have more control in saying how this grain is marketed and transported. They do not want a regulated industry. They want deregulation.

I believe that Canada and Russia passed in the night about two or three years ago. At least Russia is going in the right direction. It is trying to deregulate its industry while we are still going in the opposite direction. I encourage the government to open up the process or at least start by making these institutions democratic. That is the very least we can do.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.) moved that Bill C–56, an Act to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, be read the third time and passed.

She said: Mr. Speaker, today we begin the last stage of the debate on the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. This debate has now been going on for ten years, a decade, and we are finally at its conclusion.

During this decade, several eminent persons were involved in the debate on the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, including the former Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Jean Charest, and the former Minister of the Environment, Lucien Bouchard.

[English]

I would like to do a thumbnail sketch of how we got from where we were in 1984 to where we are in 1994 on environmental assessment.

Ten years ago the federal government of the day introduced guidelines to be followed in the environmental assessment of all projects which in one way or another involved the Government of Canada. The intention of those guidelines was undoubtedly good, but the result was chaos.

The guidelines were vague and subjective. On the one hand they were incredibly complicated and on the other hand they were incomplete. The result unfortunately was arbitrary and haphazard decision making. That led to over 40 significant court challenges, probably the most famous of which would be characterized as the Rafferty–Alameda and the Oldman dam decisions.

Business people were frustrated because they could not get a straight answer on whether their projects were environmentally acceptable or not. Environmentalists were frustrated because the cause of protecting the environment was lost under the weight of hundreds of thousands of pages of legal documents.

[Translation]

The federal and provincial governments were bogged down in legal battles on obscure points of interpretation. The people of Canada felt excluded from the environmental assessment process because, as individuals, they did not have the millions needed to become involved in such battles, even if these fights had a direct impact on their daily life, their immediate environment and their economic prosperity.

[English]

All political parties in Parliament soon realized the need for a law clearly defining what constitutes federal responsibility in environmental assessment. After a number of years beginning with the then Minister of the Environment, Mr. Tom McMillan, through to Minister Bouchard through to Mr. Charest, Parliament passed that law with the support of every single party. Unfortunately, once the law passed for a number of reasons it sat on the shelf and was never actually brought into force by the previous government.

During the last election, the Prime Minister promised that if elected a Liberal government would proclaim the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. It would then introduce amendments to simplify, open up and strengthen federal environmental assessments.

Two months ago I was pleased to announce in this House that we would keep the Prime Minister's red book promise and proclaim the act. At the same time I was happy to introduce amendments to make the act fairer, more open, more straightforward and indeed to make the decision making more public.

With the passage of Bill C–56 the government will keep its red book promise. With the passage of this legislation Parliament, we the parliamentarians of Canada, will put our country at the forefront of nations in the world in approaching the extremely important issue of environmental assessment.

As our Prime Minister leaves for Miami today for the hemispheric summit, one of the issues that underpins economic development around the world is the necessity for open, transparent and public environmental assessment. Certainly this legislation will indeed underline Canada's pre–eminent position as a country that respects the open public and transparent process before projects are begun.

Environmental assessment must be a powerful tool for the future in which economic health, environmental health and human health are integrated. Indeed, that is one of the functions of the summit.

With that understanding in mind my colleagues and I have spent the last year listening carefully to environmentalists, academics, community representatives, business, labour and other levels of government and indeed most important, individual Canadians. We want to make sure the amendments we are proposing will advance the cause of sustainable development in the best possible sense. There are three simple but key amendments.

First, the federal government is implementing the principle of one project, one assessment for federal endeavours. We do not want a complicated process where there is a big assessment at the planning stage of a project, a second assessment at the implementation stage and then another assessment every time somebody decides to make a change. What is more, we do not want a whole group of federal departments and agencies conducting individual assessments on the same project. We want environmental assessments to be tough and fair. One comprehensive assessment of a project serves everyone's interest much better than several half–baked separate assessments.

Secondly, this bill guarantees the general public the right to participate in major environmental assessments by providing funding for their participation. This idea of involving the public was first proposed in 1987 by the former Minister of the Environment, the Hon. Lucien Bouchard, but was set aside in the bill passed in 1992.

We always believed that it was a mistake to set the issue of popular financing aside. Today, we are pleased to be able to repair this deficiency in the legislation. It is all very well to say that everyone has a right to participate, but we must ensure that they have the resources required to really be able to do so.

[English]

It is one thing to say that people have a say. It is another thing to give them the tools to exercise that right.

This amendment entrenches the public's right to really participate. It is the most basic common sense that those who have to live with a project have their say.

[English]

Third, Bill C–56 will take away the power of any individual cabinet minister to ignore or overrule environmental assessments produced by an independent panel.

Recommendations of an individual panel can only be modified by a decision of the entire cabinet. Any changes to an independent assessment will require a written, detailed public explanation for those changes.

This amendment ends the era of backroom deals made at the expense of the environment.

I am proud that our government has the honour of giving Canada a progressive, fair, practical, sensible environmental assessment system. It introduces a new way of thinking. From now on, we will make decisions with due consideration for their environmental impact. The environment completely disregards man–made geographical boundaries.

The Prime Minister constantly repeats how important Canadians consider the environment to be and we must find answers together. Canada is working actively to harmonize environmental assessments throughout the world and will be pleased to sign agreements on this. I know that every one of us here in this House wants to protect the environment and that no one wants to act against the environment for short–term gain.

I hope that our efforts to achieve positive results throughout the world will have the same results here in Canada. We must work together to avoid duplication and overlap.

[English]

We have demonstrated our willingness to co–operate on environmental assessment by signing harmonization agreements with two provinces already. We are a few months away from signing harmonization agreements with two other provinces. We are actively negotiating comparable comprehensive agreements across the country.

We want to show that Canada's federalism can be flexible. We want to show that at the federal level we are doing everything we can to make Canada work better for the environment, for individual Canadians, for the protection of the heritage of our children.

Unfortunately, one government recently decided to boycott the harmonization discussions: the Quebec government.

• (1305)

All those interested in protecting the environment must ask the Quebec government if it really wants to avoid duplication and overlap. Come back to the negotiation table; come back to talk to us. We are not only prepared to speed up the harmonization process, but also to meet Quebec's officials to improve our environment. When it comes to the environment, no one must act alone.

Sustainable development is a common goal for all; it is everyone's responsibility and it knows no frontier. It is important not to get involved in jurisdiction battles, so as to ensure the best possible environment for our children.

[English]

The amendments before Parliament will not create environmental paradise on earth overnight. They will, however, produce a solid, thoughtful and democratic foundation for environmental assessments and for making sure that environmental thinking is a central component of planning. That is what sustainable development is all about, making the right decisions before the fact instead of cleaning up after the fact.

Future decision makers, the young people of today and their children, will have to think differently than the way we thought in the past. Thanks to this legislation we believe they will have the tools necessary to translate environmental goodwill into every day decision making.

[Translation]

The new Canadian Environmental Assessment Act is extraordinary in that it changes our way of thinking. We must think before we act. We must think about sustainable development and we must think about the fact that the environment knows no borders.

[English]

One project—one assessment, public involvement, government accountability are three simple principles translated into reality by today's amendments.

We are ready to translate into reality the principles stated by the former Minister of the Environment.

[English]

With these three measures we will finally be ready to move forward in January with the proclamation of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act and the agency. We can finally move forward to a new and wiser generation of environmental assessment.

It has taken us 10 years to reach the point where finally we are ready to move ahead. I want to thank the thousands of people who participated in that process.

In absentia, I would like to thank the Leader of the Opposition who was one of the first thinkers of how we could remake environmental assessment. I want to thank the former Deputy Prime Minister of Canada, the Minister of the Environment. He supported this new process of environmental assessment.

[Translation]

I want to thank the thousands of Canadians and Quebecers who understand so well that the environmental assessment process affects everyone's life, and that we not only have a right but a duty to participate in it. We hope that the three simple amendments which we propose—one project, one assessment; public financing, and participation of every minister in the decision–making process—will improve the process set in place by the Hon. Lucien Bouchard.

• (1310)

[English]

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, before I start I would ask for unanimous consent of the House to extend the clock for approximately five minutes so I may complete my speech.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Gilmour: Mr. Speaker, I thank the House. I am pleased to have the opportunity to speak on this bill today.

Bill C–56 proposes amendments to three sections of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. The basic principle behind environmental assessment is addressing concerns in the early stages of development in order that action can be taken before the project is too far along. This is a relatively new process at the federal level.

A number of years ago EARP, the environmental assessment and review process, was introduced with guidelines. Not until CEAA was passed by Parliament in June 1992 did we have any meaningful legislation at the federal level. The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act replaces the EARP guidelines and provides for a new process of federal environmental assessment.

It has taken two years for this bill to be proclaimed into law. Although the bill was tabled two years ago the regulations were only published two months ago.

The minister has stated that the amended act will be proclaimed into law by January 1995. Once CEAA is proclaimed federal environmental assessment will be legislatively entrenched.

As this process is still quite new at the federal level, there are still many bumps to be ironed out. The amendments to the act contained in Bill C–56 attempt to address some of the problems already encountered with federal environmental assessment.

Bill C–56 proposes to amend the act in three ways. First it requires participant funding be established by the Minister of the Environment. Second, it encourages, where possible, that one federal environmental assessment be carried out per project. Third, it requires cabinet approval instead of ministerial approval of responses to panel recommendations.

At first sight these three recommendations appear quite positive. However a closer look at these amendments reveals that they represent few initiatives on the part of the government. These three amendments do little to change the status quo. Further, they are inadequate in living up to what they attempt to accomplish.

During the course of the subcommittee hearings we heard from several environmental experts regarding this bill. Many of these presentations expressed a common concern that Bill C–56 does not live up to its expectations. Amendments to the act to guarantee intervener funding, to broaden the scope of decision making authority and to reduce timely and costly duplication, to guarantee one assessment per project have been requested since consultations on reforming the act began seven years ago. These are worthy goals that need to be addressed but the goals are simply not realized in this bill.

I would like to address each of these three amendments in turn. The first clause amends section 4 of the act and adds a clause which emphasizes the need for responsible authorities to carry out their actions in a co–ordinated and efficient manner with a view to eliminating unnecessary duplication in the environmental assessment process. This clause has been referred to as the one project, one assessment clause.

As I mentioned during second reading of this bill, the harmonization process simply does not go far enough. Although the possibility for more than one federal assessment is reduced, the fact remains there is still duplication of the federal and provincial assessments as well as the possibility for federal duplication between various departments.

Theoretically the amendment for one assessment per project minimizes the potential for duplication of federal activities. Where more than one department is involved, federal authorities are to attempt to co–ordinate environmental assessment activity. However I want to make it clear that this legislation does not mandate one assessment per project. This amendment merely makes it mandatory to take into account existing assessments.

The bill changes the assessment process so that departmental assessments should occur simultaneously rather than sequentially. In other words, there could be simultaneous co–ordinated effort but there will still not necessarily be one assessment.

If decision making triggers occur at different points in time, a single project may still endure more than one assessment. Therefore multiple federal assessments are still possible under the act as long as there are different federal triggers for any project.

It is well understood that the single most critical issue to industry is the length and the uncertainty of the assessment process.

Although I am pleased that this government is taking into account the need to co–ordinate the efforts, this bill lacks teeth. It lacks the teeth it needs to give it some meaning. We simply must stop duplicating our efforts and this bill does not decisively address that concern.

As it stands the bill still fails to live up to Canadian expectations for one assessment per project. The process needs to be co–ordinated to ensure there is no duplication between federal departments. This legislation would be improved if a lead responsible authority could assist in ensuring that one federal assessment is carried out. This would be a particularly good role for the agency. Such a responsibility would give the agency a greater role in the assessment process and would assist government in streamlining its functions and ensuring that one assessment per project becomes a reality, not just a consideration.

The agency could be given the responsibility to notify departments of their potential involvement in an upcoming environmental assessment, thus streamlining and co–ordinating the process. The agency could be the most effective body to ensure that the principle of one assessment per project truly becomes a reality.

We must not only deal with duplication between federal departments but also address the duplication between federal and provincial governments. At present we currently have two federal–provincial harmonization agreements in place, one with Alberta and one with Manitoba. Bilateral agreements as the minister mentioned between federal and provincial governments are being negotiated at other levels and they are intended to reduce duplication by allowing for a co–ordinated process.

We should be working toward a common set of environmental standards and goals for both federal and provincial levels of government. Federal–provincial harmonization agreements need to be worked out and signed by the provinces and the federal government to ensure that we truly have one joint assessment per project.

Let me remind the House of the horrendous cost for duplication. Forty–five per cent of federal programs representing expenditures of $40 billion overlap and compete to varying degrees with provincial programs. That comes straight out of the Treasury Board. Canadians simply cannot afford this costly duplication of services.

The second amendment to the act seeks to ensure that responses to public panel recommendations are decided by cabinet. This means that the decision to act or to reject on a panel recommendation is not made solely by the Minister of the Environment but by the cabinet. This amendment broadens the decision making authority to include more members in the decision. However, it simply does not go far enough.

As I mentioned earlier, the spirit of this clause is to ensure that responses to public panel recommendations are decided by cabinet, but cabinet remains undefined. Cabinet could be a few ministers or it could refer to the full cabinet. The term cabinet is very loose. Cabinet has many versions and it can be many things. There are inner cabinets, outer cabinets and committees of cabinet. The term cabinet is simply too loose. As it stands, important environmental decisions can still be controlled by two or three ministers with their own agendas.

Current government amendments represent only a small step forward and they change very little. If we are to ensure that the assessment process is fair and democratic this clause must be amended to replace cabinet or governor in council by order in council.

Not all responses by governor in council are orders in council. Order in council responses are more formalized and must be published in the Canada Gazette and tabled in Parliament. This amendment, which would have improved the procedure, I proposed during report stage and was unfortunately rejected by the government.

Another problem with this bill is that there are no guidelines on how or when cabinet review will be undertaken. There are no guidelines which spell out which projects will be assessed or which assessments, once completed, will be forwarded to cabinet for review. I would hope guidelines for environmental assessment procedures would make it very clear to all participants exactly what the rules are.

As it stands, there is nothing to prevent cabinet from reading the report and ignoring important recommendations. There is nothing to prevent a few members of the cabinet from rejecting panel recommendations purely on a political basis.

In addition, it is not clear whether the cabinet would be able to change either a panel's recommendations or a mediator's report. There is no clear definition of what the cabinet can or cannot do. This must be clarified in the regulations that guide the assessment process, otherwise we are no farther ahead than we were before.

Bill C–56 is yet another example of this government's failure to live up to its red book promises. Bill C–56 effectively takes decision making authority from the minister and gives it to an undefined cabinet. What it does not do is give authority to the agency or panels as promised in the red book.

The Liberal red book promises to amend the act to shift decision making powers to an independent Canadian environmental assessment agency subject to an appeal to the cabinet. The agency's relationship to government would be roughly similar to that between the CRTC and the cabinet.

This agency simply has none of the powers of the CRTC as promised in the red book. For example, this bill does not entrust decision making powers to an independent Canadian environmental assessment agency subject to an appeal to cabinet.

The head of the agency is not independent from the minister. The minister appoints this person to the position, which again makes it more of a patronage appointment than an independent agency. In no way is this agency at arm's length from the government.

Section 7 of the CRTC legislation gives the commission licensing powers which are essentially final decision making powers. There is clearly no similar commission being proposed in this act. The panel or the CEAA is not given decision making powers or powers as responsible authority.

In addition, the CRTC under the Broadcasting Act has all the powers of the superior court. This is not the case with the assessment agency.

The CRTC is a quasi–judicial commission. This is also not the case with any of the decision making powers under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

The principles of fairness of decision making which are required for the CRTC are not required for the process of decision making under the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act.

During the hearings on this bill several witnesses presented concerns that Bill C–56 does not give the agency or the panels the power to make decisions with an appeal to cabinet. This bill as presently drafted fails to address these concerns.

Clearly responsibility for environmental assessments are not in this act vested in an independent agency as promised in the red book and the relationship of the CRTC to government bears little relation to that between the agency and government.

Yet when a motion was put forward during report stage amendments to recognize the agency as an independent body, the Liberals voted it down and in doing so voted against their own red book promise. We hear so much about the red book, yet here we have the government not only ignoring a promise, but actually voting it down in the House.

There appears to be a great discrepancy between government promises in the red book and government actions in the form of legislation.

In Ontario the assessment process has been amended to make all decision making by an environmental board binding unless appealed to cabinet. In practice most decisions are final. This process works, plus it saves time and money.

I would now like to move on to the third and final amendment of this bill dealing with participant funding. Section 58(1)(i) of the act currently enables the minister to establish a funding program to facilitate public participation in mediation and assessment by review panels. Bill C–56 proposes to repeal this measure and replace it with a new section that requires the minister to establish a participant funding program rather than leaving it up to the minister's discretion as is currently the case.

Of all the stakeholders in the environmental decision making process, ordinary Canadians are those most directly affected by the environmental impact of projects. Participant funding is an important tool as it enables stakeholders to participate in the decision making process.

As I mentioned in the House on second reading, regulations are needed to guide the amount and distribution of participant funding. I recommend that the government broaden the scope when developing these regulations. The participant funding program will not be up and running until criteria are set up. Regulations could take as long as a year before they are brought into force which means that it will be some time before the participant funding program becomes a reality.

Participant funding regulations should ensure that those people directly affected by a project have an opportunity to participate. However, there must be guidelines to ensure it does not become a growth industry, funding courtesy of the taxpayer.

We do not want to start an intervener industry. Funding would be at a level to allow effective participation by those who can demonstrate they will be affected by a project. Guidelines for participation should consider whether the applicant represents a clearly ascertainable interest that should be heard at the hearing and whether separate representation of the interest would assist the panel and contribute to the hearing.

Guidelines should also take into consideration whether the applicant has attempted to bring other related interests under an umbrella group that would facilitate the retention of common experts and council and whether direction is included that only those costs that are directly related to the preparation and presentation of a submission are recoverable.

Regard should be given to whether there is a requirement for submissions and presentations to be conducted economically and last, whether a special power is required to deny costs in cases in which a submission or presentation is unnecessary, irrelevant, improper or the cost claim is excessive.

Alberta currently has established criteria in place for participant funding and could serve as a guide when regulations are drafted. According to Environment Canada sources the amount of participant funding is limited to $1.2 million per year and comes from the green plan. Although funds are currently limited by the budget, the number of dollars is open ended as the government can decide to increase or decrease these funds in future years.

One proposed amendment which I brought up in committee and which I feel still merits consideration for this act is that of proponents paying a portion of the intervener funding. How much the proponent would pay could be at the discretion of the minister or included in the regulations.

Some of the witnesses on C–56 raised concerns that intervener funding tends to be quite small, sometimes to the point of undermining the usefulness of having any critique whatsoever. As long as the funding comes only from taxpayers, funding will be less than if the proponent paid for a portion of the fund.

Let me make it clear, however, that I am not suggesting proponents should be forced to pay for every interested critic of a project. Guidelines would need to be quite specific in this area to protect from abuse. Several of the witnesses also suggested the agency be granted the authority to award participant funding under ministerial guidelines rather than vesting the authority solely with the minister.

This suggestion should be looked into either as an amendment to the act or as a regulation guiding the participant funding regulations. This amendment to the act would allow the agency to be empowered with some decision making powers, decision making powers that the agency is sorely lacking at present.

Participant funding regulations need to identify what the money can be used for and accountability must be assured. This amendment as it stands does not ensure that all Canadians and interest groups can participate equally in a full and meaningful way in all phases of various environmental assessment processes. This is beyond the scope of the bill. However, some choices must be made in the regulations which will ensure there is a selection process to ensure those parties that play a significant role have adequate funding.

In addition, attention must be paid to the fact that funds are not endless, nor are the timeframes for the assessment process without some constraints. It is not fair to subject one project to an endless tirade of inquiries. There must be a balance in the process to ensure a fair and reasonable assessment takes place.

In concluding I wish to take the opportunity to highlight another problem with this bill. During second reading I raised concerns regarding the amount of ministerial discretion allowed in the act. I noted the minister may or may not call for a review, and the fact that the minister appoints the mediator or panel members. These concerns were also raised by a number of witnesses.

Panel members are appointed by the minister. Therefore there is no permanent body that one could refer to as an agency that decides who will staff a particular hearing. The panel approach is hardly an independent agency, as members can be appointed at the whim of the minister to suit particular cases as the minister sees fit. This has direct influence on the outcome of any panel decision.

As well, during second reading I addressed concerns about the exclusion and inclusion list that makes up the regulations guiding what is and is not to be included in the assessment process. In addition, the fact that there are no regulations regarding the transport of hazardous waste still concerns me.

It is with regret I note the government has shown little initiative with the bill. The act as it stands remains virtually unchanged. We desperately need to move forward on environmental issues. There is little point in spinning our wheels for the sake of appearances. The bill requires reworking before it will begin to live up to the spirit that was intended. I have suggested some improvements for the bill, including my motion to change the final decision making authority from cabinet to order in council.

In conclusion, the government had the opportunity to move legislation that would have had a substantial impact on how environmental assessment is carried out in Canada. Unfortunately it failed in the attempt.

The Deputy Speaker: Colleagues, the hon. member for Don Valley North has given me written notice that he will be unable to present his motion during the hour provided for Private Members' Business next Monday.

[English]

Despite our best efforts and many phone calls it has not been possible to find a member who will substitute for him on Monday. Accordingly I would request the table officers to drop that item of business to the bottom of the order of precedence.

The hour provided for Private Members' Business will therefore be suspended and, pursuant to Standing Order 99(2), the House will meet at 11 a.m. for consideration of Government Orders.

[English]

It being 1.30 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think you would find consent for the following: If a vote by division bell is requested on Motion No. 257 later this day, the vote will not be deferred until Monday but will be deferred until Tuesday at 5.30 p.m.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

[English]

RECOGNITION OF THE PATRIOTES OF LOWER CANADA AND THE REFORMERS OF UPPER CANADA

The House resumed from November 1 consideration of the motion.

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to speak today to Motion No. 257 under Private Members' Business. The motion seeks to recognize the efforts of certain important Canadians both in Lower Canada and in Upper Canada. I applaud the initiative because it is important for us to recognize the efforts of those important figures in our history.

It is important to recall the efforts of such people as William Lyon Mackenzie, the great Liberal leader who was the grandfather of a great Liberal Prime Minister, William Lyon Mackenzie King. It is very important to recognize the leadership efforts of Louis–Joseph Papineau, an important reform leader in Lower Canada. I applaud that initiative.

Unfortunately where I take some exception to the motion is that it is somewhat incomplete. It ignores the efforts of some important Canadians from the maritime region or Atlantic Canada, most notably the great leader from Nova Scotia, Joseph Howe, who was very instrumental in helping to achieve responsible government in the country. It is absolutely silent on the leadership efforts of Canadians such as Mr. Howe.

One would have to question somewhat the historical accuracy of the motion as I see it before me. It speaks of the Patriots of Lower Canada and the reformers of Upper Canada. Then it equates those to geographic regions as being Quebec and Canada. For those of us who have had an opportunity to study Canadian history that is historically inaccurate. The then Lower Canada is roughly equivalent to the province of Quebec, which has geographically grown many times since becoming part of Canada or since 1867.

To equate the then Upper Canada with Canada is somewhat misleading. One would conclude that it is the Canada of today. Indeed that is very inaccurate. It ignores the Atlantic provinces, the two founding members of Canada, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. As we know, under Confederation we had four founding provinces. This particular historical equation ignores Atlantic Canada and all provinces that subsequently became members of Confederation. It is somewhat historically inaccurate.

Its intention is probably good, but it is important that we recognize in as total way as possible the efforts of all Canadians such as Mr. Howe and others.

I have some difficulty supporting the motion. I can support its main thrust but having noted its inaccuracies I just spoke to and the incompleteness of the motion I would like to move the following amendment. I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all of the words after the words "democratic government".

It then becomes more accurate historically. It then addresses the concerns I raised about ignoring the efforts of certain very important Canadians in the fight for responsible government, particularly those from Atlantic Canada and most notably Mr. Howe. I submit that my amendment is an improvement upon the member's motion.

The Deputy Speaker: While the Chair is waiting to examine the amendment, we might continue with the debate and the ruling will be made in due course as to the receivability of the motion.

Mr. Garry Breitkreuz (Yorkton—Melville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to rise today to discuss the motion put forth by the member for Verchères. It would have the government officially recognize the historical contribution of the Patriots of Lower Canada and the reformers of Upper Canada to the establishment of a system of responsible democratic government in Canada and in Quebec, as did the Government of Quebec in 1982 by proclaiming by order a national Patriots day.

It is extremely troubling for me to stand before the House and unequivocally support a motion dealing with an issue that historians have not even settled on. The hon. member is asking us as parliamentarians to stand and officially recognize the contribution of the Patriotes and reformers. That point is clear. I cannot.

This is an issue which Canadians will have to make an individual value judgment about and the appropriateness of recognizing the extent of the contributions of the Patriotes and reformers. It would be wrong for parliamentarians as a whole to make a judgment about an event in history that is still controversial in the minds of many Canadians.

In fact what lies at the heart of the controversy is the methods used by the Patriotes and reformers. To some they are considered to be great Patriots. Yet to others they are considered to be nothing more than traitors who deserved what they received.

I also state unequivocally that the Patriots and reformers have some legitimate concerns which need to be addressed. I am sure that everyone, and not only in the House but all Canadians, would agree with that.

However we would be doing a great disservice to the idea that it is possible to have the freedom to debate ideas and achieve things through peaceful means, while at the same time lending credibility to the notion that the end justifies the means, that it would be all right to raise arms against the state when there is a dispute. By no means do I support the idea that violence is a way to achieve a political end.

Support for the motion would then also be essentially a stamp of approval for the violence which took place during the revolts of 1837 and 1838. There were many deaths during those quasi–revolutions and I would certainly not want to suggest this is the proper way to bring about change.

Let us now take a moment to look at a few of the major players of the Patriote and reform debate, because I feel it is important sometimes to look at the past as if the lessons learned are forgotten. We are doomed to relearn them.

I also believe there are a number of similarities between the Party Patriote and the Bloc which need to be highlighted. In fact Papineau as Speaker of the House had no qualms about pocketing a large government salary while at the same time plotting his revolution. Interestingly enough we have seen much of the same during this 35th session of Parliament.

Papineau was also quite happy to extract harsh levies from the habitants living on seigneuries in the Ottawa Valley and allowing English merchants to do the same.

Papineau, through his charisma, focused habitant grievances against the English and reflected the fury of the francophone professional class who, as they saw it, had been systematically denied government advancement.

He also headed a party which demanded economic development at the local and regional level. Their concerns seem to be much of the same type of rhetoric to which many of us have listened every day in the House.

It is extremely important to illustrate that the lower Canadian revolution failed not only because of the division of the province into French and English but because of the divisions among the French themselves and of the type of men who attempted to make it. To upset a regime requires more than oratory, more than a prophetic fanatic such as Papineau was. It requires the support of the masses. The Patriotes had none of this.

Joseph Howe was primarily responsible for the election of a majority of reformers in Nova Scotia. He managed to bring about political change and bring about responsible government without having to resort to violence. This would be a good lesson for everyone to remember.

There is a more subtle lesson to be learned from all this, that the politicians might think they know what is best in terms of the best interests of society and those who encompass it, but it is ultimately up to the citizens of that society to determine what is best for them. Politicians better start listening to the people and not their own rhetoric.

Another key problem with the motion is the narrowness of its scope. It does not even attempt to recognize that a lot of people have made significant contributions to responsible government in the country other than simply the Patriots and reformers, many of whom are from western Canada. These other individuals would include William Aberhaart, Ernest Manning of the Alberta Social Credit and Agnes Macphail of the Progressives who was the first woman ever elected to the House of Commons. Let us not forget about the contributions of Henry Wisewood of the Alberta wing of the Progressives during the 1920s.

A final problem we see with the motion is the fact that we already celebrate the contributions of Canadians from the past on Canada Day. It is a time when Canadians can look back and reflect on all those individuals who contributed in some form or another in terms of greater representative democratic governments.

In conclusion, I will not impugn any motive or agenda beyond the motion. Yet many people feel that the motion appears to be the legitimization of a rebellion in the dismantling of the state apparatus, the legitimization of the use of force. Therefore I cannot support it.

As I mentioned earlier the reformers, Patriots and all their followers certainly have enriched Canada's history. In opposing the motion I do not want to belittle their contribution in any way. However I am concerned that if we legitimize the actions of those such as the Patriots we will be sending out the wrong message to those Quebecois who are sovereignists.

• (1345)

The PQ seem to be using the battles of 1837 and 1838 to legitimize its struggles against Canadian federalism. A Patriotes in Quebec has become anti–English, anti–federalist. The original Patriots fought for responsible government while the PQ Patriotes seemed to be fighting for the demise of this great country.

It is for these reasons I urge all the members of the House to vote against Motion No. 257.

The Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the hon. member for Richmond—Wolfe, I wish to say that the amendment proposed by the hon. member for London—Middlesex is in order.

[English]

As it is in order it is therefore an amendment on which we will vote next week.

Mr. Gaston Leroux (Richmond—Wolfe, BQ): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say to the member of the Reform Party who just spoke that we recognize English Canada and anglophone culture. They are our friends. And now, I welcome this opportunity to take part, at the request of my party, in the debate on the motion presented by the hon. member for Verchères, a motion that reads as follows: That, in the opinion of this House, the government should officially recognize the historical contribution of the Patriotes of Lower Canada and the Reformers of Upper Canada to the establishment of a system of responsible democratic government in Canada and in Quebec, as did the Government of Quebec in 1982 by proclaiming by order a national patriots' day.

The dramatic events known as the Rebellion of 1837–38 have often been depicted in textbooks and travel guides as the actions of a band of criminals who challenged the established order. The purpose of the motion submitted by the hon. member for Verchères is to rectify this perception and to recognize officially the historic contribution of the Patriotes of Lower Canada and the Reformers of Upper Canada towards establishing genuinely democratic and responsible government in Canada and in Quebec.

Perhaps I should make myself clear at this point. We are talking about recognizing the merits of the Patriotes, not about rehabilitating them or obtaining a pardon, as though they were criminals. In fact, we think it is high time the federal government recognized the fact that these events were part of the historic current of social and political unrest that affected both the colonies and their mother countries in the 18th and 19th centuries.

In Canada these events, which occurred at a time of great political upheaval in Western Europe, were centred in Ontario or Upper Canada, in Quebec or Lower Canada, and in Nova Scotia. The goals of the Patriotes of Lower Canada and the Reformers of Upper Canada were threefold. Basically they were fighting for civil and political rights, for the establishment of truly democratic and responsible institutions, and for the emancipation of their respective nations.

Above all, they were seeking recognition of the people of Lower and Upper Canada as nations capable of taking control of their own future. Any colony hopes one day to become the master of its own political and economic destiny. In 1840, the Act of Union completely denied our existence, "a people without history", it was said. The confederative pact of 1867 seemed to want to establish a relationship based on the equality of two founding peoples, but in the history of this country, the francophone nation of North America has been confined to the status of an ethnic group, only a little harder to assimilate than other immigrants.

The Patriotes reflected the awareness of French–speaking Canadians that they were a different nation. They wanted to obtain recognition of this fact from London and the other citizens of Canada. However, the definition of Canada in the Constitution Act, 1982, still does not reflect the reality of two founding peoples in Canadian society.

The second goal was the establishment of truly democratic institutions. More specifically, the Patriotes demanded the establishment of the principle of responsible government or, in other words, the creation of an executive consisting primarily of members of the House of Assembly and responsible to it, that is, accountable to the people rather than to the British Crown.

Thanks to the action of the Patriotes and Reformers, we have inherited a system of responsible government as well as democratic institutions and traditions of such great value to the Western world.

Finally, the third reason for the Patriotes and Reformers to revolt was, in large part, the civil, political and economic liberties that several nations were starting to exercise. These were commendable motives that left their mark on 19th century history. In fact, the late René Lévesque wrote, in a letter dated November 21, 1982, that the 1837–38 events and all the years leading to these events were undeniably motivated by a genuine and powerful democratic surge, coupled with a stronger than ever national assertiveness.

Arguments against recognizing the Patriotes of Lower Canada and the Reformers of Upper Canada do not hold water. It was first argued that adding another public holiday to the calendar would be both costly and unjustified. Allow me to point out that, in the mind of my colleague from Verchères, there was never any question of adding a public holiday or establishing a national patriots' day in Canada. It was for information that the hon. member for Verchères referred, in his motion, to the national patriots' day proclaimed by the Government of Quebec.

They then said that the violence associated with the 1837 rebellion should not be condoned. Fine, but we must remember that the Patriotes and Reformers expressed their grievances and demands in pamphlets, newspaper articles, mass demonstrations, pleas and speeches in the House of Assembly for many years before some of them took up arms. This motion is not intended to justify or legitimize the 1837–38 rebellion but simply to pay tribute, regardless of these violent events, to these men and women who believed in the need to establish a system of responsible and truly democratic government.

Some of my colleagues rightly pointed out that the Patriotes and Reformers are not the only ones who helped establish a system of responsible government in Canada. Although the Patriotes and Reformers are certainly not the only architects of our system of responsible government, their very significant contribution should not be ignored.

That is why we, in the Official Opposition and the Bloc Quebecois, are proud to support the motion of our colleague from Verchères and to ask this House to approve it without reservation.

The Deputy Speaker: As no one else apparently wishes to speak, I recognize the hon. member for Verchères.

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to go over the comments made during these three hours of very useful and informative debate.

It is my responsibility to conclude the debate on this motion, which I had the honour of tabling in this House, and which merely seeks to recognize the undeniable historical contribution of the Patriotes of Lower Canada and the Reformers of Upper Canada to the establishment of a system of responsible democratic government in Canada and in Quebec.

Although I am a sovereignist, I have no intention of rejecting our common values and experiences. And the chapter of our history which saw the emergence of the patriot and reformer movement is part of those common experiences.

I would like to read you an excerpt from a letter sent to me by a government member from Ontario. I do not think he will be upset, because I simply want to show to what extent these events are part of our common history.

• (1355)

He writes: "If there was a time in Canada's history when French–speaking and English–speaking people joined together to defend democracy, it was definitely during the 1837–38 rebellion which shaped the country as we know it today. The violence which occurred in Upper and Lower Canada was minimal and short–lived, compared to what happened in just about any other country that experienced similar incidents. Since then, Canadians have resolved their differences through debate, rather than with arms. This explains why a separatist party is now the Official Opposition in Parliament, something I am proud of".

Mr. Speaker, this was made possible essentially by the actions of the Patriotes of Lower Canada and the Reformers of Upper Canada.

Contrary to what the Reform Party member claimed, Quebecers are not using the Patriotes to denigrate their English–speaking comPatriots. Some prominent Patriotes and Reformers were English–speaking, and we are proud that they participated in the Patriotes movement.

My first speech in this House was to explain the relevance of this motion. This second opportunity allows me to correct a number of objections made by members of the other political parties in the more than two hours of debate on this motion.

The first objection was that the Patriotes and the Reformers were not the only ones who contributed to the establishment of responsible government. We were reminded, and rightly so, of the invaluable contribution of the Hon. Joseph Howe, a politician from Nova Scotia, who also contributed greatly to the establishment of a system of responsible government in Canada, and we recognize it. However, that does not mean that we should not also recognize the value of this structured movement which, for years, conveyed the aspirations of many people in Lower and Upper Canada.

The Patriotes and the Reformers were, first of all, honest citizens—business people, politicians, farmers, professionals—who, before some of them opted for armed struggle, had tried to make their point democratically.

We do not deny that they were not the only ones to whom we owe responsible government, but their very significant contribution cannot be ignored. Does the fact that we recently honoured the Canadian heroes who fought on the beaches of Normandy diminish in any way the merit of those who distinguished themselves at Vimy, Dieppe and Monte Cassino? Of course not, Mr. Speaker. It is self–evident.

Then, honouring Patriotes and Reformers will in no way diminish our gratefulness to persons like Joseph Howe, something I wanted to stress in this House.

Second objection. It has been said that it would be costly and unjustifiable to add a new legal holiday. We never said we wanted a legal holiday. We wasted almost an hour debating this, when it is not even in the motion.

With your permission, I will quote from the presentation I made to the Sub–Committee on Private Members' Business, on May 11, to make sure that this motion was deemed votable. Allow me to quote myself: "—the motion I am presenting to you is not aimed at establishing a national statutory holiday in honour of Patriotes and Reformers".

That is to say that, even before this matter came to the House of Commons, I had clearly stated that the motion was not intended to establish a national statutory holiday to honour Patriotes and Reformers. Of course, it will be up to the government of Canada to decide how it wants to celebrate and recognize the priceless contribution of the Patriotes and Reformers.

This argument can be explained two ways, it is either due to a blatant ignorance of the facts and of the meaning of the motion, or to a deliberate manoeuvre to derail the debate, something I am not accusing anybody of doing.

As I was saying, it has always been very clear in my mind, and that of my colleagues, that it is up to the Government of Canada to make the final decision, once the House adopts the motion, on how it intends to honour and recognize the historical contribution of the Patriotes and Reformers.

Third objection. We were told that the violence of the rebellion of 1837–1838 could not be condoned. Fine, but it must be recognized, as my colleague for Richmond—Wolfe so rightly pointed out, that for years, Patriotes and Reformers had expressed their point of view, their opinions, in speeches at the House of Assembly and at public meetings, as well as in newspaper articles. That is how Patriotes and Reformers had presented their views.

In remembering the Patriotes' actions, one should not choose to recall only the violence some of them ultimately resorted to.

The purpose of this motion is not in any way to legitimize or justify the rebellions of 1837–38. Of course not. As my colleague from Richmond—Wolfe mentioned, the motion simply seeks to pay tribute to the men and women who, notwithstanding these violent protests, believed it was necessary to have a truly responsible and democratic government in this country.

Of the people who believed and took part in this movement, some entered public life and are still highly respected today for their convictions, like Louis–Joseph Papineau, Louis–Hippolyte Lafontaine, Robert Baldwin and George–Étienne Cartier, to name a few.

After the first hour of debate, which was rather deplorable, I might say and where all kinds of objections were used to sidetrack the debate, I sent all members of this House a letter to clarify the situation concerning the three objections that were raised.

In the second hour of debate, we heard new objections. First, we heard mainly from our colleagues in the Reform Party that the bad sovereignists of today are using the actions of the Patriotes and the Reformers to justify their claims. This argument demonstrates a poor knowledge of our history.

I will remind the members that the Reformers, who would be Ontarians today, are included in the motion. It has absolutely nothing to do with the sovereignist movement. That is not why we are presenting this motion. We want to recognize the contribution of the Patriotes and the Reformers to the establishment of a system of responsible democratic government.

I must also remind hon. members of something I mentioned in the first hour of debate, namely that there are groups in Ontario which support our initiative and encourage us to bring the House to recognize the invaluable contribution of the Patriotes and the Reformers.

Let us not forget that the Right Hon. Pierre Elliott Trudeau even went to Australia to unveil a plaque honouring the Patriotes of Lower Canada and that another Canadian government official unveiled a similar plaque in Tasmania to honour the Reformers of Upper Canada. There has never been formal recognition from the government, and that is what we are seeking.

Of course, it is possible to make a connection between the actions of the Patriotes and the actions of today's sovereignists. But if we had wanted to give that meaning to the motion before us today, we certainly would have excluded any reference to the Reformers of Upper Canada.

The hon. member for Calgary Southeast said in her speech, and I quote:

> If this House is seriously fighting for a strong Canada, it would be hypocritical for its members to vote in favour of this motion.

What a pity to make such a narrow and restrictive interpretation of the motion before the House. I say to her that if this House rejects this motion, it will be more than hypocritical. Not to admit a historical reality for purely partisan reasons is beneath the dignity of this House.

During the second hour of debate, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell presented a new objection to the motion. He opposed the wording of the motion where it says the Patriotes of Lower Canada and the Reformers of Upper Canada contributed to the establishment of responsible government in Canada and in Quebec. Using a geographical subterfuge, it was argued that we could not talk about Canada and Quebec since we were talking about Upper Canada and Lower Canada and that we should therefore talk about Ontario and Quebec.

I would simply like to say to the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell that, putting aside the matter of Ontario and Quebec, we must admit that the action of the Patriotes and the Reformers was such that we can now enjoy freedom everywhere in Canada and a democratic and responsible government. The action of the Patriotes and the Reformers cannot be limited to Ontario and Quebec.

The question I asked myself was this: Why then, if he really intended to support the motion—because I must recognize in all honesty that the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell agreed with the substance, the principle of the motion, though he was worried about its wording—why then did he not support the motion? He had the right to do so. Our colleague has just proposed an amendment which after all does not change the meaning of the motion.

We would have been very disappointed if our colleagues opposite had continued to oppose this motion only, it seems, because of its wording. We are happy to see that we may come to an agreement so that this House finally recommends that the government recognize, more than a hundred years later, the historical contribution of the Patriotes and the Reformers to the establishment of responsible government, of which we are so proud.

If they had continued to reject this motion only because of its wording, they would have disappointed many groups in Ontario and Quebec as well as elsewhere in Canada that have been supporting us in this process from the beginning.

If they had continued, for disgraceful and base partisan motives, to try to deflect a supposedly level-headed debate on the recognition that is more than due to the Patriotes, Liberals and especially Reformers would have shown how low they could go. But, fortunately, government members are much more open today.

Refusing to recognize the invaluable contribution of the Patriotes and the Reformers to the establishment of responsible government, something we are so proud of today, is an insult to the memory of great men like Louis-Joseph Papineau, George-Étienne Cartier, William Lyon Mackenzie, Robert Baldwin and Louis-Hyppolyte Lafontaine. Not all Patriotes took up arms but we owe it to all of them that we live today in a free and democratic society today.

I would invite hon. members, my Reform and Liberal colleagues, to reflect on this before voting on this important motion.

I would like to conclude very briefly by thanking members from all sides for taking part in this debate. I would also like to express my particular thanks to Mr. Onil Perrier, of the Patriotes du pays, provided food for thought, and research material throughout the process.

In closing, I would like to thank—and I am sure that you will agree with me—my assistant and colleague, Catherine Beaudry, who did most of the research. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you agree with my words of thanks to her.

The Deputy Speaker: Colleagues, since the right of reply closes the debate, I must put the question to the House.

[English]

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: The question is on the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

Some hon. members: On division.

The Deputy Speaker: I declare the amendment adopted.

Amendment agreed to.

The Deputy Speaker: The question is now on the main motion as amended. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to the order made earlier this day, the motion stands deferred until Tuesday, December 13 at 5.30 p.m.

Mr. René Laurin (Joliette, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Would it be possible, since we have already gone through the procedure and voted on division, to go back and ask for a recorded division?

The Deputy Speaker: The Chair has a duty to be fair to all members. I know, as the hon. member just indicated, that there are certain rules. It seems to me we have already had a division. When I put the question, I was told they intended to rise.

Since they did, I must be fair to all members. They are entitled to ask for a division, and as the hon. member just said, I think they intended to do so.

Any further comments on this point?

[English]

It being 2.10 p.m., the House stands adjourned until Monday at 11 a.m.

The House resumed, from December 9, consideration of the motion that Bill C–56, an act to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, be read the third time and passed.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we are now at third reading of Bill C–56, which would amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act in three important ways. I want to say from the outset that the Bloc Quebecois will vote against this bill.

It is indeed impossible for us to support a bill to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, an act that we disagree with in the first place. We consider that this act is an unacceptable federal assault on a field of jurisdiction that is already occupied forcefully and effectively by certain provinces. Quebec, for instance, has its own environmental assessment process, which has proven itself.

Before going any further, I would like to take a moment to say a few words on the political strategy used by the Minister of the Environment, who is bent on associating the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act with our leader. We know that he is the one who originally initiated Bill C–78 in 1990, but a lot of water has passed under the bridge since then. The early bill has changed considerably, with the hundreds of amendments made by a legislative committee.

Many provisions and clauses have been deleted, rewritten or added. The flexibility our leader was looking for in Bill C–78, that became Bill C–13 in 1991, has disappeared and been replaced with rigidity in the legislative intent. Moreover, among the changes made, the statement to the effect that the federal government promotes sustainable development is a clear indication that it considers itself the sole authority for the renewal of resources, even though resources fall under provincial jurisdiction.

In light of all these changes, it is clear that the current centralizing vision of the Liberals is not in keeping with the original bill proposed by Mr. Bouchard. In an article that appeared in the April 1, 1992 edition of Le Devoir, Michel Yergeau, a well–known lawyer specializing in environmental law, reminded those who tried to justify federal intrusions in areas of provincial jurisdiction by invoking the fact that the first version of the reform was overseen by Mr. Bouchard, that Mr. Bouchard was well aware of the constitutional realities imposed by the nature of environmental problems.

Mr. Yergeau even repeated something that Mr. Bouchard said in one of his speeches: "In grey areas where the Constitution does not set out clearly the role of each government, co–operation must prevail". As we come to realize that the environmental debate and the fight for life itself must take place all over the globe as well as in every area of activity, our fellow citizens would not understand, much less tolerate wrestling matches between federal and provincial politicians.

Last Monday, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment told us that the federal government had already participated in many environmental assessments in Quebec. I must remind him that these assessments were carried out under the federal guidelines order providing for flexibility and co–operation between the two levels of government, something which Bill C–13 no longer allows.

Let me remind you of the Oldman River Dam case on which the Supreme Court ruled on January 23, 1992. The spirit of this ruling was one of respect for provincial jurisdiction. The Supreme Court ruled that the assessment process outlined in the guidelines order applies only to projects for which the Government of Canada has an "affirmative regulatory duty" pursuant to an act of Parliament.

Mr. Justice LaForest said, "It cannot have been intended that the guidelines order would be invoked every time there is some potential environmental effect on a matter of federal jurisdiction". He went on to say that the federal minister or the panel could not use the guidelines order as an excuse to invade—repeat, invade—areas of provincial jurisdiction unrelated to the area of federal jurisdiction involved.

The Canadian Environmental Assessment Act promulgated on October 6 is far removed from the Guidelines Order of June 1984 and Bill C–78. There used to be some flexibility and respect for provincial jurisdiction, but the new federal legislative and regulatory framework is more forceful and extends tentacles in every direction.

The CEEA has a major impact on the application in Quebec of Quebec's environmental assessment procedure. Clearly, there is a risk that this Quebec law and surely other provinces' environmental legislation will be constantly duplicated, challenged or subordinated to the federal process. Nevertheless, Quebec's procedure has been well established for ten years already, is well known to the public and developers and has proven itself.

In light of all the above, it is very clear that the minister's always associating our leader with Bill C–13 has no serious basis and may be due to some unadmitted desire to cast herself in the image of our leader when he was environment minister. But I think that the minister, as is her wont, is playing petty politics and using the only weapons she has, demagogy and partisanship.

To convince you of these unfortunate inclinations of the minister, I will show you that despite her praise and flattering remarks about our leader for his initial bill, Bill C–78, the minister voted against reinstating this bill on May 29, 1991 in this House.

Has the minister forgotten her vote against reinstating Bill C–78, which died on the Order Paper on May 12, 1991? All her Liberal colleagues also voted against reinstating it.

On May 29, 1991, the minister said that Bill C–78 should be thrown out. Today, she praises our leader for this same bill. I call that double talk. The minister is being flagrantly inconsistent. As always, she confuses the environment with partisan politics.

The minister's approach and behaviour are starting to give environmental groups and some provinces serious concerns. There is growing doubt about the Deputy Prime Minister's ability to run this important Department of the Environment well. Many people have told us that the minister does not know her issues and that her intransigent attitude is not at all appreciated. This situation is very disturbing and does not inspire confidence in the community.

A specific incident showing the minister's ignorance occurred on November 10 when she was in Charlottetown. The minister, who was there to meet the people and reassure them about the raising of the Irving Whale, took the opportunity to say that she was very poor in science in school. This incident was reported in Le Radar, a Magdalen Islands newspaper, for the week of November 18 to 24, 1994.

Here is an excerpt from this article signed by Achille Hubert: "In fact, the minister showed her abysmal ignorance when she was interviewed by Lyne Danis, a Radio–Canada journalist. When asked how the refloating operation was going to be conducted, the environment minister floundered. She thought the booms would be at the bottom of the water. As for the ship which will support the barge once it reaches the surface, she also thought that it would be at the bottom".

After listening to the option chosen to refloat that barge, I say that the minister has no idea of what is involved: She does not even have any sense of what this delicate operation entails. She showed her total ignorance of science, and I hope that the environment will not suffer more from her incompetence. Otherwise, it would not look very reassuring for the future.

I urge the minister to take a very close look at the issues which are under her responsibility, and to stop justifying her own inability by claiming that her predecessors were passive.

I want to go back for a moment to Bill C–78, which preceded Bill C–13, and remind you of what some members of this Liberal government were saying then, when they formed the opposition. At the time, the current Liberal member for Winnipeg North Centre said: "We want to make sure that the powers involved are sufficiently explicit to allow for the establishment of environmental rules capable of sustaining the pressure exerted by the provinces. With this legislation, the government does not succeed in at least protecting Canadians against the ambition of the federal and provincial governments. We have let people down in so many ways that if we were to do it once again, this would be the most infamous action ever taken by Parliament".

This is what the Liberal member for Winnipeg North Centre thought of that bill. It was not good yesterday, but it is just fine today.

The Liberal member for Eglinton—Lawrence, who is still here today, said this on October 22, 1990, and I quote: "This is legislation without teeth. It is, in fact, legislation without teeth. The key word was 'redraft' and not make amendments that are going to provide acceptable frills to this bill, but to alter completely the dimension of this bill. One of those items refers to the fact that the compliance component of the bill certainly is way lacking. There is absolute indifference to the concept of making various jurisdictions of government comply, particularly when they set up their own review mechanism".

The Liberal member for Egmont, in Prince Edward Island, said and I quote: "Bill C–78 does not satisfy the legislative requirements necessary to protect our environment. In view of the importance and the urgency of environmental impact legislation, we cannot be satisfied with an imprecise, toothless piece of legislation such as the bill presently before us. This bill does not meet the expectations of the people of Canada. It does not measure up to the expectations of its own appointed environment and economy committee. It is so seriously flawed that it should be withdrawn and redrafted".

As for the Liberal member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso, he said: "We should reconsider many basic aspects of this measure. I think that to be fair, it is somewhat short of perfection".

The Liberal member for Nepean added the following: "Unfortunately, the weakness of the legislation before us makes for a skeptical public and questions the motives of us as legislators and the seriousness of the government's intent in enacting this resolution".

The present Secretary of State for Latin America and Liberal member for Northumberland mentioned: "Mr. Mulroney's government's latest environmental legislation is fundamentally flawed. Canada will return to the dark ages of environmental law if Bill C–78 passes in its present form".

Other Liberal members, who are now heavyweights in the Liberal government, also spoke against Bill C–78 at the time. The present Minister of Industry said in the House: "The heritage of Canadians is too important to be left only to the provinces. Yet I do not see even a wish on the part of the federal government to acknowledge that it has the power to intervene in development projects which are going to be environmentally harmful. In many regards, this bill is not an appropriate answer to the numerous events happening in Canada".

This very enlightening statement by the minister shows the vision of the provinces the people opposite have. With this vision as a basis, no need to look very far to see why Liberals so cheerfully promote a centralizing kind of federalism that tends to crush and dominate the provinces.

The Minister of Industry, a fervent supporter of centralizing federalism, was not the only one to attack Bill C–78 at that time. His Cabinet colleague, the minister of social program reductions, mentioned that his colleagues and his party had brilliantly pointed out the flaws of this bill. The legislation was no good, he said. At the time, the minister of unemployment cuts said that he hoped we would one day have a government that would know how to negotiate a new agreement so that federal and provincial authorities would share responsibilities for such projects.

The minister of cuts then said that we should use our imagination to find a way to share the responsibility for environmental assessments. What a nice wish for the minister to express! Unfortunately, his wish did not come true, since his Minister of Environment, in her bill and her regulations, decided not to share this responsibility with the provinces and respect what the provincial governments are already doing, but rather to intrude by imposing her own assessment process.

I also find it rather funny to see that, back then, the minister of education cuts wanted to share responsibilities with the provinces, given his action today, his reform proposal and the negative reactions he has got so far from the provinces.

Finally, the prize for best decrying goes to our dear Minister of Finance, the minister of fake Canada–wide consultations. On May 29, 1991, he said in this House and I quote: "Bill C–78 is so flawed it will in fact undermine our existing standards for environmental assessment". He added: "My feeling is that if we have to go with Bill C–78 or none, go with none".

Here we have yet another minister who wanted to scrap Bill C–78. When you read all the speech he made on May 29, 1991, it becomes crystal–clear that the minister of consultation wanted more powers for Ottawa. Besides, nowhere in his speech did he mention the provinces and their jurisdiction. This speaks volumes about the domineering intentions of people across the floor.

This is what some Liberal members were saying when they were on this side of the House. What is so inconsistent and indecent in the Liberal position on Bill C–78 is that at the time they criticized the bill and the minister, our leader, who introduced it but today they commend him for having initiated the process.

The Liberals; headed by the Minister of Environment, now shower praise on our leader but then they hurled the pot at him. You are opportunists who change their minds with the weather. This opportunistic change of opinion unequivocally confirms that Bill C–78 has been so deeply amended that it has nothing to do any more with the purpose it was intended to fill at the time. Liberals themselves make this abundantly clear. If Liberals, in their minds, consider today's Bill C–13 as the equivalent of the then Bill C–78, the latter has to have been significantly changed to be approved today by the Liberals.

This confirms our claims that the act the minister proclaimed on October 6, 1994, is totally different from the one that was initiated at the time. The bill she has introduced today and the act it amends are unacceptable. The minister is predicting a new so–called era of co–operation but this is only to impress everyone. Far from bearing the stamp of co–operation, this new era will be one of centralization and domination by the Liberals.

The Canadian government forces this process upon us without looking at what is already being done in the provinces and it justifies the whole thing with a single bilateral agreement with Alberta. This is sufficient for the minister. This single agreement gives her the green light to impose her way on all other provinces.

Again, the Canadian government is laying down the law coast to coast. Canada is homogeneous, so, for the Liberals, what is signed or accepted by one province is good for all the others. What bad, simplistic reasoning.

We in the Bloc Quebecois do not accept that kind of standardization from sea to sea. We oppose Bill C–56 and the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act and we are not the only ones. The federal assessment process infringes on provincial jurisdiction and powers. Not only will it create duplication and disputes, but it will also subordinate provincial processes already in place.

Quebec opposes and has always opposed that federal assessment process. Since 1990, Quebec has regularly made representations on this to the federal government. Before, it was through Pierre Paradis, the former Minister of the Environment, a federalist Liberal, like the people opposite, and now, it is through Jacques Brassard, a member of the separatist Parti Quebecois, the present Minister of the Environment. Despite their conflicting political positions, those two men denounced federal interference in environmental assessment.

Pierre Paradis, the former minister and a true hard–line federalist, said that the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act was no exception to that dominating and totalitarian federalism. Coming from a federalist, that says a lot. He said that he saw Bill C–13 as dangerous interference in Quebec's affairs by the federal government. He added that Ottawa would then be in a position to impose its assessment on any Quebec project having an environmental impact. This hard core federalist said, and I quote: "With Bill C–13, the federal government is seeking to use all available means to subject the largest possible number of projects to the federal assessment process and even to control every aspect of the assessment when it is carried out by other authorities. The federal process will interfere constantly with the provincial process".

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment should understand these comments by his former provincial colleague. Moreover, as former Minister of the Environment in the National Assembly, the parliamentary secretary should pass on Quebec's message to his minister. Was he or was he not a member of the same government as Mr. Paradis?

On November 22, 1991, Mr. Paradis wrote to the minister, Jean Charest, who was luckier than his Conservative colleagues since he is still with us today. The letter said: "Far from clarifying the situation, Bill C–13 in its present form allows the federal assessment process to unnecessarily interfere with decisions which are exclusively Quebec's responsibility. This will create unproductive duplication of assessment procedures and will inevitably lead to numerous disputes".

Quebec's federalist minister said that he wished Ottawa would recognize and respect the assessment process put in place by the provinces. It seems to me that the message is clear. Mr. Paradis told the federal government to mind its own business.

All the letters, dozens of them, sent by this hard core federalist to the federal minister since 1990 contained the same messages. Let me read you a few of them. The minister was concerned that the bill would create "major constitutional problems and numerous difficulties in terms of implementation". On another occasion he said "that the federal government was not justified in using the protection of the environment as an excuse to interfere in areas under exclusive provincial jurisdiction". He also said that, to Quebec, this legislation meant that every environmental project would be subject to a federal assessment. He was concerned that adding the federal process to the provincial process would only create costly duplication and delays.

Finally, here is what Mr. Paradis was quoted as saying in the Journal de Montréal on March 17, 1994: "We have to harmonize the federal and provincial legislation so as to establish a single window in the area of environmental assessment, Quebec having priority over Ottawa". And he added that: "Quebec maintains its objective of having its jurisdictions protected, of being in charge". The current Liberal minister was there, on March 17, 1994. Why did she not hear and take into consideration the claims made by a federalist Quebec minister who had been strongly opposed to that legislation since 1990?

The new Quebec environment minister, Jacques Brassard, reacted scathingly to the promulgation of the Canadian act. Mr. Brassard recalled the Quebec representatives from the federal–provincial talks and did not show up himself at the environment ministers' conference in Bathurst, in early November. He said that discussions between the two levels of government on harmonizing environmental measures following the promulgation of the federal act were a farce, and said: "We are tired of being laughed at".

For Quebec, this legislation means being under trusteeship. Mr. Brassard put it even more bluntly: "This is utterly unacceptable to Quebec. This is provocation, a demonstration of arrogance and disregard for Quebec". With this federal legislation, developers in Quebec and in other provinces will be faced with two assessment processes with different requirements. In Quebec, businesses object to this dual assessment which will have a disastrous impact on the economy. Obviously, businesses will be reluctant to submit their projects, because they will not know what to expect from the environmental assessments.

Why do federal Liberals intrude with such arrogance in this area of provincial jurisdiction? They are federalists who, deep down, believe in a strong central government. They think that Ottawa is where it is at and that the federal government should have an overriding role. What else could we expect from them?

These people take the "think globally" approach in order to justify their excessive centralization. Members opposite hold the mistaken position that, because water and air know no boundaries, their preservation should be the responsibility of a big national machine. Who knows, with that kind of thinking, they may one day submit to a larger organization or even a world organization. Why not?

Again I quote Michel Yergeau, from Le Devoir of April 1, 1992: "The fact that Ottawa has found something called a 'global' approach that ignores boundaries is not reason enough to shrug off the Constitution. By passing Bill–13, the federal government makes an autocratic argument and unilaterally settles the dispute, necessarily in its favour".

That environmental law specialist had more sound remarks which graphically illustrate the problems the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act will bring. Here is what he says: "In order to justify that brutal approach, the federal government cloaks itself in the urgent necessity to preserve the environment in its own jurisdiction. The net results of that unilateral exercise are not good, nor can they be. It should be reconsidered and refined. As it now stands, Bill C–13 is a rough draft which will have to be refined by the courts on a case by case basis and which will only be a source of dissatisfaction for everybody. Ultimately, the process will take more time than if we had negotiated this issue. On second thought, the federal government has just set a time bomb in Canadian legislation. It is also a further threat to the constitutional reconciliation so dear to the federal government. And it is of no benefit for the environment either." End of this very enlightening quotation.

Please note Mr. Yergeau's last sentence. "And it is of no benefit for the environment either". You see, Mr. Speaker, the environment is an issue which must be dealt with in the field, at the community level. But we all know that federal centralism is not attuned to what happens at the community level.

Centralized structures are generally and often quite far from concrete problems and day to day situations. The environment needs efficiency: quick analyses, prompt actions and decisions as well as good relations between developers, decision makers and the community.

However, the minister's proposal is the complete opposite. Her process is slow, complicated, cumbersome and creates duplication. The environmental and economic repercussions will be very important, according to many experts.

In the first federal assessments, we will see how developers react and what effect the federal process will have on their decisions to submit projects. I am sure that they will not like being subjected to two environmental assessment processes. The federal government's interference in environmental assessment will create uncertainty and hesitation. It is deplorable that the minister does not seem to pay any attention at all to the impact her law will have on projects.

In December 1993, Quebec's aluminium industry association submitted the following statement to the Quebec minister of the environment and wildlife: "Section 5(1) of the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act sets conditions for the environmental assessment procedures even though these projects could already have been covered by a provincial process. . . We fear that duplication. . .will make the process more cumbersome without protecting the environment any better. This duplication will entail more costs and delays. . .developers will pay for this duplication and could very well decide to abandon economically beneficial projects".

Is that message not clear enough for the federal minister? The environment and the economy will be affected by the federal process.

Also, last January, the Centre patronal de l'environnement wrote to the federal government and said they believed it would be very difficult for the federal government to justify the implementation of a law that would unduly overlap provincial jurisdiction. With all the budgetary restraints, the federal government would be better off working in close co–operation with the provinces and sharing the fiscal burden, especially for this type of assessment where the costs and resources allocated will be considerable.

The Canadian Electrical Association expressed the same opinion in a brief submitted to the subcommittee which recently reviewed Bill C–56. I would like to quote three very revealing parts of that brief.

The first says:

[English]

"The CEAA, the Canadian Environment Assessment Act, contains serious shortcomings which are not addressed by Bill C–56. The bill before the subcommittee deals with red book commitments but does not look at issues such as jurisdiction and proponents' rights. We see the CEAA as an unwitting and unnecessary federal intrusion into jurisdictional controversy and as leading to more, not less, duplication. Harmonization agreements with the provinces will not resolve these fundamental flaws".

The second one is, and I quote:

[English]

"Canadian Electrical Association's objective is to ensure that the CEAA operates effectively and efficiently while providing the degree of certainty required for project proponents and operators. The act, even as amended by Bill C–56, and guided by the regulations published recently in the Canada Gazette, Part II, does not indicate that the environmental assessment process that will emerge will be workable".

And the last one is as follows:

[English]

"The intent of the act is not to ensure that economic activity in resource sectors stops, but that the environmental acceptability of projects be examined in a timely and appropriate manner to determine if they should proceed. The consequence of not having a workable process is that investments in projects will dry up. The Fisheries Act requires special attention because including this act as a trigger under CEAA could create uncertainty for already licensed operating facilities".

Despite its rhetoric on the federation being so efficient, the federal government is itself increasing the overlap and duplication which add to the administrative costs for governments and developers. In the name of federalism and a global approach, the government forces its way by imposing its process on us, which will create problems and lead to unacceptable costs. In the long run, clearly it will not be good for the environment and it will hurt the economy.

It is unfortunate that the federal government is once again acting unilaterally and treating the provinces, the developers, taxpayers and, of course, the environment with such disrespect.

We are all in favour of environmental assessment, but we are also in favour of showing respect for the processes already in place in the provinces. It is absolutely false to pretend that the federal government must make its presence felt for the sake of the environment. Quebec was a forerunner in the area of environmental assessments in Canada and has shown exemplary consistency and thoroughness.

The federal approach is even more unacceptable when you think that the Quebec process is recognized as one of the best of its kind. It is credible, well established and has proven its effectiveness. Since 1980, 745 projects have been submitted. Two hundred and ninety projects are presently at different stages in the process and some 25 major projects are completed every year.

What more do you want? Why is the federal government getting involved in this? Why do they want to duplicate the whole process that already exists in Quebec and elsewhere?

The federal minister believes that these problems, whether current or anticipated, will be settled by signing bilateral agreements with the provinces. Fine, but what will happen in the case of provinces with which she will not be able to strike a bilateral agreement? Has the minister considered this? Does she have an alternative for provinces which will not tolerate this intrusion by the federal government? The minister is speechless on this issue and has no answer. What matters for her is that the federal government makes the move, regardless of what the provinces want.

Since the beginning of my speech, I have often referred to the duplication of the assessment process due to federal interference in that field. Yet, the Liberals have been telling us since October 25, 1993 that they want to eliminate this unnecessary and costly duplication. The people opposite are quite far from delivering on their fine promises. Their actions and decisions are totally contrary to what they say.

But, besides duplicating what is already being done in the provinces, the Liberals cannot even clean up their own backyard. Let us take a serious look at clause 1 of Bill C–56. In its first version, that clause said: "to ensure that responsible authorities carry out their responsibilities in a co–ordinated and efficient manner with a view to eliminating unnecessary duplication in the environmental assessment process". Hence, we could think that the federal government, even though it is duplicating provincial processes, wanted to avoid any duplication deep down.

However, a motion put by the Liberals in sub–committee changed that clause. That motion included the words "to the extent possible" in the clause. The new clause reads as follows: "to ensure that responsible authorities carry out their responsibilities in a coordinated and efficient manner with a view to eliminate, to the extent possible, unnecessary duplication in the environmental assessment process"; To the extent possible, what nonsense and how ironic. Not only does the federal government duplicate provincial processes, but it also opens the door to duplication in its own operations.

I will conclude by saying that, eventually, the taxpayers will once again pay the price for that bad decision made by the federal government. They will pay twice because their environment, as well as the economy, will be affected.

What a mess the federal Liberals are making. How far will they go to satisfy their thirst for centralized power in Ottawa?

We will vote against this bill.

[English]

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I listened intently to the speech by the hon. member for Laurentides. I noticed that in her speech she took a shot at our present Minister of the Environment on her handling of the Irving Whale.

This is a very peculiar criticism because the present minister is the only minister in over two decades who has taken any action at all on the Irving Whale. She met with the fishermen and residents of Prince Edward Island and Îles–de–la–Madeleine .She met with scientists and found the money to remove the hazard from the Gulf of St. Lawrence. Yet she is under criticism because she is actually doing something about this environmental hazard.

I am curious to know what the hon. member would do. Would she remove the Irving Whale? Would she pump it out? Would she leave it there? What would she do? She seems to have become involved in this project only after the member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine got some publicity on it. If the minister is not doing a good job on this particular issue, I am curious to know what the member would do in her position.

The Deputy Speaker: The member for Egmont may not have been aware of the fact that at this stage of debate on the bill the first three speakers may speak for 40 minutes without question or comment afterward. The Chair is therefore obliged to take the member for Egmont's question and comment as an intervention and not as a question or comment.

Does the member for Egmont wish to split his time with the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment?

Mr. McGuire: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was listening as usual to my colleague from Laurentides who was speaking as usual about duplication and overlapping. I do not know what she would do if these words were not in her vocabulary.

During her speech, she asked quite a surprising question when she wanted to know what the federal government was doing in this. I wonder, at times, if we are living on the same planet. She also talked about centralizing federalism. In the most decentralized federal state in the world, perhaps she should have a little talk with the German minister of the environment or with the director of the American EPA and learn about how things are done in federal states.

In fact, as I said the other day, perhaps we will have to remind her once again that the Supreme Court said that the federal government not only has the right to intervene in the environment and in environmental assessments, but also has a strict duty to do so for all Canadians. I will remind her once again that the federal government is responsible for navigable waters, for all navigable waters whether they are in Quebec, New Brunswick or British Columbia.

It is responsible for fisheries throughout the territory and for all coastal areas, whether in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, British Columbia or the Arctic. All federal lands and all federal buildings in Canada are under federal jurisdiction.

The federal government also has a fiduciary responsibility for native peoples and thus for all the lands where native people live and have rights. It is responsible for the national harbours and ports, airports, the St. Lawrence Seaway, interprovincial and international trade and international agreements.

What is so unusual for a government with national responsibilities to pass a law on environmental assessments for whatever comes under its jurisdiction?

In fact, this law was written when the opposition leader was Minister of the Environment and now, people will try anything to demonstrate that it is different. But basically the law is exactly the same as it was initially.

Mrs. Guay: That is not true.

Mr. Lincoln: Mr. Speaker, I listened very carefully to what the hon. member for Laurentides had to say. I would ask her to at least have the courtesy to remain silent for the time being and let me speak.

Mr. Marchand: It is untrue.

Mr. Lefebvre: It is untrue.

Mr. Lincoln: In any case, the principle of this bill is identical to that of the previous bill introduced by the Leader of the Opposition.

In fact, in September 1994, only two months ago, in an interview with the Gazette, the Leader of the Opposition referred to this legislation as "his baby". During the 1993 election campaign, he made a reference to the legislation in an interview on Le Point, when he said: "We must support this legislation". I remember several instances during his previous and present mandate when he supported the principle of this bill.

One can use quotes to prove anything, but perhaps we should also quote what was said by the people of the Quebec centre of environmental law who say this legislation is entirely legiti-mate. Perhaps we should also quote lawyers Michel Bélanger and Franklin Gurter, and see what they have to say. Lawyers do not all think alike.

But the crucial point is that today, yesterday and the day before, there have been assessments in areas of joint jurisdiction. I explained this to the hon. member for Laurentides the other day. I mentioned several cases: the Port of Cacouna, the Lachine Canal, the Sainte–Marguerite River. Today, she stressed this would be impossible under the present legislation. Prove it! In fact, the legislation has an active provision that allows for administrative agreements with all the provinces, individual agreements under which this kind of joint assessment can be done in an entirely normal and active way. So there is nothing in this legislation to discourage the kind of joint assessment that was done in the past.

The government has no intention of interfering with provincial environmental assessments. She talks about the BAPE as though the BAPE in Quebec were going to disappear. She talked about Quebec's environmental assessment process as though it would cease to exist. Of course it will continue, as will everything else, the same way as in the past. Except that today, in accordance with a formal commitment we made during the election campaign, in the red book, we decided to proclaim this legislation which was initially introduced several years ago and then put on the back burner for a number of years, for no good reason. So at least we had the courage to proclaim it. From now on, all environmental assessments will have to be done on a co–operative basis.

I think the minister made that quite clear. She got in touch with her counterparts, both Mr. Paradis and Mr. Brassard, to explain that the federal government did not intend to encroach on the provincial government's exclusive jurisdiction, but nevertheless, it has certain rights and duties, as ruled by the Supreme Court, that must be respected and that include doing environmental assessments where necessary. I do not see that as an encroachment by centralist federalism and all those big words the hon. member for Laurentides mentioned with such resentment.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Lincoln: I see this bothers the members of the Bloc. We show them the courtesy of listening to what they have to say, but they never show us the slightest courtesy. All they can do is shout.

• (1150)

That did not prevent me from saying what I think, that is that there are two sides to a coin. You, of course, would like Canada to break up. How could the Bloc Quebecois, the members of the Bloc, possibly accept a federal piece of legislation? Surely it is unthinkable. Indeed, the member for Laurentides showed her bitterness by saying how abysmally ignorant the current minister was on the issue. Speaking about the Irwing Whale, she invited the minister "to take a very close look at the matter." What nerve.

In fact, as my colleague said, the current Minister of the Environment was the first one—I think there were six before her, including the Leader of the Opposition who was responsible for the matter for two years and did nothing despite all the mail he received—to take action less than three months after she got the environment portfolio. Now the member for Laurentides who is new to these matters has the nerve to say that the minister is abysmally ignorant.

The Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The parliamentary secretary's time is up. There are five minutes left for questions and comments. The member for Laurentides.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I see that the truth is hard to take. The member made a speech and did not even explain his bill. He simply attacked us while I described specific problems that Bill C–56 would create with the provinces. And he is perfectly aware of them.

Also, the member for Lachine—Lac–Saint–Louis, having himself been a provincial minister of the environment, knows all about the BAPE. He knows perfectly well how it works and should have advised the minister since he knew that the BAPE was managing perfectly well in Quebec. We did not need this federal overlap on environmental reviews. To me the member has just proven that he is totally blinded by his own partisanship and his centralizing idea of federalism.

As for the Irving Whale, I was quoting a newspaper when I spoke about it a moment ago. I did not make this up. It was written by journalists who felt very badly served by the Minister of the Environment who did not know the facts at all. So if members opposite will not take some criticism and go back and do their homework, this government has a problem.

Mr. Lincoln: Mr. Speaker, the problem with this government is that it is taking measures that the hon. member's leader did not take for two years with respect to the Irving Whale. Ask your leader, when he comes back, what he did about the Irving Whale.

I am not talking about Mr. Bouchard as an individual but as the Leader of the Opposition. I would like to ask the hon. member who is criticizing the minister if the Leader of the Opposition, while he was Minister of the Environment and after receiving numerous letters, did anything about the Irving Whale when he was responsible for the matter? And you have the gall to criticize the minister who, after only three months, did something about it!

As for the BAPE, I ask the hon. member to prove to the House that the BAPE will disappear, that its operations will change from what they are now. Indeed, I am in a good position to know the BAPE because I established the Lacoste Committee on the BAPE in Quebec. I know the BAPE inside out. You will have to show me how the BAPE will differ from what it is today and why it will make fewer evaluations.

The BAPE will continue to operate in exactly the same way. What we want to do with the act is to maintain what is already provided for in the federal guidelines. Nothing will change except that there will be an act instead of guidelines. That is all. The federal government has very clear jurisdiction, as I explained, and that is why we are doing this.

How could the PQ and Bloc members, who want to destroy this country, agree with a federal piece of legislation? Of course you will not support a federal law! Name one other province, only one that refuses Bill C–13 today. Name only one. If you can, I will support you.

The Deputy Speaker: I would like to ask members to direct their observations to the Chair for reasons which have been explained at least a hundred times before. There is about a minute left, and we will use it for questions or comments. I recognize the hon. member for Frontenac and I ask him to be brief.

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Of course, Mr. Speaker. There is a potential ecological problem which goes back almost 25 years. I would like to remind the former Quebec minister, who had the environment portfolio at the time, that when the Irving Whale sank, she was in so–called international waters. The Liberal Party, under Mr. Trudeau, extended our jurisdiction to 100 nautical miles and thereby assumed responsibility for the wreck.

True, the minister reacted positively three months after she took over as Minister of the Environment. However, what the hon. member for Lachine—Lac–Saint–Louis does not say is that from 1970 to 1994, except for nine years of Conservative government and nine months under former Prime Minister Joe Clark, the environment portfolio was continuously held by the Liberals.

Mr. Lincoln: Mr. Speaker, I do not think that deserves an answer. I believe that the actions of the minister speak for themselves. She is the first to take concrete measures and the first to have the courage to act on this. The actions speak for themselves, we do not need any other kind of answer.

The Deputy Speaker: Resuming debate. I recognize the hon. member for Terrebonne. According to my list, the hon. member for Terrebonne should be the next to speak, but if he is not here, we could go on to the next speaker.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I might be able to explain why the hon. member for Terrebonne is late. I also just got in. I had to take Boulevard Métropolitain in Montreal, and you know how it is. This morning there was a stalled bus, a bit further on a large semi–trailer. All in all, it took me an hour and a half longer than usual to reach the Hill.

An hon. member: Here he comes.

The Deputy Speaker: I think that, with unanimous consent, we can give the floor to the hon. member who just came in.

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, excuse my being out of breath, but as my colleague pointed out, there are times when one is even more in a rush than normally. I want to thank you for having the patience to wait for me. I really wanted to speak on Bill C–56. That is why I asked my colleagues to give me a hand and let you know that I was coming.

However, before I start talking about Bill C–56, in this festive season, I would like to say a few words to the people in the beautiful riding of Terrebonne. As previously mentioned in this House, the riding of Terrebonne is the most beautiful one after your own, dear colleagues. I would like to wish my constituents a very happy holiday season. I also would like to wish all the members of the great Bloc Quebecois family in the riding of Terrebonne a very merry Christmas and a happy New Year. I want to tell them that, in the coming year, we will have to work very hard, and that I look forward to working with them.

I now want to address Bill C–56, an act to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act. It should first be pointed out that the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment meets regularly to harmonize, as much as possible, the various environment acts which cause problems between the federal government and the provinces.

While the provincial ministers are trying to agree on how to improve federal–provincial relations on the environment, the federal minister tells them: "You may pursue your useless talks on the harmonizing the environmental assessment process, but as for me, I will proclaim the CEEA which will immediately be amended by Bill C–56 and, in so doing, I will agree to federal interference in this area, which will be legitimized as soon as the bill is passed".

But the minister tells them: "Go on, continue your discussions between provinces, while I put forward the so–called flexible federalism". The subject of flexible federalism was raised last Thursday, and my colleague from Laurier—Sainte–Marie gave us a definition of flexible federalism: it is a federal system in which the federal government encroaches on the provinces and the provinces give in. Bill C–56 is a case in point.

This short bill is designed to amend Bill C–13 with just four clauses, but these clauses show the federal government's intention to interfere in environmental assessment.

Logically, the federal government should limit itself to environmental assessments of projects for which it is the main developer, projects carried out on crown lands or Indian lands that require its specific authorization or to which it contributes so much that the very project depends on it. That is not the case with Bill C–56.

With Bill C–13 as amended by Bill C–56, the federal government is moving in the opposite direction. It gives itself the authority to make assessments in just about any circumstance, based on the various criteria prescribed in the legislation. This bill, if adopted, that is if Bill C–56 is allowed to amend Bill C–13, will result in legal controversy, federal–provincial conflict, again, immeasurable cost due to overlap, endless delays for the proponents. For developers, it will mean loss of contracts, loss of projects, loss of economic benefits.

Finally, the most deplorable effect this bill will have is inadequate environmental protection, because of the stubbornness of governments—need I remind you—as it is the duty of each to protect its own jurisdiction. Imposing federal jurisdiction on the provinces like that is not the way to go. The biggest loser in all this will be the environment, the very thing we were supposed to be protecting. The primary objective of the legislation is nullified by this legislation, this amended legislation. How great.

I am certainly not saying that it would be easy to determine which level of government should have jurisdiction on the environment. The constitutional division of environmental law–making powers is complex; the Constitution allocates certain responsibilities to the provinces and others to the federal government.

The Canadian Constitution does not give jurisdiction over the environment to the federal government or the provinces. When legislative powers were divided in 1867, the people and Parliament knew very little about the problems of pollution and environmental degradation. We must understand that the Fathers of Confederation could not include in the Constitution matters which were not then of public interest. That is partly why this sector is not among the various responsibilities assigned to the two levels of government under sections 91 and 92 of the 1867 Constitution Act.

While provincial environment ministers are trying to come to an agreement because the Constitution is far from clear on who is responsible for what in this area, the minister jumps into the fray saying, "Get out of my way. I am the boss in this matter".

Unfortunately for her, the official opposition is standing guard and will not remain silent on a bill like C–56, which will undermine the environmental assessment powers of Quebec and the other provinces by complementing C–13. It must be pointed out that Quebec has its own environmental assessment law, the Environment Quality Act. This law was even called one of the best in the world and one of the best assessment procedures.

With over 20 years of experience in environmental assessment, Quebec is way ahead. Why set this aside? Why reject this out of hand? Bill C–56 calls into question expertise that was acquired two decades ago.

On many occasions, the federal government has shown its interest in the environment. It has put forward principles like sustainable development, the fact that the environment knows no boundaries, and the national interest. On environmental issues, we have also been told about peace, order and good government, which are found in section 91. In short, a whole slew of arguments that we consider indefensible a priori. We have evidence to the contrary.

Bill C–13, as amended by Bill C–56, is a real legal hornets' nest. As you know, the great majority of legal challenges in this field end up in the Supreme Court, which means long delays, and except for lawyers, no one wins in these sterile conflicts. Here we might recall the dilemma opposing Hydro Québec and the Canadian government. I think it is worth giving an example to show that it is not easy to meddle so obviously in another's environmental jurisdiction.

Yes, the dispute arises from the Canadian Environmental Protection Act and not Bill C–13, but the example could very well apply to Bill C–13. The second part concerning toxics is at issue but I am sure that the ruling enlightens us on the wrong direction taken in Bill C–56. Let me quote you part of the sentence handed down by the Quebec Court and upheld by the Quebec Superior Court:

"Giving the federal government jurisdiction over the environment would allow it to infringe on provincial fields of jurisdiction. I repeat here those listed by the applicant: Section 92, subsection 5, public lands belonging to the province; section 92, subsection 8, municipal institutions; subsection 10, local works and undertakings; subsection 13, property and civil rights; and, finally, subsection 16, matters of a merely local nature".

These are some of the provisions which made these two authorities come to the following conclusion: "I have already said that, in my opinion, this section cannot fall under the general power of the federal Parliament to make laws for peace, order and good government. I am also of the opinion that this section cannot fall under the power to legislate criminal law. I therefore declare this section—of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act—to be ultra vires". That section of the act relating to PCBs and deemed to be ultra vires can have a bearing on the whole underlying philosophy of the Canadian Environmental Protection Act.

The government, which is not even waiting for the impending conclusion of this judgment, now wants to impose an amendment which will also be challenged. Who is the government trying to please, if not lawyers? We wonder.

A court has doubts about the federal authority. The government ignores the decision and continues to interfere even more, probably in the hope of having its other environmental act challenged all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada and see that tribunal conclude that it is ultra vires.

Why is the government so stubborn? It cannot even fulfill its current commitments, yet it keeps asking for more. As you know, in spite of the conventions and treaties signed, the Great Lakes and the St. Lawrence River are more polluted than ever before. In spite of the billions of dollars spent, as mentioned in the newspapers last week, acid rain keeps poisoning our forests and lakes. In spite of the treaty signed in Rio, Canada has not reached its objective of reducing greenhouse gases. And the federal government still wants to interfere in a field which falls under provincial jurisdiction. We must wonder why the federal government wants to interfere in areas under provincial jurisdiction when it cannot even adequately carry out its own obligations. Tell me why.

After all, Canadians and Quebecers will have to foot the bill for this. Some would argue that the environment knows no boundary, and it is true. We are reminded of that so often that we have to wonder why broader international treaties are not signed. Yes, we agree that the government has the right to sign such agreements, but when it does, it cannot even honour them.

In 1992, the federal government became involved in promoting sustainable development, but did not meet its objectives. This example and all the others I have already given show why, with our expertise is Quebec, with a bill like Bill 26 passed by the Ontario legislature to protect its environmental rights, with the environmental agreements reached with Alberta and with all the various agreements, we just have to reject Bill C–56 that would amend Bill C–13 and create grey areas in interpreting the law. Before passing any laws that would raise doubts, we must determine who has jurisdiction in this area. I think the minister should listen to what the Canadian Council of Ministers of the Environment has to say.

I urge the House to examine, reconsider and reject Bill C–56.

Mrs. Monique Guay (Laurentides, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I only want to say that this third reading debate is perhaps the last and only opportunity we will have to speak on Bill C–56. The Committee on Environment, is touring the country and we realized that the bill raises great concerns. Business people and provinces are worried and provincial environment departments are not sure how this legislation works. All they see is overlap and duplication.

The message here to Quebec and the other provinces, which will have the same problem, is that it will cost an arm and a leg to administer. We have to save everywhere, I think, not only in the budgets and things like that. All departments must do their part to save and reduce the current deficit, and the Department of the Environment is no exception.

The Department of the Environment should perhaps better administer its budget and avoid overlap and duplication of services that already exist in other jurisdictions, namely the provinces. This bill will not work. It will cause economic and legal problems. It will be awful for Canada's and especially Quebec's economic development.

These are the simple comments I wanted to make.

Mr. Sauvageau: Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to thank my colleague for her very pertinent remarks concerning Bill C–56. As she said in her speech and as I said in mine, the House is now aware of the reasons why we do not support this bill. I think that the arguments she so eloquently put forward and the ones I tried to present to the House myself explain why we have to oppose this bill.

We agree that the federal government used to be able to intervene and conduct an environmental assessment on federally owned land in an area under provincial jurisdiction. For example, right now, in my riding, the Department of National Defence is clearing an army mine field. It laid the mines in the first place. In this instance, we cannot ask Quebec to allocate funds to clean up a mess for which the Department of National Defence is responsible.

We are asking the federal government to honour its commitments on federally owned land. But we are being told in this bill that the federal government will be able to assess projects if it made any kind of investment, issued a licence, or had anything at all to do with them. In other words, the federal government will be able to subject any projects proposed by a province to an environmental assessment. We believe that this bill will lead to countless legal disputes and that is why we cannot support it.

I thank the member for Laurentides for her comments which are in total agreement with what I said earlier.

• (1215)

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, despite his late arrival, I congratulate my colleague, the member for Terrebonne, on his speech. As we say on the Beaupré coast, he landed on his feet.

I quote from an article under the heading "Oil covered young hooded seal found alive in Madgalen Islands", published Thursday, December 8 in Le Soleil from Quebec City, because a few minutes ago, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of the Environment bragged that his government acted quickly to refloat the Irving Whale. I quote Le Soleil: "Olivier, the veterinarian, mentioned the barge Irving Whale whose vents leak oil and which the federal Minister of the Environment refused to plug, saying that the leaks did not have much impact on the environment". I would like to know what my colleague from Terrebonne thinks of that.

Mr. Sauvageau: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans. I tried to land on my feet, but I am not in total agreement with him. Granted, the environment minister did decide quickly that something had to be done. Except that her decision was that something should be done in five, ten or fifteen years—we shall see.

She was quick to say something should be done, but she will not move as quickly to get things done. We should be able to agree on that. Is the Irving Whale involved in all this? Yes, obviously. In other words, the only thing the minister has done so far is to acknowledge that there is a problem with the Irving Whale. We could congratulate her on that, but I think just about anybody could recognize that problem.

She told us she will probably refloat the barge, and that she will probably do it very soon. In Liberal terminology, "very soon" means we will have to wait for quite a while. Are we justified in asking questions about the refloating of the Irving Whale? Yes. At this very moment, as my colleague from Laurentides told us, there are oil leaks in that area.

Recently, dead ducks have been reported in that area. They have been killed by oil leaking from the Irving Whale. There is also the seal issue which my colleague from Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans just mentioned, and many more environmental problems that have a terrible impact. Every day that goes by has catastrophic consequences in that area, and if one decision should be made quickly, it is to solve the problem immediately.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

And the division bells having rung:

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), I have been requested by the acting government whip to defer the division until a later time.

[English]

Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until tomorrow at 5.30 p.m., at which time the bells will sound for 15 minutes.

IMMIGRATION ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–44, an act to amend the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Customs Act, as reported (with amendment) from the committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Deputy Speaker: Colleagues, this is a ruling by the Chair.

[Translation]

There are 23 motions in amendment on the Notice Paper for the report stage of Bill C–44, an act to amend the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Customs Act.

[English]

Motions Nos. 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 18, 19 and 23 will be grouped for debate.

A copy of this ruling can be sent to anyone who wants one.

[English]

A vote on Motion No. 1 applies to Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 18, 19 and 23.

Is that clear? Motions Nos. 2 and 7 are identical to motions that were presented and defeated in committee. Consequently, pursuant to Standing Order 76.1(5), they will not be selected.

Motions Nos. 13 and 14 will be grouped for debate but voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 15, 16 and 17 will be grouped for debate but voted on separately. Motion No. 20 will be debated and voted on separately.

MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

As you may have been briefed, I discussed with my hon. critics from both the Bloc and the Reform Party in seeking unanimous consent this morning at report stage to introduce an amendment on clause 20 which would have the effect on those individuals who are currently in federal penitentiaries who would be deportable at the end of their term, that they not be given consideration for either day parole or unescorted temporary absences. It would seem illogical that individuals who upon completion of their term were to be deported should be moved back into the Canadian community.

I seek unanimous consent so that that may be added to the list of clauses that will be debated at report stage.

The Deputy Speaker: Colleagues, my understanding is that this motion was ruled to be beyond the terms of the bill. As members know, members can by unanimous consent do whatever they wish to do, and this would appear to be one of those situations.

[Translation]

Is there unanimous consent to accept the motion moved by the minister?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Deputy Speaker: The House will vote on the motion moved by the minister at the end of the list.

I shall now propose motions Nos. 1, 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 18, 19 and 23 to the House.

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ) moved:

That Bill C–44, in Clause 1, be amended by replacing line 8, on page 1, with the following:

"made under subsection 23(4),".

That Bill C–44, in Clause 3, be amended by replacing line 19, on page 3, with the following:

"may, subject to subsections (4), (4.2)".

That Bill C–44, in Clause 3, be amended by deleting lines 45 to 48, on page 3, and lines 1 to 25, on page 4.

That Bill C–44, in Clause 3, be amended by replacing line 27, on page 4, with the following:

"tion (4) shall truthfully provide such".

That Bill C–44, in Clause 3, be amended by replacing line 39, on page 4, with the following:

"or a conditional departure order".

That Bill C–44, in Clause 6, be amended by replacing line 44, on page 6, with the following:

"subsection 23(4) or a departure order".

That Bill C–44, in Clause 8, be amended by replacing line 23, on page 7, with the following:

"to in any of subsections 23(4) or".

That Bill C–44, in Clause 10, be amended by replacing line 6, on page 8, with the following:

"under subsection 23(4) or (4.2) or".

That Bill C–44, in Clause 10, be amended by replacing line 14, on page 8, with the following:

"under subsection 23(4) or (4.2) or 27(4)".

That Bill C–44, in Clause 11, be amended by replacing line 23, on page 8, with the following:

"23 (4.2) or 27(6), shall cause an".

That Bill C–44, in Clause 16, be amended by replacing line 4, on page 15, with the following:

"section 20(1) or 23(4) or (4.2) or".

That Bill C–44, in Clause 17, be amended by replacing lines 11 and 12, on page 15, with the following:

"pursuant to subsection 20(1) or 23(4) or (4.2); or".

That Bill C–44, in Clause 25, be amended by deleting lines 10 to 26, on page 19.

• (1225)

He said: Mr. Speaker, Bill C–44 to amend the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Customs Act went through first reading in the House of Commons on June 17, 1994. It was passed at second reading on September 27 with our support, because we supported the principle of this bill, and was then referred to the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration.

The committee tabled its report on December 8, after hearing several organizations concerned with this bill. It is a very complex and highly technical bill. We moved several amendments and the Speaker grouped them into five main motions for debate.

The first debate deals with the issue of the powers of senior immigration officers, or SIO, as they are called in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. The main clauses relating to the powers of the senior immigration officer are clauses 4 and 19 of Bill C–44. These already very wide powers are being considerably increased with respect to the exclusion of refugee status claimants at Canadian borders or entry points.

Another clause relating to powers has been included in Bill C–44 and would give the senior immigration officer the authority to issue a warrant for the arrest of people who do not show up for an examination or inquiry.

Clause 19 of Bill C–44 says that a warrant for the arrest of any person may be issued where a decision is to be made pursuant to subsection 27(4), that is administrative removal.

Section 103(i) of the Immigration Act states that a warrant for the arrest and detention may be issued against any person where an examination or inquiry is to be held and where there are reasonable grounds to believe that the person poses a danger to the public or would not appear for the examination or inquiry.

Clause 19 of Bill C–44 amends section 103 of the Immigration Act so that a warrant for arrest may be issued against any person where a decision is to be made by the senior immigration officer. That warrant for arrest may be served by the police so that the person is forced to appear.

My amendment would ensure that a notification to appear or to attend would be sent before any warrant for arrest is issued. I believe that we must add this notification as a prerequisite in the bill.

The bill gives too much authority to the senior immigration officer who already has enough. We must prevent unnecessary and arbitrary arrests, particularly since this arrest warrant is not issued by a judge, as it normally is in all democratic societies, but by a civil servant.

Often, people cannot appear because they changed address and did not get the notification. Sometimes the civil servant's computer did not take in the person's new address. Those are my comments on the power to issue warrants for arrest.

Let us now briefly analyze the additional power given to the senior immigration officer, who would have the authority to exclude some persons at the border or point of entry. As things now stand, the senior immigration officer has a specific and very wide jurisdiction. He may make an exclusion order for anyone arriving at the Canadian border. At the present time, if the senior immigration officer receives a person who does not come under his jurisdiction, he must order an inquiry and refer the case to an adjudicator.

With Bill C–44, the minister wants to change that and significantly increase the powers of the senior immigration officer. He wants to allow this person to make exclusion orders, even outside his jurisdiction, and this is unacceptable. This means that the senior immigration officer can, if he is convinced that the case does not warrant an inquiry, refuse entry, at the border, to someone who might need Canada's protection.

We totally disagree with clause 4 of Bill C–44, for various reasons. The bill is not consistent. On the one hand, it says that some cases do not come under the jurisdiction of senior immigration officers, but on the other, it allows these same officers to make exclusion orders without inquiry, and this is serious.

If the government wants fair and consistent legislation, it should say that when a case is processed by a senior immigration officer who does not have jurisdiction, it must be referred to the adjudicator for an inquiry. The adjudicator is a civil servant who is supposed to be impartial. Senior immigration officers have less expertise and less understanding of the laws and regulations than adjudicators.

Ever since the 1985 Supreme Court decision in the Singh case, every person in Canada, not only Canadian citizens or landed immigrants, is protected by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In order to have a fair and just system, there must be an inquiry whenever the situation is not clear, in particular in those cases which do not come under the jurisdiction of the senior officer.

The Supreme Court also said that the possible costs of such an inquiry on certain refugees do not constitute a reasonable justification to limit this right. According to the Supreme Court, the fact that the government deems an inquiry to be too expensive is not a good enough reason to deprive someone of the right to have one.

Other clauses of the bill give considerably more power to public officials and I will get back to that later. For instance, customs officers will be allowed to search international mail, examine documents, and in some cases, immigration officers will be able to seize those documents.

Therefore, for all these reasons, we are opposed to this considerable increase in the authority of senior immigration officers. Under the circumstances, we believe that the status quo is fairer and more just. This is why we presented our motion to amend Bill C–44.

[English]

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. The motions being offered in amendment by my hon. colleague from the Bloc would thoroughly gut this bill.

We oppose the amendments, not because we support the bill. While the bill is unenforceable and poorly thought out, its intent is acceptable. These amendments would have the effect of removing even the good intent of the bill.

Specifically the amendments remove the authority of senior immigration officers dealing with removals and deportations. They take away authority from the minister and deputy minister to apply removal law to visitors in Canada.

In short, my colleagues in the Bloc want the status quo in immigration or less than status quo. They do not want to see a change in refugee policy but I believe the Bloc does not speak for Canadians in this area. They do not think that Canada's immigration law needs to be toughened up. Needless to say, we disagree. Therefore we oppose these amendments.

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, before I speak to the amendments tabled under group one, I would like to thank the Bloc as well as the Reform Party for permitting the House to add to the list of motions the amendment that I will be speaking to later with respect to day parole and release.

Of the amendments in group one, the principal one is Motion No. 3. All others in group one are a consequence of Motion No. 3.

The current situation is that when a person contravenes the Immigration Act on more than one ground, a senior immigration officer cannot issue a removal order and must go to an inquiry. We are not trying to seek more power for the immigration officer for the sake of power or we are not trying to seek to block the entry of legitimate immigrants or legitimate refugee claimants.

On the contrary, we are trying to apply some common sense and some efficiency to the system. For example, if an individual comes to the border and has an inappropriate visa or an inappropriate passport that individual is blocked from coming into the country. Or if an individual in the country has overstayed his or her visit, the immigration officer is permitted to ask that individual to be removed from Canada.

The complications under the current legislation come into play if the individual who has the wrong passport or the wrong visa also has a serious violation against the Immigration Act, let us say a conviction of some sort. Then the immigration officer, because of the serious allegation, cannot move out the individual based on the lesser one of the two violations. We are trying to correct this area in the legislation which, quite frankly, does not make sense.

If the person has two violations, one minor and one more serious, why can the immigration officer not move out the individual based on the lesser of the two offences? He could do so if the individual only had one minor charge.

Presently the senior immigration officer cannot move out the individual because of the serious charge. A serious charge requires an inquiry. We are attempting to clarify and render the system more efficient.

If there is a lesser contravention and a more serious contravention of the act we do not push an inquiry needlessly because, if the legislation would permit it, it would allow an officer to remove the individual on the lesser of two charges. Ultimately the serious charge would probably render the person removable anyway.

The Deputy Speaker: Are his remarks being directed at the motion that by unanimous consent is to be voted on later? Do I misunderstand? If he is speaking to that issue, it will be dealt with later.

We are now dealing with the issues presented by the hon. member for Bourassa. I would ask the minister to direct his comments if he would only at the matters before the House now.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Speaker, with all due respect that is exactly what I am doing. I am speaking to the first group of amendments. I am not talking about the day parole or the unattended escort. That I know will be debated at the very end. I am debating the motion put forward by the Bloc which would not allow the senior immigration officer to remove an individual with two contraventions but would have to move the person through an inquiry.

We should try to make the system more efficient. Yes, an individual must be given full rights under the law but where there has been a contravention of the act I do not think an individual should be permitted to stay just because there are two contraventions. If there was one minor contravention that individual would have been removed. I do not see the logic of the current legislation. That is why I oppose the series of amendments in group one.

[Translation]

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to talk about the motions introduced by my colleague for Bourassa. Of course I will not list them all. I would simply like to say that the motions which are being debated seek to amend Bill C–44, and in particular clause 3(2) and (4.01) and, of course, the corresponding references.

I would like to take a few minutes to talk about the general scope of those motions, particularly with respect to subsection (4.01), which confers a wider jurisdiction to the senior immigration officer at the expense of the adjudicator and this transfer of authority seems unjustified to us.

Indeed senior immigration officers who are in fact officials of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration would be given greater powers at the expense of the fair treatment provided for by the quasi–judicial mechanism, that is, the power of the adjudicator.

Subsection (4.01) confers and re–inforces what was already provided for in the act, namely the concept of expeditious justice without any procedural guarantees and without the presence of a lawyer or a counsellor.

Besides being authorized to make exclusion orders against certain persons already referred to in section 19 of the act, under Bill C–44, the senior immigration officer will be allowed to make an exclusion order against all classes of inadmissible persons, to order an inquiry and to allow such persons to leave Canada forthwith.

• (1245)

Obviously, in our opinion, the government is slowly dismantling the arbitration structure for the benefit of its officials. We should be concerned about that and reject the measures proposed to that end. This is the precise purpose of the motions that the hon. member for Bourassa explained so well.

The Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Deputy Speaker: The question is on Motion No. 1. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Motions Nos. 13 and 14 will be grouped for debate but voted upon separately.

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ) moved:

That Bill C–44, in Clause 12, be amended by replacing line 21, on page 11, with the following:

"years or more may be imposed and the person was sentenced to a term of imprisonment of two years or more and the".

That Bill C–44, in Clause 12, be amended by adding after line 23, on page 11, the following new section:

"12.1 The Act is amended by adding the following after subsection 53(1):

"(1.1) Paragraphs (1)(a) to (d) do not apply to a person

(a) who was admitted to permanent residence in Canada before attaining the age of ten years where it is demonstrated that the person has no emotional or other ties to the country to which it is proposed the person be removed, or

(b) who has been admitted to permanent residence in Canada and has resided in Canada for ten years or more since being admitted."."

He said: Mr. Speaker, the second group of motions being debated concerns the deportation of permanent residents who have been convicted of an offence for which a term of imprisonment of ten years or more may be imposed. Clause 12 of Bill C–44 describes the circumstances under which convention refugees may be removed.

The bill provides that any person who has been convicted of an offence under any act of Parliament for which a term of imprisonment of 10 years or more may be imposed may be sent back to his or her country of origin. Maximum terms of ten years or more are handed out for offences, many of which are listed in the Criminal Code, such as use of a forged passport, theft exceeding $1,000, unauthorized use of a computer, counterfeiting stamps, and so on.

Clause 12 does not differentiate between serious or major crimes and minor crimes that have no serious consequences for Canadian society. In other words, the bill does not take into account the actual duration of the sentence imposed on an individual for a given offence. This amendment will prevent potential injustices that would result from the application of this provision.

Our amendment will prevent individuals who committed minor offences from being sent back to their country of origin. It ensures that the bill recognizes the seriousness of the offences in question and the actual duration of the sentence imposed on permanent residents convicted of offences considered serious.

We think that the maximum sentence should be reduced from ten years to two and that only the actual duration instead of the maximum sentence should count.

Our second amendment to this clause is to prevent the deportation of permanent residents who have resided in Canada for a long time.

As it stands, the bill does not provide any protection to permanent residents established in Canada for a long time who, therefore, have little or no emotional ties to their country of origin. This is presently the case of many people in Canada.

Let us not forget that there are many people in Canada who have been living here for many years without having acquired Canadian citizenship. Some residents do not want to lose their original citizenship while others are not even aware that they are not Canadian citizens because they were admitted to Canada when very young.

Our amendments will protect these people's most fundamental rights. As a result, those admitted to permanent residence in Canada before attaining the age of 10 years and those who have resided in Canada for 10 years or more are exempted from this section.

Unfortunately, the Liberal majority on the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration did not take into consideration the numerous contributions and recommendations proposed by the organizations and individuals who appeared before the committee. They were very concerned about this situation, and we deplore the fact that although this majority on the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration invited organizations and individuals from across Canada, the committee and the Liberal majority did not take into consideration their very worthwhile contributions to the committee's discussions.

Many of the briefs, particularly the one from the Quebec immigration lawyers' association, suggest creating a non-deportable class. Our amendments, in this motion, reflect this concern which we share entirely.

We also tabled this amendment because of family considerations. You may have heard of the European Convention on Human Rights. There is a European Commission of Human Rights. The European Court of Human Rights has ruled that deportation orders interfere with the law and with respect for family life under section 8 of the convention, arguing that it must be demonstrated that government decisions likely to restrict family rights are necessary in a democratic society, that is, justified by a very sound social need, and that these restrictions must be proportional to the legitimate objective sought.

We think that this provision of Bill C-44 goes against all the precedents established by the European Court of Human Rights.

Canada contracted obligations that are largely similar to the European Convention on Human Rights when it ratified the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights. Canada has always maintained that sections 7 and 15 of the Canadian Charter protect the rights of families.

In April 1994, we received a report from Waldman and Davis called "The Quality of Mercy". This bill in general and especially the provisions concerning individuals punishable by a jail term of ten years or more are not at all in keeping with this quality of mercy or with the legal precedents established in other countries. On the contrary, it violates existing provisions that have been accepted in other democratic societies. I do not think that the bill reflects the quality of mercy suggested in the report by Waldman and Davis.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my intervention will be very brief.

In speaking to Motions Nos. 13 and 14 concerning the conditions of expulsion I believe members of the Bloc Quebecois Party fail to understand what the Canadian people have been saying. Canadians have been putting pressure upon not only the government but upon representatives to Parliament like myself.

As the member representing the Bloc speaks, it would seem we are talking about dealing with people who broke regulations and failed to understand the seriousness of what may have happened and their situation in Canada.

As we look at the bill these are matters of serious intent. The bill is attempting to deal with excluding people from Canada who have committed serious offences. These motions in amendment would erode the intent of the bill. Members of the Reform Party are in favour of much of the bill, but we have great difficulty with the inability of enforcement. For that reason we will be opposing the bill as a whole but we have no intention of weakening the content. We are therefore opposing these two motions.

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I suppose during third reading we will be able to debate the whole question of the position of the Reform Party. It is supporting the intent of the bill in many clauses but voting against it because there is an assumption or preposition that somehow the intent will not be realized. That is probably better suited for third reading debate.

I will address the two motions under the second group. They would seek to change clause 12 of Bill C-44. It is unfair to suggest, as the Bloc critic has done, that the committee was blind or deaf to a number of the representations made with respect to clause 12. There was introduced at committee stage an amendment that would seek to clarify the intent and the purpose of Bill C–44.

Clause 12 suggests the following: When there are execution or removal orders against certain residents who have committed certain crimes, we are trying to suggest that individuals who have committed the crime may be punishable by 10 years or more as well as having received a certificate from the minister or his or her designate based on the seriousness of the crime.

When you get a certificate essentially there are four categories to that crime, either the violence of the crime, crimes related to sexual assault, crimes related to weapons charges and crimes related to drug peddling and the importation of drugs. When a certificate is given to an individual for those serious crimes that are punishable by 10 years or more we are suggesting not only that we have the ability to remove an individual but to also remove the humanitarian and compassionate grounds from the IAB and move that over to the department.

The Bloc amendment would amend that thinking to individuals who have been sentenced to a period of imprisonment of two years or more. The effect of that amendment would restrict the government's ability to remove those individuals and would push more of the emphasis to our courts. I think it has to be stated quite openly that many individuals who have committed a crime punishable by 10 years or more in the end receive much less than the two years which is the threshold being suggested by my hon. friend in the Bloc.

I think we should try to keep the focus on immigration as opposed to moving it squarely over to the court system. A number of decisions for a variety of reasons such as plea bargaining or keeping the person in a provincial prison would assume less than two years rather than two years or more because that is the threshold at which time the person would be in a federal penitentiary, are reasons why the judge may say less than two years so that the person may be kept at a provincial penitentiary for a variety of reasons. There are other concerns that the court system may recognize that do not account for immigration concerns.

The amendment would not only lessen the threshold to a very low threshold, which I think is unfair if the person has committed a serious crime and has been certificated as being a danger to the public based on those four categories, but it would also shift the onus of these individuals on to the court system which I think would be a mistake and which would render immigration arguments certainly secondary to other arguments that the judge may feel quite legitimate nonetheless. I believe that it would be a mistake on our part if we were to support Motion No. 13.

The second amendment would try to amend the same clause and try to define in law who may be deported or who may not. The Bloc has suggested that permanent residents before the age of 10 and who have no ties to their country of origin not be subject to deportation. They also say that anyone who has been a permanent resident for over 10 years, regardless of the crime, may not be deported.

I have difficulty with this on two fronts. First, when the Bloc suggests a person before the age 10, why 10? What if the person were nine or eleven or twelve? It is arbitrary. To put arbitrarily arrived at figures in law I would suggest is very restrictive. I do not think it would be the appropriate thing to do. I do not know how the Bloc arrived at the age of 10, but I do not think we should have laws that restrict our ability to remove individuals who face serious crimes based on an arbitrary figure or individuals who have been here more than 10 years.

The Bloc is saying if you are here more than 10 years you are considered perhaps to be more of a citizen. What if an individual clocks in at nine years in this country?

Is the Bloc therefore agreeing that regardless of the crime the person who spent nine years is not worthy of that compassionate consideration, but someone who stayed here an extra 12 months would be? I think that is the area that is going to constitute many problems if we put those arbitrary figures into legislation.

I think it would be more appropriate that those kinds of considerations be dealt with under humanitarian and compassionate reasoning where there is the flexibility to concern ourselves with rather than writing it into law.

Second, and fundamentally flawed, is the thinking that somehow the years of residence in one's country at all times, if we accept this amendment, outweighs the seriousness of the crime. I do not think we should accept that kind of reasoning. What I think Canadians are saying is that we are trying to seek an equitable balance.

We are not saying that immigration equals criminality, for goodness sake. We are not saying that. We are saying that there are the few who make it difficult for the many, and that we have to zero in on the few so that we can protect the many, and zero in on the few so that we can protect the integrity of the system.

If we accept the amendments of the Bloc, then we are saying that according to the arbitrary figure of 10, that supersedes any criminal activity in this country. Instead, I believe it is the reverse. There are certain crimes that are absolutely repugnant. If the landed resident was here 10 years, 20 years, 30 years, it still does not give that person the right to simply dismiss a serious crime against young children, or murder, or an aggravated sexual assault that turns people's stomachs. We should not simply rest on the case that just because the person has been here for 10 years that the crime is all of a sudden forgotten. We have to stand up for certain values and send certain signals.

That is where I think putting the arbitrary figure of 10 into law creates more problems than it solves. I believe that those considerations should be under humanitarian and compassionate grounds and not the letter of the law.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in spite of the explanations provided by the minister, I think it is important to reiterate the objectives of the motions to which the hon. member for Bourassa referred earlier.

The purpose of Motions Nos. 13 and 14 tabled by the Bloc Quebecois to amend Bill C–44 is twofold. Motion No. 14 would add two categories of individuals to the list of those who cannot be deported for criminal behaviour. Motion No. 13 would amend Bill C–44 to take into account the seriousness of the crimes committed and the sentences actually handed down to permanent residents.

Let us first look at Motion No. 14. Paragraph (a) seeks to exclude from the deportation process persons who were admitted to permanent residence in Canada before attaining the age of ten years, where it is demonstrated that the persons have no emotional, family or other ties to their country of origin.

Some permanent residents arrived in Canada as children. For all sorts of reasons, these people never sought to obtain Canadian citizenship. Now, they are adults and work here; they also have a family here, but no longer in their country of origin. These people are, in essence, Canadians or Quebecers. We think that sending them back to their country of origin makes no sense and is inhumane.

These people grew up in Canada and developed their talents, as well as their flaws, here. They are a product of Canadian society. It would be too easy to get rid of criminals by sending them back to their country of origin, which they left as young children. Moreover, deportation could be too harsh a sentence for the offence committed. Not only would these people have to serve a sentence for their crime or crimes, but they would also have to keep living abroad afterwards, far from their family and friends, in a country which is often foreign to them.

Second, the Bloc Quebecois is proposing an amendment to paragraph (b) so that permanent residents who have resided in Canada for ten years or more cannot be removed from Canada. This addition is similar to the other amendments and would make Bill C–44 more compassionate for people who have been in Canada for a long time.

By adopting this amendment from the Bloc Quebecois, Canada would not be the first country to act this way. For example, Australia which is often compared to Canada because of its British tradition and liberal immigration policies, already has legislation in this area. Hence, children who settled in Australia before they were ten years old cannot be sent back to their country of origin.

France's immigration policy is reputed to be much more restrictive than ours. However, it has passed legislation to prevent immigrants who have been permanent residents for more than ten years from being expelled.

The government must go beyond partisanship and go along with the Bloc. For compassionate and humanitarian considerations, we must amend Bill C–44 and pass Motion No. 14.

We must also amend the bill by adopting Motion No. 13. To determine the seriousness of the crime, the actual sentence must be taken into consideration, and not only the maximum penalty for a particular type of offence.

In its current form, Bill C–44 only takes into account the nominal sentence, that is the maximum penalty for the type of offence committed, and not the sentence imposed by the judge. Indeed, even though under the Criminal Code a term of imprisonment of ten years may be imposed for a particular offence, the principles of sentencing are applied by the courts in determining the sentence.

For example, a person convicted of breaking into a private residence can receive a life sentence. Offences such as aiding and abetting the issuance of fraudulent credit cards are punishable by a ten–year sentence and could justify the deportation of the accused.

In our legal system, sentences are generally much less severe than the maximum sentence. In some cases, it may not be a term of imprisonment or a fine, but only a suspended sentence, probation or community work. A person could therefore receive a very light sentence and still be forced to leave the country.

Moreover, if our amendment is not adopted, this provision of Bill C–44 could violate the Geneva Convention. The manual of High Commissioner for Refugees says, and I quote: "With regard to the nature of the crime presumed to have been committed, all relevant factors, including extenuating circumstances, must be considered".

Bill C–44 must reflect these remarks. We must adopt the amendment before us to avoid legal complications. The Canadian government cannot refuse to take into account the actual sentence imposed, which is indicative of the seriousness of the crime.

As for the sentence of two years less one day, everybody knows that it is the cut–off point for sentences served in a provincial penitentiary and those served in a federal institution. In Canada, the courts consider the nature of the crime before imposing a term of imprisonment of two years or more. In our legal system, there is a clear difference between a sentence of two years or more and a sentence of less than two years in terms of the seriousness of the crime. Our amendment reflects this legal reality.

I encourage all members to vote in favour of Motions No. 13 and 14 for simple common sense reasons. As we have just seen, the purpose of Motion No. 13 is to take into account the actual sentence imposed by the judge and not only the maximum sentence of ten years for certain types of crimes. As for Motion No. 14, it is designed to prevent the deportation of de facto Canadians.

The next question is on Motion No. 14. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76.1(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

Motions Nos. 15, 16 and 17 will be grouped for debate but voted on separately.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ) moved:

That Bill C–44 be amended by deleting Clause 13.

That Bill C–44 be amended by deleting Clause 15.

She said: Mr. Speaker, just a few days after his appointment as Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, the present minister said in an interview with La Presse that he wanted a system with as little political intervention as possible. He added that in the judicial system, for instance, there was no political intervention. Once a judgment was made, that was it. He also said that he wanted to reduce political intervention and felt that a stronger appeal mechanism would be the answer.

However, a year later, we have Bill C–44, which in our opinion does the exact opposite of what the minister said he wanted to do, in November 1993. This bill puts excessively centralized powers in the hands of the minister and his officials.

During the hearings of the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration, we heard this confirmed by many agencies. Bloc Quebecois amendments for deleting clauses 13 and 25 of Bill C–44 were supported by the Canadian bar association, the Canadian council for refugees, the Quebec immigration lawyers' association and the refugee lawyers association, for instance.

The present legislation allows permanent residents convicted of an offence for which a term of imprisonment of 10 years or more may be imposed to appeal to the Immigration Appeal Division. This appeal may be invoked to quash a deportation order or to stay execution of such an order on compassionate grounds.

Maintaining clauses 13 and 15 which reinforce the minister's powers of political intervention means that the minister and members of this House will be constantly asked to review immigration cases on compassionate grounds.

We are well aware of the pressures on elected representatives and especially on the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Public opinion, exacerbated and conditioned by a few sensational cases and the media's coverage of then, and, of course, political pressure from countries we do not want to offend for commercial or economic reasons are just a few examples.

Because of these pressures, it is easy to imagine what kind of decisions will be made: decisions based on a set of subjective, unpredictable factors that will vary from case to case, despite their similarities. Are we prepared to take that risk? Certainly not. The system already lacks credibility. Why make it worse?

We can expect another problem if the new legislation is not amended. As we know, immigration officials no longer meet clients in their offices and no longer answer telephone calls directly. Unfortunately, all processing of immigration files has been centralized, and regional offices are now an empty shell. To politicize the process will deprive immigrants and their relatives of the opportunity to talk with the officers in charge of making decisions which will be critical for them.

Moreover, as was pointed out in the Auditor General's report in 1990, the Davis–Waldman report and by many public servants, there is an obvious lack of training among immigration officers. This may seriously jeopardize the fairness of the process.

We cannot endorse this desire to centralize and politicize the immigration decision–making process .Decisions will be made behind closed doors. Generalists lacking the necessary training would make the decisions now made by specialists. There is no guarantee that, under these conditions, in similar cases, decisions will not be different and therefore inconsistent. Why trivialize these decisions by turning them into administrative decisions whereas, at the present time, they are quasi–judicial and based on case law with a proven track record?

Moreover, Bill C–44 proposes that the immigration minister become a new court and replace the IRB when it comes to the evaluation of risks. Thus the minister would become party to every case before the appeal division. Is it because he recently lost certain cases that the minister now wants to give himself new powers?

Moreover, under clause 14 of Bill C–44, the government wants to give the minister the right to appeal to the appeal division any decision made by an adjudicator. The current act provides for the minister to appeal only in two specific cases, when a person was found admissible or not deportable. None of the arguments presented by the government as to why the act should be amended to allow the minister to interfere with the decisions made by the adjudicator has convinced us.

The government is interfering with the whole process. There does not seem to be any more limit on the type of appeal the minister may launch against a decision made by an adjudicator. This is another blatant example of the minister interfering with and taking over the appeal division operations.

Let us make sure that the wishes expressed last year by the minister, and with which we totally agree, are respected. Let us minimize political interference in the immigration process. It is in the spirit and for that purpose that the official opposition has moved these amendments. Let the IRB Appeal Division do its job and keep the minister and bureaucrats out of this quasi–judicial process, which still needs to be improved.

• (1325)

For all these reasons, clause 13 and 15 should be eliminated and replaced by sections 70 and 77 of Bill C–86, now in force.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, again very briefly, we oppose these amendments.

As I said before this bill is unenforceable. The specifics of this bill have been roundly criticized by all witnesses before the standing committee, albeit from different philosophical points of view. The direction the bill takes, that is to toughen up immigration law to protect Canadians and to make the department of immigration more accountable is acceptable to my party. In fact my party has pushed for changes in this direction. However, this bill as written will not result in real change. It will only result in an increased backlog with no additional enforcement staff. The intent is there but the means are lacking.

The Bloc amendment would remove the intent of the bill. That we cannot support.

My party is opposed to these amendments.

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, two motions are trying to do two different things. I will take them one at a time.

The toughest decision with respect to Bill C–44 was to try to respond as best we could as a government to public concern. In trying to size it up correctly the public is very much in favour of newcomers coming to this country and joining in the building of this very exciting place called Canada. That has been part of our country's history and should remain part of the nation building exercise for many years to come.

The public has concern when there is no sense of balance. An overwhelming number of people come here as immigrants and refugees and play things by the book. They contribute. They sacrifice. They bleed just like anybody else. Then there are the few who come to Canada with very different intentions. They break the law in a serious way and then flaunt it through the system. That is what irks Canadians.

As the minister and a member of Parliament and as a Canadian, what I heard the public request was to try to have a proper context and balance. In that way we could address those who seriously and flagrantly abuse the system and make it worse for those who come to this country and respect the law. Regrettably because perceptions cut very deeply sometimes everyone is unfairly put in the same boat.

We try to zero in on the problem. It is difficult for any law to try to distinguish that. The bill deals with those individuals who have committed a crime punishable by 10 years or more and who also, I underline the word also, receive a certificate that they are deemed to be a public danger according to the four general categories of serious violence, sexual assault, weapons charges, and drugs. Those individuals and not others will not be given the opportunity of appealing their deportation to the immigration appeal division on humanitarian and compassionate grounds. It was the decision that those individuals, that narrow class, not be given the opportunity of going to the immigration appeal division but instead to make a written request for a written decision by officials in my department.

I hear what the Bloc and other members have said. When an immigration appeal division makes a decision on one of these individuals to stay the deportation or simply to overrule the deportation and it causes some consternation among the public, I wear the problem. If I were to tell the immigration appeal division what to do, members on the opposite side would be screaming for my resignation as they did for weeks on end respecting the CRTC. They have suggested that there needs to be an arm's length independence from our quasi–judicial boards. I concur with that.

In the end we are caught in the middle as public policy makers. We are blamed for decisions we did not take and we would be blamed if we sought to interfere in decisions.

The government and I chose to signal that category of individuals. They would no longer have the right on humanitarian and compassionate grounds before the immigration appeal division but would have the opportunity on a written decision with the department. They may appeal it to the Federal Court as in all cases.

Some people are suggesting that I will not only be wearing it but will be owning the problem. As a public policy maker and given the public feeling there was a need for greater consistency in decision making and a greater sense of accountability for decision making. I am prepared to take the risk of being seen to be owning the problem if it renders a more efficient system, there is a check and balance, the legislation is pinpointed to those who seriously commit criminal acts in the country, and there is a fair balance between the compassion and the generosity of Canada to invite newcomers to have a second lease on life.

There are those who seriously undermine our laws and are not citizens of the country of Canada. This country and this government do not preclude people from becoming citizens. We are a progressive country. After three years an individual can become a member of the most prestigious club the world over. It is called the Canadian family. For the narrow category that have tipped the scales there needs to be a price and a cost. That is what we are doing in clause 13 of Bill C–44.

The second motion that the Bloc suggests is that the government should not be able to appeal a decision of an immigration appeal division to turn a deportation order into a departure notice.

Let me explain why I believe the government should be able to appeal. It is not to politically intervene as my friend in the Bloc suggested. In a number of cases where the department has sought to deport a serious criminal the immigration appeal division has changed it from a deportation to a departure notice. There is a big difference between the two. Under a departure notice individuals would have to leave the country but are entitled to return. Under a deportation order persons are deported and cannot come into the country unless they have prior written consent from the minister.

Bill C–44 would allow a senior immigration officer, if a person was deported and returns without written permission, rather than going through an inquiry that can sometimes be lengthy—

Mr. White (Fraser Valley West): Like Mendoza.

Mr. Marchi: Correct. The bill would allow the senior immigration officer to turn that person around at the border without an inquiry. It is common sense. If we accept that someone cannot return unless they have permission after deportation and they come to the border without permission, why should we have an inquiry? Clearly it has already been determined. This would make it more efficient.

If an immigration appeal division disagrees and moves it from a deportation to a departure, why should a minister or the crown not say they respect the decision or it is right to make that decision but because of the seriousness of the crime perpetrated they would like to appeal the removal notice from a departure to a deportation? Deportation gives Canada the right to protect itself from such individuals.

It is not with the view of trying to be politically involved or intervening. It would simply be a right of any country to protect itself from those it deems to be a danger to the public and a notice may be switched from deportation to departure based on some consideration that is outweighed by the nature of the offence. That is the reason it is balanced, fair and measured.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this question was discussed at length in the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration, and practically all the organizations voiced their opposition to politicizing the refugee status determination process and transferring the IRB's jurisdiction, and more particularly that of its appeal division, to a politician, a minister.

There was unanimity among the lawyers who appeared before the committee to oppose the transfer of jurisdiction from a quasi–judicial organization to the executive, the political authority. I would like to mention some the organizations who came before the committee: the Canadian council of refugees, the refugees lawyers association, the Canadian bar association, the Immigration and Refugee Board. They were all against this transfer of jurisdiction from the IRB to the minister. I should also mention Amnesty International, the Quebec association of immigration lawyers, the Canadian labour congress, the Canadian ethnocultural council, the national action committee on the status of women, and the interchurch committee for refugees.

We proposed this motion mostly because we are against the cancellation by Bill C–44 of the right to appeal for equity reasons. The right to appeal in immigration matters dates back only to 1952. The Immigration Act of 1952 established a limited judicial appeal system managed by the Immigration Appeal Board.

In 1967, a piece of legislation formally instituted the Immigration Appeal Board as an independent tribunal in charge of hearing appeals filed on grounds involving questions of law or fact or mixed law and fact, by individuals under an expulsion order. In 1973, the right of appeal was restricted to permanent residents, visa holders and individuals claiming refugee status or Canadian citizenship.

Since 1989, refugee status determination is under the jurisdiction of the IRB, an independent quasi–judicial body. The Appeal Division of the IRB replaced the Immigration Appeal Board. We can see that, since 1952, immigration ministers and officials of that department have tended more and more to leave such matters to an increasingly quasi–judicial body.

However, Bill C–44, and particularly clause 4, goes against that legislative trend which started in 1952. A court of appeal must be able to rule on issues of law, fact, or both and equity, and I emphasize equity, towards refugees, visa holders, permanent residents and sponsors.

Clause 13 of Bill C–44 amends section 70 of the Immigration Act and deprives the appeal division of the IRB of the power to stay, for reasons of fairness, the execution of a deportation order, or to quash that decision in the case of crimes punishable by a term of imprisonment of ten years or more.

I take this opportunity to tell the minister why we wanted to exclude permanent residents who have lived in Canada for at least ten years. It is because such a provision also exists in Australia and in France. Therefore, we would not be the first country to do so.

The deportation decisions made by immigration officers, as opposed to an independent tribunal, may be technically flawed. For example, they may be flawed because of procedural technicalities, insufficient evidence, inconsistency or lack of accountability. Right now, the Appeal Division of the IRB is an appropriate and fair tool to dispose of an appeal on a deportation order, or to deny a sponsorship application.

I share the views expressed on page five of the excellent submission presented to the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration by the National Immigration Law Section of the Canadian Bar Association, where it says: "The appeal division looks at errors in law and at all the circumstances of a case to determine if there exist reasons based on fairness. A mere examination to look for any error in law is not sufficient. The appellant and the minister are both represented. Oral as well as documentary evidence is presented before a public forum and is subject to cross–examination. The decision is then made by an independent tribunal and subject to judicial control. With the changes proposed in Bill C–44, it is the minister or an immigration officer who will make a discretionary and subjective examination. It will not be possible to review any factual error".

I would prefer to have the decision to send a person back to his or her country of origin, thus putting his or her life in danger, made by a tribunal after due process: presentation of evidence, cross–examination and oral arguments. Very often, we are confronted with complex questions of fact or law. Immigration officers responsible for the application of the legislation often do not have the resources, the training or the mandate to determine whether or not the expulsion of a permanent resident is justified.

Further on, the national section on immigration law of the Canadian Bar Association says: "One of the main advantages of an independent tribunal is that it guarantees that difficult decisions in expulsion matters are not made by politicians. What the minister is proposing in his statement is a unit, responsible to his office, which would review expulsion measures. Political decisions are unpredictable, inconsistent and dangerous. For all interested parties, access to the minister or his representative can become a major and unfair factor".

For these reasons, I support Motions Nos. 15, 16 and 17.

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ) moved:

That Bill C–44 be amended by deleting Clause 18.

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the amendment put forward by the Bloc Quebecois involves deleting clause 18 from Bill C–44. Without this clause, section 24 of the Customs Act would not be amended.

Section 24 authorizes mail, documents or anything that may serve to establish the identity of a person to be intercepted. It is proposed to give immigration officers the power to seize and search parcels and documents suspected of being used fraudulently. We think that such provisions probably contravene the Canadian Charter of Human Rights. The Bloc Quebecois amendment is to prevent the government from being taken to court over this.

We also question another aspect of this clause in Bill C–44, and that is the introduction of reverse onus. In our judicial system, the accused is initially presumed innocent, at least that is how it has been so far. But the mail seizure provisions reverse the burden of proof. Also, there is no indication of the basis on which seizure will be decided and the nature of the mail determined.

How will customs officers determine the contents of packages before they are opened? What will tell them that a given mailing is highly likely to contain illegal documents? We think that such procedures will be impossible to justify legally.

Therefore, clause 18 may pave the way for abuse. Opening mail without the consent of the recipients goes against the most elementary of fundamental rights. In a society that recognizes the rule of law, you do not tamper with mail, to the best of my knowledge. Moreover, Bill C–44 is not overly transparent, by not mentioning the circumstances under which the mail, parcels or documents will be opened.

Regardless of our concerns, Mr. Speaker, clause 18 will be difficult to enforce.

Customs officers who testified on Bill C–44 before the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration told us that, over the past decade, 259 federal mail inspection centres had been eliminated. There are only six remaining to do this kind of work. Efforts to increase the powers and workload of employees who are already unable to meet the demand are probably wasted. The government should make sure that existing provisions are enforced and allocate adequate resources to this end.

For the sake of compliance with the charter of rights, respect for fundamental rights and practical reasons as well, I encourage hon. members to vote for Motion No. 5 put forward by the Bloc Quebecois.

[English]

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this bill attempts to give customs officers more legal power to seize fraudulent documents. We applaud that intent. However, customs has informed us that this measure is totally unenforceable and therefore without greater enforcement ability the intent of the bill is moot.

That is why we oppose the bill. It would give Canadians a false sense of security. However, this amendment by the Bloc would gut even the good intent of the bill. The Bloc and Reform view immigration law from an entirely different philosophical perspective. Its amendment reflects its philosophy. Our opposition to the amendment reflects ours.

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, clause 18 of Bill C–44 would make it a punishable offence for individuals in this country either to import or export fraudulent documentation.

If members recall, some months back there was an article in the Globe and Mail that pointed to a decision by the Department of Justice. The decision suggested that the immigration and customs officials who were opening mail to confiscate fraudulent documents and also to try to stop the rings that smuggled documents did not have authority under the law to do so.

This clause in the bill gives legitimacy under the full weight of the law to our customs and immigration officers to confiscate mail that is carrying fraudulent documentation such as drivers licences, visa applications and passports. Many have been intercepted, particularly in Toronto and Montreal.

We are suggesting in this clause that it be a punishable offence. Currently the offence would carry a penalty of two years and/or a fine of $5,000. We feel this should be a deterrent to making those fraudulent documents available.

Fraudulent documentation is a problem not only in Canada but worldwide. It is almost scary to see the kind of high technological reproduction of our documents, so we should be sending the right message.

Reform Party members keep having this debate. They support the intent of the bill but do not believe it is enforceable. It is like saying that you do not accept amendments to the Criminal Code because you do not think the police can enforce them.

The police, of which my hon. friend was a member, have too few police officers in all the major cities. Does it mean that if we bring in a Criminal Code amendment that is good in intent and shows sound judgment, that this party and this ex–police officer will turn it down because while the intent is good it is somehow unenforceable, whether by police officers, customs, or immigration? Does this allow the Reform Party to say "we are opposed?" What kind of a silly argument is that for an ex–police officer to make?

If the intent is good, then we have to make sure of the enforceability of the legislation. Anyone in this country that tries to circumvent the Immigration Act through the fraudulent production or importation of documents should be punished.

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, under clause 18 of Bill C–44, customs officers may search international parcels to look for documents and pass on these documents to an immigration officer for examination.

Immigration officers may destroy documents when they have sufficient reason to believe that such a measure is necessary, if these documents were obtained or used irregularly and if such a measure is necessary to prevent irregular or fraudulent use. The officer may give the documents back to the legitimate owners, keep the documents until they are sent back or destroy them.

According to these amendments, refugee claimants trying to obtain identification papers from relatives or authorities abroad may have their documents seized or perhaps destroyed.

Furthermore, the official is not required to notify the owner that these documents have been seized. This situation is very disturbing. Mail is sacred and inviolable in almost all countries.

The Speaker: The member will have a little time left after Oral Question Period. It being 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members, pursuant to Standing Order 31.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mr. Gar Knutson (Elgin—Norfolk, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, each Sunday at 5.30 p.m. a program called "Street Sense" is broadcast on CBC television. "Street Sense" is aimed at young consumers. It is hip and funny and its humour both informs and entertains its adolescent audience on environmental and economic issues.

Because this program is about consumers it is commercial free. It operates on a limited $1 million budget, obtained not from the CBC but from companies, associations, foundations and government programs such as "Stay In School".

The awards that "Street Sense" have received are too numerous to list but are both national and international. "Street Sense" is where the future of public broadcasting must go. It is financially viable but in a format that is unavailable through commercial enterprise. Both enterprise and young consumers benefit.

Once again, that is "Street Sense" Sundays at 5.30 p.m. Bravo to the CBC.

SOCIAL PROGRAM REFORM

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Axworthy reform, widely denounced by women's groups and by the Bloc Quebecois, is now raising deep concerns within the Liberal caucus itself.

The hon. member for Brant and chair of the national Liberal caucus fears that the cuts planned by her Minister of Human Resources Development will undermine the gains made by women's groups after long and hard social struggles.

The members of the Bloc Quebecois also believe that the reform of social programs, like the public service cuts being contemplated, must take into account the need to reverse years of discrimination against women.

The minister will have to be quite prudent in the days to come, not only because his reform is more and more widely discredited but also because his initiatives are now stirring up opposition among the Liberal troops themselves.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, violence against women is a sordid reality and not a fantasy confined to the pages of a tabloid newspaper or a pornographic magazine.

The history of violence against women is like Pandora's box that when opened reveals the ugliest side of the human condition. We would expect by now that complacency would be shattered amidst the tales of horror and abuse that so many women have lived to tell. What of those who have died?

It was inexcusable for the justice minister who professes to champion women to artfully dodge my question of last Friday. We do not need the minister's platitudes nor his citing of statistics to tell us we have a problem of domestic violence in this country.

What specific plan does this government have to get at the root causes of violence against women? Until gender roles are eliminated, until the family no longer serves as that convenient arena for male violence, until wife beating is no longer a logical extension of male domination and until our justice system demonstrates its capacity for justice, we do not have a blueprint for change.

Intellectual and political anguish have become meaningless. Violence against women exists. We have endured enough.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the necessity of continuing to educate Canadians, especially our youth, on environmental issues is crucial, not only for Canada's future but for the future of the entire planet. Together we must continue to think globally but act locally to address the many challenges we face in preserving the delicate balance of our environment.

At Cole Harbour High School in my riding of Dartmouth I recently had the privilege of unveiling along with the Minister of the Environment a new environmental information system established on the Internet by this government. It is called the Green Lane on the Information Highway and makes Canada's wealth of information on the environment available not only to Canadians but indeed to the entire world.

I ask this House to join with me in commending the Minister of the Environment and her department for taking the important step of establishing this green lane on the information highway. I look forward to the new ideas and creativity in dealing with environmental issues that will no doubt result from this global sharing of important environmental information.

NOVA SCOTIA HIGHLANDERS

Mrs. Dianne Brushett (Cumberland—Colchester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, recently I had the distinct honour of attending a Regimental Dining In, hosted by the 1st and 2nd battalions of the Nova Scotia Highlanders, held at "E" company in the beautiful new Armouries in Pictou, Nova Scotia. It was an evening of exquisite dining in the formal military tradition with a Salute to the Haggis.

These battalions have been part of our Canadian fighting forces since their amalgamation in October of 1871. Their service to Queen and country extends from the South African War of 1899 to World Wars I and II and their battles read as a who's who of Canadian history.

I salute Lieutenant–Colonel Chisholm and the men of these two brave battalions of Nova Scotia Highlanders for keeping pride in their calling and faith in their nation. "Siol Na Fear Fearail".

WORLD HUMAN RIGHTS DAY

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, on Saturday, December 10, we celebrated World Human Rights Day and the 46th anniversary of the Universal Declaration of Human Rights which was adopted by the United Nations in 1948. The declaration establishes basic international standards for fundamental human rights and freedoms guaranteeing the dignity and worth of every human being.

Several Canadians, including Professor John Humphrey of McGill, helped draft the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, which has had a tremendous influence on international law and the behaviour of states. In Canada in particular, our Charter of Rights and Freedoms confirms many of the basic principles set forth in the declaration.

The United Nations Year for Tolerance as well as the International Decade for Indigenous Peoples will also begin in 1995.

[English]

Human rights affect the daily lives of everyone. We can all take pride that our government is committed to the promotion and protection of human rights and freedoms of all people in Canada and around the world.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. François Langlois (Bellechasse, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in a report submitted to the Solicitor General in December 1993 the Security Intelligence Review Committee denounced the Canadian Security Intelligence Service for overstepping its mandate.

According to the committee, investigations by the ETT group within CSIS are not for threats to Canada's security as defined in the Act but rather the security of private companies. In so doing, CSIS is duplicating what Canadian police forces do.

Once again, parliamentarians are the last to be informed. It is only thanks to the Access to Information Act that we learned about the committee's serious allegations. The Solicitor General must promise to submit all the review committee's reports to the parliamentary subcommittee on national security and start right now by making public the report on the Grant Bristow affair.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, On December 9, I made a presentation before the Liberal task force on the Canadian National Railways system. It was a waste of my time.

• (1405)

It appears all too obvious that this task force is determined to make this the fourth Liberal government to bail CN out of its crippling financial debt load with the taxpayers' money. I watched in disgust as one witness was manipulated into saying what the task force wanted to hear. When CP Rail testified it turned into an inquisition.

The government should be neither subsidizing nor closing crown corporations. It should be privatizing them. Government involvement should be reduced to a regulatory role.

Major changes are needed for the survival of Canada's rail system. Free enterprise can do a far better job of determining the right steps to take than political or bureaucratic decision making ever can.

The decision to get out of the airport business is the right one. Why does the Liberal government not have the foresight to see that it is the right move for railways as well?

THOMAS MCKAIG

Mr. Gurbax Singh Malhi (Bramalea—Gore—Malton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I applaud the outstanding volunteer efforts of Mr. Thomas McKaig of Bramalea—Gore—Malton.

Working with CESO, the Canadian volunteer advisers to business, Mr. Thomas McKaig travelled to Panama to conduct a pre–feasibility study for a non–profit association contemplating a world cargo distribution centre.

Mr. McKaig's study will serve as a springboard for feasibility studies to follow for this world class facility.

GREENING OF THE HILL

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in this House to pay tribute to the Greening of the Hill office. Its extraordinary efforts have been recognized with the Canadian Environmental Achievement Award.

The Greening of the Hill office has proved that environmental initiatives can have economic benefits. The Greening of the Hill office has saved the Canadian taxpayer over $1 million. If we expect business and industry to move toward sustainability then the Government of Canada must show leadership and put its federal House in order.

Once again, I applaud the efforts of the Greening of the Hill office and encourage it to continue its exceptional work.

PERSONAL INCOME TAX

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, what would you say about a major simplification of our federal and provincial legislation on personal income tax? Instead of continuing to increase the number of deductions, credits and tax breaks, there would be only one universal basic exemption, which would be considerably larger. This exemption would only vary on the basis of the number of children or dependants, age, health and possibly charitable donations.

The result of this operation, taxable income, would be taxed at a considerably lower uniform rate, which would be the same for all taxpayers without exception. This is called a single tax. Its time has come.

SUMMIT OF THE AMERICAS

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, at the Summit of the Americas held in Miami, the three trade partners currently in NAFTA invited Chile to join. Even though the negotiations will only start in May, preparatory work will begin as early as January. We in the official opposition welcome and applaud this initiative taken by the NAFTA partners.

Besides the above mentioned negotiations, the 34 countries at the Summit of the Americas agreed to begin negotiations on hemisphere–wide free trade with a target date of 2005, and NAFTA will eventually be part of this broader agreement.

Given such openness, we are convinced that Quebec, as one of the most fervent proponents of free trade on the American continent, will be warmly welcome by the trading nations when it becomes sovereign. But for now, on behalf of the official opposition, let me say Bienvenido al Chile.

THE CABINET

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, rumours abound that the Prime Minister is going to shuffle his cabinet.

I can understand why the heritage minister must change with the CBC problems and the CRTC scandal. I can understand why the health ministry needs a new transfusion because of poor policy and tainted blood. Even the fisheries portfolio needs a change because of east and west coast fisheries boondoggles. When is the change going to come in the immigration department? We have the Schelew affair, José Salinas Mendoza bilking Canadians in a system of injustice, IRB patronage appointments, policy indecisions and a department left in tatters.

Mr. Prime Minister, some friendly advice, change the coach when your immigration team is in last place.

TRADE

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, (NDP): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister entertained the Miami summit of the Americas last week by calling the three NAFTA countries the three amigos. It comes as no surprise to New Democrats that NAFTA should be compared to a farce made in the United States.

If the Prime Minister really thinks that the NAFTA and any future hemispheric trade agreements should be based on friendship, why does he not extend our friendship to those in genuine need of it?

The Prime Minister could have spoken out at the summit against the illegal American embargo against Cuba which continues to devastate Cuban society but he did not. He could urge the Mexican government to address the grave social inequities in Chiapas rather than threaten military reprisals against the dispossessed but he has not. He could put human rights, labour and environmental standards front and centre of Canadian trade policy but he has not.

Social, labour and environmental agreements must be integral to any trade agreement. It is time for Canada to take a leadership role and to ensure that trade is about improving the lives of people more than improving the profits for international capitalists.

FILIPINO CANADIANS

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the popular TV show "Frasier" recently carried a joke with the punch line "For an additional $5,000 you can get a brand–new wife from the Philippines".

This comment has enraged thousands of Filipino Canadians. The painful echo of this contemptuous remark will resonate loud and long, long after the canned laughter has faded away. By maligning an ethnic group, by exploiting women and by refusing to make amends, the NBC network has shown an utter lack of sensitivity.

There is no humour in racism. There is no humour in sexism. There is no humour in degrading any human being for profit. The comment offends common decency. It offends Canadians who do not suffer bigotry willingly, who cannot allow a laugh to be gained at the expense of an entire community, at the expense of an entire people.

Apologies are indeed in order.

ATLANTIC CANADA OPPORTUNITIES AGENCY

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in recent weeks the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency has come under attack from members of the Reform Party as being nothing more than a boondoggle. Nothing could be further from the truth.

ACOA provides valuable support to small business communities in places like Prince Edward Island. If ACOA were not there the unemployment rate in the region would be much higher.

We are not opposed to changing the way the agency operates. Last week the minister responsible for ACOA announced a more co–operative approach in assisting small business. Grants are out and interprovincial teamwork is in.

If you believe this rhetoric, Mr. Speaker, you would think that all ACOA money was flushed down the toilet. Nothing could be further from the truth.

As the member of Parliament for Hillsborough, I look forward to the new spirit of regional development in Atlantic Canada. The minister responsible for ACOA knows Atlantic Canada well and he knows that economic growth in Prince Edward Island will help all Canadians.

TRANSPORT

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, since the Liberal government took office strange things have been happening in my riding of Saint John.

The new air traffic control tower that was built two years ago by the PC government was closed by this government and by the Department of Transport this year. The new VIA train station was built last year by the PC government. This government has closed the terminal and is terminating full VIA service on Thursday. As well the government has drastically cut back the hours of the Saint John weather office.

I guess I have a question for the Minister of Transport: Could the Minister of Transport please explain why his cuts have been focused on the largest industrial based city in the province of New Brunswick which has a nuclear power plant, the largest privately owned oil refinery there is in Canada, plus the frigate program and so on? Why has the minister not distributed cuts equally to Fredericton and Moncton, and not just Saint John?

Mr. Jack Ramsay (Crowfoot, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Robert Kierstead, the head coach of the Canadian Olympic pistol team has told my office that contrary to what the justice minister told this House, the .22 calibre handgun with a barrel length under 105 millimetres and the .32 calibre handgun are used in world cup competition. According to Mr. Kierstead, the banning of these handguns will end competitive shooting programs in Canada.

• (1415)

Mr. Kierstead said in a letter to the justice minister and I quote: "Either this is an oversight due to your unfamiliarity with firearms or it is a devious betrayal of Canada's legitimate high performance olympic shooting competitors".

The minister's justification for banning handguns with barrel lengths under 105 millimetres because they lack accuracy is refuted by the medals won by Canadian competitors as well as by the fact that Canadian police officers use these short barrelled handguns in the line of duty.

This clearly illustrates that adequate consultations did not take place and indicates a preconceived agenda on the part of the justice minister.

TAXATION

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Auditor General has warned the Minister of Finance against raising taxes since this would encourage even more Canadians to resort to the underground economy. The Auditor General said that he felt present tax revenues could be improved without raising taxes.

Does the Minister of Finance agree he could improve the government's tax revenues without raising taxes, as suggested by the Auditor General, if he would only concentrate on collecting taxes owed instead of inventing new taxes?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we realize that every year we can improve further on the way we collect taxes. That is why the Minister of National Revenue has done what he did this year. I can assure you that the harvest, if I may put it that way, has definitely improved. That being said, I am sure that the hon. member—

The Speaker: Order, order. Let us not forget the Chair.

Mr. Martin (LaSalle—Émard): Of course, Mr. Speaker.

Perhaps I may also say to the hon. member that I am sure he has no objection to making our tax system much fairer than it is today.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Certainly, Mr. Speaker. May I remind the Minister of Finance that the hon. member for Saint–Hyacinthe has for some time reminded him of the need for injecting more fairness into the tax system? Unfortunately the Minister of Finance has always turned a deaf ear, so I am delighted to hear what he said just now.

My supplementary question for the Minister of Finance is this: Would he agree that a tax increase for all taxpayers, as recommended by his colleagues on the finance committee, would merely accelerate the growth of the underground economy, in addition to being a complete reversal of the commitments made by the Prime Minister during the last election campaign?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the finance committee suggested that, considering the lag between spending cuts and their actual impact on the deficit, if necessary we might consider other taxes. The committee told us that the tax hike they were concerned about most was an increase in interest rates. And I must say I think they are right.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Finance agree that the best way to get rid of the underground economy would be to stop taxing the middle class to the hilt, eliminate tax inequities—something we have been talking about for the past year—and introduce a more effective tax collection system, so that all taxpayers will pay their fair share and, in fact, pay what they owe the government?

[English]

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the absolute necessity of building greater fairness and equity into our tax system and making sure that all Canadians are confident that the burden is being shared fairly is something this government has not only spoken about, but was also installed in the last budget more than in any other previous budget.

• (1420)

We filled in more loopholes in the last budget. We attacked the tax system in a way that will make it fairer. In fact the results are already being seen. Our corporate revenues are up higher than they have been in a long time.

This party takes a back seat to no one in its desire to build fairness and equity into the system. What I fail to understand is why the opposition consistently refuses to join us in that effort.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in addition to recommending an eventual tax increase for all taxpayers, the Liberal members are proposing new taxes which would directly hit the middle class. For example, they suggest imposing a new annual tax of $500 million on gas, while also leaving open the possibility of taxing group insurance benefits, RRSPs and retirement pensions.

Will the Minister of Finance pledge to reject the recommendations made by the Liberal members of the finance committee to impose a new tax on gasoline and to eventually tax RRSPs and group insurance benefits?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I find it very hard to understand the position of the Bloc Quebecois and its finance critic, since they had the opportunity to submit a constructive report and to make suggestions, not just nice speeches, but suggestions to really help us get rid of this plague called the deficit.

Instead of rising in the House to tell us about their own report and make suggestions, Bloc Quebecois members can only attack the government and, I must say, they do a poor job of that too.

We will solve the problem, but I invite the hon. member to participate in a joint effort. Deficit reduction should not be subject to partisan attacks: it should be a common goal for everyone.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I realize that the Minister of Finance does not always read the documents he receives. We have been making recommendations to him for a year now and, just recently, when he appeared before the finance committee, we made ten recommendations which have the advantage of not targeting the middle class or the poor. That is why he will not implement them.

Canadians and Quebecers will soon have to decide whether to invest in RRSPs. This is a serious issue involving billions of dollars.

For that reason, I ask the Minister of Finance to be clear and serious and to rule out, once and for all, taxing RRSPs. As I said, there are billions of dollars involved and this is a very serious matter.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have said time and again that these questions would be answered when I table the budget. This is not really the time to preclude consultation. I want to ask the hon. member, like I did on Friday, if he supports the suggestion made at his first press conference by the economic thinker for the separatist movement, Mr. Richard Le Hir, to the effect that, to eliminate the deficit, we should shut down VIA Rail and make cuts in old age pensions. That is the suggestion made by the great economic thinker for the separatist movement.

So I ask the member: Does he support that position?

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, a little over a month ago the minister of immigration did the honourable thing and called a judicial inquiry into the activities of Michael Schelew, the vice–chair of the Immigration and Refugee Board.

Serious accusations of intimidation and artificially inflating refugee acceptance rates had been levelled at Schelew. The minister said an inquiry would dispel any notion that his department wanted to cover the matter up. On the day the inquiry was to begin it was abruptly cancelled. We learned that Mr. Schelew was given $100,000 in exchange for his resignation.

Mr. Schelew may be gone but the problems with the IRB remain. Will the minister order an immediate public review of the entire Immigration and Refugee Board?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is absurd to suggest that the government has anything to cover up or hide.

• (1425)

Looking back at the process, I received a number of complaints. I gave those complaints to the chairperson of the board. The board recommended a course of action, namely an inquiry. The government, after thoughtful consideration of both the chairperson's and Mr. Schelew's response, suggested an inquiry which was started. Subsequent to the calling of that inquiry, Mr. Schelew tendered his resignation. It was the opinion of the Federal Court judge that the inquiry was moot and I accept his recommendation.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Canadians should be appalled at the way this government does business.

The minister appoints a good friend to the IRB who is then the subject of some very serious allegations. The minister orders a judicial inquiry into his friend's actions, citing concerns about the integrity of the IRB and the public's perception of a cover up. Suddenly the minister's headache disappears, at a cost to the taxpayer of $100,000.

Does the minister not think that the whole Schelew affair has seriously damaged the credibility of the IRB? Did he know beforehand about the $100,000 given to Schelew upon his dismissal?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is very unfair to characterize Mr. Schelew or anybody else as a crony of the government. That is simply not the case. The whole question of the inquiry was simply to the alleged conduct of one individual.

I have said to this Chamber and publicly that there is the agency review, which is the review of government–wide commissions and agencies. Reforms will be reported early in the new year. Also, the IRB will be responding to the Hathaway report which it commissioned. I will be meeting with the chairperson of the board this week to discuss a number of issues and to consider any other possible measures.

In so far as the settlement is concerned, I was never personally involved with settlements, nor should any ministers concern themselves about settlements. The settlement was done by the appropriate officials. I am told it was in line with settlements for other public servants. The settlement package is less than one year's salary for Mr. Schelew. That was not conducted by me. I was involved with the inquiry and the inquiry exclusively.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary certainly knew all about the settlement.

Mr. Schelew did not operate in a vacuum. He could not have caused such an increase in refugee acceptance rates without the assistance of other Immigration and Refugee Board members. The Canadian acceptance rate for refugee claimants is now at an astronomical 70 per cent. One man could not have created this wave them through attitude all by himself.

I ask again, will the minister in the interests of preserving the integrity and legitimacy of the Canadian refugee determination system hold a public review of the Immigration and Refugee Board?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the first part of the question, I only found out the details of the settlement on Friday of last week. That was the day the judge suggested the inquiry should not proceed.

With respect to the IRB, I do not believe the party across the way is concerned about building up this institution, but we are on this side of the House. It would be grossly unfair for the hon. member and his party to suggest that because of the alleged conduct of one individual the entire institution should be undercut or undermined. I said that reforms to the institution will be coming in the early part of next year as part of the agency and program review which is being conducted by the government.

COLLÈGE MILITAIRE ROYAL DE SAINT–JEAN

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

It would appear that, after refusing for three weeks, the minister has finally decided to act upon the request made by the mayor of Saint–Jean, and send officials to negotiate with the Quebec government and municipal authorities on the basis of the mayor's proposal. This proposal allows for a gradual and more civilized closure of the college in Saint–Jean.

Can the minister confirm that he has agreed to send officials to Saint–Jean to negotiate, this week, a binding agreement with Quebec on the basis of Mayor Smereka's proposal?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I myself met with the mayor of Saint–Jean to discuss this issue. My office has been in contact with him on several occasions. It is true that, on Saturday, we came to the conclusion that it would be useful to resume negotiations, since the chances were very good to finally conclude the negotiations on item 6 of the July 19 agreement, in order to make it possible for the college in Saint–Jean to keep operating as a civilian university.

Unfortunately, I learned just a few hours ago that, during a press conference, the Quebec minister, Ms. Beaudoin, who presumably was apprised of the letter faxed to her on Friday and of my press release, chose to misrepresent quite a few things.

In view of Ms. Beaudoin's position, I am no longer so sure that we can reach an agreement.

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, how can the minister justify having procrastinated for so long, and how can he justify procrastinating in following through with the proposal made by the mayor of Saint–Jean, while faculty members and their families have been living with a great deal of uncertainty for the last few months and must make a decision in the coming days on their transfer to Kingston?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the last few months, I put great effort into trying to reach an agreement that would keep the college in Saint–Jean open and allow the community to benefit economically from its operation.

On July 19, we reached an agreement that would have done just that. The Quebec government consistently refused to implement it. At last, thanks to the co–operation of the mayor of Saint–Jean, we finally succeeded in putting together a series of proposals which will or could lead to an agreement that would keep the Collège de Saint–Jean open as a civilian university.

But once again, Minister Beaudoin's bad faith has jeopardized the agreement we could have reached.

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, one thing is obvious to Canadians with regard to the Schelew affair: the matter has been closed. We have no answers and it has cost us another $100,000.

The facts of the matter are clear. To avoid any sense of avoiding the issue to have been brought before this cancelled inquiry there needs to be a full explanation by the minister.

Will the minister clear up any misunderstanding or lack of transparency in the matter by implementing a full public inquiry and including a full examination of the IRB and its executive?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Reform Party members would not recognize facts if they tripped over them.

The facts are very clear. An inquiry was called pursuant to section 63 of the Immigration Act with a reference to look into the alleged conduct of an individual. The board continues to work and discharges a very important mandate. It was the recommendation of the judge leading the inquiry, not the government, that the inquiry be stopped.

That does not mean to say the status quo of any board, commission or institution should be static and stay unchanged. I say again that reforms to institutions have already been part of the agency review for months. That review will be reporting early next year. The Hathaway commission has ushered in changes.

It is absolutely unfair for that party to try to discredit an entire institution that is working well with public servants who are doing a laudable job.

• (1435)

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration for moving a small step forward from his previous position.

To continue with my questioning on the same matter, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration has talked about transparency and about accountability. They are all things we are calling for. He says he wants the refugee determination system to work as well as it can, and I applaud this.

But will the minister put his money where his mouth is and change the refugee determination system so it is truly accountable and truly transparent?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in terms of trying to build up an institution and trying to make the system work, we have not had one constructive recommendation in over a year from that party.

All it is interested in is trying to exploit a situation that, granted, was not easy for the IRB. Again I say it would have been completely unfair to tarnish every member of the IRB and tarnish the entire institution with the same wide brush.

I have said we are interested in reforming the institution and it will be done. I invite and welcome any constructive advice or recommendation that may flow from that side rather than simply trying to cloak all the discussion in inquiries or royal commissions.

The Speaker: I appeal to members once again to make their questions and answers shorter.

LOW LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. The Department of National Defence proposes to invest over $68.5 million to build new facilities at the base in Goose Bay so that the number of low level flights can increase from the current 8,000 to over 18,000. Yet, there is no new firm contract with participating NATO countries to justify such an investment.

How can the minister be planning to authorize such additional spending to increase the number of flights when he knows full well that the U.S. withdrew from this Canadian agreement in 1991 and that Germany signed an agreement for such flights with New Mexico last May?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the whole issue of low level flying in Labrador is subject to environmental assessment panel hearings that have been ongoing. It should bring down its conclusions shortly.

Once we receive the recommendations of that panel the Department of National Defence will know whether or not it will be able to continue with agreements with our allies for low level flying and whether or not any subsequent infrastructure should be added.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Marc Jacob (Charlesbourg, BQ): Mr. Speaker, speaking of this environmental study, how can the minister still contemplate spending $68.5 million on this project based on an environmental study whose process is biased and which is being boycotted by the Innu, Naskapi, Attikamek and Montagnais?

[English]

Hon. David Collenette (Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the study in question took eight years. It cost $11 million. It was the seminal work that was done showing the impact of low level flying on algae, on fauna and on individuals.

It is a landmark study. That study is being examined by the environmental assessment panel. Certain groups chose not to participate in those hearings. That is their choice. In fact the Government of Quebec chose not to participate in those hearings. That is its choice.

We have a process. It is being followed. When the panel reports we will assess its recommendations and adjust our policy accordingly.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when the refugee acceptance rate skyrocketed and questions were asked about the vice–chairman, the minister managed to dodge the bullet.

The minister appoints board members and he appointed more refugee lawyers, advocates and special interest groups than ever before. He is in charge.

When will the minister accept his responsibility and hold a public judicial inquiry into the Immigration and Refugee Board?

• (1440)

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government appointed exemplary individuals to serve on the IRB.

The member wants to have a general, open season inquiry on what? Neither the government nor the minister gives direction on what is appropriate or not appropriate in terms of adjudication. We have not given any advice nor threshold levels on what should be adjudicated. That is the job of this independent quasi–judicial tribunal.

This individual is trying to imply that somehow the government sets the tone for adjudication. That clearly is not the case because that is not the business of government in the face of a quasi–judicial body.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Schelew affair has tainted the refugee determination process in Canada. How can Canadians be confident in the workings of the IRB when the minister not only refuses to accept his responsibility but will not even allow a judicial inquiry to root out the wrongdoing?

Why is the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration reluctant to face the music and accept responsibility for the mess he helped to create?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is very obvious the member does not know the first thing about the IRB or how it operates.

It is painfully obvious they are not concerned about the IRB, the institution. They are not concerned about Canada's position vis–a–vis international commitments. This is the same party that wants to do away with the IRB and therefore break its international obligation. That is the position of his party.

That is not the position of the government party. It is not the position of decent, average Canadians across the country. The board is a good institution that will be made better.

THE DISABLED

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

The whole world recently took note of the proclamation by the UN of the International Day for the Disabled. Among the worst problems faced by the disabled are the difficulty of integrating into the work environment and employment equity.

I ask the minister: What concrete measures did his government take to promote the integration of the disabled into both the public and the private sectors?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if the member is kind enough to stay in the House at three o'clock he will see exactly what the government intends to do when it tables its new legislation on employment equity.

Mr. Réal Ménard (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve, BQ): Although that was not very substantial, Mr. Speaker, I will ask a supplementary question.

In his annual report, the Chief Commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, Max Yalden, said that the overall representation of the disabled in the federal administration is much lower than the estimated availability rate.

How does the government intend to eventually respect its own employment equity standards for the disabled? Please answer the question.

[English]

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government has a program for helping disabled people to be able to adapt to work stations in the public service.

We are altering those work stations to help people. We want to attract more people not because of their disabilities but because a lot of them have a great amount of ability and a great deal to offer in the public service.

EDUCATION

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Some Canadians, including some students, some universities and now the Government of Ontario, are against proposals to eliminate cash transfers to the provinces.

In the face of these objections how does the minister justify his position?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as we said in the green book our primary objective is to ensure that we have enhanced and added financing for post–secondary education over a long term that will sustain and improve post–secondary education.

For example, in the case of Ontario we know full well that over the next decade an additional billion dollars will be transferred to the province of Ontario through increased tax points. We want to ensure that money is fully distributed to students and universities to make sure that the provinces live up to their responsibility of ensuring that the federal transfers are effectively distributed and managed.

Beyond that, we have put in the green book a series of proposals which would add an additional $10 billion of financing for higher education so we could have new laboratories, new libraries, and new spaces for students.

Our purpose is to ensure that we have a better system. It does not help to have fear mongering by certain provincial ministers against this political process.

GOVERNMENT APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal gravy train is still chugging along. Its latest stop is at the Rene Cousineau station. The former Liberal MP and close personal friend of the Prime Minister has just been appointed to the Canadian Pension Commission. For this privilege Canadian taxpayers will now be paying Mr. Cousineau a paltry $86,000 a year.

My question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Is this what the Prime Minister meant when he said that all his appointments would be based on merit alone? If so, how is Liberal patronage any different from Tory patronage?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has taken the point of view on appointments that the first priority should be quality candidates. We believe this is a quality appointment.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has said Canadians should look at the quality of people that he has appointed. The one thing all his patronage appointments do have in common is their close personal friendship with the Prime Minister.

LeBlanc, Gauthier, Bryden, Nixon, Carstairs, Wright, Longstaffe and Stevenson. Mr. Speaker, it is like a roll call for Santa's reindeer. In fact Rudolph would probably get a patronage appointment because of his red nose.

My supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. How is the continued use of partisan patronage compatible with the red book promise of integrity in government?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will pick out one of those appointments because the member lists several. I do not think there is a single person in the House who would disagree that probably one of the finest Canadians ever to serve in this Parliament was Jean–Robert Gauthier.

If he has an accusation to make about quality he should stand and make the accusation because we will stand behind people like Jean–Robert Gauthier. We will stand behind people like Rene Cousineau.

If the member has an accusation to make stand in the House and have the guts to make the accusation. Just because—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

The Speaker: We all want to hear the question and the answer and the Deputy Prime Minister is answering. She has the floor.

Ms. Copps: Mr. Speaker, my only point is if the member suggested that somehow being a supporter of the Liberal Party prevents someone from being eligible for a governor in council appointment, obviously about 60 per cent of the population of Canada would be ineligible.

OGILVIE MILLS

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

We have learned that, in the ongoing labour dispute at Ogilvie Mills, the company has used the services of a federal employment centre in Montreal to hire scabs to replace the strikers.

Since the minister maintains that he is committed to defending the interests of Ogilvie workers, can he confirm that Ogilvie Mills was able to hire scabs through a Canada Employment Centre for which he is responsible?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would be quite open to having the specific information documented and shown to me by the hon. member.

As he knows, I have met with the workers from Ogilvie. We have had a major discussion about the problems we face. As a result of those meetings I was able to secure a hearing before the Canada Labour Relations Board which has now established arbitration or mediation proceedings. Both parties are now coming together to see how they can resolve their differences and how they can look at the broader issue of labour laws.

We are responding to the needs of the situation. If the hon. member has further documentation that something is being done in our employment centres that should not be done, I will look into it and I will correct it.

• (1450)

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I want to reassure the minister. I will give him proof right after Oral Question Period.

Does the minister not agree that his failure to act and the role played by this Canada Employment Centre in the hiring of scabs only aggravate a labour dispute that has gone on too long already?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): No, Mr. Speaker. We met with the workers and as a result of representations by them and their union representatives we were were able to secure a proper hearing through the Canada Labour Relations Board. Mediation is now taking place with both parties. That is one way of solving the problem.

Some larger issues are involved. We are quite sensitive and aware of those issues. We are looking at a broad based review of the recommendations dealing with the Canada Labour Code and we hope to be able to present those to the House of Commons in the near future.

We are very concerned that we have fair and equitable labour relations and we think the federal government should take the lead in ensuring that.

TRADE

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

In Miami this weekend the Prime Minister embraced free trade with Chile and applauded the extension of free trade from the Arctic to Tierra del Fuego.

The international trade minister is reported to have said that Chile does not have to sign the side deals on labour and environment. There seems to be a contradiction between what the Prime Minister and his trade minister are saying on this issue. Canadians what to know who is speaking for the government.

Is the Prime Minister going to insist on the side deals or not?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the commitment is to take in the first instance the text of the agreement as the subject of the negotiation. Subsequently the side agreements on environment and labour could become an integral part of the negotiation. It is certainly our position that Chile would be expected to subscribe to the same rules as the three existing members of NAFTA.

Mr. Charlie Penson (Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his answer.

My supplementary question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. Two years ago when the Prime Minister was speaking about NAFTA he said: "This crazy trade deal is a disaster for Canada". Now he appears to be a born again free trader.

How can the Prime Minister have any credibility in negotiating an extension to NAFTA when it comes from this kind of contradiction?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the very first policy statement of the Prime Minister when he became leader of our party was that he would vigorously pursue a hemispheric trade agreement and that is exactly what he is in the process of doing.

BILL C–62

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board.

Can the President of the Treasury Board assure the House that the changes proposed in Bill C–62 will not apply to the Fisheries Act nor any other legislation which protects the environment?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C–62 is not to compromise on any of the protection to the environment that is provided in the acts of Parliament that have that purpose in mind.

It is to deal with inefficiencies in the regulations so that we can help a process that will create more jobs and more growth opportunities.

Thanks to the Minister of the Environment we have made it even clearer in the act that sustainable development is an objective to be met. With respect to the environmental protection issues and regulations thereto, it is up to each minister, and in this case the Minister of the Environment, as to which one should apply or should not apply.

I can assure the member that in consultations with the minister, the protection of the environment, the protection of health and safety of all Canadians are of paramount importance.

CANADA COUNCIL

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage. In the context of the budget cuts it is asked to make, the Canada Council is holding a phony three week consultation on its own mandate with concerned groups. The arts community is seriously questioning the legitimacy of the whole process. Background documents are provided at the last minute and questionnaires are simplistic and biased. In short, the artists refuse to support this process.

• (1455)

Does the minister recognize that the Council's consultation process is dubious and hasty? How can he justify that the arts community being dealt with in such a cavalier fashion?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is very hard for me to oppose consultations between the Canada Council and the artists. Our colleague would perhaps prefer longer and more complex consultations. But it is normal, I think, that the Canada Council develop a business plan and this is what it is doing in co–operation with the people and groups concerned.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister recognize that the strategic plan which the Canada Council will adopt following these phony consultations will have little credibility at best, since several organizations have simply boycotted this whole process they consider absolutely—frankly, where do these members think they are? In a school yard? As I was saying, this whole process they consider absolutely illegitimate and botched?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, perhaps our colleague is also criticizing the Canada Council for having no school.

The council is doing what it can to get some co–operation. I hope it will get some, since it cannot develop a good business plan without comments from the public and the people it serves.

ROYAL ROADS MILITARY COLLEGE

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is a question for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

In my riding personnel at Royal Roads military college have received their termination notices. At St. Jean, Quebec, the government offered a deal to postpone closure of CMR, are committed to making it a post–secondary institution.

Why is the government giving preferential treatment to CMR? Will the government give the same deal to postpone closure of Royal Roads as it has just given CMR?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, since the beginning we have offered exactly the same deal to Royal Roads as we have offered to the Collège militaire royal. We have made it a point to be absolutely fair in the agreements that we were negotiating; in fact, most of the clauses in the Royal Roads proposal are exactly the same as in the Quebec proposal.

The arrangement with Mayor Smereka, if it ever leads to a full implementation of the deal, is merely a process of implementation and in that process whatever is offered to Quebec will be offered to Royal Roads.

Mr. Keith Martin (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, fairness and equality are what this deal is about but are not occurring at Royal Roads.

If this is an example of regional fairness let us talk about it. The government is now making acceptance of a settlement package of the military base in Masset as a condition of its settlement of Royal Roads. They have nothing to do with each other.

Why is acceptance of the compensation package for Masset linked to the resolution of Royal Roads when no such example exists with CMR.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in both cases the military colleges are being closed and in both cases there have been economic activity consequences as a result of the closures of bases. In the two cases the amount that is offered over five years is $25 million, of which $5 million is taken from the Department of National Defence in order to compensate for decreased military activity.

This has been a part of the Quebec deal. This is a part of the British Columbia deal. It is exactly the same deal on the same basis.

POST–SECONDARY EDUCATION

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke, PC): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: Welcome home.

Mr. Charest: This cannot be the House of Commons, Mr. Speaker.

My question is for the Prime Minister or the person talking for the Prime Minister today. It concerns a statement made by the Minister of Human Resources Development in reaction to the protests of his colleague from Ontario on the issue of the cuts being proposed for post–secondary education.

The Minister of Human Resources Development is quoted as indicating that his anger in reaction to the position taken by the Government of Ontario could influence his thinking on changes to the Canada assistance plan.

What does one have to do with the other? Since when can a minister of the crown take it upon himself to wreak vengeance on a government because of a position it is taking on behalf of the people in a quite different file?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is too bad the member for Sherbrooke uses the rare occasion when he rises to his feet to repeat an allegation which has absolutely no substance.

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, (NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development who has introduced proposals to change funding to post–secondary education. He recently said, and I quote: "These wild allegations about closing universities and huge increases in tuition are simply scare mongering". However, in a submission to the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development, the Association of Universities and Colleges predicted that tuition fees would double under these proposals.

I ask the minister to come clean with Canadians. Will he in his proposals and in his view increase tuition fees or not?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member as I said in a response to an earlier question that the federal transfer accounts today for over 50 per cent of the cost of higher education in this country. The province of Ontario over the next 10 years will gain well over $1 billion in additional revenue as a result of federal transfer payments. If one looks down the road, the actual amount going to Ontario in terms of those additional revenues exceeds what presently goes in the combination of tax transfers and direct transfers.

Therefore the real question is: Is the Government of Ontario prepared to fully transfer and turn over to higher education the full benefit of those federal transfers or does it have another reason and another agenda?

POINTS OF ORDER

QUESTION PERIOD

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke, PC): Mr. Speaker, I have two points of order I want to bring to your attention.

The first point of order I wish to raise while the Minister of Human Resources Development is still around. It concerns his comments about my presence in the House of Commons, a very well known rule that I think you would want to have respected.

The Speaker: I of course will refer to the blues to be absolutely certain. However, it was my recollection that there was no mention about the hon. member being in the House. I believe the statement was that the hon. member was not on his feet, which has nothing to do with his being in the House. However, I will review the blues.

I take it this is the second point of order.

Mr. Charest: Mr. Speaker, I think it would be wise on our part to check the blues because I can assure you that my understanding of the exchange was quite clear.

• (1505)

Mr. Speaker, the other point of order I want to raise concerns the functioning of question period itself and the fact that I was not allowed to ask a supplementary question.

The Speaker: I am sure all hon. members will understand that there are times when the Chair, if you can say in its wisdom, for the better functioning of question period has single questions rather than double questions. This was one of those days.

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 11 petitions.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): When shall the bill be read the second time?

Mr. Axworthy: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to inform the House that it is my intention to propose this bill be referred to a committee before second reading pursuant to Standing Order 73(1).

As a result of the broad legislative scope this implies this reference before second reading will empower the committee to fulfil the provisions of section 13 of the Employment Equity Act. It also shows further innovation on the part of this government to turn over a bill after first reading to a committee so it can help in the actual drafting of the bill.

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is my intent to table petitions that have been collected across metro Toronto by students in a number of schools following the incident at Brockton High a few weeks ago. Members will recall that led to the severe injury of two teachers.

In this petition the petitioners are calling upon Parliament to strengthen existing laws regarding guns, to implement longer and mandatory sentences for people convicted of crimes involving the use of guns and finally that the flow of illegal weapons coming into Canada be halted.

• (1510)

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions to bring forward today. The first one is in support of the Canadian Wheat Board and is signed by constituents of Souris—Moose Mountain.

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the second one is from a number of gun owners in my riding who have asked me to present a petition on their behalf.

POSTAL SUBSIDY

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the third petition contains over 6,000 signatures from people right across Saskatchewan. They are concerned about the postal subsidy and the impact it will have on libraries right across Saskatchewan.

I am pleased to present these petitions.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mrs. Karen Kraft Sloan (York—Simcoe, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have petitions from constituents who express concern regarding the inclusion of sexual orientation as a grounds of discrimination within the Canadian Human Rights Code.

I would like to clearly state for the record that I do not share their point of view but feel that I must present their petition to fulfil my obligation as a member of Parliament.

I have another petition which requests that Parliament amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

I would like to clearly and unequivocally state for the record that I strongly support this petition. The fundamental principle underlying the petition is to ensure that people are treated equally in Canada regardless of their sexual orientation. We should not tolerate discrimination in any form in Canadian society.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to table four petitions with the House today.

The first asks that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the second petition requests that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

Mr. Randy White (Fraser Valley West, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the third petition asks Parliament not to enact any further gun control legislation, regulations or orders in council and that Parliament refuse to accept the anti–firearms proposals of the Minister of Justice. They insist that he bring forth legislation to convict and punish criminals rather than persecute the innocent.

JUSTICE

Mr. Ovid L. Jackson (Bruce—Grey, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition from residents in my riding of Bruce—Grey. It calls upon Parliament to introduce legislation amending the Criminal Code of Canada so that intoxication cannot be raised as a general defence.

The petitioners request that Parliament recognize that the Supreme Court decision on the Daviault case is offensive and seriously jeopardizes the safety of Canadians by encouraging those accused of indictable or dual procedure criminal offences to raise drunkenness as an excuse for their behaviour.

The petition was organized and presented to me by three students, Percy Smith, Shirley Rands and Bertha Mank, in the law class of Mr. Peter Mussen.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I rise to present the following petition on behalf of my constituents of Capilano—Howe Sound.

The petitioners request that this House ensure the present provisions of the Criminal Code prohibiting doctor assisted suicide be enforced and that Parliament make no changes in support of euthanasia.

SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, these petitioners are from all walks of life and of all ages. They point out that seniors have contributed and continue to contribute to the quality of life of Canadians.

There are growing numbers of seniors. Programs such as pensions and health care will experience additional growing demand. Seniors need comfortable housing, social and community involvement as well as affordable medical care.

These petitioners ask that when governments consider changes to programs that they do not forget the contributions of seniors to our country and to our quality of life.

TOBACCO PRODUCTS

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, (NDP): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present today thousands of signatures of Canadians from Quebec, Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. These petitioners note that tobacco products are clearly linked to many forms of cancer, heart disease, and other serious diseases, that the use of tobacco products is directly responsible for some 38,000 premature deaths of Canadians annually and that tobacco can therefore rightly be termed a hazardous product.

• (1515)

Therefore the petitioners call upon Parliament to remove the exemption for tobacco under the Hazardous Products Act.

MINING

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq, Lib.):

[Editor's Note: Member spoke in Inuktitut.]

(English)

Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am tabling today a petition signed by 420 people from the Northwest Territories, Yukon, British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to take action to increase employment in the mining sector, promote exploration, rebuild Canada's mineral reserves, sustain mining communities and keep mining in Canada.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have petitions signed by many people from communities across the Ottawa Valley requesting that Parliament not amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

IMMIGRATION ACT

The House resumed consideration of Bill C–44, an act to amend the Immigration Act and the Cityzenship Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Customs Act, as reported (with amendment) from the committee; and of Motion No. 20.

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Madam Speaker, before the Question Period, I was about to talk about the power given immigration officers to seize international mail.

I must add that Bill C–44 contains no provision that would allow someone to dispute the legality of any irregularly conducted seizure of goods. This section has been denounced by almost all organisations and persons who appeared before the committee.

On the other hand, clause 18 of Bill C–44 would permit the assumption that someone is guilty of intending to violate the law or regulations. It proposes a reverse burden of proof. In other words, evidence that someone has imported or exported documents that could serve some fraudulent purpose would be sufficient to prove the intent to violate the law and regulations, except if shown otherwise. Therefore, this clause goes clearly against the principle of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms which guarantees that any person charged with an offence has the right to be presumed innocent until proven guilty.

The legality of this clause must be questioned. Ultimately the Supreme Court will have to rule on the constitutionality of this disputed provision. This drastic clause paves the way to abuse. Opening the mail without the consent of the addressee is a violation of the most fundamental rights.

We must not forget that some refugees come to Canada with false papers. After all, these refugees are fleeing an unfair, dictatorial or cruel political system. If this clause came into effect, these refugees would be found guilty even before being admitted into the country. Moreover, we wonder if the minister has thought about the effectiveness of this provision, considering that, for instance, 259 mail inspection centres have been closed and the number of inspectors has been drastically reduced.

If the minister realized that he has only six inspection centres left for the whole of Canada, he would know that his proposal is ineffective. It seems to us that the minister would probably have been more hesitant to introduce this bill, and particularly this clause, if he had consulted with the organizations involved, namely Customs and Excise. Considering the lack of preliminary consultations, which was the case with Bill C–44, the minister could have got some information about the real and unfortunate situation mentioned by some witnesses from Customs and Excise, who came before the committee and complained about the lack of resources in that organization.

What we see instead is a clause reflecting an attitude which prevails throughout this bill, a bill that was written without any consultation and is only a response to political pressure. For all these reasons, I support Motion No. 20.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The question is on Motion No. 20. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 76(1)(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

Motions No. 21 and No. 22 are grouped for debate, but will be voted on separately.

Mr. Oswaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ) moved:

That Bill C–44, in Clause 19, be amended by replacing lines 36 to 38, on page 15, with the following:

"103. (1) On being satisfied that a notice of appearance or a summons has been served on any person, the Deputy Minister or a senior immigration officer may issue a warrant for the arrest and detention of the person where".

That Bill C–44, in Clause 19, be amended in the French version:

(a) by replacing line 41, on page, 15, with the following:

"sion aux termes du"; and

(b) by replacing line 3, on page, 16, with the following:

"publique ou qu'elle ne comparaîtra pas à l'interrogatoire, à l'enquête ou au prononcé de la décision, ou".

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Madam Speaker, we continue with the amendments to Bill C–44 proposed by the Bloc Quebecois.

• (1525)

The changes proposed to clause 19 of Bill C–44 by the official opposition have two objects. First, Motion No. 21 would add the words, and I quote: "On being satisfied that a notice of appearance or a summons has been served on any person"—

This addition is necessary if we want to make sure that a notice of appearance or a summons has been served before an arrest warrant is issued against an immigrant. The government must make sure that the person summoned knows that he or she will have to answer questions, appear or give evidence, before issuing an arrest warrant.

The amendment would require proof that a notice of appearance has been served before proceeding with the arrest. This might seem a bit hypothetical, but without it we might be faced with regrettable situations. For example, a permanent resident could be summoned for questioning as part of an investigation. There could be several reasons for not answering the summons: change of address, difficulties communicating with the people with whom he or she lives, or simply oversight by spouse or children.

Can we issue an arrest warrant for reasons that trivial? Did we think of all the possible consequences of an arrest which might not be warranted? Why not avoid all these unfortunate situations by amending the bill to make sure that the person summoned or asked to appear has indeed been notified to do so.

I believe that the other amendment to clause 19 of Bill C–44 will be unanimously approved by the members of this House. Basically, it seeks to align the French and the English versions of the bill.

Clause 19 of the French version does not mention the reasons why a person may not appear as a witness or for an inquiry or an examination. When comparing the French version with the English one, it becomes obvious that clause 19 is not subdivided the same way, since in English there are two subsections, (a) and (b), and none in French.

Moreover, words equivalent to "or proceeding in relation to the decision" do not appear in the French version. Our amendment seeks to specify the reason for the appearance. It would be very unfortunate indeed if these amendments were not adopted. It is important that the laws be the same for francophones and anglophones alike, and that they be as precise and well understood as possible, in both official languages.

[English]

Mr. Philip Mayfield (Cariboo—Chilcotin, Ref.): Madam Speaker, once again my intervention will be very brief. I believe that the intention of Motion No. 21 is to further reduce the intent of Bill C–44. The Reform Party members will oppose that intention.

With regard to Motion No. 22, I have never quite figured out what this is about. I will leave that to those who are going to square the French and the English on this translation.

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to respond first to Motion No. 21 which seeks to modify clause 19 of Bill C–44.

Clause 19 essentially authorizes the issuance of a warrant for the arrest of individuals who do not appear for determination before a senior immigration official.

The Bloc motion before us today would require that the person be served a summons to appear prior to the event. I would be opposed to it because the amendment would greatly restrict the ability to issue warrants for the arrest of persons who would constitute a danger to the public or perhaps a feeling, for good reason, among officials of my department that the individuals will not appear for a removal inquiry. Currently warrants are issued on the basis of objective criteria reviewable by the Federal Court. Indeed there is a check and balance within the system.

With the requirement in this clause we are trying to seek the assistance of other enforcement agencies, namely the police, through the issuance of a warrant. If we were to go along with the amendment proposed by the Bloc, it would mean that warrants could not be issued for individuals who might be dangerous to the country or may not appear as required under the law. If we cannot find the individual who may have gone underground, I cannot see logically how we could serve the individual with a proper summons anyway.

The clause is being amended to permit the warrant to be issued. We are not suggesting anything more than simply through the processing of a warrant seeking the assistance of other enforcement agencies and thereby helping Immigration Canada to have the individual who was to appear before the immigration official do so at once.

On the second amendment my comments are very similar to the member who spoke just a moment ago. I am not sure there is a difference between the French and the English text. If there is upon reflection by my officials, I certainly would not stand in the way of making sure that what the bill says in English is clearly congruent with what it says in our other official language, namely French.

I am afraid I do not have that information before me. There was confusion when the Bloc put forward its Motion No. 22 respecting the meaning of the amendment. Perhaps we will have an opportunity before we vote in the House at report stage to seek clarification of its second motion.

Mr. Nunez: Madam Speaker, I wish to take part in this debate.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The hon. member already took part in the debate.

Mr. Nunez: Not on this motion. It was on the previous motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Then I recognize the hon. member for Bourassa.

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Madam Speaker, I will be brief. I do not understand why the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, who is a a man of law, opposes that motion.

In any country, in any society, arrest warrants must be used with great caution. People's freedom is at stake. We want to make sure that certain basic precautions are taken before the execution of an arrest warrant, namely, we want the individual concerned to be advised in advance and him or her to receive a notice to appear before a warrant is issued.

As we all know, in every democratic society, a judge normally has the power to issue warrants for arrest when there is sufficiently convincing evidence or reasonable grounds to believe that a person has committed a crime. In the case of an obvious crime, a police officer is empowered to arrest a person, but this it is not the case here. We must be careful. We cannot give arbitrary powers to a government official who might abuse them.

As for the second motion, we checked the English and French versions of the text, and our research staff did too, and we found that there is a difference between the English and the French versions of this clause.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I would remind the hon. member for Bourassa that, as the mover of the motion, he should have spoken first. I would ask that, from now on, those hon. members who move motions make their speech first.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 76.1(8), a recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 22.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 76.1(8), a recorded division on the proposed motion stands deferred.

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.) moved:

That clause 20 Bill C–44 be amended by striking out lines 1 to 14 on page 16 and substituting the following:

1994, c.26, s. 35(F)

"20. Section 105 of the Act is replaced by the following:

Where person in institution

105. (1) Notwithstanding the Corrections and Conditional Release Act, the Prisons and Reformatories Act or any Act of a provincial legislature; where a warrant has been issued or an order has been made pursuant to subsection 103(1) or (3) with respect to any person who is incarcerated in any place of confinement pursuant to the order of any court or other body, the Deputy Minister may issue an order to the person in charge of the place directing that

(a) the person continue to be detained until the expiration of the sentence to which the person is subject or until the expiration of the sentence or term of confinement as reduced by the operation of any statute or other law or by an act of clemency; and

(b) the person be delivered, at the expiration of the sentence or term of confinement referred to in paragraph (a), to an immigration officer to be taken into custody.

Temporary absences

(2) Nothing in subsection (1) shall limit the authority of any person, pursuant to any Act referred to in that subsection, to grant an escorted temporary absence pursuant to any of those Acts."

He said: Madam Speaker, once again let me repeat my appreciation to both the Bloc and the Reform for having given unanimous consent to allow the government to offer this motion at report stage.

I will give a bit of background and explanation. The amendment is in reference to individuals serving time in our federal penitentiaries who are deportable, removable from our country upon completion of their time in prison.

Currently for whatever reason the individuals are considered for day parole or unescorted temporary absences. It was my feeling and that of my officials that somehow it lacks a great deal of common sense. If we think about the situation of individuals who will be deported upon completion of their sentences, why would we want to try to reintegrate them into Canadian society if they will be deported?

The reason I introduced it as an amendment at report stage is that when we came up with the proposal I obviously had to get approval from the departments of justice and solicitor general. While I was doing that Bill C–44 was introduced. Subsequent to my seeking approval both the Minister of Justice and the Solicitor General concurred that the amendment would make a great deal of sense. It is something I hope members on all sides can concur in.

Essentially we are speaking to individuals who will be deported because of the seriousness of their crime upon completion of their time in prison. Therefore this amendment would not permit such individuals to be considered for either day parole or unescorted temporary absences.

Not only does that speak to the fact that there is not going to be a need for integration into the Canadian community because of their deportations. It also limits the possibilities that upon day parole or unescorted release into the community even for a few hours those individuals may go underground or escape our authorities or officials of the Department of the Solicitor General. Consequently because of their past criminal acts they may be a danger to the general public.

Perhaps this bridges the gap between the Immigration Act, the Criminal Code and Solicitor General regulations. It is well intentioned and speaks to our regulations having the common sense they ought to have. I look forward to having the support of members of the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Madam Speaker, this amendment was introduced at noon today. We did not have time to examine it in depth but we agree to this amendment.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

(Motion No. 24 agreed to.)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of the bill now before the House.

Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I ask that the divisions be deferred until tomorrow at 5.30 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), I have been requested by the government whip to defer the divisions until a later time.

Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a), the divisions stand deferred until tomorrow at 5.30 p.m., at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

PICTOU LANDING INDIAN AGREEMENT ACT

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (for Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.) moved that Bill C–60, an act respecting an agreement between Her Majesty in right of Canada and the Pictou Landing Indian Band, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.):

[English]

Madam Speaker, I rise to address the House on Bill C–60, the Pictou Landing Indian Band Agreement Act. The legislation is being introduced at this time to fulfil the commitments the Government of Canada has made to the Pictou Landing Micmac of Nova Scotia. This legislation will further reduce the potential for any new legal action related to the Boat Harbour issue against the Government of Canada.

• (1545)

Hon. members have seen for themselves that this is not a lengthy or a complex bill. Nevertheless Bill C–60 is important to more than 400 Pictou Landing Micmac and it deserves the consideration and support of hon. members on both sides of the House.

By way of background I would like to briefly outline the history behind the Pictou Landing settlement agreement so that my hon. colleagues can make an informed and responsible decision on Bill C–60.

In the mid–1960s the province of Nova Scotia entered into an agreement with Scott Maritimes Limited to open a pulp and paper mill at Abercrombie Point in Pictou Harbour. As part of that arrangement the province accepted responsibility for treating and disposing of the effluent generated by the mill.

The nearby Boat Harbour tidal estuary was chosen as the most economical site for the effluent treatment facility. All the land around Boat Harbour was expropriated by the Government of Nova Scotia with the exception of reserve lands belonging to the Pictou Landing Micmac.

Rather than expropriate these reserve lands, the provincial government acquired the First Nation's riparian rights through negotiations with the First Nation. It is worth noting that the First Nation was not enthusiastic about the project and the use of Boat Harbour as a holding pond and conduit for pulp mill effluent. It agreed only after intense lobbying by Nova Scotia officials.

After acquiring the First Nation's riparian rights, the province blocked the entrance of the estuary to create a 162–hectare lagoon. This included some 12 hectares of reserve lands that were flooded and lost to the First Nation.

At that time the province paid the Pictou Landing Micmac $60,000 to compensate for the permanent loss of fishing and hunting revenue and other benefits derived from the First Nations' use of Boat Harbour.

Unfortunately, environmental problems began to arise almost immediately after the treatment facility opened. Despite repeated requests by the First Nation, action taken by the province did not effectively correct the problems.

In 1982 the Pictou Landing Micmac submitted a specific claim to the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Four years later due to limited progress in negotiating the claim the First Nation filed suit against the Government of Canada for breach of fiduciary duty.

The government pursued an out of court settlement with the Pictou Landing Micmac. Through extensive consultation and co–operation, a fair and equitable settlement was reached. In a community wide referendum in July 1993, members of the First Nation voted 141 to 25 in favour of the agreement.

This agreement is a $35 million settlement which includes a $20 million compensation package. It breaks down as follows: $8 million were earmarked to be distributed among the members of the First Nation for individual compensation. Much of this money has already been paid out; $9.725 million were placed in a continuing compensation fund to address special claims by members of the First Nation related to the Boat Harbour environmental problems; $2.275 million were allocated to support projects that will benefit the First Nation, including the building of a multi–purpose recreational centre and the establishment of a Pictou Landing economic development promotional package. These moneys are intended to compensate the members of the First Nation for general impacts associated with the Boat Harbour facility.

The remaining $15 million in the settlement has been directed into a community development trust fund that will enable members of the First Nation to relocate if necessary. This fund is being administered by the First Nation itself and will ensure that the First Nation and its members will be able to protect themselves from any future health effects from Boat Harbour.

The agreement also provides for programs to monitor the environmental and health effects of the Boat Harbour system. The First Nation is one of the main participants in the establishment and the ongoing implementation of these monitoring programs. In addition, although not a condition of the settlement, the federal government undertook to explore ways which might yield a solution to the environmental problem with respect to Boat Harbour.

Hon. members should be aware that this settlement agreement is self–implementing. In other words it does not require legislation to come into force.

I am pleased to inform the House that implementation of the agreement has been proceeding well. Most of the settlement funds have been transferred to the First Nation, giving it the means to develop and administer programs to improve conditions on reserve.

Although this agreement is self–implementing, at the request of the Pictou Landing Micmac, the government made a commitment to confirm two of the agreement's provisions through legislation. That is the purpose of Bill C–60.

Specifically, legislation is required to confirm that the settlement agreement is the sole source of compensation for claims related to Boat Harbour. This legislation ensures that any claims of members of the First Nation beyond those already settled by the payments to individuals can only be made against the $9.725 million continuing compensation fund. This is very important because it ensures that the settlement amount of $35 million is the full amount the federal government will pay related to the Boat Harbour claim.

In addition to releasing the Government of Canada from further claims by members of the First Nation, Bill C–60 also protects the First Nation against such claims by specifying that any such claims are to be directed to the compensation fund.

The second thing Bill C–60 will do is ensure that settlement funds are not Indian moneys as defined by the Indian Act. This again is important because it confirms that the First Nation and not the federal government has control of and responsibility for the moneys once they have been transferred. Trust funds managed by the Pictou Landing Micmac are currently holding those compensation dollars that have not been paid to individuals.

This provision of Bill C–60 actually accomplishes two goals. First, it meets the government's commitment to give the First Nation complete control over the settlement moneys as intended by the settlement agreement. At the same time it reduces the administrative responsibilities of the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

I want to assure hon. members that this legislation imposes no new responsibilities on the Government of Canada. It simply confirms and formalizes some elements of an agreement signed in July of 1993 that is already being implemented.

I also want to assure the House that Bill C–60 will have no impact with respect to the correction of environmental problems at Boat Harbour. The federal government continues to work actively with other parties and in particular the province of Nova Scotia and the First Nation to facilitate a solution to these problems.

As hon. members are no doubt aware the government is currently participating in discussions with Scott Maritimes Limited, the province of Nova Scotia, the Pictou Landing Micmac and other interested parties to identify possible solutions to the environmental problems at Boat Harbour. I am optimistic that this will lead to the development of an effective rehabilitation strategy.

Bill C–60 is essentially an administrative bill that fulfils two specific commitments requested by the First Nation and agreed to by the Government of Canada in the Pictou Landing settlement agreement of July 1993. As I mentioned at the outset it is not a complex or far reaching act. Nevertheless, hon. members should recognize that failure to proceed with the bill could impose obligations on the government down the road.

For example, without Bill C–60, the Government of Canada might be open to claims over and above the $35 million settlement figure. There will be no legally certain basis to prevent members of the First Nation from seeking additional compensation in the future.

Our failure to proceed with Bill C–60 might also mean that the First Nation could be liable for payments beyond the amounts it has received in the settlement. This would impose an unnecessary and perhaps unmanageable hardship on it.

Finally, if Bill C–60 does not become law, the government could ultimately become responsible for managing the settlement funds on behalf of the Pictou Landing Micmac. This would create a needless administrative burden and could lead to additional legal problems. It would also likely sour relations with the Pictou Landing Micmac as it would go against the spirit of the Boat Harbour final agreement and their desire to manage their own affairs.

For these reasons alone I urge my hon. colleagues to join me in supporting Bill C–60. I would remind them of the fundamental need for government to fulfil its outstanding commitments to First Nations, including the commitment to legislate these provisions of the Boat Harbour final agreement.

• (1555)

Hon. members are well aware of the government's intention to build a new partnership with aboriginal peoples based on trust, mutual respect and participation in decision making processes. Living up to our commitments is critical to the process of building a new relationship with aboriginal people that will take us into the next century. The House can contribute to that process by supporting this legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak to this bill on behalf of my party. I will tell you at the outset, however, that I am not about to congratulate the government. As far as advance notice of this bill is concerned, although I was told last Friday that the bill would not come before the House this session, I learned this morning on returning from my riding that it is on today's Order Paper.

I deplored this practice before when the Yukon bills were considered. I was very surprised to find a one foot thick pile of documents on my desk the day before second reading. I had to spend the whole night reading all these documents to try to prepare something acceptable for the next day.

As for advance notice, although this is the end of the session, the government should show some understanding, especially since these are far–reaching bills which we are often unable to discuss and criticize for lack of time. As I was saying earlier, I am not about to congratulate the government on the subject of advance notice.

I have no congratulations to offer either on the fact that this bill, like other bills affecting Natives, constantly refers to an agreement. The bill before us today is quite simple, as it contains only four clauses. There are short definitions and a significant clause 4, which is the heart of the bill. Naturally, clause 4 refers to an agreement that is not provided to us.

Again, our ability to comment is rather limited. It is difficult to make positive and constructive comments on an agreement that you have never seen. When we realized that the four clauses of this bill referred to a specific agreement, we had to move heaven and earth to put our hands on it. We finally got a copy of the agreement on Friday afternoon.

Having been told that Bill C–60 was not on the legislative menu, we did not set out to examine it immediately. So, we all had to scramble this morning. Again, I tell you, it is quite difficult to come up with constructive criticism when you have had just a few hours to go through an agreement 20 or so pages long and weigh the merits of it all.

I will nevertheless give you an overview of the historical development of the agreement underlying this bill. In 1986, the Pictou Landing band was on the verge of taking legal action against the federal crown. This action was predicated on the fact that, in 1965, an effluent treatment system had been built in Boat Harbour, Nova Scotia. Of course, it had been built on Indian land and authorities had simply forgotten to advise the Indians that there was going to be some building on their land. That is pretty well how things were done back in those days. As you can see, the native issues were far back in the government's priorities.

So, after repeated attempts to negotiate made over several years, the Indians finally said: "Negotiations are required. If the government refuses to negotiate, we will take legal action", which they did in 1986.

In 1992, the government was facing prosecution. It figured it would give negotiations a try. It then instructed its negotiators to meet with the band to consider the possibility of an out of court settlement. This settlement was reached out of court. To have it adopted democratically, it was put to a referendum in July 1993: 141 of 260 voted on the agreement, so they had a participation rate of roughly 60 per cent on the decision concerning the agreement as such. Of the 166 members who voted, 141 were in favour and 25 against.

• (1600)

Those opposed were motivated mainly by the high level of pollution on their reserve. I will come back to that shortly because we think that is the problem and it is the type of project which we can agree to refer to the Committee on Aboriginal Affairs, but there will certainly be many questions raised in that committee because I think that the environmental aspect gets very short shrift. We will have to see, with the First Nations, exactly what the settlement means, especially for the environment.

Of course, the agreement was signed following the referendum on July 20, 1993. Basically, the agreement relieves the Canadian government of any liability for past, present and future effects of the treatment system. The government says that it will escape any liability by paying them $35 million.

My colleague just mentioned that these $35 million would not be subject to the Indian Act. So the native people, the Pictou Landing Indian Band, will be able to control the $35 million themselves. I think it is important to specify that this amount will be divided roughly in two. There is a $20–million compensation account for the band and the members, recognizing that their environment was damaged. The remaining $15 million will go into a compensation account if the band ever decides to move.

We are at the point where we say: We know that your environment is very polluted, so polluted in fact that we are putting $15 million at your disposal to move. Moving might be a solution, but what will happen to the costs and also to the environment which was polluted for years and which will probably remain in that state?

As I just mentioned, the government offered the possibility of avoiding future effects and risks. The amount of $15 million will be used to move people to adjacent lands and let the company, Scott, continue what it has been doing for nearly 30 years, that is to pollute the environment.

Issues of employment and pollution are also involved, to which I will come back later. When you read the bill, and particularly the agreement, it is obvious that the government wants to discharge itself of any responsibility. In fact, this is the basis of the agreement and of this bill designed to solve the problem for good, at least according to the government's vision and definitions.

In chapters 8 and 9 of the agreement, Canada agrees to look at ways to find solutions to environmental problems. What does that mean? It means that the government is committed to looking at solutions. The government is not saying that it will solve the issue, only that it will look at solutions. The federal government also pledges to take any reasonable action to fight harmful effects, but it does not have any future responsibility. This sounds wishful thinking, while the danger to the environment remains ever present.

As I mentioned earlier, the agreement also includes waivers. These illustrate the contradictions of the legislation before us. Indeed, we are told that this issue which concerns a First Nation is settled by handing out money, but the government does not care about what happens to the environment. This is significant when you read the following excerpt:

> The Pictou Landing Micmac and members of the Pictou Landing Micmac who receive amounts from the proceeds of the settlement, including amounts arising from the trust fund, hereby waive any present or future cause of action against Canada based on flooding, breaches of property rights or nuisances arising from activities including the construction, operating, repairing, maintenance or cleaning of the Boat Harbour effluent treatment system or on any failure to meet related fiduciary, legal or other obligations.

There is a particular risk involved, and I am referring to this release from fiduciary responsibility. It may create a precedent, because the government must realize in certain cases in Canada, it has a fiduciary relationship with the First Nations. So if the First Nations are involved in litigation, they can say to the federal government: you are our fiduciary, so you have to defend us.

Though the government does not say so in so many words, it may be very tempting to consider that although there are major problems in a number of first nations and it has a fiduciary responsibility, that does not matter because in a few years, in this case 30 years, the federal government or the Crown will deal with that by giving substantial amounts of money, and the rest will be history.

This is not the first time we have seen this happen. It was also apparent in the case of Split Lake. Is this the way to deal with the Crown's fiduciary responsibility to aboriginal peoples; to say we will pay later? We should try to deal with the problems up front and not wait 20 or 30 years and then finally decide to give $10, $15 or $20 million more to settle the matter. We are concerned about this release from fiduciary responsibility.

Now, regarding transfer. The band transfers to Canada any cause for present or future legal actions against the Scott Paper Company, which is the polluter with respect to the agreement, Scott Maritime Ltd., its executives, managers, employees, respective representatives, Nova Scotia, and any other party whose actions caused or contributed to flooding, breaches of property rights or nuisances in any way resulting from building, operating, repairing, maintaining or cleaning the effluent treatment system in Boat Harbour.

Here again, we see very clearly that the native people, who had reasons to sue, are giving up and the government is taking over. It is not sure that the government, for its part, will sue the company to have it clean up the damage done to the environment.

But furthermore the agreement covers the future. I say that the band will waive any cause for legal action based on flooding, breaches of property rights or nuisances in any way resulting from any future building activities. This is quite straightforward. It means that should the company decide to expand and pollute even more, the government says that the native people have no right to sue, since it is now its responsibility. We really wonder about the government's environmental responsabilities in this issue.

Furthermore, this agreement is littered with expressions such as "reasonably established". I will give you a few examples. In our view, this agreement is full of holes and allows the government to escape all its responsibilities. Expressions like "reasonably established", "reasonable", "if at all possible", "reasonable measures" lead us to conclude that the government will have the upper hand in everything. This agreement gives it all the opportunities it wants to avoid doing anything to protect the environment.

On the other hand, I understand the government's position on jobs. Indeed, this company employs people in Nova Scotia, and I know that the unemployment rate in that province is well above the Canadian average. There are huge unemployment problems there and the government is afraid to close down this company for polluting the environment. At the present time, we must assume that the government is more concerned about preserving jobs; one must wonder how much it will cost to clean up these rivers. We are told that 86,000 gallons a day are being dumped in the river.

We can speculate on the final cost of all this environmental mis–management. We are very critical of the way the bill and the agreement approach the environmental issue and the aboriginal issue.

The government is not very convincing. It promises to consider ways to solve the environmental problem and to take reasonable steps to counter any harmful effects.

The implementation of programs reasonably necessary— again, we consider that all this reasonable stuff is a smokescreen behind which the government is hiding to escape its environmental responsibilities. To escape its responsibilities, the government is hiding behind a bill and an agreement.

A committee will be set up. Canada will appoint a six–member committee to oversee the implementation of a control program. There again, this six–member committee is simply an advisory committee. Aboriginal people will be represented on the committee, but the legislation gives it absolutely no power to say things like: Here are the control measures to put in place. Here is the way we want to solve the environmental question. No, there is nothing like that in the agreement. It is an advisory committee which will recommend some procedures to the government but, in the end, the government can simply forget to implement its recommendations.

The committee does not have any power and although the First Nations will be represented, we have no guarantee that they will always have 50 per cent of the members. Nonetheless pollution has crossed their land for more than 30 years. For 30 years, the government refused to see the problem and now they give almost no control to aboriginal people. It gives them only the opportunity to move out, without dealing with the basic pollution problem.

Coming back to the bill, it has, as I said, only four clauses, the first two being the short title and a definition of the agreement and who it applies to. But the main problem rests with clause 4, because it refers to a specific chapter of the agreement, as I mentioned earlier. We were not provided with this agreement and just recently received a copy. We took a look at its scope and, like in any agreement, one section refers to another and you end up having to examine three or four sections all relating to the relevance of clause 4.

In addition, on examination, a summary one I must say, as I indicated earlier, we found that 10 per cent of those concerned did not give up their lawsuits, for the simple reason that they could not be reached.

The bill before us today concerns the entire community. Ninety per cent of the community abandoned any potential claim, but there is this 10 per cent of uncertainty. What will this 10 per cent do? Will these people decide to opt out of the agreement and legislation and say: "Look, we never withdrew our cases. We want to sue Scott. We are totally against entrusting Canada with taking action on our behalf, with the risk of being unsatisfied with the ensuing settlement?"

These are the kinds of questions we are asking ourselves at this point. The Department of Indian Affairs will certainly be questioned on this bill when it is considered by the standing committee.

Therefore, our position is a little shaky. Of course, the Natives, the Micmacs of Pictou Landing went ahead and held a referendum. We have to respect that. They held a referendum and there was an 85 per cent vote for the agreement, even though the participation rate was 60 per cent. We still have very serious questions, not on the amounts at stake— because we know deep down that these people will be able to manage the money—, but on the future of that nation if they decide to stay there. And if they decide to move, what will the government's environmental commitments be?

• (1615)

Will the province of Nova Scotia take over and address the environmental issue? We simply do not know, as there is nothing specific in the agreement itself. So we finally decided to support the bill for reference to the committee on aboriginal affairs, although we will certainly be back here at third reading after asking many questions at the committee stage. We will support the bill for now but with all the reservations called for.

[English]

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure and I must say a bit of a habit to rise today to participate in a legislative debate on a bill that is a fait accompli.

Bill C–60, the Pictou Landing Indian band agreement, is another instance where statutory authority is being sought after an agreement has been signed and where the majority of compensation has already been paid out.

This debate will remind members of Bills C–33 and C–34 as well as Bill C–55. These were the Yukon agreements. Alas, we are getting good at passing legislation on behalf of the former Indian affairs minister and his department.

The circumstances behind Bill C–60 would suggest that this is a final step in the settlement of a specific claim brought by the Pictou Landing Indian band. In recent years there has been a great many such deals. In fact, information provided by the department indicates that by 1994, 632 such claims were received, 203 of the claims were settled and the rest are either in the process of settlement or have been rejected. About 20 of these claims have led to litigation of which the Pictou claim appears to be one.

Up to the end of 1992 the federal government had contributed $169 million and the provinces $39 million to specific claims, not including treaty land entitlement settlements which are a particular and separate type of settlement claim.

Specific claims arise from the alleged non–fulfilment by government of existing treaty or other obligations or claims arising from the alleged improper administration of reserve lands by the department. Bill C–60 would appear to address this latter category in that the Pictou band claimed breach of fiduciary duty because the department failed to obtain the band's informed consent before transferring riparian rights to the province of Nova Scotia on the Boat Harbour tidal estuary, which I presume is adjacent to the Pictou band reserve.

This transfer permitted the province of Nova Scotia to use Boat Harbour as a facility to treat effluent from the kraft paper mill owned by Scott Maritimes Limited.

The Pictou band commenced a lawsuit against the department of Indian affairs but a negotiated settlement gave rise to an out of court agreement to settle. This agreement was signed by the parties on July 20 of last year. The agreement provides for $35 million in compensation. As of April of this year, some $28 million of those moneys have been paid out and the remaining $7 million will be paid out by April of 1995. Twenty million of this money is to go into a trust fund to pay out claims to the Pictou band and to band members individually. The remaining $15 million of the total is to pay for band members to relocate "should it become necessary".

Allow me to look at these payouts more specifically. The cash settlements will be divided for purposes of compensation and mitigation as follows: $2,275,000 for band compensation and developments; $15 million for community development; $8 million for individual compensation, and $9.725 million for continuing compensation for a total of $35 million. As I stated earlier, $28 million of this total has already been paid out. There are two terms of the agreement that require parliamentary approval. The first is to provide that any claims coming forward from band members beyond those settled by the settlement payments to individuals can only be made from the $9.725 million portion which is part of the $20 million individual compensation and development fund.

The second requirement requiring parliamentary approval is to make certain that the settlement moneys are not Indian moneys within the meaning of the Indian Act. One might ask why this legislation was not tabled earlier to authorize moneys paid already not to be Indian moneys under the Indian Act.

I note from the agreement that the eligible use of moneys from the band compensation and development account are intended to provide and improve individual family and community self–reliance and include the following: resource rehabilitation and development to support increased viability of traditional and commercial resource pursuits and other resource harvesting; cultural and social support and development initiatives; business, economic and employment development initiatives; community infrastructure and housing development and reasonable, technical, legal and management activities in respect of the pursuit of band goals and objectives, including the implementation of this agreement.

Only time will tell how effectively these resources are used and if again $20 million of taxpayers money will help deliver the Pictou band to self–sufficiency. I understand there are currently 425 band members, 304 of whom live on reserve.

The individual compensation account breaks down as follows: $3 million has been distributed to all members of the band including those resident or non–resident before the effluent treatment system began which was away back, I believe in the 1960s. Another $5 million will be distributed among individual band members who were residents of the reserve for any period of time since Boat Harbour started to be used for treatment of effluent. This would suggest that in the latter case, the individual band member settlement amount would be approximately $16,500 per individual.

I wonder if this will improve the self–sufficiency of these individual Pictou band members. I sincerely hope it has had a positive impact and creates a new level of existence for these people.

This agreement has been a fait accompli for a year and a half, as I said before. The bill before us asks us to ratify two specific aspects of the deal which I would suggest is a couple of hundred pages long and excludes at least 10 other sections of the agreement. There are some basic questions to be asked that beg better understanding.

There is no way for parliamentarians to know whether the department officials succeeded in negotiating a deal in the best interests of Canada or not. It is an act of faith on our part to believe that this is the best possible deal for Canada. As I said, it is a done deal. It is a specific claim, meaning that it is specific to the particular circumstances of the case, unlike a comprehensive claim that may set a precedent for other situations. It is a one time deal with strict compensatory parameters.

There is a series of questions that arise as a consequence of this agreement and subsequently Bill C–60. One issue that comes immediately to mind is why we are here at all today. Usually specific claims do not require special legislation. Why is this agreement different?

In the agreement it states that the department failed to obtain informed consent in the 1960s before proceeding with this project. Did the department just move unilaterally or did it at least get some kind of consent? It seems rather draconian to just move ahead on such a clearly obvious breach of rights.

Turning to the terms of the lawsuit I cannot help but ask how much the band asked for and felt it was entitled to. With this concern comes the obvious question of why the lawsuit did not go to trial.

The province of Nova Scotia and Scott Maritimes Limited obviously benefited and continue to benefit from using Boat Harbour. Perhaps these two parties should pay part of the compensation awarded to the band. Why should they walk away and have the Canadian taxpayer pay the full shot?

This brings me full circle to my concern regarding the best possible deal. It has always intrigued me how we come up with these compensatory figures. I look forward to our review of Bill C–60 at committee stage. Perhaps some of my questions could have been answered in a briefing which the department kindly offered. Unfortunately, schedules and time precluded this much valued courtesy last week.

Mr. Geoff Regan (Halifax West, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I rise today to address the House on Bill C–60, the Pictou Landing Indian Band Agreement Act. I am pleased today to join my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, in urging hon. members to give this bill quick passage through the House.

Boat Harbour has been a black eye on the face of Nova Scotia for a long time. The effluent from the Scott Maritimes pulp and paper mill at Pictou has created a situation where there is chlorine, furans and dioxins in Boat Harbour to an incredible extent.

This legislation is not about solving the dispute here. It is about fulfilling the government's commitments which it made in agreeing to settle the claim. My hon. friend from the Reform Party has asked why it did not go to trial. The fact of the matter is the vast majority of lawsuits in this country do not go to trial. They are settled before trial because the parties set out their claims, look at the facts, negotiate back and forth and try to avoid the tremendous cost which could have occurred in addition to the cost of settling, the tremendous cost of years of litigation.

It seems that when the government had an opportunity to settle the matter it was wise to do so. In that situation when we are hiring legal counsel to represent us in a case, we seek their advice on what the amounts might be that the party suing might be able to achieve or receive in a court case and follow that advice.

For all intents and purposes the provisions of Bill C–60 have already been accepted and are being implemented. However, the government undertook that it would introduce legislation in this House to fulfil certain commitments requested by the Pictou Landing Micmac Band and which were agreed to by the Government of Canada in the Pictou Landing settlement agreement.

This does not mean this bill is not important. In fact, it is extremely important for three reasons. First, it will ensure the claims by members of the First Nations in that area related to the effluent treatment system at Boat Harbour are to be directed to a fund established for that purpose under the agreement. As a result, it will protect both the Government of Canada and the Pictou Landing Indian band from further claims by individuals, a very important point.

Second, Bill C–60 will ensure the Pictou Landing Micmac band is responsible for managing the settlement moneys that have been and will be paid out by the federal government.

Third, this bill will confirm that the Government of Canada intends to live up to its commitments to aboriginal people, including those commitments made by previous governments. That is a very important point. We as a government have to live up to those kinds of commitments. We have to re–establish trust between the Government of Canada and native peoples across this country.

As the minister has indicated Boat Harbour is an industrial effluent treatment facility operated by the province of Nova Scotia. It serves the nearby Scott Maritimes kraft paper mill. Boat Harbour is adjacent to Pictou Harbour as members from Nova Scotia would know and it is about 115 kilometres northeast of Halifax. It is much closer to Charlottetown than it is to Halifax; it is about 30 to 40 kilometres away from Charlottetown across the Northumberland Strait.

The Boat Harbour holding pond was created by blocking the entrance of a former tidal estuary to Northumberland Strait. Boat Harbour is currently surrounded by provincial crown land and by the Micmac band reserve.

It is important to point out that in 1966 when the idea came up of creating this effluent area at Boat Harbour the local First Nation was not at all happy about the idea. It was only after intense lobbying by the province of Nova Scotia, only after it was assured the effect of this effluent treatment system would be minimal that the band agreed to its being put there.

The point is that it was not minimal. The impact of this is tremendous. The pollution in Boat Harbour is unbelievable and certainly is far beyond what anyone would call minimal. The aboriginal people at Pictou Landing were definitely misled in this situation and are therefore entitled to redress which they have received through the settlement agreement.

The damming of Boat Harbour permanently raised the level of the harbour and flooded approximately 12 hectares of reserve land. That was a bit of a surprise. The harbour itself became devoid of oxygen almost immediately after the treatment facility commenced operations.

Over the ensuing 12 years the First Nation in that area made a number of representations to the Government of Nova Scotia seeking compensation for damage to its lands and for the flooding. Although the province made improvements to the treatment facility at that time, it stopped negotiating with the First Nation in 1982 and refused to recognize its claim.

The Pictou Landing Micmac Band then entered the federal government's specific claims process. In 1986 the First Nation filed suit against the federal government alleging breach of fiduciary duty.

It appeared they certainly had some grounds for making those allegations and for launching that suit. That of course is why the last government eventually settled, but it would seem to me that it had good reason to settle. An out of court settlement was finalized in the summer of 1993.

In addition to setting up programs to monitor the environmental and health impacts of the effluent treatment system, the government agreed to pay the Pictou Landing Micmac Band and its members $20 million in compensation. Out of this amount $3 million was to be distributed to all members of the First Nation regardless of whether they lived on or off the reserve. An additional $5 million was to be distributed among members of the First Nation who have lived on the reserve during the period of time the Boat Harbour facility has operated.

Also under this agreement a continuing compensation fund has been established to take care of special loss claims by members of the First Nation which would have arisen from the Boat Harbour problems. A total of $9.725 million has been allocated to this fund.

A further amount of $2.275 million was designated to compensate the First Nation for general impacts associated with Boat Harbour and to support worthy projects for the benefit of the First Nation.

In addition to the $20 million compensation, a $15 million community development trust fund has been set up and is now being administered by the Pictou Landing Micmac Band. These funds are available should members of the First Nation need to relocate in future in order to protect themselves from any possible future health hazards. I can imagine that if I were living next to a huge pond filled with chlorine, dioxins and furans, I might well consider moving and relocating too.

• (1635)

At a future date if Canada and the First Nation agree the moneys in the community development trust fund are no longer needed for that purpose the funds will be applied for other First Nation purposes. Both sides have to agree first.

In signing this agreement the Pictou Landing Micmac Band released Canada from responsibility and liability for past, present and future effects related to the Boat Harbour effluent treatment system.

The First Nation is also giving over to Canada all of its rights for possible legal action against Nova Scotia or Scott Maritimes related to Boat Harbour. This agreement does not mean that there will never be any claims made against the province or against Scott Maritimes. In fact we have been working with the province of Nova Scotia. Along with our urging and working with the province it is now spending $17 million to solve the problem, to improve the situation in terms of pollution impact at Boat Harbour which I think is a major accomplishment.

The settlement agreement was signed in July last year. Since then implementation has been proceeding well. Nevertheless this government still has work to do to fulfil its commitments under this agreement. That is why we are debating this bill today.

Specifically at the request of the First Nation the government agreed to introduce legislation to this House to fulfil certain commitments and provisions of the Pictou Landing Indian Band agreement. We are meeting this commitment through Bill C–60. Now it is up to hon. members to ensure that the honour of the crown is upheld by supporting this legislation.

In the Pictou Landing settlement agreement it was agreed that Canada would propose legislation to ensure two things: first, that the settlement funds will be the sole source of compensation for claims by members of the First Nation related to the Boat Harbour treatment system; second, that the settlement moneys are not to be considered Indian moneys under the meaning of the Indian Act.

These objectives will be achieved through Bill C–60 which is an administrative bill that imposes no additional obligations on the Government of Canada. This legislation ensures that any claims by members of the First Nation beyond those already settled by payments to individuals can only be made against the $9.725 million continuing compensation fund. This in turn will ensure that the settlement amount of $35 million is the full and final amount that the Government of Canada will pay with respect to this settlement.

Bill C–60 will also protect the First Nation against similar types of claims by limiting the claims of the members of the First Nation to the continuing compensation fund.

The provision that settlement moneys will not be considered Indian moneys as defined by the Indian Act is also important. First and foremost it will ensure that the intent of the agreement is met with respect to the Pictou Landing Micmac Band having complete control over the settlement moneys. Moreover the federal government will have no further liability or responsibility regarding these funds, which funds at the First Nation's request have been placed within a trust established pursuant to the settlement agreement.

The settlement agreement separates the resolution of the First Nation's lawsuit from any decisions regarding the future of the Boat Harbour treatment facility. Nevertheless the settlement agreement does require Canada to explore ways which might yield a solution to the environmental problem. That is very important.

Toward this end several federal departments are facilitating and working with the Pictou Landing Micmac Band and other concerned parties to achieve the rehabilitation of Boat Harbour. In fact the Department of the Environment is monitoring the Boat Harbour effluent system very carefully under the pulp and paper effluent regulations. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans is also involved in monitoring the system there for its effects on the local fishing habitat.

I want to advise hon. members that the federal government is committed to ensuring the cleanup of Boat Harbour meets Canada's high environmental standards. This legislation will have no impact on this process. It will not get in the way.

• (1640)

As a party to the final agreement, the Pictou Landing Micmac Band has clearly indicated it wants and expects this legislation to be enacted.

To ensure that Bill C–60 meets with its understanding of a settlement agreement, the First Nation was consulted during the drafting of the legislation. Members of the First Nation are now awaiting Parliament's decision. They have seen the bill. They like it and want to see it completed. It makes sense and fulfils the terms of the agreement as the government sees it and as the band sees it.

In making our decision on this bill, I would ask my hon. colleagues to keep the crown's honour in mind. I would ask them to remember that the legislation in this case is the product of a clear and genuine commitment which was made at the request of the Pictou Landing Micmac Band more than a year ago.

I would also remind hon. members that the government's word was accepted by the First Nation in good faith despite the problems it has endured over the past 25 years. I would not blame them for not taking the government's word after what they have gone through in this country. We have an obligation to ensure that this First Nation's trust in government is well–founded. We must demonstrate to all First Nations across Canada that the federal government will indeed live up to its commitments to aboriginal people.

There is no reason to delay action on this legislation. The intent of this legislation is reasonable and honourable. It is time to put this legislation into effect so that members of the Pictou Landing Micmac Band can concentrate on building a healthy future for their children and their communities. With that in mind, I urge my hon. colleagues to give their unqualified support to Bill C–60.

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the hon. member seems to have a lot of knowledge about this agreement. My questions relate to the situation at the reserve and adjacent to Boat Harbour itself.

Are the conditions such that the member would anticipate a significant number of members from the reserve would actually choose to relocate? If they do choose to relocate is there a provision within the agreement that specifies a time frame by which they must exercise that option? In other words, is there a window that closes within I believe it is the $9.725 million allocated amount?

Mr. Regan: Madam Speaker, I certainly do not feel it is fair to say that I am an expert by any means. It is kind of the hon. member to say that I seem to have a lot of knowledge about this agreement but I think that is perhaps overstated.

However, it is fair to say that if I were living next to Boat Harbour which is filled with chlorines, dioxins and furans that I would certainly be considering moving or relocating, particularly if the problem were not solved quickly. One of the key things is what the province and other parties are doing which is working on solving the problem that is occurring.

With respect to the $9.725 million fund for relocation, as I understand it if there comes a point where there is a feeling that it is not going to be used, then the federal government and the band can come agree to change its use, but only in the case where both parties agree. Therefore, there is not a date per se but there is a provision that agreement is required from both parties in order to make that change.

I hope that answers the hon. member's questions.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Prior to calling the question it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Drummond—Blood supply system; the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans—MIL Davie Shipyard; the hon. member for Davenport—Nuclear weapons; the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt—Bosnia.

Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a committee.)

SUSPENSION OF SITTING

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think if you sought it you would find unanimous consent to suspend the sitting until such time as you can organize for the adjournment debate or until 6.30, whichever comes first.

Mr. Harb: That is an excellent suggestion, Madam Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Therefore we will suspend the sitting until the call of the Chair or 6.30 p.m., whichever comes first.

(The sitting of the House suspended at 4.46 p.m.)

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDING

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Hon. Charles Caccia (Davenport, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary, as I did the minister last week, whether he can assure us that Canada will vote for a socially and environmentally responsible resolution that is going to come before the United Nations General Assembly.

The background to this resolution is as follows. It is a resolution that is asking the international court of justice for an opinion on whether the threat or use of nuclear weapons is ever justified.

When the vote came up in the first committee, as I understand it, Canada abstained. Tonight I want to tell the parliamentary secretary that I am ashamed of the fact that Canada decided to abstain from the vote, considering its fine, long and historical record particularly highlighted and developed over time by Prime Minister Pearson and followed in his footsteps by Prime Minister Trudeau. We have a tremendous reputation in the international community and we cannot abstain on such an important vote.

Let me also inform the House that in Canada there are about 100 national and regional groups supporting the resolution, including professional organizations such as Physicians for Global Survival, Lawyers for Social Responsibility, Project Ploughshares and the like.

In addition, city councils such as those in St. John's, Toronto, Vancouver and Victoria have passed motions in support of the resolution. This resolution was put forward at the United Nations by Indonesia on behalf of a large group of non–aligned nations. For the life of me I cannot understand why Canada cannot identify itself with non–aligned nations on a method that is related to nuclear arms and support this resolution to go to the International Court of Justice.

Surely our record is such that it should remove any doubt, any uncertainty and move us away from abstaining and vote in favour of this motion.

Madam Speaker, I am looking forward to the reply of the parliamentary secretary.

Adjournment Debate

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Lib.): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Foreign Affairs I respond to my colleague from Davenport.

At the United Nations on November 18, 1994 countries voted on a resolution which was presented before the UN disarmament committee. The resolution called for the International Court of Justice to rule on the question of the legality of the threat of use of nuclear weapons.

Canada abstained on the resolution and gave an explanation for its vote which made clear that while Canada endorses in principle the objective of the resolution, that is the eventual elimination of nuclear weapons, it did not agree that this was the most effective means of achieving that goal.

The government has and continues to attach particular importance to international arms control and disarmament. We are working actively in international fora on such issues as START I and START II, the ongoing reduction talks, the extension of the non–proliferation treaty and and the negotiation of a comprehensive test ban treaty.

Canada also vigorously supports international negotiations to prevent the transfer of nuclear weapons technology and materials, to reduce and eventually eliminate existing stocks and to ban the production of fissile materials.

Canada is concerned that some states may use the reference to the International Court of Justice as a means to prevent or delay decisions on these international initiatives on the basis that the larger issue of the legality of nuclear weapons was being dealt with in another forum.

We believe that the negotiation of and adherence to binding multilateral treaties is a more effective approach to the ultimate elimination of nuclear weapons than an advisory opinion of the International Court of Justice.

In addition, Canada was concerned that this resolution could place the International Court of Justice in a difficult situation. It is possible that the credibility of the court could be harmed if it were to rule that nuclear weapons were illegal and the permanent members of the UN Security Council who currently possess such weapons were forced to ignore it.

Finally the International Court of Justice already has before it the similar proposition following a reference to the court by the World Health Assembly. A second reference does not appear to be necessary.

The decision of the government to abstain on this matter in the company of only Norway among NATO countries, is an indication that we are prepared to accept different approaches to meeting the challenges at hand.

The resolution will be before the United Nations plenary on December 15, 1994 and Canada will abstain for the same reasons.

BOSNIA

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 37(3) I rise to get a more in–depth answer to questions I posed to the Prime Minister on December 8.

At that time I asked the Prime Minister, now that Canadians had been released, if the government would align with France's position and use this opportunity to withdraw our troops.

I further asked the Prime Minister if the government wished to reassure Canadians now that the hostages were free by withdrawing our troops.

As we all know, this is a very serious situation. The answers we have been getting from the government have praised the work the Canadian troops have been doing in the former Yugoslavia. I concur with those statements. I agree that they are the best trained troops in the world. They were put in a very difficult situation and they have done a superb job under the conditions.

Looking at the events over the past few days it would do us all well to review exactly what has been happening in the former Yugoslavia.

UN forces have had to put up with being shot at, humiliated and harassed to support the UNPROFOR mission. We are rapidly approaching the point where because of the danger, humiliation and harassment, the UN forces can no longer accomplish their mandate.

A UN spokesman, Michael Williams, said that the events last week point to an "extremely disturbing pattern" of Serbs directly targeting UN forces. He cited a series of incidents. First, two Spanish soldiers were injured near Mostar when they came under Bosnian Serb shelling. Second, three days in a row unarmed Ukrainian and British UN military observers patrolling on foot were shot at in the eastern Muslim enclave of Gorazde which is encircled by the Serbs. Third, a Norwegian observation post near near Tuzla in northeast Bosnia was fired on with mortar rounds last Wednesday and earlier in the day a nearby Norwegian observation post was destroyed by Serb shelling.

The UN spokesman Michael Williams went on to say: "This sort of outrageous behaviour clearly will affect the sort of reappraisal and reassessment of UNPROFOR, which is obviously going on in many nation capitals. I think there is a limit to what peacekeeping troops can be subjected to and forced to endure".

Over the past weekend, on Saturday, a Danish convoy of fuel tankers was hijacked reportedly by Bosnian Serbs and a French fuel convoy was turned back outside Sarajevo after it was refused entry. Two Dutch communication vehicles were hijacked along with their satellite equipment. The Serbs refused permission for the plane carrying the UN commander in Bosnia, British Lieutenant–General Sir Michael Rose, to land at the Sarajevo airport. That was just yesterday.

The Serbs have even said quite straightforwardly that they would no longer allow UN armoured personnel carriers to escort aid convoys through the 70 per cent of the country they control. Aid workers said that they could not work without UN protection.

All of this leads us down the road to ask the serious question: What are the UNPROFOR troops doing in Bosnia? The UN Secretary General Boutros Boutros Ghali said last week in Montreal that a decision to withdraw peacekeepers would have to be made by countries that sent them. In other words, Canada, France, Britain and Ukraine would have to decide themselves whether they would give up their sovereign right to protect their citizens who are sent to these war torn areas and that decision should not be made by someone else. Indeed, it has to be made by the country.

There are a couple of red herrings that I want to get out of the way because we have heard them several times. The first is the lifting of the arms embargo. What would that mean to the UNPROFOR mission? We have witnessed on television that heavy arms are throughout Bosnia at this point in time. In fact, newspaper reports are saying that 40 per cent of Bosnia is now covered with surface to air missiles. We have also seen that the troops are unable to move.

Regarding this arms embargo, the Prime Minister said that if the arms embargo is lifted, our troops will come out. It is indeed a fact that there are arms getting into Bosnia now. How effective then is the arms embargo? I would say that it is not effective at all at this point, with the exception of what is happening on the Adriatic Sea. Certainly there are arms getting into the Sarajevo airport and being distributed to the belligerent forces.

I have come to the end of my time. I would like to hear from the parliamentary secretary maybe a little more on the question that I asked the Prime Minister regarding aligning with France's position and also some comments that would reassure the Canadian public that we are indeed moving to—

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I want to tell you this is a very serious subject as Christmas approaches and our peacekeepers are in a foreign land doing peace operations. I certainly respect the viewpoint of the hon. member.

I have to tell you, Madam Speaker and I am sure the hon. member would not mind sharing this with me that he along with the hon. member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo spent some time in ex–Yugoslavia.

We have some feeling for what we are all talking about. It may differ on all sides of the House. I will not get political about this. The hon. member talked about the peacekeepers and the arms embargo. I have a son who is in the arms embargo business. He is a combat systems engineer at HMCS Toronto. As the hon. member knows, he and I worked at Halifax on the Preserver. He wants to come home for Christmas. He understands why he is there.

I will say to the hon. member we met other people. I will not mention my constituents because that could be misconstrued. I will mention classmates of my son: Andrew Napper, Rob Stoney, Colin Blais, and Stephen Brown who met us at the aircraft that took us from Zagreb to Sarajevo. It was an interesting flight. We were not sure if we were going to make it. They understand why they are there.

I want to set the record straight. The hon. member on September 21 talked about the committee that we both served on, and I may say to his constituents he served honourably and well. I want to remind the hon. member of what he said. I am sure my hon. colleague will remember this. He said: "What makes this defence committee report so important? The committee spent months hearing testimony by Canadians from all walks of life. Hundreds of testimonies have been heard in the presentation".

This is what the hon. member signed his name to. As a committee we have stated clearly our conviction that Canada's interest and responsibilities extend beyond our borders. These are true matters in defence and security as in the economics sphere.

I do not want to throw this at the member. I know that he comes from a serious motivation. He did quote what France did. I am now quoting what he said as a member of a Canadian organization which was the first time in 60 years that Canadians have had their politicians go and ask the question of Canadians: "What do you want to do in defence?"

He would have to agree with me that they said: "You should continue to do what you are doing". We may have to change at some time but at this particular point in time our Prime Minister has said: "We believe that we should stay".

I am sure the hon. member, as most of our colleagues, would respect that.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

CANADIAN HERITAGE

Mr. John Godfrey (Don Valley West, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the second report of the Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage on Bill C–53.

[English]

AGRICULTURE AND AGRI–FOOD

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food.

This interim report on agri–food priorities is intended to provide assistance to the Minister of Finance as well as the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food prior to the 1995 budget. It is based on input and views from many representatives of the agri–food sector who took the time to come to Ottawa to appear before the committee between August and December of this year.

The witnesses represented all sectors. We heard from academics, agri–food organization executives and specialists at both producer and processor levels. Each came with an individual point of view but from among them emerged some common threads.

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–297, an act to amend the Criminal Code (summary conviction penalties).

He said: Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise in the House today to introduce a bill to amend the Criminal Code with respect to summary convictions.

Earlier this year the Minister of Justice introduced sentencing reforms but he did not go far enough. Many charges that should not be are all too frequently plea bargained down to summary convictions.

This bill provides for the maximum imprisonment on summary conviction to be increased from six months to two years. For minor offences a judge could still hand down a short sentence but for more serious crimes he or she could give up to two years.

Criminals need to be sent a message that the judge has the discretion to send them up the river for a two year stay at the Crowbar Hotel.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

FINANCE

Mr. Ray Speaker (Lethbridge, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I move that the 10th report of the Standing Committee on Finance, presented on Thursday, December 8, be concurred in.

I appreciate the fact that I have the opportunity this morning to discuss the 10th report of the Standing Committee on Finance and bring it before the House of Commons for discussion.

The motion states that we should concur in the report. I want to put on the record this morning the fact that the Reform Party agrees with some parts of the report but we do not agree with all of it. I want to point out those areas where we do not agree and, as well, those areas where we do agree.

It is very important that it go on the record at this point in our discussion whether or not the government concurs in the report. It is a majority report, and represents the Liberal members on the finance committee. We would like to know if their position is accepted or rejected by the government. If it is then the people of Canada, between now and February when the 1995–96 budget is presented, will have the opportunity of reacting and giving the government advice before it formalizes the next budget. I would say it is the most important budget for the government and for Canadians at the present time.

I have this to say about the process in terms of the report. The object of the 10th annual report is to allow Canadians to have some input into the budget prior to its being accepted by Canadians. That was a good idea. But there were some shortcomings that should be explained and should be referenced so that in the next fiscal year when we go through this process we will improve the process and more Canadians can be involved.

I have observed that three types of presentations were made to the committee. First, presentations were made by those people who are very fiscally conservative and believe that the government's 3 per cent target is not adequate. They believe we should go further and balance the budget within the term of this Parliament. I certainly support those presentations.

Second, there was a group of people who believe that we should not move on the expenditure reduction side but move on the tax side, that if we tax the rich, we can balance our budget. They believe that if we allow economic growth, eventually we will grow out of our fiscal problems. Past governments have tried this. Tories over the past 10 years have attempted to do this. We have only compounded the problem and made things more difficult.

The third group of people who made presentations were the vested interest groups. They came for one purpose and one purpose only. They made presentations that said: Don't take my public funding away from me. I am a special interest group and you must protect my funding and I would like a little more. How they could ever make those presentations in light of today's fiscal realities, I cannot understand at all. Listening to those groups was very disappointing.

Those were the three types of presentations we heard. Where are the shortcomings? First of all, we did not hear from a broad cross–section of Canadians. What we must do is change and update the process to a more contemporary, grassroots, I would say Reform process, whereby Canadians have access to tell their government what to do and what their priorities should be. That was a major shortcoming of the presentations that were made to us. The government did not allow for that.

The other shortcoming was timing. In November we decided we would start hearings. The various groups were given maybe a week, at the outside 10 days' notice that they could make presentations. People came to the committee saying they had done their best in the few days. They did not know we were having the hearings and would have liked to have known sooner.

There is no reason why we cannot let the Canadian people know in July, August or September that hearings are going to take place. Then they can prepare to make well thought out presentations. Even in light of the short period of time they were given some of the presentations were very well thought out.

If those two things were corrected it would improve the process. Canadians could direct their government and tell it what their priorities are. We would have had greater input in terms of priorities for expenditure reduction. That is the first point I want to make. The process is a good start by the government but it has some weaknesses and can be improved.

My second point is with regard to the recommendation of this report to increase taxes. As Reformers we were most disappointed. I know many Canadians are starting to echo the sentiment that they do not want an increase in taxes. "Please do not increase my taxes. I cannot afford to deal with the deficit by paying more taxes. I have paid enough and I am at the point where I am going to react negatively to this whole ongoing process". I do not blame them in the least.

As members of Parliament scatter out across the nation following adjournment this week, we will hear from our constituents that they have major concerns about new taxes being imposed on them at this time.

Businesses are starting to have a growth pattern. Individuals are feeling more confident in their jobs. That is a good circumstance. If in that environment we as a government impose more taxes and start to squeeze them harder so that they do not have more flexible income for personal purposes or for expanding their businesses, we are doing those people and those businesses a major disfavour. We cannot do that.

What about the taxes that are proposed in the 10th report by the majority of the committee, the Liberal members? First, they have said to Canadians and they said to us in committee that some type of a tax must be introduced. If expenditures are reduced and people are laid off there is a period of time in the first year when the expenditure reductions do not take place. There is a delay for one or two years before there is a significant expenditure reduction. Government members have said that some kind of interim tax must be introduced to compensate for that period of time.

Everyone knows that whenever a government introduces a tax it never gets to the point where it is terminated. It is there forever after. Since the 10th report was tabled I have heard people say over and over again that it is just like the income tax brought in for the war and we still have that income tax. It has expanded and intervenes in people's lives more and more every day. That is what has happened.

However the government has said it is going to put that tax in. It is going to argue that it needs it on an interim basis to get itself through the period before it really reduces the government expenditures. I do not think that argument is good enough.

Alberta reduced expenditures by some 20 per cent across the board in government both in social program areas and non–social program areas. That was not the problem there; the event projected by this government which is being used as an excuse did not happen in Alberta. I do not believe it would happen if we had effective expenditure reduction at the federal level. I do not think it would happen the very same way.

What are those taxes that were introduced by the government? First of all it said it wanted to collect about $1 billion by putting a tax of one and a half cents on each litre of gas. The government said: "We can do that for all Canadians and it will not hurt them". One of my colleagues said it was a kind of carbon tax. We cannot really say it is that because it does not focus completely on Alberta. It affects all people right across Canada.

Last week I was listening to an Ottawa radio program. They were discussing the cost of fuel in Ottawa versus Toronto. The people in Ottawa were saying: "Why do we have to pay so much more? We are paying too much for our fuel". A number of people phoned in to say they needed to drive their cars to work. Some people think if there is a tax put on fuel that the extra tax will be coming from people who are holidaying or driving without a specific purpose. One person said: "Just about all I use my car for is to drive from home to work. It is part of my costs in my job".

If this extra cost is added, all it does is take away the money Canadians need for their personal use, their food, clothing, shelter and health care and maybe something extra when they want to buy Christmas gifts and so on. That is one part of it. That is the individual.

What about the business community? What about the trucking community out there? People are on the road every day moving their merchandise across this nation east and west, north and south, trading with the United States and taking advantage of the free trade agreement we have set up. All of those people are impacted. It takes money away from the business community that is needed maybe to hire more people or to invest and create more jobs. This tax is a depressing thing. It is not positive toward building our economy, it depresses it.

I am sure if a poll were taken people when talking to us would say very clearly that expenditures must be cut that we must reduce expenditures. The 3 per cent target set up by the government is not good enough. The $25 billion we will be left with in 1996–97 is still going to add $100 billion to our deficit. It is going to increase the debt to over $600 billion. It is going to increase the interest payments of government from some $40 billion up to possibly $50 billion.

People would say very clearly: "The cost of government must be cut back, but do not increase my taxes. I am struggling to pay the current rate. Do not take more away from me if you expect me to be the engine of the economy". I have heard politicians say for years that it is the small businesses and individuals that will make the economy move. Small businesses are the engine of our economy, not the big corporate ones. Here we are hitting them right on the chin with an extra gas tax. We are going to take $1 billion out of the economy with regard to this gas tax. That is unfair when we are trying to build the economy. We are not trying to depress the economy, but we are doing it by this tax.

I want to ask a question of my colleagues on the finance committee. There were nine Liberal members, three Bloc members and three Reform members on the committee. I will ask the question as well to this assembly: Who asked for the tax? I never heard anybody make the presentation that gasoline should be taxed, that a one and a half cent tax should be put on every litre of gasoline.

It was slipped into the committee report that there would not be a tax on diesel fuel. The government said that maybe the farmers in Ontario, Alberta or B.C. should not be taxed on their diesel fuel which was a rather compassionate consideration. Maybe some of the truckers who use diesel fuel will consider it to be a bit compassionate.

Every Canadian is being hit with this tax. I believe the Liberal members on the committee were encouraged by the finance department to float that as a balloon to see what would happen, see the reaction. If over the Christmas season while Canadians are trying to enjoy the holiday with their families, they are not yelling at Ottawa and creating a ruckus in the media, then it will be implemented.

It is a terrible time to fly a balloon because we are all trying to relax and back off from some of our responsibilities. Who wants to sit down and write a letter to their member of Parliament about a gas tax? However they might be mad enough to do just that and I hope they do.

My colleagues say they are already receiving letters of concern on this issue. The government should listen before it decides to implement a 1.5 cent a litre gas tax across the board that will affect every Canadian whether they are working or whether they are the poor. Whether they are mothers with dependent children who need to drive to day care, whether they are small business persons, whether they are trying to expand their businesses or trying to invest, every one of them is going to be hit by this 1.5 cent per litre gas tax.

We in this House had better stop that today. I would appreciate it if government members would get up today and say: "We made a mistake. We are sorry. We think we should withdraw that. We were flying a balloon". That would be a tremendous Christmas present for Canadians. That would be true Liberal compassion right on top.

That is only one tax the government intends to impose on Canadians. The next one is a corporate tax. To satisfy the left wing socialist element of the Liberal Party it was to introduce some kind of corporate tax. It is trying to wriggle it around so that it is put on the capital. Rather than being up front and saying it is the kind of tax the government is going to impose on Canada's corporate sector, it is a way to weasel some money out of those in the corporate sector. They will not know what hit them until the tax bill is laid on the table before the executive director of this country.

I know the corporate sector does not have much of a defence. There is no political group out there to represent it. Granted the committee heard from what I call the left wing presentations that we should tax the rich, we should tax the corporations, that the corporations are paying fewer taxes now than they did back in 1986. There were graphs and presentations to show that the corporate sector was slipping out from under the rug again.

I am not here to defend the corporate sector. However we have to realize the situation of the corporate sector in Canada after 1984. The real recession and downturn in the economy hit Alberta in 1982, but in 1984 real estate values for example dropped 25 to 30 per cent in a period of about 18 months. It was devastating for those people.

That is one reason, and there are others, the corporate sector is paying less. It is not because it is dodging or hiding from the tax. We should realize that. A number of groups went after the banks which is another case in itself. I want to make two more points in the two minutes I have remaining.

A tax on lotteries is the third tax being proposed by the Liberal majority on the finance committee. Who wants to defend lotteries? They are a tough thing to defend. Politically we could say that sure some lucky guy wins and he should pay the tax.

The lotteries are already taxed four times. This would be the fifth tax on lotteries. There is not much to squeeze out of the lotteries. We could take it if we want but there is not much there. Some exchanges with the provinces would have to be made. They do have some say about the taxing of lotteries and they are going to be very upset when they find the federal government trying to propose this kind of a tax.

I want to make one more point. The other tax that was going to be introduced was called the deficit reduction surtax. It is something like the gasoline tax, only worse. It puts a tax on every Canadian, no matter who they are. Whether it is an individual or a business, any kind of economic activity or earned income will be taxed by this surtax. Every Canadian will have a government tax imposed on them for government mismanagement. It is the wrong option. Like any other increase in tax, it is wrong. We should reduce the government expenditures more. That is the approach. We are totally against increases in taxes.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): We have a period of questions and comments.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, on a point of order I move that the debate be now adjourned in light of the fact that there was no notice of this.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): We will complete the period of questions and comments.

• (1030)

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Madam Speaker, speaking of the deficit reduction surtax, it is referred to specifically in the standing committee report as being a single tax. Unfortunately, one of the members from the standing committee from the Liberal side, the member for Vaudreuil, has been, I am sure without any malicious intent, misinforming the public by saying that a single tax means 1 per cent.

In other words, Canadians right now think the deficit reduction surtax being called a single tax is only 1 per cent. A single tax simply means that whether it is a single mother of three children earning $1,500 a month, or somebody earning $100,000, or a large corporation, a single tax will be applied to their tax rate. It can be whatever per cent.

Canadians have to clearly understand that what the finance committee did was turn over to the finance minister a blank cheque that all Canadians will have to fill in and sign. Will this deficit reduction surtax be 1 per cent, 2 per cent, 10 per cent? How much is the surtax going to be? I suggest to Canadians they should be aware of the fact that there were balloons being flown at nearly every committee meeting asking what is the vision that we have of our responsibility to Canadian people.

I wonder if the member might wish to comment on the reduction or the proposed elimination of the PUITTA, which is the public utilities tax that is going to be on private utilities in Alberta, Nova Scotia, Newfoundland and Labrador where in the presentation that was made to us on the finance committee it was clearly stated by the people making the presentation on behalf of those private utilities that the people of Alberta, Nova Scotia, and Newfoundland and Labrador may be looking at as much as a 10 per cent hike in their hydro rate.

I wonder if the member would care to make a comment about that.

Mr. Speaker (Lethbridge): Madam Speaker, I would like to comment on both issues raised by the hon. member. First, with regard to the deficit reduction surtax, it says in the report that a single rate levy would be made on all businesses and personal income. That means all Canadians regardless of income or circumstances would have a single levy. It does not mean 1 per cent. It could mean 5 per cent, 4 per cent or 3 per cent.

The chairman of our committee, the hon. member for Willowdale, indicated that a 1 per cent surtax collected across Canada would bring in about 700 million in tax dollars. I would think the minimum the government would charge as a surtax would be 2 per cent to bring in about $1.4 billion, because that is the amount of tax money it has looked at in this report.

Regarding the second question of the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act, I think it would be very unfortunate if the government tried to take $249 million from the private utility companies of this country. The problem is that it focuses that source of income on two or three provinces and mainly Alberta. Alberta has some major private resource electrical companies. That is $249 million that would be sucked out of the industry. In addition, it would raise the cost of utilities in those respective provinces. That would be like a targeted tax. I do not think that is fair as a tax principle as well.

In Alberta the farmers who now use electricity to pump for their irrigation systems would be significantly affected by the implementation of this tax, or changing the current circumstances with regard to the public utilities income tax transfer at the present time.

Mr. Abbott: Scare tactics.

• (1035)

Mr. Milliken: Yes, scare tactics. He is spouting scare tactics, trying to convince Canadians that somehow the government has an evil plan to tax them.

Mr. Mills (Red Deer): Speaking the truth.

Mr. Milliken: I want to have the hon. member speak the truth all right. I want him to tell Canadians what his party's plans are for cutting social programs to balance the budget. They have told us they are going to balance the budget, I think in a year or two, and are going to take $40 billion out of government expenditure.

We have had some details on the $10 billion in cuts which they have been specific on, but then there is an unspecified amount of cuts to Canada's social programs. I wonder if he would come clean with Canadians and tell them the facts. Which social programs are going to be cut and how much? I would like to hear the answer from the hon. member.

Mr. Speaker (Lethbridge): Madam Speaker, one of the things the Reform Party has done is lay out the details of our expenditure reductions. We placed before Canadians a week ago Thursday last $10 billion of expenditure reductions. First, we went into the details and presented that to the committee.

Second, we made this available to the media and anybody else who wanted the details. We went into the specifics, beyond the presentation of the finance committee, and made those available to show that there was credibility to any of the numbers we presented. If one reads any of the media reports in the Financial Post, Globe and Mail and a long list of others, there is tremendous support for the presentation we made.

We recognize that after economic growth of some $16 billion we still have to eliminate on average about $14 billion over a three year period. We see $24 billion of expenditure reduction over a three year period. On average that is about $8 billion per year.

That is approximately 6 per cent to 8 per cent per year which was not in the business community when there was a downturn after 1982 and a downturn after 1984. Some of those business people cut their business costs by anywhere from 15 per cent to 25 per cent. The expenditure reductions we are talking about here are minor and can be accomplished.

Where are they? In the social program areas, we will be outlining by the first week of February for Canadians specific expenditure reductions. The focus of our expenditure reductions will take the dollars that are left. There will be some $50 billion to $55 billion in what we call the social program area. I could define that but it would take a few moments so I will not do it. However, in that $50 billion to $55 billion we will be reducing the expenditure of that area. We have already reduced it from $67 billion because there was $67 billion in that social program area that I am talking about.

However, we will give specifics to the Canadian people as to where we will do it. Nothing will be hidden. The $50 billion to $55 billion that is left will be used for positive programs to help those people who are in true need in Canada. We will show compassion because we care about our responsibility to those people in need across this nation.

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Madam Speaker, when I was back in the constituency this weekend people were absolutely infuriated by just the mention of this increase in tax. We are already overtaxed. People are already taking their capital out of this country and people are on the brink of a tax revolt. I wonder if the government knows exactly what kind of balloons it is floating.

I would like to ask the member if he has that same feeling from the Canadian people because I do not believe the government is listening to the Canadian people.

Mr. Speaker (Lethbridge): Madam Speaker, I know I have limited time but I would encourage Canadians to speak out and speak against tax increases of any kind. We cannot afford them. We are at the maximum level. If it leads to revolt and if that is what the government wants, that is the way it will be.

I am very disappointed that the government has not stood up at this point in time and continued this debate and put its position on the table as to why it supports tax increases. If it does not, why does it not speak against the report and not concur in it?

• (1040)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, in light of the complete absence of notice that this was going to proceed this morning, the members we would like to be here in order to continue this debate are unfortunately not here. I know it is improper to refer to the absence of members, but it is vague notion today because I am not referring to any specific members.

Had we been given some notice we might have been pleased to continue this discussion. In the absence of notice we will have to postpone it. I therefore move:

That the debate be now adjourned.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Call in the members.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

PETITIONS

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Madam Speaker, this petition was signed by 300 Canadian citizens.

The undersigned residents of the province of Saskatchewan draw the attention of the House to section 745 of the Criminal Code of Canada wherein convicted murders sentenced to life imprisonment without chance of parole for 25 years are able to apply for a review after 15 years.

Whereas the murder of a Canadian citizen is a most reprehensible crime, the petitioners request that Parliament repeal section 745 of the Criminal Code of Canada.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure today to rise in the House to present a petition signed by a number of my constituents from the riding of Red Deer.

The citizens request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

Mr. Ed Harper (Simcoe Centre, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have a petition to present on behalf of the constituents of Simcoe Centre.

The petitioners request that the Government of Canada not amend the Human Rights Act to include the phrase sexual orientation. The petitioners fear that such an inclusion could lead to homosexuals receiving the same benefits and societal privileges as married people. I concur with the petitioners' request.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have a number of petitions to present.

The petitioners want Parliament to ensure the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide are enforced vigorously and to make no changes in the law that would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston, Lib.): Madam Speaker, tens of thousands of Canadians have signed petitions requesting parliamentarians to repeal section 745 of the Criminal Code.

Section 745 allows those convicted of first or second degree murder to have their parole ineligibility reduced to 15 years. There will be a vote later this day at 5.30 p.m. on a private member's bill which would do just that, that is repeal section 745 of the Criminal Code.

I have the privilege to present to Parliament some of those petitions today containing the names of several hundred petitioners requesting that Parliament repeal section 745. I urge members to be out this afternoon to vote in favour of the private member's bill.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have a petition to present to the House from Canadians objecting to absolute discrimination against lesbian, gay and bisexual Canadians who are an everyday reality in all regions of Canada. They say that is unacceptable for a country known for its commitment to human rights equality and dignity for all citizens.

It calls upon Parliament to act quickly to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am honoured once again to rise in the House under Standing Order 36 on behalf of the hon. member for York South—Weston and his constituents.

The undersigned residents of Canada draw the attention of the House to the fact that individuals convicted of first degree murder are sentenced to life in prison without eligibility for parole for 25 years. Those convicted of second degree murder can be sentenced to life imprisonment without eligibility for parole for 15 years or more.

Section 745 of the Canadian Criminal Code allows murderers to apply for a reduction in the number of years of imprisonment notwithstanding having been tried, convicted and sentenced in a court of law. Individuals convicted of second degree murder and sentenced to life in prison can become eligible for parole after serving 15 years by virtue of section 745 of the Canadian Criminal Code.

Therefore the petitioners request that Parliament pass legislation to remove section 745 from the Canadian Criminal Code. I agree with the petitioners.

RIGHTS OF GRANDPARENTS

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have petitions signed by 800 people from across the country.

These people believe that grandparents, as a consequence of the death, separation or divorce of their children, are often denied access to their grandchildren by their guardians. Several provincial jurisdictions including the Quebec civil code contain a provision to ensure the right of access of grandparents to their grandchildren.

The petitioners request that Parliament amend the Divorce Act to state that in no case may a father or mother, without serious cause, place obstacles between the child and the grandparents and failing agreement between the parties the modalities of the relations are settled by the court.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have a second petition with 45 signatures.

The petitioners are calling upon Parliament not to amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

CRIMINAL CODE

Mr. Bernie Collins (Souris—Moose Mountain, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions to present under Standing Order 36 that deal with section 745 of the Criminal Code. One is from members of the RCMP and many police officers in Saskatchewan and asks that section 745 be repealed.

I have another petition from numerous individuals in Alberta asking that section 745 be repealed. I am privileged to support these petitions.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Shall the questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Harper (Simcoe Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My Question No. 21 has been on the Order Paper since March 8, 1994 or 280 days. It is a straightforward question.

I wonder if I could get an indication of when I might expect a reply.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, let me assure the hon. member that it will be soon. I would hope we might have an answer before the adjournment of the House this week but I do not know.

I must say it is one question I have inquired about on numerous occasions. I understand there has been some difficulty with the answer. As soon as it can be provided I will be glad to table it in the House for the hon. member.

Mr. Stinson: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My Question No. 40 has been on the Order Paper since April 22, 1994 or 231 days. I am also wondering when I can expect an answer. It seems to be taking a terribly long time.

• (1135)

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I am very sympathetic to the situation the hon. member has described. I too am disappointed at the delay in getting some of the responses. In the last few days I have been pressing to get answers to these questions so they could be tabled in the House this week.

I assure the hon. member that his questions have been the subject of intense questioning by me as to when we might get answers in the House. I will continue to press for a quick reply.

I appreciate the member is representing many Canadians who are very interested in these answers. I do not deny that. I fully support his right to ask the questions. It is quite proper that he put them on the Order Paper.

As a member who used to be able to enjoy that privilege, I assure the hon. member that had I been in his position I would be saying the same as he is. I sympathize fully.

Mr. Chatters: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I ask the same question. Having had Questions Nos. 43, 44 and 46 on the Order Paper for 225 days, I would like to know when I might expect replies to the questions.

Mr. Milliken: Soon, Madam Speaker.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

On the Order: Government Orders:

December 12, 1994—The Minister of Human Resources Development—Second reading and reference to the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons of Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.) Madam Speaker, I move:

That Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity, be referred forthwith to the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons.

He said: Madam Speaker, first let me address what I think is an important parliamentary landmark. In this case we are taking a bill after first reading and directing it specifically to a committee so that it can assist in the drafting of the legislation. It is an indication of the kind of parliamentary reform to which our government became committed after the last election. It would give an opportunity for members of Parliament to consult widely with all groups affected by the proposed bill and to ensure it reflects the broad base of concern.

I thank the House leaders for the opportunity to try a bit of a pilot project in bringing the parliamentary system more into the process of legislative development and blueprinting.

The bill warrants that kind of attention. It is in many ways a very significant piece of legislation because it affects 60 per cent of Canadians. It is something that goes to the heart of the whole question of equality in our society, ensuring we try to eliminate as many barriers as possible to prevent people from going to work.

Over 10 years ago when I was in the previous Liberal government as the minister of employment I had occasion to establish a royal commission under Judge Rosalie Abella who looked at the whole question of employment equity and made a number of recommendations. Unfortunately by the time her report was finished the voters had decided to put Liberals in the position of a sabbatical for a period of years and the government that followed only went forward in a partial way to meet the recommendations of the Abella commission.

I am very pleased today, having been part of the initial start on a new regime for employment equity, to be able now to fulfil the recommendations that were originally presented by Judge Abella on how we could work toward the elimination of systemic discrimination in the workplace. By systemic we mean practices, attitudes and developments that have occurred over many years. It does not mean that somebody is being outright bigoted, but it does mean that over time we have allowed the workplace, as we have in many other parts of society, to provide a series of barriers to various kinds of people.

In this case we have four designated groups: disabled Canadians, women, visible minorities and aboriginal people, all of whom feel they have not been able to secure fair, open and equitable access to the workplace.

In the previous legislation the opportunity to enforce and provide a strong sense of direction was not there. It was simply a reporting information based system.

• (1140)

We are undertaking in the legislation a series of very important further steps to complete and to bring up to date the kind of requirements we need to make employment equity really work.

[Translation]

I think this bill is fair, reasonable and very progressive. For the first time, the federal Public Service will be subject to the Employment Equity Act. Also for the first time, the Human Rights Commission will have the authority to ensure that employers meet their obligations. For instance, the commission may conduct audits of all public sector and private sector employers covered by this legislation.

[English]

Basically we are responding to the need to make sure there is proper and fair balance among all employers under the federal jurisdiction. For the first time the Public Service of Canada, involving over 250,000 employees, will be brought under the jurisdiction of this act.

It will require obligations to be met by the armed forces, the RCMP and other areas subject to the final discussions of the President of the Treasury Board to work out matters dealing with operational efficiency and effectiveness.

We have also been giving to the Human Rights Commission, an independent agency responsible to Parliament, the right to begin to enforce these actions by giving it a power to undertake workplace audits. Rather than simply being based on some kind of abstract notion, the Human Rights Commission will now have the responsibility of examining in a wide variety of workplaces exactly in what way they are meeting their requirements under the act to ensure that barriers are brought down, hiring practices are fair, training is offered and facilities are reconstructed to meet the specific requirements to ensure equitable, fair and just treatment in the workplace.

It is our primary hope that kind of audit will be done in a fully co–operative way. Up to this point in time we can say that most private employers have co–operated, because they recognize that employment equity is not purely a matter of human rights, as important as it is. It is also good business. It is good to make the best use of human talent and human resources of whatever kind and in whatever place.

There was an interesting article a month or so ago in the American business magazine, Business Week. The title was something we do not normally see on the cover of Business Week. It was entitled "Inequality". The point made in the feature article of the magazine was that one of the major deterrents to economic growth in the United States was the increasing inequality in society.

We are moving into an age where the workplace requires more and more investment in human capital, resources, talent and ability. If we have people on the sidelines, if we marginalize people, if we do not draw upon the best talents, we do not have the full resources brought to bear to make a productive society. There is no question there are barriers in the workplace that inhibit and prevent that from happening.

A good example in Canada is how some of our major banks which come under federal jurisdiction have begun in the last couple of years very major programs of minority hiring. I quote a vice–president of one of the major banks who recently noted the benefits of employment equity practices by saying: "It brings into our business an infusion of new ideas, a broader perspective, better decision making and a greater sensitivity to all approaches".

They are finding that employment equity has substantially added to the productivity and the performance not only of designated workers but all workers. By improving the operation of human resource planning, management and development inside the workplace, designed primarily to ensure fairness and openness, it provides avenues and open doorways for all workers to achieve.

That has met the test of efficiency. We know the ideologues will not believe it but people in business understand it. The people who understand how things work will believe it, but those across the way who scrape their knuckles when they walk will not understand it. Those who are in business understand how it works. That is why it receives that kind of support.

We have consulted very widely on this bill. We have talked to business, federal employers, aboriginal groups, labour groups and disabled Canadians; four million Canadians who have one form of disability or another and have been one of the strongest and most effective lobbies to bring about these kinds of changes in employment equity. They recognize that they have enormous talents to give.

As I have said in another context when we talked about social reform, one of the objectives is to bring down barriers so that people for example who are presently disabled now under many social programs in the provinces have to declare themselves unemployable to get a benefit. At the same time there are also barriers in the workplace.

As the federal government we are working to eliminate those barriers in our own workforce and in all those companies and organizations which come under federal jurisdiction.

What we are proposing today is a major step forward that will really have major benefits. It would clearly signal to over 60 per cent of Canadians that we are prepared to move actively on their behalf to secure fair, equal treatment in the workplace.

That is a message that is long overdue and one that will clearly represent a commitment to fairness in society and a more just treatment of all those Canadians who have felt that for reasons which had nothing to do with their talent or ability, but to open up for the first time the real merit principle. There is no merit principle if there are false barriers, false discriminations and false disincentives in the workplace. The real place we find merit is when one is judged on one's merit not by who one is or what one is, but what one can do.

Finally, I also believe that this will substantially aid and enhance the basic economic position of this country. It will mean we will be able to utilize and draw upon the full range of incredible talent this country has in all its people and not say to some they are second class citizens. Everyone is a first class citizen and is a first class worker under this legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Madam Speaker, today we have an opportunity to speak to Bill C–64 respecting employment equity. Madam Speaker, I shall, if I may, quote the purpose of this legislation as it appears in the text of the bill.

The purpose of this Act is to achieve equality in the workplace so that no person shall be denied employment opportunities or benefits for reasons unrelated to ability.

The bill consists of four parts. First, it sets out the obligations of an employer and outlines reporting requirements. Part II sets out mechanisms for enforcing employer obligations. Part III deals with the assessment of monetary penalties, and Part IV establishes regulation–making authority and provides for other general matters.

The House will recall that the federal government's first affirmative action programs were set up in 1970, following the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada. However, the report of the Commission on Equality in Employment—the Abella Commission's report tabled in 1984—was to form the basis for current policies on employment equity.

Adopted in 1986, the Employment Equity Act currently applies to federally regulated employers and Crown corporations that employ 100 or more employees. These are mainly employers that conduct their operations in the banking, transportation and communications sectors which, as you know, are under federal jurisdiction.

Bill C–64 will completely change the 1986 legislation, by making it apply to the federal public service, which was not covered before. Considerations to be included in employment equity plans are now better defined. The President of the Treasury Board is to table an annual report. Finally, the Canadian Human Rights Commission will be responsible for the enforcement of the obligations imposed on employers by certain sections.

Of course, this is nothing new.

You will recall that, in a report tabled on May 14 1992, a special committee recommended that the threshold under which the legislation does not apply be lowered from 100 to 75 employees.

The same report recommended as even more important yet that a national employment equity strategy be developed, a strategy that would include a public education program. And this program, in the opinion of the committee and his chairman, was the most important part of all.

This report was accompanied by a minority report from the Liberal Party, presented by the hon. members for York South—Weston and Halifax. This minority report states that: "Maintaining the current threshold of 100 employees, or even reducing the threshold to 75 as recommended by the Special committee, results in legislation that, in effect, imposes a barrier to designated groups members who prefer to be employed in small business settings". As you can see, the minority report even goes further than the special committee report.

Let me quote again from this minority report, where the hon. member for York South—Weston and the hon. member for Halifax tell us the following: "It is our belief that the Federal Contractors Program presents the government with an ideal opportunity to demonstrate its commitment to the principle of employment equity. The message should be clear and unequivocal—if you want to do business with the federal government, you must implement employment equity in the work place".

These two examples go to show that in those days—this was 1992—employment equity was taken seriously. In fact, this special committee report and minority report have laid the groundwork, I imagine, for the bill before us today.

In this context, the Bloc Quebecois believes it is essential to ensure equitable job access to the groups affected by the legislation. We therefore endorse the principle of employment equity. The Bloc certainly supports the inclusion of the public service of Canada within the scope of the act. This was long overdue.

However, the Bloc Quebecois questions the helpfulness of a new governmental measure. As I said earlier, the special committee recommended that adequate resources be provided to the Human Rights Commission, so that it could carry out effectively its new functions. Unfortunately, the Minister of Human Resources Development has stated in a press conference that the commission would have to do more with less. This leaves us somewhat sceptical or at least concerned.

Another difficulty we would like to point out is that employment equity policies should have been adopted a long time ago. They were not. However, the federal government is now in a situation where it must reduce its workforce, which makes it much more difficult to reach equity goals and will limit the impact of this bill to a certain extent.

A bill is a statement of good intentions. However, given the current downsizing of the federal public service, it would be not only desirable but essential for the minister to propose a plan to implement this bill within the public service.

We also remember—as I read a few moments ago in its report—that the special committee had recommended a reduction to 75 employees, while the minority report suggested an even greater reduction. The bill, however, does not provide for such a reduction, even though we think it should.

• (1155)

In conclusion, although the Bloc Quebecois supports the principle of employment equity, we will introduce major amendments in committee in order to help improve the effectiveness of this bill.

[English]

Mr. Chuck Strahl (Fraser Valley East, Ref.): Madam Speaker, today we gather to mourn the death of an old friend. We lament the demise of a principle that has guarded the integrity and quality of our public service for almost a century.

The rule of merit has produced a level of quality and impartiality in government that has served Canadians for generations. The merit principle directs that jobs and promotions go to the best qualified, most competent people.

The Liberals began to inch the principle of merit into an early grave a decade ago and Bill C–64 will bang the last few nails into its coffin.

No other principle can withstand the scrutiny of elementary justice. Who should the taxpayer hire? Who deserves a promotion? It is the best and the brightest of course. All Canadians from all groups accept this.

If the minister has his way, jobs and promotions will not necessarily go to the best and brightest, the ones who demonstrate these high qualifications. From the moment this bill is passed the public service will pass over many of the best qualified in favour of those with personal characteristics wholly unrelated to the job.

The government will subordinate the principle of merit to the politics of race and of gender. This is in a time of public service downsizing. The field of opportunity will narrow even further for those who stand outside the four designated groups.

Morale is already low. Morale will take a further blow in the next budget but it will sink through the floor with the passage of this act because thousands of civil servants will be denied a fulfilling career even if they deserve it more than their neighbour.

How do we know the members of a designated group? They are self–identified. This bill encourages a mentality of victimization. It encourages Canadians to view themselves as oppressed people who can gain something by viewing themselves as such.

At present two–thirds of Canada's workforce belong to a designated group. The annual report on the Employment Equity Act says that in 1991 almost 2.3 million Canadians reported having a disability, which would be okay, but it is an increase of 30 per cent from 1986.

This government will only be satisfied when all Canadians count themselves in as victims but not all Canadians buy into this mentality. I want to applaud the seven hundred and sixty some thousand Canadians who refuse to even name their ethnic origin in Canada's last census.

Even though "Canadian" was not given as an ethnic option in this census these seven hundred and some thousand refused to be part of a designated group and pencilled in the word Canadian. I digress.

Let us look at the purpose of the bill for a moment. Its purpose is to mandate a representative workforce. Exactly what is a representative workforce? The government ignores Canada's history and its social norms. It arbitrarily demands that the public service reflect—the word reflect means like a mirror—precisely by occupational group the designated groups as they occur in the larger Canadian workforce.

This is representation according to the bill. Is the workforce so unrepresentative that people are suffering injustice? Are Canadian employers so unfair that they would shut whole groups of people out of the labour market? Is there really a need for employment equity in Canada?

There is not when one looks at the numbers. Let me give members an example of the 570,000 people now regulated under the current Employment Equity Act. Women make up 45.6 per cent but the larger workforce is 45.9 per cent female. There is a .24 per cent difference there—what an injustice. Bring out the legislative hammer. The Liberals are on their high horses, hell bent on stamping out this perceived social evil. It is ridiculous. How does this mentality come about? The Liberal government is driven by special interest groups rather than public interest.

Allow me to quote from the Macdonald commission of 1985 which describes the formulation of section 15(2) of the equality rights section of the Constitution. This section empowers the government to deny equality to all Canadians and give preference to women, visible minorities, aboriginals and the disabled.

The commission said that the government incorporated verbatim the feminist proposal for rewriting the new equality rights section. Liberals have always been driven by political expediency rather than what is fair and equitable. This is another example.

Let us look at more numbers. What about the salaries of visible minorities? Visible minority males make 93 per cent of the salaries of all men in the workforce; visible minority women make 96 per cent of what the average woman makes. Ring the alarm bells. Roll out the legislative guns. We will blast this problem with a massive, coercive, manipulative bureaucracy. That is the Liberal way.

The government is suffering a nauseating attack of self–righteousness. It constantly points the finger of blame at ordinary Canadians, accusing them of unfairness and irresponsibility. What about the three million gun owners for example? No matter that they are responsible and law–abiding, they deserve tough legislation. The government assumes them to be irresponsible, suspicious, maybe even dangerous.

If the workplace is not precisely representative down to the last decimal point, the government aims its legislative guns. According to the Liberal government Canadian employers cannot be trusted to be fair to their workers. The government must regulate them more with some heavy–handed laws.

In fact Canadian employers are fair and the numbers show it. When situations of equal choice are compared, when we compare apples to apples, there is no discrimination. According to Statistics Canada, for example in 1992, single women made 99 per cent of the salaries of single men. Other salary differences can be explained by lifestyle choices and choices that prefer family over career. This is not a matter of injustice. It is a matter of personal priority and social norms.

What is the Reform answer? The market, not the government, should regulate the makeup of the workplace. Having a representative work force simply makes good business sense. Companies which do not hire the most productive people, companies that do not hire people that reflect their own markets, will be driven out of the market, and so be it. The market will impose its own discipline on the workplace in the private sector.

What is the role of government in the public sector? The government's role is to ensure equality of opportunity for all Canadians, to dismantle systemic barriers, help with education and make sure that employment information is available, reasonably accommodate for disabilities and make employment testing fair for everybody.

Equality of opportunity ensures that everybody has an equal chance. It creates a level playing field, not a field that is tilted in favour of special interest groups. No legislation is required, no bureaucracy, minimal expense, and no coercive quotas.

I want to address quotas in the context of Bill C–64. Quotas are requirements for hiring certain numbers of designated people within certain time frames. The legislation specifically disavows quotas by name in section 31, but on the other hand it imposes all the elements of quotas in other sections.

The bill sets up quotas in disguise. Let me describe them to you. First, the employer must audit the entire workforce, then establish a timetable for correcting any unrepresentativeness with so–called numerical goals for hiring, both short term and long term, then submit a report by June 1 of every year to the government. The employer is forced by law to consult with the union when it makes its plan.

The plan must include steps that will make reasonable progress toward these goals, and the word reasonable is of course defined by the government body in charge. What is the defining enforcement body? None other than the Canadian Human Rights Commission, that group of new moral crusaders, the witch hunters of political correctness. The act creates a new big brother, compliance auditors, to go over the employers' plans and reports.

If the compliance auditors at the commission do not like the plan, the steps, the goals, the auditor can do a compliance audit. He can walk into the business at any time and demand any confidential documents. The bill even specifies that he can use the employer's photocopier to copy them. Then the auditor gives a summary order to the employer to change his plans.

If numerical goals are not quotas I will eat my hat. If the employer does not like it he can go to a new creation of the act, another one, an even bigger brother, an employment equity review tribunal which can be made up of just one person, a tribunal of one person, but possess all the powers of any other quasi–judicial body in Canada. Its orders have the power of the Federal Court and if the employer does not like what the tribunal says he must appeal to the Appeals Court of Canada. This is nonsense.

The fines attached to this bill are absolutely punitive; $10,000 for the first offence and $50,000 for each one thereafter. All of the elements of quotas are there: the plans, the reporting and specific timetables, the investigations and the sanctions. Last night the human rights commissioner said jokingly: "We hope to be able to get compliance without using handcuffs and billy clubs". That is a nice, perverse joke but Canadians will not find it very funny.

My last point is this. What is the cost of this boondoggle? In the United States where quotas were created in 1970 the cost of affirmative action was estimated at 4 per cent of the GDP, $112 billion U.S. a year. In Canada there are no clear estimates but the Ontario Chamber of Commerce estimates that a company with 500 employees will spend $100,000 just to comply with the paperwork.

This bill is utterly offensive.

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to be associated with my colleagues, the Minister of Human Resources Development and the Secretary of State for Training and Youth, in bringing to the House a proposal for the new employment equity act.

We are certain the parliamentary committee that will review this bill will be very attentive to the views of interested people and to various groups on this matter. We are looking forward to the discussions in committee and to the debate in the House.

The Prime Minister had it right when he addressed the French Senate a short time ago. He said that because of the sacrifices and efforts of the women and men who have come from the four corners of the world, we have succeeded in building in Canada a society that is pluralistic and equitable and that is founded on open–mindedness, tolerance, generosity and sharing.

[Translation]

As citizens of this country, we can be proud of the progress our society has made. I do not believe that Canadians have finished evolving. Although we have made remarkable progress towards equity, I do not think that everyone has an equal opportunity to contribute fully.

[English]

We all know there is room for more open–mindedness, more tolerance, more generosity and more sharing. That is what employment equity is all about. It is a policy of inclusion, not exclusion; of openness, not discrimination; of sharing, not restricting. That is what my hon. friend does not seem to get through his head.

It was in the 1970s that greater attention began to be paid to questions of equity and equality. One consequence was the adoption of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Even before that, Parliament enacted the Canadian Human Rights Act and the first steps were taken toward a policy of affirmative action that became in due course employment equity.

What employment equity seeks to do is to break down barriers to equality in the workplace, that is to ensure that no person is denied employment opportunities for reasons unrelated to ability. At the same time it puts in place measures to assist in creating a level playing field for aboriginal peoples, for persons with disabilities, for persons in a visible minority and for women.

On a wall in Ottawa that is otherwise undistinguished someone has scrawled: "Equal treatment does not equal equality". Employment equity recognizes that truth. Differences must be recognized and accepted if there is to be greater equality. The fact of recognizing these differences and doing something to diminish them does not constitute discrimination, as some may claim. On the contrary, it contributes to the equality of opportunity of all citizens and does not diminish any.

Some examples concerning the four designated groups may explain how employment equity is pursued in the public service and indeed often in the private sector as well. Although women are entering the public service in greater numbers than in the past, they are clustered in large measure in what are called pink ghettos. They are heavily represented in fields such as teaching, nursing and clerical work. Women working full time earn less than three–quarters of what men make. In the public service women constitute about 85 per cent of the administrative support category, the clerical workers, but only about 18 per cent of the executive group.

It was recognized some years ago that if women were to become managers in the public service, they would need assistance in overcoming the barriers they faced. Among the measures put in place was a bureau within the Public Service Commission to help women prepare themselves for tasks that had for a long time been almost the exclusive preserve of men.

Alternative work arrangements were introduced as well. These arrangements vary from tele–work to job sharing. Managers are encouraged to permit all employees to take advantage of these if possible, if it makes sense. Nevertheless, women need these alternative arrangements more because they still carry the major burden of family responsibilities.

Recently the pension provisions were amended so that part time employees could contribute. Again both men and women are eligible, but we know that 26 per cent of women work part time as compared to 10 per cent of men.

These are the fruits of a consciousness that includes employment equity. The progress that has been made, however, still leaves women far from equal. Corporate culture has to change too. There has to be a willingness to encourage the contributions of women and of all employees. That is also a matter of employment equity.

The accommodations made for persons with disabilities would be applauded by all members of the House. The Government of Canada has a policy to make its facilities accessible to all Canadians with disabilities, whether they are members of the public or employees.

A policy encourages departments to provide their employees who have disabilities with the technical aids they need to accomplish their jobs. That policy is backed up with a fund that has been placed at the disposal of the Public Service Commission. As an example, if a person who is visually impaired needs a computer with a voice synthesizer, then one will be provided.

[Translation]

In some departments, people with learning disabilities were hired to do work that others might not have found stimulating. The results were outstanding. That is employment equity at work.

[English]

In another government department students with disabilities were hired under a special program for two summers in a row. The students acquired workplace knowledge and skills that they might not otherwise have been able to gain. Perhaps even more important, the project has worked to break down the psychological barriers that persons with disabilities face. It also served to prove that persons with disabilities can be as productive as other employees. They too have abilities.

This was no doubt what the Governor General had in mind when he said earlier this month on the International Day of Disabled Persons that individuals with a disability are often marginalized by discrimination and that their opportunities are diminished by ignorance. Employment equity exists to open the doors to persons with disabilities so that they too can participate fully in the workplace.

A recent Statistics Canada study showed that among well–educated persons with disabilities, aboriginal peoples and persons of visible minority, the earning gap was closing. Although 1990 university graduates with disabilities earn some 7 per cent less than other graduates, the more important gap is in employment rates. Among university graduates with disabilities the employment rate is 6 percentage points lower than for other graduates. The gap is 12 per cent for community college graduates. Even those with relatively minor limitations have more difficulty in finding jobs than other graduates.

The story is about the same for aboriginal people. Aboriginal graduates from community colleges in 1990 have an unemployment rate that is almost 10 per cent higher than other community college graduates. The playing field simply is not level. There are a number of tools available to level the playing field. One used by the Public Service Commission is to enrich the pool of candidates. You will not have any aboriginal employees if you do not have any aboriginal candidates. You will not have the candidates if you do all the hiring through word of mouth. Even then you may not have a good selection of aboriginal candidates to consider. They may not come forward perhaps because they believe that they would not be selected. Therefore, you need a program of outreach not to guarantee a job but to provide assurances that they can compete with the principle of merit. The principle of merit is paramount in our system in the Public Service of Canada.

Once an aboriginal employee has been hired the manager may find that a certain amount of cultural adaptation is required both in his part and on the part of the employee.

Persons in visible minorities are also under–represented in the public service in comparison with the members in the workforce. Like women and persons with disabilities, persons in a visible minority are of all backgrounds. Some are recent immigrants and some have been here for decades or hundreds of years such as the black people from Nova Scotia.

One of the problems faced by the public service is that although persons in a visible minority are fairly well represented in the scientific and professional category they are not moving up in proportional numbers into the ranks of senior management. A part of the solution was found within the framework of employment equity programs in the form of a special course that we developed through the Canadian centre for management development to help certain people to develop their management skills.

Finally, whether these candidates succeed will depend on their qualifications and ability. The merit principle must govern and the person considered to be the most competent—

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to respond today to the tabling of Bill C–64, an Act respecting employment equity. This bill is important for federally regulated work places. It revokes the current Employment Equity Act adopted eight years ago.

Despite the very laudable intentions behind this first Act, it was harshly criticized by informed observers. The present government is now trying to correct some deficiencies. We certainly intend to help it improve its performance.

During the election campaign, the Liberal Party made three promises on employment equity. First, it promised to extend the scope of the law to federal boards and agencies. It also promised to empower the Canadian Human Rights Commission to conduct legal inquiries on issues related to employment equity. Finally, it promised to require firms that are awarded federal government contracts to comply with employment equity provisions.

So what were we presented with yesterday in this House, Madam Speaker? We were presented with a bill that in effect extends the law to the federal public service, its boards and agencies. It seems that this was the government's first objective. Bravo! The Bloc Quebecois applauds any initiative to ensure equal access to employment for all, including native people, the disabled, women and members of visible minorities.

The Bloc Quebecois also supports the principle of legislation forcing employers to comply with the principle of equal opportunity. Since in our opinion the government must set an example for the private sector, any new legislation had to extend the application of employment equity measures to its own departments. I might add, Madam Speaker, that it was high time.

Bill C–64 also empowers the Canadian Human Rights Commission to determine whether the provisions of the legislation are being complied with and to investigate the enforcement of the law. It also establishes an employment equity tribunal when circumstances warrant it. That is all very good, Madam Speaker.

It appears, however, that the government's third promise, concerning the application of the law to all government contractors, will not be kept. I will return to this point a little later in my speech. As you might expect, we appreciate the government's effort, but everything is not perfect either.

A committee will review the bill, but I would like to raise a few points that struck me. First of all, as I just said, I am disappointed with the lack of provisions concerning government contractors. The bill in no way extends the law to this category of employers, and this is regrettable.

Indeed, at the very beginning of the act, a "private sector employer" is defined as "any person who employs one hundred or more employees". You can understand my disappointment, as well as that of many observers. Why does that act not apply to other private sector employers who win contracts for which they are paid with public money? Should we not ensure that taxpayers' money be used in places where employment equity is valued and respected? I believe so, but this government seems to think otherwise. We will get back to this issue in committee.

I also wonder about the delays in tabling these legislative amendments. Why did the government wait for more than one year after the swearing–in of the new team to amend the act? It is certainly not because of the deficit, since this bill, unlike others, has virtually no financial impact on public money. This legislation is primarily one of a moral nature; it could have been introduced early, to emphasize the importance of the social justice which we seek to establish.

This delay is also unfortunate because, in the current context, the new legislation will definitely not help achieve employment equity. Just think of the hiring freeze, of the fact that employees cannot move on to the next salary step, and the massive reductions in the federal public service. This is unfortunate and we deplore this situation. In spite of its laudable objectives, the new legislative policy will not give results before many years, thus once again hurting the same categories of people.

Previous employment equity policies have had a very limited impact. For example, over a period of six years, the number of promotions for full–time employees in all private sectors of activity improved a mere three per cent in the case of women, 0.49 per cent for aboriginal people, 1.11 per cent for handicapped people, and 3.82 per cent for members of visible minorities. These are, in my opinion, very poor results, considering that the act has already been in effect for eight years.

The figures are not much better when it comes to recruiting. Indeed, the situation improved by 2.4 per cent for women, 1.30 per cent for aboriginal people, 0.98 per cent for handicapped people, and 2.91 per cent for members of visible minorities.

As for the public service, in 1986, Treasury Board adopted a policy reflecting the spirit of this legislation, but as far as representation in management positions is concerned, aboriginal people still represent only 1.1 per cent of the total number of public servants; persons with disabilities, 2.1 per cent; members of visible minorities, 2.1 per cent; and women, 15.8 per cent. The situation is clearly not any better in the federal Public Service than it is in the private sector, hence our conclusion that the measures that have been in place so far have not improved the participation of members of designated groups.

According to the statistics, very few members of these groups are in senior management positions and women still work mostly in office jobs, sales and services. So the situation is far from ideal, as the minister pointed out earlier.

I think we will have to examine the available information very carefully to determine why previous policies did not work.

In concluding, the Bloc Quebecois welcomes a bill that broadens the application of employment equity measures to include the entire public service. However, we believe the bill could be significantly improved so as to obtain better results and meet the objectives of this legislation. We will gladly make suggestions to the government during consideration of the bill in committee.

Hon. Ethel Blondin–Andrew (Secretary of State (Training and Youth), Lib.): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to talk to the House today about the need for and the many benefits of the proposed amendments to the Employment Equity Act. Once read, once well understood, if people are familiar with the history of how this has all come about, there is no need for the fearmongering and the falsification of information going on here today.

It should be stated clearly that what the employment equity legislation does is reinforce the merit principle. It states that very clearly. That may be a bit problematic to some because I guess some would feel a bit more comfortable knowing that there are flaws and gaps. Really what we have done is given prominence to the merit principle. Not only that, we also looked for a balanced approach of trying to integrate the four target groups in a very enforceable way into the whole labour market and also to express equity as it should be.

I do not think there is any fear with all these people fearmongering about their jobs, including the hon. members across the way scaring people by saying that what is going to happen if we do hire disabled people, women, aboriginals and visible minorities is that these people will not be hired meritoriously.

This is erroneous and this is clearly discriminatory. It is an assumption, a false assumption. Because those four target groups are going to be aided by this legislation, it is perfectly acceptable that this happens considering the gross under–representation of those groups. It is a wrong that has not been corrected.

There have been many barriers. There have been many obstacles and this is a step forward. It is needless for people to put fear in the hearts of those people who have jobs out there, particularly those people who are highly placed.

Members need not worry because these four target groups are so under–represented as of yet. It will take such a long time. It will still be such a big struggle. This will make it easy but it is not going to be just the legislation that is going to make it happen.

Unfortunately some of the greatest obstacles we will have are attitudes of people. We can put legislation there to help but unfortunately we cannot change the minds of all those people who are otherwise inclined.

The equity is not simply the subject of ideological debate for me and many other members of this House. For those of us who are women, members of visible minorities, persons with disabilities or aboriginal people, employment equity is fundamentally about democracy. It is the freedom to exercise our rights to participate fully in the political process, to make contributions to the economic and cultural fabric of our nation.

Employment equity means ensuring that all Canadians have a fair chance in the workplace. It ensures that no person is denied employment opportunities for reasons unrelated to ability. It involves identifying and eliminating barriers, taking special measures and making reasonable accommodations.

As was stated by the hon. member, there are no quotas. For instance, if 25 per cent of the population is aboriginal in a said province and there is a thousand–person company and there is not one aboriginal person, is it not reasonable to assume that company or other companies like it would want to achieve that kind of representation of that population? That is not unreasonable. That is not discriminatory. That is perfectly logical, perfectly acceptable and it is the way things should evolve if we are to show the dignity and the respect of one another as human beings.

It also talks about equality, the opportunity of equality. That seems to fail some people. In short, employment equity means ensuring that employment opportunities are open to those who have historically been arbitrarily excluded. We need not go into the figures. We all know what they are. It is a fact that is well known to many of us, including hon. members opposite.

This bill is a fulfilment of this government's vision of our country, one in which each of us has equal access to employment opportunities and a chance to fully share in Canada's prosperity. Why should some people be on the periphery of prosperity? Why should they not be sharing in the wealth of this country in terms of jobs, promotions and training? Why not adopt this legislation fully? All members of the House should see the historical isolation and marginalization of target groups in our population and that those who need a helping hand and logical reasoning, those who need that acceptance, should be accepted.

By strengthening the employment equity act we are reconfirming the core values Canadians hold dear: fairness, decency, and equality for every citizen in this nation. Canada is known around the world for that. We are citizens of the world. We are recognized for that. Why would we not enhance that within our own country?

Equality does not come easily in Canada. It is a source of national shame that as recently as the 1950s the first peoples of this country were subject to laws which prevented them from leaving reserves without a bureaucrat's permission. It is a known fact that our people were going to war and fighting for this country as First Nations people and they did not have the right to vote. Women were not even considered persons in the eyes of the law until October 1929 when women won the famous Persons case and gained the right to become members of the Senate.

According to the 1993 annual report on employment equity we still have not come close to attaining our goals. According to the most recent census aboriginal peoples continue to be under–represented in the workforce at just 1.04 per cent compared to 3 per cent in the Canadian workforce.

Aboriginal people continue to occupy the lowest paying jobs. The wage gap between aboriginal men and women working full time and other Canadians has actually increased since 1987. Mind you it should be noted by all members of this House that aboriginal people on average still make an annual income of $10,000.

Aboriginal participation in the workforce has risen by less than .5 per cent since employment equity came into effect. This is even though the number of employable aboriginal people rose by almost 50 per cent during the years 1986 to 1991.

The plight of persons with disabilities is not much better. The representation of this group in the workforce has changed very slowly. They are equally under–represented in the labour market especially given that the number of Canadians with disabilities increased from 5.4 to 6.5 per cent of the population over the same five year period.

It is simply unacceptable that today in Canada a woman still earns only 70 per cent of her male counterpart's wages, or that a person of colour is denied a promotion on the basis of his or her skin colour.

The litmus test of Canadians' commitment to true equality is access to employment. Jobs are the key to social and economic integration into the community. They are a source of fulfilment and independence for all Canadians. As the Prime Minister would say, a job gives you self–respect and dignity. Jobs are part of this government's agenda.

Employment equity ensures that those jobs will be available to everyone without any barriers. By the turn of the century two–thirds of the entrants to the workforce will be women, aboriginal peoples, members of visible minorities and persons with disabilities. This country needs the wealth of their talents.

With this bill we want to achieve a better balance that works to the advantage of all Canadians. This legislation does not set out to redress the difficulties being faced by disadvantaged groups by creating new problems for other Canadians. The amendments are designed to clarify and strengthen existing laws, not to increase the regulatory or financial burdens to employers.

Madam Speaker, I know I am out of time so I will skip a great deal of what I had to say which I think was also important. I will conclude by saying that by assuring equal access to employment and fair treatment of all, we can and will build a better nation for our children, for our families and for all Canadians.

Remember that 60 per cent of the Canadian population is constituted by these four target groups but they are not adequately represented. It should be noted that we are talking about fair representation, not under–representation. We are talking about equality of opportunity.

• (1235)

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to address Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity.

Reform opposes this type of legislation and I certainly oppose it. Affirmative action by any other name is still affirmative action. It leads to the creation of special designation groups and causes reverse discrimination as the process of merit hiring is forced to take a back seat to artificially created criteria.

The annual report of employment equity for 1994 clearly shows there is no need for this legislation. Visible minorities represent 8 per cent of the workforce governed by the current act compared to 9 per cent of the entire Canadian workforce. The report also states that women represent 45 per cent of the workforce covered by the existing act compared to 45 per cent of the entire Canadian labour force. These two facts alone show that a hiring process unencumbered by government regulations is able to adequately address this issue.

In our lifetime let us admit it, we have seen terrible inequities. Going back to the thirties and forties, there have been gross inequities in our social system but they are being corrected over the years. Human dignity and human will are creating the redress.

I find it amazing that this government feels a need to interfere with the free job market which is working well when it fails to use the same urgency to address real issues like the debt and the deficit. Why do I say the government is acting with urgency? This bill was tabled in the House yesterday, shortly after 1500 hours. The ink on that official document could hardly have been dry at the time. I did not get to read the bill until this morning. Yet here we are less than 24 hours after its introduction being asked to debate the bill's merit. That is acting with a sense of urgency but I think it might be more accurately described as an abuse of the democratic process.

I saw the converse in this House this morning when my colleague, the member for Lethbridge, was speaking on Motion No. 13 and wanted to continue debate on it. Those on the government benches said: "Oh no, we cannot do that. We did not have enough notice". They had 48 hours' notice to continue debate but that was not sufficient for them.

Why the urgency on this bill? I do not know. Are the Liberals afraid to have the complete details of the bill brought to the attention of the Canadian public, or are they simply afraid to tell Canadians about the bureaucratic maze which has to be created by this bill?

One thing I do know is that the business people in my constituency are fed up to the teeth with government bureaucracy, with more and more taxes and more and more regulations to adhere to and forms to fill out. Canadian employers are already deluged with government imposed paperwork.

That burden is increased even more through clauses 9 to 18 of this bill which call for the collection, analysis and review of their workforce leading to the preparation of an employment equity plan, complete with long term and short term numerical goals. There is also the requirement that an annual report on employment equity be filed with the minister. Let us look at the bill.

Clause 9 states that for the purposes of implementing employment equity every employer shall collect information and conduct an analysis of the employer's workforce in accordance with the regulations in order to determine the degree of under–representation, et cetera. It goes on about conducting a review of the employer's employment systems, policies and practices in accordance with the regulations. It is only those employees who identify themselves or agree to be identified by employers as aboriginal peoples, et cetera.

Clause 10 indicates that employers shall prepare an employment equity plan that does this, that and the other thing.

Let us look a bit more at this bill which will totally discourage private enterprise. It will specify the measure to be taken by the employer. It will establish a timetable for the implementation. Where under–representation has been identified it will establish short term goals. It goes on and on and on.

Clause 11: Every employer shall ensure that its employment equity plan would, if implemented, constitute reasonable progress.

Clause 12: Every employer shall make reasonable efforts to monitor implementation.

Clause 13 indicates that every employer shall update numerical goals at least once during the period.

Clause 14: Every employer shall consult with his employees by inviting representatives to provide their views.

It goes on and on and on. Thirty pages of bureaucracy imposed on employers around this country. Have I said that they are already deluged? Well they certainly are. All these measures will only serve to undermine the productivity of Canadian business as executives are forced to spend even more of their already limited time on needless government paperwork.

Clause 21 of the bill creates employment equity compliance review officers, or to use a less politically correct term, an affirmative action army. This army has the authority to enter any business which it feels is contravening the act and demand documents and the co–operation of the employer and staff. On reading part II of this bill I thought George Orwell would be very proud as big brother takes yet another step into our lives.

Clause 25 creates the headquarters or the command post for the affirmative action army with the establishment of an employment equity review tribunal. More bureaucracy and more tax dollars dropped into the bottomless pit that is the national debt. This government continues to talk fiscal restraint yet its actions do not match its words.

I would go further into the analysis of this bill but the government's haste to ram it through prohibits any more thorough examination.

In my own riding, residents of the city of Nanaimo are well aware of the adverse effects of this type of legislation. Several years ago the city implemented pay equity which resulted in an immediate and significant tax increase. It also has a lasting effect on the taxpayer in that the result is that the annual salary for an entry level employee will soon reach $30,000.

Another example of this type of policy was brought to my attention recently by a constituent. This young man is an exceptional student in a technical program at Malaspina College. His high marks caused the institute to nominate him for a federal scholarship. While his marks qualified him for the award, his gender did not.

The scholarships are handed out on the basis of gender. Since Malaspina did not have a female student with appropriate grades the qualified student was refused and both scholarships were given to another institution. This is the type of reverse discrimination this sort of legislation will create.

I will wind up if my time is up. Hiring policies should not be based upon race, culture or gender. They should be colour blind and gender neutral. If ever a bill epitomizes the difference in philosophy between the Liberals and I might even say the NDP and the Reform Party, this is it.

Canadians are hard pressed for programs they want and they cannot afford to pay for programs we do not need. In the interests of the already overburdened taxpayers, I urge the government to abandon this nonsensical legislation.

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Madam Speaker, it is evident that the member who has just spoken is rather ill informed because he has just quoted provisions that have been in legislation for over seven years, suggesting to the public that they are new provisions, some new burden.

I think he has also failed to point out to Canadians that the minister has taken the unusual step of giving an extra stage of debate on this bill, not curtailing debate, by having this discussion in the House before referring it to a committee where it will be subject to full, open discussion and consultation and will come back to the House for at least two more stages of debate. I do not know how much more open a process can be.

One of my proudest accomplishments during the last Parliament as a member was to be able to move in committee and have accepted in this Parliament amendments to the Financial Administration Act and the Public Service Employment Act that required the Public Service of Canada to live by the same rules with respect to employment equity that the act imposes on private sector employers.

It was done in this simple way, by embarrassing the government, by saying for over five years now you have had regulations imposed on the private sector that you refuse to live by. If we want to set an example as government, we have to be prepared to say that there is one set of rules for everybody. If it is good enough for the private sector it is good enough for the public sector.

The member should applaud what this bill does. It precisely says that there is no longer one legislation for the private sector and another for the public sector. We are all going to live by the same rules with respect to employment equity.

The legislation on employment equity has been in place since 1987.

[Translation]

Despite considerable progress, most aboriginal people, women, members of visible minorities and persons with disabilities who do have work continue to have low paying jobs. More specifically, employers and employees know they are not enjoying the many benefits of employment equity. In fact, diversity is a way to enhance the work environment and thus increase productivity.

By expanding the application of this legislation to the federal public service, we will provide many opportunities for persons with disabilities, members of visible minorities, aboriginal people and women.

[English]

Notwithstanding the howls from the Reform members who wished to hang on to the privileges that people just like them have enjoyed for a long time, this legislation is not about introducing bias. This legislation is about removing bias in hiring and retention of employees and in promotion. This is not about abandoning the merit principle. It is about reaffirming and fulfilling the merit principle.

For 75 years we have had in the Government of Canada the principle that you get hired on the basis of your ability and no other. Despite that we have a senior management category with less than 18 per cent women. There are the lower echelons of the lowest paid workers, 80 per cent women. Even within those lowest paid categories, guess who rises to the top in those lowest paid categories? It is not the 80 per cent of employees in those categories who are women, but mostly men.

There are numerous examples. We only have to look at the statistics of the number of referrals for employment in the public service last year; for example, 8.2 per cent referrals for positions. These were people who had already been screened as qualified. There were 8.1 per cent of a visible minority, but only 2.5 per cent of hirings were of a visible minority. There is a bias operating there and we have to take a great deal more time than we have today to look at why that is.

Let me touch some highlights. There are perceptions and attitudes: "I have always seen a certain kind of person succeed and fit well into management and therefore that is the kind of person I want to hire". These are not deliberately, consciously biased attitudes but they are attitudes that clearly influence who gets hired, who gets the opportunities to train, to get promoted, to get career development opportunities.

It affects the other side in terms of who applies. We apply for jobs where we see ourselves fitting in and succeeding. Unfortunately most women, most aboriginal people, most people with disabilities, most people from visible minority groups have not seen themselves being hired and progressing to the upper echelons in the public service.

The working environment creates an atmosphere in which one either flourishes or does not. Our working environment has not been conducive to people of different backgrounds being hired, being promoted, fitting in well and moving up the ranks.

We know that in a time of downsizing it is going to be extremely difficult to achieve some of our targets in the public service, to really move to a public service that is more representative of the taxpayers of Canada and of the people we serve. We all know that understanding our clients is an important part of being able to serve them well.

We have to make this effort notwithstanding hiring freezes, downsizing and so on. Twenty–five hundred people were hired in the public service last year. There were tens of thousands of promotions, movements, development appointments, and that is where we can certainly make some progress.

I mentioned this bill will be going to committee. We are not here to debate even approval in principle of the bill. The minister has chosen to forego that, to get that whole issue in front of a committee for examination of the bill, so it can save the time and money of duplicating effort to consider a bill and also to conduct a review of the existing act.

I want to make some suggestions to the committee as it receives this bill and considers it. I really have a hard time justifying to myself why the armed forces, the RCMP and CSIS are exempted from this legislation unless they are included later by order in council. I am sure there are private sector employers who have equally valid reasons to feel they should be exempted, but we have chosen not to do that. I urge the committee to look at that.

I urge the committee to look at defining compliance and to ensure that compliance is not simply depositing a report. I urge the committee to look at contracting, because we are now developing a shadow public service through contracting that has no obligation to pay attention to the merit principle or to employment equity or to a number of other government policies. Let me cite one case. I am aware of a man and a woman employed through a government agency to do exactly the same kind of work with exactly the same kind of qualifications. Earning a $100 difference, guess who was earning the lesser amount?

The purpose here is improving, giving everybody the opportunity to participate fully in the economic recovery this country is heading into. I want to point out that we are talking here not about privileges for minorities. We are talking about equal treatment. Unless the Reform Party cares to make the argument that inherently women, people of colour, people with disabilities, aboriginal peoples are less capable, then it can only accept the reason they have not progressed in the public service or in the private sector is some inherent preference for a different kind of candidate.

We are talking about the majority of Canadian workers and giving that majority who fit in one of these categories equal opportunity to succeed and to prosper in the Canada of the future.

• (1255)

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Madam Speaker, it is with pleasure that I rise today to speak on Bill C–64. The purpose of this bill is to achieve equality in the workplace and to correct conditions of disadvantage experienced by certain groups, including women, aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities and members of visible minorities.

This new act will replace the existing act, which was passed in 1986. It will apply to federally regulated employers and Crown corporations that employ one hundred or more employees.

The bill will extend the scope of the legislation to include the public service of Canada. It is a good idea to extend the scope of such a major piece of legislation. Perhaps it should be extended to all employers in the private sector, all employers in the public service of Canada and all portions of the public sector that employ not 100, but 75 employees, including the Canadian Armed Forces, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, Parliament and every federally regulated agency, commission and board.

The legislation requires the employer to implement employment equity by either eliminating barriers against persons in designated groups or by making such reasonable accommodations as will ensure that these persons achieve a degree of representation that reflects their representation in the Canadian workforce.

However, the obligation to implement employment equity does not require an employer to take measures that would cause him or her undue hardship.

This means that the employer is free to comply or not. With the help of legal counsel, the employer can easily demonstrate that hiring a person with a disability, for example, will cause undue hardship. The onus will rest with the employee. Who will dare challenge an employer who does not comply with the act?

We cannot say that much progress have been made in terms of employment equity since 1970, after the Commission of Inquiry on the Status of Women in Canada tabled its report. In fact, hardly any progress has been made.

Later attempts, in 1984 and 1986, were scarcely more successful. In 1993, aboriginal people accounted for some 2 per cent of the federal public service workforce; persons with disabilities, 3 per cent; members of visible minorities, 3 per cent, and women, 46 per cent, but were confined in lower–paid and precarious jobs.

Women account for only 17 per cent of the executive group, while the disabled, Natives and visible minorities have not yet reached the executive level. Representation is almost nil. The majority of them hold office, sales or service jobs.

It is too little too late, as the new legislation does not set any specific objectives for the department. Everything is left to the minister's discretion. This is a government panicked by unemployment, an increasingly challenged social program reform, phoney pre–budget consultations, casual budget preparation, cuts in essential services instead of fat–trimming, a caucus divided on several issues, including the Young Offenders Act, the firearms registration legislation, the amendment to the Canadian Charter prohibiting any form of discrimination based on sexual orientation, whether or not Quebec members should get involved in Quebec's referendum debate, the next Cabinet shuffle where many are called but few are chosen, and an anti–scab bill which is not forthcoming. I could go on and on about the differences of opinion within the Liberal caucus only a year after they came to office.

So the government tried to regain its prestige by introducing a bill. This employment equity bill, however, still creates dissension, the minister aiming for the status quo while other members join the Bloc Quebecois in asking the government to broaden the scope of the Employment Equity Act.

The guiding principle of the bill should be that anyone working for, subsidized by or doing business with the federal government or one of its boards, agencies or commissions is subject to the bill. We must go further. Employment equity policies should have been adopted a long time ago.

The minister thinks he can meet his objectives while the federal government is cutting its workforce. He will have trouble carrying out his plans in this era of cutbacks and hiring freezes. The minister's pensive expression in this morning's newspapers explains everything. In addition to the reform being challenged, he is now faced with a bill showing his intention to maintain the status quo.

A sovereign Quebec will defend vigorously equal opportunities for women, disabled, natives, visible minorities and men.

These groups are still far from occupying their rightful places and enjoying the same conditions in most areas of public life. A higher proportion of these groups live in poverty. Their income remains lower than that of men, in general.

A sovereign Quebec will resolutely fight poverty by going to the root of the problem. Yes, it is possible to break the vicious circle of poverty and dependency, provided we increase employability without making distinctions between categories of people.

Why do we have to implement an act to restore a natural right? These people are victims of the current political system, with its inconsistent tax measures affecting the groups targeted by this bill, and duplication, because two levels of government operate in fields such as manpower training and family support.

Through sovereignty, Quebec will be able to patriate and restructure programs, so as to develop an efficient and consistent policy for these groups, namely women, aboriginal and disabled people, as well as visible minorities.

It goes without saying that the scope of the act must be extended. The federal government must really take concrete action regarding this depressing climate of discrimination experienced by women and the other groups targeted in the legislation. This part of our labour force has the right to take its place. We must strive to achieve equality and social justice. This is why the Bloc will introduce amendments to this bill, when it is examined in committee.

[English]

Hon. Roger Simmons (Burin—St. George's, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I too want an opportunity to elaborate on some features of the legislation before us. I say to the minister that I am proud the government has tabled such progressive amendments that I believe will strengthen the Employment Equity Act.

• (1305)

The changes proposed will assure fair and equal treatment for millions of disadvantaged Canadians. These amendments offer the hope of better times for women, for persons with disabilities, for aboriginal peoples and for members of visible minorities.

Since the adoption of the Employment Equity Act there has been significant progress in making the workplace more inclusive of all Canadians. It has been proven that employment equity can promote fairness and equal opportunity in the world of work. The present legislation was a good beginning but has not kept pace with the times, and hence the need for the amendments now before us.

More and more Canadians are members of designated groups, yet the sad fact is that despite the increase in their numbers their opportunities have actually decreased. For example, the latest annual report on employment equity indicates that in 1993 the number of employees covered under the Employment Equity Act actually dropped by 4.27 per cent or by 26,000 jobs across the country.

According to the statistics for 1994, 74 of the 348 companies covered under the Employment Equity Act 74 or 20 per cent had no aboriginal employees at all. There were 65 of those companies with no provision for persons with disabilities on the payroll and 28 of those companies had no visible minority members working for them. There were still four employers with no women on their staffs. This is in a country where 52 per cent of the people are women.

Can we fathom any company of any significant size not even bothering to address that question? Were I malicious—and you would know, Madam Speaker, that I could never be malicious—I would wonder aloud whether such an exclusion of women by those four companies was not deliberate. How could they manage in a situation where half the available workforce is women to hire everyone but women unless they worked at it? Hence the need for the kinds of amendments we are talking about today.

Obviously much more remains to be done if we are to live up to the values of fairness, decency and equality which form the foundation of our society, our system of values in the country.

We need to bring the act into the nineties to reflect our current reality and to prepare us for the century ahead. That is precisely the kind of country we as a party promised Canadians when we wrote "Creating Opportunity".

The amendments before us are the fulfilment of our red book commitments. We said that we would bring the federal public service as well as federal agencies and commissions under the Employment Equity Act. We are doing that with this legislation. We said that we would empower the Canadian Human Rights Commission to initiate investigations and conduct workplace audits to ensure enforcement of the legislation. We are doing that. We said that we would ensure federal contractors would be subject to mandatory compliance with the principles of the act.

Mr. Williams: Quota.

Mr. Simmons: The member for St. Albert is having difficulty because he sees quotas. I say to him that he is in the House of Commons because of a quota system. We did not just go out to all Canadians, elect a bunch of people and send them to Ottawa. The act which gives him the right to be here is a quota system as such. His constituents in St. Albert get one member of Parliament, not one and half, two or three. I say to him that is called quota.

He is right. He must have been up bright and early this morning. He recognizes this business here as a quota system and he is absolutely dead right. I assume from his intervention that he is so anxious to support the legislation he cannot wait for me to finish.

Mr. Boudria: He must be. I can tell.

Mr. Simmons: He must be. With the bill we will deliver on the promises in the red book. Does that come as any surprise?

Mr. Williams: Not a bit.

Mr. Simmons: Once again the authors of the red book are delivering on the promises in the red book.

We used to sing in the church I am proud to be a member of: "Every promise in the book is mine". We are talking about another book here. I do not want to be sacrilegious, but I am sure members get the point. We identify with those promises because they are promises we fabricated in opposition having listened to the people and without any 1–900 lines. We did not have them pay to get through to us. We listened and they told us they had some concerns about employment equity, our subject today.

We heard them and we incorporated those concerns in commitments. We ran on that basis. We were elected to a majority government on that basis. We are back here this afternoon as we have been several other mornings and afternoons to say to the people of Canada: "Here is another example of how we want to honour the commitments we made to you back in October a year or so ago".

While today we deliver on some promises, we believe we must go even further. The Canadian Human Rights Tribunal, constituted as the employment equity review tribunal, will hear appeals from employers to resolve disputes and to assure compliance with the law.

Let me remind the House that the changes to the act are in direct response to issues raised by both the designated groups and by businesses. Disadvantaged Canadians complained to us there was not enough compliance with the legislation. Accordingly we have given new authority to the Canadian Human Rights Commission to conduct audits of employers to verify and gain compliance with the act.

Mr. Williams: Quotas.

Mr. Simmons: For my friend from St. Albert, let me decode that. We have given new authority to the Human Rights Commission to enforce those terrible quotas, the very system that sent him to the Chamber. We are going to enforce it on behalf of some other people, many of whom are his constituents.

I venture to say there are some women in his riding who could benefit from the legislation, women who have been excluded effectively from employment because of some unwitting employer. Maybe he has some aboriginal people in his riding. I do not know it well but there are probably a few of them who could benefit.

I see the Chair is getting impatient because I am running the clock again. I had all these other wonderful things I wanted to say for the edification of members of the House. More to the point, I say to all who are watching and listening that the legislation is a good piece of legislation. It will take us that extra step toward assuring employment equity for the designated groups, for the women I have mentioned and for other groups that were mentioned during the debate. That is why I appeal to my colleagues of whatever party to find it in their hearts and minds to give support to this good piece of legislation.

Mrs. Diane Ablonczy (Calgary North, Ref.): Madam Speaker, since this is a very new piece of legislation, for the benefit of those Canadians who watch the proceedings of the House of Commons and I know there are a number, I would like to go over one more time what the legislation is about.

This is Bill C–64. It is an act respecting employment equity. The summary says that the purpose of this bill is to achieve equality in the workplace and to correct conditions of disadvantage experienced by certain groups. The bill applies to the Public Service of Canada, to federally regulated employers, and to such portions of the public sector that employs 100 or more employees.

The bill talks about employer obligations in clauses 5 to 15; records and reports, a rather ominous sound for a lot of employers, in clauses 16 to 20; compliance audit in clauses 21 to 31; assessment of monetary penalties in clauses 31 to 37; and regulations in clauses 38 to 41. It then talks about changes to other acts that will be necessitated by this legislation should it be passed.

This is fairly significant legislation with real impact on a number of employers in our country.

It important to point out that the word equity which is the feature of this legislation simply means fairness. Government members have been playing the violin a great deal this morning about how wonderfully fair this is and how we should all be committed to fairness. I am sure that every single Canadian would applaud fairness in our country. In fact something that Canadians are noted for is a real commitment to fairness.

On behalf of the people of Canada whom we represent and whose affairs we are supposed to be managing we need to analyse whether this legislation delivers on the promise of fairness.

One of the real problems with this legislation is that what it does is unfairly and to a large degree increase the interference of government in the lives of citizens, particularly in the lives of citizens trying to keep businesses going, and trying to deliver jobs for Canadians.

First of all this legislation interferes with employment choices. It suggests that for every sector of employment there has to be proportional representation in four designated groups. It says to employers that they have to hire certain people from certain groups if they are to comply with these government legislated proposals. That is a clear interference in fairness for employers to be able to hire who they think will do the best job for them.

Second, it interferes in the principle of equality before the law. What it essentially says is that you do not have as equal a chance at a job as you would if you belonged to one of four designated groups.

I had a personal experience in my riding with a young man who was trying to be admitted into the RCMP. His applications were denied until in discussions with his family he discovered that he had some aboriginal background. Because of this suddenly he became more qualified to enter the RCMP. In fact today he is a member of the RCMP. It is very interesting how merit, qualifications and choices depend on certain genetic traits rather than merit. That certainly is not consistent with the principle of equality before the law.

Third, the legislation interferes with the administration of business in the country. This legislation and all employers that will be affected by it, which is a vastly expanded group, should look at this very carefully. I am sure they will be. They will now have to produce employment plans to satisfy certain criteria.

There will have to be regular reports to bureaucrats who will be very anxiously combing them to make sure they are correct and fulfil all the obligations. There will be compliance audits on a regular basis of these businesses to make sure employers are doing the correct thing.

There may be some appeals from bureaucratic decisions that come out of these reports and audits. There will be an ever–expanding group of regulations that will have to be complied with. It is no wonder that businesses are fatigued and why job creation is lagging behind the demand for it. With all this paperwork, regulations, proposals and requirements, how can a business get on with business? Some days you wonder.

Also this legislation sets out a great deal more bureaucracy. This is a time when governments do a great deal of their work with borrowed money, by mortgaging our future and here we have yet another bureaucracy set up in the furtherance of fairness.

Nowhere in the legislation are the cost benefits set out. Nowhere in the legislation are Canadians told how this is all going to be paid for. It is their money that is being spent. They have a right to ask, is the money I am being asked to cough up for this proposal justified by the public good that is going to be done. That is an issue that needs to be debated.

Clearly it is going to be an interference in productivity of business. This is another regulatory and governmental burden being added to all the other reports that have to be made by businesses to government. It is another government regulation, another interference into the lives and work of business people.

If we want to provide Canadians with jobs, jobs, jobs how are we going to do it when we have all of these social engineering mechanisms built into our economic sector? Does this make sense and does it really benefit Canadians?

The last thing I would like to talk about is the social consequences of this type of legislation. Unfortunately it says to Canadians what is important in the economic sector is not your qualifications, it is not your merit, it is not your competence, it is not your ability, it is not your drive, it is whether you are a victim. It is what group you belong to. It is whether you can show somehow that you are disadvantaged. Is this what we want people to be thinking about?

I understand that Tommy Douglas was not very tall. I have always felt really good about him because of that for some obvious reasons to people in the House. Sometimes Mr. Douglas was teased about the fact that he was not very tall. He had a good answer to this. He used to say: "Where I come from, we measure people from here up", indicating that it is what is in your mind, what is in your head, your intelligence, ability and competence that is important. It is not your height.

I would suggest to members that what is important to us is what we have in our hearts and our ability and not what colour our skin is, what our gender is or what disability we might have—

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member.

• (1325)

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to speak to this bill before the House, an act respecting the Employment Equity Act.

I support the bill because the principles for which it stands are very sound. Moreover we anticipate that the provisions and the regulations that will emanate following the study of this bill will be sound in practice as well.

In essence, the Employment Equity Act is challenging us to put into practice the principles that describe the core values of Canada. The values about which we are speaking relate to the merit principle, to excellence, to human dignity, to respect, to the very core values that Canadians hold dear, to fairness and equality.

I heard earlier there was concern that we would only address the victims as though the victims have no talents, as though the victims have no competence, as though the victims have no excellence. The very essence of the Employment Equity Act is to hold very high the principle of excellence and merit above all else, irrespective of colour, irrespective of gender, irrespective of disability and irrespective of origin as a people.

Mr. Hill (Prince George—Peace River): Not in this bill.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Yes it is. It is about equity. It is about the equitable representation of those with talents in the workforce because for a generation Canada has failed. Therefore, the Liberal government of the past and the Liberal government of today are again trying to reinforce the fundamental principles that govern this bill.

In the process of addressing the legislation, I would like to reiterate that the bill can be looked on as a legislative centrepiece of our core Canadian social values, social equity among all of us.

I have mentioned the operative principles of the bill. What does it achieve, we may ask. I submit that we will achieve effective utilization of one's talents and one's skills. It will ensure businesses will provide better client service and therefore better and good business for the employers. By achieving this we will create harmony among all of us. There will be no feeling of being a second class citizen because of one's disability, colour, gender or aboriginal origin.

Who will question, and why should we question, if we can enhance the maximum productivity of all peoples with talents, that we should not utilize them and get them into the workforce, by applying the principle of fairness.

I submit that by adopting the principles of this bill we will be able to benefit not only the designated groups as defined in the bill, not only the visible minorities, not only the people with disabilities, not only women, not only aboriginal people. We will benefit everyone. Therefore, this is a bill for all Canadians to consider.

That is why the bill has seen to it that in addition to the private sector, the public sector will now be covered so that the government is setting a model. To ensure that we give teeth to what we believe, to ensure that we give enforcement to what we would like to happen, the Canadian Human Rights Commission will be mandated to have this authority.

However, the work of the Human Rights Commission will not be in an adversarial fashion. It will be done within the spirit of co–operation and collaboration.

Therefore when we see our armed forces, the RCMP, our security intelligence service agency being covered under the act, to me this is a social blessing and the time has come. It will ensure that we achieve the purpose for which this act was first enacted, to ensure employers achieve a workforce that is equitable and representative of the four designated groups.

As chair of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons to which this act will be referred by the House, I am delighted to serve on that committee. Our committee will ensure that there will be open and inclusive discussion and participation of all, that any matter referred to in the bill will be addressed, utilizing a wide consultation.

We would like to hear from all groups concerned. We would like to hear from the minister, from the department officials, from departments of government that are involved in the delivery of this program. We will invite the opposition to articulate its views to us on this issue, so that together we can shape a truly equitable Employment Equity Act.

In closing, I am delighted to support this bill because it reinforces a core Canadian value, the principle of social justice for all.

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C–64. It seems to me after having gone through the bill the thought police are out in force again. Here we have big government which is going to impose its will on employers, telling them not what they shall make but who they shall hire and in what numbers and so on, rather than allowing the free marketplace to decide who shall qualify for the job.

Looking at the bill concerning the purpose of the act, this is the double speak that the whole act tries to get around. It starts off by saying:

> The purpose of this act is to achieve equality in the workplace so that no person shall be denied employment opportunities or benefits for reasons unrelated to ability—

Unrelated to ability, nobody shall be denied. Then it goes on after a while to say:

> —employment equity means more than treating persons in the same way but also requires special measures and the accommodation of differences.

It starts off with the great idea that merit is number one. This country did not get to where it is today, apart from being up to its eyes in debt, through mediocrity, quotas and minimum standards. It got here by trying harder, working harder, reaching for better things, hoping for the best for our children, rather than settling down for quotas and less than the best that we can offer.

When I intervened, one of previous Liberal speakers admitted that while this act says nothing about quotas, it is quotas they are talking about. He actually admitted right out front and was quite candid when he said quotas are what this bill is all about. Merit is being compromised.

When I go through the bill I again find this double speak where it tries to be all things to all people. Let us remember that it is talking about various groups, women, natives, visible minorities and the handicapped. Add all of these together. We have women making up 50 per cent of our population. Then add on the male handicapped, male visible minorities and male aboriginals. We are talking about a significant majority, not a minority, covered by this bill. A small minority are going to be asked to step aside even though they are the best qualified; step aside although they are motivated; step aside even if they have family responsibilities so that somebody else who is less qualified, less able, less motivated can take over and move ahead.

Going right back to the beginning where the bill says that no person shall be denied employment opportunities for the reasons unrelated to ability, that is exactly what we have.

We can take a look at the rather ridiculous items in the bill. Clause 5 states every employer shall implement employment equity by identifying and eliminating employment barriers against persons in designated groups that result in employer's employment systems, policies and practices that are not authorized by law to ensure that we have this spectrum.

I think about sports. I think about the Olympics, this huge competition recognized around the world where we go out and find the best that we can find. There are no quotas there. It does not say that there has to be so many of one group or another group. We take pride in finding the best that we can find and we match these against others around the world. If we find that somebody else beats our Canadian competitors we say let us try harder so that next time we may win.

Surely that is the essence of any type of employment, any type of endeavour in this life where we say let me be the best that I can be.

If this bill had said let us take a look at the education that keeps back some people, be they an identifiable minority or not, surely we have an obligation to help these people to achieve the education and the motivational standards to allow them to compete rather than clamping down on those who do have the education, who do have the motivation, who do have the will and are prepared to work harder. Why are we putting a lid on them to elevate the others artificially? Why do we not give those who feel that they are disadvantaged a helping hand through education and developing that commitment and motivation so that when they enter the workforce they can compete on an equal basis?

Surely that is what it is about. We do not discriminate in sports. We go out and find the best we can find. It would be ludicrous if we thought that Canada was to apply some kind of quota system so that we would always lose. Do not worry, the the thought police will be happy because we ensured that all groups were represented at the competition.

This is big government wielding a big stick on employers. It is as if government thought that employers were incapable of doing it themselves. I think about a newsletter that I subscribe to out of the United States, not in Canada. We do not find these things in Canada. There are employment equity programs in the United States that have been forced on federally funded organizations, as this bill is trying to do here.

There is a small college in Michigan that said it will not comply. It may be thought these people are a bunch of bigots because they do not want to comply, they do not want to fill out the forms, they do not want to ask people which category they fit into, are they on the bottom rung so they have to help them, are they on the middle rung so they give them a little less helping up, are they on the top rung so they keep them down. They said they do not want to participate in that type of stuff. The government said if they are in receipt of federal funds they must, but they said no.

They were cut off federal funds. Some may think that serves them right. That college was the first to issue a degree to a woman in the United States in 1860 and the first college to issue a degree to a coloured person in the 1870s. One hundred years later when the government gets around to saying they have to in order to get employment equity or hiring equity or education equity going and have to fill out the forms, they say they have been doing that for a hundred years.

They do it on merit. They do not care if you are a woman or a man or if you are coloured or not coloured, but if you have the motivation and the desire to succeed, regardless of who you are or what you are they want to help you. They were doing that a hundred years ago voluntarily, long before the Department of Health, Education and Welfare in the United States used the big stick of government to force it down people's throats.

It can be done to education. We do not stand here as the Reform Party saying we want to keep people down. We do not want to keep anybody down but we do not want to classify people and ask which group they fit into. If you are here in this country as a Canadian then that is all that is required and we say let us help these people forward through education and let us not impose penalties on the minority to help the majority.

[Translation]

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak in the House today and to show my colleagues and all Canadians that we can trust the government to keep its promises.

The red book mentions a future when all citizens, irrespective of race, gender or physical or intellectual capacity, will enjoy an equal standard of living and quality of life.

The bill before the House today will help ensure this will happen. In fact, we will reinforce the Employment Equity Act so that it also covers the public service and federal commissions and agencies. The Canadian Human Rights Commission will be given the power to conduct audits and enforce this legislation. Employers who do business with the federal government will be required to comply with the principle of the Act. By reinforcing the Employment Equity Act, the government is acting to promote its concept of Canada according to which all citizens must have an equal opportunity to share in Canada's prosperity.

The existing Employment Equity Act has been instrumental in making Canadians aware of the need to identify and eliminate barriers to the employment of designated groups.

[English]

For all the many milestones that have been achieved since its inception, however, there are still millions of Canadians who have yet to enjoy its benefits. Women, visible minorities, aboriginal people and persons with disabilities continue to face enormous barriers to employment which prevent them from achieving their full potential.

As my colleagues pointed out earlier, a substantial number of companies covered by the act fail to satisfy the legislation's mandate, 171 of 348 firms. Almost half of the companies reporting last year did not have women, persons with disabilities, aboriginal peoples or visible minorities represented in their workforce.

Too much of Canadian history has been blemished through such inequality among Canadians. It is time to write a new chapter in the evolution of employment equity.

In rewriting the law we are renewing our faith in the fundamental values that shape Canadian society, fairness, decency and justice for all. By renewing the legislation we will clarify employer obligations and strengthen employee opportunities. We are determined to strike a better balance that works to the advantage of all Canadians.

[Translation]

For the first time in Canada, public and private sector employers will be on an equal footing. The Public Service will be subject to the same rules as the private sector. All employers will be required to reflect the diversity of Canada's population in their labour force. We will extend the scope of the legislation to include the Canadian Armed Forces, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and the Canadian Security Intelligence Service.

• (1345)

The legislation will also apply to employers who do business with the federal government, which means that from now on they will have to comply with the principle of the Employment Equity Act. This legislation will also give new responsibilities to the Canadian Human Rights Commission. The commission will have the authority to conduct audits in the workplace in order to force employers to comply with the Act.

The commission will also be empowered to take corrective action as needed. In cases of non compliance, the commission may refer the case to an employment equity review tribunal, whose decisions could be mandatory.

To balance the commission's regulatory authority, employers who wish to challenge its decisions will have a chance to plead their case before the tribunal.

[English]

The legislation clearly stipulates that tribunal rulings will not cause undue hardship for employers or require them to hire or promote unqualified individuals.

The amendments are also purposely designated not to increase the paper burden to employers. They are meant to act as an impetus, not an impediment to economic growth and job creation.

Enlightened Canadian employers are rapidly discovering for themselves that employment equity is a bonus in the workplace. Diversity is proving to be a competitive advantage in an increasingly complex global economy. Given demographic trends, employers have every reason to want to capitalize on the wealth of untapped talent in the designated groups.

By the year 2000, when Canada will experience a skill shortage caused by an aging population, two–thirds of newcomers to the workforce will be women, visible minorities, aboriginal people and persons with disabilities. Canadian employers cannot afford to overlook this vast labour pool any longer.

[Translation]

All Canadians will benefit as a result of this legislation, because its purpose is to ensure that all Canadians will have equal access to employment opportunities and advancement.

The bill before the House today states that workers are to be hired and promoted on the basis of ability. It provides that ability and merit must be taken into account to ensure employment equity, which can only improve the quality of our labour force.

In fact, employment equity is closely linked to social security reform. Social and economic progress cannot be dissociated from job creation and the integration of disadvantaged persons in the community.

The changes proposed in this bill are necessary, reasonable and fair.

We are convinced that an improved Employment Equity Act will give employers an opportunity to create more efficient and more effective workplaces.

In fact, these improvements will promote tolerance and respect for diversity and encourage a better appreciation of the rich diversity of our communities.

[English]

I commend the minister for his decision to send this piece of legislation to committee. I wish to cite some of my own experiences with the public service in Quebec where some legislation has been adopted.

L'Office des ressources humaines was faced with a target of 12 per cent hiring for members of the cultural communities visible minorities. The public service was unable to attain this level. We might ask why it was unable to attain this level, even though it was a promise made by the former Liberal government of that province.

The reason, after years of studies and years of reports, was that there was systemic discrimination. In other words, visible minorities, members of cultural communities, women and the handicapped were barred by a system that did not have the types of measures in it that would allow access to promotions or even to jobs within that system.

Many members opposite said that the merit principle has been forgotten and used words like reverse discrimination. My experience has led me to believe the proposals we are presenting will require that we succeed in removing the deep rooted systemic biases that exist in any system, especially in the public service.

We also need to assure that the Human Rights Commission will have the resources and the authority to ensure compliance with the legislation presented to the House.

Finally, with respect to downsizing, cuts will be made in many areas. I hope the groups we are discussing today will not be unduly hardshipped by the downsizing that is taking place at the moment, because a lot of them were newly arrived to the present system and are on contracts.

Our public service must reflect the reality of Canada. It must be representative of all the components of our society. We are not talking about merit here. Are hon. members on the other side of the House saying there are no qualified individuals in any of these four groups? Are there no women, no visible minorities, no handicapped people, no native people who are qualified for these positions? I doubt that reflects the reality. In fact there are many of them. However there is enough systemic discrimination in the system, enough biases in the system not to allow these qualified individuals to have access to our public service.

I would like the hon. members to take these facts into consideration.

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today as a Reform member on the standing committee on human rights to address the government's proposed legislation to extend employment equity.

Bill C–64, an act respecting employment equity as tabled by the human resources minister yesterday, reflects the government's disregard for proper process in its presentation and the government's ongoing folly of spending non–existent public money to undermine the job creation abilities of Canadians and to create further division and social pressure among competing groups of otherwise talented and proud Canadians. I am delighted to take the opportunity to expand on these tenets.

Today much discussion has been shared in the House on the pros and cons of such a program. The rhetoric and mixed messages become confusing. In response I take a moment to consider how employment equity measures up to three basic and clear philosophies I believe the vast majority of Canadians would welcome and support.

According at least to the red book, Liberals too would agree, first, that deficit reduction is a major priority. They have agreed that billions of dollars in government spending must be cut to accomplish it. Second, Canada must have a credible place in the global economy. To quote from the red book:

> The federal government can and should support and facilitate the national effort to prepare Canadians to compete in the world.

Third is the equality of opportunity, and again I quote:

> Governments should support a framework of fundamental fairness and decency within which Canadians are able to pursue their individual goals.

Let us hold up the existing proposals of the bill against such a benchmark. It is not in viewing things in isolation but against a true measure that we can separate pretence from fact.

Even the present Liberal government is finally recognizing the debt and deficit are a major threat to Canada's present situation and future potential. Current government policy has finally recognized the connection between fiscal recklessness and unemployment, between high indebtedness and the loss of economic and fiscal sovereignty.

In a recent release from the Department of Finance entitled "Creating a Healthy Fiscal Climate", the government now seems to realize that the deficit problem cannot be addressed without a clear priorization of federal spending. Budgetary actions "should weigh toward reductions in expenditures". Choices must be made between high and low priority items.

Although as Reformers we believe their 3 per cent target to be totally inadequate, it has become apparent in public debate that even for that goal billions must be cut, which will demand cuts to some untouchable programs.

The first question I ask is: Should the added expense of broadening employment equity be a top priority in the mind of a budget balancing government? We must keep in mind that employment equity already exists as a policy across all public service within the Public Service Act.

Bill C–64 will mandate that approach in law though the Treasury Board now refuses to try to estimate the cost of the existing policy.

Does this imply that such a policy has been immune from the departmental review process demanded by the government in recent months? Does this imply that the policy of employment equity is so philosophically important it takes priority over federal downsizing or even some social programs? Is this so necessary as to be deemed untouchable in government operations even before it comes before Canadians for discussion? If so, who did the government listen to in order to come to that conclusion.

A Gallup poll conducted last December showed that the majority of Canadians accept the concept of equality in the workplace. However 81 per cent of Canadians oppose numerical hiring goals and 90 per cent oppose exclusionary job competition. The government is also ignoring the fact that 74 per cent of those surveyed are definitely opposed to government equity programs.

In response to the government's mantra of jobs, jobs, jobs, how will this priority program affect Canada's long term viability in the important world markets? The purpose of the act is the explicit encouragement of employers to discriminate in favour of targeted groups over all other employees, largely white able–bodied males.

No matter how we look at it, the establishment of numerical goals as outlined in the legislation means quotas. The rejection of merit as the only distinguishing characteristic dictates that the best candidate, as opposed simply to the qualifying candidate, will not necessarily be the one chosen for any particular position.

By treating some more equal than others the government's mandated policy dictates that we end up with a workforce less expert than otherwise may be possible. Canada increasingly exists within the demands of an ever expanding and increasingly competitive world market. Every means possible from sound fiscal management to excellence in every sector of the economy will be necessary for us to hold our own in the challenge of that competitive environment.

Finally I want to spend some time on the notion of equality. Section 15 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms claims Canadians are equal before and under the law. True justice lies in a process, not in the outcome.

Any competition between two individuals, whether it be a race or a job competition, can only be deemed fair in the equal treatment during the process. The outcome is never predictable. The test of the race should never be in comparing the anticipated with the actual results.

The true test of equality of opportunity is the very randomness of the outcome. Fairness dictates only that the best man or woman wins. This legislation is not just. It establishes numerical goals that must be met, which affects the outcome in favour of those covered under the goals.

As a member of a designated group I take offence at the implications of the government's numerical goals or quotas. There is a suggestion by their very existence that somehow the system lacks confidence in the ability of women in general to really compete on a level playing field.

The same Gallup poll I referred to found that 75 per cent of women agreed with the statement that governments should not actively hire more women or minority groups. As a group, women are not at a disadvantage. The 1994 annual report indicates women are actually doing better outside the act than they are under the employment equity program.

The Speaker: The hon. member will have the floor after question period. However, as it is two o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5) the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

CANADIAN EXECUTIVE SERVICE OVERSEAS

Mr. Pat O'Brien (London—Middlesex, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, CESO is a non–profit volunteer organization that shares Canadian knowledge with business communities and organizations in developing nations and emerging market economies in central and eastern Europe.

Volunteers, experienced in their profession or industry, serve as trainers and advisers to help developing communities achieve economic self–sufficiency.

I take this opportunity to recognize the outstanding efforts of Mr. John Fingland, a constituent from my riding of London—Middlesex. Mr. Fingland has provided his knowledge and expertise in the area of forest management to the people of Thailand.

I commend the time and energy he and other CESO volunteers give. These efforts will go a long way toward promoting human and global development.

IMMIGRATION

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, contrary to statements made by the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, the Schelew affair is not closed.

• (1400)

Many questions remain unanswered and the whole thing is starting to look more and more like a government cover–up operation. After the vice–chair of the Immigration and Refugee Board resigned, not proceeding with the inquiry has saved the minister from having to answer legitimate questions about the serious allegations made against Mr. Schelew.

The minister can no longer dissociate himself from the questionable, to say the least, methods used by his government to make the problem disappear, especially since it is not known who authorized the Treasury Board to give him $100,000 in severance pay.

The minister no longer has a choice. It is his duty to shed light on this issue. His credibility, as well as that of his government and of the board, are at stake.

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday a good friend of mine was laid to rest in Mission—Coquitlam. Roger was a victim of armed robbery and the gun used was not a handgun but a sawed–off shotgun.

This crime happened because two young men have no respect for the law, no respect for the rights of others and probably have never been held accountable for their actions.

What we need in this country is crime control, not gun control. We have the laws in place. What we have to do is enforce them. We must establish the rights of victims over the rights of criminals, tougher sentencing and the tightening up of the Young Offenders Act.

If we put emphasis back on the role of the family in teaching the basic values which build character and make responsible citizens of our young people, then we will be going in the right direction. Responsibility begins at home. In this way we can attack the very serious crime problem in Canada by teaching respect for others and respect for our laws at a very early age.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Paddy Torsney (Burlington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, congratulations are in order for the Ontario Fibricare Association and the Korean Dry Cleaners Association that have taken their cleaning one step further.

Recently they signed a memorandum of understanding with the Ontario and federal Ministers of the Environment to establish a Green Clean project, a voluntary pollution prevention initiative which promotes water based technologies and processes as an alternative to the use of chemicals in the dry cleaning industry.

The Toronto Green Clean depot is the first of seven such cleaners to be outfitted by Environment Canada for January 1995. The depot's objectives are to educate consumers on green cleaning and to promote wet technology to industry members.

Governments, corporations, environmental groups, industry associations and individual Canadians must work together to improve the environment for all of us. This initiative will work to eliminate the paradox that getting our cleaning done means polluting our environment.

It is another step toward achieving our goal of a green clean Canada.

BANKING

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, It has always been my concern that the five major banks make such high profits during both downturns and upturns in the Canadian economy.

The high amounts of profit the banks have declared this past month are particularly incredible. Even more disturbing is the fact that while some banks are making over $1 billion profit, they are at the very same time putting builders and developers out of business with a callous take it or leave it attitude.

I call on the Prime Minister to fulfil the recommendation of the Standing Committee on Industry to implement an independent ombudsman to oversee banking practices in this country. The sooner small and medium size businesses get a fair shake, the sooner they will be able to prosper again.

CESO INTERNATIONAL SERVICES

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I offer congratulations to volunteers with CESO International Services who give of their time both here at home and abroad.

In particular, I would like to mention two Nepean people. Mr. Jerry Szymanowski travelled to the Slovak Republic to advise manufacturers of insulation material on exports to Canadian markets. He also laid the groundwork for a joint venture partnership with a Canadian firm.

Second, Aleksandrs Sprudz. Alex came to Canada from Latvia in 1951. He spent 18 years with Indian and northern affairs helping establish agriculture co–operatives in Indian and Inuit communities.

He recently returned to his homeland to share his knowledge and experience in his field with researchers and professors from Latvian universities. He was instrumental in working with members of the Latvian congress of agronomists to put forward a resolution to the Latvian government for approval of lands to be set aside for the sole purpose of agricultural co–operatives.

Aleksandrs Sprudz passed away on December 6, 1994. I wish to extend my heartfelt sympathy to his wife and daughter.

CANADA COUNCIL

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we learned today that Quebec artists, too, refuse to support the phony consultation process initiated by the Canada Council.

Several organizations, including the Quebec artists' union, the Quebec theatre council and the Quebec writers' union, have expressed their deep concern and denounced what they see as a lack of respect for artists.

• (1405)

This government, which has decided to slash arts financing, has the nerve to undertake consultations to ask artists where it should cut. Given the improvised and slapdash approach of the Canada Council and the obvious complicity of the Canadian heritage minister, we wonder about this government's respect for culture and the arts community.

WORLD JUNIOR HOCKEY CHAMPIONSHIPS

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to inform the House that between December 26 and January 4 the world junior hockey championships will be taking place in my riding of Red Deer.

Everyone in Canada appreciates junior hockey. The people of my riding are incredibly proud to host the best juniors in the world. Red Deer has a great hockey tradition with its Western Hockey League team. Current NHL stars such as Glen Wesley and Mark Tinordi were born in Red Deer.

We look forward to watching all the future stars when they come to play for the world championship. Competitions like this will inspire the next generations to carry on Canada's proud hockey heritage. Come on out, watch the games and enjoy the competition. Together we will all promote Canada's great winter sport.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie, NDP): Mr. Speaker, with the publication of the Transportation Safety Board report, the Canadian public has again been made aware of the problems of the deregulation theory that Transport Canada has been pursuing for over a decade.

In spite of evidence to the contrary, transport ministers from Axworthy to Mazankowski and on to the current minister have insisted that "safety will not be compromised". NDP members have always argued that without regulation and adequate inspection staff, safety would inevitably take second place, particularly when carriers are strapped for cash. In such cases maintenance is reduced, accidents increase and consumers are at risk.

Since the department's strategy is in question I suggest that the minister take charge and ask someone like Judge Moshansky, who reported on the Dryden crash, to do a follow–up investigation to see if Transport Canada's inspections are now improved enough to correct the shortcomings previously identified.

TAXATION

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out to my colleagues that the Quebec independence movement is not a threat to national unity. Quebecers will settle the problem concerning the Quebec independence movement. What really threatens the well–being and unity of our country is a fiscal and monetary system in need of thorough reform.

The tax system is unfair and inequitable to the majority of Canadians. The helplessness felt by Canadians has become a source of frustration and undermines the credibility of elected officials and democratic institutions. This threatens to break up our country unless we tackle this major problem right away.

DRAFT BILL ON QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the following statement appeared in the August 3 edition of the Toronto Star: "I agree with Mr. Chrétien that a pequiste government would not be empowered to launch the negotiation process towards independence and that, contrary to the warnings given by provincial Liberals, the eventual election of the PQ does not mean that Quebec will become independent. For once, I agree with those who support federalism".

That statement made by the Bloc Quebecois leader could not be more explicit. The fact that the PQ was elected does not give it any right to unilaterally declare Quebec's sovereignty in its draft bill before consulting the population through a referendum.

The Premier of Quebec must set aside his biased consultation process and quickly hold a real referendum, in which Quebecers will decide if they want to separate from Canada.

The Speaker: I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but her time is up. The hon. member for Trinity—Spadina.

ECODEK

Mr. Tony Ianno (Trinity—Spadina, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, yesterday saw the opening of EcoDek, a brand new environmental tourist attraction at Toronto's CN Tower.

• (1410)

EcoDek is a state of the art, cost effective exhibit that promotes the principles of environmental learning and citizenship. Through this high tech, innovative, interactive and entertaining exhibit, EcoDek has the potential to reach 1.5 million visitors who annually go to the CN Tower.

EcoDek's ability to raise public awareness of and encourage involvement in environmental issues goes beyond the actual attraction. It includes an educational package that has been developed to help teachers maximize the educational value of field trips to EcoDek before, during and after classes.

To this end I am happy to report that over 600 schools from many parts of Ontario and the Great Lakes states have already booked visits to Toronto beginning in January.

I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the Minister of the Environment, the CN Tower and its many partners for advancing environmental awareness in a manner that is commensurate with the city of Toronto as a world class destination for foreign travellers.

COLLÈGE MILITAIRE ROYAL DE SAINT–JEAN

Mr. Laurent Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs once again showed that he was acting in bad faith regarding the Collège militaire royal de Saint–Jean. Instead of looking after the interests of the residents of Saint–Jean, the minister prefers to generate controversy regarding the academic future of that institution.

Instead of constructively discussing the proposal made by mayor Smereka, which is supported by a large majority, the minister keeps looking for excuses to sabotage the negotiation process. Is that his idea of flexible federalism? The minister should change his antagonistic attitude and look after the well–being of the public instead of his own partisan interests, so that, in the end, the only real winners are the residents of Saint–Jean.

There is no need to prolong the uncertainty and controversy. Let us settle this issue once and for all; after all, we are very close to a happy ending.

REGIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Cliff Breitkreuz (Yellowhead, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Liberals have done it again. Last week the minister responsible for ACOA was such a hero for announcing that his pork barrel agency will no longer hand out free money.

Canadians can rest easy knowing that ACOA intends on following in western economic diversification's footsteps. Never mind the fact that WED wrote off nearly $12 million of taxpayers' money last year.

Then there is FORD–Q, Federal Office of Regional Development–Quebec, the outfit the finance minister runs. He talks a good game and wants to cut the deficit but at the same time he doles out money hand over fist through his own pork barrel program.

Roughly three–quarters of FORD–Q's assistance is repayable. Taxpayers should not worry that FORD–Q gives out free money for amounts under $25,000 and they should not worry that last year FORD–Q wrote off $13.7 million of their money.

Yes, the minister of public works should be proud that he is now in very elite company.

Mrs. Sue Barnes (London West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in February 1995 comprehensive firearms control legislation will be introduced through amendments to the Criminal Code, Customs Act, Customs Tariff, Export and Import Permits Act, National Defence Act, the Young Offenders Act and other related statutes and regulations.

The design of the program addresses different needs of the country affecting safer homes and streets. Programs will be put in place to control the import, export and domestic transit of guns.

Sentencing provisions of the Criminal Code include tough new minimum sentences. A national firearms registration is a central foundation of the coming legislation.

Many of my constituents applauded this legislation. I urge all Canadians to obtain the information material through their own MP to examine the scope of the coming legislation to better understand the problems that we are trying to address and the potential solutions.

I look forward to working on this legislation in the justice committee when it reaches it.

CENTENNIAL FLAME RESEARCH AWARD

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as chair of the Standing Committee on Human Rights and the Status of Disabled Persons, I announce with pride that the recipient of the 1994 Centennial Flame Research Award is Linda Nancoo of Toronto.

Administered by our committee, the award honours the courage and determination of Canadians with disabilities. It recognizes their many contributions to society.

Ms. Nancoo, a person with a vision disability, has proven that a physical disability need not be a barrier to success as a writer. Her project will address the relationship between culture and disability, utilizing real life stories of Canadians with disabilities from the ethnocultural community.

This project is designed to generate increased awareness and sensitivity on this issue on the part of all Canadians.

• (1415)

On behalf of the committee I congratulate Ms. Nancoo on her achievements. By honouring her, the committee and therefore the House of Commons itself is honouring all Canadians with disabilities. I ask all colleagues to join me in this sentiment.

TATSHENSHINI–ALSEK WILDERNESS AREA

Mr. Mike Scott (Skeena, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister of cultural heritage has nominated the Tatshenshini–Alsek wilderness area in northern British Columbia as a world heritage site at the United Nations, with absolutely no public discussion, input or support.

The Tatshenshini contains rich mineral deposits worth more than $10 billion. This represents an enormous opportunity for job creation, real job creation, not taxpayer funded handouts, and huge revenues for governments.

A recent Decima research poll shows that 85 per cent of British Columbians believe it is important to check for mineral deposits when considering setting aside land for parks. Sixty–seven per cent believe that mining and other land uses should co–exist.

Clearly the public wants to maintain a viable mining industry in Canada. A world heritage site designation undermines and threatens the future of the Tatshenshini for resource use, which is clearly against the wishes of a vast majority of British Columbians.

I call on the minister to withdraw this undemocratic and unsupported nomination forthwith.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

COLLÈGE MILITAIRE ROYAL DE SAINT–JEAN

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last Friday, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs said that he intended to send some of his officials to Saint–Jean to negotiate an agreement on the basis of the proposal put forth by the mayor of Saint–Jean.

Yesterday, using as a pretext what Quebec's intergovernmental affairs minister had said, the minister reversed himself and refused to delegate his officials to resume negotiations today, as planned.

In view of the urgency of the decisions the staff and their families will have to make and since everyone has agreed to resume discussions on the basis of the mayor's proposal, how does the minister explain his latest about–face, his refusal to send officials to Saint–Jean to resume negotiations today, as he had promised?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if anyone has not flip–flopped on this issue, it is I. For the past four months, I have been telling the opposition day after day that this matter must be settled on the basis of the agreement signed with the Government of Quebec on July 19.

Ms. Beaudoin, in her press conference yesterday morning, denied the basis of our agreement. She denied that the July 19 agreement would be the basis of our negotiations, so she is the one who has set aside what would have made it possible for us to reach a positive conclusion for the college in Saint–Jean.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs is dancing the cha–cha–cha on the Saint–Jean college issue—and he knows it. He is taking one step forward, and two steps back. That is what he is doing.

I would like him to tell us exactly in what way what the Quebec minister said changed the proposal from the mayor of Saint–Jean, which is based on the July 19 agreement that seems to be so dear to the minister. How did that change the mayor's proposal which Ms. Beaudoin and the people of Saint–Jean are prepared to discuss? The minister is the only one who will not get involved in the negotiations.

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is always better to dance the cha–cha–cha than St. Vitus' dance, like the opposition.

The proposal from the mayor of Saint–Jean, Mr. Smereka, only implements the sixth point of the July 19 agreement. Therefore, by stating, as she did literally yesterday morning, that she does not believe in the July 19 agreement, Ms. Beaudoin has set aside the whole basis for negotiations.

At midday today, I wrote to Ms. Beaudoin, indicating that if she advised that she was prepared to accept the terms of the July 19 agreement, I would gladly resume negotiations, because what we care about is keeping the college in Saint–Jean going and the welfare of the people of Saint–Jean.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, despite the importance of this issue for the community of Saint–Jean, the teaching staff and their families, the minister stubbornly persists in refusing to discuss it.

The Quebec minister clearly indicated to the minister that she was ready to discuss the proposal put forth by the mayor of Saint–Jean and the minister himself said that this proposal was consistent with the July 19 agreement. What more does it take, Mr. Speaker? If the Quebec minister abides by the agreement, or rather the proposal, from the mayor of Saint–Jean, and the federal minister thinks that it is consistent with his proposal of July 19, what more does he need?

I put my question to the Prime Minister so that someone in that government will see the light.

The Speaker: I would ask the hon. member to put his question.

Mr. Gauthier: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I always have trouble avoiding relevant comments.

Given the importance of this issue for the community in Saint–Jean and the teaching staff, does the Prime Minister intend to intervene to bring his minister to his senses since his attitude is completely incompatible with what he himself called flexible federalism?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, flexible federalism means that when there is an agreement, the other government respects it. That is the basis of the good relations which should exist in Canada.

On July 19, we signed an agreement in good faith with the Government of Quebec and it was hailed as a very good agreement. The people of Saint–Jean were happy. But since a new government was elected in Quebec, there is no more agreement. If the Government of Quebec wants to abide by the agreement we signed with the previous government, there will be no problem. If it wants to reopen the issue, well, what can I say? The people of Saint–Jean will suffer the consequences.

CANADIAN SECURITY INTELLIGENCE SERVICE

Mr. François Langlois (Bellechasse, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. This morning, we heard that the government had decided to remove and not release several parts of the report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee on the disturbing Bristow case, in which CSIS not only infiltrated but actually contributed to the activities of the racist Heritage Front organization.

How can the Solicitor General, who claimed that he wanted to release all the facts on the Bristow case, justify this attempt to conceal several parts of this report? What is he trying to hide from Quebecers and Canadians?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we must not make any final decisions. I said that I wanted to release as much as I could of the SIRC report, in accordance with the appropriate legislation. We still have the entire report under review. I hope I will be able to announce a decision very shortly.

Mr. François Langlois (Bellechasse, BQ): Mr. Speaker, if the government still claims it wants to release the facts about the disturbing allegations in the Bristow case, how can the Solicitor General explain the fact that he has yet to submit the full report to the parliamentary sub–committee on national security for consideration?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, according to the legislation governing CSIS, the report is submitted to the Solicitor General. It is therefore the Solicitor General's responsibility to decide on the best way to release the report. My responsibilities include making sure that when I release the report, I am guided by the appropriate provisions of the Privacy Act and the CSIS Act. I trust the hon. member would want me to take seriously the legislation adopted by Parliament in this respect.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, over the past month the allegations of intimidation and artificially inflating refugee acceptance rates have been levelled at Michael Schelew and the Immigration and Refugee Board.

On November 21, Mr. Schelew was quoted as saying that he would not negotiate a severance package because he wanted exoneration. A judicial inquiry was ordered. It was called off because Mr. Schelew resigned with a $100,000 parting gift from the federal government.

Who negotiated and authorized this severance package? Will the minister make public the details of the negotiations which led to this 180 degree turn by Mr. Schelew?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the ultimate decision to stop the inquiry was made by Judge Hugessen who said in his ruling that there would have been no reason or right to proceed. The deputy chair offered his resignation. Accordingly the government entertained a settlement. The settlement was conducted by government officials. The settlement in the end was in keeping and in line with standard government procedures. We believe it to be a fair settlement.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question was: Who negotiated the settlement with Mr. Schelew?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the answer was included in my first response: Government officials.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell us which government officials negotiated the settlement with Mr. Schelew and what his own role was in those negotiations?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that the negotiations were nothing untoward, nothing special. They were in keeping with normal standard procedures between government and public servants and those appointed through governor in council and no, I was not involved.

AIR SAFETY

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

In a release published yesterday, the Transportation Safety Board of Canada reported serious deficiencies in the way Transport Canada handled the inspection of safety measures taken by air carriers. The board mentioned in particular major deficiencies with respect to the nature and frequency of the inspections, as well as insufficiently thorough audits and follow–ups.

Considering that safety must be his top priority, how can the minister explain that such deficiencies are allowed to continue in terms of air safety, in spite of the many recommendations put forward by Canadian control organizations? And what positive steps does he intend to take to remedy the situation within his department?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the question raised by my hon. colleague is a very serious one. We have read carefully the report of the Transportation Safety Board and taken note of its two major recommendations. First, air carriers must be subjected to much more minute inspections. Second, when faults of any kind are found in the system, there has to be a follow–up to ensure that these faults or deficiencies have been corrected.

The board's report takes into account all incidents since 1984, the latest one dating back to December 1993. We take very seriously every one of the recommendations made by the board and intend to act on them.

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, would you kindly remind the minister that he has been in office for over 14 months now. How does he expect to be taken seriously, knowing that similar recommendations were made in the past by the Transportation Safety Board and ignored by Transport Canada?

[English]

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is not a matter that we are going to pursue in this House on the basis of when the incidents occurred. Anything that has to do with the safety and security of travelling Canadians we are going to take very seriously.

The report brought in by the board yesterday identified two major problems. The first was the depth of the audit that is conducted. We have undertaken to make sure that situation is corrected. The second was the follow–up. The first incident occurred in 1984. The last one referred to by the board occurred in December 1993.

My hon. friend knows that we are doing as much as we can to maintain a climate of confidence in the transportation system in Canada. We understand the import of what was recommended by the safety board. We intend to follow through on it. I can assure my hon. friend that a hell of a lot more will be done in the next few months than in the last 10 years.

The Speaker: Although the word hell is not necessarily unparliamentary, perhaps we could use it a little more judiciously in the future.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Michael Schelew might be gone from the IRB, but his presence and the presence of other like minded IRB members continues to be felt.

Within the next couple of days in Edmonton a refugee claim being made by an American woman claiming spousal abuse will be heard by a full member panel of the IRB. Hundreds of other refugee claims will be made this year by people who come from democratic nations. Surely the minister can see how ludicrous this is.

Will the minister agree to a full review of the way the IRB determines refugee status and who is eligible to make a claim in the first place?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as I have mentioned in this House and outside this House many times, the government is conducting a full review of its agencies, boards and commissions. Within this review is also the IRB. We have every intention of undertaking any reform or measures that would strengthen the institution.

As well, the chairperson will be moving very quickly on the commission that she had asked for some months back about the Hathaway report, about how individual members react to different situations.

I also mentioned to him during the course of question period yesterday that I will be meeting with the chair later this week so that I can also ascertain how she feels about a number of things over the last number of months which has not been easy.

If the member has ways of trying to improve the institution then count me in. If he simply wants to undercut the institution he can count me out.

Mr. Art Hanger (Calgary Northeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that is precisely the same arm's length excuse that we have heard from this minister all along but it does not wash.

This minister has the power under the Immigration Act to prevent before they begin refugee claims by people from countries like the United States, but he has chosen not to do so.

Will this minister admit that his unwillingness to stop refugee claims from the United States and Israel makes a mockery out of the IRB, his office and the country as a whole?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member criticizes me for being at arm's length. Three weeks ago they were giving lectures about how ministers have to respect independent, quasi–judicial boards. Which one is it?

The member asks whether I would deny or allow a refugee claim. That shows a profound ignorance of how refugee determination works in this country. It is not the minister or members of Parliament who adjudicate. That is why it is semi–judicial and independent, so that those adjudications may be done properly by members of the Immigration and Refugee Board.

REPRODUCTIVE TECHNOLOGIES

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health.

The Baird report made public over a year ago recommended banning the commercialization of human embryos. One year later, the minister tells us that women will have to wait another year for the government to legislate against the commercialization of human embryos.

Does the minister still intend to wait another year before stating her position on the new reproductive technologies, when commercialization of human eggs is occurring at the IVF Canada Clinic in Toronto as we speak?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her question. As she knows very well, these are very complex issues. I am currently working on a short term solution that should help until we can table a bill.

• (1435)

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Health realize that her inability to present the Minister of Justice with the report he needs to prepare the necessary legislation is causing unacceptable delays favouring the growth of unregulated trade in human eggs and embryos?

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, many times in this House I have spoken of the complexity of this issue and of the many jurisdictions.

I have one comment to make. I would certainly hope that the members of the Bloc Quebecois, when we do bring something forward, will speak with their provincial counterparts, the Parti Quebecois, to help us ensure that these types of practices are regulated efficiently and quickly.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this whole Schelew affair is just the tip of the iceberg. Mr. Schelew may be gone but the fundamental problems with the IRB remain.

The board is far too vulnerable to special interests in the immigration industry. It remains unaccountable to the Canadian public and its credibility has been shaken. Friends and foes of Mr. Schelew have all been calling for a public inquiry to clear the air surrounding the IRB.

When will the minister put public interest ahead of political damage control and call an immediate, thorough and public inquiry into the workings of the IRB?

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, public interest always comes first. No one is suggesting for one moment that any vested interests have any control of the Immigration and Refugee Board. If the member has information like his leader was doing a few weeks ago, he should come clean and give us specific information.

I mentioned very seriously that the review of all government agencies is something that the IRB is involved in. Proposals have been made and will be released in the new year.

Second, the Hathaway report which I hope the hon. member had an occasion to read points out a possible number of avenues that the current chair independent of government is looking at.

Third, I will be meeting with the chair to discuss the issues as well as any other possible measures that would strengthen the board. If the Reform Party which has been in office for a year—

The Speaker: As a general rule, if you have three points that is quite a bit.

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, not only has the Immigration and Refugee Board been tainted by the Schelew affair but the entire process for admitting immigrants and refugees into Canada has been brought into question.

The problem is much bigger than Mr. Schelew, the IRB or this particular minister. What is needed is a thorough investigation into the whole immigration and refugee determination process along with a look at alternative methods and procedures.

Will the Prime Minister get to the bottom of this mess and order a white paper on the immigration and refugee determination system in Canada either through this minister or through a new minister with the skills and commitment to reform the system?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I know very well that the policy of accepting some refugees in Canada does not please the Reform Party. Canada has always been more able than any other country to help people in very difficult positions around the world.

I do not want to do that, in conformity with the laws that this Parliament has passed. If there is some need for change in the legislation, the House of Commons will have an occasion to study it and make recommendations.

This government in a year and one month has shown that we have the proper balance. There are some incidents. It is not easy to come to a conclusion in cases like that.

We have appointed members with their own convictions and they try to do their best. In this case apparently there might have been some error made and the person decided to resign. He has the right to resign and somebody else will be appointed. We want to maintain a policy that permits the people of the world, when they are in very difficult situations, to know there are some people who are concerned about human beings, the Canadian government.

ROGERS CABLE

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

Rogers, the cable television company, decided to change access to its French–language channels TV5 and Météo Média, and to cancel Musique Plus, as of Thursday of this week. These changes will significantly reduce access to French channels for francophones. This situation is undoubtedly the result of a bad decision made by the CRTC regarding RDI, a decision that the heritage minister refused to review, in spite of a request to that effect by the opposition.

Since it is also the responsibility of the minister to support francophone and Acadian communities, will he take action so that Rogers maintains those three French–language channels as part of its basic service?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to serve Canadian and francophone communities. I have no intention of interfering with the decisions of the CRTC, except to the extent of the legislative powers delegated to me. The hon. member's remark is interesting. In fact, we are examining this issue.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see that the minister has decided to take our request into consideration, but can he tell us now when he intends to provide an answer to francophone communities, since this service will be cut on Thursday?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I already had the opportunity to express my views on extending the RDI service to francophone communities. Radio–Canada has a responsibility which I have recognized, and it is precisely from that angle that I look at the issue.

NUCLEAR WEAPONS

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Foreign Affairs.

The United Nations World Health Organization has asked the World Court for an advisory opinion whether the use of nuclear weapons is against international law. Will the government consider informing the court of those areas in which Canada considers the use of nuclear weapons to be against international law?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Canada supports the objective of the elimination of nuclear weapons. However, we believe a treaty that would be binding on all the parties would be more conducive to efficiency than a mere reference to the international court of justice.

TAXATION

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today in this House the Liberal government summoned members from all over Ottawa so they could smother debate about the fact that their government is considering tax increases. How can the finance minister claim his government is willing to listen to Canadians when he permits his government to smother debate about the issue in this House?

The finance committee has gone across the country and has heard from Canadians. There has been extensive discussion within the committee in which the member participated. In this House there have been countless questions. There have been discussions back and forth.

I am not quite sure what further debate the Reform Party would like to see. We have listened to the members ad nauseam putting up strawmen like carbon taxes and everything else.

One day the leader of the Reform Party talked about what it cost per minute to listen to this House. We have blown a billion dollars listening to the Reform Party.

Mr. Jim Abbott (Kootenay East, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rather get the impression that the finance minister along with the rest of his party did not have a clue what they were voting on this morning. What has happened to the Liberals and the finance minister since they sat on this side of the House?

• (1445)

Perhaps I could help the finance minister remember that on April 27, 1993 he said: "In the real world outside Parliament Hill political revolution is under way". He said: "Canadians are demanding an end to the volleys of taxation that issue from the nation's capital every spring". What does he think of his own words today?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member is absolutely right. When I was in opposition I referred to the political revolution that was taking place outside the House. It took place and that is why we are in government.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. Yesterday, I clearly demonstrated to the minister that the Canada Employment Centre in Verdun was instrumental in the hiring of scabs to replace workers now on strike at Ogilvie.

Now that the minister knows what is going on, does he intend to take steps to stop this practice in Verdun and at all Canada Employment centres?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I took a look at the information provided by the hon. member and had it examined.

I would like to report to him and to other members of the House. He knows full well that under the rules of the International Labour Organization, to which Canada is a signatory, in the delivery of employment development services a government cannot take sides in any industrial dispute.

Therefore they posted the notice of the job with the fact that there was a strike or an industrial dispute taking place, which was totally and completely within the criteria established by the International Labour Organization.

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister agree that this situation makes a case for the quick adoption of amendments to the Canada Labour Code that would prohibit the use of scabs during a labour dispute, and that this should be done without waiting for the review announced by the minister?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have said in the House before that we are very interested in looking at modernizing the Canada Labour Code.

We are taking into account a number of representations. I have met, as have other members of the caucus and the member for Outremont, directly with the working group from the ADM Ogilvie. We will certainly take the representations into account. We are looking at the entire issue. When the cabinet has decided then legislation will be presented to the House.

GOVERNMENT BUSINESS

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today the Minister of Justice told the press that because "we have had just a very busy time" he is not going to bring forward changes to the Canadian Human Rights Act. Earlier he delayed introduction of gun legislation and he failed totally to introduce legislation to end the drug defence in justice.

My question is for the government House leader. In light of the fact the government is so short of legislation to bring before the House that the House is often suspended or is adjourned early, why is the government not introducing its legislation on schedule as promised?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we have a program of legislation with which we are proceeding. I expect the legislation the hon. member mentioned will be tabled shortly after we come back in February.

Even if the legislation had been tabled this week there would not have been time to do anything more than open debate. That is a fact in reality the hon. member should recognize as House leader for his party.

Mr. Elwin Hermanson (Kindersley—Lloydminster, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this is an ongoing problem. We have had this problem for months, ever since the Liberals took over.

Today the President of the Treasury Board announced further delays in reform of the MPs' outrageous pension plan. Is this delay symptomatic of a government that cannot find consensus in its caucus, will not allow free votes, and therefore avoids trouble by denying Canadians prompt introduction of promised legislation?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the department is going to be going for another three or four years. Nobody is retiring or leaving. I do not think any of the members opposite are planning on doing that. There is plenty of time to deal with the issues.

We are continuing to review the matter and to look at the various options. We have a number of things the government is putting forward to meet all its obligations. We will meet our obligations under the red book commitments with respect to MPs' pensions, to end double dipping, and to deal with the question of a minimum age.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. Harold Culbert (Carleton—Charlotte, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development.

After several weeks of investigating native government on the Maliseet reserve near Woodstock in my riding, the Telegraph Journal has made some very serious allegations regarding the expenditure of federal funds.

Could the minister provide the House with information concerning the allegations over mismanagement of funds in the first nation and any information relative to an RCMP investigation?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, band members at Woodstock First Nations have made allegations against their chief, Mr. Len Tomah, who has been chief for about 10 years. The RCMP is investigating. The file is not closed to date. Obviously it has not obtained sufficient evidence to lay any charges.

I hesitate to discuss an ongoing case in the House because we have a system of justice, fairness and due process based on facts, not on allegations. Within that regard I want to assure the member of two things. First, there will be full and complete co–operation by ministry officials with the RCMP and, second, there will be no interference with the RCMP investigation.

DUAL CITIZENSHIP

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

Last June, the Liberal majority on the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration, supported by the Reform Party, adopted a report on the Citizenship Act, which included a recommendation to eliminate a long standing right in Canada to hold dual citizenship. The Bloc Quebecois objected strenuously to this recommendation.

Can the minister confirm that his government intends to accept these recommendations to abolish the right to hold dual citizenship in Canada, a right that is recognized by more and more countries, including Italy, Australia, Switzerland, Great Britain, France and the United States?

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister confirmed a few days ago, the Canadian government and the Parliament of Canada will ultimately decide citizenship matters.

It is true the Standing Committee on Citizenship and Immigration was asked to do a study and report on how we could upgrade our Citizenship Act, which has been untouched virtually for some 20 years. There were many recommendations within that report and dual citizenship was one of them. The report and those recommendations are currently before cabinet. One would expect that those amendments would come to the House next year.

[Translation]

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, The minister did not answer my question. Would the minister agree that this recommendation is a blatant attempt at blackmail, to scare Quebecers on the eve of the referendum on sovereignty?

[English]

Hon. Sergio Marchi (Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I hate to disappoint the member but it is absolutely false and irresponsible to say that about members of Parliament from all parties who worked hard on the Citizenship Act.

They heard issues being raised by the public. They travelled. They had representations made to them. On balance the report made a very worthy set of recommendations.

The dual citizenship which the member outlines was only one of many recommendations. It would be absolutely unfair if we were simply to lift one recommendation from a generally good report. Instead we should deal with it on balance in a comprehensive and fair way.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, some senior officers at national defence headquarters are drawing separation expenses, that is they are being paid an allowance because they have chosen to retain their home elsewhere during their tour of duty here in Ottawa.

No one would object to reimbursing out of pocket expenses during a temporary dislocation from home and family. But when such reimbursement becomes a permanent part of an individual's pay package something is wrong with the system.

• (1455)

Will the Minister of National Defence advise the House how long that is, for what period of time separation allowance is normally paid?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. I am sure it is posed within the context of his concern for Canadian forces personnel.

In response to his question I have three points to make. The first one is that the program he talks about is called imposed restriction. It is related to the mobility that Canadian forces members have compared to any other part of Canadian society.

The second point I would make is that there are 900 members of the Canadian forces involved or less than one per cent and 65 per cent of them are non–commissioned members.

The third point is if he has any indication the regulations are not being followed properly and there are some unauthorized things happening, I think he owes it to the Canadian public to be more specific to me and to the minister.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

We are talking about $12 million a year here. One individual received separation allowance for a full year, almost $20,000. Another received over $86,000 for a period of more than four years. All this is in addition to their normal pay and allowances.

Why would the Department of National Defence allow these two individuals to remain separated from their families for so long, knowing it was costing the taxpayer well over $100,000 in separation expenses?

Mr. Fred Mifflin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence and Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows the management of personnel in the Canadian forces is a complex task with many different dimensions.

He also knows that the military career requires a much greater degree of mobility than any other segment of Canadian society. This imposes stress on individuals and their families and a much greater burden on the organization itself, considering their families. I am quoting from a report which the hon. member signed.

EDUCATION

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

The minister will know that for good reason criticisms have come forward over his proposal to cut $2.5 billion from post– secondary education. The criticism is based upon the need to ensure that Canadians are better educated, not worse educated. Provincial education ministers have expressed concern, at the least, and some have indicated that the proposals are disastrous.

I wonder when the minister will stop hysterically attacking provincial cabinet ministers who disagree with him and start listening to those ministers who want to save post–secondary education in Canada. When will he stop this disastrous attack on post–secondary education and Canadians in general?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is incumbent upon everybody involved in looking at the whole need to restructure our social framework, including the way to provide for higher education, to deal with the facts. The facts are that over the next several years the revenue going to the provinces substantially increases, not decreases, as a result of the growth in revenue coming from the tax points.

When certain provincial ministers refused to acknowledge both that fact and their responsibility to ensure that those increased revenues were in fact turned over and transferred for investment in higher education, it does deserve some rebuttal to show that responsibility must reside where it is clearly placed on provincial ministers to make sure they spend the money the federal government transfers to them for the betterment of higher education.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I wonder what world the minister lives in. He used to be a university professor. He should understand what post–secondary education is all about.

How can doubled tuition fees and skyrocketing student loans possibly help Canada, Canada's students or the future of the country?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is precisely because I spent some time in the university system that I know there is much room for serious reform, serious restructuring and serious modernization of the system so that we can reach out to far more students.

The proposal under the green paper is to provide increased accessibility for another quarter million Canadians. That requires reform on the financial side and begins to require serious reform and consideration by those in the academic community to look at how they are spending money and how they are investing money to get full value for it.

CABLE TELEVISION

Mrs. Bonnie Hickey (St. John's East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

Cable companies are now providing unordered cable service and automatically billing consumers for a service they did not request or may not even want. This puts the onus on the consumer to write to the cable companies to inform them that they do not want this service.

Can the minister please tell us what it is he is planning to do to end this unfair marketing?

Hon. Michel Dupuy (Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am sure many consumers welcome the hon. member's question.

The marketing technique known as negative optioning is one that comes under the jurisdiction of provincial consumer legislation. However, the CRTC is responsible for ensuring that cable operators provide all information available to consumers so that they know the choices which are available.

PRIVILEGE

ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Mr. John Cummins (Delta, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege today in relation to a discrepancy between a response given to the House and myself regarding Order Paper Question No. 82 standing in my name and the answer I received to an access to information request. I have advised the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans of my intention to rise today on this issue.

Mr. Speaker, with your permission, I would first like to state the case to demonstrate the discrepancy and then present supporting precedents. My question was: What effect did the late signing of the aboriginal fisheries agreement in British Columbia have on the Department of Fisheries and Oceans—

The Speaker: Order. I am sure all hon. members will want to listen to this point of privilege. The hon. member for Delta.

Mr. Cummins: In his response on November 10, the minister stated that while negotiations on agreements with aboriginal groups for the management of aboriginal salmon fishing were in many cases protracted, leading to delays in signing of agreements, these had little impact on agreements and fisheries regulations. I emphasize the words "little impact".

Access documents which I received December 7, 1994 contradicted the minister. I will bring several of these contradictions to the attention of this House.

In a memo dated August 17, 1994 approved by D.D. Aurel, Chief of Conservation and Protection, Fraser River Division it is stated: "The late signing of the aboriginal agreements has also resulted in difficulties in respect to proper management of the fishery and, in many cases, bands have not been able to abide by the terms of the agreement".

The second point states: "The lateness in the signing of the 1994 aboriginal fishing agreement has resulted in the breakdown of effective management of the native fishery on the Fraser River. Again, many aspects of the agreement failed to materialize or were simply neglected. DFO officers were unable to perform their duties".

The third point in the memo states: "The late signing of the aboriginal fishing agreements has contributed to management's reduced capacity to adequately monitor the fishery, provide accurate catch information and provide enforcement of the regulations governing the fishery on the Fraser River between Steveston and Lillooet during the period of June 25 to July 31, 1994".

In a memo dated September 19, 1994 to Paul Sutherland, Acting Regional Director, Pacific Region from the Director of Conservation and Protection, Pacific Region it is stated: "The major aboriginal agreements were not signed until well into the month of July 1994. As such there would have been no designated aboriginal guardians patrolling their early fisheries until such times as the agreements were signed. This created a gap not only in the enforcement program but also in the monitoring of the early portion of the fishery".

The second point of the same memo: "In addition, there were a number of start–up problems with the guardian program once the agreements were signed, including the lack of an enforcement co–ordinator until mid August. There was therefore a lack of direction for those aboriginal guardian staff who were hired by the bands until the enforcement co–ordinator position was filled".

On August 22 the Fraser River fishery catch estimation was addressed to the Chief of Conservation and Protection, Pacific Region from the Field Supervisor, General Investigation Services, Fraser River Division and stated: "Agreements in the Sto:Lo and Musqueam–Tsawwassen areas were not signed and hence no mandatory landing program was in place until well into the early Stuart sockeye migration in the lower river with a potential unreported catch in this fishery".

These documents indicate that the late signing of the AFS agreements had a massive impact on the enforcement of the agreements and fisheries regulations. The documents contradict the minister. The minister knew this. In early November of this year he met with fisheries officers of Vancouver and discussed the shortcomings of the enforcement regime in place last summer.

The rights of the members of this House include the right to accurate information. Beauchesne's sixth edition states in citation 24:

> Parliamentary privilege is the sum of peculiar rights enjoyed by each House collectively as a constituent part of the High Court of Parliament, and by Members of each House individually, without which they could not discharge their functions.

Surely we must expect the responses to Order Paper questions to be accurate and well–reasoned. I placed that question on the Order Paper recognizing it was one that required detailed study by the government because I wanted a detailed answer. After all is that not the purpose of such questions?

In speaking to a similar discrepancy to an Order Paper answer and access to information documents, the member for Kingston and the Islands in 1990 stated: "The information provided to the House must be accurate and must not mislead the House".

I offer for the Speaker's consideration the 1978 decision where the member for Northumberland—Durham raised a question of privilege in the House of Commons. The then Solicitor General had written and provided information which later proved to be erroneous.

On December 6, 1978 the Speaker indicated as reported at page 1857 of Hansard: "I therefore find a prime facie case of contempt against the House of Commons". If it was contempt against the House of Commons to provide a member of Parliament with erroneous information, then surely to provide the House itself with erroneous information through a written reply to a question on the Order Paper would also be a prime facie case of privilege.

It is incumbent upon the government to provide through the Order Paper not only the questioner, in this case myself, but the House accurate information in order for us as parliamentarians to discharge our functions appropriately.

I have been able to get accurate information under access to information. Both the access request and the Order Paper question were submitted in late September. How is it that the minister could get away with inaccurate information responding to an Order Paper question in the House?

The response given in this House would have been illegal under the Access to Information Act. If members want accurate information, is it necessary to go to access to information rather than to this House? Surely members of this House should expect a standard of accuracy that is as high as that received under access to information.

Mr. Speaker, should you rule that I have a prime facie case of privilege, I am prepared to move the appropriate motion and send the issue to a parliamentary committee.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has raised a point that in substance at least in its pith is correct. He says that Parliament is entitled to accurate information. I quite agree with him.

In providing answers to questions the government makes every effort to ensure the information provided in the answer is accurate. If the hon. member in his question has raised points that merit looking at, I am sure the minister of fisheries will take the matter under complete advisement.

If there is a supplementary answer or a correction to be tabled in the House, the government will have no problem whatever in doing that. Your Honour, I know the government is entitled to table supplementary answers to questions that have already been answered where it turns out that additional information comes to light or there has been some error or some misinformation.

I know that the minister of fisheries in answering these questions, as all ministers, has striven to make sure that the answers are full and complete and correct. As someone who has some role in tabling the answers in this House I work with the ministers and their staff and with the persons who provide these responses by the government to ensure that the answers are full, complete and correct.

I know there has been no attempt here to mislead. I am sure the minister of fisheries heard the hon. member's submissions and will note them and will review them. If there are corrections to be made, a supplementary answer will be forthcoming.

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a brief intervention. I submit that while the hon. member has demonstrated an interest in the issue of the management of the Fraser River salmon it is clear he has not demonstrated a breach of his privileges.

The member in his summation said that the information given on September 23, 1994 is not absolutely complete and the minister knows it is not complete because in early November, six weeks later, he met with enforcement officers in Vancouver who gave him additional information.

If you check the "blues", Mr. Speaker, because I listened very carefully, you will find that is exactly what the member said, that the minister should have known better on September 23 and had a more complete answer because on November 2 the minister met with enforcement officers and was given additional information.

I want to confirm that as the member knows, I did meet with enforcement officers on November 2 at DFO headquarters in Vancouver. I was given additional information. As a consequence of that additional information I set up a panel which in the last week has held public hearings in British Columbia listening to every single stakeholder group talking about the management of salmon on the Fraser River. The member knows that as well, even though he has called into question the integrity of this panel which is chaired by none other than the former Speaker of the House of Commons, the Hon. John Fraser.

Let me say this to the member and let me say to you, Mr. Speaker, that at the time the question was asked the answer which was given makes reference to the fact that delays in signing agreements have had little impact, it says, on the enforcement of aboriginal fisheries. That is the information the minister had. I learned subsequently in discussions with enforcement officers over a full month later of additional concerns.

We have acted to have a total public review to deal with those concerns. I have a review going on internally in the department to deal with concerns about enforcement. Nobody is attempting to mislead anybody. The member is a month behind the process. We were already working on the problem before he even brought it to the House.

The Speaker: I do not in any way minimize the seriousness of this question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Delta. He surely has a grievance which perhaps can be corrected without proceeding to a complete point of privilege. I would hope that the hon. member for Delta and perhaps the member for Kingston and the Islands and the hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans might come together to resolve this particular grievance.

I want the House to understand that I do take this very seriously when a member feels that he or she is in any way impeded from performing his or her duties as members of Parliament.

I would give this assurance that I will return to the member for Delta if indeed he does not get a response to his grievance in discussions with the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and the hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I will leave it at that for the time being.

• (1515)

Mr. Cummins: Mr. Speaker—

The Speaker: Order. Is this on the same question of privilege?

Mr. Cummins: Yes, Mr. Speaker. I want to correct the record on a point made by the minister.

The Speaker: I wonder if the hon. member might consider my suggestion. We could let this sit at this point with the full assurance of the Chair that I will return to the member if his grievance is not responded to in a satisfactory manner. Can we leave it there?

Mr. Cummins: Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, a point of order. I think you might find there is unanimous consent in the House to revert to statements by ministers so that the Minister of Transport can make a brief statement.

The Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to revert to statements by ministers?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

CP RAIL

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the House will know that on September 21, CP Rail System tabled an unsolicited bid of $1.4 billion for the CN North America eastern rail assets.

I am announcing today that the Government has rejected CP's offer and is not prepared to entertain any further the sale of CN Rail assets.

[English]

In reaching our conclusions, we reviewed the business and policy cases beyond the financial implications of the deal. Canadian Pacific's bid would have had a substantial impact on employment, the rail network and the cost of rail service for eastern shippers. The government was also concerned about the impact that the transaction would have had on CN's remaining western operations.

We must address the fundamental problems facing the rail industry to ensure that the sector is viable, competitive and continues to meet the needs of Canadian shippers. A series of meetings have been held with shippers and other stakeholders in all regions of the country. This phase of the consultation process will wrap up with a national shippers' meeting in Ottawa tomorrow.

I have also asked a committee of members of Parliament headed by the member for Kenora—Rainy River to discuss with Canadians the feasibility of commercializing Canadian National. I look forward to the recommendations that the member and his colleagues will bring forward, particularly with regard to the possibility of employee participation in any commercialization of Canadian National.

We will announce a comprehensive and workable rail policy framework in 1995. We must put the Canadian rail sector on a stable footing and try to maintain a healthy level of competition within the rail industry and against other modes.

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, even if we did not have the opportunity of looking at the details of the CP offer, for lack of relevant documentation and because the government did not deign to consult us, the opposition is nonetheless relieved to learn today that it has decided to reject the offer.

Indeed, we are of the opinion that CP's bid was too low, as pointed out in a study by Morgan Stanley, and involved too many drawbacks for the people of Canada and Quebec.

We were not unconcerned by the creation of a monopoly east of Winnipeg and there was no indication of how local railways would be treated under this new monopoly. We do agree with the government: this offer of CP Rail had to be rejected on financial and public interest grounds.

However, the question of Canadian National and the Canadian rail system still remains unresolved. It is particularly disappointing to see how undemocratically the Liberal government is treating the opposition around this issue. No opposition member, neither from the Bloc Quebecois nor the Reform Party, was asked to sit on this committee.

This is above all a partisan parliamentary group studying the privatization of CN. The eight Liberal members and the federal senator on the committee have worked their way toward recommendations which have no doubt already been drafted, long before the so–called hearings are over.

On February 18, as the Official Opposition's transport critic, I asked the Standing Committee on Transport to give priority to the matter of rail service. I asked again when the House reconvened on September 19, and the minister's response was the creation on September 29 of this partisan Liberal working committee.

Last week in committee, although it had been agreed to put aside consideration of the national airport policy to concentrate on ports, we again asked the committee to give priority to rail issues and travel to the regions to hear what the people have to say.

The government is set to introduce a global rail policy in 1995 without even consulting the elected members of the opposition. I hope that the government will reconsider its approach in this matter, and not in cavalier fashion either, because it is totally unacceptable. We hope that the minister will be much more open and democratic with the democratically elected members of the opposition.

[English]

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I can go along with the minister's decision not to accept CP's offer but not the part that states the government is not prepared to entertain any further offers for the sale of CN Rail.

The formation of CN Rail began in 1917 when numerous small rail companies found themselves in severe financial trouble. The root cause of the rail industry problem even then was an excess of trackage. Once formed, CN commenced an aggressive program of expansion, despite evidence that there was already excessive trackage in Canada. In order to compete CP Rail was forced to expand as well. The results were inevitable.

In 1937 CN's debts were a major problem so the government of the day cancelled them. It was a Liberal government. No one addressed excess trackage which resulted in CN again finding itself in severe financial trouble in 1952. Once again the government of the day entered the picture and bailed them out. Once again the government of the day was Liberal. Still no one addressed the problem of excess trackage.

During the next two decades CN, despite losses of approximately $25 million a year, continued capital spending of up to $200 million a year. The results were once again inevitable. Enter the government in 1978 with yet another bail–out and, yes, once again it was a Liberal government.

It appears the latest Liberal government is now prepared to be the fourth to bail a government company out of trouble so that it can compete with a public company using the taxpayers' money as a subsidy. That is not acceptable.

A task force to study this, made up of only Liberal members who have an obvious political agenda to maintain this unviable rail company, is not acceptable.

Yesterday I made a statement in the House indicating my expectation of the government's position based on my observations of the task force in action. The task force had a predetermined policy and only went forth to manipulate people into accepting it.

The only solution to Canada's rail problem is the privatization of CN. Whether it is sold as a whole entity or sold in part is not the issue. After almost 80 years of problems it is time for the government to butt out. Government interference causes rather than resolves problems. Reduce government's role to a regulatory position and allow the marketplace to resolve the problem. They will do a far better job than politicians and bureaucrats ever could.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I wish to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 33 because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by eight minutes.

EMPLOYMENT EQUITY ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion.

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I look forward to resuming debate on Bill C–64.

To sum up what I have already said, as a Reformer I stand by and support the concept of equality for all Canadians, whether that equality be in law or in opportunity in the marketplace. As a Reformer I am strongly opposed to the injustice of establishing employment goals for designated groups. I have listened to young people who also resent the inference of inequality of such employment equity legislation as we see today.

Visible minorities do not want this type of help as it creates resentment not only within their own communities but also in their efforts to be accepted as equals within the larger community.

A young second generation Chinese Canadian journalism student recently shared her frustration in my constituency office. Despite her excellent qualifications, the recognition that she had received was lessened by the question of whether her success was in fact a token of her perceived difference rather than reward for her unequivocal excellence. Tokenism has no part in Canada if we truly believe in equality.

It is the government's job to provide the means for equality of opportunity. It is not the government's job to push unjust and unfair equality of results in the marketplace. Employment equity is unnecessary and it is unwise as it institutionalizes the very notion of discrimination that it purports to reject.

Years ago as society's architects only mused about the notion of legislating hiring practices, Martin Luther dreamt of a society that was blind to race and gender. "Judge us not by the colour of our skin but by the content of our character" he implored. How sad that Canadians are being driven to adopt policies that deny the very principles we hold dear. These are principles that are upheld by Canadians of all abilities and backgrounds. These are principles that will lead us to the prosperity we deserve as a great country, principles which we have presented in this brief discussion.

The legislation of Bill C–64 works against the principles I have described, principles of equality, of fiscal accountability and of the excellence of all Canadians in our society.

Mr. Herb Grubel (Capilano—Howe Sound, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my brief remarks are designed to repeat some of the basic arguments against pay and employment equity which underlie Reform's opposition to Bill C–64.

Reform believes that government should assure equality of opportunity in economic life, but it has no business using the labour market to assure equality of outcome. Doing so interferes with basic freedoms, makes false assumptions about the causes of inequality, creates large inefficiencies and is basically unjust.

Consider the problem with freedom. Canada has developed into a prosperous society by upholding basic personal freedoms. One of these consists of the ability of individuals to sell their labour services to the highest bidder and for employers to choose freely those whom they wish to hire as long as they do not interfere with the fundamental freedoms of others.

These freedoms are an end in themselves, but they also are the engines which drive economic activity in a market economy that has produced the riches our society enjoys today.

Throughout the world and history people have died for these freedoms. We all remember the American civil war. Slavery represents the extreme limitation on people's freedom to sell their labour services to the highest bidder. Employment and pay equity legislation imposes on free Canadians just a bit of such slavery. Our society is on a slippery slope.

• (1530)

Consider the idea that existing inequalities between groups is due to discrimination. Reform believes that this proposition is based on false assumptions and empirical evidence. Studies by Tom Sowell at Stanford University have shown that Americans of Japanese origin as a group have much above average U.S. income.

My former colleague, Don DeVoretz at Simon Fraser University, has shown that immigrants on average have higher incomes than people born in Canada. The recorded extraordinary success of these two groups is indicative of the impossible task of establishing that group disadvantages are caused by discrimination based on race, gender or national or ethnic origin.

Economists led by Nobel laureate Gary Becker have long argued that free markets offer the best protection against discrimination. Consider a firm that gets paid $1 for the assembly of a computer component. The wage rate is $10 per hour and the average male is able to complete 10 units per hour. Consider that women have greater dexterity and are able to assemble 12 units per hour. Any firm which refuses to hire women for this task is at an obvious competitive disadvantage with a firm that does. It will ultimately go out of business.

Students of labour markets have been able to show that discrimination in the labour market has historically persisted only in instances where government regulation or government enforced monopolies like labour unions have prevented the adjustment from taking place.

Bill C–64 and similar legislation involves serious costs. Bureaucrats, lawyers and the police needed to enforce such legislation are not available to produce goods and services that determine our living standard. The private sector incurs large administrative costs. In addition there are the costs of lost efficiency. Goods and services will no longer be produced using the lowest cost.

In the United States affirmative action has been estimated to result in lost output equal to 4 per cent of national income. Since Canada may be assumed never to want to lag behind the U.S. in such social legislation for long, we may soon expect at least such cost.

The ultimate cost of governmental attempting to create perfect equality of incomes has become obvious through recent developments in socialist and communist governments around the world. Employment and pay equity in these systems had been perfected. Now communism and socialism around the world have failed or are in retreat.

What does the Liberal Government of Canada do? It pushes state efforts to achieve equality of income by applying it to the civil service. In addition, the recent Liberal recommendations to the finance minister in the report of the Standing Committee on Finance bragged about the fact that if adopted they will further equalize income. Have the Liberals learned nothing from history?

Let me now discuss briefly the sense in which the proposed legislation is basically unjust. Using the course of power of the state to help one group of disadvantaged individuals automatically discriminates against others and deprives them of their rights and freedoms without due process.

These groups are paying a discriminatory tax and are implicitly declared guilty of discrimination. Reform sees no justice in forcing young people belonging to one group to pay today for discrimination that may or may not have taken place in the past.

By the same token, where is the justice in giving members of minority groups alive today benefits in return for injustices real or imagined suffered by past members of this group?

Let me close by reminding members of the slippery slope on which we find ourselves. In one of his novels, Kurt Vonnegut describes a world in which state created equality of outcome was perfected.

• (1535)

It had moved from assuring pay equity to equity in looks and sports. In Vonnegut's brave new world, good looking people had to wear glasses and other devices to assure equality of looks with those disadvantaged by nature.

Gifted athletes were made to wear heavy weights to assure that they were able to jump no higher and run no faster than the rest. In the end, the hero of the story discards the starting post equalization devices and enjoyed his life to the fullest for a short time until he entered jail for the rest of his life.

Whenever it is impossible to make a strong intellectual case against the government policy like pay employment equity the question arises why governments persist with such policy. Public choice theory of government provides the answer.

Such legislation serves the interests of politicians and parties. Identifiable groups are given benefits and they are expected to reward the donors at the ballot box and with financial support. The cost of the legislation in terms of lost freedoms, discrimination against the innocent and reduced output are difficult to measure.

As a result the victims of the policy have little or no incentives and knowledge to punish the politicians who have imposed those costs on them. Such special interest group legislation slowly and exorbitantly lowers the income of Canadians and most tragically deprives them of their freedom.

Bill C–64 and similar legislated pay and employment equity reduce the welfare of Canadians. That is why Reform opposes it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Call in the members.

During the ringing of the bells:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, I have been requested by the chief government whip to defer the division until a later time.

Accordingly, pursuant to Standing Order 45, the division on the question now before the House stands deferred until later this day at 5.30 p.m. at which time the bells to call in the members will be sounded for not more than 15 minutes.

CRIMINAL LAW AMENDMENT ACT, 1994

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.) moved that the amendments made by the Senate to Bill C–42, an act to amend the Criminal Code and other acts (miscellaneous matters) be concurred in.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like say a few words about Bill C–42.

[English]

The other place has now amended the bill in two respects but has otherwise passed it. I should add it has also made minor changes to certain parts of the French language version.

• (1540)

The two important changes which arise from the work of the other place should be mentioned briefly. Clauses 61 and 62 have been deleted. Clause 61 would have replaced section 604 of the Criminal Code. It would have prohibited the defence from publicizing information received from the prosecution in the fulfilment of the crown's disclosure obligations.

The limited purpose of the amendment was to ensure that this information would only be used to prepare the answer and defence in the courtroom.

The committee of the Senate felt that a number of related issues should be dealt with at the same time. I am able to tell the House that is going to be possible because the government is now looking at the prospect of codifying disclosure requirements arising from the Supreme Court of Canada judgment in Finchcomb as part of our work toward the reform of the preliminary inquiry and criminal procedure generally.

We agree with having clause 61 removed from the bill. Now it can be dealt with in the context of the broader treatment of disclosure and we accept that change for the very good reasons given by our colleagues in the other place.

The second clause deleted is clause 62. That would have amended section 648 of the Criminal Code to restrict publicity about certain jury trial proceedings that occur before the jury is empanelled.

It was the intention of the government in putting this clause in the bill to fill a gap which has existed for some time and to provide for orders banning publication in those cases in which pretrial motions concerning the admissibility of certain evidence were heard in courtrooms before the jury was actually sworn in.

The publication of such pretrial motions, particularly as they relate to evidence that might eventually be heard, might contaminate members of a prospective jury panel, might give them impressions or information about the evidence which would make it more difficult or impossible for them to serve impartially.

It was pointed out by the committee of the Senate which considered this clause that the language which the government used to achieve that purpose might be overbroad. It might be mandatory where permissive language might be preferable. In any event the provision, however worded, should permit the publication of matters other than those which might sway a jury if they were made public before the panel was sworn in.

We are happy to have that clause removed as well. We will consider it and try to meet the legitimate concerns that have been expressed. We will try to improve it and bring it forward at another time.

The government is indebted to the other place for its characteristically careful work, particularly the detailed analysis done in a very constructive way by the committee of the Senate. We are grateful if its work will result in an improved bill, a better law for Canadians.

[Translation]

Mrs. Madeleine Dalphond–Guiral (Laval–Centre, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I will be the only member to speak on behalf of the Official Opposition on Senate amendments to Bill C–42, an act to amend the Criminal Code and other acts. As far as we are concerned, we, the voice of democracy, have already made ourselves heard when the bill was read the third time and passed in this House, on October 4, 1994.

If I rise today, it is to denounce the amendment process used by the other chamber of this Parliament. The Standing Committee on Legal and Constitutional Affairs of that institution tabled its recommendations on December 12. The committee suggested that some amendments be made. The spokesperson of this committee of the other place complained about the Criminal Code review process as well as that used for Bill C–42.

• (1545)

In his view, it would be highly desirable in the future that such bills be submitted to the other place first. He says that the other place has proven itself in that area.

The Bloc Quebecois has always been openly opposed to the existence of an institution like the other chamber of this Parliament. Let me tell you why.

The primary function of the other chamber of this Parliament should be akin to a consideration and review process to put the brakes on the House of Commons. The role of this institution is supposed to be to counterbalance the parliamentary executive. The Fathers of Confederation gave the other place the means to act as a federal chamber looking after the rights of the provinces, the rights of the regions, and to guarantee their participation in the federal legislative process.

We are forced to recognize that such is not the case however. The inherent goals of this institution of the Parliament of Canada have been replaced with less noble and less democratic goals, such as thanking friends of the regime and representing a handful of groups with interests often less than compatible with those of a true democracy. The elitism prevailing in this obsolete institution is not reconcilable with democratic activity. We, the Official Opposition, think that it is up to the elected representatives of the people of Quebec and Canada in this House to pass or reject the legislation introduced by the government.

Therefore, we are not interested in giving consideration to the amendments suggested by the members of the other place. The amendments proposed by the house of partisan appointments in regard to this bill clearly demonstrate the uselessness and the waste of time, energy and money generated by the activities of the members of the other place.

Notwithstanding the respect we may have for some members of the other place, the fact remains that their work can often amount to mere stylistic or cosmetic changes. We see the legislative role of the other chamber as unacceptable overlap, especially in these times when we have to put public finances in order.

Is it justifiable to spend $26,952,000 a year so that the other place can tell us that a bill we have just passed, on which all democratically elected members of this House voted, needs cosmetic or stylistic changes?

Allow me to quote a short passage from a speech delivered on June 8 by my colleague from Richmond—Wolfe: "The Bloc has always spoken out against the existence of a Senate, and I would like to demonstrate that this institution is, in our opinion, as archaic as it is useless. This institution is nothing more than an excuse for the government to reward its friends, be they Liberal or Tory, who will then work—in true partisan fashion—for the government or for the interests they represent".

No, we do not need the other chamber. Given the current lack of constitutional progress, I understand how some members of the other place, with pensions and perhaps a passion for passive political life, would want to justify their salaries. But all this only adds to a system which is already too heavy and costly.

Furthermore, this does not enhance in any way the process to consult on and pass a bill already approved by all members of this House.

Let us have a quick look at the proposed changes. There are six amendments, including two technical changes and two somewhat questionable stylistic changes. The last two amendments suggest that the members of the other place did not understand the purpose of Bill C–42, since their amendments deal with protecting the right to a fair and equitable trial and with the obsolescence of a current provision in the Criminal Code.

• (1550)

As you can understand, we refuse to give any consideration to the amendments proposed by the other place, since it does not represent anyone, has no mandate from the population and is to all intents and purposes a mere patronage nest or, if you prefer, a haven of recognition, pure and simple.

We will therefore vote against the amendments proposed by the other place, since they are, in our opinion, cosmetic in nature and questionable and come from an institution without legitimacy in the eyes of the Bloc Quebecois, the official opposition. I am sure that the vast majority of Quebecers will support our position on this.

[English]

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to speak again on Bill C–42, although I did not expect to be doing so when I last spoke on this legislation on October 4. At that time the Reform Party agreed with the majority of the bill the way it stood and therefore proceeded to committee of the whole and quick passage through the House of Commons. We had one clear objection at that time but it now appears the House of sober second thought has had some other ideas about the bill.

The amendments deal with the French version of the text and are apparently only housekeeping items that I am sure better clarify the meaning of the text. The amendments of concern are those to clauses 61 and 62. Clippings of newspapers were filled with editorials and columns urging the Senate to reject these two clauses of the bill. Apparently the Senate listened well and proceeded to send the bill back to the House with those two deletions. Here we see the power of the media at work.

I am not going to criticize the Senate for sending the bill back with amendments. That is what it is supposed to do. However, I am sure the Senate could have made other more important amendments that would have strengthened the legislation.

Clause 28(3) of the bill states: "Everyone who commits mischief in relation to property that is a testamentary instrument or the value of which exceeds five thousand dollars". The bill would replace the word "one" with the word "five". Why did the Senate not bring forward an amendment to this part of the bill? The reason is clear. The bleeding hearts think this would be too cruel, too onerous. They did not think twice on this one.

In 1954 the dollar indicator for theft over, theft under was $50. The next time this clause was changed was in 1975 when it became $200. The law as we know it today was amended in 1985 to $1,000. The punishment for theft over is an indictable offence and liable for imprisonment up to 10 years. For anything under $1,000 the punishment is usually a summary conviction with minor consequences available.

The government must realize that when it brings forth amendments it will set a precedent on amendments in the future. This government does not think logically. Neither does it consider the past nor the future.

Property crimes in Canada historically account for approximately two–thirds of all Criminal Code offences. In fact in 1990 thefts over and under $1,000 comprised over two–thirds of all property crimes reported to police.

The area of concern is theft over. From 1986, one year following the dollar cut off being raised to $1,000 until 1992, theft over had increased by 9 per cent. I am sure the government at the time felt that raising the rate from $200 to $1,000 would help curb the property crime rates.

Now today with Bill C–42 the government hopes that by raising the limit from $1,000 to $5,000 this increase will help curb property crime rates in 1995 and beyond. The government should take a careful look back at history and see how things failed before charging ahead with an idea that it only hopes will work for the best. In my opinion the government should keep the dollar amount at $1,000. Getting softer with criminals is not going to reduce the crime rate. It will perhaps only increase it.

Bill C–42 was first read on June 15, 1994. The member for London West spoke on October 4, with a speech that perhaps could have been prepared by one of the minister's staff. In that speech she said: "It is important that the rights of accused persons to a fair trial before an impartial jury not be compromised by premature publicity of information which may or may not be relevant in admissible evidence".

The hon. member went on to say: "The rights of witnesses and victims also require protection from the needless public disclosure of personal information. A prohibition would be created to ensure that sensitive material disclosed to the accused for the purposes of making a full answer in defence is not made public for that purpose. This will serve to maintain the balance of interests between the right of the accused to a full answer in a defence and the confidence the public needs to encourage co–operation in criminal investigations and prosecutions".

• (1555)

The member in her speech stressed that this provision would protect the rights of the witnesses and the victims from needless public disclosure of personal information.

If the member for London West agrees with the justice minister that these two amendments are necessary, that would mean she believes that without this provision in Bill C–42 the rights of witnesses and victims will not be protected because this is exactly what she implied in her speech. Will she come forward and back up the words she spoke in this House on October 4? Not in a million years.

The minister clearly liked the bill or he would not have endorsed it. Now he is endorsing a major change to the bill. Was he influenced by the Supreme Court, his colleagues in the Senate, or was it the backbenchers of the Liberal caucus? Will these groups be factors in other bills, say perhaps in Bill C–41 which is also raising its fair share of controversy?

We are in support of the amendments that have come back from the Senate. However, we are simply frustrated that there were not more changes to other important parts of the bill, namely the theft over clause. Reformers want a more open system of the courts and of government. Do the Liberals?

The public and the media have been screaming to open the courts for all to see and know. Perhaps it is for inquiring minds and perhaps it is for future safety. Reformers look at it for safety and the principle of general deterrence. That is why we recommended for the disclosure of names of young offenders, simply for the good of public safety.

Canadians apparently have been calling for a lift on publication bans and the Liberals listened for now. Good for them for listening. Canadians have definitely called in a louder voice for the names of young offenders to be released, but the Liberals' ears all of a sudden go deaf. Something is definitely wrong.

The minister can stand before this House today and say he is in support of the amendments which come from the Senate but look for future alterations to this same section of the Criminal Code. The minister has said he will try again with these limits. The Liberal member for London West clearly spelled it out in her speech: "Historically this bill and ones like it were introduced on a regular basis. However the last such bill was introduced in 1985. The Minister of Justice intends to return to the previous pattern. He anticipates bringing forward a second bill of this nature once Parliament has dealt with this one". Need I say more?

The chamber of sober second thought did not have enough second thought about what the public wants in view of the demarcation of theft over and theft under. Alternately, deleting clauses 61 and 62 leans toward more openness and disclosure in the courtroom. The top court of the land has said that freedom of the press and the public's right to know what goes on in court should be accorded equal weight with the constitutional right to a fair trial. The public must be vigilant for systems and bureaucracies have a tendency over time to become insular and self–serving, thereby more closed to its operations to not submit to public scrutiny.

We have heard from the other place. They apparently are awake over there. If however the system or this government has failed in respect to the measure of theft over and theft under in the definition, then I call on the government not to proclaim this specific section until broader public support can be demonstrated for it. It is my reading of the public mood that the theft over line is going in the wrong direction.

We are in support of the amendments that are before this House today dealing with Bill C–42. I think I have clearly gone on record to state the dissatisfaction we have with the performance of the Senate and the lack of amendments it produced.

Bill C–42 is a housekeeping bill. The minister is accepting a change from the other place. May he also heed what I am saying today for the Canadian public is also listening.

Mr. Rock: I am grateful for this opportunity, Mr. Speaker. I just want to comment on one aspect of the hon. member's statement concerning these amendments to the bill.

As I understood the hon. member he referred to the change in the value of property involved in crime in an effort to influence the incidence of crime reporting or the crime rates. Perhaps I did not understand the hon. member's point. I apologize if I have it imprecisely but let me just tell the House lest there be any doubt what our rationale was as a government for proposing that change.

• (1600)

The dollar amount of property involved in such crime is the demarcation point for determining where the trial of such charges occurs. At and below that amount the trial of such charges occurs in the provincial court and within the jurisdiction of a provincial court judge. By increasing the amount we have increased the number of cases that will be tried in that court, without the necessity for the more elaborate procedures of preliminary inquiry and the prospect of a trial by judge and jury.

The change is intended to reflect agreement on the part of participants in the criminal justice system—the provinces that administer the system, the prosecutors, the defence lawyers and government federally that writes the criminal law—that we should encourage the disposition of as many of these cases as possible in the least expensive and most summary locale, which is the provincial court.

It has nothing to do with crime rates, nothing to do with percentages, but everything to do with the more efficient administration of justice and always in keeping with the right to a fair trial and disposition. I am grateful for the opportunity to clarify the matter.

Mr. Forseth: Mr. Speaker, the change for theft under or over also is a significant change to the available consequences. On the principle of stare decisis the justice minister knows that there is a going tariff for theft under. This is certainly going to change. For the public to get hold of the idea that the common tariff or consequence for theft under is now going to include property up to $5,000 is quite a considerable shock. When I mentioned this recently to some policemen on the street as I was riding with them on their shift they could not believe what Parliament was doing.

I ask the minister to perhaps consult further with the people at the line level and delay the proclamation of this amount.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC WORKS AND GOVERNMENT SERVICES ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–52, an act to establish the Department of Public Works and Government Services and to amend and repeal certain acts, as reported by the Standing Committee on Government Operations (with amendments) from the committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): There is a ruling by the Speaker on Bill C–52, an act to establish the Department of Public Works and Government Services and to amend and repeal certain acts.

[Translation]

There are 11 motions in amendment on the Order Paper for the report stage of Bill C–52, an Act to establish the Department of Public Works and Government Services and to amend and repeal certain Acts.

Motion No. 1 will be debated and voted on separately.

Motions Nos. 2 and 3 will be grouped for debate but voted on as follows: an affirmative vote on Motion No. 2 obviates the necessity of the question being put on Motion No. 3. However, a negative vote on Motion No. 2 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 3.

[English]

Motions Nos. 4, 5, 6 and 7 will be grouped for debate but voted on as follows. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 4 obviates the necessity of the question being put on Motions Nos. 5, 6 and 7. On the other hand, a negative vote on Motion No. 4 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 5.

• (1605)

An affirmative vote on Motion No. 5 obviates the necessity of the question being put on Motions Nos. 6 and 7. On the other hand, a negative vote on Motion No. 5 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 6.

An affirmative vote on Motion No. 6 obviates the necessity of the question being put on Motion No. 7. On the other hand, a negative vote on Motion No. 6 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 7.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 8 and 9 will be grouped for debate but voted on separately.

[English]

Motions Nos. 10 and 11 will be grouped for debate. A vote on Motion No. 10 applies to Motion No. 11.

[Translation]

I will now call Motion No. 1.

[English]

MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C–52, in Clause 7, be amended by adding after line 20, on page 3, the following:

"(a) refrain, where possible, from engaging in activities for or on behalf of any government, body or person in Canada or elsewhere that are in direct competition with private corporations, firms or organizations;

(b) ensure, where possible, that public disclosure of decisions and other information is complete and easily accessible;

(c) ensure that the Queen's Printer for Canada is operated efficiently and competently, maintaining as a priority the effective use of tax dollars;

(d) ensure that the reduction of all costs remains a high priority in the operations of the Department;".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I begin my little speech about the motion to amend by saying that it has been a very frustrating experience to go through Bill C–52.

We are told it is a routine bill, one that has as its purpose to simply bring together a few departments into one. Actually it is an action that was done by the previous government and is now being rubber stamped by this one.

While we were told in committee to hurry, hurry, hurry and were not even allowed to listen to witnesses in some cases because we were in such a hurry, the message was obviously hurry up and wait. That was over a month ago. The bill has been on the Order Paper four times and now finally we are here.

I want to speak to the motion in amendment. First, this motion to amend standing alone is not very meaningful. We have to start by listening to the first part of clause 7 which states:

In exercising the powers or performing the duties or functions assigned to the Minister under this or any other Act of Parliament, the Minister shall

We are now suggesting that some four clauses be inserted on things the minister shall do. I must speak briefly about the process. In my little more than one year as a member of Parliament I have discovered that as government backbenchers or opposition members the only way we have any hope of changing anything is to persuade the minister to give the instruction that it should be changed.

However it is very difficult to persuade the minister if the minister will not hear. The only way to get the minister to hear is perhaps if we could ask Liberal members who are listening to hear the quality of the argument, to assess it and then to decide that perhaps these are well founded amendments that should be supported. If those members will then twist the arm of the minister so that he will give instructions on how the party will vote, the amendment will pass. If he does not do that then I speak here in vain.

Here are the arguments. The first paragraph states: "refrain, where possible, from engaging in activities in direct competition with private corporations". I want members of the House to know that my party and I have received a number of representations from individuals, groups and small businesses with grave concerns about the government entering into competition.

There is one kind of competition we welcome in terms of government. If an arm of the government has to compete with private enterprise where private enterprise has shown that it can do things more efficiently, we think the taxpayer gets the best break if the private organization will do the work at a lower cost to taxpayers. Very often when government gets into a position of competing with private enterprise it has a totally unfair monopolistic advantage.

The reason we are supporting this group of four amendments is that we want to ensure that business thrives and indeed survives. At least 80 per cent of the economic activity of the country is derived from small business. To ask these businesses to pay taxes that are used to provide financial backing to the government firm or the government agency to compete and undercut prices is a violation of a fundamental principle of justice and the principle of what is right.

Some may wonder about the wording because we have said: "refrain, where possible". It is because I am a bit of a realist and somewhat pragmatic. I realize the probability of the motion being passed would essentially disappear totally if we made the motion hard and effective the way it ought to be.

We want at least to insert into the bill the requirement that the minister "refrain, where possible". I do not know how he could determine this. There would be times when he would say it is not possible. I suppose that would be subject to debate and perhaps even a court investigation to see whether he was living up to the terms of this clause in the bill. The important point is that the minister would be given the directive to stay out of competing with private enterprise.

The second paragraph indicates that the minister is to "ensure, where possible, that public disclosure of decisions and other information is complete and easily accessible". One problem with the way government does business is in the area of questioning backroom deals. If we accept the integrity of the Liberal government, it has said in its campaign literature and has kept on saying that it wants honesty, openness and integrity. It would provide the minister with the ability to provide openness according to the standards of the governing party, according to its words. We are saying "ensure, where possible" so that it does not come in so hard that they say they are going to throw out the amendment of this renegade third party guy.

We want them to consider it seriously. That is why it has this little softening phrase.

The third motion is that the minister shall ensure that the Queen's Printer for Canada is operated efficiently and competently, maintaining as a priority the effective use of tax dollars. This is the missing ingredient in Bill C–52.

The overriding concern of Canadians from sea to sea is that we are not being responsible with their tax dollars. We need to build into legislation the necessity of being frugal, of saving money, of cutting expenses, of balancing the budget, getting rid of the deficit.

Canadians are demanding this. One way of achieving it is to require the ministers to actually maintain as a priority the efficient use of taxpayers' dollars in performing these services.

In the last several days we have received the report of the committee that was studying the Canada Communication Group. I am intrigued in reading that report to find that this independent review committee has suggested very strongly that Canada Communication Group, which as most people know does all the printing for the government, among other things, should be privatized. It should be sold to private interests so that when government has a contract to let, everybody out there is on an equal playing field. It is critical that we listen to that report. This motion aids that.

The fourth subgroup in Motion No. 1 is that the minister shall ensure that the reduction of all costs remains a high priority in the operations of the department.

In other words, this amendment would require that the minister pay some attention to the reduction of costs. We in the public works and government operations committee could then ask him to be accountable when he comes before the committee.

We could say to the minister: Mr. Minister, how did you express cost cutting efficiency as a high priority? From minister to minister we can insist that there be measures taken to be totally efficient.

In conclusion, the four points in the motion, if given careful thought, are very reasonable. I urge all members to support these amendments, not because I have asked them to, although obviously I agree or I would not have proposed the motion. I do not urge them to support them because the Reform Party supports them. If they did so, partisanship would enter and they would automatically oppose the motion. I urge those members to consider supporting this motion strictly and totally because it best represents the needs and the aspirations of Canadians who are footing the bill.

Mr. Ian McClelland (Edmonton Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like for a few moments to add a few thoughts to the debate.

Much of what I would add has been said in the previous readings of the bill. However I would like to illustrate something that has been brought to my attention by a number of very interested parties and that is the desire of the federal government to begin to compete with private enterprise at the very time it is ostensibly getting out of business or privatizing.

The illustrations that I would use today will probably deal most directly with the post office but I would also like to bring in the example of Canada Mortgage and Housing and its appraisal process. I would also like to speak briefly about the impact of the bill and the ability that it gives the minister to compete in the private sector with the engineering fraternity.

Ostensibly the bill is a routine housekeeping bill that has the effect of consolidating the department. When we are considering the intrusion of the federal government into private enterprise or into areas that could be better served by private enterprise, we have to keep in mind that the government brings an enormous weight and an enormous amount of sway to the table whenever it decides it is going to get into a business.

Before I entered the political realm I was in the photo finishing business. I can remember being absolutely appalled when some years ago the post office was trying desperately to recoup some of its losses. The thought perhaps never occurred to the post office that one of the ways it could increase the use of its product was to provide a faster, better and more efficient service. It decided it was going to expand its product line. I believe it was Consumers Distributing products that were going to become available in post offices.

There I was, a small businessman, paying taxes to support the post office and finding myself in a position where I would be competing with the post office. Fortunately this did not come to pass.

Recently it was brought to my attention, and I am sure to the attention of other hon. members present, that the post office once again, as it was privatizing and becoming a crown corporation, was trying to increase its revenue rather than trying to decrease its expenses. It had announced a 2 cent price increase in the cost of a stamp. The post office had made, I think, a $26 million profit that year.

The post office was increasing the price of a stamp because it had to have more money. However, there were many sceptics who thought that perhaps the reason it was going to increase the first class postage rate was because it wanted to cross–subsidize and get into other businesses.

The post office started with a tremendous advantage as a crown corporation. It had a distribution network coast to coast. Imagine the situation, if you will, of someone being in the instant printing business, as has happened right here in Ottawa. They wake up one day, open their mail delivered to them through the post office, because of course the post office has a monopoly on the delivery of first class mail, and it is a survey from Canada

Post saying that it wants to be in a position to better serve its customers.

What is it going to do, folks? It is going to offer services such as typesetting, small run instant printing, the kinds of things that as one comes to the post office it would be kind of convenient to have right there. The trouble is the world does not need another instant printer. Instant printers are all over the place and they have, by and large, got themselves into business at their own expense.

Now they find themselves in a situation where they are competing directly with a crown corporation that has a monopoly on first class postage and can raise prices so it can compete with the private sector.

Another instance that has come to my attention concerning the post office has to do with it purchasing a courier company, I believe it was Purolator, and then going into competition with other people in the courier business. If the post office feels that it has the right, the purview and the privilege of going into competition with existing businesses, then should not existing businesses and other courier companies have the same right to go into competition with Canada Post? If Canada Post can compete with small business why then can business not compete with Canada Post?

It would be absolutely reasonable and fair that if Canada Post intends to continue down this path, it should find itself competing for the first class postage delivery.

If the post office finds itself in competition when delivering first class mail, what will happen? I bet the mail will be delivered faster. I bet it will be delivered on Saturday and I wager it will be delivered for less. Usually when there is competition the consumer benefits.

Now we have the reverse situation where a crown corporation with a monopoly on the delivery of first class mail is able to use the profit generated by the monopoly situation to cross–subsidize its ambit into other areas of business.

I submit to hon. members this is not right. It is not fair and it is counterproductive to the notion of free enterprise and privatization which is absolutely essential as our country moves down the path toward becoming self–sufficient and not becoming a sinkhole for taxpayers' money.

The third example I would like to raise is the question—this is part of the broader, more general intrusion of government into business—of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the practice of agents who work for Canada Mortgage and Housing to do appraisals on real estate in competition with the many competent people in private business who are licensed to provide that service.

Does this not have the potential for conflict of interest? An employee of Canada Mortgage and Housing is going out and doing an appraisal on a property that would be financed by Canada Mortgage and Housing. Is that not the same kind of one hand feeding the other dealsmanship that got us into a problem in some of the other financial institutions? Would it not be better if Canada Mortgage and Housing were required to have third party appraisals?

I suggest this kind of creeping intrusion of crown corporations into the sphere of private enterprise is not only counterproductive, but it is unhealthy for our economy because it does not bring in the discipline of the marketplace.

The last and final example I would like to bring to the attention of the House is that Bill C–52, at least according to the Canadian Association of Professional Engineers, would give the public service the mandate, the free rein, to set up in competition with professional engineers. As a matter of fact "the bill's loose wording gives complete power to bureaucrats. The sections read that the minister may incur expenditures or perform or have performed services or work in relation to any federal real property, or any other non–crown property with the consent of its owners".

As the government devolves from the sphere of private enterprise as we are wont and forced to do, in my opinion it would be a very good precedent for this Parliament to set to say that if private enterprise has the ability and the desire to compete in any sphere, then the government through a crown corporation or directly will not compete as a matter of principle.

I would ask that hon. members present give thought to these concerns and whenever the opportunity arises, to give private enterprise the advantage over public enterprise.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on Bill C–52 and to support the Reform Party's motion because it is an improvement on the bill tabled by the government.

Unfortunately, Bill C–52 lacks vision and backbone. This bill in no way improves the government's regulations. It is so bad that some clauses and provisions in this bill are regressive. It is going backwards—the Liberals and this government are going backwards.

This bill makes changes which are bad for private enterprise or do not improve openness or access to information. You know as well as I do that if there is a department where patronage, favoritism and unfairness are rampant, that is wasteful and contributes to the government's deficit, it is Public Works.

I admit, anyone who reviews Bill C–52 will know the impact it can have on the operation of the Department of Public Works and Government Services. Anyone can see how important it is to improve the operation of this department. It would have been easy for the minister to suggest changes to the acts governing these departments, Public Works and Government Services, for instance, to introduce as a code of ethics to regulate contracting out, which is increasing and almost out of control in the federal government.

The minister could also have given officials the power to disclose information, he could have empowered officials in his department and given them the chance to blow the whistle on mismanagement and government waste. Or the minister could have suggested amendments that would have given the public and members of this House better and easier access to information so that this department and this government avoid waste, thus reducing the deficit.

But no. This is a very lacklustre bill that contains nothing new and was introduced by a minister who seems near–sighted, and that is very worrisome. I wonder if this reflects the spirit of the government. The minister introduced a bill that does not improve in any way an old act containing provisions which hinder its efficiency. It is worrisome to have someone at the helm who is near–sighted.

As the Reform Party member mentioned earlier, the debate in committee on Bill C–52 was illogical, if not insane. We made very good suggestions to improve this legislation, but the Liberal members refused to listen, or else they were unable to grasp the underlying logic. Perhaps they have less brains than their own minister, who is already pretty blind. We got the distinct impression that they were only interested in having this legislation passed as quickly as possible, without any amendment.

They refused to let the committee hear witnesses on amendments to some clauses of the bill which have a very serious impact on the operations of the department, and which involve the right of the government to interfere in the private sector, particularly in the consulting–engineer sector.

This legislation is very poor; it contains nothing new and it reflects a total lack of imagination. This is why we will support the Reform Party motion, not because it is the best possible one. Paragraph (c) reads: "ensure that the Queen's Printer for Canada is operated efficiently and competently—", while paragraph (d) says: "ensure that the reduction of all costs remains a high priority—". These are pious wishes which carry no legal weight. Nevertheless, we are prepared to support this motion, although it has no real impact on the Department of Public Works.

However, paragraphs (a) and (b) are a definite improvement over the existing bill. In the case of (b), the Department of Public Works is encouraged to open the door to information, to reveal more information to the private sector or the general public on the way contracts are awarded, and to improve access to information, which is now extremely difficult to obtain. As I said before, it is an improvement. The department and the Liberal government must provide access to information, especially on the process of awarding contracts.

I think the Reform Party's motion is an improvement, but it is flawed because of the words: "where possible". There is no legal obligation on the government to disclose information if the motion is worded this way. My point is that the words "where possible" open the door to all kinds of abuse and arguments preventing access to information, preventing the government from disclosing information on contracts or even members of Parliament from having access to such information when contracts are awarded in their own riding. This is not satisfactory.

We run into the same problem in paragraph (a) of the motion, which deals with a matter that is even more serious, coming from the Department of Public Works. A Reform Party member already mentioned the problem about opening the door to competition between the federal government and the private sector. Paragraph (a) of motion No. 1 tries to prevent the government from competing with the private sector. But again, "where possible". These words open the door to all kinds of abuse. The fact is that basically, the Department of Public Works should not have the right to compete with the private sector.

We are talking about a substantial part of this bill. This is a new power the Minister of Public Works has acquired. It is very skilfully done, by the way, because clause 5 is already an introduction to this new power and clause 10 as well, and of course clause 16, which we will have a chance to discuss later on.

For the first time in the history of the Government of Canada, we have a proposal that the federal government should compete directly with private businesses, especially engineering firms which, incidentally, are well established in Quebec. Several members in this House, including Liberal members, I am sure, have received representations from SNC Lavalin, HBA, Tecsult, and more than 100 companies altogether that are concerned about the unfair competition in which the federal government is about to engage through Bill C–52. So although this Reform Party motion does not go far enough, we on the Bloc side still think it is a definite improvement over the bill as it stands.

In concluding, the Bloc will try to amend this good motion from the Reform Party. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Charlevoix:

That Motion No. 1, in paragraphs (a) and (b), be amended by deleting the words ", where possible,"

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The amendment is in order.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few comments on what has been said, and then I will highlight the key points with respect to this motion.

[English]

The first colleague who addressed this bill called it a routine bill, which it is. It is an important bill but a routine bill.

Members have complicated it. Either they have not understood it and therefore by virtue of that it has been complicated for them or they have understood it and by virtue of that they have tried to take advantage of it for political reasons.

We talk about not having been able to get witnesses. Of course we had witnesses but there comes a time when we have to stop meeting. Are we going to wait for the whole of Canada to come forward? We know that many of the witnesses had absolutely nothing to do, the witnesses they wanted, with clarifying the elements.

[Translation]

And the only reason was petty politics, an attempt to embarrass the government, pure and simple.

[English]

My colleague refers to backroom deals. What backroom deals? If he knows of a backroom deal put it on the table. He should not suggest that members of government have been dishonest. Either put up or be quiet. It is inappropriate behaviour for any member to be suggesting that someone else has been dishonest. Either he has proof or he does not. Do not slur the reputation of colleagues. That is not the way a parliamentarian is supposed to act.

He refers to the question of desire to compete. I have any number of quotes I can bring forward by reputable Canadian organizations, some of them from the province of Quebec, that indicate quite clearly that they do not see this as the government's intent to try to compete.

We are trying to get the best deal when we are dealing with other governments for Canadians. That is what we are trying to do. We are trying to respond to the private sector if it asks us to respond to assist it. I would be delighted to share some of those in the process of this particular debate.

The second speaker referred to Canada Post and CMHC, I guess the point being that government is becoming increasingly involved with the private sector. I hope it was not suggested that Canada Post and CMHC are somehow involved with this legislation. I want to make it perfectly clear they are not. I would dispute the claims being made with respect to government competing with the private sector in those instances as well.

I want to point out very quickly that one of the weaknesses of the particular motion, and it has been addressed in part, is where possible what would happen if this were to go through?

• (1645)

The opposition would always say it was possible and we did not do it. All of us thought we would be debating in the House of Commons the interpretation of where possible is. On that very basis it has to be set aside.

[Translation]

As I said earlier, I do not wish to accuse all the members of the Bloc of engaging in petty politics. But the one who just spoke made accusations of patronage, without any proof, of favouritism, without proof, and waste; also without proof. It is very easy to make such accusations in the House of Commons and not back them up. This is unfortunate, most unfortunate.

He said that the minister lacks vision. This is insulting! Because he does not understand the bill, he blames the minister. Because the bill has limited scope, he accuses the minister of lacking vision. This is too bad. He says that the Liberal members are deaf and blind. How insulting to those people who are so afflicted! That is what he said, Mr. Speaker. Now, I suppose he will deny it. In the House of Commons, he can say anything he wants, without proof. He likes to hear himself speak. How very unfortunate!

To top off everything he has done and said, he criticized the motion and then went on to say that he will support it. What a contradiction!

[English]

I simply wanted to mention that I have been very patient in this first round. Not all of the comments have been terribly relevant but in the second round I shall try to make awfully certain that I bring to members' collective attention any comments that are off topic.

I have a few more comments to make and I shall be brief. I know that my colleagues are anxious to get on to other palpitating clauses and motions as I am. With regard to the motion that was made, the amendments proposed by my colleague from Elk Island are already addressed in clause 7(1)(a) as amended by the committee.

I want to read that clause and make awfully sure that I do not mislead anyone. Clause 7 has already been amended at committee and the words "and for enhancing the integrity and efficiency and the contrasting process" were added to the clause.

With respect to competition, one of the issues, we have already addressed this at great length in committee and we will be talking about it some more. This is the debate. This is it. We are in disagreement.

[Translation]

We are not in agreement. That is fine, no problem. Do you want me to produce my 1,000 witnesses? You will produce a thousand more, and then we will decide who makes the most sense. Well, I think that sometimes you have to pause and start afresh.

[English]

On public disclosure, members know as well as I that the minister has offered to the members of this House the open bidding system, the government business opportunities publication. He has provided guidelines for advertising and public research by the government.

This minister and this government have been open and transparent. Those members have not been able to get the figures when they wanted them in terms of what they wanted even though those have not been available, and so they choose to attack the government and pretend that it was less than up front.

With regard to the Queen's Printer we want what the member wants but we want it for all of the government's operations, that is, being efficient and cost effective. The Queen's Printer has had a long and proud history providing government and advancing the printing industry. When there was a problem in that sector, the minister moved forward boldly and corrected the situation.

With respect to efficiency and savings they suggest 4,000 people, a billion dollars saved by the year 2005. I guess when you say that you really do not care very much about the 4,000 families that are going to be affected or you do not understand how much a billion dollars is—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I hesitate to interrupt any member at any time but occasionally the Chair tries to remind all of us to come through the Chair and not be direct to one another across the floor of the House. I ask the member to keep that in mind.

• (1650)

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the reminder. My enthusiasm is a result of being upset at my colleague being so unfair and having exaggerated so much. In the spirit of Christmas I thought there would have been some gentleness.

[Translation]

I thought there would have been a little kindness, a little open–mindedness, but obviously they are not yet aware of the approaching festive season.

[English]

I think I have made the major points. The way it is worded, as I have indicated, the debate would be whenever it is possible. We simply cannot do this. We believe it has already been covered. We believe this government has been open and transparent and we believe we are going forward in the right direction.

I will limit my remarks at this time. I assure my colleagues that I am ready for a lot more.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before proceeding on the debate of Motion No. 1, it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: The hon. member for Saint John—Rail Line Abandonment; the hon. member for Quebec—Social Program Reform; the hon. member for Manicouagan—Canada Labour Code; the hon. member for Vegreville—the Canadian Wheat Board; the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden—Banks.

Resuming debate on Motion No. 1, keep in mind that members who have already spoken must wait until we proceed to the next motion. Members have 10–minute interventions without questions or comments.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I am sure you will correct me if I am wrong, but do I not have an opportunity now to speak since there has been an amendment to my motion?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I thank the member for Elk Island. He has learned very quickly. He is ahead of me. I do not mind telling the member that yes there has been an amendment and he can speak again.

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I have some statements which are relevant to the amendment. I do not know if you noticed, but I think I was very close to being on topic speaking about the four points of my amendment one by one. I was very careful to do that.

I would like to say a few things partially in rebuttal to the hon. member from the Liberal Party who just spoke. He indicated how patient he has been. I suppose if we were to blow up our chests a little those of us on the other side would say that we too have tried to exercise patience in trying to work together and I shall continue to do that. It is not my objective here to merely fight for the sake of fighting. I want to do what is right and what is best for the Canadian people.

The member said that there was a time to a stop in these discussions. I think the record ought to show that we probably discussed Bill C–52 in committee for 10 hours maximum. That is my estimate. We heard one witness. That is my recollection of it. I stand to be corrected if that is wrong.

Second, the member made some statement about backroom deals. I did not accuse anybody about backroom deals. I said the perception out there among the people is that governments engage in backroom deals. Because the Liberal government has said it wants more openness and honesty and integrity, and Reformers are also saying this, surely we can agree that we will do away with any reality of that which may have occurred in the past. Let me be really charitable in the spirit of Christmas and say it happened before the Liberals were elected, some of them, at least to the government side.

We need to do away with not only the reality of it but the perception of it. The only way to guarantee that the perception is removed is by actually putting into legislation that there is this openness.

With respect to the amendment to my motion that says "where possible", I do not know how to say this in such a way that it does not come out wrong. I am going to try very hard to do that. The only reason that we inserted these two words in sections (a) and (b) was the government side. Observing the way discussions went in our committee and recognizing that if we were to come with an amendment which would be very hard and which would say the minister must engage or make sure, refrain from engaging in activities and so on, we were quite certain that the Liberal side would have just said nix to it. We softened it deliberately for them, to give them an opportunity to vote for this so that the minister has greater flexibility. That is why the words are there, to say "where possible".

I know the hon. member from the Bloc is most sincere and actually made an amendment to my motion to remove those words which would have been my first choice. I know they do not have a chance of getting it passed. Instead of not going anywhere, I would like to at least move the government a little in the right direction, and that is why we said "where possible'. That is my comment with respect to the amendment that has been made.

In the spirit of Christmas, if I may quote the hon. member for St. Boniface, in the spirit of gentleness let us get together on this and let us vote in favour of the motion but let us leave those words in so that the Liberals can feel comfortable voting for it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Resuming debate on the amendment to Motion No. 1.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Asselin (Charlevoix, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I support the amendment to the amendment to Motion No. 1 moved by the hon. member for Québec–Est, to delete the words "where possible" and here is why.

First, Bill C–52 provides the government with the opportunity to amalgamate Public Works Canada, Supply and Services Canada and the Translation Service. It appears to us that, in the context of a bill, "where possible" is little more than idle talk, as the hon. member for Québec–Est indicated. Such words also leave room for interpretation and favouritism.

At the same time, we could expect —I hope it will not be the case under this government as it was under the previous one— that this will encourage the granting of contracts to friends of the regime and leave the door wide open for lobbyists. It is only natural for lobbyists who attend luncheons at $1,000 a plate organized by the federal government to be tempted to come and knock on the doors of Liberal members to get contracts. It has been done before the Liberals came to power and I would hope that, in a spirit of openness and transparency, the member will not object to seeing things change.

Quoting the red book, the Liberal government talked about transparency during the campaign. There have been several books and papers since, of course. We have gone from red book to green paper, from green to purple, from purple to orange, from orange to grey and we certainly hope that all these will not result in a black paper.

So, in a spirit of transparency and goodwill in administering public assets, you, the Liberal government, hold a majority of seats. If ridicule kills, that is why the Conservative government no longer exists. And if you continue to be wasteful with respect to contracting–out and privatization, your days are numbered, gentlemen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Order! As I said a moment ago, you are encouraged not to address one another directly across the floor, but rather through the Chair. It may be more useful someday.

Mr. Asselin: Mr. Speaker, you scared me. I was sure you were about to say that one day I, the member for Charlevoix, might occupy the Speaker's chair.

• (1700)

In close co–operation, the member for Québec–Est, the member for Laurentides, when she was parliamentary critic for public works and governmental affairs, and myself have shown that the Bloc Quebecois was very serious when we were hearing testimony. We took the time to listen to the witnesses and asked appropriate questions.

In closing, I hope to be able to speak, if time permits, on clause 16 of this bill, which allows the government to compete with private engineering firms.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The question is on the amendment of the hon. member for Québec–Est. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 76, a recorded division on the amendment stands deferred.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 2 and 3 will be grouped for debate but voted on as follows: an affirmative vote on Motion No. 2 obviates the necessity of the question being put on Motion No. 3. On the other hand, a negative vote on Motion No. 2 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 3.

[English]

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C–52, in Clause 16, be amended by replacing lines 39 to 45, on page 5, and line 1, on page 6, with the following:

"16. The Minister may do any thing for or on behalf of

(a) any department, board or agency of the Government of Canada or Crown corporation, or

(b) with the approval of the Governor in Council, any government, body or person in Canada or elsewhere that requests the Minister to do that thing, where the Minister is authorized to do that thing under this".

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C–52 be amended by deleting Clause 16.

[English]

Mrs. Chamberlain: Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have the opportunity to put forward an amendment to clause 16. With this amendment, the requirement for governor in council approval under clause 16(b) is being proposed. This will allay some of the concerns that the members in our particular task group on government operations had. I hope they are going to support this amendment.

Concerns have been expressed by some members of the private sector also. For example, the Association of Consulting Engineers of Canada, which represents 14 per cent of the consulting engineering community, has expressed reservations about 16(b) opening the door for public works and government services to compete with the private sector.

I want to be very clear on this point. The bill does not permit the department to compete with the private sector. It cannot even respond to requests for proposals. That is very clear in this.

• (1705)

The authorities contained in clause 16 are not new. They are contained in section 13 of the current Department of Supply and Services Act. This section enables the department to; first, work with the other levels of government to reduce overlap and duplication; second, to partner with the private sector when requested. The introduction of a requirement for an order in council, as I propose, guarantees a higher level of authority and accountability. It will ensure that the department only partners or engages in reduction of duplication with provinces with the direction from the cabinet. We cannot get a greater safeguard than that. This is pure accountability.

Currently PWGSC has over 120 active bilateral initiatives for areas of discussion with provinces and territories in services ranging from translation, bulk purchasing and co–operative procurement practices, real property management and shared accommodation. These are aimed at reducing overlap and duplication. Hence, savings for taxpayers. This is something that we promised to do. It is something we all promised to do. Every single party in the Chamber promised savings for taxpayers.

If other levels of government approach PWGSC with a view to co–operating in the provision of cost–effective services related to any of its 21 service lines, the department should be and must be in a position to consider such requests in the interest of the taxpayer. This is consistent with the government's election commitment to work closely with provincial governments to reduce duplication and improve service delivery in all areas where governments are involved.

Mr. Speaker, if you think you have heard that quote before, well you have. You will find it in the red book at page 23. We cannot forget that there is only one taxpayer in Canada. We have a responsibility to work co–operatively to ensure the most efficient and cost effective delivery of services possible for Canadian tax dollars.

This is what clause 16 guarantees to all of us as Canadian taxpayers. Clause 16 of Bill C–52 assists in fostering the spirit of co–operation and partnership between the government and the private sector. This is especially important for the small and medium sized businesses that are currently requesting partnerships with the government.

As we stated in the red book, the crucial role of the government is to work with the private sector to identify strategic opportunities for the future and then to redirect its existing resources toward the fulfilment of these opportunities; again, a quote from the red book, page 44.

We are moving on our campaign goals and our promises. The government is committed to working with the private sector to identify strategic opportunities and to redirect our existing resources toward the fulfilment of all these opportunities when requested.

The opportunities clause 16 offers for partnerships with the PWGSC, businesses, particularly small and medium sized businesses, can lever the federal government, use its experience and expertise to create and expand new markets, particularly foreign markets and to create jobs. Private sector jobs, is this not what we are all about? Is this not why we are here today?

This Liberal government recognizes that when Canadian businesses prosper abroad Canadians prosper at home. The government has heard the concerns of the private sector, including the Association of Consulting Engineers of Canada. It rightly feels that it should not have to compete with government. At the same time it supports public–private partnership as long as it is industry led.

I quote the association's president who appeared before us in committee. He said he is "not against private–public partnerships where the private sector is in the lead role and not the other way around".

PWGSC has received many letters indicating support for industry led government partnership initiatives including letters from members of the Association of Consulting Engineers of Canada. I have many quotes from letters that we have received in support of Bill C–52.

• (1710)

The government recognizes that no legitimate purpose would be served by allowing the department to compete with the private sector. I would not support that. In fact, when there has been actual or perceived competition with the private sector, the Minister of Public Works and Government Services has moved swiftly to rectify the situation.

For example, he took action to address the concerns of the printing industry with the Canada Communication Group. With clause 16, Bill C–52 moves the government down a path of reducing the tax burden for Canadians while assisting business in partnership, on request. The proposed amendment put forward ensures greater accountability in this process. For these reasons I encourage all members of the House to support this amendment.

To do less is not doing what our taxpayers want us to do. They want us to reduce duplication. They want us to see where we can help firms in public practices when requested. When we can with tax dollars help them, they want us to do that. To do any less is irresponsible. I call on all members to support this amendment.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Paul Marchand (Québec–Est, BQ): Mr. Speaker, once again, government members confuse and mislead the public with their arguments that do not hold water. For instance, they say that the president of the association of consulting engineers of Canada agrees with this motion. I can tell you that I was on the phone with him this morning, as I have been repeatedly these past few weeks, and he keeps telling me that he is against this motion and this clause in Bill C–52.

I want to tell the government that the association has demonstrated its opposition by issuing countless press releases stating that the government is not listening, that "The government is not listening, it is encroaching on our markets". The association, which is concentrated in Quebec, represents 800 consulting engineering firms whose 35,000 members question this bill.

The government member would have us believe that the government is creating jobs. This is pure nonsense. What this clause does is threaten high–quality jobs that have evolved over several years, perhaps mostly in Quebec, jobs that are not created overnight. What is at stake here is top expertise that our consulting engineering firms have demonstrated around the world. It is mainly this sector which is being targeted.

The government cannot mislead the population by saying, as my colleague did earlier, that it does not intend to compete with the private sector.

The minister himself said in a letter that "in response to your question, the primary purpose of Bill C–52 is"—imagine that—"to authorize Public Works and Government Services Canada to provide common services to the departments, boards and agencies of the Canadian government". Clause 16 increases this power by allowing the minister to provide common services, similar to those offered by federal Crown corporations, to other governments and to the private sector in Canada and abroad.

A few paragraphs further, the minister goes on to say: "Clause 16 is not intended to make the Department of Public Works and Government Services into a fierce competitor of the private sector". Certainly not a fierce competitor, but a competitor nonetheless under the monstrous guise of trying to compete and reduce this government's deficit through economies of scale.

Let me give you an example. What is proposed is that the government would provide all the supplies, as well as all other goods and services, not only to itself but maybe also to the provinces, the territories and the municipalities across the country. This is a concentration of purchases. If we had a warped mind like some government members, we might think that there are economies of scale or savings to be made. But we know very well that this is not the case. This would only create a monster like the former U.S.S.R. That country enjoyed a government monopoly and had economies of scale in every sector. But look at what happened to the U.S.S.R.: it no longer exists.

The basic problem is that the government does not understand that the public and private sectors each have a specific role to play. When you mix the two together, particularly if the federal government starts to compete with the private sector, the whole system becomes skewed, because the federal government can hide all sorts of costs. It can change numbers to make it look as though a particular item or service costs less or money is saved here or there. In this way, the government can compete with certain companies and put them out of business, while favouring friends of the party. This is wonderful—

Mr. Asselin: This is what you call progressive federalism.

Mr. Marchand: Precisely. In Quebec, we want to avoid this at all costs, because clause 16 shows a blatant lack of understanding on the part of this government. It seems that the government does not even understand the strongest tendencies in the economy and in modern politics. The government should not go for concentration and centralization. Centralizing all federal, provincial, municipal and other purchases and sales in the country will not result in savings.

Such a move goes against the most elementary and basic rules of economy. This government proposes a bill, clause 16 in particular, which goes against basic economic rules. This is why the government and the people of Quebec are anxious to leave a regime which is headed the wrong way, as confirmed unequivocally by clause 16.

Despite all the representations made by the private sector and all the issues raised with members and the Minister of Public Works, there seems to have been no realization that perhaps this clause should have been deleted or even the previous legislation reinstated.

The consulting engineering sector suggested it preferred the previous act, because Bill C–52 which we are considering today gives the minister additional powers, powers that did not exist before. It is the only really new element in this bill. The rest is not new, just a bunch of provisions that have been revamped. However, this new element is almost an insult to the intelligence of people who understand the workings of our economy. It is a threat to an industrial sector that is thriving and highly specialized, and it opens the door to unfair competition and, once again, to even more patronage.

Clause 16 certainly does not encourage people who are the slightest bit familiar with the operation of the Department of Public Works to support this provision. In fact, Mr. Speaker, suggestions by the government that perhaps these overtures to the private sector should be made in consultation with the business community would actually make no difference at all.

This clause gives the government complete latitude to operate on the turf of the private sector, where it has no business to be, because, I repeat, this opens the door to patronage and is a threat to industries that, over the years, have developed an expertise that is appreciated and an expertise they want to maintain. The government has no business in this sector. And that is why we in the Bloc are opposed to this clause and to the government's amendment.

[English]

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am a little frustrated in getting up here. This amendment comes from the Liberal side. I know the way things work around here with the majority over there and the less than majority over here that it will pass and what we say probably will not.

I will not miss this opportunity to go on record as powerfully and as strongly as I can to say that this is not the answer to the problems we have in this country, specifically on this one issue.

When I first saw this amendment I thought of a television show I watched for about 10 minutes one day. This lady was put into a box; the box was closed; the magician sawed her right in half. It was incredible. Her body was cut in two. Then he opened the box and she was fine again, there was no severance. That is what this particular amendment does. It gives the illusion of accomplishing something but really nothing is accomplished at all.

It is important for us in considering what we are talking about to really know what this motion says. Originally it said the minister may do anything for or on behalf of any department, board, or agency of the Government of Canada or a crown corporation or any government body or person in Canada or elsewhere.

It was mentioned earlier here that this was already in the previous act, the one this bill replaces. Not quite right. The two words "or elsewhere" were added. In other words the ability of the government to perform these functions now goes even outside of our country according to what it first proposed.

We now have this amendment. It still has exactly the same words except the one little word "a" has been taken out. Other than that the words are all there. The only difference is that for the minister to do anything for or on behalf of any government body or person in Canada or elsewhere, he or she must now obtain the approval of cabinet. In other words there is no restriction at all on whether or not government can still do anything for anybody.

The other day I was giving a little speech to a few people. I said the rough paraphrase of clause 16 of Bill C–52 was simply that the minister may do anything for anyone and the taxpayers pick up the bill. It was then said to me that that was not quite fair and that I was overstating it. Yet, it is very difficult to read anything else into this when it says that the minister may do anything for or on behalf of, and then everything listed includes anybody because finally it gets down to that every entity is either a government, a government agency, a body, or a person. There is no exclusion.

I would also like to make reference to a quotation. It is from a letter written by no other than the minister himself. These are his words: "I have already decided that Public Works and Government Services Canada will not be competing with the private sector by offering services outside the federal government". That quotation is from a letter signed by the Minister of Public Works and Government Services.

I am at a loss to understand if that is his intention why he would hesitate for a second to state that in the legislation. The legislation says one thing and the minister says exactly the opposite. He is trying to assure us and the critics of this bill that we ought not to worry because it is not his intention to do this. Yet the bill clearly says that the government may do it. I do not see where the logic lies there; it misses me completely and I think it would miss anybody who stopped to think about it.

We have had a number of very strong presentations on the intrusion of government into private enterprise. I have a whole stack of them here. I know I cannot refer to them so I will not, Mr. Speaker, but they are here. Most of them are from small business firms and notably among them are consulting engineers. I will not quote it but I remember one of them said that this legislation cuts right to the very core of small engineering firms whose lifeblood is bidding on and providing services for provinces and municipalities.

This legislation now says that the taxpayer is going to be subsidizing the competition because government agencies are also going to be bidding. That introduces such a large unfairness into the free enterprise process.

I would also like to read a statement from a very well–known organization which does things along the lines of analysing our economic problems and difficulties and solutions to those problems. This is that organization's assessment of this bill, not mine: "It is clear that if the implication of the bill is that the federal government intends in any way to engage in the undertaking of work for private purposes in competition with contractors in the private sector, this would be entirely wrong and the bill ought to specifically preclude the federal government from doing this".

There are other references. As I said I have many of them here from individuals, groups and businesses. They all give the message that the government should not be in the business of competing with private enterprise, period. Why it is in this legislation at all is a total mystery to me.

Now there is an amendment that clause 16 ought to be amended by dividing the two parts. One part says to let the minister go ahead, but in the other part he has to get a nod from the other cabinet ministers, behind closed doors, no openness, no accountability and no restriction on what he can do for anyone anywhere on planet earth.

I object. On behalf of all of those people who wrote to me and my colleagues, I object. I object on behalf of all of those small businesses, those engineering firms, the printers, the small newspapers who wrote. They said they do not like having government taxation subsidy driving them out of business. For all of them I say as strongly as I can, please, members of this House, reconsider this. Do not pass this legislation and then regret it later because I know you will.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): There is one minute, if the parliamentary secretary wishes, or I could see the clock as 5.30 p.m.

Mr. Duhamel: Mr. Speaker, I am not losing my place in the order of speaking.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The member will have an opportunity to speak when the matter comes back to the House.

CRIMINAL CODE

The House resumed from December 8 consideration of the motion that Bill C–226, an act to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to order made Thursday, December 8, 1994, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred division on the motion of Mr. Nunziata at second reading stage of Bill C–226, an act to amend the Criminal Code.

Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you would find unanimous consent that the House proceed first with the vote on Bill C–51, then proceed with the other votes on government business, and Bill C–226 and Motion No. 257 would be the last items to be voted on this afternoon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House has heard the suggestion of the chief government whip that I call the vote on Bill C–51 and at the very end we come back to Bill C–226 and Motion No. 257. I would start with Bill C–51, the Canada Grain Act. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL ASSESSMENT ACT

The House resumed from December 12 consideration of the motion that Bill C–56, an act to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act, be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred recorded division on the motion for third reading of Bill C–56.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I think you would find unanimous consent that the members who have voted on the previous vote be recorded as having voted on the vote now before the House in the following manner, Liberal MPs voting yes, along with the member for Beauce.

[Translation]

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois members are opposed to this motion.

[English]

Mr. Silye: The Reform Party members today vote nay, except for those who wish to vote otherwise.

Mr. Solomon: Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party members in the House today vote yes on this motion.

Mrs. Wayne: Mr. Speaker, as party whip for the PC Party, the members of the PC Party tonight will vote in favour.

Mr. Bhaduria: Mr. Speaker, I will be voting with the government.

IMMIGRATION ACT

The House resumed from December 12 consideration of Bill C-44, an act to amend the Immigration Act and the Citizenship Act and to make a consequential amendment to the Customs Act, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 45, the House will now proceed to the deferred recorded division on the motion at report stage of Bill C-44.

The first question is on Motion No. 1.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent to apply the results of the last vote to this one, as follows: the Liberal members vote no.

• (1805)

Mr. Duceppe: Mr. Speaker, the members of the Bloc Quebecois support this motion.

Mr. Silye: Mr. Speaker, the Reform Party members vote nay, except for those who wish to vote otherwise.

Mr. Solomon: Mr. Speaker, the New Democratic Party members who are here vote in favour of the motion.

Mrs. Wayne: Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out to you that the name of the riding is Saint John and not St. John's as you said a little earlier. The members of the Conservative Party will vote against the motion.

Mr. Bernier (Beauce): I vote yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Bhaduria: Mr. Speaker, I will be voting with the government.

(The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare Motions No. 1 lost. Consequently, Motions Nos. 3, 4, 5, 6, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 18, 19 and 23 are also lost.

The next question is on Motion No. 13, standing in the name of the hon. member for Bourassa.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent to apply the results of the vote on the previous motion to this motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 141.]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare the motion lost.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent to apply the results of the vote in the same way to Motions Nos. 14, 15, 16 and 17.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to vote against Motion No. 14.

The Acting Speaker: The next question is on Motion No. 14.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

CRIMINAL CODE

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C-226, an act to amend the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to a committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House will now proceed to the taking of the recorded division on the motion that Bill C-226 be read a second time.

As is the custom, the vote will be taken row by row, beginning with the mover, and moving on to those in favour of the motion who are on the same side of the House as the mover.

Those in favour of the motion and seated on the other side of the House will be called on next. Those who oppose the motion will then be asked to vote in the same order.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare the motion carried.

(Bill read the second time and referred to a committee.)

RECOGNITION OF THE PATRIOTES OF LOWER CANADA AND THE REFORMERS OF UPPER CANADA

The House resumed from December 9 consideration of the motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to the order made on Friday, December 9, 1994, the House will now proceed to the taking of the recorded deferred division on the motion, as amended, by the hon. member for Verchères under Private Members' Business.

As is customary we will proceed with the recorded division row by row, as we did for the previous division.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare the motion carried.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

(Motion agreed to.)

Mr. Serré: Mr. Speaker, I would like the record to show that I was present during the vote, but that I deliberately abstained from voting.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It being 6.40 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

COMMUNICATIONS SECURITY ESTABLISHMENT

The House resumed from November 15 consideration of the motion and of the amendment.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have an opportunity to rise and speak on this motion of the member for Scarborough—Rouge River to deal with an issue which I am sure does not capture the hearts and minds of a whole lot of people.

I had the opportunity to work on a parliamentary committee in the previous government. We were responsible for a five–year review of CSIS. This motion really emanates from the lack of courage as I would put it of the previous government to deal with this issue of oversight over agencies that can collect data and information on individual Canadians.

In that sense I welcome the opportunity to be here this evening and talk about the proposal that would see the Communications Security Establishment, CSE, fall within the oversight provisions of SIRC, the Security Intelligence Review Committee.

This recommendation really flows from our committee recommendation which was unanimously adopted by all parties in the previous Parliament. I congratulate the member for Scarborough—Rouge River for keeping the issue in front of Parliament and in front of Canadians and bringing forward a motion that I hope all members of the House will see their way clear to support.

The effects of the motion quite frankly would see that CSE would fall under oversight. People will ask what is oversight and what does it mean. It is a protection for individual Canadians and it is really Parliament overseeing agencies that can collect data and information and even conversations of individual Canadians as they go about their daily lives.

I think the issue was put quite nicely by the Library of Parliament in its paper on CSE. I would like to read one section of it because it does put the issues fairly succinctly. I am quoting page 14:

> Ward Alcock told the House of Commons subcommittee on national security in June 1993 that CSE is a foreign intelligence collection agency. The very nature of its work depends upon a degree of secrecy. To the extent to which it works is not secret, it loses its capacity to function and to collect information that is of use and value to the Government of Canada.
> This statement puts the key issue into its most basic terms: how can a government institution that functions most effectively in the shadows be held publicly accountable without compromising its efficacy? This question is especially important when it relates to an agency with the capacity to violate the rights and freedoms of Canadians.

The opinion that was given by the Library of Parliament was also buttressed by a well known author, Richard Cleroux, who recently wrote a book, "Official Secrets", a look at the spy agencies and other agencies that were involved in collecting data on Canadians and to protect Canadians from untoward activities by foreign governments and foreign agencies.

While I hate to read a rather lengthy quote, I think Mr. Cleroux in his book captures the spirit of what is involved and what this motion is trying to do. I quote pages 77 and 78:

> The CSE, which is considered the only government agency more secret than CSIS, employs more than 1,700 people, and uses highly sophisticated radio and telecommunications equipment to listen in simultaneously to thousands of embassy, ship and airline telephone and telecommunications transmissions and voice conversations across Canada and around the world.
> The CSE functions as a funnel. Everything that is telecommunications in Canada is sucked into it. It needs no judicial warrants because it is part of the military, not part of CSIS.

• (1845)

Later on the same page:

> Most of the information picked up by CSE is in the form of electronic data rather than voice conversation. Ninety–nine per cent is shipped wholesale, without ever being analysed here, to the U.S. National Security Agency in Fort Meade, Virginia. The Americans in turn tell the Canadians what they think the Canadians should know.

That is a very clear and concise statement of what is happening with CSE as noted by the author Mr. Cleroux. It points to why we need some oversight, be it parliamentary or otherwise.

This motion says it should be SIRC that carries out that particular function.

We had the privilege of having Stuart Farson advise us and do research for us as we looked at the five–year review of CSIS. He was concerned that CSE was without any parliamentary oversight and that the question of Canadian rights being possibly trampled was very important. In effect he made recommendations to us as a committee that we should look at including CSE in the oversight function.

As we look at what some of the authors have to say, both Mr. Cleroux and Stuart Farson in his paper "Canadian Security Intelligence in the Eighties", it becomes clear that we have a number of agencies. CSE is well–known and clearly defined, being discussed in Parliament and elsewhere. There are also other agencies within the RCMP and other departments of government that have no oversight. That circumstance only exists in Canada. The United States Congress has an oversight committee as well as do other countries in the world.

It is important that we protect Canadian rights. We can still protect secrecy. It is the beauty of the circumstance with the Security Intelligence Review Committee that only those things that should be made public are in fact made public. It is an independent committee of independent people who are the eyes and ears of Parliament.

I go further and support the member for Scarborough—Rouge River in his efforts to have some parliamentary oversight. While there is some duplication, in the long run it is beneficial that we have that oversight in order to protect the rights of Canadians. When one thinks somebody could be listening into a telephone conversation or the electric transmission on a fax machine without having a warrant, something is fundamentally wrong with the circumstance. It requires parliamentary or in this case SIRC oversight. That is what the motion will hopefully accomplish.

I would refer members to our report on CSIS and recommendation 87. It says:

> The Committee recommends that Parliament 1) formally establish the CSE by statute—> and 2) establish SIRC as the body responsible for monitoring, reviewing and reporting to Parliament on the activities of the CSE concerning its compliance with the laws of Canada.

This is not the case presently.

As it says in the write–up:

> The Committee sees no reason in principle, however, why the security and intelligence arms of the Department of National Defence should not be reviewed by SIRC.

Personally I support the position. I voted in favour of it when the committee looked at it and I support it now. All Canadians need to be protected. These are important rights that should not be easily trampled on. We do not need some big funnel in the sky scooping up all of the information and transporting it to the United States for analysis.

I would recommend the motion to all members of this House.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, let me first of all commend the member for Scarborough—Rouge River for his concern for making the debate on the CSE more transparent than the answers given during Question Period by the minister responsible, the Minister of National Defence.

Indeed, the member who also chairs the sub–committee on national security, has moved: "That, in the opinion of this House, the government should amend the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act to authorize the Security Intelligence Review Committee to review the operations of the Communications Security Establishment (CSE)".

As you can see, this augurs much better than the minister's various statements on the subject. This motion is based on a principle which the Bloc Quebecois has stated many times: the ability to account to our taxpayers for the activities of federal institutions, including the Communications Security Establishment.

If this motion is adopted and implemented by the Liberal government, the Communications Security Establishment will be accountable to the Security Intelligence Review Committee, better known as SIRC. It is estimated that the CSE spends between $200 and $300 million a year without being held accountable for it. It is also estimated that the CSE employs between 800 and 1,000 employees, but other sources put the number as high as 1,850.

However, it is impossible to obtain confirmation of these figures at this time. Furthermore, recent allegations from a former spy who worked in the CSE for several years indicate that agents used electronic eavesdropping to intercept the telephone calls of Quebec politicians. When questioned on this subject, however, the Minister of National Defence hides behind the sacrosanct national interest and refuses to answer.

The motion of the member for Scarborough—Rouge River does not set a world precedent, far from it. The Australian Security Intelligence Organization, MI–6, the Government Communications Headquarters in Great Britain, and the CIA in the United States are already monitored in their respective countries by an outside committee, which operates in a way similar to what is proposed in Motion M–38.

Belgium and some countries which belonged to the former Warsaw Pact are now considering the possibility of doing exactly what the member for Scarborough—Rouge River is proposing for Canada. Unfortunately, our Minister of National Defence tells us that it is not in the national interest to reveal the operational methods or the administrative standards which apply to the CSE's activities, and I refer to an article in Le Devoir of October 25, 1994.

Where is the respect for democracy when the minister, always in the so–called national interest, refuses to tell us how many people work for the Communications Security Establishment? After all, the Agence France Presse reported, on November 8, 1994, that the British defence minister was downsizing the secret service, and that about 100 of the 6,000 positions related to these operations at the Government Communications Headquarters would be eliminated.

The British can evaluate how their secret service is managed, as well as appreciate the fact that it is affected by the budgetary cuts announced by their government. They also know how many employees work for that service, and they are informed of the cuts affecting this organization responsible for analysis of so–called sensitive information, or intelligence.

This is where democratic transparency starts. By now, you will have guessed that I am in favour of having an external body monitor CSE's operations, as proposed in the motion now before us.

However, I have some reservations regarding the Security Intelligence Review Committee. First, I wish to point out to the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River that the current membership of that committee, SIRC, must be reviewed. Indeed, the members of the committee were essentially appointed on the recommendations of the main political parties in the previous Parliament. These appointments were made on the basis of recommendations by the Liberals, the Conservatives and the New Democrats.

• (1855)

I agree with my Bloc Quebecois colleagues who feel that some SIRC members no longer have a legitimate right to sit on the committee, since their presence does not reflect the will of Canadians, as expressed during the last federal election. Indeed, these members essentially represent political parties which were democratically rejected by voters.

The membership of this committee should take into account the wishes of Canadians, and it should reflect the political reality of this Parliament. It is time members of SIRC did the honourable thing and promptly resigned so that Parliament could then appoint new members to represent them on this committee.

I should add that in the near future we will have to take steps to take politics out of the process of appointing members to this committee. Furthermore, the legislation governing SIRC should concentrate on reviewing certain mechanisms that raise a number of questions. For instance, does the process of reporting to Parliament really give members a chance to establish that the rights and freedoms of Canadians and Quebecers have been respected? Should this mechanism be more transparent? Should SIRC be allowed to submit its annual report uncensored to the Speaker of the House?

Under section 54 of the CSIS Act, SIRC is also required to submit to the Solicitor General, on a regular basis, special reports concerning specific events. Should we provide that the nature and subject of these regular reports be routinely communicated to the House?

Section 30 of the CSIS Act defines the functions of an inspector general, which include monitoring compliance with operational policies and reviewing the operational activities of CSIS. Before including the CSE in this legislation, we should consider the relevance and effectiveness of having both an inspector general and the SIRC for monitoring purposes. Is this duplication that could be avoided?

Should the mandate of the director of the CSE be seven years, like his counterpart at CSIS? Or should tenure be during pleasure? Should SIRC have access to cabinet documents which are not legally accessible at the present time? And finally, should a member of the Auditor General's office audit CSE's accounts and report his findings to this House?

Many questions remain to be answered. I think that in the public interest, the government should answer them as soon as possible to prevent further erosion of the public's trust in federal institutions.

In concluding, I seriously hope that the government will react favourably to the motion presented by its member for Scarborough—Rouge River and that it will give careful consideration to my questions and recommendations.

[English]

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to have the opportunity to contribute to debate on motion M–38 introduced by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

It is also a pleasure to support this motion. It is not only timely but essential to accountability. It is essential to amend the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act to authorize the Security Intelligence Review Committee to review the operations of the Communications Security Establishment, or CSE.

This motion brings to light concerns expressed as early as 1990 in the book Spy Wars and more recently in the new book Spyworld written by Michael Frost, a former CSE employee, where it is alleged that this organization routinely snoops on law–abiding citizens. It compiles dossiers on everything and everybody from Margaret Trudeau to Quebec separatists. It is open season on any unsuspecting Canadian citizen.

CSE is a unique entity in government. It normally comes under the jurisdiction of the Minister of National Defence as its budget is hidden in the communications budget of the military. However, in reality it is a separate entity that receives its operational tasking from the deputy clerk for security and intelligence of the Privy Council. The political tasking comes from the cabinet committee on security and intelligence.

• (1900)

As we witnessed as a result of recent questioning in the House, the mandate of the CSE is questionable. There is no political accountability except to a group of cabinet ministers which is the most secret cabinet committee of government. Here we have an agency with a budget of hundreds of millions of dollars listening to overseas phone calls and accountable to no one person. This is not ham radio and catching the BBC Sunday night opera. This is serious business. It requires serious attention.

We are told all this snooping is done to protect national security. Well the Diefenbunker is no longer a secret and we are about to mothball some CF–18s. There is no obvious external threat, so why so much resistance from the government to outside scrutiny?

While I am no big fan of SIRC, it is as good as anything we have for this purpose. SIRC has managed to keep an eye on our spies without exposing them to danger. We can work on the patronage elements of SIRC at a different occasion.

Why not let SIRC have a review capacity in CSE? Why should CSE be above the law? Why should its budget, mandate and methods not be scrutinized? The operative question is: Does CSE spy on Canadians? The Deputy Prime Minister says it has no mandate to do so, but the Deputy Prime Minister recently refused to answer direct questions regarding if in fact it had.

In September 1990 a report entitled: "In Flux But Not in Crisis" was tabled. This report was the work of a special parliamentary committee on the review of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act. On page 153 it reported: "This organization clearly has the capacity to invade the privacy of Canadians in a variety of ways. It was established by order in council, not by statute and to all intents and purposes is unaccountable."

The passage goes on: "While the committee understands that this agency must be shrouded in secrecy to some degree, it believes that Canadians should be in a position to understand what the organization does and should not have to wonder whether their rights and freedoms have been infringed. The committee has evidence that both the RCMP and CSIS have asked the CSE for assistance and as such the committee believes that the Communications Security Establishment should have a statutory mandate that provides for review".

My congratulations to a member of that special committee, the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River, the member responsible for the motion before us today. He at least recognizes the gravity of the previous passage I just read from the report.

The Minister of National Defence unfortunately believes there is already sufficient review. To me, he is another of those do nothing, say nothing, status quo ministers who would rather stonewall than change. Things are just fine the way they are because they do not impact on his personal and private life.

The fact is this minister really does not have control of the CSE. What he controls is financial and administrative matters. The chief of the CSE reports to the Clerk of the Privy Council for policy and operations. This is not what I consider a fully constituted part of DND like the minister says it is.

The minister need only take a look at the government's response to the "In Flux But Not in Crisis" report entitled: "On Course: National Security for the 1990s" to see what it has to say about control of CSE and what is and what is not a fully constituted part of the Department of National Defence. The Prime Minister and the Privy Council Office are the real power and the issue. The Minister of National Defence is the filler in the sandwich.

I am not as naive as to believe that Canada does not need to intercept communications for intelligence purposes. It is part of the electronic information highway. There has to be some form of review and accountability, otherwise abuses can take place.

As the book Spyworld states: "Employees of the CSE routinely listened to the conversations of Canadians as they tuned and tested their equipment". I also believe there is nothing wrong with sweeping offices or encrypting phones. This is normal in today's age but I want to know what the CSE is doing besides this. I want to know that it is not abusing its powers. An external review agency seems the only way we can lift this veil of uncertainty, assure accountability and free the CSE from suspicion. That does not sound like such a bad thing to me.

I understand that the CSE is good at what it does. Let us make it even better. Let us support this motion for the good of all Canadians.

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise to support the motion of the member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

Let me begin by first making an observation about the Canadian Security Intelligence Service. We recognize that the role of CSIS is one of counterespionage and counterterrorism in Canada. Its role is to ensure that foreign governments do not have an improper influence on the lives of Canadians in the sense that it would compromise Canada's security.

That is a very important function in Canada because we are a multicultural society. We value very greatly immigration from all lands. We value our tremendous ethnic and cultural diversity. The fear is that this ethnic melting pot, as it were, may be influenced by some of the foreign nations from which immigrants come and the traditional ethnic hatreds that some countries have.

To that end CSIS protects our interests by doing intelligence work in the ethnic communities in Canada in order to prevent terrorists or foreign governments getting a hold. In doing that we as Canadians have to be concerned that while CSIS fills that very important function that it does not go too far and that the rights of Canadian citizens are protected, including ethnic Canadians.

To cover off that problem we have built into the CSIS act a very excellent control, the Security and Intelligence Review Committee. It is basically a committee of Canadians of conscience who are appointed. They have sweeping powers to doublecheck what CSIS does to make sure that while it does operate in secrecy it operates in a way that has the interests of all Canadians at heart.

Now we come to the Communications Security Establishment. This organization springs from the second world war and Canada's involvement in code and cipher breaking. It is well known what it does now. It is an agency whose role is to intercept communications and to process them. Its direction is toward the collection of foreign intelligence.

I should say it has quite an interesting history. It arose from an organization called the examination unit and specialized in the second world war in breaking Vichy French codes and some Japanese and then went on to break the codes of the free French.

Indeed we will find when the book is written on the subject that the Communications Security Establishment during the early part of the cold war undoubtedly specialized in analysing the diplomatic codes and ciphers of France. I think we will find that this was one of the reasons for the vive le Quebec libre speech of Charles de Gaulle. I think he was very annoyed to discover that Canada had France as a target.

There is nothing unusual in that as all nations monitor the telecommunications of other nations, be they friends or enemies. It is a way of determining whether contracts are kept, if governments are interfering in the diplomatic and commercial affairs of one's own nation.

This type of study takes two shapes. It is code and cipher breaking where you actually attempt to break the codes and ciphers of another nation, be they diplomatic or commercial ciphers. It also takes the form of traffic analysis. When you cannot break the codes and ciphers of another nation you examine where messages are being sent and the volume of messages. That gives an indication of what that country is doing in terms of its diplomatic or commercial activities.

Over the last 15 years code and cipher breaking has lessened in importance in the field of communications intelligence, primarily because code and ciphers have become increasingly hard to break. More than that, it is because communications satellites particularly have enabled governments to monitor the affairs of other nations in a much more efficient manner than could be done hitherto.

I believe the collapse of the Soviet Union had much to do with the fact that satellites were monitoring its lack of economic progress more than with any other cause. The Soviet Union could not hide from the satellites that trains were not running, that there was pollution everywhere and that the Soviet Union was in an economic mess. It worked the other way as well. The Soviet Union was monitoring Canada and the United States and the western world. It could see that it was losing the economic war.

In the world of intelligence the agency that looks after domestic counterespionage and the foreign intelligence gathering agency like the Communications Security Establishment are complementary. They always work together. In the case of foreign and diplomatic intelligence it is important for CSIS to monitor what is happening to foreign nationals on Canadian soil who may be engaged in espionage. The parallel activity is the Communications Security Establishment which monitors the actual traffic in diplomatic and commercial communications. These things always go together.

There is the same situation in Canada with its ethnic makeup. While we have CSIS looking after anti-terrorism shall we say, it inevitably has to probe into the affairs and activities of various ethnic communities in Canada. Similarly the CSE has to be in tune with what may be happening in terms of communications, whatever it can derive either from telecommunications or other communications sources what is happening to the nations that may not have Canada's interests at heart or may be attempting to influence ethnic communities in Canada. The two are complementary and very necessarily so.

This type of activity overlaps in subtle ways. I would like to go back for a second to World War II and tell a very brief story which illustrates this point. It was a great triumph for Canadians during World War II and was not reported very well at all.

In 1940 in North Africa the British were facing the Italians in great numbers. Britain had very few troops on the ground in Egypt and the Italians had an enormous army in the western desert. Britain had its back to the wall with the fall of France and was very fearful with Italian entry into the war about what would happen in North Africa.

The Canadian army intelligence had the advantage of being able to monitor the telegraph lines that left Canada from Newfoundland and Nova Scotia and went to Britain, the Canary Islands, Spain and ultimately to Italy. Telegraph traffic coming out of the United States had to pass momentarily through Canada before it went on to Italy.

• (1915)

Even before Mussolini declared war on the allies after the fall of France, or as France fell, Canadians were monitoring the traffic of Italian Americans communicating with relatives in Italy. Mussolini, in an attempt to raise money to buy weapons, had asked Italian Americans to remit U.S. dollars to Italy so relatives would be paid a bonus in lira in Italy. Italian Americans were constantly sending remittances to their relatives in Italy. This was just before the Italians declared war and just after.

Canadians were monitoring all this. As the banks in the United States required that the remittances give names and addresses, it was found that many remittances were being sent to Italians in the military. They were being sent to the actual bases where the Italian military personnel were located. This enabled Canadians to construct the entire Italian order of battle before Mussolini declared war. Wavell, the famous British general who defeated the Italians in the western desert, knew exactly where every division or every unit in the Italian army was in the desert.

We can see how in the intelligence field, communications intelligence, foreign intelligence gathering can be mixed with something that is essentially a domestic phenomenon. In this case it is out of country; it is the Italians but it is a communications phenomenon.

I told the story for the basic reason that we should have a situation in the intelligence world where one arm of secret intelligence gathering, which is CSIS, is responsible and answerable to some review committee which, shall we say, has an oversight role. We cannot have half a loaf; we need the entire loaf. I submit that no matter how competent the Communications Security Establishment inevitably there is some overlap. Both arms of secret intelligence should make this independent review, and for that reason I entirely support the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me as well to speak on the motion put forth by the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River and the amendment of the hon. member for Bellechasse.

The motion per se is to amend the Canadian Security Intelligence Act to authorize the Security Intelligence Review Committee to review the activities of the Communications Security Establishment. As for the amendment, it is designed to force the review committee to table each year before this House a report on the activities of the CSE.

First of all, I would like to say that I agree entirely with the motion with amendment, as I think it is essential for the elected representatives to retain a minimum of control on agencies and institutions related to the world of espionage and intelligence that CSIS, the CSE and the SIRC are.

It also appears necessary, in the light of recent events, to remind the individuals who are part of such organizations that their duty is first and foremost to serve the public and that we have been elected to represent the public.

Concerns expressed by members from both sides of this House are born out by disconcerting revelations concerning alleged unlawful activities of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service and the Communications Security Establishment.

How does a country that prides itself on being one of the most democratic in the world explain having agencies that account for their activities only when and to whom they please? One can also wonder what the current Liberal government is doing to give a feeling of security and restore confidence to all Canadians, but Quebecers in particular, who may have been targeted more often than they should by unlawful investigations.

Why did the government not react when it found out that serious allegations had been made and that the relevant standing committee of this House had been unable to obtain satisfactory answers? Why did a private member have to take the initiative? How will this be perceived by the public?

• (1920)

Although the member's initiative is eminently positive, we have a right to wonder what kind of image this passive government is sending to the population whose suspicions and concerns are quite justified.

There is no doubt that the Security Intelligence Review Committee is essential to ensure at least a minimum of accountability on the part of CSIS and eventually the CSE.

Only yesterday, we learned from a Canadian Press article published in La Presse that CSIS may have overstepped its mandate and inadvertently revealed secrets in trying to fight industrial espionage. The national agency may have collected with complete impunity information having nothing to do with any threat to national security.

It is certainly not the first time, and probably not the last, that such a thing has occurred. In this case, the review committee produced in 1993 a secret report that was obtained under the Access to Information Act. This should not be seen as a model of openness but it is an acceptable minimum. Unfortunately, this acceptable minimum does not currently apply to the CSE which, as we have seen recently, enjoys an unusual level of freedom.

The Deputy Prime Minister said loud and clear in this House that the CSE's mandate was not to spy on Canadians. But no one was fooled, especially since the question that was put to her did not deal with the CSE's mandate but with its actual operations. In fact, the CSE has no mandate defined in legislation and is accountable only to the Privy Council. Clearly, it is not in the Privy Council's interest to make the CSE's blunders public, which makes it a very poor watchdog, we must admit.

The motion being debated today would considerably improve the situation, since it would make the CSE subject to monitoring by SIRC. Unfortunately, I must express some reservations about SIRC's effectiveness. I am thinking, for example, of SIRC's serious credibility problems, which are due to the fact that it is now made up of people who have not understood that they are answerable to Parliament and to the public, and who hide behind a narrow interpretation of some legal provisions to justify their silence.

The testimony given by members of SIRC before the House Committee on National Security on September 13 was a disgrace and Canadians and Quebecers were certainly not well served. At least four of these individuals, whose sense of ethics seems to be quite underdeveloped, were appointed by the previous government, which, need we remind you, was rejected by the voters in the most summary fashion. We are entitled to question the legitimacy of these well–known Conservatives who sit on SIRC.

That is why I join my colleagues in the Bloc Quebecois to demand the immediate resignation of these individuals, and I urge the Liberal government to act on this.

A significant renewal of SIRC's staff would reflect the new make–up of this House and bring new blood to an organization which really needs it.

Hopefully, with a minimum of four new members, the Security Intelligence Review Committee could regain some of its lost credibility. These changes are essential, but they are still cosmetic.

Only this government, through the Solicitor General, can make the required changes to the legislation on the Security Intelligence Review Committee.

We can have motions to force the SIRC chairman to provide real answers to parliamentarians, instead of just saying "maybe" or "maybe not", but he will not do so as long as the government does not make significant changes to the act establishing the SIRC.

Although the Official Opposition can only agree with the underlying principle of this legislation, it questions the process for appointing SIRC members, as well as the ambiguous relations of that committee with Parliament.

In conclusion, the issue debated today was in fact the relation of confidence between Canadians and their institutions. When they were in opposition, the Liberals kept asking for greater transparency, as well as better control by Parliament over spy agencies.

The Communications Security Establishment spends over $250 million annually.

What does it do with that money? How does it spend it and for what purposes? We hope that the proposed motion will shed some light on CSE's operations. However, we are very aware that it is up to the federal government to ensure greater transparency regarding intelligence activity in Canada. Unfortunately, this government seems totally paralysed over this issue, as with several other strategic issues.

I want to congratulate the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River, and the hon. member for Bellechasse for their initiative which, I hope, will be supported by the government and approved by the majority of members in this House.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think we should bear in mind several aspects of the world situation, in other words, the geopolitical, strategic situation of Canada. As a nation with a population of 30 million and a member of the G–7, as a country with a fairly important position in the world, we have to consider not only Canadian industry but also the security of this country today and in the next century.

It would perhaps be useful, in a discussion about the Communications Security Establishment, better known as the CSE, to consider briefly Canada's foreign intelligence activities and the role of the CSE in this respect. First of all, I would like to explain what is meant by foreign intelligence. The term foreign intelligence refers to information on the resources, intentions and activities of foreign states, moral entities or individuals as they concern Canada's defence or the conduct of Canada's international affairs.

This may include information of a political, economic, military or scientific nature or indeed information related to the country's national security. We should also realize that, unlike many of its allies, Canada has no active foreign intelligence service. However, like most countries, Canada has set up a number of limited mechanisms for collecting and analysing information from other countries.

Earlier I mentioned the political context. Since the demise of the Soviet Union and the Eastern Bloc, there has been an increasing sense of instability. This is no longer the world we used to know, where we had the Communists on one side, and the free world on the other, and when we knew who our enemies were. The world has changed considerably since the fall of the Berlin wall in 1989.

I think that today we live in a world that is far more insecure, unstable and uncertain—when we look, for instance, at Eastern Europe—a world where there is a certain lack of cohesion. We have all these small republics, the conflict between Russia and Chechenya, the dissolution of Yugoslavia and the problems of reconstruction in Eastern Europe. There are very real threats, not only locally, but internationally.

We no longer have the kind of control over nuclear arms that we had at one time, and unfortunately, this uncertainty has caused some nations to cast envious looks at Canada and the West. That is why Canada is not necessarily immune to the changes that have been taking place during the past five years, and especially as a result of the events and disruptions in Eastern Europe. That is, as you know, the political reality we are all faced with.

• (1930)

There are economic challenges as well. More and more, a number of countries, some of which we may have thought of as friends, are showing a great deal of interest in Canadian industries. I would say that, these past few years, allegations of industrial spying in the pharmaceutical industry have been increasing. In Quebec, there have been blatant cases of Quebec interests being targeted. They were spied on because they had knowledge and technologies that some of our allies, who will remain nameless, wanted for themselves. It makes us realize that we have knowledge that the whole world is interested in having. Why not use it?

The same with the airspace industry. Many countries have shown an interest for Canadian companies such as Bombardier and de Havilland. I also hear that we have companies specialized in high technology and biotechnology. There is no doubt that an increasing number of foreign countries are interested.

So, we are not immune to change, nor to other countries wanting to obtain information from Canada unlawfully, if not illegally.

I think that Canada has prospered because of the security we enjoy in this country, good understanding and economic and political stability between provinces, co–operation between the industry and the Government of Canada. But this security must be maintained and that is why I think that a communications security establishment meets that need not only to look after our interests, but also to ensure that military changes or upheaval outside Canada do interfere with scientific and technological progress on the home front.

There is no question that the world we live in is not an easy one. Personally, I would rather live an a world where there would be no CSE, no CIA, no M–5, no KGB, and no foreign interest.

I believe some people, and this is often the case for the Bloc, have concerns, whether they are founded or not, about the existence of the CSE and other such organizations we have known in the past. But we have a role, an obligation to protect our industries. That is why the CSE is more interested in helping protect Canadian industries trying to develop in an increasingly competitive world.

There is Eastern Europe and then, there are emerging Asian countries. Again, there is interest in the new Canadian technologies, the aluminum and paper industries in particular, where Canada has held on to a certain tradition of supremacy. In an increasingly competitive international environment, we need an intelligence service like the CSE to make sure that information stays in Canada and that such countries do not disrupt the operation of our businesses.

Canada is also a multicultural country. More and more of our people come from other countries.

• (1935)

Since Canada is a welcoming country, we have people coming from various countries in Latin America, Asia, Central and Eastern Europe. Sometimes, people return to Canada and settle here to destabilize the country.

There are even well–known and not so well–known ethnic groups facing internal conflicts that have unfortunate repercussions at the national level.

I think that my time is up, but I would like to say, in conclusion, that we need an intelligence service like the CSE, whose main concern is protecting Canadians in the international community and, unfortunately, because of the geopolitical realities prevailing here as the century draws to a close.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Before I give the floor to the hon. member for Saanich—Gulf Islands, being as we are getting close to a period of recess, I wonder if there might be unanimous consent to allow the member for Saanich—Gulf Islands, instead of taking five minutes now and having the remaining five minutes of his ten minute maximum to be taken up at the third hour debate at another time when we return, if the House would give unanimous consent to allow the member to make his intervention complete. At that time we would go to the late show. The member would have five minutes and we would go with no later than ten minutes from the time he would start. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Jack Frazer (Saanich—Gulf Islands, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in speaking to Motion M–38 today, I am convinced that important Canadian issues are involved. That there are problems with the Communications Security Establishment, CSE, is emphasized by the fact that the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River who chairs the subcommittee on national security feels obliged to call for the government to authorize a regular ongoing review of CSE operations.

Concerns over the mandate of CSE and other Canadian intelligence agencies have been reported in the media, and the release of Spyworld has caused indignation in many quarters.

CSE is not directly accountable to the public purse, to Parliament or to any other independent body. The 1990 review by the special committee of the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act acknowledged that it is now time to examine the wider dimensions of Canadian security and intelligence community and to impose statutory mandates and review mechanisms where necessary.

However, government took no action. Ten years ago Parliament passed legislation holding CSIS operations accountable to an independent body, the Security Intelligence Review Committee, SIRC, which is made up of five political appointees.

SIRC would not rank anywhere near being the best check and balance on the operations of CSIS but it is certainly better than having no review or accountability mechanism. To paraphrase an old saying, if halitosis is better than no breath at all then SIRC is better than no supervision at all.

Thus, while SIRC may not be the best answer, one wonders why the review committee did not also invoke the same requirement for CSE operations. Therefore, Motion M–38 is timely and important.

When the special committee called for a regular review of security and intelligence agencies it also recommended that this agency should have statutory mandate to provide for review and monitor mechanisms. At the time government was considering providing the Minister of National Defence with additional capacity for review of the CSE. To this day government has dragged its heels and has failed to initiate the means for review. It has failed to hold the agency accountable to an independent body for its expenditures or even direct legislation to protect private citizens from the prospect of CSE intruding into and invading our privacy.

There is cause for great concern. Today high tech, computerized world is much different from that which prevailed at the time of CSE's inception during the second world war. It was then set up to intercept signals and break enemy codes, referred to as ciphers and codes.

Today CSE is responsible for communications or information technology security, COMSEC or INFOSEC, and signals intelligence, SIGINT. It sounds not unlike Goldfinger in James Bond or Captain Kirk in "Star Trek"or "Star Wars" all rolled into one.

• (1940)

Unquestionably there is a need to know the state of the art so that CSE can ensure federal government telecommunications or electronic data processing systems are known to be secure.

It must ensure that government personnel are given security training or education and that Canadian industry has access to appropriate security advice, although this aspect might better be left in the hands of the private sector.

The darker side, of which little is known, is that CSE monitors the communications of foreign countries to provide intelligence to government. It listens in on radio and telephone communications between embassies and home countries or consulates. It follows all national and international telephone calls. It records foreign radio communications and reads electromagnetic transmissions from embassy typewriters, processors, and so on.

We understand that 80 per cent of its operational budget is directed to the signals intercept program for communications intelligence which uses radio waves or radar to spy and protect national security; for example, telemetry intelligence, interception of signals relaying information from sensors on board a test vehicle to test engineers, revealing the vehicle's flight and performance characteristics.

Parliament has no statutes or laws to direct the CSE because it was established by order in council, by a cabinet directive. Thus one can speculate on the obvious CSE operations but only the depth of our imagination limits the breadth of its capability and potential involvement. By and large it seems that CSE is accountable to no one. It has virtual carte blanche to write its own terms and exercise full discretionary powers.

Little is known of its operations and even less about how it spends the public's funds it is given. During House of Commons debate hon. members have quoted from the Globe and Mail that expenditures in the order of $100 million to $125 million were budgeted for 1991. Another hon. member ventured to guess that $250 million would be a conservative estimate. Who knows how much is spent, how it is spent or why it is spent—perhaps some cabinet ministers, but certainly no independent regulatory agency exercising control.

When one considers Canada's massive deficit–debt it becomes obvious that government has an obligation to seek ways to trim fat, ensure accountability and avoid duplication of efforts. This motion provides government with an excellent opportunity to do just that.

Two special joint committees of this Parliament have only recently concluded reviews of Canadian foreign policy and defence policy. As a result Canada's role in foreign affairs and our military will be adjusted to better reflect today's needs. It would be logical to follow with a review of Canada's security and intelligence agencies. There has been no such review since their inception in the 1940s and operational control has become lax because their accountability is not adequately enforced.

Obviously a certain amount of secrecy and restricted knowledge of activities is required for CSE. Everyone understands that an intelligence agency cannot adequately perform its duties unless it is to some extent clothed in a veil of secrecy. However, there must still be a mechanism to ensure that activity control limits are in place and enforced and that the taxpayer's dollar is being appropriately and efficiently employed in service to Canada and Canadians.

In 1975 an order in council transferred responsibility for CSE from the National Research Council to the Department of National Defence, but only administrative responsibility was transferred, not its mandate, powers, control or accountability. Thus, I strongly endorse Motion M–38 calling for the government to amend the Canadian Security Intelligence Service Act to authorize the Security Intelligence Review Committee to review CSE's operation and budget.

Government could and should go even further by transferring CSE from the Department of National Defence to CSIS. Such action would make CSE subject to the same control and accountability that CSIS now is.

There is urgency required in implementing some statutory directive because of CSE's capacity to invade and intrude into our privacy. Southam News has already reported that the Privy Council Office has asked the RCMP's legal branch to examine legislation that would make it easier for police to intercept digital or computer communications.

• (1945)

In the United States similar laws are under study and the Digital Telephony and Communications Privacy Improvement Act giving telecommunications companies funds to develop software technology allowing full access to telecommunication systems has been debated in the U.S. Congress.

If enacted, this U.S. law would permit monitoring of a wide range of personal data. Are we in Canada also to have our own big brother tracking our every move? Electronic eavesdropping is surreptitious, easily used, and has the capacity to intrude into our most private lives with no search warrants required.

Despite the minister's assurance that CSE has no mandate to spy on Canadians, we do not know what its mandate is. Without checks and balances CSE has no limits to its operations and can be used against anyone without their having any knowledge that it is happening. To have the legal ability to so infringe on our right to privacy is simply unacceptable.

In conclusion, while I have concerns about SIRC being as responsive and appropriate a monitoring agency as I would like, it is certainly better than having no monitoring agency at all. Perhaps an improvement in answer to this dilemma would be for the monitoring agency, for both CSIS and SIRC, to be constituted as a separate cell under the aegis of the Auditor General who reports to Parliament. Unless there is some technical reason why this cannot be, it would seem to provide the arm's length monitor required to do the job without political bias or interference.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired, but I want to put on record that by unanimous consent we extended the time of debate on Motion No. 38 by an extra five minutes so that the next time the motion is before the House there will be 55 minutes left of debate.

Pursuant to Standing Order 93, the order is dropped to the bottom of the order of precedence on the Order Paper.

RAIL LINE ABANDONMENT

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker, on November 2, I asked the Prime Minister to ensure that Saint John, New Brunswick, was given a dayliner after VIA's final run through Saint John which takes place on December 15.

The Minister of Transport responded to my question by saying what he needs to hear are proposals that make sense and not what was being done by the former PC government, the party that I now represent.

I find irony in what the minister has said because what the minister has done to Saint John does not make any sense. A new train station was built just last year by the former government. The Liberal government closed it, took away the VIA service and offered a bus to take passengers to Moncton.

The former government built a new air traffic control tower in Saint John. The Liberal government has now closed it and has taken the air traffic controllers away. The decisions are a waste of taxpayers' dollars.

I understand the present fiscal constraints the government is facing. The government has decided to cut non–profitable operations. One of these operations was the VIA Atlantic train from Sherbrooke to Saint John, the first mainline ever to be abandoned.

In the Gaspé area the NTA recommended that the Gaspé rail line be abandoned, but the government of the day, the previous government, decided that the abandonment decision should be overturned because the loss of the rail service would negatively affect the quality of life in that region.

The same thing is happening in New Brunswick and in Saint John with this decision. The quality of life in my area is severely negatively affected with the removal of VIA passenger service.

Why did the hon. member's government not do the same for the eastern line as the PC government did with the Gaspé abandonment? Where is the rat pack that was there in the opposition? The minister of fisheries, the Deputy Prime Minister and others formed what was known as the rat pack. They fought hard with myself as mayor of the city of Saint John to make sure the people of Saint John had a rail service.

I cannot accept that the government has cut off the total passenger service to my riding and replaced it with a bus. In light of the savings to the federal treasury that the cut of the Atlantic service will provide, I do not feel that a dayliner would be cost excessive. Since we have a brand new railway station I feel we should get some use out of it and not waste the taxpayers' money that was spent on it. The government looks very irresponsible as does the commission for VIA when they close down a railway station that has just been built.

• (1950)

A dayliner service to Moncton would be more appropriate, given the state of highways in New Brunswick. As well it seems to me that a dayliner link if scheduled and priced properly could make money, given that the highest population density in the province resides in the area of Saint John. The decision by the minister to offer a bus instead of a dayliner is really an insult to the people of Saint John.

We were told by the previous government: "You use it or you lose it". The citizens have used it. It is a way of life for our people. There are many people who have no other way to travel except by that train.

The closure of the VIA Rail Atlantic will not save taxpayers much money and comes at a time when the Amtrak network is expanding in Maine. All these cuts and closures come at a time when in Europe and the U.S. they are building high speed and very efficient trains.

I am asking the government to ensure VIA service to Saint John by providing a dayliner to Moncton instead of a bus. In this time of giving I ask the government to give a little back to the citizens of Saint John that it has taken away.

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, owing to the impending sale of CP's operating assets between Sherbrooke and Saint John, there is no assurance of continued access for the Atlantic train. The member knows that VIA does not own tracks. It operates on running rights from CN and CP. Therefore with CP selling the assets there is no track available for VIA.

VIA will discontinue its Atlantic train over the CP route on December 17 and will increase train frequency to six round trips per week over the ocean route. VIA has done a first rate job in arranging for bus service between Saint John and Moncton to connect VIA passengers with the ocean service. This is the most economical way to provide connections within the VIA network.

In addition, the interline ticketing and tariff agreement VIA has made with SMT will provide for ease of ticketing and baggage handling. SMT will also be modifying schedules on its Fredericton to Newcastle route, providing a direct connection at Newcastle to the ocean for passengers from Fredericton.

It is evident that a connecting bus service is the less costly option by far. The annual cost of a dayliner service would be in the order of $1.2 million per year. The bus service is much less than that by half.

We have been asked why VIA's newly constructed station in Saint John will no longer be used. Perhaps the member should ask her former Conservative government. When the station was constructed CP was already negotiating the sale of the entire Sherbrooke to Saint John line. The member might want to respond on why her colleagues spent the money on the basis of speculation.

The commitment of Minister of Transport to Saint John and New Brunswick is unquestionable. His actions with respect to the CAA at Saint John, his action with respect to the port of Saint John and with respect to highways in Saint John and New Brunswick are sure testimony of the minister's commitment to good transportation systems in Saint John and New Brunswick.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, exactly eight days ago, I asked the Minister of Human Resources Development when he would table the five missing technical papers that were to clarify, if possible, the direction that his plan to reform social programs would take.

At that time, the minister answered that he thought the remaining documents would be made public in ten days. I want to tell the minister that he has only two days left to keep his promise, but that is not the main purpose of my statement today.

On this point, I first want to speak out against how the minister is proceeding. In a few days, the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development will complete a Canada–wide tour of consultations in which thousands of citizens will have participated. What a mockery has been made of the consultation process!

An incredible amount of energy has been mobilized but the people whom they said they wanted to consult were not provided with the proper information. They were consulted on an indefinite subject, but I suspect that the chosen direction has already been decided and they are being very careful to keep it from the public. All this remains to be confirmed, of course, but the confirmation should come soon.

In the House, on December 5, I also asked the minister to confirm that he had in fact gone blindly into a reform guided only by the cuts imposed by the finance minister. Instead of answering my question, the minister replied that I was completely ignorant, and said: "A large–scale national survey showed that 96 per cent of Canadians believe major changes have to be made in social policy. It may be that the hon. member does not understand but 96 per cent of Canadians are in favour of what we are doing".

The minister was quite right. I do not understand, but not necessarily what he thinks I do not understand. I cannot understand how a minister can interpret in such a shameful demagogic way the results of a poll. Here are the facts. The Decima poll, to which the minister was referring, revealed that 96 per cent of Canadians feel that the time has come to reform social security programs. Some 53 per cent support major changes, while 26 per cent are in favour of a comprehensive reform.

How can the minister distort the facts in such a way and accuse me of not understanding anything? This is a mystery which, I am sure, only the minister can penetrate.

Let me repeat again the results of that poll, just to make sure the minister understands: 96 per cent of Canadians feel that a reform of social programs is necessary. This is not at all the same as saying that 96 per cent of Canadians support the government's approach, far from it!

I also want to tell the minister something he surely knows already: Canadians do not agree at all with the proposal, as introduced by the government. The same poll indicated that 19 per cent of Quebecers strongly supported the idea of a two–tiered UI system, while 56 per cent somewhat agreed with it. This is a far cry from the 96 per cent degree of support of Quebecers that the minister claims.

Finally, I want to take this opportunity to remind the minister that women's groups, including the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, which alone represents over 80 groups, condemn the proposed changes to the UI system, because they feel these changes are discriminatory. Would the Minister of Human Resources Development go so far as to claim that all these women did not understand anything either?

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as of today the government has released four background papers: "Income Security for Children", "Persons with Disabilities","Child Care and Development " and "From Unemployment Insurance to Employment Insurance". The remaining four papers will be released in the next few days. I can assure the member there is still time for public debate and for the standing committee to analyse these papers as it prepares its final report early in the new year.

Social security reform is an ongoing process. We will continue to make information available to the public throughout the process. Let me emphasize again that our programs are outdated, costly, and no longer meet the needs of today's labour market.

As recent polls have shown, the Canadian people believe there are problems with our social programs and that changes are required: 96 per cent of the people believe there are at least some problems with social programs requiring either minor changes, 17 per cent; major changes, 53 per cent; or a complete overhaul, 26 per cent. Slightly fewer Canadians, 89 per cent, believe the UI system should be changed. The majority, 55 per cent, believe change is required because the system is antiquated, while one–third believe the expense associated with the program is the main reason the UI system should be changed. There is overwhelming support, 80 per cent, for our two–tier system of UI.

I am convinced the government has the support of the Canadian people as we work to reform an antiquated social security system. The release of the remaining technical papers in the next few days will further inform and allow us to make the important decisions required to ensure the survival of Canada's social security system.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

Mr. Bernard St–Laurent (Manicouagan, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak about the anti–scab bill and the minister's commitment to table such legislation, which was supposed to be done some time in December.

In March 1994, in my riding near Sept–Îles, at the QNS & L Company, 300 employees were in a legal strike position and were locked out. The strike or labour dispute was to go on for three months. As soon as the dispute started, the employer rushed to hire scabs.

• (2000)

So, as you can imagine, this led to violence and did not creative a climate conducive to bargaining with respect and dignity by the workers and the employer. The emphasis was on confrontation throughout the process, and there was no attempt to reach an agreement because scabs had been hired.

Last week, I travelled to Decatur, Illinois, with Ogilvie Mills workers belonging to the CSN, who joined fellow workers who are also on strike, sympathized a little, and tried to meet the head of the business in Decatur, where Ogilvie has its headquarters. To all intents and purposes, I have never seen anything like Decatur in my life, although I have witnessed many labour disputes. I was involved in the union movement for a while before being elected to the House of Commons, so I knew what to expect, but it was the first time I saw anything like that. Decatur could be called Dictature City or Scab City, as the people over there call it. It is the same thing.

If you want to work, all you have to do is show up at Decatur. ADM owners hire, on the spot, workers they then send to one of the many places where there is a labour dispute, to work as scabs, because at Decatur, it is normal to work as a scab. So, this creates a climate of incredible violence. Bargaining is the establishment of a power relationship between two groups and in turn, this power relationship creates respect, which ensures that everything will be done in a dignified manner. Then, once this is established, you can talk about a clean, decent labour contract. But as long as there is no anti–scab legislation in place, this cannot be achieved.

In front of the Ogilvie Mills workers here on Parliament Hill on September 19, the minister promised to amend the Canada Labour Code to ban strike–breaking. He was to bring in a bill making the required changes to the code. This sounded rather interesting. But more recently, on December 4 to be exact, the minister backed away, claiming that his department was preparing another bill, a bill on pay equity, which really has nothing to do with anti–scab legislation.

So, based on that, I wonder, and I repeat the question I asked earlier: how can the minister justify his about–face on the need to incorporate anti–scab amendments into the Canada Labour Code? How does he explain this about–face, as I asked him before, except as an act of obvious lack of political courage?

[English]

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, part I of the Canada Labour Code establishes the framework for industrial relations and regulates the conduct of collective bargaining in the federal private sector.

This jurisdiction covers the operations of enterprises which fall within the definition of federal work, undertaking or business and includes interprovincial and international rail, road and pipeline transportation, air transportation, shipping, longshoring, grain handling, telecommunications, broadcasting, banking and certain crown corporations.

As the Minister of Human Resources Development indicated on December 5 in responding to an inquiry raised by the hon. member for Manicouagan, part I of the Canada Labour Code, including the issue of replacement workers, is currently being reviewed with the view to modernizing and improving it so that it can better reflect today's realities. Creating a legislative framework which is free of barriers to co–operative labour management relationships also supports the initiative of the Minister of Industry in building a more innovative economy.

The minister has asked a senior assistant deputy minister to undertake the review process. This involves a consultative process with business, labour unions and other affected parties to seek their views. The views expressed during the consultative process will be carefully considered prior to introducing amendments to part I of the Canada Labour Code.

The hon. member for Manicouagan also made reference to a dispute involving Archer Daniels Midland Company, formerly Ogilvie Flour Mills, and the Syndicat national des employés des Minoteries Ogilvie Ltée.

The company and the union are currently negotiating the renewal of their collective agreement which expired on January 31, 1992, and which covers approximately 150 flour mill employees. When the parties were to conclude an agreement with the assistance of a conciliation officer appointed by the minister they were placed in a strike–lockout position. The union membership began a strike on June 6, 1994, following the rejection of a company offer on the previous day.

A federal mediator met with the parties in July and October of 1994 but little progress was made. Meanwhile the union filed a request with the minister for consent to file a complaint with the Canada Labour Relations Board alleging that the company had failed to bargain in good faith.

Ministerial consent was granted and the CLRB held a hearing on November 4, 1994, at which time the parties agreed to resume mediation meetings in an effort to settle their differences. The mediator met with the parties November 30 and December 1 and talks resumed today, December 13, 1994.

A federal mediator resumed meetings with the parties today and mediation talks are scheduled to continue December 14 and 15. It is encouraging that the parties are continuing to meet and I am advised some progress is being made. Both sides have been urged to take advantage of this opportunity to arrive at a settlement of their long and difficult dispute.

Mr. Leon E. Benoit (Vegreville, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 37(3) I rise to get a more detailed answer to questions I raised on December 5 and 6.

As a person who is concerned about the future of the Canadian Wheat Board I feel it is imperative to point out some of the activities of its government appointed commissioners during the advisory committee elections. I believe these activities point out problems with the board which could, if not immediately dealt with, lead to its demise over the next few years.

The real threat to the Canadian Wheat Board is not from outside but rather from within and result from its lack of accountability and its lack of willingness to change. The main issue to be dealt with is the complete lack of accountability of these appointed commissioners to western Canadian farmers.

This is a concern I have heard from farmers over the past several years. After all, farmers pay all of the operating costs of the Canadian Wheat Board out of their pockets. Why does it seem too much to ask for the commissioners that run the board to be directly accountable to farmers? The only way to ensure that the board of directors is accountable to farmers is by allowing farmers to elect them. There is no other way.

On Monday, December 5, I asked the minister of agriculture about the results of the Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee elections. I mentioned it was no surprise that less than 40 per cent of farmers eligible to vote turned out to elect these largely symbolic positions.

What was a surprise, however, was that leading up to the election, Lorne Hehn, the chief commissioner campaigned for a group of candidates that had a specific political agenda. In addition Richard Klassen wrote an "open letter to prairie wheat and barley growers". Their articles appeared in the Western Producer, Grainews, and many local papers.

Section 17(4) of the Canadian Wheat Board Act strictly prohibits these actions. It states: "It is the duty of the board to exercise direction and supervision over the administrative conduct of an election of members of the advisory committee". Therefore, the role of commissioners parallels that of Elections Canada in a federal election.

By promoting the point of view of one group of candidates the commissioners, I believe, violated the Wheat Board Act and the trust given to the people who hold these positions. On this basis I asked for the resignation of those who knowingly violated politically neutral positions.

In his response the agriculture minister said he would not ask for their resignations because he had no proof to justify these allegations. He also stated it was not unusual for a chief commissioner, from time to time, to defend the policies and practices of the wheat board.

The proof can be found in the chief commissioner's words and in the words of other commissioners. Not only did the chief commissioner openly offer his opinion in the November 17 issue of the Western Producer but he also stated that during the board's 60–year history it is entirely unusual for commissioners to defend the actions of the board.

Hehn states: "The events of recent weeks compel me to violate the long tradition of silence on controversial grain policy issues. I do so at the risk of being accused of meddling". Therefore, Mr. Hehn knowingly violated section 17(4) of the Canadian Wheat Board Act. This is a very serious offence and I am sure the chief commissioner was aware of the consequences.

Clearly, the politically neutral stance of the wheat board was violated by the chief commissioner and other commissioners. It is also clear that the actions of these individuals should be reviewed. Furthermore, it is clear to everyone that farmers must review and make decisions about how their marketing agency should be run.

I have three specific questions for the minister. With this evidence before him, will the minister acknowledge that the commissioners have violated the Canadian Wheat Board Act and the trust given to them? Will the minister ask for the resignation of all commissioners who campaigned during the period leading up to the advisory committee elections? Will the minister replace those political appointed commissioners with an elected board of directors? If yes, when? If not, why on earth not?

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Agriculture and Agri–food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that section 17(4) of the Canadian Wheat Board Act referred to by the member for Vegreville addresses the administrative requirements for an election of a Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee.

The recent speeches and articles by the Canadian Wheat Board commissioners are a response to producer requests for more information on the board and how it markets wheat and barley on behalf of the producers.

The Canadian Wheat Board commissioners did not campaign on behalf of any candidates. They were responding to those producers who want more information. It is only logical that the wheat board commissioners who are charged with the responsibility of marketing wheat and barley on behalf of the western Canadian producers would be in the best position to describe how they are fulfilling their responsibilities.

As the hon. member well knows, the debate on the issue of grain marketing has been ongoing. It was not initiated with the particular Canadian Wheat Board advisory committee election and it will not end with this election.

As we have stated on numerous occasions, producers need the opportunity to discuss the grain marketing issue in a logical, structured form with all the facts available to them. The producers will be provided with a forum to discuss and debate the issue over the coming months.

Any decision on how we market grains and oilseeds should be made in the context of where we want our grain industry to be in five to ten years from now. As a result, the federal government has initiated discussions with the industry to develop a longer term vision.

BANKS

Mr. John Solomon (Regina—Lumsden, NDP): Mr. Speaker, when inflation is high in Canada, bank profits are high. When inflation is low in Canada, bank profits are high. When the economy is in recession, bank profits are high. When the economy is in a growth mode, bank profits are high. When interest rates are high in this country, bank profits are high. When interest rates are low, bank profits are high. They are high in every circumstance when it comes to economic indicators.

The fact is that bank profits continue to be high in this country. In view of the fact that the chartered banks donated to the Liberal Party over $700,000 to the last campaign in Canada and the financial institutions as a whole donated over a million dollars to the Liberal Party slush fund in the last campaign, I am curious to know why the banks continue to get a free ride when it comes to contributing their fair share to building Canada.

In the last year alone the six major chartered banks in Canada reported profits of $4.3 billion. The chartered banks have an important role in our country's economy due largely to the regulations that are in place under the Bank Act. With the privilege of banking should come the responsibility of assisting in the development of our economy.

The Minister of Finance agrees that Canada's deficit is a serious problem. He, in consultation with the Minister of Human Resources Development, has made it clear that they will be making cuts and reductions to Canada's social security programs. Many Canadians have experienced the hardship of the recession and also faced cutbacks to their unemployment insurance coverage.

The Minister of Finance has made it clear that we will all be tightening our belts to help pay down Canada's debt. Meanwhile we have the banks in Canada that have made huge profits during hard economic times. They have made their profits on the backs of Canadians. It is money that is made on the spread of interest rates, financial transactions and on the government debt.

Another reason is bank service charges. Service charges are one of the fastest growth areas for banks. They allow the banks to continue making money in hard times and in good times.

I believe the government should ask the banks to justify their banking practices and their actions. As responsible corporate citizens the banks have a moral responsibility to pay their fair share of taxes and to reinvest their wealth in Canada and create jobs.

The Minister of Finance has a responsibility to regulate the banks and ensure that they participate in our country's economic recovery.

Bank customers receive interest rates of 2 per cent or 3 per cent on their savings accounts while being charged up to 11 per cent on their loans. The interest rate spread is wide and the banks are the winners on the spread.

After 127 years of Liberal and Conservative governments in Canada we are approaching $550 billion in debt. There has been no job creation as a result of this latest bank manoeuvre. The banks have made profit by cutting back on staff as a matter of fact. A year go the Royal Bank announced the need to slash 3,000 jobs from its payroll as well as another 1,100 jobs from its newly acquired Royal Trust, because of the recession its said.

Is the Royal Bank now willing to create 4,000 new jobs or is it going to continue to make profit at the expense of its former employees? The answer to that is not likely.

The Royal Bank in 1993 year end made profits of $324 million and paid absolutely no taxes. As a matter of fact, it received from the federal government and the revenue department $5 million in tax credits.

Two years ago the CIBC announced cutbacks of 2,500 jobs. In fact, 14,000 banking jobs have been eliminated in the past four years. Banks reasoned that cutbacks were necessary but now we see their profit margins. The banks lost money on bad real estate loans primarily over ambitious commercial projects in foreign countries. As well, they have lost money loaning money to other countries without providing the same equity backup and guarantees that individuals in Canada must provide.

I am asking in summary that the government provide leadership on this issue and ensure that the banks make a stronger contribution by paying their fair share of taxes back to this country and to institute a fair interest rate policy and to justify some of their monopolistic practices so that Canadians do benefit from banks when they make a profit.

Mr. David Walker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, over the past few weeks six major banks have reported their profits for the year ending October 31, 1994. The six largest banks reported profits of over $4.2 billion, a 47 per cent increase over last year. This has prompted some observers to ask whether the banks are paying their fair share of tax.

Banks do pay considerable amounts of tax. Banks pay income taxes and are subject to two federal capital taxes, the large corporations tax which applies to all corporations with more than $10 million of capital, and the financial institutions capital tax. This latter tax is paid annually at an average rate of 1.25 per cent of capital. This tax is designed as a minimum tax for banks and other large financial institutions.

Over the past five years the six largest banks and their mortgage subsidiaries paid on average $850 million per year in federal income and capital taxes. In 1991 and 1992 they paid around $1 billion per year in federal income and capital taxes.

Banks also paid income, capital, property and other taxes to provincial and municipal governments.

The hon. member is no doubt aware that further measures were introduced in the 1994 budget to ensure that banks and other financial institutions continue to pay their fair share of tax. These changes will improve the measurement of income on securities and loans held as part of their ordinary course of business.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Pursuant to Standing Order 38, the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24.

(The House adjourned at 8.19 p.m.)

STATEMENTS BY MEMBERS

VIA RAIL

Mrs. Elsie Wayne (Saint John, PC): Mr. Speaker,

'Twas the eve of Christmas recess,
And all through the House,
Not a member of the rat pack was stirring, not even a mouse.
The statements were chosen by the Speaker with care,
In hopes that all House members would be fair.
The MPs were nestled all snug in their seats,
In hopes of receiving some Christmas treats.
I rose from my chair to see what was near,
When, what to my wandering eyes should appear,
But the Minister of Transport with no VIA,
But eight tiny reindeer.
With a little driver, so young–like and slick,
I knew in a moment it must not be Saint Nick,
More rapid than a Challenger the cuts they came,
And he snorted and he stomped while shouting,
No train! No train!
But I heard the good people of Saint John exclaim,
Don't worry, Elsie, the PCers will return,
And we will have the VIA train once again.
Merry Christmas everyone.

CANADA

Mrs. Anna Terrana (Vancouver East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the holiday season is drawing near and I would like to extend to Canadians my very best wishes for a very happy holiday season.

[Translation]

Next year might bring the separation of Quebec, and this is why I would like to take this opportunity to tell Quebecers that Canada is a great country and that their presence in Confederation is extremely important because of the cultural dimension Quebec brings, and especially because of what the Quebec people mean to Canada.

I hope that next year will bring the welcome news that Canada will remain united and that this unity will not be challenged again.

[English]

Canada must remain united. Anglophones, francophones and allophones must all work together in a harmonious country as Canadians. We cannot erase years of history and camaraderie between provinces. Canada must keep its state of Confederation with its ten provinces and two territories. Our strength is in unity, not in separation.

Today we are also celebrating the 30th anniversary of the Canadian flag. May it continue to be our symbol of unity and harmony.

[Translation]

Happy New Year to all.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, after 10 successive weekly increases, the central bank rate set by the Bank of Canada went up 71 basis points yesterday. With this decision, the Bank of Canada will slow consumption and investment, and will paralyze the housing market, a sector crucial for the creation of jobs, especially at a time when the reduction of unemployment is a major concern of Canadians and Quebecers.

Unfortunately the employment crisis is not a priority in Ottawa. The government does not have the courage to seriously tackle government spending in order to reduce the deficit and the debt which are responsible for these pressures on interest rates. There is no job creation policy and the Bank of Canada is allowed to maintain an anti–inflationary monetary policy which undermines the economic recovery.

Meanwhile interest rates are going up and the unemployed remain without jobs.

SAINT–JEAN MILITARY COLLEGE

Mr. Bob Ringma (Nanaimo—Cowichan, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, a couple of months ago I watched in amazement as the government caved in to pressure from the Bloc and Parti Quebecois when it agreed to pay $34 million to Quebec for the 1993 referendum. The decision was based almost solely on the word of the most distrusted Prime Minister in Canadian history.

For the past month I have been even more amazed as the Bloc and its PQ allies try to force the renegotiation of a signed deal on the military college at Saint–Jean. This is not some vague verbal guarantee from a former politician; it is a signed agreement. The Bloc and PQ are being totally hypocritical in their demand. The government must not acquiesce to this absurd request.

The government has finally agreed to Reform's request that British Columbia be treated equally as regards Royal Roads. Let us hope that we have now seen the end of this charade.

CABLE RATES

Mr. Roger Gallaway (Sarnia—Lambton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as consumers many Canadians believe that their home cable rates are set by the CRTC.

Due to the complexities of the cable companies' sales vocabulary, the truth is that basic cable rates are controlled but that extended cable rates float at whatever the local supplier demands. Certainly I am not opposed to open market pricing if the market is truly open.

Let me invite all present or who are watching today to call their local cable companies to request the basic cable service as defined by the CRTC and not extended cable service as defined by their local cable companies. Next, try to find another cable carrier in your neighbourhood to give a competing bid.

After you have realized that the marketplace limits that type of competition, get out your chequebook because you are about to pay for six new channels that have been authorized by the CRTC. This is an open market with no choice. Pay up or look for the rabbit ears.

AIR INDIA FLIGHT 182

Ms. Colleen Beaumier (Brampton, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, during this Christmas season my thoughts are with the families and friends of those who perished in the tragic bombing of the Air India flight 182 on June 23, 1985.

This will be the 10th Christmas since that tragic day on which 329 passengers and crew lost their lives as a result of the bomb blast aboard the airliner just 120 miles west of Ireland. Although some arrests have been made, this terrible crime remains shrouded in mystery.

As the families and loved ones of those who perished aboard Air India flight 182 face their 10th Christmas since this tragedy, I ask all members to join with me in expressing our deep sorrow at their loss which continues today.

Christmas is a time when we are sharing love. We should make them feel warm.

FORMER YUGOSLAV REPUBLIC

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the former Yugoslav republic, FYROM, in Skopje seeks international recognition as the republic of Macedonia.

Only thirteen states, seven from the former Soviet Union and east Europe and three Asian communist states have recognized the Skopje republic as that. Twenty–six other states have recognized Skopje only as FYROM and another twenty–two have recognized Skopje as FYROM but without diplomatic relations. The remaining 124 members of the United Nations including Canada have not recognized Skopje in any form or opened diplomatic relations.

• (1405)

Canada's position is in full accord with the international law on recognition.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Michel Bellehumeur (Berthier—Montcalm, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the former ruling party, which is left with only two members in this House and 53 senators, has managed to make the government backtrack on the issue of the Pearson airport privatization cancellation. Both parties, which have mutual friends working for the Pearson Development Corporation, agreed to let the consortium sue for up to $80 million in possible compensation.

But worse still, we did not get to the bottom of this scandal and taxpayers will never know why the government is getting ready to squeeze all this money out of them for the benefit of its cronies. In view of the vast amount of public funds wasted in this ugly mess, the government must get to the bottom of it and set up a royal commission of inquiry to examine all the aspects of the deal which are still unclear.

The way this government is handling this issue reveals quite clearly the strange kind of ethics which can be found in both the Liberal Party and the cabinet.

GOVERNOR GENERAL APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present my first instalment of the Liberals copy Reform awards.

Just when we thought the only two types of Liberals in Ottawa were the appointed and the disappointed, the hon. member for Durham restored our faith in the political process. In a letter to the Ottawa Citizen the member supported Reform common sense policies when he proposed two solutions for Governor General appointments.

Remember our leader was booed in the House when he suggested this very idea. The first was to submit a list of names to the House of Commons to allow all Canadians through their MPs to have a voice in the selection. The second solution was a vote by all people of Canada in a general election.

It gives all Reformers a feeling of great pride when we hear Liberals choosing to quote the PM from Calgary Southwest and not the PM of Canada.

RACISM

Mr. Jag Bhaduria (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville, Ind. Lib.): Mr. Speaker, racism breeds intolerance in society. One would think educational institutions in our multicultural society would be the last place where racism would exist. This is not the case.

Three weeks ago Mahendra Gupta, a teacher at Toronto's Humberside Collegiate, was deliberately pushed down a flight of stairs at the school. He was later found unconscious at the bottom of a concrete stairwell.

It was a cold and calculated attack. School officials were aware of racist correspondence sent to five non–white teachers but chose not to inform students and staff.

Racism still permeates the Toronto school board. According to Rick Kollins, a Toronto board superintendent, the attack was "not a good news story but a sign of moving in the right direction".

Years of inaction and window dressing by the Toronto school board have resulted in a teacher being racially attacked and the attack is perceived as a positive development by senior officials. It is not.

STRATFORD FESTIVAL

Mr. John Richardson (Perth—Wellington—Waterloo, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Stratford Festival, Canada's national English language theatre, on the conclusion of its 1994 season. All 10 plays enjoyed outstanding critical reviews and for the first time since 1990 the season was a financial success.

The festival realized in excess of $17 million in box office receipts, $3.5 million through fund raising and received only $900,000 in federal grants. In return, the theatre generates $150 million worth of business in the community and generates $25 million in taxes.

I wish all those associated with the Stratford Festival another successful season. I encourage all members of the House to join with us in 1995 when, in the words of the festival's artistic director Richard Monette, the Stratford adventure continues.

PORT OF VANCOUVER

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I stand to recognize a jewel in the crown of western Canada, situated in part in my riding: the port of Vancouver.

Vancouver stands as the gateway to the Asia–Pacific. The port of Vancouver is the guardian of that gateway, serving the western regions as a point of entry and departure of all goods to the Pacific.

The port of Vancouver is the largest port on the west coast of North America. Its annual throughput is approximately 70 million tonnes.

As a fully self–supporting crown corporation the port serves all of B.C. and western Canada. It supports 9,000 jobs in the lower mainland as well as another 62,000 employees from the rest of Canada who produce, transport and process the goods that move through the port. The port's cargoes exceed $38 billion annually.

• (1410)

As the sleeping tiger of Asia awakens, the port of Vancouver has the unique opportunity to become the hub of trade for the northwest. The U.S. ports of Oregon and Seattle vie for the prize. Perhaps all western Canadian provinces should claim ownership and mould it to become the Pacific jewel that it can be.

VENTURE CAPITAL

Mr. Tony Valeri (Lincoln, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, our government must be committed to assisting innovative small and medium sized enterprises. An industry which may help us to meet our objectives is the venture capital industry which searches out businesses that are young, innovative and operating in a growth market.

The FBDB recently concluded a baseline survey of 259 companies which secured venture capital financing. Despite the effects of the recent recession these venture backed companies still increased the number of people they employed at an annual compounded rate of 40 per cent.

The global economy is becoming increasingly specialized. High tech firms once considered the wave of the future are here today. In order that Canada not be left behind it is essential that the government assist in creating a positive environment for the venture capital industry to support small and medium sized businesses which will have a positive impact on our economy as a whole. The venture capital investment industry is an important means by which we can support young companies while ensuring that Canada remains competitive in the global market.

Clearly the venture capital industry provides a great potential. As our government is committed to rejuvenating the economy this is one vehicle that should lead the way.

ROGERS CABLE

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, yesterday, the Minister of Canadian Heritage gave us another demonstration of his now infamous lack of courage. Following the decision by Rogers Cable to change access to its French–language channels TV5 and Météo Média, and to cancel Musique Plus, as of tomorrow, the minister avoided his responsibilities.

Obviously, the heritage minister understood nothing yesterday, neither the question he was asked, nor what is at stake. Francophones in several regions are outraged by Rogers' decision. These channels are an important part of their cultural environment, especially among young people.

We hope that the Pontius Pilate of cable television and francophones outside Quebec will emerge from his torpor and take action so that Rogers and all the other cable television companies do not reduce their services in French.

PEARSON INTERNATIONAL AIRPORT

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, Bill C–22, a bill denying the rights of Canadians to due process before the courts, is coming back again. This time it is the Liberals in the other place who are trying to find an eleventh hour solution to the mess which the Liberals in the House now find themselves in.

Our Liberals are in trouble due to their insistence on using the Pearson airport as a smoke screen to hide the real issue: the rule of law. They are trying to rewrite the rules of this land to suit their own purposes. This is a precedent we cannot allow to occur. If it does, what can we expect next? Expropriations without compensation, a change in the basic concept of innocent until proven guilty?

The government needs a conscience. This is often portrayed as a small person sitting on a shoulder. In the case of the Liberals their conscience is sitting on this side of the House.

I offered the Minister of Transport a solution to this mess back in October but he did not even respond to it.

The Reform Party has been consistent on the issue. It is nice to see the Liberals finally agreeing not only with us, but the respected legal opinions throughout this country.

RURAL POST OFFICES

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to ask the government to maintain its presence in rural Canada through the operation and ownership of federal buildings in these small communities.

In my own constituency at least three communities, the town of Wilke, the town of St. Walberg and the village of Loon Lake, have federal buildings on their main streets that currently house the post office. On several occasions over the last four years these buildings have been offered for sale by the department of public works but no buyers have been found.

It appears that the federal government wishes to jeopardize postal services in these small communities by selling off the buildings that house those post offices giving Canada Post the opportunity to relocate into retail franchises.

The public works department and Canada Post have the same minister. I call on him to support rural Canada.

VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the government is committed to the elimination of all forms of violence in our society.

• (1415)

In particular, members on this side of the House are truly concerned about the incidence of violence against women which has often been dismissed as unsubstantiated and exaggerated.

The recent ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada admitting drunkenness as an allowable defence for a man accused of sexually assaulting a 65–year old woman is an indication of the insensitivity that currently exists in the country.

Furthermore, as recently as last week in reference to the incidence of male violence against women the member for Lisgar—Marquette stated they were always taught at home as kids that when they went to get the cattle out of the pasture not to wear red because it would infuriate the bull in the pasture.

I fail to see the connection between violence against women and the herding techniques of the Reform Party member opposite.

It is my hope we will all work toward eliminating this type of insensitivity in our society.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, for the past 14 months the Minister of Finance has promised he will reduce the deficit. We are still waiting.

Disappointed by his failure to act, the financial community and investors are becoming increasingly concerned about the government's failure to reduce the deficit. In fact, in a situation where we can expect the U.S. economy to start overheating, failure to reduce the deficit will always cause interest rates to rise in Canada.

Will the Minister of Finance admit that his weak-kneed approach to fighting the deficit and the miscalculations in his own budget plan are increasing concern in the financial community and among foreign investors, and that his failure to act is largely responsible for the rise in interest rates in this country?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly prepared to admit that this year, we will reach our goals as far as the deficit is concerned, the first time in ten years the federal government has done so.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the minister is a deficit expert. Everybody knows that. We all know the figures.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier: Would the minister agree that scepticism in the financial community has increased considerably since Liberal members announced that the government would probably be unable to reach its goal of 3 per cent of GDP, which they feel justifies a general tax increase, ostensibly temporary, a proposal the Minister of Finance is still considering?

• (1420)

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if there is any scepticism on the financial markets about a government that refuses to deal with its problems, it most certainly concerns the provincial government in Quebec, the PQ, the Bloc Quebecois headquarters. Ever since they came to power, they have refused to admit that they have a financial problem and that both levels of government will have to work together to deal with that problem.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe what we just heard. For the past 14 months, the Minister of Finance has been talking about the Government of Quebec. With a $40 billion deficit, rising interest rates and his policies that have been a complete failure, he talks to us about the Government of Quebec. I cannot believe it.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

An hon. member: Wake up.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, look at them carrying on. And they talk about the Government of Quebec.

The Speaker: Wonderful Wednesday. The hon. member will please put his carefully wrought question.

Mr. Gauthier: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this advance appreciation of my question. Would the Minister of Finance admit that by merely coasting along on our economic recovery instead of stimulating job creation as he should have done, he has heightened the lack of confidence in the financial community which no longer believes his promises to reduce the deficit?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in the last quarter, we experienced 4.6 per cent growth, and in the quarter before that, 6.4 per cent. This year, 400,000 jobs were created. Last month, 95,000 jobs were created in Canada, a record for this country. Congratulations to my colleagues.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would remind the Minister of Finance that one month after he tabled his first budget, Canada's rating was downgraded, while, so far, Goldman Sachs and Moody's say that Quebec's credit rating will be maintained.

Some hon. members: There.

Mr. Loubier: The Minister of Finance continues to ignore the proposals and recommendations made by various stakeholders, including the official opposition, to reduce the deficit. His inaction has earned him very poor marks in the eyes of the financial community as this session ends.

Will the Minister of Finance not recognize that before contemplating further tax increases, he should make it a priority to recover the bulk of the $6.6 billion in unpaid taxes owed to the federal treasury?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Roberval asked us to make cuts. Now, I will ask the Bloc Quebecois finance critic for the fifteenth time, where does the Bloc suggest that we cut? We have yet to receive a single note or suggestion. Really! Family trusts? I am waiting for the finance committee report. I think that you submitted your opposition yesterday. But where, where really, should we cut? Make suggestions. Be constructive.

As for Goldman Sachs, the firm has made a favourable report because its people have said that the people of Quebec were obviously going to vote to remain within a united Canada.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we did submit proposals to the minister. As a matter of fact, when will he admit that, had he put a stop to unjustified tax shelters as we suggested, collected outstanding tax accounts as we suggested, stimulated employment as we suggested, in a word, had he taken aggressive action to cut spending over the past year—a year wasted—he would not now be facing a credibility gap, this confidence crisis, and an upward swing in interest rates that will affect everyone in Canada.

• (1425)

[English]

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we are now enjoying the highest economic growth of any of the G–7 countries. We are enjoying the highest economic growth of almost any of the OECD countries. We are creating jobs. We are reinvesting in the economy. We have the best productivity record of almost any of the industrial countries. Our exports are up. I have been told about 10 times that our exports are up.

Let it be very clear that this has been a very good year for the Canadian economy.

Interest rates are up. They are up because of inflation in the United States. They are up for a number of reasons. The single most important reason for the increase in interest rates this week is the international financial community has said that one of the major provinces of the country, Quebec, refuses to face up to its deficit problems.

I call upon it to do its job.

TAXATION

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Bank of Canada rate rose three quarters of a per cent yesterday to over 7 per cent, driving up consumer loan rates. Since April the interest rate increases have added about $200 a month to payments on a mortgage of $100,000.

As the finance minister knows, our national house is mortgaged to the tune of $542 billion, on which we make payments of approximately $3.3 billion a month in interest alone.

Could the minister tell us what impact these interest rate increases over the past year are having on the national mortgage? Could he give us a precise dollar figure on how much these interest rate increases are costing the federal treasury since the government took office?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is a matter of public record and was set out in the House of Commons finance committee. Each one per cent increase in interest rates costs the nation $1.7 billion on an annual basis.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, when the average Canadian is faced with a $200 a month increase in mortgage payments, he or she has only one real option and that is to cut spending in other areas of expenditure. When it comes to meeting increased mortgage payments on the national house we hear, to our dismay, that the ministry is now considering getting the money from tax increases on gasoline, on personal incomes and on corporate incomes.

Will the minister please tell us that these rumours are utterly unfounded, that there is no truth to the fact, and that he has no intention of taking more money out of taxpayers' pockets in order to meet his increased mortgage payments?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have responded to this question on numerous occasions by simply saying that the government will make its position known in the budget. We are in the consultation process. We are waiting for constructive suggestions from Canadians and from the two opposition parties.

We are waiting for the Reform Party to complete its suggestions for areas in which we should make cuts. For instance, the person in the Reform Party who was concerned with social policy—that is an oxymoron—the member for Calgary North, said she would cut some $16 billion or $17 billion out of social policy spending.

We are waiting for the Reform Party to give us its constructive suggestions. We will make our position known in the budget.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the blunt truth of the matter is if the minister cuts spending the way he should, special interests in the country will squeal like stuck pigs. If he tries to fix the deficit with tax increases he will injure the economic interests and prospects of every man, woman and child in the country. He is going to take heat either way.

• (1430)

Why does he not take the political heat for doing the right thing rather than the wrong thing and declare that he will fight the deficit only through spending reductions? Why do you not take the heat, through you, Mr. Speaker, for doing the right thing rather than the wrong thing?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): We are prepared to take the heat, through you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin: (LaSalle—Émard): In fact we would much prefer to do it that way.

We understand the bulk of the actions that have to be taken must be taken on the spending side. We understand that Canadians have to live within their means and that they expect their governments to do the same. We are going to do that.

We also have had the benefit of a very well thought out report by the House of Commons finance committee in which members on all sides of the House participated. That is an important part of the consultation process. We intend to take that into account and we will give our answer when we bring down the budget.

COLLÈGE MILITAIRE ROYAL DE SAINT–JEAN

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

With just 10 days before Christmas, time is running out on the issue of the Royal Military College in Saint–Jean for the teachers, their families and the whole Saint–Jean community. All stakeholders have agreed to discuss the merits of the proposal from the mayor of Saint–Jean, which provides for the gradual conversion of the military college into a civilian educational institution. The only holdout is the Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs.

Can the minister promise today in this House to resume discussions on the basis of the proposal from the mayor of Saint–Jean, which provides for a three–year transition period?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I spoke to the mayor of Saint–Jean yesterday at lunchtime and it is clear that we can come to an agreement. The only obstacle is that the Parti Quebecois has not yet agreed on the basis of negotiations. I hope to be notified in the coming days. As soon as I am notified, we will resume negotiations.

Mr. Claude Bachand (Saint–Jean, BQ): Mr. Speaker, Quebec's Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs acceded yesterday to the minister's objective of demilitarizing the college. As the minister said to us yesterday, let us stop fooling around.

Will the minister, in the interest of the Saint–Jean community, resume negotiations on the basis of the proposal from the mayor of Saint–Jean, yes or no?

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we must indeed stop fooling around, so the Quebec minister, who says one thing on Monday and another thing on Tuesday, should confirm her position to me in writing before I can take action.

SECURITY INTELLIGENCE REVIEW COMMITTEE

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it has been more than five days since the Solicitor General received SIRC's report on the Bristow affair. Despite the fact that SIRC insists that it wrote the report for public consumption, the minister has withheld it not only from the public but from the members of the national security subcommittee.

Could the minister advise the House the nature of the problem that is causing the delay and provide us with a definite time for the release of the document?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my objective is to have the material available to members of the House tomorrow.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, while I am delighted to learn that the report is finally being released, I would like to ask the minister about his response to a question yesterday when he responded that it was his responsibility to decide on the best way to release the report.

Does the minister believe that the best way to release the report is to delay its release so that he does not have to face scrutiny on the contents of the report until February?

● (1435)

I thought she would be delighted to learn that my objective is to have the material available for her and all members of the House tomorrow. I thought she would give me some applause for that. Again I am very surprised at her question.

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development.

Eastern Quebec's main social, community and labour organizations have asked the federal government to take seasonal workers into consideration, rather than let them down, in its social program reform. According to the minister's estimates, close to two thirds of unemployed people who would be considered frequent UI users are seasonal workers.

Will the minister recognize that, since seasonal workers represent close to two thirds of those whom he defines as frequent users, his project to implement a two–tier UI system would essentially target these workers?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, about two months ago I established a special working group to look at the way seasonal workers could be impacted by the various proposals.

The member knows that in the green book we do not just present one proposal; we present a variety of proposals about how we can change the unemployment insurance form.

The special working group has been going across the country. It has met with several hundred representatives of various working groups, union groups and business groups. I have met with its representatives and they are doing a very effective job of making a proper assessment of how we can be very considerate and very sensitive to the issue of seasonal workers.

Ten years ago only about 14 per cent of unemployment insurance funds were drawn down by those who were frequent users. Today it is over 40 per cent. It shows a very fundamental change in the way unemployment insurance is being used. It is time Canadians have the honesty and the responsibility for taking a look at those changes.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister recognize that regions which depend on industries such as forestry, fishing and tourism, such as eastern Quebec, will be the main victims of his reform and will become second class regions with second class jobless?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member uses words like victim and so on. It shows that he has not read the proposals.

One of the most serious issues facing Canadians is helping those who are affected by frequent unemployment or affected by long periods of unemployment to have better training, better support, better off season adjustment programs so they can get longer term employment.

The whole thrust of the green paper is employability. Get more work for longer periods for more people. That is the whole point of the reform.

By using that kind of provocative language all the member is doing is stirring up reaction as opposed to helping Canadians understand the kinds of choices they can make. I would suggest that he stop doing it.

BOSNIA

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the government is choosing inaction on Bosnia now, but while Parliament is in recess over Christmas what will it do?

While Reform accepts NATO's protective role for the UN, will the foreign affairs minister stick to his commitment of recalling Parliament for a full debate before Canada considers giving NATO permission to enter into the war in an expanded way?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I assure the hon. member that we do not intend to change the mandate of our troops in Bosnia.

Canada has accepted participation in the UN peacekeeping mission. That is the mandate our soldiers are fulfilling there. We know that under very difficult circumstances they are performing remarkable jobs, saving the lives of civilians affected by this war, helping humanitarian convoys to get through, and assisting in probably the most difficult UN peacekeeping mission ever under the responsibility of the United Nations.

• (1440)

Mr. Bob Mills (Red Deer, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I did not get an answer to my question.

It is interesting that in opposition the Liberal Party had lots to say about foreign affairs policy decisions being made without consulting Parliament. How can it change so dramatically by simply changing the side of the House that it is on?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I remind the hon. member that there have been three debates in the House of Commons on the subject.

I assure the hon. member that when the decision is taken to renew or to change our mandate we will again consult Parliament.

CUSTOMS BROKERS

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue.

To comply with the new regulation that takes effect on January 16, 145 of the 269 customs brokers who operate in Canada have applied to Reed Stenhouse, a Toronto company, for the surety bond required by Revenue Canada. As of today, 32 of these customs brokers have been denied bonds, in other words, they have been put out of business. Another twenty or so have yet to receive a reply.

Does the minister realize that this new policy of requiring customs brokers to obtain high surety bonds has already resulted in the loss of at least 250 jobs, and that the losses will be much more substantial if he persists on this course?

[English]

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in my view the figures provided by the hon. member are not accurate. Certainly his projections for the future are inaccurate.

Over the last four years there have been 15 failures of customs brokers leading to very substantial problems for their clients. Their clients of course are the ordinary importers of Canada.

The problem that arises under these circumstances is that the clients are liable for a second time for money they paid to the customs broker. It is vital that we deal with this problem. We must create a fair system of mutual insurance so that the client of the customs broker can be protected. This is what we are attempting to do.

[Translation]

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, should the minister not demonstrate the most elementary common sense and reconsider this decision, if he wishes to see these businesses and the hundreds of jobs they represent survive?

[English]

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly accept the representation of the hon. member to review it. It is not a policy which is yet finally determined. We are examining it at the present time and we will make a decision shortly.

I should point out that the concern I expressed in the House a moment or two ago is a very real one. We must make sure that the customs system in Canada does not result in some importers paying double the amount because of the failure of the agent that they employ as a customs broker.

ROGERS CABLE

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

Recently, it came to our attention that Rogers Cable television will no longer provide its suscribers with access to three French language channels.

What is the government's position on access to French language programming for all Canadians?

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his question. Canada's policy is to promote shows and programs in both official languages, French and English, in the distribution and presentation of television programming.

Furthermore, I must say that cable operators are free to decide what they will distribute. The market rules, the market decides. Subscribers are free to contact their cable company to let it know how they feel about it. Also, they can always file a complaint with the CRTC.

VETERANS APPEAL BOARD

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal red book said that the Tory government "made a practice of choosing political friends" in making appointments. It went on to say that the Prime Minister would fill positions "on the basis of competence". My question is for the Secretary of State for Veterans Affairs.

Could the minister explain to the House the criteria for appointments to the Veterans Appeal Board?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, competence.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I could not hear the answer.

The answer did not include that several of the 1994 appointments to the Veterans Appeal Board have been long time friends of the Liberal Party, including failed Liberal candidates and former Liberal MPs including René Cousineau, Patricia Landers and Una MacLean Evans who supported the Prime Minister in his bid for the Liberal leadership race in 1990. The Liberal list goes on and on. The major criteria appear to be that one must be a Liberal to get these $86,000 a year plums.

My supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. When will the government live up to its red book promise and put an end to these blatant partisan patronage appointments?

Right Hon. Jean Chrétien (Prime Minister, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have looked at the list of order in council appointments. We have made more than 650. I checked and I do not know more than 40 of them. I have not done very well regarding Liberals because I know only 40 of them.

The others I did not know but they were recommended and chosen. I hope that the day has not come in Canada where because some day one has the good fortune of offering one's services to serve Canada as a member of Parliament that one will disqualify oneself forever to serve on a board anywhere in the land.

NATIONAL TRANSPORTATION AGENCY

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

Several decisions by the National Transportation Agency allowing CN and CP to abandon lines in Quebec will be implemented in 1995. The Quebec economic development professionals' association is concerned about the devastating impact of these decisions on regional development in Quebec and urges the minister to review these decisions by the agency.

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, we understand very well the concerns expressed by my hon. colleague. However, he certainly understands that a minister cannot easily bypass the decisions made by a quasi-judicial agency. That would not be acceptable.

In response to these concerns, we asked CN and CP, whenever the National Transportation Agency allows them to abandon rail lines, not to remove this infrastructure because we want to look for ways to maintain services in these regions. It is important not only in Quebec but across the country. We will try to maintain a moratorium on rail line removal until a national policy is in place.

Mr. Paul Mercier (Blainville—Deux-Montagnes, BQ): Mr. Speaker, does the minister not agree that he should review the National Transportation Agency's decisions on the basis not only of cost effectiveness but also of the impact of line abandonment on regional economic development? Should he not facilitate the takeover of some segments by local or regional organizations?

[English]

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the question posed and even the suggestions contained in the remarks of my hon. colleague are very valid. I believe it is very important to make sure that we all understand the contribution that rail makes to regional development. The work of the Nault commission in looking at the commercialization of CN, the decision of the government to reject the unsolicited bid from CP, and our commitment to announce a national rail policy in 1995 reflects the kinds of concerns that were raised by the hon. member.

• (1450)

We will attempt to make sure that by encouraging CN and CP to leave the rail infrastructure in place, even though they have had the right to abandon it on the basis of a decision from the National Transportation Agency, it will help to address the concerns that were raised.

I expect that all members on both sides of the House will want to make a contribution to the exercise that is under way now, being led by the member for Kenora—Rainy River, looking at the future of CN, particularly commercialization with employee participation.

AVIATION AND MARINE SAFETY

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, automated weather observation systems are being installed at airports across the country to replace human observers. This is the same technology that is being used with automated lighthouses. I would have no problem with this as a cost saving measure if the system worked, but it does not.

Why is the Minister of Transport prepared to jeopardize aviation and marine safety with unreliable technology that is being asked to do a job it was never designed for?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is not unusual for the hon. member to mix apples and oranges but the fact is that the destaffing of lighthouses is based on technology that has been used around the world. For example, in the United States of America there is one staffed lighthouse remaining and it is a historic site at Boston harbour.

With respect to the AWOS concern, which is a very legitimate concern, I reassure the member, members of the House, and the travelling public in general that Transport Canada has reacted to the concerns raised by the aviation community. We are making certain that services are adequate. We have to deal in the light of the fact that the Air Transportation Association of Canada, the Canadian Professional Airline Association, the airlines themselves, would never fly into airports where there was not an adequate level of safety available to them.

As important as the question is, I would not want to leave the impression raised by the hon. member's question that somehow there is an unsafe situation in the aviation industry in Canada.

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it happens that several airlines now refuse to fly into airports as alternates that use the AWOS system.

Transport Canada recently agreed to put human weather observers back into Dorval and Edmonton municipal airports. This causes one to wonder why the safety of Canadians using those airports are more important than the safety of those using one of the 48 other AWOS sites and those of the coastal marine and aviation users.

Will the minister agree to cancel destaffing of aviation weather observers and light stations until AWOS systems can be proven to work and are accepted by marine and aviation users?

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the best measure is the support being provided by the aviation industry to the initiatives we are taking. I take exception to the hon. member's comment that some airlines are refusing to fly into specific areas where there are AWOS installations.

I hear the hon. member saying "speak to Canadian Airlines". The hon. member used to be an air traffic controller so we know the system is already working better because he is here.

The representative from Canadian Airlines who made the complaint about the AWOS happens to be a meteorologist. Again, we are trying to do the very best we can. I do not think it helps the situation in any way to suggest that the system in Canada is unsafe. We have the safest navigation system in the world.

PUBLIC SERVICE OF CANADA

Ms. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal.

Almost daily there are rumours about thousands of cuts in the public service. These speculative reports leave the impression more of a demolition derby than a renewal of the public service.

What exactly is the minister doing to keep our government's commitments to improving moral in the public service, to treating the public service with respect, and to treating federal employees fairly? What is he doing for public service renewal?

• (1455)

Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and myself would agree that we had and we still have one of the finest public services in the world and that we have to maintain its quality in order for it to be able to perform well in the future.

The government has given a pledge that it would reduce involuntary layoffs to an absolute minimum and it will keep that pledge.

In the program review we are looking at all the programs to make government more efficient in order to cut costs. There is no doubt that government will have to be downsized. However in that process we are always keeping in mind that the public service has to be kept efficient and able to perform its job. It has to be kept in a spirit that will permit it to respond to the challenges that it faces. We will do that.

DEPARTMENT OF THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment. In his recent report, the Auditor General mentions that after spending $26.6 million, the federal government has still not solved an issue related to unproductive rent payments, this after 20 years. Those payments concern a Vancouver lot rented by the federal government, and more specifically by the Department of Environment, where an environmental centre was to be built. However, the project was abandoned in 1976.

Can the minister tell us what action plan her department has to solve this issue, since this useless lot costs taxpayers $4.4 million a year?

[English]

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad that the member has asked this question because on taking over the ministry I made arrangements to inform the band that future payments after this fiscal year should cease and desist.

We have begun negotiations and in fact expect to conclude an agreement very shortly where in fact there will be no further federal payments made for this land. In a year we have solved the problem.

Mr. Paul E. Forseth (New Westminster—Burnaby, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

On November 29 he produced four orders in council concerning prohibited weapons. Two court decisions should require the minister to lay these orders before the House at least 30 sitting days before their effective date. His date of January 1 would not even be close.

Will the minister explain to the House why he has not complied with the law, section 116 of the Criminal Code?

Hon. Allan Rock (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the orders in council to which the hon. member refers were made not under section 116 of the code, which does indeed require the procedure he has described, but rather under section 84 of the code which does not.

Although there is a judicial decision of a trial court which holds that it is necessary even under section 84 to lay the regulations before the House, that decision is under appeal to the appellate division of the court in Alberta. We have every confidence that judgment was wrong in that respect and that we will succeed in the appeal.

INTEREST RATES

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. It is with regard to the very unwelcome Christmas present that Canadians got with an increase in interest rates.

Increasing interest rates have affected, as the minister himself said today, charges on the debt and deficit. They influence consumer confidence, farmers and small business. The government has been telling Canadians what they must cut back on. Would the minister consider a public review of monetary policy in the country and a review of the mandate of the Bank of Canada?

Would the minister commit to undertaking such a public review before the budget of that mandate of the Bank of Canada and the interest rate policy?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, approximately one to two months after we first took office, the Government of Canada and the Bank of Canada entered into an agreement whereby we set the inflation targets which is very important in terms of monetary policy in the country and in terms of keeping inflation low.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, keeping inflation low is a major asset toward the economic recovery of the country. What is crucial, if we are going to get interest rates low, is that we get the fundamentals right and that is job creation, investment in productivity, low inflation and the kinds of things we are now seeing within the Canadian economy.

• (1500)

We live in an interdependent world. No country is isolated from the effects of that. Getting the fundamentals right and the economy strong and cleaning up the finances of the country are by far the best ways of keeping interest rates low.

OCCUPATIONAL SAFETY

Mr. Sarkis Assadourian (Don Valley North, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. Every year on the job accidents cost the government and the economy about $10 billion. In these times of fiscal restraint it is important to find ways to cut costs.

What action is the minister taking to eliminate waste and cut on the job accidents which currently total about $10 billion a year?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for a question which I think is both important and timely. We have noticed over the last several years there has been a trend line downward in the level of occupational accidents and the level of compensation claims. We recognize that with a whole new series and new kinds of industrial and office based hazards growing, we are going to have to do more.

One thing we did immediately was establish a 1–800 number that works out of the Centre for Occupational Health and Safety in the city of Hamilton to provide instantaneous information for all users of industrial kinds so they can find out what kinds of solutions and programs are necessary.

One of the most important initiatives under the new labour side agreement under NAFTA is that we have now started a series of major conferences on occupational safety dealing with petrochemicals, construction and electronics so we can begin to share the knowledge and information of the three countries and begin to provide new standards.

It is important, especially when we get into new office space hazards, ergonomics and other areas, that we begin to enlist the co–operation of business, labour and all levels of government to provide a new regime of occupational safety in the country.

POINTS OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, during his reply, at which time I expected a lot of rhetoric, the Minister of Transport made a particular remark stating that the air traffic control system was safer because I no longer work for it, because I am here in the House.

I would ask the minister to clarify this point. Is the air traffic control system safer because I am here in the House fighting against his unreasonable measures, or was it a direct personal attack on my abilities, in which case he must withdraw—

The Speaker: I see where we might get into a little more repartee here. I wonder if the hon. member would give me a day to look at the blues to see precisely what was said. I will try to figure out what was meant. I will get back to the House if necessary.

MULTICULTURALISM

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour today to present to the House, in both official languages, a letter conveying the government's position and decision on redress.

• (1505)

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have just tabled the letter I sent to the following groups: the Chinese Canadian National Council, the German Canadian Congress, the Canadian Jewish Congress, the National Association of Canadians of Origins in India, the National Congress of Chinese Canadians, the National Congress of Italian Canadians, the Ukrainian Canadian Congress and the Canadian Ukrainian Civil Liberties Association.

The letter conveys the government's decision on redress. This is not a decision the government has taken easily, but it is one that after much discussion reflects a commitment to building a more fair and equitable society.

In the letter I wrote that as Canadians we are proud that our citizens trace their origins to every part of the world. Together we have built this country on the principles of fairness, generosity and compassion. Our history records the remarkable success we have achieved by applying those principles.

Our history also records that at times we have strayed from them. There have been episodes that have caused suffering to people.

[Translation]

In the crisis atmosphere of war, some Canadian ethnocultural communities found their loyalty questioned, their freedom restrained and their lives disrupted.

[English]

In the past Canada enforced some immigration practices that were at odds with our shared commitment to human justice. Canadians wish those episodes had never happened. We wish those practices had never occurred. We wish we could rewrite history. We wish we could relive the past. We cannot.

[Translation]

We can and we must learn from the past. We must ensure that future generations do not repeat the errors of the past.

[English]

Seeking to heal the wounds caused by the actions of previous governments, six ethnocultural communities have requested redress and compensation totalling hundreds of millions of dollars. The government understands the strong feelings underlying these requests. We share the desire to heal those wounds.

The issue is whether the best way to do this is to attempt to address the past or to invest in the future. We believe our only choice lies in using limited government resources to create a more equitable society now and a better future for generations to come.

Therefore the government will not grant financial compensation for the requests made. We believe our obligation lies in acting to prevent these wrongs from recurring. The government will continue to take concrete measures to strengthen the fabric of Canadian life by combating racism, prejudice and discrimination through education, information and the promotion of the values of fairness.

[Translation]

We have already made progress. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms now guarantees equal protection and benefit of the law without discrimination. Through the Canadian Multiculturalism Act, we are committed to the full and equitable participation of individuals and communities of all origins in shaping Canada's destiny.

By passing the Canadian Human Rights Act and upholding the international convention on the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination, we have taken another step in entrenching the principle of equality.

[English]

The letter goes on to say a further major step forward is the establishment of the Canadian race relations foundation. The government will proclaim the act establishing the foundation in the spring of 1995. The foundation, first proposed a decade ago, will play a fundamental role in moving toward the elimination of racial discrimination in Canada.

[Translation]

We honour the contribution of all those communities whose members, often in the face of hardship, persevered in building our country.

[English]

Together we must ensure that all Canadians can face the future with pride in Canada, in our values and in their own heritage. We are a nation of inclusion. Our task is to strive together to guarantee that the actions of the country match the principles of its people.

• (1510)

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to point out to the secretary of state that we received a copy of her statement barely an hour and a half ago. We think that is unreasonably short notice and the government has a strange way of proceeding, to say the least.

Be that as it may, I am pleased to speak today on this important matter. Indeed, it is wrong to minimize the suffering of several Canadian cultural communities caused by Canada's reprehensible behaviour towards them, as was the case in the climate of crisis due to the war.

Canada shamefully deviated from the principles of justice, compassion and generosity which always guided its behaviour towards all its citizens from all over the world who have contributed greatly to its enrichment.

The government's decision not to pay financial compensation to the cultural communities that asked for redress is totally irresponsible. Instead of excusing the past, the government must face the truth. Some members of these communities were incarcerated in makeshift camps, the property of some was seized, others lost their jobs; in short, their most basic rights were literally violated.

What is the government's response to them? We are sorry for the past and we must now get on with the future. What a response.

Does the government realize that many people still live today with the scars from what happened then? What message is the government giving all those affected by what Canada did? That the country does not face up to its responsibilities and hides behind pious platitudes.

On the contrary, the Bloc Quebecois thinks that there should be fair financial compensation for all those citizens who were considered to be outright enemies of Canada. The government must make fair financial restitution to these people and communities. The desire of the leaders of these communities for real restitution must be respected. The government must immediately go back on its decision.

On behalf of all members of the Bloc Quebecois, I wish to repeat how important we consider the cultural communities in Canada and Quebec to be; their contribution to our societies points the way to the collective development of us all.

[English]

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this fall I had the privilege of speaking at a symposium in Banff hosted by the Ukrainian Canadian Civil Liberties Association. Members of the association were asking the government to recognize injustices that had been taken against their group during World War I.

In the early 1900s thousands of people came to Canada from all over the world. Many of these settlers had come from Austria–Hungary, fleeing their oppressive government. When the first world war broke out these people were declared aliens and were made to report weekly to the government. Failure to do so resulted in arrest and deportation to labour camps.

Unfortunately this treatment was not limited to people from Austria–Hungary. As the minister explained, people from various ethnic backgrounds were treated in a similar fashion and the only reason they were treated so poorly was their membership in a group, in these cases an ethnic group.

I am elated to see the Liberals following the lead established by the Reform Party. They recognize as we do that Canada has never entered a war spontaneously or without great consideration. Canadians prefer peace and mediation to the horrors and atrocities of war. Further, Canadians cherish the equal rights of all individuals in society and recognize that they should not be compromised.

It is not possible to determine who has been negatively affected by these government decisions or exactly by how much. Giving money to these groups to redress the mistakes of the past would not fix those mistakes. We do need to look to today and to the future to ensure that the rights of Canadians are not unjustly compromised. The secretary of state has suggested that she will proclaim the Canadian race relations foundation in order for the government to avoid making the same mistakes again.

Unfortunately the Canadian race relations foundation will not meet this noble goal. The Canadian race relations foundation will cost $24 million just in an initial capital output and it is suggested that its yearly operating costs will be several millions of dollars.

However it is not just because of costs alone that we oppose the foundation. We have some of the same concerns expressed by the Liberals when they were in opposition. Let me remind the House of some of their earlier criticisms.

The member for Winnipeg North suggested that the foundation should not exist because the responsibility for the program could be accomplished elsewhere. He stated: "Social harmony cannot be created by posters, proclamations or literary contests or even by co–operation between business and government or direct government action. The real challenge is in the hearts and minds of each of us as individuals".

This foundation will have over 30 GIC appointments; yet another opportunity for patronage at its worst.

The member for Eglinton—Lawrence stated: "One of the most important questions is: How do we finance some of the philosophies the minister says this foundation addresses?"

The member for Scarborough—Agincourt when in opposition also criticized the foundation. He said the foundation "gives the minister a great impact on the direction taken by this organization and could lead to it becoming nothing more than a mouthpiece for government policy. It could lead to the assumption that the foundation is more of a political organization than one of a proactive association for the needs of the furtherance of race relations". He continued to say that "the funds available for this foundation will act only as a vehicle for the government of the day to put out its policies and to place into position people who are supporting it. Probably it will be the president of the foundation, somebody who has raised funds for the government".

This foundation is required by law to be housed in Toronto. The Liberals criticized this fact as well. Winnipeg is the most multicultural city in Canada yet it has been given no consideration as a possible site.

The motherhood ideology of multiculturalism and anti–racism is noble. However support for the programs caring for the policies is already in place. Consider the efforts and positive results accomplished by the Canadian Human Rights Commission. This in conjunction with programs in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration and the Charter of Rights and Freedoms has taken Canada a long way toward reaching the goals of a tolerant society.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE AND HOUSE AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the 55th report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and House Affairs regarding selection of votable items in accordance with Standing Order 92.

This report is deemed adopted on presentation.

GOVERNMENT ORGANIZATION ACT (FEDERAL AGENCIES)

The Hon. Marcel Massé (President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada, Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs and Minister responsible for Public Service Renewal, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–65, an act to reorganize and dissolve certain federal agencies.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

[English]

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–298, an act to amend the Income Tax Act (deduction of interest on mortgage loans).

He said: Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise in the House today and introduce my private member's bill entitled an act to amend the Income Tax Act (deduction of interest on mortgage loans).

The bill proposes that subject to subsection (2) there may be deducted in computing a taxpayer's income for a taxation year an amount equal to the interest paid by the taxpayer in the year to a mortgage lender on the first $100,000 of a mortgage secured by an individual's qualifying home. Some conditions apply as outlined in this bill.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.) Mr. Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent for the following motion. I move:

> That no Private Members' Business shall be considered on Thursday, December 15, 1994, providing that the item set down for consideration that day shall retain its position first on the order of precedence.

In other words, in order to obtain unanimous consent for private members' hour not to be held tomorrow afternoon, the member in whose name the private member's item is on the order retains his place on the order of precedence when we come back in February.

CHILDREN

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present this petition signed by 1,200 students of a secondary school in my riding. It asks one thing only: that the government keep its promise. And I am keeping my promise to the students of this school to present their petition in the House and to read it.

I will be brief. These students tell us that every day on earth 40,000 children die of starvation and illness, and that at the world summit for children the leaders of this country promised to reduce the number of children who leave this earth prematurely. These students also ask the government—

The Deputy Speaker: As the member knows I of course accept his good faith, but has the petition been deemed admissible?

Mr. Sauvageau: It has been accepted and approved.

The Deputy Speaker: Fine.

Mr. Sauvageau: Our whip taught us well Mr. Speaker, and we respect the rules on tabling documents in this House.

The students also told us that every year, on this planet earth, countless numbers of women die giving birth to children. The government undertook to reduce the number of such mortalities.

The government also undertook to help children in war–torn countries, to help children who wanted a normal education, and to respect the work done by children.

For all these promises made by the government, I present this petition, signed by 1,200 students of the École polyvalente Paul–Arseneau.

VOICE MAIL

Mr. Maurice Godin (Châteauguay, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table a first petition signed by 852 residents of the riding of Châteauguay, which I have the honour to represent. These petitioners from 28 organizations object to the use of voice mail in serving seniors. This much criticized technolohy is definitely not suited to seniors.

Indeed, seniors are entitled to proper service, especially when they have inquiries to make about income security. I agree with them and together, we call upon Parliament to kindly ask the government to abandon the plan to implement voice mail for seniors.

CFB BAGOTVILLE

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of over 10,000 residents of the riding of Chicoutimi, I would like to present a petition on the military base in Bagotville, which is one of the main employers in the region, providing work to more than 1,500 military and 250 civilian employees. The strategic function of the base is air defence and airspace control in eastern Canada, international contingencies and support for land and sea forces.

The base's responsibilities extend beyond its confines, as it also provides support for local recruiting centres and militia units. Finally, over the summer, the base hosted the air cadet camp attended by some 3,000 young men and women. CFB Bagotville has been a major player in our region, both socially and economically, for over 50 years.

MINING

Mr. Raymond Bonin (Nickel Belt, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to present a petition in support of keeping mining in Canada.

In this age of technological transformation, we often forget that mining and natural resources are and continue to be some of the economic forces that sustain our great nation, a nation that is judged to be the best place in the world to live.

The petition asks the government to do all it can to improve the slumping mining investment climate in Canada so that mining will continue to provide jobs for Canadians, continue to be a significant exporter and continue to contribute to Canada's economic prosperity.

I fully concur with the petition.

SERIAL KILLER CARDS

Mr. Walt Lastewka (St. Catharines, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to place petitions before the House today on behalf of the member for Parliament for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold.

The petitions are signed by residents of St. Catharines, Thorold, Welland, Niagara Falls and surrounding areas.

I join the petitioners in speaking out against the serial killer cards and call on Parliament to amend the laws of Canada to prohibit the importation, distribution, sale and manufacture of killer cards and to advise producers of killer cards that their products, if destined for Canada, will be seized and destroyed.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Dan McTeague (Ontario, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present three petitions on behalf of my constituents from the Ontario riding.

The first petition calls on Parliament to act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code of Canada to extend the same protection already enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Dan McTeague (Ontario, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition requests Parliament to ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Dan McTeague (Ontario, Lib.): My final petition, Mr. Speaker, calls on Parliament not to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships, including amending the Canadian Human Rights Act to include the prohibited ground of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation, which I concur with.

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured today to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present three petitions from Elk Island and the surrounding area.

The first petition asks that the Young Offenders Act, because it is not stringent enough, be amended to lower the protected age to 12, to provide harsher penalties for those convicted of violent crimes and the release of the names of offenders.

The petition is signed by 1,296 petitioners.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Ken Epp (Elk Island, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the next two petitions are essentially the same. They request that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or homosexuality and not to amend the human rights code to include the undefined phrase sexual orientation.

Together the two petitions contain 1,058 signatures.

FIREARMS

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present two petitions today. The first petition contains almost 200 signatures.

The petitioners request that Parliament refuse to accept the anti–firearms proposal of the Minister of Justice and insist that he brings forward legislation to convict and punish criminals rather than persecute the innocent. I gladly present that today.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mrs. Sharon Hayes (Port Moody—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition is from residents of my riding of Port Moody—Coquitlam.

These residents of Canada request that Parliament ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously.

I certainly support these petitions today.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. David Chatters (Athabasca, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36, I would like to present a petition signed by the residents of the city of Fort McMurray in my riding of Athabasca.

The petition requests that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in any way which would tend to indicate societal approval of same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase sexual orientation. I present and support the petitioners.

VIA RAIL'S PROPOSED CUTS AND LINE ABANDONMENTS

Mr. Michel Guimond (Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to table a petition signed by 704 Canadians who want the government to continue subsidizing VIA Rail.

Grouped together in Rural Dignity of Canada, these residents of Canada and Quebec demand that the Government of Canada hold public hearings and consultations before making any decision on VIA Rail's proposed service cuts and line abandonments. The people of Quebec and Canada also call for an immediate one-year moratorium to be placed on any line closure.

VOICE MAIL

Mr. Richard Bélisle (La Prairie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am tabling today a petition on the introduction of voice mail service at Income Security. This petition was signed by 157 residents of Brossard, Candiac and La Prairie and members of the following seniors' groups: AFEAS La Nativité de La Prairie, AFEAS Notre-Dame-du-Sacré-Coeur de Brossard, Club de l'âge d'or de La Prairie, Joie de vivre de l'âge d'or de Brossard.

Whereas seniors are naturally more at a loss when faced with voice mail technology; whereas seniors are entitled to adequate service, particularly with regard to their income security enquiries; therefore, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to ask the government to abandon its plan to introduce voice mail systems for seniors.

[English]

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Barry Campbell (St. Paul's, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present two petitions today which have been signed by over 200 Canadians.

The petitioners draw the attention of the House to the fact that discrimination against lesbian, gay and bisexual Canadians is an everyday reality in all regions of the country. This kind of discrimination is unacceptable in a country known for its commitment to human rights, equality and dignity.

The petitioners call on Parliament to act quickly to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to include sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination.

I am pleased to support these petitions.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Gar Knutson (Elgin—Norfolk, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I am pleased to present three petitions signed by well over 100 people.

The first petition asks Parliament to act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. Gar Knutson (Elgin—Norfolk, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the second petition asks Parliament to ensure that the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no change in the law which would sanction the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Gar Knutson (Elgin—Norfolk, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the third petition requests that Parliament not amend the human rights code, the Canadian Human Rights Act or the charter of rights and freedoms in any way that would tend to indicate societal approval for same sex relationships or of homosexuality, including amending the human rights code to include in the prohibited grounds of discrimination the undefined phrase of sexual orientation.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Ms. Judy Bethel (Edmonton East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present a petition bearing the signatures of 371 people from Edmonton and other areas in Alberta on the issue of euthanasia. It is a very difficult subject and has much interest to the citizens of Edmonton.

Along with recent correspondence and meetings with individuals and organizations, such as the Ukrainian Catholic Women's League who organized this petition, about their views on the topic, we are planning to hold a policy forum on January 20, in Edmonton East. We will bring together individuals well versed in legal, medical and ethical aspects of assisted suicide.

It is our hope that this discussion will be informative and broad in scope because I really feel the need for the wise counsel of my constituents on this issue before I can make a final decision on how to vote in the House.

Mr. Clifford Lincoln (Lachine—Lac-Saint-Louis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want to present a petition on behalf of 48 citizens of my riding.

The petitioners request that Parliament ensure the present provisions of the Criminal Code of Canada prohibiting assisted suicide be enforced vigorously and that Parliament make no changes in the law which would sanction or allow the aiding or abetting of suicide or active or passive euthanasia.

GRANDPARENTS' RIGHTS

Mrs. Daphne Jennings (Mission—Coquitlam, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to present petitions on behalf of my constituents and other British Columbians.

The petitioners ask the government to amend the Divorce Act to include a provision which will give grandparents standing before the courts to ask for access to see their grandchildren. Perhaps no time is more heartbreaking and empty than Christmas when grandchildren and grandparents cannot see or speak to each other.

STARRED QUESTIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, would you be so kind as to call Starred Questions Nos. 97, 98 and 100.

[Text]

*Question No. 97—Mr. Godin:

With respect to the Kahnawake Band Council (a) what is the breakdown of the $1,619,076 in grants awarded to it from 1989 to 1994 to help it negotiate self-government and (b) what legal counsel were paid with this money?

*Question No. 98—Mr. Godin:

What is the breakdown of the $2,063,470 awarded the Kahnawake Band Council from 1989 to 1993 for purposes of economic development, economic growth and self-sufficiency?

*Question No. 100—Mr. Godin:

What is the justification for the average annual increase from 1989 to 1993 of 13.6 per cent in federal investment in the Kahnawake Reserve?

[English]

Mr. Cummins: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. On September 28 I put a question on the Order Paper to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans concerning the possible conflict of interest of members appointed to the Fraser River Sockeye Review Board. The board has started public hearings and I have yet to receive a reply.

The chair of the review board is a public servant who serves at the sufferance of the government. At least two board members have proposals before government departments. One board member is actively promoting his proposal in the hearings. At least two board members sit on various department of fisheries advisory boards.

It is vital for the minister to respond to this question on the independence of his inquiry. My question deserves an immediate answer.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, there are many deserving questions on the Order Paper and I know that ministers are working assiduously to provide competent accurate and full answers to all the questions.

I know that the minister of fisheries will have heard the representations of the hon. member today and I am optimistic that soon we will have an answer for him.

Perhaps we could go back to my original point on Starred Questions Nos. 97, 98, and 100, please. The answers are as follows.

The information held by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on the band council's expenditures is contained in the financial statements supplied by the band. The information is confidential financial information from a third party and as such cannot be disclosed without the band's consent under the terms of section 20 of the Access to Information Act.

With respect to Starred Question No. 98, I should advise that the answer is identical to that in No. 97.

With respect to Starred Question No. 100 the answer is as follows.

It is not possible for us to verify the percentage of 13.6 per cent. The band's budget increased in part as a result of the introduction in 1991 of the new funding formula for the economic development program.

The band's funding for social assistance also increased as a result of the band taking over the delivery of social assistance to all beneficiaries on reserve in 1992. Moreover the funding for the post-secondary program has also increased.

I ask that the remaining questions stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to call Motion No. P–3.

That an Order of the House do issue for a copy of the December 9, 1994, report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee entitled "The Heritage Front Affair", subject only to the removal of that information relating to the amount and management of payments to sources which, if disclosed, could, in the opinion of the Solicitor General, impair the ability of the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service to obtain information from sources that is strictly necessary to its duties and functions, and having regard to subsection 18(2) of the Canadian Security and Intelligence Service Act and paragraph 8(2)(c) of the Privacy Act.

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers No. P–3 in the name of the hon. member for Perth—Wellington—Waterloo is acceptable to the government.

The Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House that Notice of Motion No. P–3 for the production of papers be deemed to have been adopted?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Deputy Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

And the bells having rung:

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to defer the vote?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Deputy Speaker: Therefore, the vote is deferred until 10 a.m. tomorrow.

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I would ask that the other Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

The Deputy Speaker: Shall the other notices of motions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

DEPARTMENT OF CANADIAN HERITAGE ACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–53, an act to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage and to amend and repeal certain other acts, as reported (with amendments) from the committee.

Mrs. Brown (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. In viewing the motions on the Order Paper this morning I noticed a misprint in Motion No. 12. It should have read: "That Bill C–53 be amended in clause 7" and not clause 4 as it is reported. I would like the assurance that this will be corrected in Hansard.

The Deputy Speaker: So done, and I thank the hon. member.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Deputy Speaker: This is a long ruling and I understand copies will be available for anyone who wishes to have it in writing, almost instantly if not already. There are 27 motions in amendment standing on the notice paper for the report stage of Bill C–53.

Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10 and 21 will be grouped for debate but voted on as follows: (a) a vote on Motion No. 8 applies to Motion No. 10; (b) an affirmative vote on Motion No.

8 obviates the necessity of the question being put on Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9 and 21; (c) on the other hand, a negative vote on Motion No. 8 necessitates the question being put on Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7; (i) a vote on Motion No. 1 applies to Motion No. 9; and (ii) a vote on Motion No. 5 applies to Motion No. 21.

[Translation]

Motions Nos. 11, 12 and 13 will be grouped for debate but voted on as follows:

(a) Motion No. 11 will be voted on separately.

(b) An affirmative vote on Motion No. 12 obviates the necessity of the question being put on Motion No. 13.

(c) On the other hand, a negative vote on Motion No. 12 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 13.

[English]

Motions Nos. 14, 15, 16, 17, 18 and 19 will be grouped for debate but voted on as follows: (a) a vote on Motion No. 14 applies to Motions Nos. 15, 16, 18 and 19; (b) an affirmative vote on Motion No. 14 obviates the necessity of the question being put on Motion No. 17; (c) on the other hand, a negative vote on Motion No. 14 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 17.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-53, in Clause 4, be amended by replacing lines 19 to 24, on page 1, and lines 1 and 2, on page 2, with the following:

"4. (1) Subject to subsection (2), the powers, duties and functions of the Minister extend to and include all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction, not by law assigned to any other department, board or agency of the Government of Canada, relating

(a) to Canadian identity and the identity of Quebec;

(b) to the values, cultural development and heritage of Canada and of Quebec; and

(c) to areas of natural or historical significance to Canada or Quebec.

(2) The Minister shall not exercise the powers and perform the duties and functions assigned to the Minister by the Act, unless the Minister has received the approval of the government of every province where

(a) the government of the province has enacted legislation or established a provincial program in a matter over which Parliament has jurisdiction under subsection (1); or

(b) the government of the province has notified the Minister in writing of its intention to enact such legislation or to establish such a program."

Motion No. 10

That Bill C–53 be amended by deleting Clause 5.

[English]

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.) moved:

Motion No. 21

That Bill C–53, in Clause 22, be amended by deleting lines 4 to 8, on page 8.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Quebec, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity today to discuss the amendments moved by my colleague from Rimouski—Témiscouata and myself concerning Bill C–53, on the Department of Canadian Heritage.

I do so with pleasure, because the amendments proposed by the official opposition well reflect one of Quebec's traditional demands from the government in Ottawa. Indeed, the very essence of the proposed amendments—and we make no mystery of it—is the recognition of Quebec's cultural specificity and identity.

• (1550)

In so doing, we propose that the federal government and the House of Commons at the very least recognize the fields in which Quebec has exclusive jurisdiction. Once it has recognized them, we ask that it respect them.

Bill C–53 as written is seriously deficient, first of all, because it fails to recognize the existence of more than one national identity on Canadian territory. We refer in particular to clauses 4 and 5 concerning Canadian identity, Canadian values, Canadian culture and Canadian heritage.

I have already had the opportunity several times in this House to express my opinion that no unified Canadian culture exists, since efforts are still being made to define, discover and grasp it. We also note a glaring omission in the bill. Indeed, no mention is made of the Quebec and native cultures and identities. Why? For what secret reason is the government systematically ignoring those very real and important cultures? Is it to eliminate them? Is it to better promote a new product, as though this was a mere marketing strategy? There has to be a reason. Maybe some day we, mere mortals, will be worthy of that knowledge.

The vast majority of Quebecers do not agree with this legislation. Let me quote some testimony heard by the Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage.

I will quote officials from Quebec organizations which represent a very large number of people, because their opinions carry more weight. I will start with the Mouvement Québec français, whose members are the Montreal Teachers Alliance, the Association québécoise des professeurs de français, the Centrale de l'enseignement du Québec, the Confederation of National Trade Unions, the Fédération des travailleurs du Québec, the Mouvement national des Québécois, the Société Saint–Jean–Baptiste de Montréal, the Union des artistes, the Union des écrivains québécois and, last but not least, the Union des producteurs agricoles.

Together, these groups represent a very large segment of the Quebec population. Here is what their spokesman, Guy Bouthillier, had to say:

"In this bill, everything related to culture is labelled under the heading Canadian identity. Indeed, nowhere is there any reference to Quebec and its culture. From the federal government's point of view, there are only one culture and one identity: the Canadian ones. This will come as a surprise only to those who still believed that there was some basis—as well as some honesty on the part of those who oppose that notion—for the concept of a distinct society. This bill will at least have the merit of dissipating any lingering illusion. Beyond the fine rhetoric, there is the written word, the legislation, which will prevail in the end".

Needless to say, the Mouvement Québec français rejects this legislation.

François Rocher, an associate professor of political science at Carleton University in Ontario, said this: "The government's approach is part of an unfinished process to build a national identity by denying existing realities in Canada".

He went on to say that the only option that would be both acceptable to Quebec and potentially beneficial to the other provinces of Canada would be to revert to the duality concept—at least in the case of Quebec—and to accept the political consequences of such a decision.

I may add that Professor Rocher submitted his analysis of the bill in his professional capacity and not as someone representing a nationalist organization from Quebec.

On the other hand, one of the best known organizations in Quebec is the Saint–Jean–Baptiste Society of Montreal, also a member of the Mouvement Québec français, as I mentioned earlier.

In their brief, they said, among other things, that they were firmly opposed to Canadian multiculturalism and to legislation that would enshrine intrusions by the Government of Canada into Quebec's cultural life. The culture of the people of Quebec must not be subordinated to the priorities of the culture of another people, the people of Canada. This bill is centralist in design and a threat to Quebec's distinct identity. It was a bill that would be forced down people's throats, over the almost unanimous objections of Quebecers to a concentration of authority over cultural matters in Ottawa and to a view of national identity that was designed to submerge Quebec's identity, according to the brief. It is all there, Mr. Speaker.

• (1555)

It is clear that all intervenors from Quebec who examined this bill condemned the centralist vision underlying the federal government's intentions. The problem is not new. It has been with us for a long time. What surprises me is that these people are still willing to come to Ottawa to express their views as Quebecers. After years of struggle, one would expect them to stop trying. However, they are anxious for their friends in Canada to understand the differences that make Quebec distinct, a distinctness that will soon be expressed in a new status for Quebec, that of a sovereign state.

I want to take this opportunity to thank these people for spending all this time and effort to attend the committee's hearings. I want them to know their efforts were greatly appreciated.

I also want to mention the entirely unacceptable attitude of some committee members who consistently stayed away when witnesses from Quebec testified before the committee, which merely confirms the general lack of interest for Quebec's concerns. This attitude is reflected in the wording of the bill and has always been present in relations between Quebec and Ottawa. It is not just a lack of courtesy. It reflects a complete lack of interest and consideration. This is very sad.

Members from Canada had a chance to become better acquainted with their future neighbour. They did not take advantage of this opportunity and as a result may not understand that the purpose of our amendments is the very basis of our determined opposition on this bill. Another perfect example of the two solitudes, although the Minister of Canadian Heritage denied this when he appeared before our committee.

[English]

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak at report stage to Bill C–53. I have proposed 14 amendments and present these as common sense changes. We are told the bill is a simple housekeeping matter, but I suggest this is not the case. The bill should not be passed in its present form and the amendments suggested will improve it.

The first glaring omission is the requirement by the department to submit an annual report. We have heard all the rhetoric from the Liberal side of the House on how accountable it is to Canadians, yet despite this it has neglected to include a clause requiring the department to explain its actions to Canadians.

The Auditor General has made it clear that Canadians and members of Parliament require more access to information about the operations of government than what was presently received. In light of this it is hard to understand why the government has chosen to move in a direction away from reporting of this kind.

We have heard in response to our concerns on this issue that information on the departments may be included in the estimates. However, this is unacceptable for a number of reasons. First, the estimates are prepared to outline in general terms the proposed spending priorities of the department, whereas an annual report provides information about how the money was spent. This is an important difference.

Second, an annual report will include a description of the plans and priorities for the future and an evaluation of whether former plans and priorities have been met. Such information is not contained in the estimates.

Third, the only assurance the House has that information which was formerly contained in the annual reports will be included in the estimates is a promise from the government—cold comfort indeed.

The bill is meant to streamline government and to get rid of bureaucratic redundancies. However consider the following. The inclusion of parks, natural marine conservation areas, historic canals and copyright create an array of confusion and wasted money.

During the review of the bill at committee we heard testimony regarding parks. The managing director of the association for mountain parks protection and enjoyment provided for the committee a balanced review of parks. His presentation did not promote a vision from either of the extremes on the issue. He did not promote a tree hugger approach to parks, which advocates a zero usage mandate for parks. Nor did he promote an industrialist approach, which advocates unsustainable parks use. The position suggested was one of compromise between industry and sustainability. He said: "Many Canadians have questioned why the government moved Parks Canada from the Department of the Environment to a new and seemingly unfocused Department of Canadian Heritage. Over the previous 14 years Parks Canada had established a firm position within the DOE as the leader and innovator in matters affecting the environment. I have proposed an amendment which will delete from the bill all references to Parks Canada. This will allow us to move it to DOE where it belongs".

• (1600)

The same arguments can be made for natural marine conservation areas. Why should the Department of Canadian Heritage be responsible for natural marine conservation areas? It makes no sense. Presently transport looks after historic canals. I fail to understand why we are going to pass a bill that will add jurisdictional headaches, in this case specifically to canals. Again this is needless, wasteful duplication.

I have also proposed amendments which would have the effect of deleting from the bill the references to copyright which it now contains. As the American model demonstrates, the last thing that artists need is a bloated bureaucracy which fights over jurisdiction for copyright responsibilities. The most effective assistance to artists is to take the responsibility for copyright and to lay it squarely within one department. In this instance I believe that department to be industry.

Bill C–53 gives the minister jurisdictional powers over the promotion of greater understanding of human rights, fundamental freedoms, related values and multiculturalism. No one would disagree with the nobility of the intent behind these statements, just as no one would disagree with the statement that racism is bad.

However, our concern remains with the number of ministers responsible for these programs. Presently they are covered by immigration, justice, health, heritage and who knows how many others. This kind of administrative overlap is wasteful and needless.

We have proposed an amendment which would transfer to the regions responsibility for national languages. When reviewing the bill at committee we heard a number of witnesses who criticized the federal government's language policy. The Liberals did not call a single witness to defend the policy. This can only be because it is so hard to find someone to defend it.

Regarding language policy, we recommend the bill include a clause which would read the minister has jurisdiction over the promotion of language policies centred first on freedom of speech, second on recognition of the French language in Quebec and the English language in other provinces; third on recognition of bilingualism in key federal institutions such as the Parliament of Canada and the Supreme Court of Canada; and fourth, on recognition of bilingualism where the number of citizens is sufficient to warrant the provision of services in both official languages.

The Prime Minister has stated that in order to help bring the deficit down he wishes to replace duplication within the provinces. The amendment will do just that. It recognizes that the primary responsibility for languages should remain in the regions and the provinces.

Members of my party have been pointing out the wasteful spending of special interest grants since we arrived in this House and for seven years before our arrival. Clause 7(a) of the bill gives the minister the authority to issue grants, contributions and endowments.

The amendment I present finally puts an end to the special interest funding that Canadians have come to resent. The only people who defend these grants are those who receive them. Surely their opinions should be questionable because of an obvious conflict of interest. When we ask Canadians who do not receive these grants how they feel about them their answers are always the same. They do not understand why their tax dollars should be spent on small groups of people with narrow agendas, especially when that money could be spent in better ways like reducing the deficit and debt and to help protect programs such as health care.

Finally, the government has put in the bill clause 8 which will give the Minister of Canadian Heritage the unilateral authority to raise revenues by arbitrarily raising fees for services or facilities. According to the Financial Administration Act, the minister must take such decisions to cabinet. Such a requirement is the minimal process to be followed for the accountability and transparency of fee increases. Now with clause 8 of the bill, the minister will be able to raise any fees he chooses. He must only consult with the relevant party. What does that mean?

Our amendments bring a nominal level of accountability to government. I seek the support of the House to the changes we recommend.

• (1605)

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): If we are proposing this many amendments, Mr. Speaker, it is chiefly because the bill, as it stands, is really unacceptable to us.

I would like to address in particular the amendment we have proposed on copyrights, as we would like to have copyright throughout federal jurisdiction brought under the Department of Canadian Heritage. We feel this amendment is essential for the following reason: shared responsibility for copyright by the two departments causes undue delay in reviewing the Copyright Act.

When they testified before us last Monday, representatives of the artists' union told us that they have been waiting for politicians to get around to amending the Copyright Act for eight years.

On December 22, 1993, the director general of the Montreal artists' union, Mr. Demers, wrote the Prime Minister to tell him that this sharing of responsibility by two departments has led to a two–headed vision, which has resulted in objectives that were more often than not contradictory. The Copyright Act is the only legislation protecting the rights of creative artists. We believe that it should be designed around this priority. Since it is in the interest of creative artists that consumers have unrestricted access to their works, the Department of Canadian Heritage will certainly not lose sight of their unique interests. We need only review existing legislation in other countries to see that protecting the rights of creative artists in no way impedes the circulation of their works, quite the contrary.

Another reason for presenting this amendment is that the Department of Industry is mandated to look after the interests of consumers and corporations, a responsibility that interferes with the interests of creative artists. The cultural industry is like any other industry, according to the Department of Industry.

During the proceedings of the industry committee, the director general of corporate governance at the Department of Industry, David Tobin, testified as follows:

> Our view, of course, is that cultural groups are exactly that. They are a cultural industry and we recognize them as that. There are employment and financial considerations. They are adding value to it. When you ask whether we treat them differently, I would argue that we consult with them, we share information with them, and we discuss their concerns. I do not think we treat them any differently.

This raises a doubt in my mind: what will happen in the next rounds of negotiations if we are unable to really defend our cultural industries, if we do not see them at the outset as clearly different from other industries? What will happen then with the GATT agreements we had such a hard time securing, at the very last minute this time around.

Another reason is that the industry minister does have legal responsibility for copyright matters. They tried several times to convince us that the responsibility was shared between the two departments, that the two ministers would address the issue, and that the Department of Industry works with the Department of Canadian Heritage. The deputy minister who testified on behalf of the Department of Canadian Heritage said that they were 100 per cent responsible for drafting the bills.

Some responsible individuals with the same mandate at the Department of Industry told the industry committee that their goal—as Mr. Finckenstein stated—was to consolidate the four old departments into a single one and to combine the four old laws into a single one. That was to create the Department of Industry. This bill reflects the situation that prevailed under the old legislation.

The old legislation included the Copyright Act, which came under the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs; responsibility for it has now been given to the Department of Industry. Let me say that the old Department of Communications Act does not contain a single reference to copyright. The only law which refers to it is the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs Act. We now find this same reference in the Department of Industry Act.

This clearly suggests that the Department of Canadian Heritage will have no jurisdiction over copyright, despite what we may have been told and what the Minister of Canadian Heritage himself may have said.

• (1610)

Another reason is that the heritage department's mandate is to promote cultural development. We saw that very clearly in the brief from the Union des artistes, which said: "Since the role of this department is to look after identity, values, cultural development and heritage, we think that it is logical, fitting and obvious that this department defends and promotes the rights of those without whom the above concepts are meaningless".

Surprisingly, during the election campaign which brought it to power, the Liberal Party answered a questionnaire from the Canadian Conference of the Arts, dated October 4. Two questions drew my attention because the answers were particularly interesting.

The Liberal Party was asked if it would make it a priority to revise the Copyright Act so that this law would really defend the financial and moral rights of writers. The Liberal Party answered that revising the Copyright Act would be a priority for it. "We will ensure above all that writers reap the just rewards of their work at the same time as we facilitate access to material protected by copyright. Liberals understand the importance of copyright. That is why, when we reorganize the administrative structure", which we are now doing with this bill, "we will review the Conservatives' decision to divide jurisdiction over copyright between two departments".

I am really sad to see the Liberal Party, which had made a formal commitment to establish a single department and to correct the mistake made by the Conservatives, perpetuate that mistake through Bill C–53. I am sad to see that it gives priority to the industry rather than to creators. Soon, Canada will no longer be a place for creators, because the industry will have taken precedence over creativity.

Another reason why the government should accept the amendment which we propose is expressed, once again, by the Canadian Conference of the Arts: "The cultural sector has a long experience of the paralysis resulting from the sharing of responsibility in key sectors. Suffice it to mention the dead end in which the copyright legislation is stuck, precisely because of this fragmentation of jurisdiction".

As recently as yesterday, we saw an example of the difference between two departments can be and perhaps what a minister with clout can do. When we pressured the heritage minister on broadcasting and cable television companies, he said: "I cannot intervene". However, when major companies asked the government to order the CRTC to review the decision to approve a $2 increase, the government said: "Yes, that decision will be reviewed". Not because that decision is costly for the poor, but because it affects major companies. That is the problem: When it comes to defending real causes, the Liberal Party does not deliver. It does not fulfill the promises it made on cultural development and copyrights.

I deplore this situation and I hope that, before the end of the debate, the government will have the courage to postpone the passing of this bill, which really does not benefit Canadian culture and creative artists. I also hope that the minister, who probably hears our plea somewhere, will take these factors into consideration for the future of Canada.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I was surprised and even disappointed to hear the motions presented by the hon. member for Calgary Southeast, who calls herself a Canadian first but, at the first opportunity, is not averse to lashing out at French Canadian minorities.

• (1615)

Bill C–53, an Act to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage and to amend and repeal certain other Acts, says in clause 4(g), which the hon. member for Calgary Southeast would like to redraft in her image, that the Minister of Canadian Heritage wants to see "the advancement of the equality of status and use of English and French and the enhancement and development of English and French linguistic minority communities in Canada".

The hon. member for Calgary Southeast proposes that lines 23 to 27 be replaced with the following: "(g) the promotion of language policies centred: (i) on freedom of speech". I wonder whether the hon. member for Calgary Southeast realizes what she is saying. Freedom of speech is not about the language you speak but the ideas you want to share with others. She does not even understand the principle of the freedom of speech to which people are entitled in Canada.

Second, she recommends the following: "on recognition of the French language in Quebec and the English language in the other provinces". This is horrifying, coming from a person who calls herself a Canadian but would like to see only Quebec as French speaking and the other provinces, and I say the other provinces and not the rest of Canada, as English–speaking.

As a French speaking member from Ontario, a fourth generation franco Ontarian, I say to the hon. member, through the Chair, that her proposals are an affront and an insult. As a French Canadian and a francophone, do I not have the right to speak my own language and receive services in that language? You would take away these rights. It is utterly despicable to want to take away those rights, and to tell anglophones in Quebec: From now on, you will have to speak French if you want services or whatever.

I would ask the hon. member's colleague to repeat what he just said. Was that a racist comment, sir? Would you repeat what you said?

The Deputy Speaker: Order. I did not hear the remarks. Dear colleagues, this is a very important debate. If all members could just keep their cool and their comments to themselves, this would benefit us all, as Canadians.

I give the floor back to the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester.

Mr. Bellemare: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for this reminder. I can assure you that it is rather difficult to keep your cool when your language rights are violated, when you are told that you will no longer be allowed to speak your language, except in the stables or in the privacy of your own home, in the shed or while mowing the lawn. From now on, I would not be allowed to speak French in my province of Ontario that is so dear to me or to request certain services in French when travelling to Calgary. I regret to say that the hon. member is far from kind.

Her third suggestion deals with "recognition of bilingualism in key federal institutions, such as the Parliament of Canada and the Supreme Court of Canada". She and her colleagues from the Reform Party, whom I have observed, especially on the official languages committee, do not understand the first thing about the Official Languages Act, nor do they understand what bilingualism is about.

They do not understand what bilingualism is about. They confuse official languages and bilingualism. They are under the impression that laws are made here to force anglophones to speak French for example. That is not it. The hon. member, on the other hand, would like to force me to become, if possible, unilingual and speak English only. There is nothing wrong with being a unilingual English speaking member of Parliament, but personally, as a franco Ontarian, I would rather be francophone, franco Ontarian and bilingual, and have respect for English Canadians as well as French Canadians.

Bilingualism, dear lady, is for people who put themselves at the service of others.

The Deputy Speaker: I think it was pointed out at least five times that members should address their remarks to the chair. We would then avoid problems like this. I would ask the hon. member to address his comments to the chair, please.

Mr. Bellemare: Mr. Speaker, you are right, I will address my remarks to you, but I will refer to the hon. member. I know that to the hon. member, who probably does not understand French and certainly does not speak it, the word "madam" may sound very negative and even derogatory. I wanted to pay her a compliment, but she does not want me to. Perhaps she is not a lady. I do not know, but I do know that she is an elected member.

So from now on I will refer to her as the hon. member for Calgary Southeast, who is against bilingualism and against francophones outside Quebec. Bilingualism is for those who want to serve the country. Bilingualism is for those who want to serve the people of their country. Bilingualism is for those who want to do business with other countries, English speaking countries and French–speaking countries alike.

There are about one billion anglophones and francophones around the globe. One billion. People who become bilingual are an asset to Canada, but dear lady—excuse me, the hon. member for Calgary Southeast—is not interested in principles or in Canadian history. I am sure that she does not spend her evenings reading about Jacques Cartier, Champlain or Montcalm. She thinks that Canadian history started when she was born and that regulations should always be based on financial considerations. She does not give a hoot about anglophone minorities in Quebec and francophone minorities outside Quebec. I find her remarks totally deplorable and un–Canadian.

[English]

Mr. Hugh Hanrahan (Edmonton—Strathcona, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to stand before the House and discuss the report stage of Bill C–53.

Bill C–53, as I mentioned during the first and second reading, is riddled with problems which are quite evident if we look at the number of motions that have been put forward by the Reform Party and the Bloc Quebecois. Because of time constraints, I will attempt to keep my comments extremely brief and focus solely on the motions before us.

Motion No. 2 deals with the removal of clause 4 in section 2(a). While I am in no way against "the promotion of the greater understanding of human rights, fundamental freedoms and related values". I am against the idea of having more than one minister responsible for these issues. In fact I wholeheartedly believe that the Department of Justice is better suited to ensure the noble intentions of this clause.

• (1625)

Passage of Motion No. 3 would result in the elimination of multiculturalism from the bill. I believe that the continued funding of programs like this will ensure a Liberal defeat in the next election. Canadians want less government, not more. They want to see the government manage its allocation of revenues and stop running up astronomical debts and deficits.

In short, what they are looking for is a government to priorize its spending programs to ensure that everyone is maximizing the benefits from his or her tax dollars.

Government funded multiculturalism programs do nothing to address this fundamental attitude toward government spending and programs. In fact, the Liberals seem more content to raise Canadian taxes than they are to control spending. We have a spending problem in Canada, not a revenue problem. Therefore not only is multiculturalism financially unsound but in fact it is politically unsound as well.

As a member of the standing committee on heritage I have had the pleasure of listening to witnesses describe the multicultural funded programs as a poor way to promote culture. Moreover, I have heard and talked to many Canadians who believe that multiculturalism does nothing but make us all hyphenated Canadians focusing on what separates and not what binds us together. Its day has come and gone and it is time that the Liberals face up to this fact.

Motions 5 and 21 deal with an issue that is also of great concern to the Reform Party. I am speaking of overlap and duplication. Why should one department oversee areas which should be under another portfolio such as national parks and marine conservation areas, or even historical canals. It should be our goal as parliamentarians to do everything in our power to decrease the amount of bureaucracy and administer services in each department by themselves.

Motions 5 and 21 will be a step in the right direction. They will allow parks and conservation to go back to the Department of the Environment and historic canals to return to transportation.

Historical canals belong to the department of transportation for the simple reason that they are administered by and are subject to the regulations of the department of transportation. A perfect example would be the Ottawa canal. It is a historical canal yet it is still in use and therefore subject to the rules and regulations of the department of transportation. Therefore why is it in the department of heritage?

Motion No. 6 has been clearly stated and illustrated in the Reform Party's blue book policies. Essentially we believe that there is no need for the official bilingualism policy. We feel there should be a policy based on territorial bilingualism where bilingual services will be maintained and supported where numbers warrant. That is the reason we have recognized the need for bilingualism especially in key federal institutions such as Parliament and the Supreme Court which are explicitly outlined in Motion No. 6.

Clause 7(a) of Bill C–53 is of extreme concern to me as it allows the ministers to facilitate the implementation of any program and the minister also to provide financial assistance in the form of grants, contributions and endowments to any person. The concern arises from the idea that the minister may at his or her discretion provide financial assistance in the form of grants, contributions and endowments. Where are the checks and balances? Where is the accountability? Where is the financial control? Where is the openness and transparency?

Another concern relates to the fact that the minister could be allowed to implement other programs, such as multicultural programs, unilaterally. This would not only be unacceptable to me, to the Reform Party, my constituents, but also to a majority of Canadians.

Motion No. 12 would alleviate this concern as far as it relates to clause 7. Directly related to clause 7(a), clause 8 should be eliminated. Clause 8 deals directly with the notion that the minister can fix fees and charges which the minister considers appropriate. Again, what happened to accountability and openness or checks and balances?

• (1630)

Prior to the bill the minister was responsible and subject to any regulations that Treasury Board made. After Bill C–53, the minister may or may not be subject to these regulations as set out by Treasury Board. It is unclear and therefore it should be removed.

Although for the most part Treasury Board is no more than a rubber stamp in terms of approval for rate increases or fees or changes, there is still an institutional check on the powers of the ministry.

Motions Nos. 14, 15, 16, 18 and 19 alleviate the concerns which the Reform Party has outlined in clause 8 regarding the accountability and powers of a minister.

The last motion I would like to discuss briefly is Motion No. 20. It deals with the inclusion of an annual report which would be brought before Parliament outlining the expenditures and revenues of the department of heritage. I speak in support of this motion because I believe in accountability, openness and fairness.

An annual report would help not only parliamentarians but also Canadians to understand where, why and how much funding was allocated to ensure the best accountability possible. Although I have heard that part III of the estimates will be improved to accommodate the lack of an annual report, I believe it is still in the best interests of Canadians to have an annual report simply because it would be more accessible and clearer than the estimates.

I appreciate this opportunity and I hope that all members of the House listened carefully to why these motions should be supported. I look for them to support these motions when the time comes for a vote.

Mr. Tony Ianno (Trinity—Spadina, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to voice my concern and to basically state that I do not believe this motion should be adopted.

The main reason is, as we have discussed in committee, that the Multiculturalism Act is really a Canadian reality. What we are dealing with here is an opportunity for us as an institution, as a government to ensure that Canadians and those coming from abroad continue to understand the differences that make up this country.

I think multiculturalism helps on the basis of trying to reduce the barriers that exist between us. There are many aspects to multiculturalism that are a new reality in the global sense. That is from an entrepreneurial perspective and business opportunities. I think that when we take into account that the world is becoming smaller with satellites and telecommunications, faxes et cetera, there is an opportunity to encourage our businesses to do more trade which is the fundamental aspect of growth that we in this country are looking forward to.

This act and the Minister of Heritage will continue to increase the understanding of our realism, the Canadian identity as it exists today. We also have to continue to strengthen the cohesion that exists in this country and reduce the lack of understanding that sometimes exists in different regions.

If we take into account the rich human resources and the opportunities that exist for increasing that trade, we will see more Canadians working and we will reduce our deficit problems as the member across stated.

I also believe that multiculturalism policy is an eloquent testimony to our commitment to uphold the values of equity and fairness. It is a visionary statement about the kind of society we are all working to achieve, one in which each Canadian can realize his or her potential, economically, socially, politically and culturally. Multiculturalism is appropriately part of the department of heritage because it is a fundamental characteristic of our Canadian identity.

• (1635)

Therefore I believe the motion should not be adopted.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on October 3, I spoke on Bill C–53 in this House and I rise today to denounce the mandate which the Department of Canadian Heritage is about to give itself. It is unacceptable for me and for all Quebecers that this new department's mandate makes no reference to Quebec as a society or to its cultural and linguistic specificity.

Why does the Liberal government again stubbornly persist in wanting to deny the existence of Quebec, its language rights and its cultural specificity? How can the federal government claim that it wants to promote Canadian identity and intentionally omit from its bill any reference to Quebec culture?

Therefore I will support the amendments moved by my colleague from Rimouski—Témiscouata to include in Bill C–53 references to the specific nature of Quebec's culture, language and identity.

I will continue in the same vein by demonstrating to this House that this new department's mandate is to assimilate Quebec culture, no more or less.

Let us take the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation as a specific case in point supporting my argument.

The Broadcasting Act says that the CBC's programming should seek to be of equivalent quality in French and in English.

On this subject the law is clear: French and English must be treated as equivalent.

Let me give you another quotation, this time from part of CRTC decision 87–140, in connection with a public hearing of the Canadian Radio–Television and Telecommunications Commission on January 21, 1994 concerning the licence renewals of the English and French networks.

Among the long term objectives which the CRTC set for the CBC is the following: to achieve a fair and equitable balance in production, distribution and scheduling of regional and network programs on both networks, English and French.

The CBC's mandate is clear since it is dictated by the CRTC's directives and the Broadcasting Act. The French and English networks must be equally productive and have the same rate of programming.

The two quotes which I just read to you clearly show the federal government's apparent intentions. These views are clearly reflected in the act, as well as in the guidelines published by the Crown corporation responsible for the monitoring and renewal of licences for television and broadcasting in Canada.

The federal government says that it seeks to promote the use of French in Canada. However, the daily reality does not support that claim; in fact, it shows just the opposite.

The government cannot merely tell us about its good intentions: It must also act. It is nice to claim equal status for French and English, but that claim must be supported. These are mere statements of intention with no real basis.

On July 27, 1994, the CRTC approved the budget allocation of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, in an internal document entitled CRTC Decision 94–437. That document clearly indicates that the CBC allocates 63 per cent of its TV network budget to the English language network, and only 37 per cent to the French language network, this for the term of its next licence.

Moreover, the CRTC feels that the CBC is in the best position to decide how to allocate its funds. Thus, the CRTC is satisfied that the corporation's decisions do not violate the legislation.

If you look at the overall programming costs for the two networks, you will see that the proportion for the French language network is now below 40 per cent, its level of six years ago.

Furthermore, in 1970, there was no difference at all between the two networks. I think this proves that the federal government is gradually limiting the scope of its duties and obligations to accommodate a not so subtle policy of assimilation.

The Broadcasting Act and the CRTC required the corporation to give equal treatment to both networks. Furthermore, both the legislation and the CRTC specify that production of programming should be equivalent for the English and French networks.

However, when it is time to share financial resources, the French network gets half the funding that goes to the English network.

This reduction in financing for the French network reflects Ottawa's lack of vision, which has been very harmful to the development and vitality of the country's francophone communities. This is a typical example of the federal government's policy of ignoring reality.

In fact it reflects the policy of cultural and linguistic assimilation favoured by the federal government: legislate fair and equal treatment for English and French, while this is not followed through in the allocation of financial resources.

I will give a few examples of the corporation's disproportionate allocation of financing.

In 1992 the average investment per hour of programming was $37,496 on the English network and $18,390 on the French network. In other words, half as much.

The average cost of news bulletins was $18,000 on the English network and $7,000 on the French network. Less than half.

The average cost of drama programs was $90,000 on the English network and $68,800 on the French network.

I realize that the Minister of Canadian Heritage and the President of the CBC, Mr. Manera, will try to justify what is being done by his crown corporation by saying that Canada has three times as many anglophones as francophones. However, the tv ratings for the French network are three times as high as for the English network.

In fact, ratings for the English network vary from 11 per cent to 13 per cent during prime time. The Chairman of the CRTC, Keith Spicer, even referred to recent figures below 10 per cent. Ratings for the French network, however vary between 30 per cent and 38 per cent.

In other words, the French network reaches the same number of Canadians as the English network. So why are financial resources not allocated accordingly? Why is the French network at such a disadvantage when it manages to reach the same number of viewers as the English network?

• (1645)

I would like the heritage minister to be able to reply to these questions, because this looks like a policy of assimilation designed to bring about the death of Canada's other cultural community.

Is it the goal of the federal government to destroy the stronghold of the French language in North America? In any event, that is what I think and what the assimilation rate that grows from one census to the next would seem to indicate. Is this the federal government's covert policy of ignoring reality?

This is an unacceptable situation, especially when Canadian legislation stipulates clearly that the treatment must be equivalent. Not more, not less, but equivalent.

How, then, can the federal government continue to claim that it guarantees the equal treatment and use of French in its federal institutions when there are examples such as those of the CBC and the CRTC?

These facts reinforce the findings of the Official Languages Committee. The annual report on official languages demonstrates beyond any reasonable doubt that Canadian heritage organizations are in fact agents for assimilating rather than protecting the French speaking citizens of this country.

The Minister of Canadian Heritage must deliver the goods to the French speaking community in Quebec and elsewhere in this country. The federal Liberal government has the responsibility to guarantee the rights of the cultural minority in this country, especially when they are clearly enshrined in its legislation.

I would like to take the opportunity available to me today to denounce the Department of Canadian Heritage, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation and the CRTC. This department and these crown corporations are giving credence to decisions that are contrary to the rights of French–speaking communities in Quebec and elsewhere in this country. The federal government has no right to sanction these decisions by the CBC and the CRTC.

The federal government and this new Department of Canadian Heritage deny the cultural identity of Quebec and work against it.

I therefore salute this democratic exercise to which we have been called by the Government of Quebec, in the form of the draft bill on Quebec sovereignty.

This draft bill sets out the political plan that the Government of Quebec recommends in order to resolve, for once and for all, the constitutional problem in which Quebec has been mired for too many years. I think that it is the only way we have left to promote the full development of the people of Quebec.

The Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Beauport—Montmorency—Orléans—MIL Davie Shipyard; the hon. member for Gaspé—Fisheries; the hon. member for Bourassa—Immigration; the hon. member for Châteauguay—MIL Davie Shipyard; the hon. member for Chambly—Customs Brokers.

Mr. John Godfrey (Don Valley West, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I am rising to discuss Motion No. 5, which deals with national parks. According to the amendment the effect would be to drop all references in the legislation to national parks, historic canals and national marine areas.

I suppose the question arises: Why should we include national parks under Canadian heritage? For those of us who have been interested in the park system it is interesting to note that over the years national parks have been located in different ministries.

The first place they were to be found after their creation in the 1880s was in what might be described as the predecessor to the Ministry of Natural Resources. This indicates that parks in those days were seen to have not only a natural component but also an economic component. They were seen as part of Canada's natural resources.

A subsequent reorganization of government meant that parks found themselves suddenly with Indian Affairs and Northern Development. This new vision of parks suggested that they were to be seen somehow as up there, out there, out of sight, out of mind to some degree. That was because they were in remote places often in the north, often in places where the aboriginal populations could be found. Of course that ignored the reality that there were parks close to centres of habitation, such as the Rocky Mountain parks.

After that the parks structures found themselves in the Minister of the Environment which seemed to make sense. The theme there was one of protection rather than human use. It put the stress on not interfering with the parks which took away the notion of an economic connection with parks.

Now finally with Canadian heritage the circle is to some extent complete. This latest reorganization of government recognizes that parks have different characteristics all of which have to be recognized. They are natural preserves and need protection, but they are also cultural sites. They are also economic sites for activity, for tourism for example.

By putting them into a new ministry this bill tries to recognize the complex way in which we now look at parks. In this bill we recognize that history, culture and nature are intertwined in some fundamental way. This is simply to pick up on what is happening internationally under conventions such as that of UNESCO concerning the protection of the world cultural and natural heritage. In UNESCO's eyes cultural and natural heritage are inevitably linked and so they are in ours.

Parks are also a crucial element of our national identity. They go with the vision that Canadians have of themselves wherever they live, of being in some close harmony with nature, some respect of nature and some awe of nature. It was Margaret Atwood who once described the common theme of Canadian literature, si c'était en anglais ou en français, as survival in the face of nature, survival in the face of difficult forces.

Those who are concerned that by having parks taken away from the Department of the Environment should rest assured that the environmental concerns will not be diminished by having them in Canadian heritage. They will continue to be respected. It will continue to be the case in our international agreements, such as under UNESCO that parks will be fully protected.

The reason that parks are being put in Canadian heritage is to respect their role as part of our system of values, part of our history, part of our culture, part of what it is to be a Canadian.

As I mentioned earlier, there is an appropriate return to where we first saw parks because there are economic reasons as well to link together national parks and national historic sites. That is because tourism of all sorts is of continuing and indeed growing importance for this government. As members of this House will recall, we have a major $7 billion tourist deficit and parks have their role to play in correcting that, as do national historic sites.

These are terrific assets, our parks and historic sites. It makes sense for them to be kept together. We think that indeed for those who worry about the environment having parks located in the Department of Canadian Heritage simply means there is one more environmental voice at the cabinet table.

It is also the case that it is a commitment of this government to complete the national parks system, that system which was so much expanded in the 1970s by our present Prime Minister. To this we are adding a new kind of park under water parks, the national marine conservation areas which this amendment would have us locate in some other place. These are the parks of the future; these are the parks which respect our complex marine life. They too belong in the same package with the national parks and national historic sites.

Finally, it seems to us that having subjected the national parks system to so many reorganizations and having had it put in so many different places over time that Parks Canada has done well in the new Department of Canadian Heritage. It has found a new place to call home. It would be both counterproductive and extraordinarily disruptive to move it yet again after a mere year and a half.

For those reasons we are opposed to this amendment. We think that national parks and indeed canals and national marine conservation areas belong properly with the Department of Canadian Heritage.

• (1655)

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I think you might find unanimous consent for the following motion. I move:

> That 15 members, three staff and three interpreters from the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri-Food be allowed to hold hearings in relation to the committee's study on the future of Canadian agriculture in St. Hyacinthe, Victoriaville, Quebec City, Florenceville, Halifax and Charlottetown from January 22 to January 28, 1995; in Kelowna, Camrose, Lethbridge, Saskatoon, Winnipeg, London, St. Catharines, Brockville and Alfred from February 5 to February 15, 1995.

The Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Hermanson: No, Mr. Speaker, I will not give unanimous consent. I believe there is some disagreement among the committee as to the benefit of this trip.

[Translation]

Mr. Benoît Sauvageau (Terrebonne, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise in this House to speak on Bill C-53. Before getting to my opening remarks, I would like to start by giving a definition of bilingualism. This is my own personal definition but one that I believe is shared by many Quebecers. This is for the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester who talked about bilingualism and its importance. He has used this term over and over.

I think that, for a Quebecer, bilingualism simply means that a French-speaking Quebecer learns English. We are not so sure that it works both ways. As far as we are concerned, for us, it means learning English, and for the English, being able to understand us. There are of course exceptions, colleagues whom

I wish to congratulate, in this House, on our committee and around us.

The importance of the multicultural dimension of Canadian unity has been mentioned. Not so long ago, we had the opportunity to travel to western Canada with the environment committee. Much to my surprise, be it in Winnipeg, Edmonton—and I call this to the attention of the hon. member for St. Boniface, champion of the French fact—or Vancouver, we were unable to find French–language newspapers in the hotel, airport or convenience store. Nowhere in Edmonton, Winnipeg and Vancouver was I able to buy Le Devoir or La Presse. But you could get USA Today and magazines from New York City. There were all sorts of magazines and newspapers but none in French. And we are told that the French fact is very well championed just about everywhere. I have my doubts about that.

The amendment to clause 4, presented by my colleague from Rimouski—Témiscouata, would simply recognize Quebec's identity in Bill C–53. It is an essential clause. It is indeed essential to recognize that Canada was built by two founding peoples, a fact that this bill denies. That is why we cannot support it. These two founding peoples are the francophones and anglophones of this country.

I do not think that a single Liberal member would knowingly contest the fact that Canada was built by two founding peoples. This is what the Minister of Canadian Heritage is simply denying with this bill. That is why we are opposed to it.

I therefore urge the minister to recognize the two founding nations and to accept every amendment proposed by the hon. member for Rimouski—Témiscouata, which recognizes Quebec's identity, so that every motion should include the word "Quebec" or "the identity of Quebec". Otherwise, we cannot approve Bill C–53, as it denies an obvious reality in this country.

If I may, I would like to read from the report of a Canadian royal commission that was written a number of years ago. This is a rather long excerpt, but I will tell you afterwards when it was written and by which royal commission, and you will see that the problem goes back a long way.

• (1700)

Here is the excerpt. The dominant majority in politics—like the federal government and the anglophones—often takes its advantages for granted and does not appreciate the disadvantages suffered by the minority, especially when this minority enjoys or appears to enjoy some degree of cultural freedom. However, the minority, as long as it regards its collective life as an entity, may want control over it and look beyond cultural freedom. It then questions its political status. It feels that its future and cultural development are somewhat precarious and perhaps limited in a political environment dominated by the other group forming the majority. As a result, it leans towards greater constitutional autonomy. Ideally, the minority wants this autonomy for the whole community but, when this objective cannot be reached, it may focus its efforts on a narrower political stage where it would be in the majority.

We think about sovereignty. It is personal. This excerpt is from the 1967 Laurendeau–Dunton report on bilingualism and biculturalism.

The recognition of the French fact, of francophone minority rights goes back to at least 1967. One francophone and one anglophone on the same royal commission signed this report recognizing minority rights. It is therefore imperative to recognize these rights.

According to the brief submitted by the Société Saint–Jean–Baptiste, it is important to see how this conclusion has evolved over the years, how political parties have learned to live with the findings of the Royal Commission on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. I am talking about biculturalism and not multiculturalism.

Twenty–five years later, in 1991, another look at this issue of culture and the French fact in Quebec and Canada led to the following conclusion: The two levels of government also compete on the last element of the analysis, culture, resulting in overspending, conflict and inefficiency.

An hon. member: Come on.

Mr. Sauvageau: Sorry, Mr. Speaker, for going on and on about the French fact, but it is important to us, although you may be tired of hearing about it.

The federal government has played a major role in cultural life through several institutions: the National Archives, National Gallery, CBC, Canada Council for arts and research, National Film Board. Some fields of exclusive federal jurisdiction have major repercussions on Quebec's cultural sector, for example, in communications. Given the importance of culture to the development of Quebec's identity, we could not overemphasize the urgency of taking back jurisdiction in this field. Quebec must exercise exclusive jurisdiction in all areas related to culture and communications.

This conclusion comes from the report of the constitutional committee of the Liberal Party of Quebec, not the Parti Quebecois, but the Liberal Party of Quebec, in 1991, on page 32 of the report entitled "a Quebec that is free to make its own choices".

Twenty–five years later, we in Quebec have not deviated very far from the position that Quebec culture, to be well defended, must first of all exist and second be managed solely and exclusively in Quebec.

Does this date from 1967? No. Long before that, royal institutions recognized this distinction between the French fact and the English fact in North America. Let us review some constitutional history. In 1791, the Constitution Act recognized Upper and Lower Canada. Since 1791, a distinct society of French–speaking people in North America has been recognized.

Why did the crown agree to divide the territory then? To please the Loyalists? Why were the Napoleonic Code, the seigneurial system, the French fact and the Catholic religion recognized? Quite simply, because there was a distinct society in North America then. It still exists and it is found mainly in Quebec.

• (1705)

Later, in 1840, they tried to bury that minority with the Union Act. They tried to bury it when anglophones formed a majority. Following the Durham report, they thought that if the two colonies, Upper and Lower Canada, were joined, francophones would be in a minority situation and would quickly disappear. Therefore the problem of the French fact would be solved.

Luckily for us, we are still here to take care of ourselves. In 1867, we managed to create a province, Quebec, primarily to protect our rights. However, this bill would eliminate everything for which we fought in the past.

Throughout their history, francophones have preserved their distinct society in North America, and that must be clearly recognized. As my colleague mentioned earlier, a member of a group represented by the Société nationale des Québécois de l'Outaouais came to talk to us. He gave examples of how francophones were treated unfairly, here in this country. The financing of Radio–Canada is one such example.

As the Société nationale des Québécois de l'Outaouais said, "Radio–Canada is another example of cultural discrimination by the federal government. If the two languages and the two cultures are truly on an equal footing, and if Canada is bilingual and bicultural, the two networks should receive equal financing. Yet, the French language network receives 37 per cent, compared to 63 per cent for the English language network. To justify this discrepancy, the CRTC said, on January 21, 1994, when the TV licences of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation were renewed, that if the allocation of money were based on demographics, the ratio would be three to one in favour of the English language network".

The figures support the CRTC decision to allocate 63 and 37 per cent respectively to the two networks. However, if you take the ratings into consideration, you will see that they are comparable. Radio–Canada is indeed treated unfairly.

I conclude with a quote from a great Quebec historian, Denis Monière, who submitted a brief to the committee. I trust I can quote him verbatim in the House. He said: "The establishment of the Department of Canadian Heritage, which is the most thorough and perverse Canadian imposture, follows the numerous attempts made since 1867 to deny the existence of a people which is distinct from the Canadian people and which refuses to be integrated into an alienating entity. This project reflects a Canadian cultural imperialism bent on eradicating Quebec's national identity and following a long tradition inspired by the Durham report. Since that report, all those who believed in a bicultural Canada were proven wrong by Canadian history, and misled French Canadians besides".

For all the reasons which I have tried to express without being put off, we oppose Bill C–53.

[English]

Mr. Pagtakhan: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. Earlier this afternoon the member for Calgary Southeast stated: "We have some of the same concerns expressed by the Liberals when they were in opposition. Let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, of some of their earlier criticisms. The member for Winnipeg North suggested that the foundation, referring to the Canadian Race Relations Foundation"—

The Deputy Speaker: This is a perfectly legitimate debate and there is time for the member to debate. From what I have heard thus far it is not a point of order. If the member wishes to debate he is perfectly free to sit down and rise again on debate. Is the hon. member for Winnipeg North on debate?

Mr. Rey D. Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North, Lib.): Yes, Mr. Speaker. The member for Calgary Southeast said: "The member for Winnipeg North suggested that the foundation", referring to the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, "should not exist because the responsibility for the program should be accomplished elsewhere".

• (1710)

For the record of the House I would like to state that on May 29, 1990, to which the member was referring, I stated on page 12020 of Hansard with reference to the Canadian Race Relations Foundation:

> I support this bill, which is to contribute to the elimination of racism and all forms of racial discrimination in Canadian society.

On the following page I said again:

> I support this Canadian Race Relations Foundation based on the preamble that we will support and reaffirm our support for the international convention on the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination; that we will henceforth reaffirm our belief and support in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms; that the Canadian Multiculturalism Act would assume greater and greater meaning.

The record speaks for itself. What the member for Calgary Southeast did was not only take my statement out of context but misrepresented my statements. Therefore to me it was a dishonourable thing.

The Deputy Speaker: The Chair is having great difficulty. Having ruled that the member was not speaking on a point of order but on debate, the Chair therefore is hoisted on the same petard.

The hon. member for Calgary Southeast has already spoken on this matter and does not therefore have the right to speak further.

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. The hon. member for Winnipeg North called my colleague a dishonourable member. I would ask that he withdraw that statement from the House.

The Deputy Speaker: I listened carefully to the hon. member for Winnipeg North and I think the member said that what was done was a dishonourable thing. The thing was dishonourable, not the member. Perhaps the member for Winnipeg North would like to clarify that.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, if I said dishonourable member, I would withdraw it. What she did in her speech was dishonourable.

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that what the hon. member for Winnipeg North is insinuating is that the hon. member is dishonourable, and that is wrong. He can couch it in different words but he is actually referring to the member. I would ask that he withdraw that statement.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, never in my mind is the member dishonourable. I regret that she said it but the statement was made and it is with pain that I received the statement. Therefore, to that extent I would like you to consider that the statement lacks honour.

The Deputy Speaker: I wonder if the hon. whip of the government wishes to make any intervention on this matter.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I know that in the cut and thrust of debate we sometimes make references to one another which are unfortunate. I do believe that the hon. member meant that the statements were unacceptable. I hope it was not a reflection on the hon. member. I am sure she is most honourable, as all other members are.

The Deputy Speaker: It is virtually Christmas Eve. I am sorry we are reduced to this. We are obliged to call each other hon. members every time we refer to each other. Because that particular word is used so often in this House, I would invite the hon. member for Winnipeg North to reflect on what the effects of his comments here this afternoon have amounted to.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge that the member for Calgary Southeast is honourable.

The Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. House leader of the Reform Party have any further intervention?

Mr. Hermanson: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Winnipeg North for clarifying that for us. I appreciate it.

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(1) a recorded division on the motion stands deferred. The recorded division will also apply to Motion No. 10.

Before proposing group No. 2, I must remind you that: Motions Nos. 11, 12, and 13 will be grouped for debate and voted on as follows: Motion No. 11 will be voted on separately. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 12 obviates the necessity of a question on Motion No. 13. A negative vote on Motion No. 12 necessitates the question being put on Motion No. 13.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

The House resumed from November 17 consideration of the motion.

Mr. Jim Hart (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it certainly is gratifying to know that the spirit of Christmas has fallen upon this House. It was interesting listening to the debate this afternoon.

Earlier this year Information Commissioner John Grace included in his annual report 43 recommendations to close loopholes in the 10 year old Access to Information Act. Mr. Grace stated: "The first decade has shown that the government bent on secrecy can certainly diminish the effectiveness of the access law".

Mr. Grace goes on to say that he wants the new government to have the self–confidence to be scrutinized and the fortitude to be forthright.

Motion No. 304 gives the Liberal government that golden opportunity to take this first crucial step toward restoring Canada's faith. At the top of page 92 of the red book which starts by talking of initiatives to "restore the confidence in the institutions of government", it certainly seems like the Liberal government in the spirit of this motion would have to agree with Motion No. 304.

The information commissioner's recommendation No. 43 states that the access act be extended to all federal government institutions including special operating agencies, crown corporations and wholly owned subsidiaries, any institutions to which the federal government appoints a majority of governing body members, the Senate, the House of Commons, the Library of Parliament and all officers of Parliament.

During debate on motion 304 of November 17, I was listening very carefully to the member for St. Paul's. He made a couple of comments in his address to the House that I would like to repeat.

He said: "At the time of the act"—it was passed in 1982—"there was careful consideration to which institutions should be included in the coverage of the act and which should not". Later in his address he went on to say: "We cannot assume that these were frivolous decisions as to who was included and who was excluded". I thought to myself it was worthy of doing some research on. Was it carefully thought out?

We went to the Library of Parliament to see if we could find out some information about those debates and the reasons why some corporations were excluded and some were not. An article from the Hill Times printed March 17, 1994 is headed: "Parliament's exemption from information access act perplexing".

The reporter went back to the key people who were involved in the drafting of the act in the late 1970s and the early 1980s. Strangely enough, all of the people who were contacted said that they could not recall an actual reason for the exclusions. Then the reporter went back to the person who should really have all the information on this, the man responsible for drafting Bill C–43, Liberal minister Francis Fox. He was posed the question, why were these exemptions made? How did he respond? "You got me". That is what he said. He did not know.

We wanted to dig a little deeper into this. We went to Robert Auger, the Privy Council adviser to Mr. Fox and posed the same question. What was the reason for these exemptions? He said: "It is some kind of philosophical assumption that nobody questioned". Nobody has ever questioned this. That comes back to the debate of November 17 and the comments from the member for St. Paul's. I am certain that he did not intend to mislead this House.

Certainly the testimony I have presented today would indicate that there was not careful consideration at the time. At least we should ask questions and maybe even assume that some of these decisions were frivolous and without basis.

Crown corporations have not been open to public scrutiny and this continues to fuel the fire of voter cynicism. Canadians are demanding accountability. They want open government. Is there anything wrong with accountability and open government? It is high time that the government takes action.

Why are crown corporations exempt from the Access to Information Act? Let us look at a couple of them. In the case of the CBC and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, there are concerns that competitors would be able to gain an advantage in their respective markets through access requests.

These crown corporations continue to exist because they are financed by the Canadian taxpayer, not because they are profit making players in the competitive marketplace. This is a pretty strong argument for wanting accountability and access to information on how these corporations are operated. The taxpayers want to know how their hard earned dollars are being spent. Provisions could be made that could protect commercially viable information. Therefore that argument is also put to rest.

There have been numerous examples of the need for public access to information on crown corporations. Earlier this year the National Arts Centre spent $250,000 on a proposal to submit an application for a performing arts television network. If it had not been for the Auditor General's report, Canadians would have been kept in the dark about this ridiculously expensive proposition. The Auditor General said: "The activities of and the expenses incurred for this broadcasting project are beyond the objects and powers of this corporation".

In addition the Auditor General obtained legal opinions supporting the view that a performing arts network was outside the NAC's mandate. If the National Arts Centre had not been exempt from access to information, a private citizen might have been able to come forward with this information, an elected official of the House, or maybe even a journalist would have easily exposed this ludicrous proposal before some $250,000 taxpayer dollars were spent needlessly.

Canadians currently pay for half of the NAC's annual operating budget of $40 million. Do they not have the right to ask certain questions about the operations? The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation is financed by Canadians to the tune of $1.1 billion, and yet it operates under the same veil of secrecy as the other crown corporations. Access to information would allow Canadians to question just how that $1.1 billion is spent. Canadians have the right to know.

Again I would remind the House that provisions could be made to protect the commercially viable information that needs to be protected.

According to CBC staffers, costs of production are kept secret, even within its own organization, to avoid jealousies among producers whose shows are given different budgets and to keep writers and others from knowing how little of the pie they actually receive. It is a shame.

Instead of going to Parliament the Auditor General's report on the CBC will be submitted to the CBC's board of directors and made public if and when the board sees fit. The true owners are being deprived of this information on the CBC. Who would they be? The people of Canada.

Access to information would eliminate this cat and mouse game. Again I would like to reiterate this because it is important. Provisions could be made to ensure commercially viable and valuable information would be protected.

Perhaps a crown corporation should file an access to information request just to find out for themselves what access to information really means. When information is kept secret, bureaucrats and politicians could be tempted to do things that they would not do if they were made public. The more information available to Canadians the better off the country will be.

I will give some more examples of the kinds of abuses that I am talking about. There have been abuses throughout history. Perhaps the most famous was that of the Aberdeen Marina, the Hong Kong club where Canada's foreign offices spent some $773,000 on memberships for 34 diplomats and family members. That was back in the early 1980s. Or maybe it was the so–called bridge to nowhere. Members may recall the $2.1 million structure erected in the riding of a federal Conservative cabinet minister. The only problem with the project was that the bridge when built was not connected to any road.

A more recent example, and we may never have the answer to this one, is much taxpayers paid to chauffeur, entertain and put Haitian leader Jean Bertrand Aristide in hotels during his recent six day visit to Ottawa in January.

• (1740)

A local Ottawa newspaper reported that it requested the information under access to information. It was refused by foreign affairs which claimed Aristide's hotel bill was too sensitive and could lead to squabbling among other foreign visitors because they may receive lesser treatment. Do the taxpayers of Canada not have the right to know this information? I think they do.

The Liberal government red book talks of initiatives to restore confidence in the institutions of government. Gosh, that sounds good. According to my research, the government should do so soon. It has an opportunity right now. Freedom of information builds faith like few other policies build faith in the Government of Canada. It slows the build–up of dirty laundry that a future government will only be too happy to wash.

My Liberal colleagues could well learn from the information commissioner's scathing criticism of the Mulroney government's attempt to put roadblocks in the way of citizens trying to find out about how the government made decisions and what those were.

The final piece of evidence that I have today is from a gentleman by the name of John G. McCamus who was involved as a witness in the second reading of Bill C–43 in 1980. He said: "As many critics of the bill have observed, there is one highly visible category of federal agencies which have not been included in the schedule—the federal crown corporations engaged in the supply of goods and services. The exclusion of commercial crown corporations from the access scheme is, in a word, indefensible".

In closing, Motion No. 304 is about openness and accountability. The government owes it to all Canadians to have the self–confidence to be scrutinized and the fortitude to be forthright. The passage of Motion No. 304 will help to regain the public confidence in this institution.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean H. Leroux (Shefford, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is always a privilege and an honour for me to represent the people in my riding of Shefford, who elected me in the last federal election and who expect a high degree of integrity from us.

It is my opinion that the Access to Information Act should be extended to all government institutions, as tabled in Motion No. 304 by the member for Red Deer. The purpose of this motion is to make the whole Canadian federal administration more accessible and open.

This transparency is necessary if we are to win back the confidence of the taxpayers, particularly in this period of economic austerity, when the federal government is preparing to make cuts in a multitude of social programs, when, at the same time, the heads of Crown agencies are getting rich on taxpayers' money and enjoying privileges beyond the reach of the average Canadian, and when this same government is making thousands of partisan appointments, with no public control.

Nevertheless, in his Speech from the Throne last January 18, the Prime Minister stated that integrity and public trust in the institutions of government were essential. In addition, he said, and I quote: "The Government is committed to enhancing the credibility of Parliament. Changes will be proposed to the rules of the House of Commons to provide Members of Parliament a greater opportunity to contribute to the development of public policy and legislation".

The time has now come for the federal government to table legislation designed to ensure that its institutions and Crown agencies excluded from the Access to Information Act are more transparent.

• (1745)

The Bloc Quebecois particularly wants to stress the need for federal institutions such as the Senate and Crown corporations to be transparent. The public should be able to scrutinize the actions of these bodies which are undemocratic because non–elected and more likely than not using taxpayers money.

For the sake of democracy and to make the current system more transparent, the Bloc Quebecois can only concur in the March 1987 report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General, which recommended that the Access to Information Act apply to all federal institutions, including administrative tribunals, the Senate and the House of Commons.

This committee recommended at the time that the Access to Information Act and the Privacy Act apply to all 53 parent Crown corporations and their 127 wholly owned subsidiaries. These corporations and their subsidiaries had assets tens of billions of dollars in assets over which the public has absolutely no control.

On the other hand, these recommendations did not apply to other corporations, including 140 subsidiaries that were not wholly owned by Crown corporations and 26 joint ventures and mixed enterprises, of which the capital stock is jointly held by the federal government and other levels of government or organizations.

The report of the Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General states that there are certainly other entities with no capital stock for which the federal government has the right to appoint, directly or through a Crown corporation, one or more persons to the board of directors or similar body, with the public being systematically excluded from the process, except to foot the bill.

Canadians pay for all that. Therefore, they have a right to know. Since these are theoretically Crown corporations, the taxpayers of Quebec and Canada are entitled to and should know how these corporations are administered. That is why they must be subject to public scrutiny.

I would like to ask a question in this House: Why are some Crown corporations subject to the Access to Information Act while others are not, when they all receive public funds?

The burden of proof rests on the federal government. The Liberals—yes, the Liberals—must keep their word and restore trust in public institutions.

You will tell me that we all want to see positive changes and ensure that our political institutions and Crown corporations operate with honesty and integrity.

I know for a fact that these issues were raised by the Liberals when they were in opposition. Now that they are in power, I hope that some of them will remember the importance of making public institutions more open, accountable and honest.

Quebecers and Canadians have never been so disillusioned with federal institutions, public administration, politicians and the public sector.

The people must be able to trust those in power. Obviously, they have little confidence in the federal government, while the credibility of public institutions is steadily eroding.

This disaffection may be attributable to several factors: some elected officials committed indiscretions while others governed arrogantly, it must be said.

• (1750)

Citizens are unhappy because they are not really consulted, because their views are ignored, because public affairs are dealt with behind closed doors as soon as they become crucial.

Quebecers and the people in the rest of Canada are disappointed and unhappy with the poor quality of many public services, given government overspending and the tax burden imposed on them.

Although Quebecers and the people in the rest of Canada attach great importance to social programs and our democratic heritage, they are annoyed by the apparent confusion among the various public powers. Likewise, duplication in federal government services is unacceptable to all our taxpayers.

I agree with the essential part of the motion proposed by my colleague from Red Deer, that all publicly financed government institutions should be subject to the Access to Information Act.

[English]

Mr. John Finlay (Oxford, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, everything to my hon. colleagues in the opposition, particularly in the third party, seems simple and very easily fixed. I suggest that this shows a lack of imagination and a lack of understanding of the complexity and sensitivity of much that we in government have to deal with.

My hon. colleague from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt leaves the impression that everything that is secret is somehow evil, that nothing which is personal or concerns individual Canadians is or should be confidential.

I would remind him that even public boards like boards of education and municipal councils at the local level deal with personnel, legal and property matters in camera and not in public.

However, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Red Deer for putting this motion forward at a time when Canadians are losing trust in their political institutions, or were. All of us must be active in finding ways to promote more open and accountable government.

However, in searching out these various ways to promote more open and accountable government, we must recognize that our institutions face a variety of other challenges equally important to Canadians.

For example, Canadians want government to cost less, to be more efficient and to operate in a more business like manner. In come cases it may be necessary to balance the value of openness with these other values.

Although I find the objectives behind this motion laudable I cannot support this motion for three reasons. First, we must be concerned about the impact this motion will have on the competitive position of crown corporations. I do not say the impact is great or small, merely that before adopting this motion I would want to hear directly from those crown corporations on this issue.

Second, in times of fiscal restraint we must stop and ask what will this motion cost the taxpayers? How will those costs be paid? The fact is that processing access requests requires an access to information bureaucracy and costs money.

The third reason I cannot support this motion is that it fails to distinguish between different kinds of crown agencies and different institutions of Parliament.

The motion is too broadly worded and as such disagrees with the findings of the 1986 parliamentary committee report "Open and Shut" and with the most recent report of the information commissioner.

Returning to my first reason for opposing this motion, I am not convinced it has struck the proper balance between the competing values of open and accountable government on the one hand and smaller, more efficient government on the other.

The motion asks that crown agencies be subject to the scrutiny of the Access to Information Act. There are presently more than 130 crown agencies subject to the act. I assume that the hon. member means by crown agencies those crown agencies not yet subject to the act. In particular, I assume he is referring at least in part to crown corporations.

• (1755)

It is with respect, particularly to crown corporations, that the balance between efficient, competitive business like crown agencies and open, accountable enterprises becomes most important.

The basic question is whether crown corporations which have mandates to operate in a business like fashion, sometimes in competition with the private sector, should have to work under different rules than their competitors. If you believe that crown corporations should act like businesses, why would you impose a different set of rules on them?

If you believe crown corporations should not be competing with the private sector at all, that is a completely different question. Subjecting crown corporations to the scrutiny of the Access to Information Act will not terminate the crown corporations if that is your goal. It will simply make them less competitive, more expensive and less efficient.

I would not want to make a decision on the motion before the House until I know more about the implications. I am not prepared to support the motion at this time.

Another reason why I do not support this motion is that we do not have enough information about what the potential cost to the taxpayer will be. The fact is processing access requests costs taxpayers money. The most recent report of the information commissioner says that the annual cost of processing access requests is $20 million and that the current fees are not designed to recover costs, but merely to deter trivial requests.

Adding institutions to be covered by the Access to Information Act is saying that the government needs to spend more money. Where will this money come from? How much will it cost? Whatever it costs we know that it is a cost that private business does not have to incur and therefore will make crown corporations less competitive, at least to the extent of the cost of processing access requests.

I do not say that the cost of processing access requests cannot be justified. The information commissioner says that $20 million is a bargain for such an essential tool of public accountability. He may be right. All I am saying is that we should not adopt motions based on good intentions without first asking the basic questions of how much will it cost and who will pay.

Also, I am reluctant to support this motion because of the report of the parliamentary committee that examined the Access to Information Act in 1986. Its report is called "Open and Shut". That committee considered a broad range of entities which might be made subject to the Access to Information Act. It concluded that it would not be appropriate for all crown agencies to be made subject to the act. It thought a definition of crown corporation should be developed and should be limited to corporations in which the crown has a controlling interest and which provide goods or services to the public on a commercial basis. It thought there should be special exemptions for the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, mentioned significantly by my hon. colleague, in relation to program material.

With respect to Parliament, the parliamentary committee was of the view that the offices of senators and members of the House of Commons should be excluded from scrutiny of the act. It said the relationship between such elected and appointed officials and the electorate is sometimes described as akin to solicitor–client privilege, and parliamentary privilege is involved. Therefore, the committee suggests their continued exclusion from the scope of the act.

The committee thought that the Access to Information Act should not apply to the judicial branch of government and therefore not to the Federal Court, tax court, Supreme Court of Canada. Perhaps surprisingly, the committee thought the act should apply to administrative tribunals which perform quasi–judicial functions.

The committee recognized that the federal government is involved in joint ventures with others, notably the provinces, and in those cases thought it would be best if there were negotiations with the provinces before making such joint ventures subject to the Access to Information Act.

Here we have a parliamentary committee that studied the issues very carefully.

• (1800)

The considered conclusion was that it would go too far to include all crown agencies and at least in the case of the CBC it saw merit in examining the special circumstances of crown corporations that would become subject to the act. It saw merit in excluding courts, MPs' offices and federal–provincial joint organizations.

I am not prepared to say that parliamentary committee was wrong in making these judgments. I think it goes too far to say in a sweeping statement that all of Parliament and all crown agencies should be subject to the Access to Information Act.

In conclusion, I support a comprehensive, careful review of the Access to Information Act and I will support amendments aimed at improving access to government information. I may well support extending the application of the Access to Information Act to crown agencies not yet covered by the act, but I cannot in all conscience support a motion that fails to distinguish between various kinds of crown agencies that might make the correspondence I receive from my constituents automatically subject to the act and that is voted on without hearing from executives of crown agencies not presently subject to the act.

I think the better approach is to take the Minister of Justice at his word that it is time for a review of the Access to Information Act. Let him draw upon all of the expertise we can acquire and use the full parliamentary procedures, including committee hearings, to produce the best set of amendments possible.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to begin my remarks by saying that committee would decide many of those things which the hon. member has just talked about.

I am sure he, as a fine parliamentarian, is also aware that a private member cannot initiate a motion or a private member's bill which is going to cost the government more money. Therefore, I think it would be appropriate for the member to make sure that he gets on the record at some point that he well knows what the purpose, plan and policy of private member's motions and bills is.

I would like to make a few comments about Motion M–304 which my friend from Red Deer brought in. I think it is excellent, quite frankly, because the government has said it was going to do all kinds of things with access to information but here we are well over the one year birthday and precious little has happened again in that vein.

Let me just refresh your memory, Mr. Speaker. I do not know where you were on July 11 but I was in the bush in Beaver River having a wonderful time getting some rest and relaxation. I do not get the Ottawa Citizen out there nor do I get Canada's national newspaper, the Globe and Mail. Nonetheless, let me look at some of the things that were going on while you and I were away from these hallowed halls on July 11.

The Ottawa Citizen, July 11 stated: "Justice Minister Allan Rock is promising an overhaul of the federal Access to Information Act so it is more in line with public expectations of openness in government". We have read about openness in government in the red book and in any number of places. He thinks it is now out of date, very much in need of an overhaul. My friend just suggested that it certainly is in need of an overhaul, but when? When are we going to see any changes in this thing? We have been promised all kinds of legislation. We have had take note debates on just about every subject we could dream of and yet there is no action.

We have been in the House now almost a year in this new session and we have seen precious little come forward in terms of tangible, get your teeth into it kind of legislation.

Mrs. Brushett: You cannot keep up with the action.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member across might be surprised at how I could keep up to the action.

The justice minister says the present act reflects the state of the art as of the mid–1970s. We are not in the 1990s. Before he gets it together, dear knows, we will be into the next century and into the 2000s, I am not sure how we will say that. However, he says people's expectations of government are different. There is a need for more openness. For heaven's sake, that is absolutely right, the Ottawa Citizen is bang on.

There is a word here that is going to go through my comments over and over again, a motif, and that is the word secrecy. If anything would disgust the Canadian public it is a government that sits in here and does not talk about secrecy but acts secrecy. That is really frustrating for people.

• (1805)

Members of this House are all aware of the need for accurate, complete and timely information. The Access to Information Act which was brought in on July 1, 1983 talked about openness and making sure that people had access to some information if they really needed it, not just for fun. It is time consuming for people to dig up information as well as expensive because you are paying people to dig up that information. The bottom line on that is what is the cost if we do not do it?

If we ignore access to information, if we do not go ahead and process people's requests and have them accessible to the information that they really need, that people are demanding, what is the cost if we do not do it?

I think there are some long term costs there that the hon. member might think about, especially when he is campaigning in the next election.

We take this as a right of the Canadian people. Along with rights that we all have come responsibilities. We as parliamentarians have responsibilities to the Canadian public, after all it is paying our cheques.

Many companies, crown corporations, the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, cabinet ministers' expenses, if the public is paying the bills, why should it not have some of this information at its fingertips? It seems ludicrous to me that we would say sorry, there are certain parts of the act that are exempt and so we do not have to tell you.

If anything is going to frustrate people—and on a school board as well, as my hon. friend mentioned earlier—if anything frustrates the parent teacher association it is going to a meeting and demanding that they look at the minutes, because they are paying those bills too. When I was participating with school boards in my teaching career it would be ridiculous for people involved in the school system to say we do not think you should have access to that information.

I taught in a small school in a small town and nothing would run you out of town faster than a parent teacher association or the parent advisory council saying "what do you mean, you are not going to tell us? We are paying your salary and you had better let us know some of this information".

There should be few state secrets at any level.

Speaking of secrecy, in the Times Colonist from November 17, 1994, very fresh, a few weeks ago, the title of an article was "Weak Government's Lapse into Secrecy". Freedom of information works great when things are going well for government but it is a different story when the going gets tough. That is for sure.

This person says government information in the electronic age should be preserved as a national resource. Government should help people gain access to it and should be held in easily obtainable form. In other words, people should be able to have access to this with computers and the electronic highway and everything else that we have. There should be absolutely no reason for secrecy.

The Ottawa Citizen on January 22, 1994 said that not only is it so secretive but that once you do crack through on that on access to information, if you are going to get any information out of it, it is slower than molasses in January, when this article was written. This person says that one of the most common complaints about access to information is that it is slow and getting slower. If there is anything we need in this bureaucracy it is not slow and getting slower. That is for sure.

Ten years ago almost 79 per cent of requests were completed in 30 days or less, while 6.3 per cent took more than 60 days. Now only 57.5 per cent are completed in 30 days and 21.4 per cent take longer than 60 days. This looks vaguely familiar, what

I see every day across the way, a government that says it is bringing in legislation on this and that and the next thing.

I have been tallying what was an actual government sponsored, initiated, carried through to fruition bill in this House. It was not something from Kim Campbell that was held over and was going to be updated and change the name of departments and move ahead with this and that. The Tobacco Smuggling Act was something that this government could take credit for because it started it, carried through and finished it, whether it was good or bad is immaterial. Everything else was something left over.

"Public information, political property", from the Globe and Mail, Canada's national newspaper, July 5, 1994, when we were out of the House again. Public information, should it be public property? Of course. Is it? No. It belongs to the government and it keeps its claws and talons right into it. Heaven help anyone who tries to find out anything. From Toronto Star last January 29: "This law errs on the side of secrecy. When you get into thorny areas, it gets very cumbersome".

• (1810)

If there are people who are finding this tedious, perhaps they could mention this to the hon. justice minister and he could perhaps get something through here. I would hate to think we were keeping anyone up.

In 1983 the Liberals were the government and I was not here. The Toronto Star says: "When the act was passed 33 statutes were exempted, cabinet discussions and tax information, for example, under section 24".

Under the Conservative government in 1986 the Liberals were here too: "In 1986 a parliamentary justice committee said section 24 should be repealed because it was undemocratic". Imagine such a thing in this institution.

Let me finish by reading an article from November 18, just a few weeks ago. This was from the Ottawa Citizen: "Canadians don't enjoy an open and accountable federal government". It could not have been a Liberal that wrote that article surely, because they have told us for months now that they have an open and accountable government: "Instead they are saddled with a bureaucratic culture only marginally less secretive than a decade ago", we know who was in power a decade ago, "when the principle of access to information held by government was first enshrined in a new federal law".

I do not want anyone to think we are making light of this, surely. Only some of the faces are a little different over there and you and I looked at them all in the last Parliament, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately it seems many of those faces are the same. The names have changed. If anything shrouds this piece of legislation which has been in place for years now, if anything is going to send us on our Christmas recess and make it look like this place has not changed a bit, it is if this government is not really committed to changing the Access to Information Act.

We welcome real, substantive changes to that. We look forward to 1995 and hope that we have far more substantive legislation in place that we can support.

[Translation]

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to speak on the motion from the member for Red Deer, since the very essence of this motion is in line with what the Bloc Quebecois has been asking for and I should say that it is also what my constituents in Chicoutimi expect.

The objectives of the Bloc and the official opposition are clear and precise. We want greater transparency and openness in the management of public affairs and respect for the taxpayers' acquired right to know what the government is doing with public funds.

This motion says that Parliament and crown agencies should be subject to scrutiny under the Access to Information Act. At present, the Access to Information Act, passed in 1982, gives access only to federal government documents. Under this law, therefore, government institutions must make their documents available.

Nevertheless, there are exceptions. Some of the 112 federal crown corporations and several government agencies, including the House of Commons, the Senate, the Library of Parliament and officers of Parliament are not subject to this law.

The Bloc Quebecois believes that the Access to Information Act must be extended to any government institution financed with public funds. In a democratic system like ours, public affairs must be run as openly as possible. That is what our constituents want. Openness, yes, but it is a word which frightens my colleagues opposite.

• (1815)

We see it in the way they have run the affairs of state for a little over a year. Need we mind you of their reticence and great lack of openness on many issues? First, on Bill C–52, concerning the Department of Public Works and Government Services, the Liberal government persists in blocking any amendment which would make this department's awarding of government contracts more open. It is hard for members of this Parliament to obtain relevant information on their riding from this department.

Members of Parliament are the last to find out about the reorganizations going on in their riding. In Chicoutimi, a reorganization of post offices was announced to the public after the fact. Moreover, firms of consulting engineers or architects were never told why they could not bid on certain contracts.

A public inquiry might shed some light on how these contracts are awarded, but I imagine they are reserved for friends of the regime. You will also remember this whole episode when the Minister of Canadian Heritage wrote to the CRTC about an application. Some said it was a lack of ethics, others talked about a lack of transparency, while others concluded that it was patronage. The government did not follow the principle of transparency, and was caught in the act. It is Bloc Quebecois members who dared to reveal that the Minister of Canadian Heritage got personally involved in issuing a broadcasting licence.

And the Prime Minister did not even take any sanction against that minister, who had intervened. The Prime Minister even had the nerve to excuse his minister by saying that other Cabinet members had also been involved in similar patronage activities. The government also objected to the bill on public financing for political parties. That speaks volumes about their desire to ensure transparency. Past experience tells us that the main financial backers of political parties are usually the ones who get lucrative government contracts. These people are called friends of the regime.

Then there are the reports of the Security Intelligence Review Committee, which are submitted to the Solicitor General. However, the solicitor refuses to let the parliamentary subcommittee on national security have access to these documents. Why was that subcommittee set up if it cannot have access to the reports tabled by the agency responsible for monitoring intelligence activity?

Given this lack of transparency, which is becoming more and more prevalent, the Access to Information Act remains one of the only means for elected members of this House, and Canadian taxpayers, to obtain information on the operations of departments and government agencies, including crown corporations.

Thanks to that act, MPs were able to have access to the findings contained in a SIRC report. SIRC concluded that the inquiries conducted by one of the branches of CSIS are not related to threats to Canada's security, as defined in the act but, rather, to threats to the security of private businesses. In conducting such inquiries, CSIS duplicates the operations of the federal and provincial police forces.

• (1820)

As my colleague from Bellechasse pointed out a few days ago in this House, it is unfortunate that parliamentarians are the last ones to be informed of such allegations. Without the Access to Information Act, this government would not reveal anything, either to the official opposition or the citizens of this country.

This time around, the government cannot deny the public its right to scrutinize the management of public affairs, which are financed in large part through the taxes it pays.

The Bloc Quebecois supports the objective of making the whole federal administration accessible and transparent, for the sake of fairness and equity.

We have been elected by our fellow citizens; our mandate is to report to them on the activities and functions of the public administration.

Moreover, the Access to Information Act should also apply to the Senate, an institution which is appointed, not elected.

However, the act should not apply to government agencies and crown corporations which hold confidential information for the purpose of competition, insofar as that information is concerned, but the act should apply to them in the case of general information such as expenditures, budgets, trade practices and personnel management.

In view of the many examples I have just listed, the Bloc Quebecois will vote in favour of this motion since it promotes more transparency. Let us hope that our friends opposite will know enough to take advantage of this opportunity.

[English]

Mr. John Williams (St. Albert, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to rise and speak in support of the motion in the name of the hon. member for Red Deer which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the Parliament and Crown Agencies should be subject to scrutiny under the Access to Information Act.

This is a timely motion. Yesterday afternoon I attended the public accounts committee of which I am a member and regularly attend. We have been having problems getting some information from the government regarding a $2 billion loss this country has suffered. The taxpayers are out $2 billion and we have been trying to find out who actually caused the loss. Was it the Ministry of National Revenue? Was it the Minister of Finance, or was it the Department of Justice?

Officials were in front of the committee and we were trying to determine who was responsible. Was it bad advice from lawyers? Was it bad decision making by revenue and finance?

When the Minister of National Revenue was in front of the committee he gave a complete and detailed report. He said that the public accounts committee had every right to read the legal opinions which had been obtained from the Solicitor General's department on a particular case but we were not getting them. He was prepared to say we had every right to have them but as far as he was concerned we were not getting them.

Now we are debating access to information. I think access to information is a fundamental part which goes to the very heart of democracy. We on behalf of the taxpayers should know and have every right to know. When the taxpayers lose $2 billion they have every right to know who made the mistake. Therefore, access to information is more fundamental than most people think.

Think of other situations. A couple of months ago we were all distressed to find out that the Commissioner of Official Languages was driving back and forth between Ottawa and Montreal in a chauffeured limousine courtesy of the federal government, just because he would rather live in Montreal than in Ottawa.

Access to information would help us to find those things out earlier. It is the taxpayers' money. Not only is he being driven in a chauffeured limousine between Ottawa and Montreal because he likes to live in Montreal but works in Ottawa, but we have also given him an apartment that I think costs $15,600. We are paying that because he likes to live in Montreal but his job is in Ottawa and he needs a place to hang his hat while he is here. We find these things out.

• (1825)

The chairman of CN Rail needed a place to hang his hat too so he got a $300,000 interest free loan from CN. Who owns CN? The taxpayers. Does CN make a big profit? CN is subsidized. There is a major loss of millions of dollars of taxpayers' money but the chairman said: "I am worth it. I do a good job for this organization. I need and should have a $300,000 interest free loan in order for me to do my job better".

I am sure many taxpayers would agree with the idea that they could do their job better if they had an interest free loan of $300,000 but they cannot have it. There is a Liberal member over there who suggests that perhaps he could also do his job better if he had a $300,000 interest free loan. Only one, his seatmate, disagrees but that is by the way.

The point we are trying to make is that if we had the information, people would be a lot more careful about the way they spend taxpayers' money than they do. If it is secret they do not have to answer to anybody; just keep it under the table and everything will be fine.

I looked at the Access to Information Act. I opened it up and looked at section 13. The subject in subsection 2 is that the head of a government institution shall refuse to disclose any record. This is the Access to Information Act. I thought that must be an aberration. Section 13 deals with information obtained in confidence, but that is okay. He could perhaps refuse that one.

How about federal–provincial affairs under section 14? The head of a government institution may refuse to disclose any record requested under this act. How about section 15, international affairs and defence? The head of a government institution may refuse to disclose any record requested under this act.

On it goes. Under section 16 on law enforcement and investigation, the head of a government institution may refuse to disclose any record requested under the act. In section 17 concerning the safety of individuals, again may refuse to disclose.

By the time we get through to section 24 we get to statutory prohibitions. Virtually every document is protected and not open to information, to scrutiny, nor to the taxpayers who pay millions of dollars for this organization. The House of Commons has a budget of $243 million. That does not include the Senate. That is for here. Think of the mountains of paper we produce, all secret.

The Reform Party in the last election said to cut $300 million or $400 million out of subsidies to crown corporations. That gives an idea of how much money they are losing. It is in the billions every year and nobody has the right to find out how they are losing the money, what kind of service they are producing, or anything along those lines.

Surely the taxpayer who is footing the bill has the right to know. That is all we are asking. It is not very much. They are forking out about 40 per cent of their income every year in income taxes and it is all secret. The government denies them access. It does not get back to them to say what it is doing with their money.

The honourable thing to do would be for the government to support the motion. The member for Red Deer put this motion forward seriously thinking that we would take note of the fact that Canadians need to know and want to know and government will work a lot better if they do know.

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES

Mr. Yvan Bernier (Gaspé, BQ): Mr. Speaker, do you want me to start right now? It is not on MIL Davie but on fisheries.

Excuse my English. I was just trying to maintain a good relationship with my colleagues. I hope the people will forgive me. I want to reassure French speaking Canadians, I am not being assimilated. I was just practising my English. After all, at least 15 per cent of my constituents are English.

I am pleased to rise this evening to address a question I have asked in this House concerning the repatriation of fisheries management. This question was put to the Minister of Fisheries on December 6. As usual, I was not satisfied with the answer and, therefore, intend to ask the question again this evening.

On November 16, I asked the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans whether or not he intended to make changes to administrative responsibilities regarding fisheries, as requested by the Quebec fisheries minister at the federal–provincial conference of fisheries ministers held in Victoria on November 1.

I also asked the minister if he intended do comply to this request along the lines of what Quebec is asking for.

The minister's answer was very clear. On November 16, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans indicated that he had been asked this question by several provinces weeks or even months earlier.

The minister understood the demands made by the provinces in order to improve administration of this resource and to eliminate unnecessary overlap in the fisheries sector.

Indeed, Quebec had reached this conclusion several decades earlier. Unfortunately, since another Liberal government was in power at the time, in 1983–84, it decided to repatriate management. Today, in 1994, we still have to enter into negotiations merely to recover what was taken from us.

The minister went on to say that he intended to respond directly to reorganizing the fisheries sector and that he looked forward to continued good dialogue and discussion with all of the provinces. He even added, "including Quebec". You will understand why I was anxious. Finally, we had someone who was willing to take action.

I raised the matter again on December 6. At that time, I asked the minister why he had not responded to the request from the Quebec government, because the Quebec government had expressed, through a letter, its desire to make official the claims that had been made at the federal–provincial conference.

The minister responded to me in a way that I would qualify as boastful. I expected something else from a minister. He said that it was a shocking thing that fully 35 days had passed. But when a minister is getting ready to table a fisheries plan that will affect all the Atlantic provinces, I think that 35 days is a long wait.

Thirty–five days of silence, it is a long time, when Quebec is putting forward a serious and important proposal, asking the minister to start the negotiations.

My message is: Does the minister intend to table in this House a planned schedule for meeting with his provincial counterparts, and to inform the population of Quebec and Canada of it?

He has been a minister for 14 months now, and nothing is happening. All I am asking him is: Does he have a plan, an agenda to meet with his counterparts from Newfoundland, Quebec and British Columbia?

• (1835)

[English]

Ms. Susan Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Gaspé that the issues raised by Minister Landry are serious and require careful consideration.

He should also know that the whole question of federal and provincial roles and responsibilities and the management of marine fisheries is of key concern to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Far from ignoring the Quebec government's proposal I can assure my hon. colleague that the questions raised by Quebec are being carefully analysed. I do not believe that the hon. member would expect an immediate response to a proposal that calls for a fundamental restructuring of federal and provincial roles and responsibilities in the marine fishery.

I understand that the Quebec government is seeking increased responsibilities in marine fisheries management and has devoted a great deal of energy to formulate its proposal. However, given the multilateral nature of the Atlantic fishery and the federal government's responsibility to ensure the conservation of the resource, I believe that his request needs to be addressed in the context of multilateral discussions of fisheries.

For example, it is essential that we strive to reach a federal–provincial consensus on historic shares that will meet the needs of all stakeholders before we can move on to consider specific proposals.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has also indicated that in order to consolidate the views of all stakeholders on licensing reform and processing capacity reduction he will be launching an Atlantic round table in early 1995.

I trust that this series of round table consultations will offer an opportunity to the Quebec government as well as to the other Atlantic provinces to play a constructive role in the design of the fishery of the future.

Finally, I would like to respond to the comments made to the Quebec government regarding overlap and duplication in federal and provincial programs and services. As part of the government wide program review exercised, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans has undertaken a thorough review of its programs with a view to maximizing efficiencies and eliminating costly duplications.

Extensive consultations have led to the establishment of important co–operative agreements in the fisheries sector which demonstrate that federal and provincial fisheries programs can harmonize without putting at risk local interests with tangible benefits to taxpayers and clients.

The Ministry of Fisheries and Oceans remains firmly committed to the path we embarked on some months ago which is designed to achieve new efficiencies and forge new and productive partnerships of all the stakeholders in the fishery.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Osvaldo Nunez (Bourassa, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on November 24, I asked the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration a question on an order to deport Mrs. Thérèse Sabadin and her two children to the Seychelles. Mrs. Sabadin had suffered physical violence and had received death threats from her husband, who was convicted and subsequently deported to the Seychelles.

Although this was a very sad case, Mrs. Sabadin was deported with her two children to Barbados and then sent back to Canada. This involuntary trip was very expensive for Mrs. Sabadin.

Finally, as a result of numerous representations by the Bloc Quebecois and several women's organizations, the minister agreed to allow Mrs. Sabadin's application for permanent residence to be processed in Canada.

Mrs. Sabadin now has to wait several months before she can get a ministerial permit. Until then, she will have no status in this country and will not be able to work. Without official papers, she will also have trouble obtaining social assistance and will have to wait at least a year before she can get permanent residence status. To apply, Mrs. Sabadin had to pay $700, which she did not have, in administrative costs. She had already paid $650 for her initial application. Action réfugiés Montréal, a community organization, paid the fee on her behalf.

In this House, I have often criticized these fees as arbitrary and unfair. Recently, even the Liberal member for Winnipeg North was critical of this abuse of people in need by the Department of Immigration.

I would ask the minister to be more sensitive to the plight of women who claim refugee status on the grounds of fear of persecution because of their gender.

It is now ten days until Christmas and two weeks before the end of 1994, and I want to take this opportunity to send my best wishes to my constituents in Montreal North, especially those of ethnic origin, the Italians, Haitians, Arabs, Latin Americans, and so forth.

• (1840)

I also want to send my best wishes for health, happiness and peace to all new Quebecers and new Canadians. Despite the feelings of hostility that are apparent in some sectors of public opinion, I believe that most people still support immigration and opening our doors to refugees fleeing persecution. To the thousands of immigrants and refugees in Canada and Quebec, I want to send a message of support, understanding, solidarity and hope.

[English]

Ms. Susan Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration confirmed for the hon. member on November 24 in this House that this case was being reviewed by immigration officials.

The minister had previously advised a colleague of the hon. member on November 17 that immigration officials conduct an additional review in cases where there may be new information that may or might alter a decision to remove a person.

Such reviews may be conducted when in keeping with the authority delegated by the minister to managers, a manager of a Canada immigration centre determines that there might be additional information.

In this particular case a manager in the CIC in Montreal granted a two week reprieve in this case to give the individual an opportunity for further review.

I am pleased to advise the hon. member that the additional review has been completed and immigration officials have determined that the individual and her children should be allowed to remain on humanitarian and compassionate grounds. The individual and her counsel have been advised of this decision.

The Deputy Speaker: Since the hon. member for Châteauguay has to leave immediately, we will hear the hon. member for Chambly.

CUSTOMS BROKERS

Mr. Ghislain Lebel (Chambly, BQ): Mr. Speaker, in reply to two questions I recently asked in this House about the new regulations increasing bonds to be posted by customs brokers, the Minister of National Revenue referred me to the Canadian Association of Customs Brokers which seemingly supported his approach in this matter.

First of all, let me say to the minister that the picture is somewhat different from what he told us then. On November 24, the association held a meeting where 883 members gave their opinion on the advisability of these new regulations. The results of the vote were 803 against the regulations, 74 in favour and 6 abstentions. Because larger brokerage firms have multiple voting rights, the final result was 135 against the regulations, 141 in favour and 7 abstentions.

A study conducted by Brian Hull and Associates, a well-known economist from Ottawa, for the coalition of small and medium size brokers, shows that the new regulations unduly favour the larger brokerage firms. If they were to be subjected to the same standards as smaller brokers, they would see their security bill jump $1 million in one case, and between $150,000 and $180,000 in other cases, while they now pay only $30,000 for a maximum security of $10 million.

We can see the advantage given to these larger brokerage firms by this new administrative policy. Does the minister know that small and medium size brokers, those who broker 20,000 imports or less per year create 2,500 direct jobs in Canada and that their disappearance by a stroke of his pen would have a dramatic effect?

Does the minister know that with these new standards only 19 brokers would remain in Canada thanks to the privilege he would be giving them by instituting a ceiling of $10 million for the security they must post.

Let me quote the conclusions of Mr. Hull's study.

[English]

The effect of this new ruling by Revenue Canada for account security and the disproportionate burden of its impact as between large and small firms is to place the Government of Canada in violation of the basic principles of conduct on which the Competition Act of Canada is founded.

• (1845)

The effect of the new formula is to, first, impede the efficiency and adaptability of the Canadian economy; second, restrict opportunities for Canadian competition in global markets, while discriminating on behalf of foreign competition; third, seriously impede the opportunity for small and medium sized enterprises to participate in the Canadian economy; and, fourth, to reduce the choice of competitive prices and services available to Canadians.

[Translation]

A $10 million security on a monthly invoice of $250 million is only 4 per cent, while a $1.8 million security for smaller brokers is 100 per cent of their monthly invoice.

Does the minister, who is trying so hard to protect importers, realize that large brokerage firms are just as likely as small ones to go bankrupt? I would even go so far as to say that large diversified companies, with interests in transportation, storage, handling, run a higher risk. Take real estate development, for example, Campeau Corporation, the Reichman brothers and others went under before all the smaller companies disappeared. In the insurance business, did some large companies not go bankrupt before many small ones?

If the minister is really committed to protecting the public, here is my suggestion: First, he should go back to the formula where everyone had ten days to pay duties and taxes, the way it is in the United States and the way it was in Canada before these interim payments, which are at the root of all our problems, were instituted. He should keep security at 100 per cent of monthly billings and make all brokers, large and small, equally responsible.

[English]

Ms. Susan Whelan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the department is considering increasing the security requirement for obtaining release prior to payment of duties and taxes to 100 per cent of the average monthly invoice up to a maximum of $10 million. This action is being considered in direct response to the number of cases where brokers fail to deliver to Revenue Canada funds received from their clients, the importers.

Since importers remain liable, they have had to pay a second time to the department. As most brokers' clients are small businesses the department needs to ensure increased security to protect them and the jobs of the more than one million Canadians they employ.

Extensive consultations have been undertaken with the Canadian Society of Customs Brokers that negotiated a master bond program to make it easier for their members to meet the new security requirements. Discussions have also been undertaken with the Canadian Importers Association. Whatever is decided I do not believe any financially viable broker will be forced out of business.

Brokers are already provided with the flexibility to arrange for some of their clients to post their own security or to deliver interim payments to the department. Although many brokers have few assets in their companies they may also restructure their financial arrangements by using personal assets to obtain security.

A recent enhancement has been discussed that would assist both brokers and importers in obtaining security. The requirements for importers posting their own security, whether or not they use a broker, would be based on an amount equivalent to the duties and taxes payable on a monthly basis, less the goods and services tax.

This enhancement could make it easier for brokers to arrange for some clients to obtain security and enable them to protect the remainder of their clients from the consequences of default. As well, the cost of doing business for most of the 8,000 importers who deal directly with the department would not increase.

In conclusion, this enhancement is being discussed with the Canadian Importers Association and the Canadian Society of Customs Brokers, both of whom are contributing positively to resolving this issue.

The Deputy Speaker: Before we adjourn this evening, I would like to say a few words on a more personal note.

[English]

Chief senior page, André Frechette, has now worked most capably in the House for forty–two and a half years. Imagine, forty–two and a half years of putting up with members of Parliament.

Tomorrow our Speaker will, I believe, pay tribute to Mr. Frechette and his long years of capable service to the House. Unfortunately I cannot be here and I would like to do so now. Can you imagine how many thousands of services Mr. Frechette has done for so many hundreds of members over those many years? We are all deeply in your debt, sir.

Mr. Plamondon: Mr. Speaker, all of us in the Bloc Quebecois wish to join you in extending our best wishes to Mr. Fréchette on his retirement and say how much we have appreciated his work here in the House. I have had that privilege for the past ten years, and I want to say that although we will miss you very much, you truly deserve a wonderful retirement.

[English]

The Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 38(5), a motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m.

DEPARTMENT OF CANADIAN HERITAGE ACT

The House resumed from December 14 consideration of Bill C–53, an act to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage and to amend and repeal certain other acts, as reported (with amendments) from the committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Pursuant to Standing Order 45(5)(a) the House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions on report stage of Bill C–53, an act to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage and to amend and repeal certain other acts.

The first question is on Motion No. 8 The vote on Motion No. 8 also applies to Motion No. 10.

[Translation]

An affirmative vote on Motion No. 8 obviates the necessity of the question being put on Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 9 and 21. A negative vote on Motion No. 8 necessitates the question being put on Motions Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6 and 7. The vote on Motion No. 1 also applies to Motion No. 9.

[English]

The vote on Motion No. 5 also applies to Motion No. 21.

[Translation]

The vote is on Motion No. 8, standing in the name of the hon. member for Rimouski—Témiscouata.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I think you will find unanimous consent to apply the vote just taken on Motion No. P–3 to the motion now before the House in reverse.

Mr. Lee: Madam Speaker, I am certainly prepared to give my consent to this. In the last vote I was present but did not vote. I would ask that the record show that I abstained from voting on the last motion. I am certainly present for this vote and will vote with my caucus.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare the motion lost.

• (1045)

[English]

The next question is on Motion No. 2.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, on a point of order. I think you would find unanimous consent that the members who have voted on the previous vote be recorded as having voted on the vote now before the House in the following manner: Liberal members voting nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Do we have unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Laurin: Madam Speaker, the members of the Bloc Quebecois will vote nay on this motion.

Mr. Silye: Madam Speaker, Reform members vote yea, except those who wish to vote otherwise.

[English]

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, New Democrats present in the House today vote nay.

Mr. Bhaduria: Madam Speaker, I will be voting nay.

(The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare the motion lost.

[English]

The next question is on Motion No. 5.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent to apply the vote on report stage Motion No. 3 to the motion now before the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Laurin: Madam Speaker, we agree. The members of the Bloc Quebecois vote yea.

[English]

Mr. Silye: Madam Speaker, the Reform Party members will be voting yea, except for those members who wish to vote otherwise.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, in consultation with my colleagues in the New Democratic Party we are voting nay.

Mr. Bhaduria: Madam Speaker, I will be voting nay.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 152.]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare the motion lost.

The next question is on Motions Nos. 6 and 7.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent to apply the same vote to report stage Motions Nos. 6 and 7. If you could just seek unanimous consent, you would get to apply the vote on Motion No. 4 to Motions Nos. 6 and 7.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Mr. Laurin: Madam Speaker, there must be a mistake; we did not vote on Motion No. 4 as we intend to vote on Motions Nos. 6 and 7.

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, if I could just attract the attention of our colleagues for a moment. I am seeking unanimous consent to apply the vote taken to report stage Motion No. 2. That is, item 4 on the list that we have before us.

I am seeking unanimous consent to apply that vote to report stage Motions Nos. 6 and 7.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 151.]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare Motions Nos. 6 and 7 lost.

• (1055)

The next question is on Motion No. 11.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I believe you will find unanimous consent to apply the vote taken on report stage Motion No. 1 to this motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Translation]

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 150.]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare Motion No. 11 lost.

[English]

The next question is on Motion No. 12. An affirmative vote on Motion No. 12 obviates the need for a vote on Motion No. 13. A negative vote on Motion No. 12 necessitates a vote on Motion No. 13.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent to apply the vote taken on report stage Motion No. 2 to the motion now before the House.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 151.]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare Motion No. 12 lost.

[English]

The next question is on Motion No. 13.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent to apply the vote taken on report stage Motion No. 1 to the motion now before the House and you would find further unanimous consent to apply that to report stage Motions Nos. 17, 22 and 24 as well.

[Translation]

Mr. Laurin: Madam Speaker, again, I think that the numbers of the motions reported by the hon. Liberal Party whip should be checked because all this is not consistent with the previous agreement.

Would it be possible to repeat the numbers of the motions being referred to?

[English]

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I would ask consent that the result applied to Motion No. 1 apply to report stage Motions Nos. 13, 17, 22 and 24.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See list under Division No. 150.]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare Motions Nos. 13, 17, 22 and 24 lost.

• (1100)

[English]

The next question is on Motion No. 14. A vote on this motion also applies to Motions Nos. 15, 16, 18, and 19.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I seek unanimous consent to apply the vote taken on report stage Motion No. 3 to the item now before the House.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: See list under division No. 152.]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare Motion No. 14 lost. Consequently, Motions Nos. 15, 16, 18, and 19 are also lost.

[English]

The next question is on Motion No. 20. A vote on this motion also applies to Motion No. 23.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I think you would find unanimous consent for the members who voted on the previous motion to be recorded as voting on the motion now before the House in the following manner: Liberal members voting nay.

[Translation]

Mr. Laurin: Madam Speaker, we will vote yea.

Mr. Silye: Madam Speaker, the Reform Party will vote yea, except for those members who may wish to vote otherwise.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, New Democrats vote yea.

Mr. Bhaduria: Madam Speaker, I will be voting nay.

(The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare Motions Nos. 20 and 23 negatived.

● (1105)

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (for the Minister of Canadian Heritage) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think you would find unanimous consent to apply the vote just taken on report stage Motion No. 20 in reverse to the concurrence motion.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Does the House agree?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:)

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): I declare the motion carried.

When shall the bill be read the third time? Is there unanimous consent to read the bill the third time later this day?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

SECURITY INTELLIGENCE REVIEW COMMITTEE

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Madam Speaker, in order to comply with the order of the House made earlier this day, I am now tabling copies, in both official languages, of the report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee entitled "The Heritage Front Affair".

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I hereby submit to Parliament, through your good offices, the final report of the task force on economic instruments and disincentives to sound environmental practices.

HUMAN RESOURCES

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to submit two copies, in both official languages, of the document entitled "Canadian Positions with Respect to Conventions and Recommendations" adopted at the 79th and 80th sessions of the International Labour Conference in Geneva in June 1992 and June 1993.

The report is to be referred to the Standing Committee on Human Resources Development.

CANARCTIC SHIPPING

Mr. Joe Fontana (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32(2), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the 1993 annual report of the Canarctic Shipping Company Ltd.

• (1110)

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE TO PETITIONS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 38 petitions.

* * *

INTERPARLIAMENTARY DELEGATIONS

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present to the House, in both official languages, the fourth report of the Canadian NATO Parliamentary Association concerning the North Atlantic Assembly annual session which was held in Washington, D.C., from October 14 to 18, 1994.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

NATURAL RESOURCES

Mr. René Canuel (Matapédia—Matane, BQ): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present the fifth report of the Standing Committee on Natural Resources relating to our review of the mining industry.

I wish to thank those who testified before or submitted briefs to the committee. By their input, they have made a significant contribution to our work.

Mr. Bernard Deshaies (Abitibi, BQ): Madam Speaker, the members of the Bloc Quebecois who sit on the committee welcome the recommendations contained in the report of the Standing Committee on Natural Resources concerning mining development. However, the Bloc Quebecois saw fit to append a dissenting report to make sure that these recommendations do not promote federal interference in areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction, particularly with respect to costly duplication and overlap between actions taken by each level of government.

Finally, Bloc members want the Minister of Natural Resources to make sure that the implementation of the tax measures described in these recommendations will benefit the mining industry and that appropriate control measures will be put in place so that there is no loophole, in the interest of the national Treasury and the continued credibility of the mining industry.

Routine Proceedings

[English]

WESTERN GRAIN TRANSPORTATION ACT

Hon. Douglas Young (Minister of Transport, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–66, an act to amend the Western Grain Transportation Act.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

VETERANS REVIEW AND APPEAL BOARD ACT

Hon. Lawrence MacAulay (for the Minister of Veterans Affairs, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–67, an act to establish the veterans review and appeal board, to amend the Pension Act, to make consequential amendments to other acts and to repeal the Veterans Appeal Board Act.

(Motions deemed adopted, bill read the first time and printed.)

● (1115)

CANADA PENSION PLAN ACT

Mr. Janko Peric (Cambridge, Lib.) moved for leave to introduce Bill C–299, an act to amend the Canada pension plan (increased contributions and pension).

He said: Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to table a private member's bill which aims to improve the Canada pension plan.

The amendments to the Canada pension plan which I am proposing will cause the plan to grow significantly in contributions and benefits. The expanded plan will eventually result in a more adequate retirement pension for all Canadians and will reduce the need for private pensions and retirement savings plans.

The Canada pension plan would then provide an adequate and fully portable pension for all Canadians.

I hope that all members will support this initiative.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

AGRICULTURE

Hon. Alfonso Gagliano (Secretary of State (Parliamentary Affairs) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I move that 15 members, three interpreters and three members of the staff of the Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food be authorized to hold meetings on the future of Canadian agriculture in Saint–Hyacinthe, Victoriaville, Quebec City, Forestville, Halifax and Charlottetown from January 22 to 28, 1995, and in Kelowna, Kamloops, Lethbridge, Saskatoon, Winnipeg, London, St. Catharines, Brockville and Alfred, from February 5 to 15, 1995.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Is there unanimous consent to move the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): There is not unanimous consent.

PETITIONS

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Bill Graham (Rosedale, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have the pleasure to present to the House a petition which prays that this House will speedily recognize the need to amend the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation. The petition is signed by over 90 Canadians. I am pleased to support this petition.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have a petition which was collected and prepared by students of St. Anne's School in Peterborough. It reads:

"We the undersigned citizens and children of the province of Ontario draw the attention of the House of Commons and the Minister of Justice to the following: That criminals do not fear the law as much as we the citizens and children fear for our safety because of recent crime involving guns. We wish that the federal government enact more severe penalties for the perpetrators of crimes involving the use of firearms. We believe in crime control as well as gun control".

CHILD ABUSERS

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have another petition which is signed by more than 120 people of the Peterborough area which reads:

"We the undersigned residents of Canada draw the attention of the House to the following: Whereas babies and young children lack the ability to defend themselves against abusers; and whereas thousands of innocent, vulnerable, defenceless children every year fall victim to sexual abuse, serious physical and psychological harm, maiming and death; and whereas child abusers must be dealt with harshly by the criminal justice system, your petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to amend the Criminal Code to ensure stiffer sentences and mandatory treatment for all child abusers".

LEONARD PELTIER

Mr. Peter Adams (Peterborough, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have a third petition which is from more than 125 citizens of Peterborough and the surrounding area.

• (1120)

The petitioners point out that at the time of the extradition of Lakota–Chippewa native American Leonard Peltier from Canada to the United States, the information provided surrounding Mr. Peltier's case was fabricated by the U.S. authorities. Since that time new information has emerged which indicates that Leonard Peltier was not guilty of the crime for which he has spent the last 18 years in prison. Therefore the petitioners request that Parliament hold an external review of the 1976 extradition hearing and that he be brought back to Canada for asylum.

PARLIAMENTARY PRAYER

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first petition deals with the prayer in Parliament.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton, Lib.): Madam Speaker, the second petition deals with assisted suicides.

It is a pleasure to present both of these petitions.

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Jim Gouk (Kootenay West—Revelstoke, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by residents of Canada.

They point out that Canadian citizens support lawful and responsible use of firearms and ammunition, that many Canadians oppose laws to put more restrictions on the prohibition of legal firearms ownership rather than addressing violent criminal misuse of firearms.

The 1993 Auditor General's report indicates that many firearms regulations were brought in as a matter of public policy with no regard to further effectiveness or potential benefit.

The petitioners call on Parliament not to enact any further firearms control legislation, regulations or orders in council. The petition is signed by 277 residents of Kootenay West—Revelstoke. I highly concur with this petition.

MINING INDUSTRY

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Madam Speaker, I have a number of signatures from petitioners in the Yukon.

They note that Canada's mining industry is the mainstay of employment in over 150 communities across Canada. They therefore call on the Parliament of Canada to take action that will grow employment in this sector, promote exploration, rebuild Canada's mineral reserves, sustain mining communities and keep mining in Canada. In addition they request that the Canadian Industry Mineral Federation which has proposed a 10–point plan be supported by the Government of Canada.

GRANDPARENTS' RIGHTS

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36 I would like to present a petition signed by several people from Saint Paul, Alberta in the heart of my constituency of Beaver River.

They are saying that grandparents as a consequence of death, separation or divorce of their children are often denied access to their grandchildren. The relationship which exists between grandparents and grandchildren is very natural, fundamental and certainly a special one.

These petitioners are requesting that Parliament amend the Divorce Act to include a provision similar to section 611 in the Quebec civil code which states: "In no case may a father or mother without serious cause place obstacles between the child and grandparents. Failing agreement between the parties, the modalities of the relations are settled by the court".

They are asking that they be allowed to go to court to settle these matters.

Madam Speaker, I wish you a Merry Christmas.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I rise to present two petitions.

One is on behalf of 149 of my constituents from the riding of North Island—Powell River requesting that Parliament not amend the human rights code that would indicate societal approval of same sex relationships.

ASSISTED SUICIDE

Mr. John Duncan (North Island—Powell River, Ref.): Madam Speaker, the other petition signed by 33 of my constituents requests that Parliament not repeal or amend section 241 of the Criminal Code and therefore will uphold the current law disallowing euthanasia. I personally concur with these petitioners.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Ms. Hedy Fry (Vancouver Centre, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to present a petition from members of my riding. There are 563 signatures. It reads:

"We the undersigned residents of Canada draw to the attention of the House the following: That one of the core values of Canadian society is a strong belief in equality. That equality for all Canadians includes freedom from hatred, harassment and discrimination. That all Canadians regardless of race, religion, gender or sexual orientation must be treated equitably under the same circumstances. That great misunderstanding still exists in Canada resulting in acts of discrimination, harassment and crimes of hate against citizens on the basis of sexual orientation.

"Therefore we the petitioners humbly pray and call upon Parliament to enact legislation to amend the human rights act to prohibit discrimination against persons based upon their sexual orientation. Further we call upon you to pass the Liberal government Bill C–41 which gives tougher sentences to those who commit crimes of hate against others on the basis of their sexual orientation".

• (1125)

MINING INDUSTRY

Mr. Benoît Serré (Timiskaming—French River, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to present a petition signed by 290 Canadians with regard to mining.

The petitioners are very concerned about the decline of ore reserves in this country. They are very concerned about the fate of the 150 mining communities that depend on mining for their livelihood. They call on Parliament to take action that will grow employment in this sector, promote exploration, rebuild Canada's mineral reserves, sustain mining communities and keep mining in Canada.

I concur with the petitioners.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Ted McWhinney (Vancouver Quadra, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition signed by 31 residents of Vancouver and the greater Vancouver region requesting that the Canadian Human Rights Act be not amended so as to provide for same sex relationships.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have a petition with 30 signatures of Canadians who wish to bring to our attention the fact that this petition calls for an amendment to the human rights code to include sexual orientation as a prohibited ground of discrimination. The fundamental principle underlying the petition is to ensure that people are treated equally in Canada regardless of their sexual orientation.

CRIMES OF VIOLENCE

Ms. Beth Phinney (Hamilton Mountain, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have petitions here from right across Canada to add to the over three million signatures that I have already presented in the House. These petitioners feel that there are serious discrepancies in the criminal justice system and many vulnerable persons have little protection under the current system, women, children and disabled persons in particular.

These petitioners request that Parliament recognize that crimes of violence against the person are serious and abhorrent to society and that Parliament amend the Criminal Code of Canada, the Bail Reform Act of 1992 and the Parole Act accordingly.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I have two petitions signed by people from Deep River, Rolphton, Pembroke, Petawawa and other areas throughout the Ottawa Valley. They request that Parliament act immediately to extend protection to the unborn child by amending the Criminal Code to extend the same protection enjoyed by born human beings to unborn human beings.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

[Text]

Question No. 43—Mr. Chatters:

How many and what are the names of the Indian bands and tribal councils that are being co–managed and having their bank issued cheques co–signed by Indian affairs officials?

Hon. Ron Irwin (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Currently there are 97 recipients under a financial management plan, FMP: 86 recipient controlled, seven co–management and four third–party managed. No Indian band or tribal council has their band issued cheques co–signed by Indian Affairs officials.

DIAND requires First Nations or their organizations, with a cumulative deficit greater than 8 per cent of their total revenues, to have in place a FMP to address the situation. The manner in which this FMP is managed depends upon the severity of the situation:

Recipient controlled: Where the FMP is exclusively managed by a recipient who is deemed to have the required administrative skills to address the difficulty;

Co–managed: Where the recipient is deemed not to have the required skills and recommends to DIAND the name of an independent qualified person or organization to be responsible for the financial affairs of the recipient; and

Third party managed: Where the recipient is deemed not to have the required skills and the health and safety of the community is at risk, DIAND appoints an independent qualified person or organization to administer the day to day affairs of the recipient.

The names of Indian bands and tribal councils who are under a co–management regime cannot be released as this information is confidential third party financial information under section 20(1)(b) of the Access to Information Act.

Question No. 44—Mr. Chatters:

With respect to financial audits conducted by or for the government on Indian bands, tribal councils and aboriginal/Metis organizations, (a) how many audits were conducted during the last five years, (b) how many were considered fully satisfactory and approved by the government, (c) how many received a failing grade from the government?

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by the Departments of Canadian Heritage, Indian Affairs and Northern Development, Justice and the Privy Council Office as follows:

In so far as Canadian Heritage is concerned: (a) two; (b) two; (c) Please refer to Justice's reply, part (c).

In so far as Indian Affairs and Northern Development Canada is concerned in the past three years—DIAND's automated audit tracking system contains three years of date, (a) 2,034 audits were conducted; (b) 1,573 unqualified and 318 qualified audit opinions were accepted by the department. The Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants has classified audits into three categories, unqualified, qualified and denial of opinion. A denial of opinion is not accepted by the government; and (c) 143 audits have a denial of opinion. DIAND prepares action plans to address financial management problems for those recipients who have a denial of opinion.

DIAND does not fund Metis organizations. For such organizations, please refer to the answers provided by Canadian Heritage, Justice and the Privy Council Office.

In so far as the Department of Justice is concerned: (a) three; (b) one; (c) two. One audit was jointly sponsored by Canadian Heritage, the Federal–Provincial Relations Office of the Privy Council Office, Justice Canada, Saskatchewan Department of Social Services, the Saskatchewan Indian and Metis Affairs Secretariat.

In so far as the Privy Council Office is concerned: (a), (b) and (c) Please refer to Justice's reply, part (c).

Question No. 69—Mr. Bodnar:

With regard to the recent audit of the Saskatchewan Metis Nation, completed by Deloitte–Touche, (a) what was the total amount of expenditures questioned by the auditors, (b) in terms of these questioned expenditures, (i) who made each expenditure, (ii) for what amount, (iii) for what purpose and on what date?

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Total amount of funding questioned by the auditors: $2,770,131

Programs:

Core Program, 1993–1994
Canadian Heritage: $514,180
Total: $514,180

Tri–Partite Program, 1993–1994
Privy Council Office: $313,320
Saskatchewan Indian and Metis Affairs Secretariat: $313,320
Total: $626,640

Core Program, 1992–1993
Canadian Heritage: $601,311
Department of Justice: $50,000
Saskatchewan Indian and Metis Affairs Secretariat: $10,000
Total: $661,311

Tripartite Program, 1992–1993
Saskatchewan Indian and Metis Affairs Secretariat: $370,000
Department of Justice: $460,600
Saskatchewan Social Services: $71,000
Total: $901,600

Fur Trappers Meeting, 1992–1993
Saskatchewan Indian and Metis Affairs Secretariat: $10,000
Total: $10,000

Justice System Program, 1992–1993
Department of Justice: $56,400
Total $56,400

Question No. 82—Mr. Cummins:

What effect did the late signing of the aboriginal fishing agreements in British Columbia have on the Department of Fisheries and Oceans enforcement of the agreements and fisheries regulations in 1994?

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): On September 23 the hon. member raised the question of the impact of the late signing of agreements on enforcement and regulation of British Columbia fisheries. On November 18 a response was provided which assessed the impact of late signing on the overall enforcement of agreements and regulations pertaining to management of the aboriginal fishery.

The answer provided to the question posed by the hon. member in September was neither inaccurate nor misleading. The response acknowledged that late signing did have some effect.

In characterizing this effect as small, the response was correct in the context of management of aboriginal fishing throughout British Columbia and in the context of the legal capacity to enforce against unauthorized fishing. The question posed by the hon. member was set in both these contexts. The response was not meant to imply that in specific areas and for specific agreements the late signing of agreements did not have negative implications as recorded in the documents cited by the hon. member.

The response characterized the effect on "enforcement of the agreements and fisheries regulations" as small for the following reasons:

1. The integrity of management systems made up of both agreements and regulations was maintained. All aboriginal salmon fishing before the signing of agreements was licensed under the aboriginal communal fishing licence regulations. These licences provided an enforceable framework for the control of aboriginal fishing until agreements were signed.

2. While there were problems with the implementation of some of the more complex agreements, particularly the Sto:Lo agreement, these instances must be interpreted in the context of the 47 agreements signed in 1994 with aboriginal groups across British Columbia.

3. In 23 cases steps were taken to minimize the effect of delays in signing agreements through bridge funding agreements starting at the beginning of May. These agreements provided aboriginal groups with funding to continue management and enforcement activities under protocols established the previous year while negotiations on allocation numbers and funding levels for the current year continued. In the Sto:Lo area, while bridge funding was not possible, a contractor was employed to monitor the fishery.

4. Finally, many of the problems with enforcement which have been identified by fisheries officers are not related to the late signing of agreements. Problems of resource levels, planning and communication while real, and in some cases perhaps attributed by officers to signing of agreements, are actually more related to other aspects of the operation of the department.

The minister has never denied that there were problems with enforcement of aboriginal fishing agreements and regulation in British Columbia in 1994. Many concerns were raised by fisheries officers when the minister met with them on November 2. Some of these problems, such as the curtailed activities of aboriginal guardians and other problems with the ability of some aboriginal groups to participate in management, were related to the late signing of agreements and were identified as such in the initial response. However, in the face of failure to reach agreements at an earlier date, the department took steps to minimize these effects.

The minister is committed to conservation and has taken measures to ensure that the reasons for the disappointing returns to the Fraser this year are independently investigated and publicly reported on. The minister does not believe the late signing of agreements was the primary cause of poor returns in the Fraser. The minister would like to point out that, as agreements are negotiated documents, the department does not have complete control over when they are signed. However, if late agreements are bad, the government must consider the effect of no agreements and no aboriginal involvement on the management of the fishery.

This should not be a game of semantics debating the definition of "little impact". Suffice to say, all issues contributing to the situation on the Fraser this year are being assessed and the minister is committed to taking whatever remedial action proves necessary to ensure conservation.

With specific reference to the late signing of agreements steps have already been taken to commence negotiations on agreements for 1995 in early January. To provide time for planning the implementation of agreements the minister will not be authorizing the signing of agreements after a deadline well in advance of when fishing for major runs is to commence.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The questions as enumerated by the parliamentary secretary have been answered.

Mr. Milliken: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

DEPARTMENT OF CANADIAN HERITAGE ACT

Hon. David Anderson (for the Minister of Canadian Heritage) moved that Bill C–53, an act to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage and to amend and repeal certain other acts, be read the third time and passed.

Hon. Sheila Finestone (Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women), Lib.): Madam Speaker, the hearings on Bill C–53 by the Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage during the past weeks have given many Canadians from all sectors of our society the opportunity to present their views on the responsibilities encompassed in the proposed legislation.

Every kind of opinion has been heard about this bill, including the name of the department, the portfolio and its holdings, and suggestions on how to amend various acts under its jurisdiction. This expression of a wide range of views about the Department of Canadian Heritage is consistent with the objective of our parliamentary system of fairness and openness in government. It is consistent with the government's ideal about giving all citizens the right, the access and the opportunity to become involved in all aspects of Canadian life.

• (1130)

[Translation]

The Department of Canadian Heritage would encourage the possibility of greater participation by our fellow citizens in the social, political, cultural and economic life of their country.

In a few moments, my colleague, the member for Mississauga East, will speak about the many advantages of having one integrated department.

Indeed, the department's responsibilities, which range from natural reserves and historic sites and figures to sports and include the arts and cultural industries, really cover all aspects of life in Canada.

[English]

My intention therefore is to concentrate on the multicultural aspects of Canadian life and why there is a need for a program that focuses on building understanding and respect and on fighting racism, bigotry and prejudice.

For my government this program is more than building a monument. It is far more lasting in terms of daily living for Canadians, whatever their language, culture, milieu, newly arrived or long time resident. Multiculturalism is about the very fabric of our society.

Canada has been built by wave after wave of immigrants. All Canadians other than the First Nations have their roots reaching to the four corners of the earth. They have kept coming and they have come at different stages.

I was at a very moving and beautiful ceremony yesterday held at Rideau Hall with the Governor General of Canada. At that ceremony Dr. Dmytroa Cipywnyk, a very distinguished Canadian of Ukrainian descent and who is president of the Canadian Ethnocultural Council, received in the name of the 37 groups that represent ethnocultural communities across Canada a coat of arms.

It was a very moving day as I saw Ukrainians, Germans, Italians, Greeks, Jewish people, East Indians, people from the Czech Republic, Poland, Argentina, people of Irish descent and people from countries all around the world who all belong to this Canadian Ethnocultural Council. They had decided that they wanted to have a heraldic emblem that would represent who they are and what it means to be part of Canada.

I was very touched and moved by the words of the Governor General. Mr. Hnatyshyn made a comment on the choice of the heraldry, the red and white crest with the winged seeds. He said maple trees are different. Maple seeds have a design that allows them to spiral to the ground far from the trees. They take root in new places, adapt to new conditions and thrive. That is the kind of spirit that has drawn millions of people to this land for hundreds of years. It is that spirit that draws people here today.

I thought that was very demonstrative of the role and the place that Canadians have played from all parts of this world, from the Irish who came here fleeing hunger and famine to the Chinese who came to help build the railways, to the blacks who came through the underground railway. All kinds of people have come to this shore and each wave has brought prosperity, growth and development. Each wave has had to live difficult experiences and each wave has been enabled by the concepts that are founded in our democratic process to grow and to prosper, but not without difficulty.

We have addressed those difficulties at many different times in different ways because we have been a growing and emerging democracy.

• (1135)

In that spirit that moved thousands upon thousands of volunteers to respond, to reach out and to work for social harmony and social peace as their communities arrived here, it was the small groups that lent a hand to the business people, to the families in need, the Baron de Hirsch, for food, for coal, for heat; it was the organizations that came together to give food and lodging, shoes and clothing for the cold weather. Whether it was my community or the Christian community or the other communities, they gave a helping hand and enabled us to feel a sense of comfort and welcome and then we made the choice to stay, to move on, to integrate, to associate, to make our way of life here in Canada.

That spirit, that generosity is found in the charitable social and cultural organizations of today. They all need respect, understanding and they need and come for some form of support as they work to face a very changed dynamic in society. Society is a great big global village whose people have still not learned how to live respectfully in many of the lands from which they come.

We have an important job that is different than before because technology has changed. The world we now see is in conflict and those conflicts are now coming here and we must stop those conflicts. It is a different kind of situation.

It is important that these volunteer organizations help us work toward social peace and social harmony. If we reach out our hand in friendship and we welcome the newly arrived as the host society, we will have received them at our table with grace and dignity and we will help others integrate into our society under the value system that we have built into our society.

It is fairly new. When we talk about what we have put in here it is the spirit of multiculturalism that moved much of the change that we saw as we brought in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms, as we brought in the Canadian Constitution, as we signed international documents to eliminate all forms of discrimination, all forms of racism, as we put into place acts of employment equity.

I have said it before and I will say it again. It is time for us to get up to date, to understand and to explain to constituents just what multiculturalism means for Canada, just how important it is to the fabric of life here.

We have never been a static society. Canadian federalism is a growing and evolving modern society. It is governance that looks at and adapts to change. It is not frozen in any particular mode or model. It has guiding principles today that form the very core of this nation and it moves based on fundamental principles. It means that Canada has been and is now and will continue to be a host country and a home country for people from around the world, from a multitude of other cultures that all share the same goal of making a good life for themselves and their families within the framework of our laws and our principles of justice and fairness, of peace, order and good government at all levels of our society.

It is obvious that people see the structures we have in place and that is why they want to come here. As citizens we have adapted it, have adopted it and have allowed it to evolve because we do not all have in our hearts and our minds the goodwill we need to have to help ensure that the fundamentals are there and that we move forward with them.

It is very healthy that we have dialogue around the goals of multiculturalism. It is very healthy that we look at and analyse our society and recognize the ugly face of racism, recognize that those groups, Heritage Front, the Ku Klux Klan, are here, are out there, are spreading their poison and it has to stop. This is not a place where we allow them one seed from the maple tree to settle in the earth of this land.

Community groups, social, cultural and educational groups contribute their skill, knowledge, expertise and creativity to Canadian life. It is the responsibility of all Canadians in the public as well as the private sector to encourage the conditions that allow all of us, regardless of our origins, to expect these principles of fairness and justice flourish and grow and that we support those initiatives.

The government's multiculturalism programs are in place to assist us in reaching this goal. It is not an unreasonable goal and it is not an unattainable goal to expect that all Canadians be integrated into our society and become contributors to the country's progress.

I did not say assimilate. I did not say that one should lose one's identity, but one should learn to live in co–operation with respect and understanding in our neighbourhoods. Those are the choices we have in this society. This is nothing more than good common sense. It allows for peace. It allows for civil society. The multicultural programs are there because unfortunately there are still barriers that prevent some individuals and groups from realizing their full potential.

Canada was founded on a tradition of democracy, decency and civility, values of fairness and justice associated with this system that have guided and shaped our social structures, laws and institutions.

We have strayed. We have erred, but we have also grown and learned to cherish the fragile form of rule that we have in place here which calls for constant vigilance. It is in civility and respect, it is in an appreciation of our diversity that we live. Pluralism, diversity, multicultural and multiracial backgrounds are our reality. Together we shall weave a tapestry that forms the fundamentals that is Canada, as we look in the House and see how different we are, how different are the geographic regions, the backgrounds, the lands and the languages.

There is no one in the House who can look back more than two or three generations, maybe four. There are some here who tell me they have been here for six generations, but that is not the lifetime of this nation. We are all different and learning to live together, respecting each other. We do not have to love each other, but we have to respect each other for our differences and yet for our Canadian appreciation of the values of life.

To live with this reality, to ensure social peace and cohesion will not happen by wishing. That only happens by working for it.

[Translation]

Multiculturalism is not incompatible with Canadian values. On the contrary, it is based on the principles of the rights and responsibilities set forth in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the Canadian Human Rights Act, the Official Languages Act, the Citizenship Act and I might even add the Employment Equity Act.

Canada's multiculturalism policy makes it possible to overcome obstacles more easily and to promote institutional change.

It recognizes the richness found in cultural diversity. It is modeled on the values which guide us, are essential to our way of life and underlie what we aspire to as Canadians.

• (1145)

When I visited numerous cultural communities across the country, I had the opportunity and the privilege to meet many men, women and young people who were all representative of today's Canadian society. Some are proud that their ancestors were among the first ones to step on Canadian soil. Others take pride in their dual citizenship, or in their newly acquired citizenship.

I met members of organizations and associations involved in many sectors, including business, health care, education, law enforcement, as well as municipal and provincial administrations, to name but a few.

[English]

The message is always the same. The Government of Canada must help Canadians of all backgrounds to build a society where we can live in our neighbourhood in peaceful respect, united in the common purpose of securing the well–being of our families. That is what they told me. They recognize prejudice, they recognize bigotry, and they recognize the need to ensure that we stamp it out.

I believe that the government's multiculturalism policy and the programs it supported can help to achieve this goal but only in participation with the private sector and community based groups that speak for all Canadians. Those multicultural councils are vital to our well–being.

To do this successfully we are going to have to meet a number of challenges. First, we must recognize that pluralism does not contradict our assured sense of national identity, nor does it prevent social cohesion. We must not confuse national values with cultural pluralism because values cut across religious, cultural and ethnic and racial lines.

Second, we are going to have to work on ways to facilitate the long term integration of first generation Canadians. We must give new citizens the tools to be effective, responsible, and informed so that they can contribute to Canada's development and become full and active participants in building a stronger country.

Long term integration starts with learning about Canada, starts with civics. So many of the countries from which people are coming and have come do not understand democracy as it is lived here in Canada today. They do not and have not lived in democratic states. They have fear of speech. They have fear of police. They have fear of neighbours. They have fear of difference. It is our job if we want to live together in peaceful harmony to enable them to understand they are welcome, as I said earlier, at our table as part of the family.

We teach that Canada is a democratic country. That is what we do in multiculturalism. We teach that we welcome the expression of opinion. We teach that we welcome difference while ensuring that racism and bigotry find no home here. Otherwise it is pointless and it would be a pointless lesson if we do not practise what we preach.

Democracy requires that all citizens feel they are valued in this society. They must know that the opportunities to participate are available to everyone and should be available equally. We have to stop creaming those societies of their top intellectuals, bringing them here and not recognizing their academic qualifications.

We must recognize that we must teach one of the official languages of this country. If we do not do that you cannot participate in a democratic society. You cannot shop in knowledge. You cannot look after your children and apply medications and buy medications. You cannot understand political parties. You cannot make rational decisions if you cannot read and speak one of the official languages of this country, depending on where you live and in what region you live and from where you came and what seems to adapt best to you. One of the official languages must be a part of the background of training.

There must really be no barriers to participation based on race, religion, ethnic background or language.

[Translation]

All Canadians must be able to express their views so as to be understood by others. This is why, as I just said, we have made education in both official languages a priority. This is important, because Canadians must have a decent standard of living, and they must participate in the daily activities of our society. Otherwise, people feel isolated; they can be manipulated and they may not lead the life they should be able to, here in Canada.

• (1150)

[English]

The multiculturalism program is therefore organized around four key objectives. First is to facilitate community participation and integration into the fabric of Canadian society.

Second is to help those who render services in our hospitals and health institutions and those who receive the services; the police, the municipalities and the schools as well, to ensure that their policies and programs adjust to the reality of our diversity.

Third is to strengthen social cohesion by promoting harmonious cross–cultural, intercultural and interracial group relations.

Fourth is to promote public awareness of the economic and social benefits of pluralism.

We know already that we have the support of many major Canadian organizations and institutions that understand the value of a respectful, open and participating society. One example I would give is that peaceful harmony means good business. Therefore, removing racism and acts of racial prejudice undertaking is valuable.

We thank the Canadian Association of Broadcasters which has produced $10 million worth of air time which has been devoted to the fight against racism. In our schools across this land, parents and teachers associations have helped us fight prejudice and misunderstanding in the schools and have distributed very valuable materials that are lessons in civicism and civility.

Other partners, the Conference Board of Canada and the Asia Pacific Foundation, have made it clear that diversity has an economic benefit and that pluralism gives us a natural competitive advantage in a global economy that is in itself multicultural and multilingual.

The Canadian Advertising Association has done some excellent research and has put out a document called "The Colour of Your Money" that enable us to understand how important it is to be able to deal with the customers who live on our street and in our district.

Our broad range of partners also includes the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police, the Multicultural Help Association, the Canadian Advertising Council, the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, the Canadian Association of School Board Trustees, the Canadian Teachers' Federation, and the Canadian Conference on the Arts.

These are not song, dance and festivals. Although I would love to be able to finance them, we do not do that. They are partners that help us ensure an open, respectful and understanding society where we all have choices to live, choices to choose where and how we want to live within the laws of respect in this land so that we live in an integrated milieu that makes Canada the best place for all its citizens.

These are the partnerships along with the volunteer sector that open more lines of communication to provide all Canadians, men and women and our youth, with a greater knowledge of the richness and benefits of our diverse population.

We are working to change government from the inside as well as to ensure interracial understanding. The same way we work with shop foremen to prepare that floor as the host community to the new arrivals, so we are doing within our own house. For example, we worked and are working with the Departments of National Defence, Customs and Excise, and the RCMP to help ensure they are sensitive in their response to Canada's reality.

[Translation]

Our programs related to interracial relations and cultural comprehension, and also to the integration of first generation Canadians, help all Canadians, through community support, to work together to build an economically sound and socially just country.

Multiculturalism is not based on compartmentalization, nor on division.

[English]

It is not based on being a hyphenated Canadian.

[Translation]

It seeks to build an integrated society where everyone has an equal chance to succeed, as well as an opportunity to understand and apply the principles governing citizenship.

• (1155)

[English]

It is also not as I said before about funding song and dance, and unicultural festivals, as important as they are.

[Translation]

When we see the tragedies which occur every day in the world, we have no choice but to cherish human life, and that includes all men and women—Catholics, Protestants, Jews, Hindus, Sikhs, Muslims, be they black, yellow, brown, red or white—who adhere to the democratic values of the Canadian society.

[English]

With an investment of less than $1 per year per Canadian, the federal government helps to promote a fairer society.

In a society with a government that spends less than $1 per year but depends on additions to that dollar through the voluntary sector and through voluntary effort, the federal government helps to promote a fairer society in which all Canadians have a chance and a choice to participate equally and with respect.

This is an investment we cannot afford to ignore. The value of our multiculturalism programs to Canadian society must be confirmed by ensuring that they can work effectively within the Department of Canadian Heritage. All of us, whether in this House or not, must be ever vigilant in our defence of the values of a democratic, free and open society.

[Translation]

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Madam Speaker, the bill before the House today, on third reading, is Bill C–53, an Act to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage and to amend and repeal certain other Acts.

The Bloc Quebecois has five major reasons for voting against this bill. First, through this bill the Government of Canada denies the existence of Quebec as a nation and the existence of its culture.

Second, nothing in this bill points to any major changes in federal policy on defending the rights of francophones in Canada, although anyone who can read and use a pocket calculator will see that the federal government's policy on bilingualism has failed.

Third, this government has forgotten its commitment made to creators during the last election campaign with respect to patriating copyright legislation to the Department of Canadian Heritage.

Fourth, at a time when there is a growing trend towards amalgamation in the communications sector, the government has decided to confirm the separate status of telecommunications and broadcasting by making the Department of Industry responsible for the former and the Department of Canadian Heritage responsible for broadcasting.

Fifth, nothing in this bill gives the Department of Canadian Heritage any real power to control foreign investment where cultural products and industries are concerned.

I will now comment on these points one by one, to demonstrate the major weaknesses of this bill. In his speech on second reading of the bill we are now considering at the third reading stage, the Minister of Canadian Heritage defined the word "heritage" as, and I quote: "the set of signs that enable us to recognize ourselves as individuals who belong to a group or even a country".

On the basis of that definition, it was reasonable to hope that the Canadian government would recognize in law what has been a fact since the beginnings of this country and what the Laurendeau–Dunton Commission recognized, and I am talking about the existence of two founding peoples equal before the law and of several nations. Unfortunately, this bill makes no reference to the signs that would enable Quebecers to recognize themselves as belonging to this country. This bill recognizes only one nation, the nation of Canada, and gives the Minister of Canadian Heritage the authority to promote one identity: the Canadian identity.

• (1200)

There is worse. The heritage minister, who sponsored this bill, testified before the Standing Committee on National Heritage on December 1. My colleague, the hon. member for Québec, asked him at that time why his bill made reference to only one nation, namely the Canadian nation, instead of two, that of Quebec and Canada. With the arrogance and ignorance that have come to characterize him, he replied: "I would be grateful if you could tell me, or if there is not enough time, my officials who will be testifying before you at a later date, which clause exactly refers to a single Canadian nation. All I can see in this bill is references to Canadian identity. And that is not the same thing".

Again, the minister is playing games. He is insinuating that my hon. colleague from Québec did not understand a thing.

Let me explain to the Minister of Canadian Heritage a couple of basic rules of grammar. When you write "nation", it is a singular. And singular means one, not two, because then you would have a plural, meaning more than one. When you write "Canadian nation", the word "Canadian" is used as a qualifier or adjective and, in French, the function of the adjective is to modify the word it is combined with. In this bill, we are not talking about just any nation, but the Canadian nation.

Let us take a closer look at clauses 4 and 5 of the bill, which specifically give the minister the mandate to promote the Canadian nation.

Clause 4 reads, and I quote:

> 4.(1) The powers, duties and functions of the Minister extend to and include all matters over which Parliament has jurisdiction, not by law assigned to any other department, board or agency of the Government of Canada, relating to Canadian identity and values, cultural development, heritage and areas of natural or historical significance to the nation.

As for Clause 5, it reads as follows:

> 5. In exercising the powers and performing the duties and functions assigned to the Minister by section 4, the Minister shall initiate, recommend, coordinate, implement and promote national policies, projects and programs with respect to Canadian identity and values, cultural development, heritage and areas of natural or historical significance to the nation.

In this case, there is no room for interpretation in the French version of the clause, as the word "canadiens" is spelled with an "s". If you go back to the grammatical rule I just gave, this means that the qualifier "canadiens" modifies every noun that precedes it in the sentence—the same way that "Canadian" modifies every substantive that comes after. The meaning of Clause 5 then is the following: "In exercising the powers and performing the duties and functions assigned to the Minister by section 4, the Minister shall initiate, recommend, coordinate, implement and promote national policies, projects and programs with respect to Canadian identity and Canadian values, Canadian cultural development, Canadian heritage and areas of natural or historical significance to the nation—that is to say the Canadian nation".

You will have noticed that this entire bill is predicated on the concept of a Canadian nation. For the Minister of Canadian Heritage and the cultural agencies under him, there is only one nation, the Canadian nation.

In the brief he tabled with the Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage, Mr. Monière reported to us the results of polls conducted by Léger & Léger and related by Maurice Pinard, a renowned McGill University professor whose integrity, credibility and intellectual honesty are unquestionable.

These polls show that Quebec's national identity has evolved considerably and that Quebecers are more and more likely to identify themselves as Quebecers first and foremost and not as French Canadians, much less as Canadians. In 1992, 54 per cent of respondents of all linguistic origins—this is important—referred to themselves as Quebecers, 26 per cent as French Canadians and 20 per cent as Canadians. These figures clearly point to the existence of a Quebec culture, a Quebec identity, a Quebec nation, which the bill before us does not reflect.

Many things were said in committee on this concept of nation. When department officials came to testify, they told us that since this bill was not a constitutional document, it did not have to mention the two founding nations of this country. I must humbly admit that I did not have time to verify this statement from a legal standpoint. But I know very well that at the time of the "beautiful risk", we tried to have Quebec's distinct society recognized in the Constitution, but the rest of Canada turned us down.

We are on the horns of a dilemma, the one about the chicken and the egg, which will be much more simple and easy to solve through Quebec sovereignty, since the government refuses to make any amendment to this bill which would have helped us feel at home in this country, even though we were the first to arrive in this country named Canada by Jacques Cartier, a country whose national anthem was composed—lyrics and music—by two Quebecers, Calixa Lavallée and Basile Routhier. We are being denied the right to feel at home in this country, so the only alternative is to leave.

Mrs. Finestone: I feel right at home, and I refuse to leave.

Mrs. Tremblay: I listened to you, Madam, so try to listen to me while I speak. Thank you.

In summary, what the deputy minister, cultural development tells us is that the Canadian identity includes the Quebec identity. He said in committee that their general vision is that the Quebec identity is a fundamental component of the Canadian identity.

This vision, which would wipe out Quebecois culture as if it did not exist by itself but was only an integral part of Canadian culture, was denounced by many groups that appeared before the Committee on Canadian Heritage during the marathon hearings which, by using dilatory procedural tactics, we were able to force the government to hold.

François Rocher, a political scientist at Carleton University, said that what the government was doing was part of an incomplete process of nation–building, based on a denial of the national realities that already exist in Canada. Establishing a heritage department is part of a much broader plan to refashion the way that Canada's identity is to be understood and expressed. Mr. Rocher thus shares the idea expressed by his colleague, Mr. Monière, who said that the heritage department was really a propaganda department.

In fact, what the government is doing is, first, to deny the social and historic reality of an existing Quebec culture and nation; second, to imagine a fictitious Canadian national community to hide the lack of a common sense of Canadian identity; third, the government wishes to promote this made–up identity and even impose it on all communities in Canada.

It is quite obvious that this is intended particularly to counter Quebec nationalism. To oppose the growing demands for particular identities, the government proposes a homogenizing national vision. However, building a national identity on the denial of already existing identities that are strong and politically articulate can only exacerbate the tensions that exist in Canada.

It must be pointed out that all the efforts of this department consisted and from now on will consist in denying the existence of a culture other than the Canadian one and furthermore in using our taxes to promote this Canadian culture on Quebec territory. Why do the Bloc Quebecois and most of the witnesses who appeared before the heritage committee so strongly denounce this denial of Quebec culture by the federal government? Quite simply, because failing to mention it in the bill means denying its existence.

Mr. Rocher said that three conditions are essential for a culture to exist. First, it must be able to express itself; that is, it must be rich and flourishing. Second, it must be able to fulfil itself, that is, be used and valued in economic, social and political activities. Finally, it must be recognized, that is, accepted and taken into consideration by other communities close by.

• (1210)

The right to exist is part of one's identity. The identity must represent something, not only for the individuals which make up a community, but also for the other communities which recognize the legitimacy of that identity.

Let us now come to the second reason why the Bloc Quebecois will oppose this bill, namely the failure of the federal government's official languages policy.

This legislation provides no major change regarding federal policies on bilingualism, as was confirmed to us, in committee, by the responsible deputy minister at the Department of Canadian Heritage. According to paragraph 4(2)(g) of the bill, the minister is responsible for, and I quote:

> (g) the advancement of the equality of status and use of English and French and the enhancement and development of the English and French linguistic minority communities in Canada;

Also, clauses 23 and 24 of the bill amend the Official Languages Act to confirm that the Minister of Canadian Heritage will be the one responsible for the implementation of sections 41 and 42, Part VII, of the Official Languages Act, which relate to the co–ordination and the implementation of linguistic policies within federal departments.

So, there is nothing new under the sun. Yet, the government should really have brought major changes to its linguistic policy. It should have clearly indicated its intention to salvage what can still be salvaged.

Let us take a look at some figures, 25 years after the Official Languages Act took effect. First, the percentage of Canadians whose first language is French is dropping drastically, and the official languages policy implemented in 1969 has done nothing to stop that trend.

According to Statistics Canada's latest census, 6.5 million Canadians, or 23.8 per cent of the population, have French as their mother tongue. In 1951, that proportion was 29 per cent.

Let us look at the assimilation rate, which is the ratio between the number of those who say French is their mother tongue and the number of those who actually use French at home. According to the latest census, the average assimilation rate in Canada, excluding Quebec, was 35.9 per cent, which represents an increase of 4.5 per cent over the 1986 figure.

British Columbia is the undisputed champion with an assimilation rate of 75.2 per cent. Saskatchewan is in second place with a rate of 69.6 per cent, followed by Alberta with 66.9 per cent. Even New Brunswick, which is the only constitutionally bilingual province and which prides itself in giving special treatment to French, has an assimilation rate of 8.7 per cent.

Some say that Quebec has the most racist linguistic policy. Yet, its English–speaking community is growing.

In the 1991 census, 9.2 per cent of Quebecers said that English was their mother tongue, while 11.2 per cent stated that they spoke English at home. Instead of hiding its head in the sand, Canada should look at what is being done in Quebec.

Let us now turn to how the federal government implements its policy on bilingualism in its own Public Service. Take Foreign Affairs, a sector that is crucial when representing Canada abroad and helping business people from Quebec, for instance.

Recent reports released by the department indicated that only 42 per cent of Canadian diplomats were bilingual and that 23 per cent were francophones, of whom more than 95 per cent were bilingual. We can therefore conclude that only 25 per cent of English Canadian diplomats speak French, which is totally unacceptable in their position as representatives of a country that calls itself officially bilingual.

The consequences of the lack of bilingual Canadian representatives abroad are well known. A unilingual francophone client abroad, whether he is a businessman or a citizen in distress, is unable to communicate with about 60 per cent of departmental officers. He cannot read unclassified documents drafted in English only and can only communicate with a minority of the diplomats in Canadian embassies abroad.

With this many of our diplomats being unilingual English, the problem is compounded when the embassy is a small one.

And what impression do foreigners get when they find that the Canadian ambassador, a career diplomat, does not speak French? That Canada is a unilingual, English–speaking country.

• (1215)

Turning to the Department of National Defence, 48.1 per cent of the total francophone establishment, both civilian and military, is bilingual, while only 6.9 per cent of the anglophone establishment is bilingual. Furthermore, 23.4 per cent of francophones are in English–speaking units and only 1.7 per cent of anglophones are in French–speaking units. There is no good reason for this. What makes these statistics even more depressing today is the closing of the Collège militaire de Saint–Jean. Both departments are, in fact, a microcosm of the situation in the federal Public Service.

In its latest report on the language situation in the federal Public Service, Treasury Board said that in Quebec, to serve a minority group that represents 10 per cent of the population, the federal government had an establishment that was of 52.7 per cent bilingual, or 15,945 positions out of a total of 30,234.

If we apply this ratio to the rest of Canada, the number of bilingual positions should be 30,666 instead of 7,465, which is the case today. So there is a crying need for 23,000 bilingual positions, which is not being met. After the Yukon, the francophone minority least well served by the federal government is in New Brunswick, where the percentage of francophones is 33 per cent and the percentage of bilingual positions in the federal Public Service is only 39.4 per cent. Applying the same ratio we applied to Quebec, the entire federal Public Service in this province should be bilingual.

It is obvious to me that the view in Ottawa is that a francophone is not worth as much as an anglophone, because when it comes to being served in one's own language, the anglophone gets the service, while the francophone has to speak English. Studies have repeatedly shown that the inability to obtain services in one's own language is a factor that contributes generally to assimilation.

If the federal government really wanted to put the status and use of French and English on an equal footing in this country, it would invest in this principle, in other words, when awarding bursaries for language training, it would give preference to anglophones in Canada with a very poor knowledge of French instead of to francophones, who generally have a fairly good knowledge of English. But no, the Department of Canadian Heritage does the opposite. On page 13 of his report, the official languages commissioner notes that of the 7,301 bursaries awarded in 1992–1993 for summer language courses, 3,150 went to Quebecers. What this program, like many others, is designed to do is anglicize Quebec, not to make Canada bilingual.

Here, I cannot help pointing out the difference in the treatment of the English and French networks of the CBC. While the CBC spends an average of $18,390 per production hour on its French network, it spends twice that amount, or $37,496, on its English network, and it does so with the blessing of the federal government, the Department of Canadian Heritage and the Canadian Radio–Television and Telecommunications Commission.

In this regard, the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation continues to be a clear example of what the federal government has in store for French in Canada and of the collusion of Canadian institutions in the implementation of this unequal status.

I could not close this chapter on the failure of 25 years of bilingualism policies without sharing with you some information that appeared in the summer issue of Language and Society, a magazine put out by the Commissioner of Official Languages. This particular issue looked at the accessibility of health services in the language of the minority. It contained the following lines: "The government of British Columbia has instituted a program of access to multilingual services. French is not included, however, even though francophones form the fifth largest ethnic group in that province. Language assistance is offered in Chinese (Mandarin and Cantonese), Punjabi, Spanish, Somali and Vietnamese, even though Vietnamese is only the sixteenth largest ethnic group in the province".

Surely British Columbia holds the gold medal for assimilation, since it does not offer any health services in French to its French–speaking population.

• (1220)

The spokesperson for the provincial Department of Health, Mrs. Susan Gee, explains the situation this way, and I quote: "There are not enough Francophones in British Columbia". Yet, there are more Francophones than Vietnamese. "They are not considered immigrants and they are expected to be bilingual since they are Canadians". In other words, they are expected to speak English.

Other provinces have no policy regarding the provision of health services in the minority language. As one witness told the committee: "Call 911 just to see if you can get service in French". When you think about everything the federal government said against user fees and its refusal to do anything to provide health services in French, there is only one conclusion to be drawn.

The third reason why we oppose this bill is that it gives the Minister of Heritage the power to legislate with regard to copyright. Let me remind the House that we have been waiting now for almost nine years for the Copyright Act to be amended. Let me also remind the House that the legislation was supposed to be amended under the previous government and that the current Minister of Heritage, when he was appointed, appeared before the Committee on Canadian Heritage, that was last April, and told us that the reform of the legislation was one of his priorities. At that time, he said it was only a matter of weeks before he could table the bill. However, creative artists will not even see the legislation before Christmas.

Why? Because the Copyright Act is essentially the responsibility of the Department of Industry. Every creative artists' group has demanded that the act be transferred to the Department of Heritage. All those who came before the committee indicated that the Department of Industry is in a conflict of interests in this matter. Indeed, the department must protect the interests of consumers and corporations, which are in direct contradiction with the rights and interests of the artists.

Before the election, even the Liberal Party had recognized that this was inappropriate. In response to questions by the Canadian Conference of the Arts, the Liberals wrote: "The Liberal Party will have as a priority to review the Copyright Act. We will make sure that, above all, the writers reap the fruit of their labours, while easing the access to copyrighted material. Liberals understand how important copyrights are. That is why we will review the Conservative decision to share this jurisdiction between two departments, when reorganizing the administration."

This at least is one case where the Liberal Party has not kept its word and that is most unfortunate. In an almost unprecedented effort of manipulation, the chairman of the heritage committee did his best to make us and the witnesses believe that his government had, in fact, proceeded to review the Conservative decision but had finally decided that it was more logical to leave the responsibility of the Copyright Act with the Department of Industry.

His attempt to save face failed. Indeed, senior officials from the Department of Industry, who drafted Bill C–46 establishing this department, said before the industry committee that all they did was put into legislative terms Ms. Cambell's reform. This evidence was corroborated by Heritage Canada officials who, during the briefing session given to our staff, stated that Bill C–53 was just a housekeeping bill whose sole purpose was to put into legislative terms the Campbell reform, and not to correct its flaws.

Officials from the Department of Industry went even further. When questioned by the committee chairman, they stated that it would not help to add a reference to copyright in the Heritage Canada legislation. They said that if we had to add this kind of reference every time the interests of two departments overlapped, we would never see the end of it. By saying this, these officials confirmed what many had told us in committee, that the government amendment to Bill C–53 regarding copyright does not give the minister any new powers.

As my colleague for Richelieu said in committee, since the legislative power with regard to copyright rests with the Department of Industry, the protection of the rights of creative artists comes down to a matter of credibility and the strength of individual ministers.

• (1225)

Given the clout and credibility of the present Minister of Canadian Heritage, creative artists have good reason to be pessimistic, and they have the whole–hearted sympathy of the official opposition.

By its refusal to give copyright legislation to the Department of Canadian Heritage, the government has shown that it could not care less about creative artists. It sends an alarming signal to the artistic community and cultural industries. We all remember the decision made in the Ginn transaction, and we all know how that sorry saga ended.

I cannot conclude without saying a word on our last two reasons for voting against this bill. Against all logic, as far as the defence of our cultural industries is concerned, the Canadian government maintained another decision made by Ms. Campbell, splitting broadcasting and telecommunications.

At a time when convergence is critical to the activities of our cultural industries, it was important to rescind the decision separating two things that, by nature, belong together: telecommunications and broadcasting. The message this government sends to people in the communications business is that financial interests will take precedence over cultural interests in Canada and Quebec. That is a very serious problem because the value to be gained from the information highway will not be the physical network itself, but rather the information travelling through that network.

I would also like to say that today, we are witnessing another shift toward the industry department. Indeed, as for copyrights, the federal government chose to leave to the Department of Industry jurisdiction over foreign investments in cultural industries, thus giving to the Department of Canadian Heritage only the power to develop cultural policies. The former Department of Communications had that power. It used it to develop a publishing policy which the government light–heartily violated in the Ginn case and in the Maxwell–McMillan versus Prentice–Hall case, as well.

I am getting to the conclusion, which is simple: this government, with its Bill C–53, once again simply lacks vision.

At the dawn of this crucial year for our collective future, the Canadian government had a unique opportunity to send clear messages to the citizens of this country, whom the Department of Canadian Heritage has a mandate to protect. As a member of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, this saddens me. But as a sovereignist, I am very happy that the government did exactly the opposite of what Canadians were expecting, but exactly what Quebecers were hoping for.

It simply denied the existence of our nation. It does not suggest any move to frenchify English Canada and to stop the bilingualization of Quebec. On the contrary, in our opinion, clause 4(2)(g), which provides for the advancement of the equality of status and use of French and English, is not even worth the paper on which it is written. Finally, the government has not lived up to the expectations it had instilled in creative artists and an important part of the tools it could use to defend culture and creators is now in the hands of the Department of Industry. The government has just officially placed an important part of the Canadian Heritage under its administrative supervision.

For all those reasons, the Bloc Quebecois will oppose this bill. It is narrow–minded, dangerous for the Canadian nation and disrespectful towards creative artists. There is only one hope for Quebecers, which is to choose to have their own country. Only then will they be able to express their own culture and have it recognized for the best of our collective future.

Mrs. Jan Brown (Calgary Southeast, Ref.): Madam Speaker, I rise to speak at third reading of Bill C–53, an act to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage.

I must say it has been a unique experience to participate in the process of presenting this bill to the House, to hear the responses of so many of my colleagues at second reading, to acknowledge the efforts of all of us in committee and now finally to speak once again at this next step in its passage. In my view this represents the best of what democracy has to offer us: freedom of speech and the opportunity to disagree and present alternative points of view. Having said that, will we be left yet again with the status quo?

Speaking from this side of the House I believe that our point of view has enriched the debate as the government has continued its creation of a superministry of cultural identity. We have presented many arguments to challenge the new ministry. As I have said before, it denies us an opportunity to define ourselves as Canadians despite the insistence of some that it provides and promotes greater understanding and a greater sense of intercultural endeavour.

What is occurring is the legislative entrenchment of grants to a host of special interest groups. The total of all special interest group funding throughout all government departments is rumoured to be approximately $500 million. The government has not been specific in terms of the cuts it plans to make to special interest groups. Responses have ranged from the preparation of guidelines to the anticipation of reduced funding. There is nothing explicit in that regard but to wait until the February 1995 budget.

It is obvious the government is not comfortable discussing expenditure reduction. This is odd especially at a time when Canadians are seeking a more open approach to governance. It is also odd at a time when the opportunity to present a model for change, as has been presented in the creation of the Department of Canadian Heritage, has not been seized. The circle of virtue is reduced to a vicious circle and the status quo remains.

The ministry consolidates several subcabinet departments: the Secretary of State; the Department of Multiculturalism and Citizenship; the Department of Fitness and Amateur Sport; Parks Canada; components of Environment Canada; and the heritage component of the Department of Communications. I will focus further on a number of these departments in this presentation.

Given the unacceptable, incomprehensible and contemptuous personal attack made yesterday by my colleague from Carleton—Gloucester with no regard or relationship to Bill C–53, I will clarify for the member the Reform Party's position on languages. I hope he will be able to understand this clear policy.

The Reform Party supports the promotion of language policy centred on the following:

[Translation]

first, freedom of expression; second, recognition of the French language in Quebec and of the English language in other provinces; third, recognition of bilingualism in important federal institutions, including the Parliament of Canada and the Supreme Court; and finally, recognition of bilingualism wherever the number of people warrants the presence of services in both official languages.

[English]

Explaining further so as to be perfectly clear, let me quote the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan. He explained during second reading of the bill that the official languages policy is divisive. For proof of this, one need only to be reminded of the pejorative, anti–women comments that were hurled my way yesterday by the member for Carleton—Gloucester.

My hon. colleague from Nanaimo—Cowichan stated that "the mandate calls for the advancement of the equality of status and the use of English and French. Under this mandate the ministry will spend $24 million this year on official languages in education. The Constitutions of 1867 and 1982 clearly state that education is a provincial responsibility. Why then is this ministry spending a quarter of a billion dollars in this area of provincial jurisdiction?"

• (1235)

We oppose this bill for a number of reasons, only one of which is our opposition to the government's official languages policy. I would like to quote the profound words of my colleague from Surrey North when she questioned the need for this department.

The hon. member stated: "Webster's dictionary defines heritage as something that we inherit at birth; in other words it is like a legacy. It is something or anything that is derived from the past or from tradition. By definition then, heritage of an individual or a group or a country is what we actually inherit at birth, that which was created and moulded by the actions of those who preceded us just as what we do now in our lifetime will become the heritage or the mould of the lifestyle for those who come after us".

She went on to say: "Those in the present inherit a base from the past to build on for those in the future. Instead of there being a specific Department of Canadian Heritage, all departments or ministries should be responsible through the legislation they propose for the development and maintenance of everything we do, of the heritage for those who are to follow, not just a single department".

Let me share with the House a story about a man by the name of Glenn Bradley. I found his story in the book Worlds Apart: New Immigrant Voices written by Milly Charon. His story is titled "The Dilemma of Multiculturalism". This is Glenn's story and it constitutes the bulk of my remarks today. There is a poignancy to this story that I will leave with the House.

Language and nationality are current issues in today's society. In view of the laws and general social outlook in Quebec, one has to realize that to survive here, one must become French. Many of the language problems exist today because the younger generation did not want to learn to speak French, perhaps because of their parents who may have been immigrants and wished to keep the old ways and mother tongue dominant.

I grew up under the new age of political reform in Quebec. The social phenomenon of the quiet revolution and le Front de Libération du Québec were part of my childhood surroundings. These events played a part in the rise of the supremacy of the French language in Quebec.

My parents witnessed these social reforms and decided that if I was to have a future in Quebec I would have to learn to speak French.

They could have rebelled in their own way. They could have brought me up with all the Scottish traditions they had been raised with. However, teatime, the clans, and Robert Burns were not to play a part in my childhood education.

My family roots are deep in Scottish soil. My parents and all my ancestors were born in Scotland. My parents decided to leave their homeland in the late 1950s. At that time, Quebec was looking for skilled workers.

My father, who had been an engineer on merchant ships sailing out of Scottish ports, decided that Quebec would be the ideal place in Canada where his skills would land him a job without too much difficulty.

Quebec City was my parents' first stop, but when they realized that Montreal was the industrial centre of the province, they moved to St. Michel, a suburb.

My father worked in the oil refineries in the east end of Montreal and continued to do so even after the family moved to Duvernay, a predominantly French Canadian sector of the city of Laval. They chose Duvernay deliberately because they realized that the children they were planning to have one day would be able to learn French by association with the other people in the area.

During my early school days in the late 1960s, my father had decided that the shift work in the refineries would interfere with his responsibilities as a parent. Education was booming in Quebec, and the need for technical teachers was great. My father capitalized on this and easily landed a job with the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal as a metalwork teacher for Monklands High School in Notre–Dame–de–Grâce. At the time, my mother was the vice–principal of Laval Highcliff Elementary School which I would attend.

Because both my parents were involved in education at different levels, it made them realize that if their offspring were to flourish in this country, they would need a good education.

In the late sixties and seventies the Laval school started testing its program with bilingual classes for elementary school children. Highcliff was chosen as the test school, and a group of students who were considered above average would take their classes in French. I was lucky to participate in that program.

My interest in the French language actually had started almost from the moment I could talk coherently. Living in a French neighbourhood meant that whenever you went out into the street, nine times out of ten the other children were speaking what I thought was a strange language. Little did I know that "ballon–chasseur" was dodgeball and that "cache–cache" meant hide and go seek. From then on I was determined to learn what they were saying so that I would not be at a disadvantage when playing with them. Oddly enough, this decision made when I was five years old would dominate the rest of my life.

Since English instruction in the French school system left much to be desired and I was already starting to learn French, I decided I would play ambassador. Just as an ambassador is a liaison in another country, my role would be liaison between the two languages. Imagine my surprise when I confronted the children in the street with my first garbled speech in French, my strained "bonjour, je m'appelle" was returned with "maudite bloke" a reference to the somewhat square–headedness of the English population. Chalk up one for French Canadian nationalism, I guess.

Good old Scottish stubbornness, or whatever you want to call it, made me decide to beat them at their own game. I excelled in my French studies through bilingual and immersion programs to a degree where my knowledge of the language and grammar was perhaps better than that of the French children themselves.

Unfortunately, the responses I received had gone from one extreme to another. Although I got along with the other children, I was never really accepted by them. I finally discovered the reason why. French Canadians hated the French from France almost as much as the English. My French accent was almost like that of the people French Canadians called "les snobbes".

By the time I was 13 I realized that French Canadian was a proper language and a culture all of its own. I decided to treat what I had already learned as a separate language and discover exactly what French Canadian was and is.

In my final years of high school I delved into dozens of written novels, the works of Savard, Thériault and Vallieres, the plays of Tremblay and Gélinas and the poetry of Vigneault and Nelligan. From these pieces written by prominent French Canadian authors I was able to obtain a good grasp of the emergence of the French Canadian culture in Quebec.

It was interesting to witness the transition in myself. I was so involved with these studies that a few of my high school buddies started calling me Frenchie. I graduated from high school feeling very comfortable with my knowledge of French Canadians. As strange as it may sound, perhaps I had too much knowledge.

Just before heading off to Carleton University to study communications, something in my brain snapped. I began thinking I was French Canadian. I did everything to convince myself that I was. I had become a staunch Parti Quebecois supporter. I even cried when René Lévesque lost the sovereignty association vote. I defended everything that was considered French Canadian.

At Carleton I was elected president of the Francophone Club. My plan for assimilation might have worked except for two things: my name and my ancestors. Once again my wise parents from the old country came to my rescue. They were able to grind into my thick skull that should the situation in Quebec worsen, my name alone would make me stand out like a sore thumb.

For most people it might have been too late to change, but at 18 I began learning about my own cultural history, the glory of the Scottish clans and all the benefits that Quebec and Canada enjoy today because of Scottish immigrants. Robert Bruce, Mary Queen of Scots and the poet Robert Burns are well–known names in Scottish history, but what of those who immigrated to Canada and gave so much of their time and efforts to build this country?

Lord Selkirk, a Scottish philanthropist and colonizer was responsible for bringing immigrants to Prince Edward Island. They later spread to Nova Scotia and established a colony there. Selkirk opened the west with his settlements in the Red River Valley in Manitoba.

Scottish immigrants were instrumental in the establishment of the fur trade in Canada and played the greatest part in the foundations of education in this country.

Early Scottish settlers placed top priority on education. The first non–sectarian school for higher education in Nova Scotia, Pictou Academy, was founded by a Scot. Dalhousie University, McGill University in Montreal, the University of Toronto, Queen's, St. Francis Xavier and the University of New Brunswick all owe their establishment to Scots.

Sir Alexander Mackenzie, trader and explorer, discovered the Mackenzie River and was the first white man to cross the northern part of the American continent to the Pacific Ocean. Simpson and MacTavish are other names synonymous with the building of our country. Alexander Mackenzie, a Scot, was Prime Minister of Canada between 1873 and 1878.

In addition, Scotsmen and Canadians of Scottish origin have played formidable roles in communications and journalism. There has been George Brown, founder of the Globe; William Lyon Mackenzie, founder and editor of the Colonial Advocate and one of the leaders of the 1837 rebellion; John Nielson, editor of the Quebec Gazette; John Dougall, both father and son, of the Montreal Witness; and Hugh Graham, Lord Atholstan of the Montreal Star.

Suddenly a new dimension was added to my research for cultural identity. I realized that I was neither Scottish nor French Canadian. Talk about an identity crisis! Because Canada is not the melting pot that characterizes the United States, there is really no distinct Canadian culture. Therefore, I didn't consider myself to be a Canadian. I was a mixture, a part of three great nationalities.

After much deliberation I decided that the only way out of this dilemma was to combine the best parts of all three nations. To become a part of the French Canadian culture, to be accepted as an equal, I needed more of the expressions in daily use.

To accomplish this I spent the summer of 1981 working in a French children's camp. That summer was the turning point in my life. I not only picked up the oral requirements but also a large group of French Canadian friends.

I learned more about Scottish culture by reading books and poetry by Scottish authors, as well as the stories of the clans. I joined a curling club to get a taste of a Scottish sport and social gathering.

In order to become more of a Canadian, I relaxed my hard line views on independence for Quebec. I now try to picture Canada as a whole and am more sympathetic to the feelings of the people in other provinces.

I thought I was all set—I had satisfied my goals and those of my parents. The one thing I had forgotten to consider was my friends.

Each group of friends I had made in the past few years had accepted me in the way I related to them. I was the one who had adjusted easily to each group by simply changing my frame of mind and attitude to what each group was interested in and expected of me.

I went partying with my French Canadian friends, bar hopping with my anglophone high school buddies and was involved in intellectual stimulation with my university associates. Each world was different, yet I fitted easily into each one. What I had failed to consider was the interaction between the groups.

I soon discovered through trial and error that my old high school friends would not be accepted by my university buddies; nor would my English friends be accepted by my French Canadian friends and vice versa.

This created a situation which is similar to the problems of Quebec society today. Because of my personal experience, I feel French Canadians and English Canadians will never associate unless some concessions are made by both sides. We will always run into people of both cultures who will refuse to speak the other's language. There is animosity even within each cultural group—animosity caused by intellectual, social and economic differences.

If only we could learn from one another, if we would be willing to mingle, we could absorb a great deal by association. With understanding comes acceptance. Unfortunately the situation may not be resolved in my lifetime. To keep the peace, the cultures may have to remain apart.

I don't favour apartheid in the South African sense, where one culture is discriminated against on economic, social, political and colour levels. I do believe, however, that many cultures can coexist in one province as long as there is agreement on the equal value of each.

My plight is understandable. I enjoy the knowledge of many worlds, yet to keep harmony among them, I have to keep them separate. Therefore, in a sense, I am trapped in the middle of all three groups.

Because I can't combine all these worlds, despite the fact that each has so much to offer, I have to spend an equal amount of time in all of them.

Although it is satisfying to experience the diversity, you can't give 100 per cent of what we have to share and at the same time receive 100 per cent of what everyone else has to offer. The basic explanation for someone in this dilemma is that you can be acquainted with many, but totally involved with none.

It is another way of explaining and learning to live with loneliness.

• (1250)

That is the end of Glenn's story in The Dilemma of Multiculturalism. We will notice in all the text there is no mention of dollars spent but one man's effort to become more familiar with his own identity, his own cultural roots, and to try to find a way in which he could fit into a culture in Quebec and still remain associated with the rest of Canada.

I leave the story with the House without further analysis. I think it is worthy as a reflection on what it means to be a Canadian living in this country of ours today.

I am going to move now to an experience I had as a member of the Standing Committee on Canadian Heritage when we had one of our witnesses come to speak to us about the issue of multiculturalism. His name is Dr. Rais Khan and he addressed the issue, stating that both the act and the department were evidently intended to facilitate integration of the different cultural groups into the Canadian society. But the policy of multiculturalism has become subverted in this noble intent. It has encouraged ethnic and cultural groups to perpetuate their distinctiveness and has thus prevented them, even though inadvertently, from integrating into the mainstream of society. Official bilingualism has erected cultural barriers and gender discrimination and encouraged social ghettoization.

Let me give an example of how multiculturalism goes wrong, an example with which my Liberal colleagues will most certainly agree, as did the Minister of Canadian Heritage.

Multiculturalism gets twisted to such an extent that groups of individuals believe that by virtue of being a member of some identifiable group they deserve special funding and privileges. This is clear as was the case with the Writing Thru Race conference which was hosted in Vancouver by the Writers Union of Canada. This conference refused to allow anyone of non–colour to attend, that is to say whites were barred from attending a conference which received funding from the Canada Council. Thankfully the minister heeded my advice and took away part of their funding.

Dr. Khan, as he continued in his presentation to our committee, explained:

> The exotic multicultural concept of the everlasting immigrant has come to function as an institutional system for the marginalization of the individual. While this is not hopefully the intent of official multiculturalism, it certainly is its consequence. Culture is not only a selective demonstration of exotic events; it is how people live and interact with one another in their daily lives. Canada in the next century will not even have a dominant plurality. What is especially puzzling is why the advocates of multiculturalism, many of whom are so–called leaders of ethnic communities, have embraced such a discriminatory label. The misdirected and shortsighted actions and propositions in the name of official multiculturalism have generated mounting criticism of both its intent and direction. The voices of criticism come from both old Canadians and new ones, from intellectuals and ivory tower academics, from writers of colour and those who lack colour, from respondents to several recent public opinion polls and from government appointed commissions.

Dr. Khan also drew our attention to the Keith Spicer citizens' forum which, in recognition of the inherent deficiencies and drawbacks of official multiculturalism, called upon the Government of Canada to eliminate funding for multicultural activities except those serving immigration orientation, reduction of racial discrimination and promotion of equality.

I believe this is the crux of the problem. Even the proponents of multiculturalism support the policy because in their view it contributes to immigration orientation, reduction of racial discrimination and promotion of equality.

It is a curious situation of people from opposing spectrums—those who oppose multiculturalism as well as those who support it—agreeing to a common set of objectives.

• (1255)

It is not just the Reform Party that has expressed what so many other voices are saying. The objectives that multiculturalism seek to promote are immigration, orientation, reduction of racial discrimination, enhanced participation and promotion of equality.

These can be just as effectively achieved through the implementation of the provision of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms supporting the Canadian Human Rights Commission and the acknowledgement of the opportunities offered through the Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

Special treatment to some at the expense of others is discriminatory in and of itself. No one is saying that ethnic groups should be suppressed in the Canadian context. Rather, our vision of Canada should be committed to the goal of social and personal well–being that values individuality while emphasizing themes like family, community assumption of responsibility, problem solving and communicating these value sets to a means of better group life. However at no time should the rights of a group supersede the rights of individuals unless the group happens to consist of a majority within Canada.

As I said earlier, I have concentrated most of this presentation on multiculturalism because it is something about which all of us in the House feel deeply. I also have to say that I am looking forward to 1995. We definitely have challenges lying before us in the new year. My wish for all of us, as we enter the new year, is that we use our collective wisdom in the decision days of 1995 that lie ahead of us.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Canadian Heritage, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I will be splitting my time with the member for Oakville—Milton.

On behalf of the Minister of Canadian Heritage I am pleased to have the occasion to speak on the third reading of Bill C–53, an act to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage.

Our debate has underscored the importance that the legislation be swiftly passed to establish in law the Department of Canadian Heritage. We are marrying programs that have been living together for more than a year. The departmental programs are working well. The job of Parliament is to formalize its name and its existence, enabling the Minister of Canadian Heritage and the department staff to carry out, in a single ministry, related mandates previously held by a number of separate government departments.

In reference to why the Department of Canadian Heritage is so vital, we like to use the term synergy. We believe the combined impact of the whole of the department exceeds that of its individual parts. We believe the formation of the new department has enhanced and strengthened the effectiveness of many of its programs.

The Department of Canadian Heritage brings together important common elements of the federal government, those elements which define Canada as a multifaceted dynamic nation with a rich cultural and natural heritage.

The department is responsible for everything relating to Canadian identity and values, cultural development, heritage preservation, and areas of natural or historical significance to Canada and to Canadians, values that we share and that unite and define us.

While the discussions concerning Bill C–53 have been interesting, many of the arguments put forward against the formation of the department are fundamentally flawed.

Opposition members have tried to erect roadblocks in what should have been a routine legislative exercise. Those roadblocks were reduced to speed bumps as the necessity for the legislation became clear. It is an important and vital tool for the effective and efficient government Canadians want.

The leader of the Reform Party of Canada has argued against Bill C–53. On December 7 he spoke before the Standing Committee of Canadian Heritage. He expressed the view that multiculturalism, one of the components of the new department, is the responsibility of individual private associations and, interestingly enough, where necessary lower levels of government: not the role of the federal government.

Conversely, he alsc stated or asserted his belief that the federal government should confine itself to combating racial, linguistic and cultural discrimination. While as usual condemning the whole program, he supports most of our multicultural activities. He is the master of contradictions.

Assisting all Canadians to participate in Canadian life and access the same rights helps them to contribute to and ultimately change society so that it reflects the lived experience of all Canadians. Yet there are always going to be individuals who will blame one identifiable group for whatever social or economic ills that disturb them.

As the government and as individual Canadians, we must recognize that understanding and respect between peoples is central to combating racism and other forms of discrimination. We have to build that awareness into our social structure at all levels of society.

At the federal level there is an important and essential leadership role to play. In its 1992 report the Canadian Human Rights Commission stated that "economic hard times and human rights make uneasy bedfellows".

Tolerance for diversity and human difference becomes diminished during times of fiscal difficulty. In times like these the temptation is to make choices: economic over equality issues. If our mandate is to create opportunity then it must be for all and not just for the privileged, well positioned and fortunate.

[Translation]

The criticisms of Bill C–53 voiced by the leader of the Reform Party clearly shows that his party's policies are not rooted in the life and the future of all Canadians.

The minister's multiculturalism programs support a wide variety of activities which promote the integration of first generation Canadians, irrespective of their origin, into the social, cultural, economic and political life of Canada. We all benefit from the contribution of each Canadian to the growth and development of our country.

The contribution of all Canadians is an integral part of the strength and diversity of Canadian culture. Culture is the very basis of Canadian identity and sovereignty. As a whole, the arts and our cultural industries contribute over $24 billion to the gross domestic product, and this is about 4 per cent of the GDP and 660,000 jobs. This is no accident; it is the result of the commitment and determination of successive governments, and of the enormous pool of talent in Canada. The Department of Canadian Heritage will be at the centre of government action in the area of arts and culture.

To help artists and creators even more, the heritage minister announced an amendment to Bill C–53, which would give the department significant responsibilities in matters of copyright. Copyright legislation, which determines the ownership of works of art, is vitally important to artists and the income they derive from their work. This is a most timely measure for artists and creative artists, some among whom earn the lowest wages in the Canadian economy. This is a positive, effective and efficient change.

Change is also part of the life experience of Canada's First Nations. Native culture is part of our history and our heritage, and it enriches the Canadian identity significantly. At the present time, more than a million aboriginal Canadian citizens, members of our First Nations, are at a crossroad. In 1986, Bill Erasmus, then Grand Chief of the Assembly of First Nations, said that native people would have a lot to contribute in the next century. "It is our turn", he said.

• (1305)

[English]

The Department of Canadian Heritage is a proud partner in this process, administering a number of important programs to support aboriginal citizens in defining and participating in addressing the social, cultural, political and economic issues affecting their lives in Canadian society.

Aboriginal peoples launch and manage the programs which are community based and include such initiatives as the aboriginal friendship centre program, the northern native broadcast access program and the aboriginal women's program, aboriginal representative organization programs.

[Translation]

During the whole debate on this bill, Reform Party members have also expressed their opposition to the official and legislated recognition of both official languages in Canada. Canadians support the notion of two official languages for the very simple reason that these are the languages they speak and they are attached to them. For instance, in spite of the ever present threat of assimilation, minority francophone communities have gone from barely surviving to having their vested rights recognized. There is no way back.

On the contrary, the government recently embarked on a process which is the logical and unavoidable consequence of its vision of linguistic duality and of its action in this area. This process is aimed at involving all federal institutions in the development of minority official language communities, in accordance with section 42 of the Official Languages Act.

Obviously, the Department of Canadian Heritage is not the only institution able to play a critical role in the full development of official language communities. Interdepartmental consultation will help the machinery of government to promote the development of both official language communities, in every field of activity.

[English]

Canadians are open to the reality of the country with two official languages. The Reform Party opposition is a view that a majority of Canadians do not share. Sixty–four per cent of Canadians expressed support for the policy in an April 1994 Angus Reid survey. Provincially, support ranges from 88 per cent in Quebec to 73 per cent in the Atlantic region and a solid 59 per cent in Alberta. Over all, the last 10 years have witnessed stable and solid national support which continues both in principle and practice.

In addition, if one considers on the one hand the progress of official language communities in minority situations, thanks to their determination and the commitment of government, and on the other hand the overall support of Canadians for the policy of official languages, it remains imperative to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage in law.

Under its official language promotion programs, the department encourages not only the development of official language communities throughout the country, but also the recognition and use of both official languages in Canadian society as a whole. The strenghthening of our country's linguistic duality promises to improve opportunities for all. The Reform Party members would do well to recognize and accept this reality and join Canadians in the benefits accrued by it.

I commend the member for Calgary Southwest who went to St. Jean last summer to learn French. But the question remains how the member can oppose official language funding but does not mind using official language funding.

We all know that the 1993 reorganization of government was carried out with a view to streamlining the business of government and adapting the structure of government to improve the services it provides to the public. The aim of reorganization was to establish better, more efficient and more effective government. The Department of Canadian Heritage epitomizes that type of government.

I urge my colleagues to recognize the role the Department of Canadian Heritage plays in promoting Canadian values and support the efforts of the public service.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): The hon. member has about seven to eight minutes.

Ms. Bonnie Brown (Oakville—Milton, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to speak at third reading of Bill C–53, an act to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage.

As a member of the standing committee, I have had an opportunity to review the legislation and to hear firsthand accounts from witnesses. I believe this bill to be an accurate reflection of the mandate, activities and role of the department in fulfilling the mandate of the Government of Canada on several important fronts.

The department's programs have an effect on our day to day lives and their relevance, be it cultural or economic, is felt by each of us. Within this department are the programs that speak to us regarding what it means to be Canadians, that set us apart from the rest of the world and that have helped Canada earn its top ranking by the United Nations for overall quality of life.

The new Department of Canadian Heritage embodies the democratic principles that are inherently Canadian. We are a nation forged on fundamental respect, respect for basic human rights and values, respect for the use and equal treatment of two major official languages, French and English, respect for cultural diversity and respect for the traditions and contributions of our aboriginal peoples.

Today countries throughout the world are trying to discover the formula that will enable them to create a real sense of national identity among groups of different ethnic, cultural, linguistic and racial backgrounds. Many of these countries are now taking a serious interest in the 100 per cent Canadian model we have created which exemplifies respect for each other no matter what our backgrounds.

In the bill creating this department, the government undertakes to advance the equality of all Canadians in their country's social, economic and cultural life. It recognizes the need to eliminate the barriers that divide Canadians and to provide opportunity to establish bonds built on confidence and mutual respect.

We know that social cohesion and a strong national identity can only be accomplished where there is understanding, awareness and respect among all the people who make up our country.

As the Right Hon. Lester Pearson put it: "In a diverse federal state such as Canada it is important that all citizens should have a fair and equal opportunity to participate in the national administration and to identify themselves with and feel at home in our national capital".

I am proud to be a member of this Liberal government that believes in tolerance among its citizens and which strives to ensure that people of all origins who come to Canada have an equal opportunity to contribute to its growth, development and an evolving sense of identity.

Our diversity is one of the things that makes us stronger and more competitive in the global economy. The range of languages we speak, the cultures we know and understand provide us as Canadians with a distinct advantage from an international trade perspective. This has been recognized by the president of the Royal Bank who indicated that our future success as a nation depends on our harnessing the richness of diversity within the country so that we can become truly competitive in the global marketplace.

Dr. Barbara Ward, the British economist and writer, described us as the world's first international nation. We are admired abroad for the society we have built together and we can take real national pride in this accomplishment.

This bill provides the government with an opportunity to forge ahead in an area which has proven to be of real importance to Canadians time and time again. They want a government that will lead them forward in building a society that encourages all its citizens to contribute economically, politically, socially and culturally to all aspects of life in this great country of ours.

[Translation]

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Madam Speaker, Bill C–53 certainly has given rise to a lot of criticism for a bill that was supposed to be a simple housekeeping measure.

It must have become quite obvious by now that the Official Opposition is dead against this bill. And our reasons for opposing it are far from cosmetic. They have to do mainly with the very essence of our cultural identity as Quebecers as well as the necessity of ensuring the survival of our culture through a sensible handling of the copyright issue.

• (1315)

First of all, after education and postsecondary education, the federal government has now extended its involvement to mass communication, even though this is clearly an area of provincial jurisdiction. In fact, the federal government is centralizing more and more, and this bill is but one example. That is why we denounce the deceit in calling the department to be established the "Department of Canadian Heritage", when this is just a disguised way of establishing a department of culture and to invade a provincial jurisdiction. The people of Quebec wonder why they should contribute financially to a scheme to deny that Quebec is different, unique, as a nation, when even the staunchest federalists in Quebec recognize this fact.

My hon. colleagues will be reminded that, equipped with international agreements, English Canada is now in a position to counter cultural invasion from the U.S. This is a totally legitimate concern, seeing how important it is to differentiate oneself from such a powerful neighbour and to manage one's cultural resources. But why can Quebec not have similar concerns? Why would the government not feel the need to also do something to protect the rights of creative artists on its territory?

Following government reorganization, copyright, which used to be with the Department of Communications and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, would now come under the Department of Canadian Heritage and the Department of Industry. Instead of using this restructuring as an opportunity to concentrate copyright responsibilities at the heritage department, which is the only one mandated to protect the work and its creators, the government persists in its paralysing indecision with regard to copyright.

Such dichotomy only leads to divergent political priorities, especially when the officials of the two departments involved see the issue in totally different lights.

For instance, Paul Racine, Assistant Deputy Minister, Cultural Development, told the Canadian heritage committee: "—the fact is that the minister and the department set all copyright policies and oversee the drafting work—as was done in the past and will be done in the future with Phase 2. In other words, they do all the work from A to Z. As I told you, this was recognized by previous Prime Ministers through repeated formal ministerial delegation and it is, in my opinion, recognized in law for the first time through this amendment. It is a matter of fact. Whoever gets the ingredients, cooks and serves them may or may not be called a chef, but he or she certainly bears a close resemblance to one".

However, there appears to be several chiefs, as Mr. Von Finckenstein, Deputy Minister at Industry Canada, told the Standing Committee on Industry something quite different. He said: "Before the merger, copyright was in the Department of Communications and the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, together with all other intellectual property, be it patent, trademarks or copyright. This whole division has now gone to Industry. It has not been broken up or changed. The people in charge of copyright are the people who once worked for CCA on this matter. As for their mandate, which is to develop copyright policy, the Minister of Industry is indeed ultimately responsible for the application of the law and for amending it, but policy decisions are obviously made at the cabinet level, where the Minister of Canadian Heritage, for instance, can put forward the cultural point of view". That is what Mr. von Finckenstein said.

Therefore it is total confusion, the department of tutti frutti, as my colleague from Rimouski—Témiscouata calls it. Even the officials do not know who really is responsible for the Copyright Act.

The government is supporting a myth and confusion by letting people believe that the heritage department plays the leading role with respect to copyright, when the real power clearly resides in the industry department.

• (1320)

It must be noted that the deadlock blocking revision of the Copyright Act is partly due to conflict between two ideologies: protecting the creative artist vs. protecting the consumer. Performing artists, creative artists and copyright holders do not benefit from this division; rather it is those whose concerns have nothing to do with cultural development, values and identity.

Furthermore, it is totally unacceptable and far–fetched to put the Copyright Act, which protects the economic and moral rights of creative artists and the holders of these rights, under the Department of Industry. It is ridiculous to put copyrights on the same level as trade–marks, patents, industrial designs and integrated circuit topographies, as in paragraph 4(1)(h) of Bill C–46.

Those who propose that copyrights be under the sole jurisdiction of the Minister of Industry are wrong. Such a decision would greatly jeopardize cultural creativity in Quebec and in Canada. Obviously, the cultural sector is an industry, in the sense that it generates an important economic activity, but it is certainly not an industry like the other ones.

Cultural development depends on the Copyright Act, which allows artists to be associated with the economic life of their works. Consequently, if the current apathy persists, it could seriously hurt a very important cultural industry. The government approves enormous budgets to defend and promote Canadian identity. Is it not high time this government recognized the cultures which are part of that identity and are its very foundations, and show some respect for the artists who shape these cultures?

The government's apathy is all the more incomprehensible considering that the Liberal Party often insisted that even though culture generates economic activity, it cannot be treated like other industries. Moreover, the Liberals pledged, in their red book, to support production, marketing and distribution, so as to promote the circulation of Canadian books, films and recordings on the domestic market, to consider allowing investment tax credits to stimulate the production of such works, and also to consider the possibility of providing income averaging mechanisms in the Income Tax Act, for Canadian artists. However, the Quebec and Canadian cultural industries, and the artists, are still waiting.

Also, in answer to questions from the Canadian Conference of the Arts, the Liberal Party pledged, during the last election campaign, to review the Copyright Act and ensure above all that authors get their dues, while facilitating access to material protected by copyright. The Liberals claimed to understand the importance of copyright. It made a commitment to restructure the administrative organization and review the Conservative decision to split this jurisdiction between two departments. But again, our artists are still waiting!

These facts and the delayed amendment minister Dupuy put forward when he appeared before the committee show the lack of interest and the total lack of respect of the government for Quebec and Canadian artists and cultures. Allow me to describe the disrespectful attitude shown by Liberal members of the committee. I have already mentioned the last minute amendment put forward by the Minister of Heritage.

One of the committee members, a loyal and faithful Liberal, said that, when the amendment was proposed, everyone in the room applauded and commended the minister's decision. Not so, Madam Speaker! The members of the other parties did not applaud. The people representing the artists did not applaud either, especially since the same hon. member had just finished saying that these people had "pleaded" with the committee to have the opportunity to present their very legitimate requests. What a respectful attitude for the government members to have!

The artist are, in fact, far from satisfied with the minister's amendment. That is what they told us. Several associations from both Quebec and English Canada, who were able to appear before the Committee on Canadian Heritage because of pressure by members of the Bloc Quebecois, told us they were disappointed with and concerned about the attitude of the government.

Twenty–five Quebec and Canadian associations, representing more than 30,000 writers, creative artists and performers, sent an open letter to the Minister of Heritage asking to complete the review of the Copyright Act, in light of the following nine recommendations: the confirmation of the creative artist as the first holder of the rights to his or her work; the recognition of neighbouring rights; the adjudication of consequential rights to visual artists; the protection of works for the rest of the life of the author or the copyright holder; the use of technologically neutral definitions; compensation through private copy; the establishment of a rental right; the elimination of all exceptions to the protection of works; the adoption of adequate sanctions to protect the rights of creative artists.

These demands are far from being unreasonable since numerous countries have included them in their legislation. Germany, Japan and France have all adhered to the 1961 Rome Convention, but Canada has not. These G–7 countries have recognized the need for royalties on private copy, but Canada has not. France and Germany have legislated on neighbouring rights, but Canada has not; it does not seem to find it appropriate to do so.

In conclusion, I would say that it is through copyright and neighbouring rights that creative artists and copyright holders can ensure the continuity of their creative work by receiving just compensation for the use of their work. The present situation has to change. Not only is this situation unacceptable in the context of a society that claims to respect the people who are the source of its cultural heritage, but its national and international notoriety makes it embarrassing for Quebec and Canada.

This government will soon prove to us that it sees culture only as a symbol that can generate money.

The least we can say is that, with such a policy and such a government, the future is certainly not bright for the pillars of Canada's and Quebec's cultures. Let us be realistic and not mince words: the government is showing once again that it is totally incapable of taking a stand in favour of artists and understanding the interests of creative artists.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Madam Speaker, I would like to comment on the speech made by the hon. member for Québec.

I would like to know her definition of a Quebecer. I often hear the Quebec nation defined as including the English, the Irish and the Scots. Does it include the Jews and other groups or are we talking about old French Canadian families exclusively? I would appreciate her comments on this definition. How does she see the Quebec nation?

Mrs. Gagnon: Madam Speaker, I am a little surprised the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine should ask this question. As a Quebecer himself, he ought to know.

A Quebecer is, first of all, someone who lives in Quebec and is defined as such by his language and culture. I am not going to make a long speech about what it means to be a Quebecer. If the hon. member has trouble explaining what it means to him to be a Quebecer, then he is the one who has a problem.

Mr. Gagnon: Madam Speaker, I have no trouble defining what I am and explaining who I am.

However, in this debate on Quebec nationalism, which has been going on for some time, there are people who claim that Quebec includes all minorities. But all I keep hearing from the opposition is that there are Quebecers whose ancestors settled here long ago and that the partnership and participation of other cultures has become irrelevant.

I am not asking the hon. member to tell me where I fit in but to tell me whether the English, the Irish and all other minorities are part of Quebec as we know it today. That is all I want to know.

Mrs. Gagnon: Madam Speaker, a Quebecer is someone who believes in Quebec values. He believes he can identify himself as a Quebecer. A Quebecer is someone who travels. I heard Mr. Dupuy say that when he is in Canada, he says he is from Quebec, and when he is in another country, he says he is from Canada.

I have no trouble identifying myself. When I travel throughout the world, and I have had several opportunities to do so, when I am outside my country, outside Quebec, I say I am a Quebecer. When I say I am a Quebecer, people realize I am a francophone, because outside Canada, people know there is a francophone majority living in Canada. This is a way of identifying myself as a Quebecer.

A Quebecer is also someone who believes in his or her values. I think Quebec must have all the tools it needs to be able to decide its future.

• (1330)

Centralizing all decision–making authority and standardizing all programs the way the government is doing today is not going to help Quebec find its identity.

The Acting Speaker (Mrs. Maheu): Five minutes left for questions and comments. Any more comments?

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine.

Mr. Patrick Gagnon (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General, Lib.): Madam Speaker, of course I intend to support the government's new proposals for Canada's cultural sector.

When I hear the opposition condemning the very existence of Canada and the fact that Canada has done nothing for the French fact, I think that is absolutely untrue and unacceptable. Some people are looking for a definition of the Canadian nation, and it seems that originally, Canada was a word that meant "village" in one of the aboriginal languages. A village is a community where people live together, and these people have worked together to build a country.

I may remind the opposition that this Canada, this village we have created is the envy of the world. I could refer again to the view shared by the United Nations that Canada still ranks first as the best country to live in.

Consider how Canada developed. The first colonists who came to Canada wanted to make a new life for themselves. My ancestors, as those of the member for Quebec with whom I share the same surname, landed on the île d'Orléans in 1642. My ancestor, Maturin Gagnon, one of the first French settlers, wanted to start a new life. Obviously, through the years, there has been many changes and historical upsets, but I believe that Canada and its very existence as a country, has made it possible for the Canadian Francophonie to thrive.

I believe that this fact must not be ignored. I believe that the nature of Canada, as a state, resides in its linguistic duality, and the generous reception given to the cultures which have contributed to the development and the building of this structure called Canada. Among those who came were the Irish, the Scots, the Jews, the Asians and the Europeans, to name a few. People from 160 countries have contributed, in one way or another, to the creation and the building of the Canadian federation.

There are 6 million francophones in Quebec, more than one million of whom are new Quebecers, and anglophones who also contributed to the development of Quebec, as part of Canada, of course. Everybody was the better for it: Montreal became the first metropolis of the Canadian federation. The river brought people to Montreal, but I do not want to focus on the past, I want to speak of the future. This is the spirit of a true Canadian: someone who looks towards the next century.

And there are over half a million francophones in Ontario. A third of the population of New Brunswick is made up of francophones. There are tens of thousands of francophones in Manitoba and in the western provinces. They are there, they exist, they are counting on the support of francophones in Quebec to keep this country united.

• (1335)

I would go even further. Unfortunately, nationalists never take into account the contributions of francophones outside Quebec. Carmen Roy was not even mentioned. There is Angèle Arsenault, Édith Butler, even Roch Voisine. These are francophones outside Quebec who not only ensure in some way the French presence outside Quebec but could also be considered as some of the greatest figures of French culture in Canada.

I told you about the francophones outside Quebec but not about the success of bilingualism. Some vainly tried to prove quasi scientifically that bilingualism does not work. But there are more than 4.4 million Canadians who master both languages. I had the opportunity to go to Vancouver, where I made a speech to young people who, much to my surprise, spoke a more than proper French. This was music to my ear. I also received well written correspondence in French.

We must not forget that, in 1977, 237 schools offered an immersion program to 37,835 students. In 1988—these are Anglophone students registered in immersion programs—there were 1,500 schools and 241,140 students. Within ten years, bilingual and immersion programs increased by 700 per cent. I think what makes French so vital and attractive is the growing interest of many young English Canadians for the beautiful language of Molière.

Certain people have attempted to minimize and trivialize the efforts made by some provinces, but they overlooked the fact that more than 27,000 students in British Columbia, more than 26,000 in Alberta, 18,000 in Manitoba, and even 115,000 in Ontario go to immersion schools. It is very interesting to travel in English Canada and meet these young people who were able to benefit from this program. And believe me, Madam Speaker, these young people are very grateful for it.

Canada has an international reputation as a leader, for the way it treats its minorities, be they francophones outside Quebec or anglophones in Quebec. Of course, there are other minorities and, to me, this makes the strength of this country. This diversity of cultures, this meeting place of ideas, Madam Speaker, that is what Canada is all about.

Some hon. members: They do not even have washrooms.

Mr. Gagnon: Well, my friend, let me tell you something about washrooms. In the Magdalen Islands, there is a small English school for which the province of Quebec is responsible but it refuses to grant the money needed to rebuild this school used by English–speaking children. The school has water and electrical problems and the window panes are broken. It no longer meets the needs of the population but unfortunately the Government of Quebec is waiting for the Government of Canada to foot the bill and build a school for these English–speaking children. That is how some minorities are treated in Quebec.

But enough of that. I invite the members of the opposition to go to Grosse–Île, in the Magdalen Islands, and see for themselves in what condition that small English school is today. I am sure the story would make the front page of Quebec newspapers.

We were talking about a meeting place of ideas. We know that English is spoken by more than 800 million people in the world and that there are more than 20 million who speak it right here Canada. That is where this meeting place of ideas, new found solidarity comes from. That is what we find in Canada. When you have a chance to travel, as I have had the privilege of doing for decades, you can always appreciate the bilingualism, the biculturalism, the openness and tolerance of Canada. This is something we must never forget.

When I see how weak the nationalist philosophy, the separatist philosophy is, I find it sad that they do not realize that it is because of the federal presence that Quebec has been able to find its identity. We never hear the opposition talk about the contribution of the Canadian government to Telefilm Canada, the National Film Board, the CBC or independent productions. We never hear the opposition talk about that. All it does is constantly deny the facts and knock what makes this country what it is.

There is much to be done and I think it is interesting that the learning of the second language, as I have said earlier—in survey after survey, we realize that more than 75 per cent of Canadians are in favour of institutional bilingualism.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): You should come to my riding and see if that is the case.

Mr. Gagnon: Madam Speaker, it is the hon. member of the opposition who should come to my riding.

[English]

I am going to turn to the English language. I have been privileged and I hope I am sharing this with a number of other young Canadians. I have seen here a number of anglophones who have names like McClarty, McPherson, who have names that are of Asian origin, who are now taking the leap toward bilingualism, who are now moving beyond bilingualism because they can now master three and four languages. That is the strength of Canada.

It is a privilege to speak in this forum today in both official languages because bilingualism is not only a tool for our regional and economic development but is also a part of who we are. In doing so we now can pick from the French culture, from the English culture, from the other cultures around the world that have come here to work as one. That is one of the fundamental issues that will be discussed in the upcoming Quebec referendum.

It will be up to the separatists to prove that Canada does not work. I am from the Gaspé peninsula which is 96 per cent French speaking. I attended French schools but I had the opportunity of mingling with English friends. I have had the opportunity of moving on. I have had the opportunity of exchanging with all Canadians from all walks of life. There is not one person in Canada I have met whom I do not like.

I think Canadians are understanding. We are a tolerant society and regrettably the opposition, including some members from the Reform Party, is not aware of the fortitude, of the fact that being a Canadian is more than a privilege, it is something other countries wish they had.

Obviously the opposition will have the opportunity to react, not only following this speech but in the upcoming referendum.

[Translation]

Mr. Lebel: Start with liking Quebecers.

Mr. Gagnon: "Start with liking Quebecers"—Madam Speaker, can you beat that? It bothers them to hear a young person like me identify himself as a Canadian of French origin, a Canadian who went to the trouble of learning the second language, who took the trouble to travel, visit and study with English Canadians. Sometimes it hurts the separatists to hear that. Unfortunately, we live in a changing world and unfortunately the opposition is unable to meet the challenge of Canadian federalism.

I have heard all kinds of speeches from the opposition, on Pierre Elliott Trudeau, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, St. Laurent, on real French Canadians, good Canadians who built and implemented programs from which I benefit.

• (1345)

This brings me to an important point on the official languages in Canada. Let us look at the efforts made by Pierre Elliott Trudeau to have the French fact recognized, to be served—yes, maybe not as well as we would like in Bonaventure or Montreal or other places—but I think this recognition of the French fact by the rest of Canada, of the existence of French, and promoting the language—it is an incredible achievement of our Liberal predecessors.

Let us talk about another great Canadian, a great Quebecer—

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): René Lévesque.

Mr. Gagnon: René Lévesque. You have it: René Lévesque, who grew up about 30 kilometres from my home town of New Carlisle, in the Gaspe peninsula.

Like René Lévesque, I come from Gaspe but, unfortunately, none of us can pretend to be Gaspesians first and foremost. This is very interesting. I can tell you that: René Lévesque was among the first to recognize the importance of speaking both French and English. He was open to the world.

I must say, however, that it is thanks to Pierre Elliott Trudeau and those who followed in his footsteps that Canada has become the country that we know today.

I will not talk much long longer because I am anxious to hear the slanderous and malicious criticisms of the opposition throughout the afternoon. I challenge the opposition to find a better country than Canada.

Mr. Chrétien (Frontenac): Quebec.

Mr. Gagnon: Quebec is part of Canada. No independent country enjoys a reputation such as that of Canada. Unfortunately, we only hear hogwash from the opposition. And that is unfortunate.

I invite opposition members to make a comparison. I am speaking to you as a Quebecer, a Gaspe native, a francophone. I am asking you to take into account the efforts made on this side of the House, to recognize the efforts made by this party, the efforts made by some English–speaking members.

I see the hon. member for Ontario, who is an English–speaking Canadian. I do not always share his views, but here is a young man who went to the trouble of learning French. There are others too. I do not know them all, but several have made the effort. I believe this is the beauty of our country. This is what makes it interesting.

We will overcome each of the obstacles set up by the opposition, starting with the upcoming referendum.

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Madam Speaker, I wonder in what country my colleague from Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine lives. It must be a country somewhat different from ours.

I too live in Canada. I must agree with him that, as long as the referendum is not a done deal, I still live in a country called Canada. I think he does not live in the same country as the rest of us, because he may speak English, but he does not read it. Last week–end, there was an article in the Globe and Mail depicting the bilingual situation and the assimilation level of French–speaking Canadians. I referred to it this morning in my speech, and I believe the hon. member was here at the time.

The assimilation rate throughout Canada is 36 per cent. Bilingualism is highly praised and my colleague can be proud to be Canadian as much as he wants to. He has the right to be proud, I do not deny it. But what is surprising is the fact that he does not better understand the country, or the part of the country he comes from.

He told us about a school in the Magdalen Islands which was in bad shape, but he must not forget that Quebec is just getting out of its torpor after nine years under a Liberal government. Liberals were in office for nine years. So, if the people in the Magdalen Islands were not able to fix the windows in their schools or make any renovations, it is because of the Liberal government which has been ousted in Quebec. There is no doubt that Mr. Garon, to whom we will forward your complaints, will hasten to find a way to solve this problem, because he has solved many problems in other small schools.

The hon. member said he had never heard the official opposition make any positive comments about federalism, but I think all my colleagues have heard me say how much we owe to the CBC. That corporation helped us get out of the hole and believe in what we were. It also helped us define what we were and get over the Dark Ages in Quebec, all thanks to a great Liberal federalist, Jean Lesage, who was a federal minister here, in Ottawa, before returning to Quebec to tell us: "Come on, Quebecers! Let us be masters in our own house!"

Mr. Gagnon: Madam Speaker, it is always a pleasure to discuss with the hon. member for Rimouski—Témiscouata. I think she does have a lot of respect for my region, for the Gaspe peninsula, and for the problems, mainly economic, that we have in my constituency of Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine.

Unfortunately, I do not agree with her option, which is legitimate in a way—Quebec's separation. But as a federalist, I will tell you that the CBC's achievements she talked about are precisely the result of co–operation among all Canadians, between anglophones over there, anglophones over here and francophones across the way. That is what has made and will continue to make the strength of Canada.

That is why, with the recognition of the CBC's achievements, and the commitment of the federal government to defend, promote and ensure the development of the French fact in Canada, the next century is most promising for Canadian unity.

Mrs. Christiane Gagnon (Québec, BQ): Madam Speaker, let me remind the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine that we are paying 25 per cent of the CBC budget, but we cannot say that the English network is of much use to us. I would like to go back to the remarks made by the hon. member, who said that all official opposition's comments were hogwash.

I think the hon. member has no respect for the vote of confidence given the elected members of the Bloc Quebecois, for the mandate they were given to come to Ottawa to work after Quebec's interests. That is exactly what we are doing today, defending Quebec's interests. I think the hon. member does not respect our mandate.

After all, we are a majority in Quebec, a majority of Quebec MPs. I hope very many Quebecers will have heard the hon. member say in this House today that our comments are only hogwash and I hope they will draw their own conclusions from his disrespectful remarks.

An hon. member: Downright insulting.

Mrs. Gagnon: It is not the first time I hear the hon. member speak that way. He talks as if the world revolves around him. He is the centre of the universe and says: "Just look at me; I am well–travelled, I am fantastic."

An hon. member: Yes, he is an only child.

Mrs. Gagnon: I do not think it is fitting for a member of this House to say: "Just look at me; I am well–travelled, I am fantastic".

An hon. member: Yes, indeed. "Look at me. I have risen to the top of the heap".

Mrs. Gagnon: A member should represent the public, be the voice of the people. The people of Quebec have given us a vote of confidence and sent us to Ottawa to defend their interests.

We defend positions that are not being defended by federalists living in Quebec, who want to repatriate powers, who want full control in Quebec. We did not invent that.

Mr. Gagnon: Madam Speaker, I think it is uncalled for to call someone—I will not repeat the words that were used to describe me.

• (1355)

I am criticized for having the intellectual curiosity to be interested in what is happening elsewhere and for wanting to share this with Quebecers. I have always recognized the existence of the Official Opposition. It hurts them to hear this voice from the Gaspe, this young federalist, because, and you know this as well as I do, we represent the majority of Quebecers.

Look at the results of the last election in Quebec. Scarcely 44 per cent of Quebecers supported the Parti Quebecois. Unfortunately, the opposition, and especially its home base, are not so sure they want to have their referendum as soon as possible. Increasingly, Quebecers are recognizing Canada's role and the generosity of the Canadian federation.

An hon. member: Token Quebecer.

An hon. member: Opportunist.

Mr. Gagnon: I hear terms being used like "token Quebecer" and "opportunist". I hear all kinds of things from the opposition. I am proud to be the member for Bonaventure—Îles–de–la–Madeleine, I have the confidence of my riding and I am working in the best interests of my constituents, and this means being in Quebec, a Quebec that is part of Canada. Is that clear?

S. O. 31

The Speaker: It being nearly 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON AGRICULTURE AND AGRI–FOOD

Mr. Paul Steckle (Huron—Bruce, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, at yesterday's meeting of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Agriculture and Agri–Food I tabled a report entitled "Future Directions for Canadian Agriculture and Agri–Food: A Huron–Bruce Perspective".

This report is the result of a series of intensive meetings which I organized in my riding with the objective of taking stock of where those who work in the agri–food sector today see their industry going tomorrow.

It was designed to support and enhance the objectives of the study on the future of agriculture on which the committee, together with its colleagues from the Senate, has been working since August, and which as a result of those who claim to represent the interests of the grassroots community has been effectively blocked from undertaking its most important phase, consulting directly with Canadians who work in Canada's agri–food sector in their workplaces.

I would encourage all members to initiate something along these lines to complement the work that is being done for what is after all one of Canada's major bedrock industries.

FRANCOPHONE COMMUNITIES

Mrs. Suzanne Tremblay (Rimouski—Témiscouata, BQ): Mr. Speaker, last week, in its Saturday issue, The Globe and Mail revealed alarming statistics concerning francophones outside Quebec, despite the Official Languages Act passed 25 years ago.

In fact, francophones have never been so vulnerable. More than a third of francophones outside Quebec speak English at home and their rate of assimilation is at 36 per cent. It is as high as 75 per cent in British Columbia and 70 per cent in Saskatchewan.

Instead of helping francophone and Acadian communities in Canada, federal institutions are speeding up their assimilation. The refusal of the Minister of Canadian Heritage to put pressure on cable companies such as Rogers, Laurentien Cable and Cogeco, which recently decided to eliminate several French– language channels from their basic service, paints an even darker picture of Canadian federalism.

WORLD CUP SKIING

Mr. Myron Thompson (Wild Rose, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend the 1994 Women's World Cup alpine races were held in Lake Louise, Alberta, the heart of Wild Rose country. I would like to extend my sincere congratulations to the organizers of this prestigious event. With their tireless efforts Lake Louise has proven to be first class on the world skiing stage once again.

There are four individuals who must receive special recognition: John Cassels, race chairman; Bruce Hamstead, chief of race; Bill Webster, president of Alpine Canada; Brien Perry, president of Alberta Alpine.

On behalf of the constituents of Wild Rose we are all proud of the contribution they have made to the sport of skiing in Canada.

Well done, Lake Louise.

CANADIAN CHILDREN

Mrs. Brenda Chamberlain (Guelph—Wellington, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, Christmas is a time for hope and renewal. As we prepare to leave the House of Commons in order to return to our families and friends in our ridings we should be mindful of the children of Canada, symbols of hope for our future.

Children are the ones most impressed with what Christmas is all about and unfortunately they are sometimes the most disappointed and discouraged because of circumstances beyond their control. Poverty, hunger, illiteracy, domestic problems and other challenges often get in the way of what should be a season of joy and happiness.

As we leave here this week, let us rededicate ourselves to our children, always treating them with care and giving encouragement. Our children are our future and we can make a better life for them by remembering every day that they hold in their hearts the special meaning of Christmas.

To my colleagues and to you, Mr. Speaker, Merry Christmas.

PEACEKEEPERS

Mr. John Bryden (Hamilton—Wentworth, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I would like to read from a soldier's letter I received not long ago:

> I am in the Canadian Armed Forces and have been for 10 and a half years. I have been to Cyprus, Somalia and at this very moment am in Yugoslavia. I am sure you get hundreds of letters per day from people expressing their views on every type of situation going. My letter is just a get to know you letter.
> I read in your 1994 fall report that a Yugoslavia family received a Canadian flag as part of their welcome to Canada. The only Canadian flag I've seen is on our sleeves. Could you please send me a Canadian flag for over here and also a calendar to mark off the days left on my tour.
> Waiting to hear from you. Yours sincerely—

I immediately sent this young soldier every Canadian flag I could lay my hands on plus 100 pins.

As we approach Christmas, let us remember it is not enough just to talk about how much we value those who help and serve us, we must also show it by our deeds.

RAOUL WALLENBERG

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, January 17, 1995 will be the 50th anniversary of the arrest of Raoul Wallenberg by the Soviet army.

In 1944 Wallenberg, a Swedish diplomat and businessman, persuaded his government to send him to Budapest where he rescued thousands of Jews by sheltering them in protected homes, flying the flags of Sweden and other neutral countries.

After his arrest Wallenberg disappeared in the Soviet prison system. Over the years various human rights groups have acted on his behalf and tried to get from the KGB information about his whereabouts.

No one knows definitively whether he is alive or dead. The Government of Canada should persist in its efforts to obtain from the Russians the real truth about what happened to Raoul Wallenberg and a pubic acknowledgement of his contribution to humanity.

As Elie Wiesel has written, Wallenberg will forever testify for man's need to remain human and his ability to succeed.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. Stéphane Bergeron (Verchères, BQ): Mr. Speaker, for over a year, subject to a great deal of blackmailing and arm-twisting, this government and its international trade minister have completely given in to the United States in every trade dispute opposing Canada to that country. For instance, the government reneged on its solemn promise and accepted to limit the exportation of Canadian wheat to the U.S.

In the case of uranium, the government let the Americans cook up an agreement with Russia which is discriminatory for Canadian producers. As for sugar, it knowingly sold out our producers who are now excluded from the American market. And now, the government is once again giving in to American pressure by accepting to make the payment of $800 million owed to Canadian lumber producers conditional to the signing of an agreement between the two countries.

After being in office for over a year, the Liberals have proven, beyond any doubt, that their strategy regarding trade with the US is an utter and complete failure.

BILL C–226

Mr. Dick Harris (Prince George—Bulkley Valley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I was pleased to participate in the debate of Bill C–226 and in a free vote last Tuesday night which sent Bill C–226 to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs. This bill would strike section 745 from the Criminal Code, thereby denying those sentenced to life imprisonment the opportunity for early parole.

The bill passed by a vote of 136 to 103. This bill demonstrates how the use of free votes can make meaningful input from all parliamentarians and it also demonstrates the value of a truly representative legislature.

• (1405)

I must commend the member for York—South Weston for having the conviction to put this bill forward. I would like to commend all those in the House who voted in favour of this bill.

This is truly a victory for free votes and truly a victory for Canadians who demand a safer society.

RAILWAYS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona, NDP): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the decision by the Minister of Transport to turn down the offer by CP Rail to purchase the CNR east of Winnipeg.

I want to suggest to the minister that what he should do now as a second step is abandon his plans to privatize or commercialize the CNR in some way and rather turn his attention to how to create a larger policy environment in which railways can once again thrive in this country.

We need to do things about the tax system. We need to look at ways in which the costs that the railways incur are incurred by them directly in a way that other transportation modes do not have to do similarly.

There are a lot of things that the minister could look at to return railways to the prominent place that they once had, not for the sake of a romantic vision of the past but for the sake of the environment, for the sake of the future.

I believe that rail is the transportation mode of the future. I would ask the minister to consider ways in which he could strengthen CN and railways in general in this country.

FRIENDSHIP CENTRES

Mrs. Marlene Cowling (Dauphin—Swan River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to recognize the contribution of the 114 friendship centres across Canada.

These centres provide vital services to aboriginal peoples, including job training and placement, literacy, advanced education, child care and substance abuse counselling.

Forty years of experience and a large volunteer base provide friendship programs with the ability to address aboriginal needs in a culturally relevant and fiscally responsible way.

It is important that we continue to support our nation's friendship centres. We need to help strengthen the network of support services they have built. We need to ensure that friendship centres can continue to offer their important services to aboriginal Canadians now and tomorrow.

FIRST NATIONS POLICING SERVICES

Mr. Harbance Singh Dhaliwal (Vancouver South, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to inform the House today that the Government of Canada has successfully negotiated a number of community tripartite agreements with five First Nations and the province of British Columbia.

Under these agreements aboriginal members of the First Nations common policing service will be dedicated to provide improved safety and security for the people living in the Haisla, Fort Nelson and Prophet River, Nanaimo, Nanoose and Nisga'a First Nations.

This RCMP First Nations community policing service will be able to provide policing services sensitive to the needs and culture of the people living in these communities.

These agreements were signed under the terms of the federal First Nations policing policy. Under this policy the federal government pays 52 per cent and the province 48 per cent of the cost of the police service.

I am sure all members will join me in congratulating the Ministry of the Solicitor General, the Government of British Columbia and the five First Nations.

MICROCELL 1–2–1

Mr. Dennis J. Mills (Broadview—Greenwood, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, MicroCell 1–2–1 is turning on. The personal communications system revolution in North America has started and Canada will be the first.

MicroCell 1–2–1 has the vision, the people and the technology and the $500 million in capital required to start building the most advanced personal communications network in Canada.

The time has come to celebrate the launch of this new era and to do that MicroCell 1–2–1 invites every Canadian child and his grandparents on Christmas Eve to visit one of the following locations and call anyone they love in the world on their public network for free.

The freedom of expression sites are the Place Fleur de Lys in Quebec, Eaton Centre in Montreal, the Bayshore Shopping Centre in Ottawa, the Pacific Centre in Vancouver and the Community Info Access Centres of Toronto.

Free long distance calls for Canadian children and their grandparents on Christmas Eve; watch your local newspapers for further details and other locations to be announced.

Congratulations to MicroCell.

SOCIAL PROGRAM REFORM

Mr. Roger Pomerleau (Anjou—Rivière–des–Prairies, BQ): Mr. Speaker, we learned yesterday, on TV, that some people were flying to Finland on a Concord to meet with Santa Claus. Yet, I was always told that Santa Claus lived at the North Pole, and was therefore a Canadian.

Well, it is bad enough for Canadians to learn that RRSPs will be taxed and that the GST is here to stay. Social program reform, unemployment insurance cuts and tuition fee increases are nothing pleasant to put under the Christmas tree. New taxes, supposedly temporary, are no way to start the New Year.

As if we did not have enough bad news, the government is letting them take away our Santa.

Just one more thing: what happened to the red book reindeer in all this?

PETRO–CANADA

Mr. Jay Hill (Prince George—Peace River, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, in 1988 Petro–Canada entered into an agreement with Daly Enterprises of Saint John, New Brunswick. Four years later Petro–Canada, whose motto is "committed to Canadians", reneged on its commitment, saying: "If you don't like it, take us to court".

In a blatant attempt to force Daly to sell its prime locations, Petro–Canada is demanding a 24 per cent interest charge on money it claims Daly owes. This is not an isolated case.

Many Canadians are appalled by this insensitive loan shark behaviour from a company that is still 70 per cent government owned.

Last Thursday in response to a question about the bullying tactics of Petro–Canada against the Curtis family, the Minister of Natural Resources seemed surprised and said she would look into this situation.

On behalf of all Petro–Canada dealers who believe they have been shafted, it is incumbent upon the minister responsible to launch a long overdue investigation into its questionable business practices.

MANITOBA ASSOCIATION OF BILINGUAL MUNICIPALITIES

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, about ten days ago, the Manitoba Association of Bilingual Municipalities held a forum in St. Boniface entitled Think Globally, Act Locally or Vision globale, action locale.

This seminar was organized to look for ways to improve economic development in our communities. Weaknesses, such as duplication and lack of planning, were mentioned and examined, but strengths were also found: a well–educated and well–trained bilingual manpower, and a deep commitment to improving the quality of life.

This is an excellent example of English and French–speaking people working together to improve the quality of life of their citizens.

CANADIAN FLAG

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, 30 years ago, a resolution of the House of Commons approved the new Canadian flag. Today, we are celebrating this major event.

This flag originated at the Royal Military College in Kingston.

[English]

There one day in early 1964 the Hon. George Stanley, who was then the Dean of Arts at the Royal Military College, pointed out the RMC flag to a member of this House's flag committee, the Hon. John Matheson, who was then the member for the county of Leeds, for the constituency of Leeds, and is a cousin of mine. Mr. Matheson's design was subsequently adopted as the Canadian flag after a very long and bitter debate in this Chamber.

Today all Canadians are proud of our great flag. Long may it wave over a strong and united Canada.

SOCIAL PROGRAM REFORM

Mrs. Bonnie Hickey (St. John's East, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, many of my constituents of St. John's East have given the discussion paper on reforming our social programs serious consideration. They have written and phoned me with their views and come into my office for meetings. Also, over 100 constituents turned out to a public meeting that I hosted on November 29.

I am pleased to say that this meeting was a success. It was good to see on a cold Newfoundland night that there was a good cross–section of people in my riding who had come out to express their opinions.

I am currently preparing a report which summarizes the points made at the meeting and will be forwarding it to the minister and the standing committee on human resources.

The government has asked Canadians for their views on social security reform. I have told my constituents that I will ensure their views on this issue are well known.

SPECIAL INTEREST GROUPS

Mr. Jim Silye (Calgary Centre, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and submit my second Liberals copy Reform award.

Number two on the list is the hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth who said: "The practice of using tax revenues to finance special interest groups with particular axes to grind has created a multimillion dollar system of bureaucratic patronage that operates with little accountability to ministers, MPs, the media, or the taxpayer".

It appears that Liberal backbenchers are finally beginning to see the light and have added the Reform blue book to their reading list.

Unlike the red book the blue book calls for the reduction and/or elimination of funding to special interest and advocacy groups. Unfortunately cabinet is not listening.

To date we have seen no action by this government to cut back interest group funding. To cabinet we say enough is enough.

Listen to what the Reform Party is saying. Listen to what the Liberal backbenchers are saying. Stop funding special interest groups and start giving taxpayers a break.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

TAXATION

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, for 14 months now the Minister of Finance has been utterly unable to convince his Cabinet colleagues to take the measures necessary to bring about a substantial reduction in his deficit.

In an attempt to fulfill their commitments and reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of the GDP, Liberal members are proposing to further increase the burden of taxpayers, who are already weighed down with taxes, particularly those in the middle class.

Given that now is the time when taxpayers make decisions about the amounts they will invest in RRSPs, would the minister simply take advantage of this final question period to reassure worried taxpayers by undertaking publicly not to tax RRSPs in his next budget?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the member for Roberval knows very well that we will have to wait for the budget. The Minister of Finance is not really in a position to make budget announcements here, in the House, even if Christmas is approaching. We will have to wait until the end of February.

That being said, I am sure the member will admit that if we wish to meet our objectives, cuts will have to be made. It would be of great help if his party would make constructive suggestions on exactly where we should cut.

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, this being the festive season, I will cordially remind the Minister of Finance that we have been suggesting tax expenditure cuts for more than a year now. What I cannot understand is why he does not implement our suggestions. We will make some more before the holidays, if he wants to keep an ear out.

I will even offer him a suggestion today. The national Treasury should make a priority of recovering $6.6 billion in unpaid taxes owed to the government. We are not talking about people who have paid their taxes, but about unpaid taxes totalling $6.6 billion. Since he should first recover this amount, could the Minister of Finance then undertake not to look at taxing group dental and medical plans, which have a particular impact on families?

[English]

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, despite repeated efforts on this side of the House the Bloc still does not understand what accounts receivable are.

In the accounts receivable there are many Canadians who are having difficulty paying on time, but who have made arrangements with the government to pay over a period of time. They owe us money. No question. They pay it back with interest.

Also in that accounts receivable are certain Canadians who dispute tax questions with us. They say we do not owe as much as you say. When we examine their documents we often discover that they are right. I certainly do not think we should be collecting money from Canadians who do not owe it to us.

• (1420)

The accounts receivable are exactly that. We are coming off a bad recessionary period, the Tory recession. We are coming on to the margin recovery. We are doing all we can to help Canadians who are having difficulty and who are now getting back on their feet.

The last thing we are going to do is force them into receivership and bankruptcy by the policies adopted by the Bloc Quebecois.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it may be that I do not understand what an account receivable is at Revenue Canada, but the Auditor General of Canada and I think alike. Neither of us understand. These members do not understand and neither does the public. The minister is the only one to understand.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Let me get back to my question to the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I will get a serious answer. Does the Minister of Finance see the commitment his Prime Minister made during the election campaign not to raise taxes for two years, a solemn commitment made to all Canadians, as a commitment that should be honoured? And if so, why does he not come out and say so clearly, today, instead of letting uncertainty hang over the heads of taxpayers?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, more to the point, we have to ask ourselves: is our tax system, here, in Canada, entirely fair? Or does it have loopholes, a point that some of the hon. member's colleagues have already raised? Are there loopholes that should not be looked at?

If, contrary to his colleagues, the hon. member is of the opinion that the system is perfectly fair, that no changes are required, fine, no changes will be made in the next budget, but we think that the system is not entirely fair and that changes will be required. We certainly intend to assume our responsibilities.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I was happy to hear the Prime Minister admit that there are tax inequities. This, incidentally, is one of the proposals he will find in the report submitted to him by the Official Opposition, which suggests 10 ways to reduce his deficit problem. I would ask him to read these recommendations, which were tabled in both official languages about two weeks ago. It may be time for him to read them.

In order to meet their commitment to reduce the deficit to 3 per cent of GDP by 1996–97, the Liberal members on the finance committee are proposing higher taxes for all taxpayers through a supposedly temporary surtax. The Official Opposition, however, believes that the deficit can be substiantially reduced without raising personal income tax, by making vigorous efforts to collect unpaid taxes and cut spending, including inappropriate tax expenditures.

Instead of raising taxes for all taxpayers, will the Minister of Finance finally decide to fairly and seriously consider all the proposals made by the Official Opposition to help him cut the deficit in an intelligent way?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, first of all, yes, I did read the Bloc Quebecois's report. I can assure the hon. member that we intend to consider these recommendations carefully. It should, however, be pointed out to the hon. member that these recommendations would help us with only a tiny portion of the $42 billion deficit. I would ask the hon. member if he could make suggestions that will really help us solve the deficit problem and the structural problems facing us.

Mr. Yvan Loubier (Saint–Hyacinthe—Bagot, BQ): Mr. Speaker, I would calmly remind the Minister of Finance that, based on our calculations, which he has not contradicted, our 10–point proposal would amount to about $15 billion in cuts and savings of all kinds and in new taxes that would make rich Canadians pay their fair share, if they do not already. I would invite him to reassess our proposals.

I put my supplementary question to the Deputy Prime Minister. Does she intend to reprimand her finance minister, as the Prime Minister did yesterday on the issue of high interest rates, so that the finance minister will reject the idea of a surtax that would hit all taxpayers, which would be totally inconsistent with the Prime Minister's own election commitment?

• (1425)

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Bloc Quebecois just said that it has given us suggestions in terms of deficit reduction of some $15 billion. I hate to contradict their mathematics, but the number is nowhere near that. In fact it is not even one third of that.

That being said, what really must be done in this House by the opposition, and indeed the Reform Party have done it in part and have said they are going to do it before the budget, is to give us a comprehensive plan. It is quite easy to make great speeches. It is quite easy to set out targets with no background. But what is very, very difficult is to do the line by line study that allows us to deal with the profound structural problems of our economy and the way that governments spend.

In the month and a half that the opposition is going to have off, I would invite them to sit down and really work up a proper plan so that when we come down with the budget we can have an intelligent debate.

SECURITY INTELLIGENCE REVIEW COMMITTEE

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the SIRC report on the Bristow affair brought forward this morning is a whitewash. It does not adequately address the Reform Party's primary concern, namely that a paid agent of the former Progressive Conservative government allegedly tried to build links between Reform and extremist groups for the purposes of discrediting Reform in an election.

The Mulroney–Campbell administration may or may not have known what Grant Bristow was doing but they were certainly aware of his activities and they were in a position to use that information for political advantage.

Will the Solicitor General tell this House why SIRC did not more thoroughly investigate this particular concern and what he intends to do about it?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Security Intelligence Review Committee was created by an act of Parliament, adopted by this House and the other place, to operate at arm's length from CSIS, at arm's length from the minister, at arm's length from the government. In short, it operates very much like a permanent commission of inquiry. It presented its report. I tabled that report in the House today.

I understand the hon. leader's question. However, I think that question would best be put to SIRC itself. I understand its members are appearing before a subcommittee of the justice committee tomorrow. That would be a very good vehicle for asking such questions.

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, sections of the SIRC report read like a who's who of the Tory party. Their names are sprinkled throughout the report: Lewis, Jelinek, Dobbie, Segal, Sparrow, Campbell. Many of these people were reported to have had meetings with key players in the Bristow affair and were involved in smear campaigns against the Reform Party. Yet, in interview after interview with these former Tory politicians, SIRC avoided asking the key hard questions.

Will the Solicitor General agree that a committee like SIRC composed of political partisans investigating alleged improprieties by politicians makes a mockery of natural justice and discredits the internal security system in this country?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the members of the Security Intelligence Review Committee are appointed by order in council in exactly the same way as a short term commission of inquiry. They have the fullest powers to investigate, to seek documents, to question people under oath and they are in a position to complete a full and comprehensive report into matters they look into. That is what they have done. That report is before us for questioning and also is before us to use as a resource to make sure that CSIS is operating in a way required by law.

I suggest to the hon. leader of the Reform Party that he take another look at the report. Its basic purpose was to investigate allegations about the conduct of CSIS not about the conduct of political figures. It has done this job. I suggest that he and his colleagues follow up their concerns by addressing their questions directly to the members of SIRC when they appear before the parliamentary subcommittee or for that matter, seeking out meetings with them directly.

• (1430)

Mr. Preston Manning (Calgary Southwest, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today's SIRC report on the Bristow affair highlights the inadequacies of checks and balances on CSIS. It is also clear that the mechanisms for monitoring the activities of CSIS are ineffectual. They are open to political manipulation by virtue of the patronage appointments to the Security Intelligence Review Committee.

Will the minister agree that the highly political and completely ineffectual Security Intelligence Review Committee should be done away with? Will he agree that the parliamentary subcommittee on national security should be made the watchdog of CSIS and should be given the teeth to do the job?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I reject the premise and innuendo of the hon. member's question.

The SIRC was created by an act of this Parliament to operate at arm's length from the government, from Parliament itself and from CSIS. I really question why he thinks a subcommittee of this House made up of people linked directly to political parties is less partisan than the arm's length Security Intelligence Review Committee. There is a contradiction in what he says.

TAX CREDITS

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Revenue.

While the major Canadian banks are declaring record profits of over $4 billion this year, we learn that these same banks will benefit from some $300 million in tax credits for research and development, in particular for expenses to develop software used in current operations, such as automated teller machines. The Auditor General has denounced such tax credits as ineffective.

Can the revenue minister confirm that nearly $300 million in tax deductions will swell the banks' profits, which already amount to $4 billion, and that these credits are for so–called R&D expenses which are really nothing but current expenditures?

[English]

Hon. David Anderson (Minister of National Revenue, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member can rest assured that there will be no payment on pseudo claims for tax credits.

We have a very strict procedure for dealing with the tax credits for scientific research and experimental development. The three criteria are: first, there must be advanced knowledge; second, there must be a real risk of failure involved; and third, the research must be undertaken by experts.

We are now assessing the applications. I might add that anybody can put in a request for such an application. It simply does not mean that Revenue Canada will accept it. We are looking at it closely with over 300 auditors and also a large number of scientific experts to make sure that in fact no money is paid under this scheme other than that which is due to be paid.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre Brien (Témiscamingue, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance.

First of all, I would like to remind him that he started by saying that the Bloc Quebecois had no suggestions. Five minutes later, he was up to $5 billion. So that he can do his figure work better, I would like to remind him that we are talking about $1.6 billion for defence, $3 billion in corporate subsidies, and $6 billion in unpaid accounts. The Minister of Finance should get his figures straight and by the end of Question Period, we may find that the deficit is much smaller.

Yesterday, the Minister of Finance asked us where to cut. Here is another suggestion. Does he intend to end the waste of public funds denounced by the Auditor General and reduce his spending by $300 million, in addition to savings suggested by the Bloc Quebecois?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of Finance and Minister responsible for the Federal Office of Regional Development—Quebec, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I fully endorse what the Minister of National Revenue just said. The purpose of these tax credits for research and development is certainly to create new technology. It is not for companies to do things that they should do anyway as good management.

I think that the Minister of National Revenue answered the question very well and I can tell you that he has just stated the finance minister's position too.

SECURITY INTELLIGENCE REVIEW COMMITTEE

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the SIRC report on the Heritage Front affair is full of contradiction. It states that CSIS did not investigate the Reform Party or its membership. Yet in the same report it has acknowledged that a CSIS Ottawa region investigator searched the names of the contributing individuals and companies to the Reform Party leader's 1988 campaign against the CSIS databases.

I ask the minister if this does not constitute an investigation of the party and its membership, what does?

• (1435)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the report of the Security Intelligence Review Committee which is the report of the committee and not of the government said in part that the service had an obligation to investigate whether the government of the foreign country was involved in attempting to influence the outcome of a Canadian election. It also went on to say that CSIS did not investigate the Reform Party or its membership.

If my hon. friend does not agree with this, I suggest she question SIRC directly when it appears before the subcommittee. I understand her concerns, but the vehicle to which she should address her questions is the SIRC itself.

Ms. Val Meredith (Surrey—White Rock—South Langley, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General cannot remove himself from the responsibility of representing Canadians on this issue.

I will be talking to SIRC tomorrow. This investigation on allegations was from an individual considered by the CSIS investigator as an unknown quality who was self–serving and very opportunistic. It would appear that investigations of this nature can be held with very weak probable cause.

What assurance can the minister give to Canadians that contributors to political parties today are not being investigated by CSIS?

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I repeat that this report is a report of an independent commission of inquiry. My role is to bring the report to the attention of the public through this House in the fullest possible manner, which I have done.

With respect to the second part of the member's question, the law adopted by this Parliament makes clear that CSIS is not to investigate lawful acts of protest, dissent or promotion of a cause. I think that is pretty well clear. I hope it will give the reassurance the hon. member is seeking.

BLOOD SUPPLY SYSTEM

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Health. On December 5, the minister said that she would rather wait for the public hearings on this issue to be completed before commenting on the blatant lack of rigour endangering the safety of Canada's blood supply system. These hearings were held on December 6 and 7.

Now that the hearings have taken place, will the minister tell us why the Bureau of Biologics does not comply with its own standards, given its responsibility to check the quality of blood products and facilities at all 17 transfusion centres of the Canadian Red Cross Society?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I thought the hon. member was going to wish me a Merry Christmas and a Happy New Year, and also congratulate me for the good work I did this year.

Clearly, we worked well and we will continue to do so.

As regards the hon. member's question, I can say that we more than doubled the staff of the bureau. We implemented a number of measures. We are also spending $11 million on the Krever Commission because we feel this is a very serious issue. Not only do we want our blood supply system to be as good as any, we want it to be the best in the world.

Mrs. Pauline Picard (Drummond, BQ): Mr. Speaker, words fail me. How can the minister not take this recommendation seriously?

Our blood supply system is blatantly flawed and Canadians are at risk of being contaminated before the end of 1995. This is very serious. Some people are actually dying because of this.

Will the Minister of Health at least have the decency to immediately contact the head of the Bureau of Biologics, who is accountable to her, and clearly tell him that he has the duty to comply with his own safety rules?

• (1440)

[English]

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I take the question very seriously indeed.

Since I became the Minister of Health we have done more in terms of blood safety and inspection of centres and increasing personnel than was done in the previous 10 years.

We did not and I am not waiting for the report of Mr. Krever to take action. We have done everything that we can and we will continue to do everything we can. Meanwhile we are anxiously awaiting to see what other new measures Mr. Krever will ask us to undertake. We will do whatever it takes to guarantee that the blood system in this country is the very best in the world.

HEALTH CARE

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, five weeks ago the health minister threatened private clinics throughout Canada. She promised swift action and then she vanished, perhaps permanently.

The minister now knows that all provinces struggle to fund health care because this government withdraws from medicare funding.

Will the minister give every province a Christmas present by admitting her political blunder?

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I seem to recall during the last election campaign a Reform Party committed to the medicare system in this country. As a matter of fact the leader said he was opposed to user fees and did not want to decrease access to the health care system. I have a quote here which says: "I want to make it absolutely clear that the Reform Party is not promoting private health care deductibles or user fees".

If there is a blunder that has been made during this year it is by the Reform Party. We have kept our word. I am keeping my word. We are going to have medicare in this country not based on how much you can afford to pay, but based on your need for care.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Some hon. members: More, more.

The Speaker: The hon. member for Macleod.

Mr. Grant Hill (Macleod, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, that applause was a nice farewell.

Informetrica did a study which states that by the end of the EPF freeze in 1995 the federal government will have offloaded $29.4 billion unilaterally on to the provinces, $10.4 billion on to Ontario alone. Some Canadians think this is a big problem.

What will the minister do? I ask her to stand up and answer if she has an answer but if not to stay seated preferably in the backbenches.

Hon. Diane Marleau (Minister of Health, Lib.): The hon. member can quote whatever studies he wants but Mr. Speaker, perhaps you can give this message to the hon. member. There has not been one study that says we need to spend more money in our health care system. Everyone knows we need to spend it differently and more effectively. That is the exercise every province has undertaken. It is not easy but it is necessary.

At the same time we should not ever forget average Canadians who need health care. We never want to go back to the days when people could lose their homes at the same time as they lost their lives.

• (1445)

If the hon. critic would go four seats over and speak to his leader he might be able to get the policies of the Reform Party right in terms of what it said during the election.

INTERNATIONAL TRADE

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

As of January 1, 1995, the United States will impose new restrictions on Canadian sugar exports. Because of this unilateral decision to change the classification of products with a high sugar content, Quebec and Canada stand to lose almost 2,400 jobs. Since the change was made before GATT was signed, the federal government now claims that it cannot intervene in this issue.

Can the minister explain to us why the Canadian government let the United States unilaterally change the classification of products with a high sugar content, when it knew full well that this would have disastrous consequences for the sugar industry in Quebec and Canada?

[English]

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the United States is proposing to take certain actions effective January 1 with respect to the importation of products containing sugar into the United States.

As the hon. member knows, Canada takes strong exception to the position being taken by the United States. We have made those representations abundantly clear at the officials level in dealing with the U.S. department of agriculture, the U.S. trade representatives office and the White House.

Representations by Canada to the United States continue to be made. In the past 24 hours the Minister for International Trade has been in touch with his U.S. counterpart to make the Canadian position abundantly clear. We will continue to pursue that position in the best interest of all Canadians, including those in the province of Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Guy Chrétien (Frontenac, BQ): Mr. Speaker, since the minister has confirmed that Canada is no match for the United States in bilateral trade negotiations, will he undertake to refer the issue to a GATT panel?

[English]

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian government will pursue all its options in defending the Canadian position in the face of U.S. action with which we may disagree.

However I want to make it fundamentally clear that in the process we will not engage in any game of trading off one region of the country against another or one commodity against another or one group of producers against another.

All these are separate and distinct issues. They must be dealt with separately and distinctly on their own merits and we will not trade off the Canadian—

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

INFRASTRUCTURE PROGRAM

Mrs. Eleni Bakopanos (Saint–Denis, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the infrastructure program.

The recession hit Canadians hard, including the residents of my riding of Saint–Denis, and reduced their employment opportunities. Over the past year, the situation seems to have improved and people are starting to go find jobs again.

[English]

Could the minister responsible for the infrastructure program give us an update on the status of the program?

Hon. Arthur C. Eggleton (President of the Treasury Board and Minister responsible for Infrastructure, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, as we reach the first anniversary of the launching of the program when the Prime Minister and the premiers came together on December 21 in Ottawa, I am pleased to be able to bring more good news to members of the House.

At the halfway mark of the program over 80 per cent of the $6 billion has been allocated to some 8,400 projects, creating over 81,000 jobs for Canadians. We are well on our way to the creation of some 100,000 direct jobs in the program.

I am pleased to tell the member for Saint–Denis that in the province of Quebec we have created over 20,000 jobs and have contributed significantly to the economy of the city of Montreal.

One more statistic, because I know the Reform Party's interest in the matter: I have received from Reform Party members some 15 letters and 10 of them have been in support of the program.

PETRO–CANADA

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, last week in the House both the Minister of the Environment and Minister of Natural Resources said they would look into the circumstances of the tragedy suffered by the Curtis family of New Brunswick at the hands of Petro–Canada and report back to the House.

Since then the Curtises have received conclusive proof from the renowned environmental health centre in Dallas that indeed exposure to gas fumes was the cause of permanent mental and physical damage to their seven–year old daughter.

My question is for the environment minister. As Petro–Canada is not only responsible for the leak but actually knew about the leak two years before it took any action, what does the government plan to do about holding this corporate criminal responsible?

Hon. Sheila Copps (Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of the Environment, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I will follow up on the undertaking I gave both publicly and privately to the member last week.

Not only did I receive his question in the House. I subsequently went over to discuss it with him personally. He assured me that he would provide medical information that we would use in an attempt to personally intervene with Petro–Canada. I have discussed the issue with my colleague, the Minister for Natural Resources, and we have been awaiting the medical evidence the member says is now in his possession.

Mr. Bill Gilmour (Comox—Alberni, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Natural Resources. I have the documentation. We received it today. It will go to both ministers.

I have other documentation showing that the Minister of Natural Resources and the Minister of the Environment were both notified about the case by the Liberal member for Fredericton—York—Sunbury last January, nearly a year ago.

Since the minister knew about the tragedy a year ago, why did she not do anything about it then? Why has the minister allowed Petro–Canada, a government controlled company, to snatch this little girl's future away?

Hon. Anne McLellan (Minister of Natural Resources, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, let me say in relation to the statement just made by the hon. member that indeed a colleague of mine informed me of this set of circumstances. I intervened at that time. I believe, in part because of that intervention, a settlement was reached in relation to part of the claim raised by the Curtises. Therefore I take exception to the fact that the member suggests I did not act upon the request of my colleague.

The other matters raised by the hon. member in relation to the health of the female child in question I understand are presently before the courts, are being pursued in the courts, and therefore it would be inappropriate for me to say anything further at this time.

POST–SECONDARY EDUCATION

Mr. Laurent Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry, BQ): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Human Resources Development. Everybody knows that the reform proposed by the minister for post–secondary education has met with strong opposition from the provinces and student associations.

Does the minister still intend to go ahead with his reform of post–secondary education funding, as proposed in his green book, when the provinces and student associations are very much opposed to this proposal?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, if there is any broad unanimity in the country from one end to the other, I suppose it is the need for a substantial, major overhaul and reform of all social programs including those in post–secondary education. In the province of Quebec alone 95 per cent believe it is time for major reform in social programs.

As the hon. member knows, a Commons committee has been holding hearings. We have had widespread consultation through a questionnaire. We have now received 20,000 copies from Canadians. They will be analysed. There is an ongoing series of discussions and a wide variety of options.

The hon. member, as a member of Parliament, would not want me to preclude the judgment of his colleagues who have spent a great deal of time listening to Canadians, or preclude the judgment of many Canadians who have bothered to take the time to write in to give their contributions, by simply making an arbitrary judgment, as it seems the Bloc has done, before listening to the Canadian people.

• (1455)

[Translation]

Mr. Laurent Lavigne (Beauharnois—Salaberry, BQ): Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that people have already been waiting for quite a while. Everybody is aware of the minister's proposal and even Ontario has expressed some opposition.

How can the minister claim to represent a flexible federalism when he threatens to retaliate against the government of Ontario if it continues to make public its resistance to the proposed reform?

[English]

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Human Resources Development and Minister of Western Economic Diversification, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the one thing that will never lead to co–operative or flexible federalism is the kind of fearmongering the hon. member has just engaged in. I have never made suggestions or threats of the kind the hon. member suggested. He should withdraw that remark. It is not based on any fact or any presupposition.

I would simply say to him that at this time the broad majority of Canadians want some change. They want governments to work together on change. They want us to find the best ways to spend our money.

I keep saying the only group that seems to be objecting continually without analysing or considering the options is the Bloc Quebecois. It is simply standing in the way of Canadians getting what they want, which is a much better, more effective social system that will help people get back to work.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food.

In 1983 the government implemented the Western Grain Transportation Act that gave railways guaranteed returns on investments and operating expenses. Not only was it a licence to print money. It also allowed railways to become inefficient and non–performing since they were paid regardless of how they moved prairie grain.

Is the minister now proposing to offload past Liberal mistakes on to farmers in the form of a cash buyout?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows the Minister of Transport and I are working on a set of proposals for comprehensive reform of the Canadian grain handling and transportation system. That obviously includes a very detailed examination of existing legislation in the form of the Western Grain Transportation Act.

In terms of a consultative process, a very extensive process is now under way by both the Minister of Transport and myself consulting with farm organizations, farmers and all other stakeholders in the grain transportation system. Our objective is to collect all their recommendations and advice toward the end of this year or the very early part of 1995 so that early in the new year we can put before our cabinet colleagues a set of proposals to deal with some longstanding issues in our grain handling and transportation system.

Our objective, in the final analysis, is to ensure we position the country to compete with the rest of the world and win in our grain sector.

Mr. Jake E. Hoeppner (Lisgar—Marquette, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows very well that three prairie premiers insist that the Western Grain Transportation Act represents an inherent right promised to prairie provinces. They also insist that none of these moneys go into the east and that they stay in the west.

Is the minister prepared to put these funds into a safety net program that will offset the effects of U.S. and European subsidized products in the form of a trade distortion adjustment program?

Hon. Ralph E. Goodale (Minister of Agriculture and Agri–Food, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, a variety of proposals are under consideration. Some of those proposals come from the producer payment panel, which was a consultative process that ultimately reported publicly in June of this year. There have been other proposals in terms of the structure of the method of payment that have come from the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Various farm organizations have come forward with other alternatives. There is clearly a difference in view among farmers and farm organizations in western Canada on whether the funds either partially or totally should be dedicated to some kind of a safety net system. That is one of the alternatives on the table.

However I must tell the hon. gentleman that thus far in the consultations we have had with farmers and farm organizations the recommendations and advice we are receiving are very much against the notion of folding the funds into any kind of safety net.

SOFTWOOD LUMBER INDUSTRY

Mr. Stan Dromisky (Thunder Bay—Atikokan, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this question is for the Minister for International Trade.

For several months Canadian lumber companies have been waiting for the United States to begin repaying the bulk of softwood lumber duties collected on Canadian exports. Can the minister tell this House when Canadian companies will begin receiving repayment of these funds?

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Minister for International Trade, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, those in the United States lumber industry who had challenged the NAFTA procedures have now agreed unanimously to withdraw their lawsuit.

Accordingly, with the removal of this final obstacle, I understand that the United States Department of Commerce will in the next days begin to return the deposits of Canadian lumber companies, totalling some $800 million plus interest.

I should add that the Canadian and United States governments will join in a consultative process to facilitate trade in lumber on both sides of our border.

TRIBUTES

The Speaker: My colleagues, it is quite probable that this will be our last question period this year. Today, I want to do something that I know you will agree with. The House is saying goodbye to three of its House officers who have been with us for a great many years.

In offering tribute, I would like André Fréchette, the head page who has been with us for 42 years, to please come and stand with me on my right.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: I would also like to invite our two deputy sergeants–at–arms. They have always been at that end of the House but for today, gentlemen, I wonder if you would join me here in front of the Speaker's chair.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

The Speaker: I would first call on the member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, today is the last working day on the floor of the House for our chief page, André Fréchette. He has had an amazing term of service in this House. What is more amazing is that the 41 years he has worked here represents more than 80 per cent of his life and I do not mean working life.

Of the 10 Prime Ministers who have been in office since the beginning of his employment in this House, nine have benefited from time to time from his assistance. I am certain there is no other living Canadian who can claim to have personally assisted nine Prime Ministers not to mention 14 leaders of the opposition, scores of cabinet ministers and probably more than 1,000 members of Parliament.

During his years of service he has learned more about the House and its workings than most members. He always seems to be the first to know what is going to happen in the House, often being able to provide helpful advice to members and to other staff.

Mr. Fréchette started his career with the House as a page when he was barely into his teens and it is only just that he should retire now while he is still a youngish man.

• (1505)

We will miss him very much in this House, Mr. Speaker, but of course we will be reminded of his presence on a daily basis because of the very able staff that he has trained to function in his absence.

[Translation]

Mr. Fréchette, we wish you a long and happy retirement.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Gilles Duceppe (Laurier—Sainte–Marie, BQ): Mr. Speaker, three employees of the House of Commons are about to retire, namely Léo Robitaille, who has been with us since 1953, Sam Renaud, since 1954, and André Fréchette, since 1951.

Serving the members of this House takes dedication, patience and understanding, and we would be unable to do our job without their support.

I would like to comment particularly on Mr. Fréchette's career which kept him in the House for 43 years. He started working here when he was 11, under Louis Saint–Laurent. He has known 12 speakers and several generations of members. I think this is a record, and should be in the Guinness Book of Records.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Duceppe: I wish to thank Mr. Robitaille, Mr. Renaud and Mr. Fréchette on behalf of all members of the Bloc Quebecois.

We wish you a long and happy retirement!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Darrel Stinson (Okanagan—Shuswap, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, today it is both an honour and indeed a pleasure to pay tribute on behalf of the Reform Party of Canada to my friend, chief page André Fréchette, on the occasion of his retirement.

Mr. Fréchette was born in Hull and first came to work in this place in 1951. He became chief page in 1980. What are his plans for retirement? We know he enjoys bowling every week, and we wish him all success to bowl perfect games. In the summer he knows the many wonderful locations where he can pick every kind of wild berry around the area.

After 42 years as a page he has well earned a rest, but we have been informed that a friend has also invited him to form a partnership in a small business. Mr. Fréchette has a big decision to make ahead. But I know he will bring his special enthusiasm to whatever choice he makes.

What advice would he give to young people today? I would like to quote: "Do anything you can to become a page. It is the best experience in the world and it is wonderful for young people to feel they are contributing to their country".

I am sure his wife, daughter and grandson take special pride in the years that he has given to Canada. I want to express the appreciation and congratulations of Parliament and our personal thanks to chief page André Fréchette. We will all miss you.

Also, we would like to extend our best wishes on the retirement of Mr. Leo Robitaille who has served Parliament here since 1953, and Mr. Sam Renaud since 1954. We wish you the best of everything in your retirement and the best of the season.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is a rather special day for me. As you know, I am the only staff member of the House of Commons ever to have been elected to this place since Confederation. That I consider special. What is even more special today is to say to you and to hon. members that I have had the opportunity of working with all three people we are honouring this afternoon.

[Translation]

At one time I worked in the parliamentary restaurant like Mr. Léo Robitaille, who is being honoured today. As a member of this House, I have always known and worked with Mr. André Fréchette. I also came to know Mr. Renaud.

• (1510)

If I could pretend for an instant that I am still an employee of the House of Commons, as I was a long time ago, I would like to tell these three men that the members of the House wish them the very best. I am sure that, in my imaginary capacity as an employee of this House, I also speak for all the employees of this House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the New Democratic Party, I too would like to wish Mr. Robitaille, Mr. Fréchette and Mr. Renaud a very happy retirement and also thank them very much for their service to this House and to generations of parliamentarians and to young people throughout the years.

[Translation]

I want to wish them a happy retirement.

By the way, Mr. Speaker, there are many other employees in the House of Commons who are going to retire.

[English]

I would like to also thank all of those other employees of Parliament who are taking retirement on January 1 and to thank them as well for their service to this Parliament.

The Speaker: Léo, André and Sam, at long last the Speaker gets to speak. My colleagues, today is a very special day. It is very special for all of us because in a very real sense we who serve in this House and the people who help us to discharge our duties as parliamentarians know full well of the pressures and demands that are placed on all of us. I include here the officers of this House.

Today as we say goodbye to Léo and Sam, I must say that I had hoped in my tenure to never be able to avail myself of your services, but already once I have had to call upon you when one of our members would not withdraw. I have forgiven him long since.

My colleagues, today also we say goodbye to André Fréchette. I ask the pages who are here today to come and stand around the Chair. There have been many pages that André has worked with and whom he has helped over the years.

[Translation]

I am happy to see you are all here, our pages, my pages, the pages of all Canadians.

[English]

It is indeed fitting that at this time of the year, as we prepare to go home, as we prepare ourselves indeed to be with our families and friends that we, the family that is Parliament, and most especially these three men who are leaving us today, would say to them, and I do today claim my right to speak on behalf of all parliamentarians when I say to you: Thank you for a job well done. We appreciate you very much.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Michel Gauthier (Roberval, BQ) Mr. Speaker, I was under the impression that I could dispense with the Thursday question today, but it seems that my hon. colleague has a number of items to announce, so I would ask him to proceed.

• (1515)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Government in the House of Commons and Solicitor General of Canada, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I have a few offerings for my hon. colleagues, just before the holidays.

[English]

First of all, in my capacity as Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, I want to join in the congratulations and best wishes to Mr. Fréchette, Mr. Robitaille and Mr. Renaud.

This afternoon we will continue consideration of third reading stage of Bill C–53. I believe there is an understanding that we will vote on this today. However, there will be an interruption at around 4.30 or 5 p.m. when the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod will summon the House to the other place for a royal assent ceremony. I understand that will be the last formal activity in Parliament by His Excellency the current Governor General before he leaves office early in the new year.

Also, I understand there is some considerable desire on both sides of the House to adjourn for the winter adjournment provided for in Standing Order 28 after completing Bill C–53 and the royal assent.

I will announce the business for the day when we return during the week before that date, hopefully not in this House but directly to my hon. colleagues. I want to say that tentatively I am looking at Bill C–44 and Bill C–62 as the selections likely to be called.

Finally, I would like to extend to the other House leaders and all members of this House my non–partisan best wishes for the holidays and the new year.

The Speaker: My colleagues, if indeed we do break today, I invite all of you to join me for a reception in my quarters before you leave today.

PRIVILEGE

ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Mr. John Cummins (Delta, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, as I informed you and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans earlier today, I rise on a question of privilege in relation to a discrepancy in the supplemental answer given today to Order Paper Question No. 82. The answer is again inaccurate and misleading. It misrepresents the facts and is contradicted by DFO enforcement documents which I have received under access to information.

I was prepared to meet with the deputy House leader and the minister as per your instructions to discuss a satisfactory answer to Question No. 82. I sought such a meeting. A meeting never occurred and instead, the minister tabled a supplemental answer this morning.

The question asked the effect the late signing of the aboriginal fisheries agreement had on enforcement of fisheries agreements and fisheries regulations in 1994. The minister's answer does not respond to the effect on enforcement.

The Speaker: Is this new information the member is giving the House, or is it a repetition of the information he put before the House previously? Can the hon. member clarify that?

Mr. Cummins: Mr. Speaker, the information is new. What I am doing is responding to the supplemental answer to Question No. 82 which was tabled this morning.

The minister's supplemental answer to Question No. 82 which I refer to does not respond to the effect on enforcement. The departmental documents received under access to information deal specifically with the effect on enforcement.

The minister's supplemental answer deals with the management of the aboriginal fishing strategy, not the effect on enforcement of fisheries regulations, that is, the Fisheries Act. Now is not the time to debate the aboriginal fishing strategy.

The answer implies that aboriginal guardians were on duty as usual and that licences were given out as required under the regulations. That is simply not true. Virtual chaos reigned on the west coast. Fisheries documents prove it.

The issue before this House is whether the minister's answer misleads this House and prevents me as a member from carrying out my duties.

Let me read a few short sections from the August fisheries enforcement document on early Stuart migration which clearly demonstrates that the minister's supplemental answer is inaccurate. In Steveston it was reported that "the ability to properly manage the Fraser River aboriginal fishery has been seriously compromised". It also states: "The late signing of the aboriginal agreements has also resulted in difficulties in respect to proper management of the fishery, and in many cases bands have not been able to abide by the terms of the agreement".

• (1520)

In Fraser Valley East and Fraser Valley West the report states that the lateness in the signing of the 1994 aboriginal fishery agreement has resulted in the breakdown of effective management in the native fishery on the Fraser River. DFO officers were unable to perform their duties effectively because updated licensing data was not available, therefore proper gear and licence checks could not be done. Mandatory landing sites were not operational until late July. Arrangements were not made by the harvest committee as per agreement to recover landing slips—

The Speaker: The Chair is in a quandary. It would seem to me that what we have here is information which is deemed to be accurate by one side and deemed to be inaccurate by the other side. What we are into now I believe is a point of debate. I wonder if the hon. member could move to identify the specific point of privilege he is referring to.

Mr. Cummins: Mr. Speaker, in point of fact I asked the question: What effect did the late signing of the aboriginal fishing agreements in British Columbia have on the Department of Fisheries and Oceans' enforcement of the agreement and fisheries regulations in 1994?

The answer that was originally provided said that the impact was minimal. The documents which I received under access to information proved otherwise. The supplemental answer which I received this morning did not address the issue. Instead it addressed the issue of the management of the aboriginal fishing strategy. It did not address the question asked.

The breach of privilege as I suggested the other day for your consideration, Mr. Speaker, was the 1978 decision where the member for Northumberland—Durham raised a question of privilege in the House. The Solicitor General had written and provided information which later proved to be erroneous and inaccurate. The Speaker ruled as indicated in Hansard on page 1857: "I find therefore a prima facie case of contempt against the House of Commons".

I maintain that the same thing has happened again. If it was contempt against the House of Commons to provide a member with erroneous information, then surely to provide the House itself with erroneous information through a written reply to a question on the Order Paper would also be a prima facie case of privilege.

Should you rule—

The Speaker: Order. Colleagues, I think at least at this point from what I have heard we are in the process of debate.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is here now as is the member for Kingston and the Islands. I am going to permit an intervention. After the interventions are over, I will hear what you have to say first and then I will decide where I am going to go from there. The hon. Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

Hon. Brian Tobin (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, this is not a question of privilege. It is not even a matter of being a good point of order. What we have here is the beginning of a debate.

The debate being proposed by the member opposite is a debate about the impact or the capacity of enforcement officers both departmental and aboriginal officers to conduct their responsibilities.

• (1525)

This is very technical that there is a late signing of an aboriginal fisheries agreement. The agreement in question this year has been the subject of a lot of discussion, questions in the House, a great deal of media. It is now the subject of a review by a former Speaker and a public panel. There has been some acknowledgement of some problems. The agreement in question primarily is on the lower Fraser. The group in question is the Sto:Lo. But this is one of 47 agreements. There are 47 agreements.

If the member chooses to focus on some areas of difficulty and draw from them the conclusion that the entire program, the planet as we know it, the fishery as it has been conducted, the Department of Fisheries and Oceans, and every last fish are all subject to a totally uncontrolled situation, that is his right as a member of this House. But to extrapolate from it that the answer given is misleading when there are 47 agreements and not just one is improper. It is wrong and is an abuse of the whole principle of a question of privilege.

What we have here is a debate. Mr. Speaker, if you would like to provide for a debate, you well know in the years we have shared together in this place that I am always tempted to engage in such.

I will quote only two examples. For example, he said that the minister's answer implied something. Different people may draw different implications from words that are used, whether in the question or in the answer. I think it is entirely proper for a minister to provide an answer to a written inquiry which may be an answer that is not agreed to by the member receiving the answer.

Sometimes that may provoke the member to ask more specific questions. If the hon. member had asked what was the result of the non–signing of an agreement in area x he might have received a different answer to the question he asked on the Order Paper for which a much more general answer was provided.

I note that the minister, in answer to the hon. member's point the other day, tabled a supplementary response. This is unusual but it is perfectly proper for the minister to do that. He did it in order to satisfy the anxieties the hon. member raised the other day when he suggested that somehow the answer was misleading.

I want to suggest when the government prepares answers to questions in this House it prepares them as of the date the question is asked. Occasionally when the answer comes to me a month, two months or four months later—and sometimes they are late, we have had that experience recently—the answer is wrong because events have changed in a notorious way so that even I know they are wrong. Then I say I think we should update the answer and give an answer that is correct as of the date we are tabling the reply.

I suspect that part of the problem the hon. member encountered in this case is that the information available to the department on the date the question was put was different from the information when the answer was tabled some two months later. Additional or supplementary information was provided by the minister this morning. I tabled that on the minister's behalf.

In light of all that I do not understand how the hon. member can argue that his ability to perform his functions as a member of Parliament have been impaired by this answer. That is the nub of the issue on a question of privilege. If his ability to perform his functions are impaired, I suggest to him the thing for him to do is put more questions on the Order Paper and ask more detailed questions so he gets more detailed answers.

I am sure if he does that he will get the answers he wants. But reading from selective reports and then suggesting that because those reports are different from the answer when, as the minister has pointed out there are many reports, is not correct. It is not fair.

It is not impairing the hon. member's ability to carry on his functions. He is obviously able to carry them on because he has all the reports in his possession and is able to read and quote from them in this House. If that is the case how are his abilities impaired, and if they are not, there is no question of privilege.

The Speaker: Colleagues, I think that for my purposes at least at this point what I would like to do is review the answer which was tabled today. I would like to review the information the member put before us on another day and has brought back with more information today. I will have a look at the information. At this point at least, subject of course to my looking at it and reflecting on it, I am not convinced that there is a question of privilege.

• (1530)

However, if the House will give me the time to review the documents that have been placed before me, I will come back to the House if necessary.

I move now to the second question of privilege of the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

PRESS GALLERY

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, earlier today I was denied access to press gallery room 130–S on two occasions. I understand a similar occurrence took place a few days ago with respect to another member; I was informed of it by the member. Although I am prepared to move a motion, I state for the record that the essence of the privilege matter is the denial of access of a member or members to rooms on the parliamentary precincts.

In view of the season, our agenda this afternoon, and the fact that I would like to think it was a simple misunderstanding with the press gallery, perhaps I could suggest that Your Honour take the matter up with the press gallery to ensure that there are no misunderstandings about the rights of all members to have access to all open rooms in the parliamentary precincts, barring of course the other place beyond the bar, washrooms of the opposite gender and common sense things. If you would do that, Your Honour, I think it might clear up the matter.

The Speaker: It is a point of information; I am not sure it is a question of privilege. I will undertake to get more information on what precisely has been happening in the last few days especially with respect to room 130–S. I will give the information to the hon. member or indeed share it with the House if I feel it is necessary.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

DEPARTMENT OF CANADIAN HERITAGE ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion that Bill C–53, an act to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Hugh Hanrahan (Edmonton—Strathcona, Ref.): Mr. Speaker, once again it gives me great pleasure to discuss Bill C–53, an act to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage.

It would be useful to state unequivocally that the Reform Party does not support the bill. The reasons for this are numerous. Since I have spoken on the bill during first and second readings and have participated in committee and report stages, I feel most of what I have to offer has already been stated. Therefore I will not deliberate at great length on the issue.

However I would like to summarize the key aspects of the bill. First let us look at multiculturalism. As I mentioned yesterday in the House, as a member of the Standing Committee on Heritage I had the opportunity to listen to witnesses describe multicultural federal funded programs as divisive and that they focus on our differences rather than on our similarities. This is ultimately the opposite outcome to that which the government had intended for the program.

I truly believe the intention was noble enough when the multiculturalism legislation was passed by the Trudeau government. However it was an experimental program that has failed its goals. The program does little to unify and seemingly everything to separate. The government must stop the waste.

Multiculturalism is creating an entire generation of hyphenated Canadians by focusing on differences, not on similarities. The majority of Canadians believe there is nothing wrong with multiculturalism. Yet they believe it should not be funded by the government but by multicultural organizations. This is the position of the Reform Party we have been defending since the late 1980s. According to Neil Bissoondath, author of Selling Illusions—The Cult of Multiculturalism in Canada:

> Anyone critical of the multicultural policy—is immediately branded a racist.

• (1535)

Moreover it is my perception that this type of attitude is present today and is carried by the media, as anyone who speaks critically of funding for multiculturalism programs are labelled meanspirited or ignorant and intolerant. This is not an answer to the problem we are encountering today in Canada. I can unequivocally say that the Reform Party is not racist nor is it intolerant. However it is fiscally responsible.

Multiculturalism programs cost Canadians over $30 million annually. This funding could be better spent on health or education. I am sure everyone knows that education and not cash is the true way to break down barriers between cultures and individuals. Therefore I think it would be wise for the government to rethink its multicultural policy.

Next, overlap and duplication is a theme in which this Parliament will hopefully be remembered for decreasing, although for this to happen the Liberals must re–evaluate Bill C–53 as it is riddled with inconsistencies and duplications between departments, such as overlap and duplication between the Department of Canadian Heritage and the departments of industry, environment and transportation. Yet the Liberals seem quite content to allow the overlap to continue, which will only lead to confusion of responsibility and mismanagement.

To illustrate the point I will use national parks. They were in environment but have since moved to heritage. I am still wondering why. Recently one witness, David Day, managing director of the Association for Mountain Parks Protection and Enjoyment, was before the standing committee discussing this issue. It is important to illustrate what he said because he made a great deal of sense.

He spoke of the difficulty governments face in administering and managing our national parks because of the diversity of expectations. I could not agree more.

What is it that we as a society would like to see from our national parks? Specifically talking about national parks, Mr. Day said:

> Many Canadians have questioned why the government moved Parks Canada from the Department of the Environment to a new and seemingly unfocused Department of Heritage. Over the previous 14 years Parks Canada has established a firm position within the Department of the Environment as a leader and innovator in matters affecting the environment.

With the increase in tourism in Canada national parks are more closely linked to industry and environment than they are to heritage. The question remains: Why are parks in heritage? Streamlining government activities not only makes financial sense but also creates accountability. Government should be held accountable for department mismanagement and project failures.

Bill C–53 simply reinforces the perception of the process of government that needs reform as well as Reformers more so now than at any time before. Perhaps one of the most important changes or reforms the House needs is true free votes, free from party discipline. The Reform Party suggests changes to parliamentary rules to allow for more free votes and to ensure that the defeat of a government does not automatically mean the government must resign.

Bill C–53 is a prime example of a bill that should be defeated because it is fundamentally flawed. However its passage is a foregone conclusion as we will see later this afternoon. What we are doing here is nothing more than an illusion. We have been constructively criticizing and proposing positive changes, yet our suggestions fall on deaf ears.

• (1540)

What the Liberals have to understand is that less government will ultimately mean more freedom and more prosperity, not just for a certain few or a certain region but all Canadians. We as parliamentarians have an obligation not only to our constituents but to Canadians as a whole. We must start to make decisions that will enable the country to lower our deficit and ultimately our debt. Since the beginning of my speech Canada's national debt has increased $1,443 per second which equates to approximately $1,776,000.

An hon. member: Then you had better sit down.

Mr. Hanrahan: Whether I am standing or not does not matter; they are still wasting the money.

It is for these reasons I am opposed to Bill C–53. It does nothing to reduce government spending or waste, government mismanagement or incompetence, government overlap or duplication. Bill C–53 does not set an example for other ministries. Nor does it have the direction needed to lead the country out of the financial crisis we are presently facing.

It is for these reasons that we as parliamentarians should reject Bill C–53. We should send a message to Canadians that we are truly serious about parliamentary reform, deficit reduction, government streamlining and government efficiency.

[Translation]

Mr. Pierre de Savoye (Portneuf, BQ): Mr. Speaker, when we talk about heritage, most people believe that we are dealing with ancient things, old things. However, this afternoon, I would like to show that heritage also means modern things, even highly advanced technology. I would like to do it from a cultural perspective, from the perspective of Canadian and Quebec culture.

At the present time, right above the Equator, there are two American satellites beaming down to South and North America. They were sent into orbit by the Hughes Corporation, a subsidiary of General Motors in the United States. These two satellites have been nicknamed "Death Stars". What does this mean?

These satellites can transmit TV signals nearly to every home from the North Pole to the South Pole. They can broadcast up to 200 channels simultaneously.

I must warn you that this is not science fiction; not only can these satellites do what I have just mentioned, they have been doing it for several weeks already. They now have customers mainly in the U.S., but also in Canada.

These American satellites belong to the Direct TV Corporation and can be used by a Canadian corporation called Power Direct TV, itself a subsidiary of Hughes and Power Corporation.

What does this have to do with culture? Think about it for a moment. These satellites broadcasts are, for the time being, totally foreign to what is happening on the cultural scene in Canada. Programs are produced in the US and the content is American, naturally.

In fact, just about anyone in Canada can obtain the necessary equipment to receive these channels, and I will explain how to illustrate how real a danger it is for Quebec and Canadian culture.

• (1545)

In the United States, right now, you can buy a dish the size of large pizza and a descrambler, and get the signal coming from a satellite on your television set. Now Direct TV is a business concern and the signal is not free; however the company has to know that you are receiving their signal to be able to bill you for it.

How does it work? You go to the United States and you buy the box and the small dish for about C$900. I should add that as soon as the market picks up, the prices will fall to about half that much. You bring all this back to Canada, to Quebec, or any other province or to the Northwest Territories and you install your small dish outside, or even inside if you have a south–facing window. Next you connect your box to the phone line and you dial the 1–800 number.

You automatically reach the U.S. company and register as a new customer willing to use their services. The company then sends a signal to one of their geostationary satellites above the Equator telling it to talk to your box. These satellites always stay above the same spot on the Equator. This is not science fiction, this is happening now. Your box has a number, and when the satellite sends it the right signal, it comes to life. From then on, it gives you access to about 200 channels.

You can now view all the regular programming of the major American television networks and you can order up movies on a pay–per–view basis, which is like going to a video store, except that you do not have to get out of the house. You push a button indicating that you want to watch such and such a movie and, automatically, the box records the films that you ordered and your viewing time. At the end of the month, the parent company in the U.S. phones your box and reads the meter, so to speak. And the box provides the information. The company in the U.S. then issues a bill and sends it to you.

However, since you are in Canada, you will not receive the bill at your home. It will be sent to an American address that you were provided with, and you will get the bill from there. No GST, no provincial sales tax. I think that the Department of Revenue should realize that services are being provided to Canada without any international agreement.

I will quote officials from the American company working on the Canadian side. Mr. Kruyt, who works for Power Direct TV, appeared before the heritage committee on November 16.

What was the question I asked? I had asked him why the company tolerated that Canadian consumers receive the signal, knowing that it was not complying with Canadian consumer law. He answered: "We have no financial incentive to prevent these people from receiving the signals, but do have a financial incentive to charge them for doing so".

I then asked him what made him think that eventually, in providing the service legally to Canadians, signals could be screened to ensure that they receive Canadian rather than American signals. And the answer I got was that the American company would give them control over what they call the on–off switch if they could start business in this country. This is of course a situation where profitability is the only rule.

• (1550)

Culture in Canada and Quebec is now at risk. What can and must be done about it? First, we need our heritage minister to be properly equipped, to have the proper legislative tools to act. Instead, we have the Minister of Industry saying: "Communications. That belongs to me".

At this rate, telephone comes under communications, television comes under communications, banking transactions, specially those made at an automatic banking machine, come under communications. What about education then? Will it also come under the jurisdiction of the Department of Industry, when it is televised?

When the medical profession will make use of telecommunication media, will it become one more thing under industry jurisdiction? Telecommunication can be such an area of responsibility, but only insofar as the equipment is concerned and at the exclusion of content, which much be the responsibility of other appropriate departments. My point it that there is nothing in the legislation before us, absolutely nothing, that gives the Minister of Canadian Heritage authority to act.

I would even go further. With this chunk of the electronic highway —and we know that this highway is coming and that it will take many forms— how can we prevent goods and services from crossing our borders electronically, when we know full well that we have legislation in place to prevent them from entering in material form?

Take hate propaganda, for example. In electronic form, we cannot do a thing about it. Terrorist instructions are already circulating on Internet, here in Canada and Quebec. This would never be allowed if it had to go through a border point. What will we do to stop this? Our heritage department must be able to negotiate GATT–type agreements with our global partners, so that all countries with approved electronic data links will agree to protect their mutual interests. Therefore, the Act to establish the Department of Canadian Heritage should enable our heritage minister to tell the countries with which we will have electronic links: "If we receive a signal that should not be received, we expect you to take those responsible to task, and we will do the same for you".

We will thus be able to protect our cultural interests, first by avoiding invasion as we will have control over what is coming in. It is not a matter of hindering the free flow of information, but of seeing that what would not be allowed through a border point cannot get through electronically either. We can also agree to export our own cultural wealth overseas and not let barriers be put in place over there.

In conclusion, the bill as it stands should not be approved by this House nor by the other place, as it does not meet the requirements Canadians and Quebecers are entitled to.

The Royal Assent

● (1625)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I declare the motion carried.

(Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that there is unanimous consent for the following motion and I believe the hon. member for Roberval will second this motion. I move:

That the House shall not sit on December 16, 1994 provided that it shall be deemed to have sat and adjourned on that day for the purposes of Standing Order 28.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): The House has heard the terms of the motion by the parliamentary secretary. Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

(Motion agreed to.)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Louis-Hebert—Human Rights; the hon. member for Chicoutimi—Gliding school; the hon. member for Yukon—Social program review; the hon. member for Laval East—Draft bill on Quebec sovereignty.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing the House that the Senate has passed the following bills: Bill C-51, an act to amend the Canada Grain Act and respecting certain regulations made pursuant to that act; Bill C-56, an act to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act; Bill C-57, an act to implement the agreement establishing the World Trade Organization.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): I have the honour to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

Government House
Ottawa

December 15, 1994

Mr. Speaker:

I have the honour to inform you that the Right Honourable Ramon John Hnatyshyn, Governor General of Canada, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 15th day of December, 1994 at 4.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving royal assent to certain bills.

Yours sincerely,

Judith A. LaRocque
Secretary to the Governor General

• (1635)

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Excellency, the Governor General of Canada desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, the Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1650)

And being returned:

The Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House went up to the Senate chamber the Governor General was pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

Bill C–36, an act respecting the Split Lake Cree First Nation and the settlement of matters arising from an agreement relating to the flooding of land—Chapter No. 42.

Bill C–38, an act to provide for the security of marine transportation—Chapter No. 40.

Bill C–42, an act to amend the Criminal Code and other acts (miscellaneous matters)—Chapter No. 44.

Bill C–48, an act to establish the Department of Natural Resources and to amend related acts—Chapter 41.

Bill C–51, an act to amend the Canada Grain Act and respecting certain regulations made pursuant to that act—Chapter 45.

Bill C–55, an act to establish a board having jurisdiction concerning disputes respecting surface rights in respect of land in the Yukon Territory and to amend other acts in relation thereto—Chapter 43.

Bill C–56, an act to amend the Canadian Environmental Assessment Act—Chapter 46.

Bill C–57, an act to implement the agreement establishing the World Trade Organization—Chapter 47.

Bill C–63, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1995—Chapter 48.

ADJOURNMENT PROCEEDINGS

[Translation]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Mr. Philippe Paré (Louis–Hébert, BQ): Mr. Speaker, on Friday, December 9, I put a question to the Deputy Prime Minister about the Prime Minister's timid stand on human rights and the Canadian government's inability to guarantee the security of Canadian business people travelling abroad.

I made particular reference to the case of Mr. Tran Trieu Quan, a citizen from the Quebec City area who has been held prisoner in Hanoi for over eight months by the Vietnamese authorities. Charges have yet to be laid against him, which leads us to conclude that Mr. Tran is being unjustly held and that the Canadian government should demand his unconditional release without delay.

In answer to the first part of the question, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of International Trade said that "the Canadian government has raised the issue on several occasions". We in the Official Opposition cannot forget that during his Asian Tour with Team Canada, the Prime Minister never talked publicly about the important issue of human rights. To justify his cowardice, the Prime Minister said that he was afraid that Canada would be made fun of.

As regards the outrageous situation experienced by this Canadian who has been held prisoner in Hanoi for more than eight months now, the parliamentary secretary is merely taking note of the question.

• (1655)

Why is the Canadian government unable to impose the only possible solution, that is to say the release of Mr. Tran, who is being held illegally in a country where Canada just opened a chancellery in Hanoi and a trade office in Ho Chi Minh City, in addition to having been involved in the settlement of the arrears owed to the International Monetary Fund? Let us be frank: the Government of Canada is directly financing a government that is holding a Canadian prisoner. Some justice, Mr. Speaker!

The second part of my question dealt with the Canadian government's inability to ensure the security of Canadian business people abroad. In this regard, this whole affair has already taken its toll on the Quebec business community. For instance, the Sainte–Foy Chamber of Commerce recommended that its members stop trading with Vietnam. Last Friday, this organization also announced that it would recommend that chambers of commerce across Canada and Quebec adopt the same policy as long as Mr. Tran is held prisoner by the Vietnamese authorities.

How then are we to understand the Deputy Prime Minister's answer, and I quote: "I have personally reviewed every comment made by the Premier of Quebec when he was the host of the governor of a Chinese province and, each time, he adopted the same policy as the Government of Canada"? First, I would remind the Deputy Prime Minister that Vietnam is a sovereign state and not a Chinese province. Second, I would remind her that if I want to question the Government of Quebec, I would not do it through the House of Commons.

Lastly, I am pleased to see that the Deputy Prime Minister admits that Quebec has the ability and the know–how to establish an international policy independent of the federal government's. If that were not the case, I would really like to know why she would waste her time reading and studying the public statements made by the Premier of Quebec on various subjects relating to foreign affairs.

However, this partisan stand of the Deputy Prime Minister clearly shows the Canadian government's insensitivity to the fate of Mr. Tran, a Quebecer held prisoner in Vietnam.

[English]

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Foreign Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, I want the hon. member to know that this government is not at all insensitive to the situation of Mr. Quan. He might be happy to know that the Prime Minister raised the matter of Mr. Quan's continuing detention during his meeting in Hanoi with the Vietnamese Prime Minister Vo Van Kiet.

The Prime Minister received a full explanation of the details of the case and was assured that the matter would be handled fairly and in accordance with Vietnamese law.

Mr. Quan has both Canadian and Vietnamese citizenships. Vietnamese authorities, however, do not recognize dual nationality and deny access to Mr. Quan by Canadian officials.

However, as a result of repeated high level interventions from the Canadian government we have gained counsellor access to Mr. Quan. Canadian officials have visited Mr. Quan and confirmed he is not being mistreated.

This is a very complex case in which a Vietnamese corporation lost a considerable sum of money. We understand that the Vietnamese are investigating the possibility of fraud.

As part of its regular counsellor assistance Canadian officials are facilitating discussions between Mr. Quan and Vietnamese authorities with regard to the possibility of Mr. Quan's release. These discussions are private and confidential and it would be inappropriate for me to comment on them here.

The Canadian government will continue to provide all appropriate counsellor assistance to Mr. Quan and will monitor the situation with vigilance. It would not be appropriate for the Canadian government to demand that the Vietnamese set aside their own legal procedures and immediately release Mr. Quan, nor would it be appropriate for the government to support a business boycott of Vietnam because one of its citizens is being held in connection with a criminal investigation.

We have the right to insist upon counsellor access and due process. We are and will continue to do both.

DRAFT BILL ON QUEBEC SOVEREIGNTY

Mrs. Maud Debien (Laval East, BQ): Mr. Speaker, On December 9, I rose in this House to ask the Prime Minister about the referendum process in Quebec. The Bloc Quebecois wanted to know, and still wants to know, if the Prime Minister stands by what he wrote in his autobiography where he said: "If we lose the referendum, we will respect Quebecers' wishes and accept separation".

The Prime Minister answered my question by saying, first of all, that he wanted a clear question, adding that he would not answer any hypothetical question. The Prime Minister should realize that he is inconsistent in his statements. By not clarifying his stand on wishes democratically expressed by Quebecers, the Prime Minister is refusing to give an opinion on the right of the Quebec people to decide their future.

• (1700)

Before being sovereignists or federalists, we must all be democrats. I dare hope that nobody wants to make Quebec an independent country or to maintain it within the Canadian federation against Quebecers' will.

Moreover, the Prime Minister would do well by following the lead of his colleagues, the hon. member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine and the hon. member for Mount Royal, both of whom recently recognized that it is up to Quebecers to decide their future. The Prime Minister has shown partisan behaviour instead of political responsibility during Question Period last Friday. It is urgent that he display an attitude appropriate to his important responsibilities as a head of state.

Besides, during the same debate last week, the Prime Minister wrongly accused sovereignists of hiding their option by using a question referring to a draft bill containing 1,600 words. He said that many federalists were refusing to participate in those consultations because of this little trick. Those were terrible and very inconsiderate remarks.

Should we remind him of the consultations which surrounded the Charlottetown Agreement? Should we remind him that the Charlottetown Agreement contained not 1,600 words but well over 10,000 words? Yes, 10,000 words. The Prime Minister and his party were not at all shocked. On the contrary, they promoted the content of that agreement all across Canada.

You must admit that the qualms the Prime Minister has today are quite recent and his rationale seems one-sided. The federal government and its Quebec branch have to talk about the real options. Let them remind us that they have nothing else to offer but the status quo.

The truth of the matter is—and the Prime Minister should admit it—that federalists do not want to take part in consultations on the referendum because they have nothing to suggest but the old status quo. It may be Christmas and a time to eat traditional dishes, but that does not mean the federal government should serve us the same rehash.

In fact, the federal Liberals do not want to travel across Quebec and talk with citizens of every region. When you cannot argue for your political ideas with logical arguments, you use every kind of trick to divert the debate onto procedural details.

You cannot negotiate or manipulate the soul of a nation, nor can you put a price on it. No, the soul of a nation can only be seen if the people can democratically express their will. That is what the Government of Quebec is proposing and what the Prime Minister of Canada is rejecting. The Prime Minister must accept this inescapable fact and take part, with his colleagues, in particular the member for Bonaventure—Îles-de-la-Madeleine, in the pre-referendum consultations the Government of Quebec will be holding.

[English]

Mr. John English (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, before debating the result of the vote, let us address the process. It should be democratic and it should be clear.

We are asking Mr. Parizeau to duly initiate the referendum process, to present his question to the National Assembly and to move on quickly to the Loi sur la consultation populaire.

As indicated by Mr. Johnson, we are asking the PQ to end this masquerade, this so-called consultation and to get a clear mandate from the population. In other words, hold a referendum as soon as possible and put an end to the uncertainty. Let the public decide.

The Bloc and the Government of Quebec claim that they are great believers in the democratic process. They talk solemnly about the need to respect this process, but their very first act is to attempt to pre-empt the referendum by introducing a draft declaration of sovereignty which will be voted on by the National Assembly before the people of Quebec have spoken.

There can be nothing less democratic than forcing the National Assembly to vote on a declaration of sovereignty before the people of Quebec have had an opportunity to express themselves at the ballot box.

The Bloc is asking, in the event that Quebecers vote yes to separation, to recognize the people of Quebec, to recognize the right to leave the Canadian federation. Will the Bloc agree that the decision to introduce the draft declaration of sovereignty and to have the National Assembly pass it before the people of Quebec have spoken through referendum is fundamentally undemocratic and against everything they claim to stand for?

• (1705)

Will the Bloc recognize that the people of Quebec have the right to stay in Canada when they vote no in the referendum?

Quebecers know that they live in one of the greatest countries in the world, a country that they built. This country is evolving and Quebecers have a part to play in this evolution. The burden of proof rests with the separatists.

We are confident, Mr. Speaker, that a strong case will be made for Canada.

SOCIAL PROGRAM REVIEW

Hon. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon, NDP): Mr. Speaker, on October 17 of this year I asked the Minister of Finance to come clean with Canadians about what the government's intentions were in terms of reducing funding for social programs in this country.

Since that time there has been much speculation. One report indicates a potential cut of $7 billion contemplated by the government in our social programs envelope. Others, for example the Standing Committee on Finance which has just released a report, project that over the next two years there will be something like a $3.4 billion cut in social programs.

This discussion that is going on certainly does not take into account the reality of what social programs have contributed to this country. Certainly as a New Democrat I am not against changes to social programs, but clearly Canadians are beginning to realize that the social security review has been merely an attempt to cut expenditures rather than to really and truly change our programs.

If the intent was to change programs, to make them better, to make them more efficient, I think we would have seen a very different process. I think the government has to be clear with Canadians what the intent is around the reduction of revenues in the social program area.

I would remind the government that in 1991 Statistics Canada was very clear that only 6 per cent of our debt could be attributed to social programs. I would suggest to the government that we need equal debate, indeed more debate, on that 94 per cent of the cost of our debt and deficit.

One of the major costs of that is how we finance our programs, not simply what we do within the purview of those programs. Since October 17 when I first posed the question to the minister I continued to raise questions about the financing of the debt. For example, only yesterday I posed the question to the Minister of Finance suggesting that he should have a public inquiry into the role of the Bank of Canada in setting interest rates, because of course the amount of our foreign debt is certainly affecting the interest rate policy, and to look seriously at how monetary policy in this country is formed and the role of the Bank of Canada in that.

The minister did not respond to that particular request. I would suggest again that the minister instead of just simply looking at cuts to expenditures should also look at why they are necessary. Part of the reason for that is the monetary policy that was pursued by the previous Mulroney government and has been continued if not with even more zeal by the current Liberal government.

There are several things that the minister should be looking at in this area. The minister might recall that before 1967 the Bank Act legislated a ceiling on interest rates that allowed for some control. Prior to 1991 the act ensured that the Bank of Canada had some control over interest on the national debt.

I would like to ask the question why it is that the government will not be clear about the reduction in expenditures it wants to make to the social programs envelope? In addition, why will the government not look at the way and the role of the Bank of Canada, which has become I might add not the bank for Canadians but the bank for chartered banks, and how the government by looking at that could return the controls of its monetary policy to the people of Canada and not simply to the chartered banks.

I would be very interested, Mr. Speaker, in again posing those two questions.

Mr. John English (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada has embarked upon a significant reform of Canada's social security system in co–operation with provincial and territorial governments and with all Canadians. The social security review is allowing Canadians to consider options for structural reform of Canada's social programs. At the same time this review must respect fiscal realities and the government's deficit reduction targets.

The 1994 federal budget established fiscal parameters for social security reform. It announced measures that would reduce spending on unemployment insurance by $2.4 billion. It also indicated that further UI savings leading to lower UI premiums would result from social security reform.

• (1710)

The 1994 budget also announced that growth in social security transfers to the provinces would be curtailed by ensuring that Canada assistance plan transfers and the post–secondary education component of established programs financing are no higher in 1996–97 than in 1993–94. Savings of at least $1.5 billion will be realized from preventing the growth that would otherwise have occurred.

The social security discussion paper confirmed these parameters and makes sure that the entitlements under EPF–PSE and under CAP will be no higher in 1996–97 than they were for each program in 1993–94.

Beyond 1996–97, EPF–PSE funding will be at best kept stable at the 1996–97 level and no increase in funding for CAP or its successors should be anticipated beyond 1996–97.

If any additional savings are required to help meet the government's fiscal targets they will be announced in the 1995 budget.

In the meantime the government is listening attentively to the views of Canadians and of the parliamentary committees that are now engaged in discussions about social programs and fiscal issues.

GLIDING SCHOOL

Mr. Gilbert Fillion (Chicoutimi, BQ): Mr. Speaker, the eastern region gliding school at the Chicoutimi—Saint–Honoré airport in the Saguenay has been in operation since 1978.

Sixteen years of operation during which the school was assessed yearly by the authorities of the Royal Canadian Air Cadets and given full marks. Also sixteen years of operation at a location that is considered ideal. The Chicoutimi—Saint–Honoré airport is located in a truly outstanding site, in a rural area offering numerous advantages in terms of room to maneuver and safety.

In September, authorities in charge of the cadets asked for a feasibility study with a view to moving the gliding school from Chicoutimi–Saint–Honoré, in the Saguenay, to Saint–Jean.

Last Wednesday, socio–economic stakeholders in the region presented Major Dumontet and Lieutenant–Colonel Chartrand with an analysis of the Chicoutimi–Saint–Honoré site. Besides stating advantages of the Chicoutimi–Saint–Honoré site that were never disputed, the study emphasized major security problems at Saint–Jean. We have proof and aviation experts agree that our concerns are justified.

Nothing came out of the meeting with the people in charge of the cadets. Quite the contrary, the answers they gave us added to our concern. Therefore, because the decision appeared imminent, I asked the Minister of National Defence to impose a moratorium long enough to leave the Cadet headquarters sufficient time to address the concerns of the Chicoutimi—Saint–Honoré committee and, in particular, to make the best decision.

Since the survival of a school which has been operating in our area for 16 years and which has generated substantial economic spin–off is at stake, we repeat our request for the feasibility study to justify the move to Saint–Jean.

We also ask for a second evaluation by Transport Canada of both airport sites, mainly from a security point of view.

The evasive answer the minister gave us led us to believe that everything was done behind closed doors and that he was not even advised. My question enabled him to learn that this whole reorganization was being planned in dark back rooms, away from the scrutiny of those concerned, and, therefore, without any consultation.

The people of Saguenay—Lac Saint–Jean do not want to have to put up with the same bungling as the people of Saint–Jean, when the military college was closed. There should be greater transparency when consulting with the committee, for the preservation of eastern region gliding school. Why rob Peter to pay Paul? This is the question.

Mr. John English (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Intergovernmental Affairs, Lib.): Mr. Speaker, the Eastern Region Gliding School was situated in St–Honoré in the early 1970s because suitable accommodations for the cadets were available and the airport was conducive to glider training operations.

However several factors have resulted in the recommendation of the eastern region cadet staff to relocate the summer cadet gliding operations from the civilian airfield in St–Honoré to the municipal airport in St–Jean. The reasons are several.

First, one has to consider the ongoing efforts to reduce costs and improve the efficiency of cadet training.

Second, there is a substantial commercial cost required to house and feed the cadets in Chicoutimi.

Third, there are operational inefficiencies involved in moving aircraft and personnel resources every summer from the home base at the St–Jean airport, where are located the hangar and the offices, to the training location in St–Honoré, which is located at a distance of approximately 350 miles.

Finally one must note the decrease in the usage of the St–Jean megaplex coupled with improvement to the St–Jean airport.

Prior to undertaking the operational and financial analysis, full support for the proposal was received from the city of St–Jean, subject to noise reduction concerns. In accordance with Canadian law an environmental impact analysis was conducted.

A comparison of operations and flight safety measures between the airfields at St–Honoré and St–Jean clearly indicated the following benefits: an annual saving of approximately $300,000 generated primarily by reduced costs of housing and feeding of staff and the air cadets at the CFB St–Jean megaplex.

Second is the availability of the main operating base hangar at the St–Jean airport to which the gliders and tow aircraft can be rapidly moved, thereby eliminating the possibility of environmental damage from the wind or hail compared to the situation at the St–Honoré base where the gliders and tow aircraft remain in the open over the entire summer training period.

Furthermore there is the non–restrictive glider takeoff and climb procedures at St–Jean compared to the restrictive ones imposed by the Chicoutimi airport authorities as a result of the noise concerns of St–Honoré residents.

In conclusion, flight safety is our number one consideration. This proposed move would not have been recommended if we had any concerns over flight safety.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Kilger): Let me express season's greetings to Canadians from coast to coast to coast.
